When this reporter was about to leave the mid-town studio of Dorothy Maynor, she rushed ahead of him to the hall closet, took out his top-coat and stood on tip-toe to help him slip it on. After a little struggle, which he won, she folded her hands on her breast, curtsied and said, "Thank you. Thank you so much for coming up."

Nothing that happened in the hour your correspondent passed in her company could give you a clearer idea of the childlike humility of the Negro soprano whom Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, has called "a native Flagstad."

But still it conveys no picture of the Methodist preacher's daughter from Virginia who, at her New York debut in Town Hall the night before, had achieved a triumph that recalled the first appearances in this musically blase town of such artists as Heifetz, Menuhin and Flagstad herself.

In appearance, Miss Maynor, who is twenty-eight, is like a Polynesian, and Gauguin might have delighted in her. She has the glow and shy gayety of a jungle bird. Short and plump, she is the kind of girl of whom O. Henry said that the eyes and the hair continued growing after she, herself, had stopped.

Anxious to Please

There's sun in her skin of gold-powdered tan, in her melting deep-brown eyes, in her slightly husky sing-song speaking voice, in her smile that reminds you of a child bewildered by too many toys and sweets on Christmas morning.

All she could say of her recital on Sunday night was that she was "still tied in knots." She had been terribly nervous; she had felt such a tremendous responsibility toward the people who had done and said kind things; she had been so anxious not to disappoint any one.

Judging from the scenes in Town Hall at the close of her concert and what the critics wrote the next day, Miss Maynor lived up to expectations. At the end of her last group of songs she gave two encores—Richard Strauss' "Zueignung" and the aria, "Depuis le Jour," from Charpentier's opera "Louise." But the audience wouldn't go. They stood, cheering and waving hats and handkerchiefs, until it became apparent that the soprano, after her taxing program, had decided to sing no more that evening.

Then some three hundred rushed up to the stage and almost crushed the little singer. Among the enthusiasts were many singers who couldn't wait to welcome her into the lyric fraternity—Frederick Jagel, Elisabeth Schumann, Rose Bampton, Edward Johnson, Hope Manning, Jessica Dragonette, James Melton and two distinguished artists of the debutante's own race—Paul Robeson and Roland Hayes.

Miss Maynor didn't remember what they had told her. "They all said wonderful things to me," was all she could recall, and she was glad when it was over.

And the critics? Her voice, said Mr. Downes, was "phenomenal for its range, character and varied expressive resources," and Mr. Chotzinoff used such phrases as "a most appealing quality," "exquisite singing" and "a pianissimo without a rival."

Miss Maynor was completely overwhelmed by all this praise. She was grateful, deeply grateful, she twittered with one of her warm smiles, and she realized that it meant more responsibility, more hard work with her teacher, John Alan Haughton, with her instructors in German and French.

Her Daily Schedule

"I'm up every morning at 6:30," she said. "I study music for an hour and do an hour of French and an hour of German. Then comes my singing lesson and after lunch I start all over again. Yes, that is my schedule every-day."

How did it all happen? Well, she had studied for three years but until three months ago nobody knew her outside of her home town of Norfolk, Va., and a few blocks of uptown New York. Then, in August, a friend had advised her to get away from the city for a while and she'd gone up to New England.

There Mrs. Gorham Brooks, on whose estate, Tanglewood, the Berkshire Music Festivals are given, had taken her to Dr. Koussevitzky. Yes, Mrs. Brooks had been a friend for some years. The first time she met the Boston maestro was at a morning rehearsal of the orchestra at Tanglewood. Dr. Koussevitzky had just rehearsed a ticklish passage with his double basses, and Miss Maynor thought he wasn't in the best of humor.

Here's What Happened

But she was supposed to sing for him that day and sing she did in the empty shell that holds 6,000 people, with Dr. Koussevitzky sitting in the third row in solitary and somewhat peevish grandeur. She sang Handel's "O Sleep Why Dost Thou Leave Me" and Pamina's aria from Mozart's "The Magic Flute." After that Dr. Koussevitzky brightened up considerably but, said Miss Maynor with a giggle, she couldn't possibly tell her visitor what he had said and done.

The Post man got this information from other sources. Dr. Koussevitzky jumped up and down, shouting "A miracle! A miracle! A musical revelation! The world must hear her! The world must hear this voice!"

Next day, at Dr. and Mrs. Koussevitzky's annual picnic for the orchestra men and their wives, she sang a complete recital, and after the final concert of the festival the conductor had her sing again, for a group of Boston and New York cognoscenti, in the orchestra's tuning shed.

A terrific storm broke while Miss Maynor sang a florid Mozart aria in the flimsy little building but she didn't know it until friends told her about it later.

"All I knew," she told your reporter, "was that the rain was coming through a broken window and beating me in the face."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
NOV 22 1939

Two Varieties Of Americans Portrayed in Music

Dr. Koussevitzky Conducts Works by Schuman, Thompson

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

No conductor on the modern scene—and this is the age of great conductors—has the assimilative faculty of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The only two others who could be mentioned in the same breath simply haven't it at all.

Koussevitzky is the true cosmopolite, the gourmet of musical taste who not only appreciates a savor but knows its components. He is as canny about French music of any period as he is of Russian or English, classical German as of Spanish and conjures them all with the same gusto.

Those who have heard him speak our language in his quaint and charmingly unique accent would doubt that the tune "Dixie" meant any more to him than would the music of MacDowell or Griffes or Stephen Foster. Yet in Boston they refer to him as the "Godfather of American Composers," a title which might be thought just a fond compliment except for the abundant evidence that he has earned it. That he understands American music is not to be doubted.

Two Kinds of Americans

Of course there are as many different kinds of American music as there are Americans but that makes no difference with Koussevitzky. Last night in Bushnell Hall at the second concert of the Symphonic Series the Boston Orchestra played two kinds and regarding the first example the audience was considerably more perplexed than was Koussevitzky, although they gave an exceedingly cordial ovation to the composer, William Schuman, who arose from his seat in the ninth row and was finally persuaded to come forward.

His American Festival Overture is young, loud, swaggering, good-humored and yet truculent. It is short but broad-shouldered; it wears a checked-pattern suit with tight trousers, and a hat pulled over one eye; it whistles through its teeth and packs a wallop, see? It makes me think of James Cagney. And Koussevitzky, gnomish and understanding, gives you just about that.

Then there was Randall Thompson's Symphony No. 2 in E minor. It was as American as the Chamber of Commerce and a comfortable home; as American as spoiled children and plain sentiments. It was more so than a work that will probably always be more popular, the "New World Symphony." Dvorak's classic is mentioned only because there appears to be a similarity of derivation, particularly in Thompson's last movement.

Definition of Music

Dr. Koussevitzky could not have better projected either of these works had he been born in Yonkers or Yakima. The Largo was singularly moving and the audience seemed impulsively bent on applause when it was over. After all, music may be said to be this and that, through endless pages of definition, but there is room for neither dependent clauses nor dissent if we simply agree that: Music is a melody. It does not have to be sweetly linked nor long drawn out, provided it speaks a thought for which words were never made.

It was not intended to linger so long over these two compositions because both were reviewed in these columns after a hearing in Symphony Hall last month but it is significant that Koussevitzky continues to put them on his programs and neither sounds less important upon second hearing.

Familiar D Minor

The leader of the Bostonians did no less for Cesar Franck than he did for the Americans. The D minor has been heard at Bushnell oftener perhaps than any other symphony, but there is no regret that it was included last night. Koussevitzky made pretty serious business of it and conveyed a sense of soul-shaking struggle in the first movement which too often is looked upon as the pensive self-preachments of a morbid organist. He imparted to it drama and the grip of reality which gave all the more sense to the philosophy of the second movement and the eventual triumph. Koussevitzky, who has never made a reputation in the theater, has a thorough awareness of dramatic elements. This he shares with the greatest composers and interpreters of all time. It is a more important musical factor than is generally reckoned.

Something should be said of the orchestra. Perhaps there will be an opportunity later. "They were better this time than last," as someone remarked, "but don't we always say that?"

THIS CLIPPING FROM VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NOV 22 1939

New Haven

By Harold M. Bone

'Ice Vanities of 1940' at Arena this week (21-25).

Yale Dramat did 'Rope's End' for annual fall production.

Locals trekking to Bridgeport to catch state's only burley at the Lyric Serge Koussevitzky batons Boston Symphy in Woolsey Hall concert tonight (Wednesday).

Simone Simon, Mary Brian, Mitzi Green open 'Three After Three' at Shubert this weekend (24-25).

Larry Hart, Vinton Freedley, Burgess Meredith, Jimmy Durante in for premiere of 'Aries Is Rising' at the Shubert last week.

Jimmy Dorsey resumed one-day vaude at the Arena, Saturday (18); spot formerly operated Sunday vaude but this had been replaced by hockey.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
NOV 22 1939

Boston Symphony Program This Evening

Making the first of their two scheduled appearances here this season as part of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Woolsey Hall this evening, the concert commencing at 8:30. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct, and the program will be as follows:

Mozart—Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"
Hanson—Symphony No. 3
Schumann—Symphony No. 1

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 23 1939

Boston Symphony Here Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will appear tonight at Carnegie Hall for the first time this season, playing an all-American program. It will begin with Arthur Foote's Suite in E for Strings and the Concerto for piano and orchestra by Walter Piston. The program also includes the Roy Harris Third symphony, and Randall Thompson's second Symphony. Jesus Maria Sanroma, Boston pianist, will be solo[illegible] the Piston work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEWS (B'klyn Section)
NOV 23 1939

Boston Orchestra To Begin Series

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will begin a series of five concerts in Brooklyn tomorrow night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The orchestra will devote half of its first program to American composers and soloists.

90-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 23 1939

Stravinsky to Give Musical Poker Game With Boston Symphony Here on Tuesday

Pack of Playing Cards Portrayed by Ballet Dancers

By Selig Greenberg

When Igor Stravinsky, famous Russian composer, conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence next Tuesday night in a program devoted entirely to his own works, he will present the first musical interpretation of a poker game ever written.

The piece, Mr. Stravinsky's latest ballet score, bears the title, "Card Game, In Three Deals." While Providence listeners will have to use their imaginations to follow the moves of Mr. Stravinsky's poker players, the choreography of the ballet, which had its premiere at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York two years ago, depicts in detail the progress of three deals of straight poker, with the dancers portraying the pack of cards.

Choice No Accident

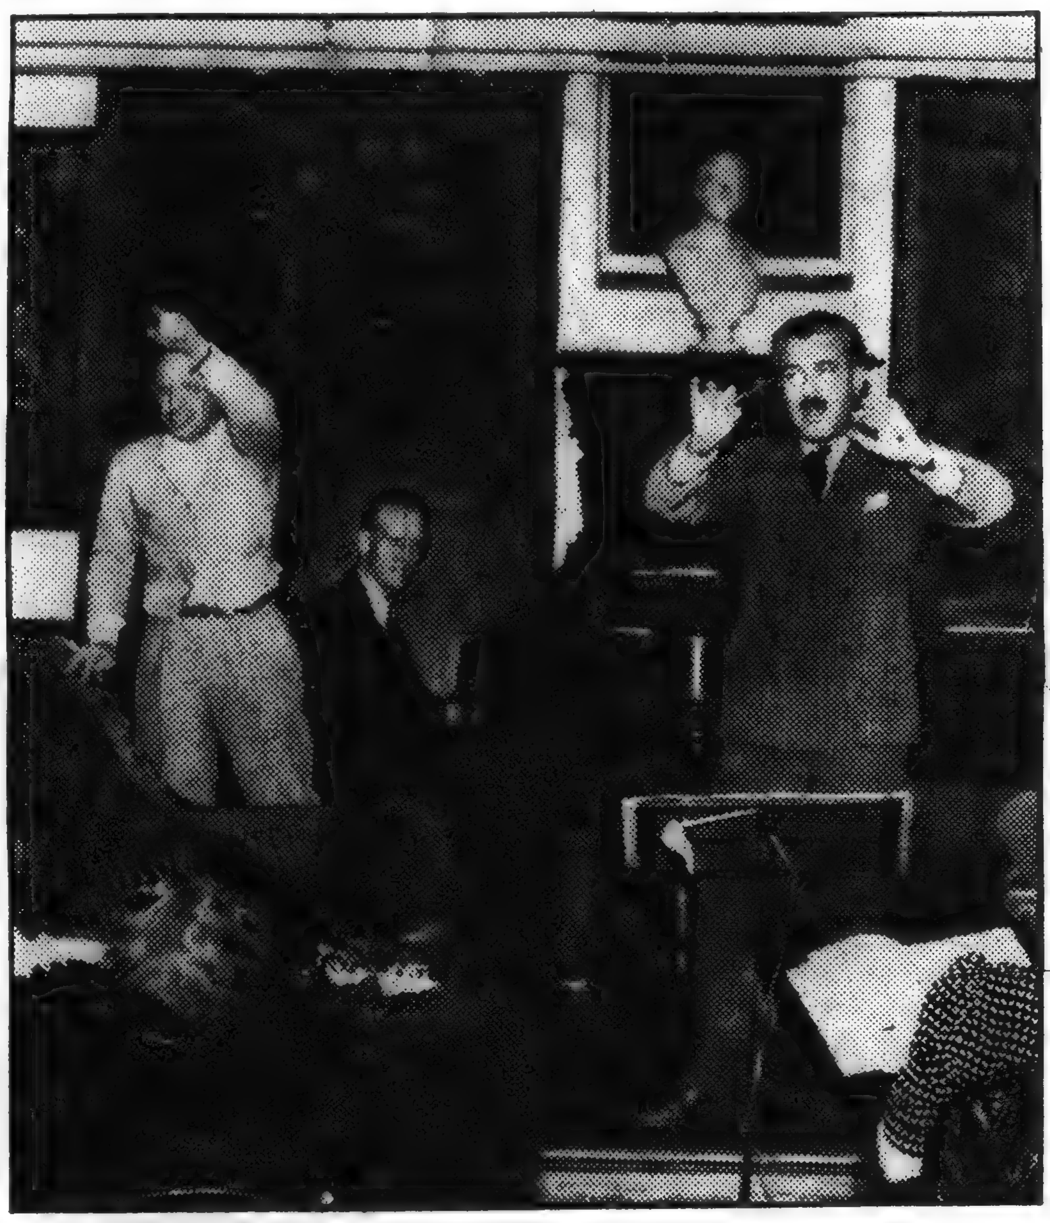
It's probably no accident that Mr. Stravinsky has chosen a poker game as a theme for musical composition. Besides being noted for some of the most startling innovations and trick harmonies in modern music which have repeatedly set the musical world on its ear, he is also an enthusiastic poker player and is known among his intimates to be practically unbeatable at poker sessions.

In an interview in Boston last night, Mr. Stravinsky, who is generally regarded by critics as among the two or three contemporary composers likely to rank with the great masters of music, acknowledged with some deprecation his prowess at poker and insisted that he was only a penny-ante player. He then went on to discuss weightier matters, including his work, the influence of radio on musical appreciation, and his devotion to Bach.

This professed admiration for the greatest of classicists by the No. 1 musical modernist of our time may come as a surprise to concert-goers who have been alternately swept away and scandalized by Mr. Stravinsky's violent, unconventional harmonics and his resort, for the first time in the annals of music, to bitonal counterpoint, that is, the writing simultaneously in two clashing keys.

Doesn't Look Part

The interview took place in the parish house of the Arlington Street Church, during the intermission at a rehearsal by the Cecilia Society. The society, a mixed chorus of about 100 voices, was rehearsing Mr. Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms which it will present together with the Boston Symphony at concerts in Symphony Hall on Dec. 1 and 2.



Igor Stravinsky, on the left, trying hard to get the right pitch and tempo from the Cecilia Choral Society of Boston, while Arthur Fiedler, its regular conductor, contributes his bit at a rehearsal.

There is no known norm for the appearance of genius, but if you were to meet Mr. Stravinsky strolling on the street you would hardly be likely to take him for a genius.

In the spring, summer and fall, you'd probably give him no more than a passing glance, unless you're particularly susceptible to somewhat dandified apparel. In winter time, he probably attracts more attention because he wears an overcoat with a black fur collar, which in this part of the world usually brands a man as either a foreigner or a crank or, at best, a millionaire. A slight, natty, fidgety, myopic little man with horn-rimmed glasses and a clipped mustache, Mr. Stravinsky might be taken for anything but the musician who has written some of the most brilliant, riotous and stirring pages in modern music.

Brimming with Energy

But when Mr. Stravinsky gets behind a piano or a conductor's stand—he did both last night—it doesn't take long to realize that he's no ordinary person. High-strung, brimming over with energy despite his 57 years, his whole body aquiver from head to toes to the rhythm of the music, he instantly rivets all eyes upon himself.

During the two-hour rehearsal last night, he put on a grand show, something almost akin to a modernistic ballet, conducting with the sharp, exact beat of a metronome, galloping across the stage, alternately playing the piano and leaping to his feet and lunging at the chorus, clapping his hands like a spirituals singer, snapping his fingers like a Spanish dancer, beating time with his toes like a tap artist, singing, gesticulating, grimacing, imploring, cajoling in Russian, German and English, insisting upon just the right tempo and proper phrasing of each note even if it had to be done over a dozen or more times, looking occasionally like a cross between a whirling dervish and a man doing his setting-up exercises.

Makes Grand Entrance

After making a grand entrance into the church hall surrounded by an entourage including a young and beauteous blonde, Mr. Stravinsky took off his overcoat with the fur collar and revealed a veritable symphony in color. He was wearing a blue coat with a white handkerchief in his breast pocket, light-grey trousers, a white shirt, a cream-colored tie, brown shoes and blue socks. Before long, after he had warmed up and broken into a sweat, he peeled off his coat and disclosed a light-brown coat-sweater. Mr. Stravinsky's bright-hued sweaters are legend in musical circles, and he never goes to rehearsals without one because he is said to be mortally afraid of drafts.

The chorus, whose members range in age from girls of 20 to men of about 50 or 60 who sing without any compensation and purely for the love of music, performed the Symphony of Psalms several years ago and has had seven rehearsals of the piece during the past few weeks under Arthur Fiedler, its conductor. But this was Mr. Stravinsky's first attendance at the rehearsals and, although Mr. Fiedler had painstakingly whipped the singers into shape, the composer found much that wasn't to his liking and made the chorus go over the whole symphony twice. More rehearsals will take place next week together with the orchestra.

All Over the Place

Suave Mr. Fiedler was at the conductor's stand when the rehearsal got underway and Mr. Stravinsky took his place at the piano beside the accompanist. From the start he placed his hand instinctively on the keyboard and within a minute he was pounding away at the piano, playing four hands together with the accompanist. After that he was all over the place. At times he took over the baton from Mr. Fiedler, a few seconds later he would be back at the piano, then he would again leap to his feet or slap his hands on his knees, like a metronome, counting loudly, "Eins, zwei, drei, vier, one, two, three, four!"

"More crescendo," he implored, "more, more!" And then, a minute later: "Pianissimo, please, delicate, transparent!"

When intermission time came, Mr. Stravinsky, like the chorus, was quite exhausted but he agreed to be interviewed for a few minutes.

Subsidized as Poet

He said he was now dividing his time between working on a "Classical Symphony" and occasional lectures at Harvard. Mr. Stravinsky, it should be explained, is filling this year the Charles Eliot Norton Chair of Poetry at Harvard. He is, of course, no poet within the strict meaning of that term, but Harvard authorities are wisely inclined to accept an extremely wide interpretation of the meaning of "poetry" when it comes to subsidizing genius.

His reference to the "Classical Symphony" brought the question whether it was true, as some critics have said, that he had given up his earlier musical idiosyncracies and was now "returning to Bach" and conservatism.

"One is always with Bach," Mr. Stravinsky replied, a bit tartly. "I was never far from Bach. I have always been a pupil of Bach. It's wrong to call me now a neo-classicist. I have always been classical."

Greek Orthodox Christian

In discussing his Symphony of Psalms, which had aroused some surprise when it was written several years ago because Mr. Stravinsky is primarily famous for his celebration of the pagan rites of Russian mythology in his early ballet scores, the composer said it was an expression of his deep religious feeling. "I've always been a religious Greek Orthodox Christian," he declared.

Mr. Stravinsky hasn't been in his native Russia since 1914 and said he never expects to go back there. He has spent most of the past 25 years in Switzerland and France and declined to be drawn into a discussion of his opinion of the Soviet regime.

He was more voluble in talking about radio, which he said "has done as much good as bad" and while it has brought good music to people who had never heard it before, has also resulted in the evils of passivity.

Sees Bad In Radio

"The absence of active effort and the liking acquired for this facility make for laziness," he said. "Listeners fall into a kind of torpor which deprives them of all power of discrimination and makes them indifferent to the quality of the pieces presented."

At this point the rehearsal was resumed and Mr. Stravinsky was forced to bring to a close the polylingual interview—conducted in a mixture of Russian, German, French and English—and went back to his jumping around like a Jack-in-the-box.

In addition to his poker ballet, Mr. Stravinsky will also conduct at the concert here Tuesday night the "Firebird" and "Petrouchka," two of his most popular ballet suites, and the Capricio for Piano and Orchestra, in which Jesus Maria Sanroma will appear as soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NORFOLK, VA.
VIRGINIAN PILOT

NOV 23 1939

Norfolk Singer Wins New York Critics' Praise

Dorothy Maynor Called 'Born Singer' and 'Consummate Artist'

New York music critics have been lavish in their praise of Dorothy Maynor, Negro soprano, who was born and raised in Norfolk and who is a graduate of the Hampton Institute, class of 1933.

Olin Downes, of the New York Times, perhaps the most distinguished of the critics who attended the soprano's debut in Town Hall, New York, Sunday night, wrote that her "voice is phenomenal for its range, character and varied expressive resources. The voice has power as well as rich color. The opper tones can be widely dramatic, and need never be forced. There are many different tone-qualities available, and the voice, because of the singer's sensibility, changes color constantly in response to mood and dramatic inflection. Miss Maynor also is a good musician, with knowledge of style, a fine ear, inherent taste as well as sincerity.

"Saying these things, it is immediately to be added that she gave different kinds of performances. . . . She proved that she had everything needed by a great artist—the superb voice, one of the finest the public can hear today; exceptional musicianship and accuracy of intonation; emotional intensity, communicative power. Her breath control is extraordinary, and it enables her to phrase with wonderful beauty and distinction of melodic line, and to maintain an exquisite pianissimo. Elsewhere, and no doubt largely as a result of nervousness, she was not at her tonal or interpretive best, and was inclined to force and to forget properly 'to cover' her upper tones, which were not always free.

"There were unforgettable performances of such songs as the Handel 'Sleep, Why Dost Thou Leave Me;' certain of the Schumann and Schubert songs; passages of Mozart, notably in the Pamina aria, and the superb performance of the aria from 'Louise,' which she sang as an encore and which had better have been heard by the whole audience earlier in the evening. Here she was the consummate artist. . . .

"The singing of Schumann's 'Du bist wie eine Blume' was an example not only of the beauty of the pianissimo but the manner in which, in the very tone itself, as created by Miss Maynor, the mood and emotional color of the situation is inherent—with or without the text; a characteristic of the born singer.

Gives Schubert Composition

"The simplicity of Schubert is always an infallible test of a singer's sincerity, and with the first notes of 'Gretchen am Spinnrade' the singer had seized her audience. . . .

"It was inevitable that Miss Maynor would be asked to sing a group of Negro spirituals. Two of these, including the second, 'By and By,' she did very beautifully. Best of all this group was the encore, sung without accompaniment, with remarkable tonal beauty and intensity of feeling—'The Crucifixion.'"

Unusual attention was received by the former Norfolk woman from other newspapers, as well as the New York Times. She had become famous for her voice even before she made her New York debut, and tickets for her concert were sold out several weeks in advance. Last summer, she was hailed by Serge Koussevitsky, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as a "native Flagstad."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NORFOLK, VA.
LEDGER DISPATCH

NOV 23 1939

Critics Acclaim Norfolk Singer

Negro Soprano Gives Concert in New York

Dorothy Maynor, Norfolk-born Negro soprano, has been acclaimed by New York music critics as a result of her concert debut in Town Hall there Sunday.

As related in the Ledger-Dispatch last summer, she is a daughter of the Rev. John J. Mainor, formerly a Negro minister here, and a sister of John J. Mainor, Jr., who has been employed as a caulker by the city water division. The spelling of her name has been changed to Maynor for professional reasons.

The soprano was a graduate of the Hampton Institute, class of 1933. She has received wide publicity since Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, hailed her as a "native Flagstad."

"Her voice is phenomenal for its range, character and varied expressive resources," Olin Downes wrote in the New York Times. "The voice has power as well as rich color. The upper tones can be widely dramatic, and need never be forced. There are many different tone qualities available, and the voice because of the singer's sensibility, changes color constantly in response to mood and dramatic inflection. Miss Maynor also is a good musician, with knowledge of style, a fine ear, inherent taste as well as sincerity."

91

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

NOV 23 1939

Damrosch Heads His List of Ten Greatest Musical Personalities

Pierre Key, College Club Speaker; Refers to Nelson Eddy as Big Money Maker

Because of his fine musicianship and his outstanding work as an educator, Pierre V. R. Key, speaking yesterday afternoon before the College Club in the Woman's Club House, put the veteran Walter Damrosch at the head of his list of 10 greatest musical personalities. No musician has made a greater contribution to music in America than Damrosch, said Mr. Key.

Toscanini and Paderewski, Hoffman and Rachmaninoff were next in line closely followed by Kreisler, Flagstad, Marion Anderson, Stokowski and Tibbett. Others who would rank up in a longer list were Heifitz, Pons, Koussevitzky and Martinelli. Lower on the list came Spalding, Horowitz, Lehmann, Pinza, John Charles Thomas, Crooks and Bonelli.

Mr. Key pointed out that with so many individual tastes it was quite impossible for all persons to agree on a group of artists but that if one considered it from the standpoint of native and acquired ability, the position extended the artist by the public, and his length of service before the public, it was then possible to make comparisons and finally a choice.

Calls This "Hooey"

Mr. Key branded as "hooey" the new seating arrangement of the Philadelphia orchestra, saying that Walter Damrosch tried the same thing some 25 years ago and found it unsatisfactory. In the new arrangement wood winds and brasses are in front where strings were formerly. Mr. Key doubted that if one were blindfolded, one could tell what orchestra was playing, except for outstanding characteristics and this also applied to conductors. Maintaining that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the greatest orchestra in the world, Mr. Key did not put its conductor in the first 10 group. He praised his reading of modern scores but felt that his readings of the classical works were not equal to the readings of other conductors.

Toscanini with his artistic integrity makes no concessions with the written note, playing the music as nearly as possible as the composer meant it to be played. Rachmaninoff and Hoffman are both great musicians and both have made notable contributions to music, said the speaker. He spoke intimately of the Hoffman genius for invention as well as his pianistic talent.

Eddy's Big Income

Speaking particularly of Nelson Eddy, whom he does not feel has paid the attention to the esthetic side of his art that he might have, Mr. Key spoke of the fabulous sums the baritone earns each year. A picture will net him $125,000, a concert perhaps $4200 and a radio appearance $2500, less taxes and managerial fees. Making half a million dollars a year sometimes lessens the esthetic urge, Mr. Key decided. The speaker wondered that if and when Eddy might decide to do serious work and enter the Metropolitan, if it would be too late.

Mr. Key paid tribute to the sincerity and artistry of Albert Spalding and the spirituality and intelligence of Marion Anderson and Roland Hayes. Speaking of the Negro soprano, Dorothy Maynor, who made her debut in New York Sunday night and who was hailed at Stockbridge last summer as a great singer by Koussevitzky, Mr. Key said that she showed great promise and would surely go places. She was naturally on a spot after so much advance publicity but she came through extremely well.

In concluding his remarks, Mr. Key said that after all, his choice of artists was a personal matter but looking at them from the standpoint of their contribution to music, their length of service and their own personal qualities, he had decided in his own mind the artists named.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 23 1939

Music

BOSTON SYMPHONY OLD FAVORITE PLEASES AS EVER

The stability of our times is pleasantly shown in the regular visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, once in the fall and again in the spring of the year. Last evening the familiar artists comprising this great ensemble were arrayed before us; for that matter, we must have a familiar lock to them as they survey the hall. Dr. Koussevitsky was greeted with the usual fervor, and the evening might have been any concert in the Woolsey Series since 1923.

Three works comprised the evening's music, the Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" by Mozart, Schumann's First Symphony in B-flat, and, for novelty, the Third Symphony by Howard Hanson. From the reviewer's point of view, adjectives and enthusiasm may well be exhausted on the first item, for no more perfect work can be found in the repertory of any orchestra. Mozart succeeded in writing works which give the players much joy in performance, for the rushing scale-passages requiring the ultimate in neatness of execution, the tiny figure resembling a baroque embellishment, and the exciting rhythm offer problems to which players rise with professional glee.

American Way

Mr. Hanson paints his colors in broad strokes on a large canvas; his scores are always lively and interesting, if they do not, in all cases, seem worth the striving. A son of the North by birthright, he acknowledges in his music the same idioms generally associated with Sibelius, a worthy model. Every composer worth his salt has had imitators, and every composer granting him proper debt to his elders flatters them by imitation. The brass and the drum are common property since the days of Beethoven, even if Mr. Hanson's elders did not demand so consistent pumping of one, or such a wallop on the latter. The present symphony shows its creator's technical mastery in all respects, causing one to blush a little for Schumann's lack of ease before the orchestra. The symphony has many merits apparent on first hearing and, doubtless, others to be gained on further occasions; let us, then, refrain from hasty judgments and accept, if not acclaim, this as a pleasant occupation for a musically susceptible chancellor of the Eastman School of Music in Rochester.

Dr. Koussevitsky remembers the symphonies of Robert Schumann more often than most conductors. Audiences are always made comfortable before them because of their deep sincerity and loveliness of melodic materials; and so the First appealed by reason of these considerable virtues, the more so since our contemporaries too often lack these graces of the spirit.

Regret

It remains to our embarrassment that New Haven is deprived of hearing one of the concerts of American music which stirred Boston several weeks ago, and are this week being given in New York. Dr. Koussevitsky has elected to repeat many of the works given in those two memorable events as opening programs for the New York season, adding other American works from contemporary lists. The whole remains, both in retrospect and in prospect, one of the most important moves ever made in this country toward helping us to find ourselves musically.

A public, such as our own, which professes abhorrence of many of the ills stalking the world today should be directed toward the positive measures of cultivating that which is free of prejudice, democratic in plan and performance, and the creation of a free spirit. The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to New Haven, under auspices traditionally bound to explore new fields, encourage the spread of knowledge, and act as beneficent center of cultural experience. The present instance is a negation of those factors and audiences should be apprized of the fact. Whereas Boston and New York give overwhelming support to two representative programs of American music, New Haven apparently is not deemed ready for this departure from the conventional.

H. EARLE JOHNSON

Boston Orchestra Plays in Hartford

Trans. Nov 23

Top hats and white ties overflowed Hartford's huge Bushnell Memorial Hall Tuesday night for the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Thanksgiving week-end tour. Dr. Kousevitzky and his men made a specially American occasion of the evening by devoting the first half of the program to two native composers: Schuman and Thompson. After the intermission came the Cesar Franck Symphony.

It was interesting to note the feeling of curiosity that pervaded the multitude as Dr. Koussevitzky stepped to the podium for William Schuman's "Festival Overture." Would the audience approve this invigorating work by our 29-year-old composer? They did, and so much so that composer Schuman was beckoned from his audience seat to take a well-applauded bow.

But it was in the thoroughly fresh and captivating Symphony of Randall Thompson (No. 2 in E minor) that the spirit and rhythm of the American idiom caught the audience. More than one person in the audience moved with the danceable tempos, and there was a quiet undercurrent of approval, which merged into a ten-second hush after the last note had sounded. Then, with deafening applause that did not die until Dr. Kousevitzky returned repeatedly, the enthusiastic listeners voiced their emotions.

Audience Comments

During intermission, your reporter, in an inquisitive mood, listened to remarks about the music. Interesting were old generation comments versus new. One matron was heard to say she liked it, but found it hard to take, while her daughter kept repeating that the American works are among the finest pieces of music written.

In Cesar Franck's D minor Symphony the familiar themes flowed easily and smoothly and one was conscious of a relaxing and soothing effect upon the audience. At the end of the evening one felt that here was music well balanced. The audience showed complete unanimity of thought in not arising from their seats until Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra had three times acknowledged the applause.

P. D. S.

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON HERE

N.Y. Times Nov. 24

Koussevitzky Directs Program Devoted to Symphonies by American Composers

CARNEGIE HALL IS PACKED

Brilliant Audience Applauds Long and Vigorously for Each Performance

By OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a program consisting entirely of American music at the opening concert of their New York season last night in Carnegie Hall.

To the best of the writer's recollection this is the first time that a leading orchestra of the country has devoted two of its subscription concerts exclusively to symphonic works by native composers. Dr. Koussevitzky believes that Americans have produced enough music and to spare that is worthy of such exploitation. He himself has been exceptionally curious as to the product and encouraging to American creative musicians from the time of his arrival in this country fifteen years ago.

In fact the entire program of yesterday evening consisted of works that the Boston Symphony Orchestra had already played at various concerts, although on the previous occasions they had been interspersed with European scores. These two programs of American music—that of last night and that which will be played tomorrow afternoon—represent a selection from one hundred and twenty-six compositions by forty-seven American composers which Dr. Koussevitzky has performed during his tenure of office at the head of the Boston Symphony.

Works Vigorously Applauded

It is a pleasure to record, before statements of personal opinions of the music heard last night, that Carnegie Hall was packed for this occasion with a very brilliant and representative audience, and that each performance was long and vigorously applauded. How much of this applause proceeded from the sympathy of the audience for the native sons and how much was induced by playing so finished in technique and so glorious in its euphony and richness of color that much poorer music would have sounded with deceptive magnificence could be matters for debate. In any event, the occasion constituted a public welcome and an artistic triumph for the courageous step taken in the composition of the program.

This program consisted of Arthur Foote's E major suite for string orchestra, Walter Piston's "Concertino" for piano and orchestra, with Jesus Sanroma as soloist; Roy Harris's Third symphony and Randall Thompson's Second symphony. The music was full of interesting and suggestive contrasts. Each work was unlike the others, in technic, style, approach and development of subject-matter. And each was well written, and some put down with sheer virtuosity—above all, in this respect, the "Concertino" of Mr. Piston.

This might not have been the case twenty-five years ago in this country. Certainly, at that time, no program which presented one American composer no longer living but three in their creative prime would have demonstrated such craftsmanship and thorough acquaintance with the modern devices of the art. There were some pages, in different places, not as strong as others. But in no case was there technical ineptitude or amateurish orchestration. This program alone would have demonstrated that the day is past when any American composer need be told that he doesn't know his business.

Importance to Future Seen

This is important: not only for the present, but even more important for the future, because it means that at last our composers have sharpened their weapons and learned how to use their tools.

However, the leading question is yet to be considered. Admitted all the highly creditable facts just cited, what had the composers to say?

The Foote Suite is charming, not highly original; in the first movement redolent of Schumann; in the second, the pizzicato, inescapably reminiscent of a certain familiar symphonic movement of Tschaikovsky; yet entertaining, written with sincerity, refinement and grace in the style of an earlier day; and, in the case of the final fugue—certainly the best of the three movements—constructed with genuine skill and created with musical passion. It is music. It grows and accumulates as it sweeps to a climax—the work of a true maker of beautiful sounds, who long since won the high respect bestowed upon him in his lifetime and now accorded his memory.

Came the exhilarating technic and the nervous flight of Mr. Piston's highly modern "concertino." It is a work remarkably made, reminding one in some pages of Hindemith. It is not all polytonal counterpoint either. The middle part has a Hindemithian shadow, a dark and brooding quality, with much color, some melodic substance, but little actual invention.

Then the fast movement returns and there is an electrical conclusion. The thing is that this music remains dry, juiceless, in a sense academic; for you do not have to be somnolent to be academic, or even old-fashioned. This very expert music of Mr. Piston often ticks, and one feels a mild curiosity to take apart the clock-work. But the curiosity is only mild. There is more music, in this writer's belief, in other scores of Mr. Piston. The orchestral performance was of the finest; the piano part was played with soundest musicianship and fingers of quicksilver by Mr. Sanroma. As virtuoso and musician he would have deserved anywhere the homage he received.

Mr. Harris's symphony is a striking advance, according to last night's impression, over his previous work in the same form, and, indeed, over his other instrumental compositions that we have heard. It is much clearer, stripped to simplicities, shaped with great care. The opening is striking in the breadth, the fashioning and the spacious intervals of the main theme, not in itself distinguished or fascinating, but projected with a fine starkness, yet suppleness of line, against a meager tonal background. Some might say that the heroic bare hills and plains of parts of America could have inspired that. Others might discover in it more direct relationship to plainchant, of which Mr. Harris has made an earnest study in recent years. This introduction, however, demands much to complete it, and that "much" is not wholly forthcoming.

Figures for Strings

There is a lighter passage of some length, with persistent waving figures for the strings, and short singing phrases put over them. But, while the sonorous effect is pleasing, the passage does not impress the listener as being more than a bridge for connecting two places. A passage that comes considerably later, an ostinato over a drum-beat, is the most immediately effective passage in the symphony. The final part falls short, because it does not really get anywhere. A short and explosive motto theme hurls out from brass instruments; it twists and turns about, in and on itself. Can one say that here, either, is a genuine musical fruition?

For us there is the spectacle of a highly encouraging advance over Mr. Harris's earlier symphony; of a work, written in one movement, but which, essentially, seemed almost to drop apart into an introduction and a three-section structure, which seems divided in parts none too well fitted together. Or, on paper, they may fit. But the eye is not the ear.

Mr. Thompson's symphony is commendable for its unaffected and spontaneous ease of manner, its real melodic content, its lack of portentousness. There is much in it that is Negroid, as for instance the opening theme; the "blues" song of the middle movement, so short, as though it feared to attempt development. One must admit that the scherzo is mostly a rhythmic figure which keeps repeating, while the listener says, "Good boy; but, now that you've got the preliminaries out of the way, what's your theme?"

A Rythmic Profile

That theme does not materialize. It may be remarked that this would not be the first scherzo to hurry along without any real theme except a certain rhythmic profile. The best movement is surely the finale, the glorification of the singing theme, its alternation with other matter, and the peroration, which delighted the audience. It is a symphony which is slight of material slight in other dimensions, but melodic, expressive, attempting no more than its nature justifies, expressing high spirits, sentimentality, zest. The ideas are mostly short-breathed. Sequences, as also in another way by Mr. Harris, are overworked, etc. But a symphony by a real musician, palpably an American, with an entertaining style.

The concert was rewarding, and not only to the composers, most of them present, and called in turn to the platform to acknowledge the applause.

92

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 24 1939

Koussevitzky Conducts Four U.S. Works Here

Leads Boston Orchestra in Music by Foote, Piston, Harris and Thompson

By Jerome D. Bohm

The most adventurous and courageous of our orchestral program builders, Serge Koussevitzky, faced his first audience of the season in Carnegie Hall last night, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in music exclusively by American composers. The works brought forth were Arthur Foote's Suite in E major for Strings, Op. 63; Walter Piston's Concertino, in which the piano solo part was played by Jesus Maria Sanroma; Roy Harris's Third Symphony and the Second Symphony in E minor of Randall Thompson.

All of these had been heard here previously, the Foote Suite as recently as last week when it was performed by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra; but the Harri Symphony had been given here only once before.

!!

The Foote Suite, although penned in 1937, the year the composer died at the age of fifty-four, might easily have been written in the nineteenth century. Both the Prelude and the Fugue with which it closes are romantic treatments of classic forms and the Pizzicato and Adagietto reveal unmistakably the influences of Tschaikovsky, Schumann and Wagner.

A generation separates Mr. Piston's Concertino from the Foote Suite, and Mr. Piston, who does not compose in the manner of Handel, Tchaikovsky, Schumann or Wagner, but who is not unaware of the existence of Hindemith, among others, is one of the technically best-equipped of our music makers. His Concertino crackles with wit and good spirits and is not without its moments of sentiment, although these seem to come less naturally to him than his sprightliness. Mr. Sanroma, whose flair for modern music is well known, set forth the piano part brilliantly.

By far the most impressive music of the evening was the Harris symphony. This is truly autochthonous music. No one but an American could have created this score which is redolent of our soil. There is a genuine sweep and the evocation of the tremendous open spaces of this country therein akin to the "Frontier" of Martha Graham. There can be no question here of mere intellectualization as with so much modern music; the emotional reaction it creates in the listener is direct and immediate.

It was perhaps inevitable that much of Mr. Thompson's well-made, facilely tuneful symphony should sound dated following the powerful impact of the Harris symphony. Its harmonic idiom is definitely of a kind which has become part and parcel of our purveyors of popular music; the thematic material of the largo movement has all the characteristics of a song hit.

The performances were one and all superb—whether in the Foote suite, where the orchestra's strings played with glowing translucence, or in the Harris symphony, where the tonal masses were of overwhelming solidity. Mr. Koussevitzky disclosed the broad scope of his musical sympathies, interpreting each work in the style peculiarly fitted to a veracious conveyance of its contents. The huge audience received some of this music cordially, some of it with unusual demonstrations of approval, and Messrs. Piston, Harris and Thompson were present to acknowledge the applause.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 24 1939

WORDS About Music And Musicians

Asher B. Zlotnik, son of Mr. and Mrs. Philip Zlotnik of 161 Barbour St., who is enrolled at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia, is studying orchestration with Randall Thompson, whose Second Symphony was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday evening at Bushnell Memorail.

* * *

The recorded program for the Sunday at Five at the Hartford School of Music this week will be all-Sibelius and will consist of "The Swan of Tuonela" and the second Sympathy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

NOV 24 1939

Boston Symphony Begins Visits

Koussevitzky Conducts an All-American Concert—Three Composers Take Bows.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

Three native-born composers took the platform to bow in the course of the concert of American music which opened the Boston Symphony's fifty-fourth New York season in Carnegie Hall last night. They were Walter Piston, whose birth State is Maine; Roy Harris, who began life in Oklahoma, and Randall Thompson, a New Yorker whose activity as a musical educator has been divided between the East and West coasts.

Also on the program was a work by Arthur Foote, the Boston composer of an elder generation who died two years ago after a career that was long and full of honor. His music was the Suite in E major which was performed recently by the Philharmonic at a pair of concerts. The suite dates back to 1907 and it is one of the oddities of program-making that it now should make this double re-entry. But it is well worth playing, particularly the clearly written fugue at the close.

Serge Koussevitzky saw to it that the four American compositions had not merely adequate but brilliant performances. That accorded Mr. Piston's Concertino for piano and orchestra had the benefit of the flying fingers of Jesus Maria Sanroma, an artist with a particular flair for modern works which breeze along, rather than languish, and which require a jaunty rather than a romantic approach. Some of the concertino is more than a little xylophonic. Its emotional implications are almost nil. But here is a first-rate example of that newer craftsmanship which is placing the American composer in a definitely better position among world technicians of the art.

Two Contrasting Symphonies.

Mr. Harris's Third Symphony may be regarded as his most imposing work. It is large of limb and it does not smack of the lamp. A whiff of something American does come from the "pastoral" section of its single movement. But it lumbers, at times, and for this reviewer there is much that is commonplace in its melodic substance, pleasant and forthright though the sound of it is.

Mr. Thompson's symphony is a slighter and sleeker work. It, too, has touches of Americana. No European would have been likely to hit upon quite the same turns of phrase. There is no program and neither is there anything of tragedy or the darker emotions in its spirit. Without being jazzy, the work has a rhythmic propulsion that is undeniably of this age. One must put it down as well written rather than profound or the product of any white-hot inspiration.

Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct a second all-American program on Saturday afternoon, embracing compositions by William Schuman, Edward Burlingame Hill, John Alden Carpenter and Howard Hanson. Whether this is the fairest way of presenting the works of native composers remains arguable. Edward MacDowell opposed the idea, insisting that American works should be heard not in company with one another, but with music by Europeans. To Mr. Koussevitzky's credit as a program-maker, it can be said that on this occasion there was no reason to complain that any work got in another's way. The applause was long and hearty, particularly after the composers came into view.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

NOV 24 1939

Orchestra Here On Monday Night

The first orchestral program of the Choral Union Concert series of this year will be presented at 8:30 o'clock Monday night in Hill auditorium by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, conducted by John Barbirolli.

Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the [illegible]l concert of the series Dec. 14.

The Philharmonic-Symphony's concert Monday will be its first before an Ann Arbor audience since its organization in 1930 by merking of the New York Symphony and the New York Philharmonic Orchestras.

The 103-member orchestra will come here from Chicago, where on Sunday they will play for an afternoon radio broadcasted program, and will continue from here on a tour which will also include appearances in Pennsylvania, Maryland, Washington, D. C., Ohio, Ontario and New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

NOV 24 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM BLOOMSBURG, PA.
MORNING PRESS

NOV 25 1939

Young Negro Soprano Acclaimed As 'The Discovery of a Decade'

Dorothy Maynor, Daughter of a Virginia Minister, Recalls She Was Frightened at Debut Before Town Hall Crowd at New York, but She Hopes to Perfect Her Art

By MARY ELIZABETH PLUMMER

New York, Nov. 23—(AP)—To the distinguished roster of Negro singers that includes Marian Anderson, contralto; Roland Hayes, tenor; and Paul Robeson, baritone, now is added the name of a young soprano, acclaimed by some of her listeners as "the discovery of a decade."

She is 28-year-old Dorothy Maynor, who said today it wasn't personal ambition and the urge for fame that makes her sing—success, of itself, doesn't interest her.

"It's that I'd like so much to be a fine instrument for songs. To me, the songs are so beautiful."

In her mind like a dream was the memory of her debut last Sunday night at Town hall, before an audience said by one critic to be "perhaps the most resoundingly demonstrative ever assembled in that edifice."

Standing Room Only

The "S. R. O." sign was out that night. Edward Johnson, general manager of the Metropolitan opera came; Frederick Jagel, Jessica Dragonette and Rose Bampton, of the opera company; John Erskine, pianist and author; Andre Kostelanetz, orchestra leader.

Paul Robeson, Roland Hayes and Langston Hughes, Negro playwright, were there.

There were flowers for the singer, and thunderous shouts of "bravo!" The crowd wouldn't leave after her last encore, an air from the opera "Louise." Finally the curtains closed, and the house lights came on.

One critic wrote, "She should be able to reach almost any hight as one of the leading concert singers of her generation."

Today, however, the modest young singer from Norfolk, Va., daughter of a Methodist minister, was thinking less of the triumphant aspects of her debut than of the "good advice" of the critics to work and perfect her art.

"Work hard, oh my goodness yes," she said. "It's work that absorbs me entirely.

"I know it will take years, but time doesn't count."

It's something like a fairy story, the story of a girl who hoarded her pennies a few years ago to hear Lotte Lehmann sing, and wept when she found at the last minute she didn't have enough.

She had planned to teach public school music, or maybe domestic science, when she entered Hampton institute. An orchestra conductor, three women who encouraged her were the factors that started her career several years later.

Miss Curtis Harriot of Boston and Miss Mary P. Hayden of New York believed in her talent and urged her to study seriously. Then Mrs Graham Brooks, of Boston, the donor of "Tanglewood" for the Berkshire music festival, brought the young singer to the attention of Dr Sergei Kousevitzky, conductor of the Boston symphony.

He gave her an audition one day last summer, and her singing won his warm approval. She sang at the picnic for his orchestra during the Berkshire festival.

She was so frightened then, she recalled today, she hardly knew what was going on, and she was frightened too at her debut.—"I think I was anxious straight through."

Her outward appearance after the first number was one of complete composure through a program in four languages.

But now—

"There's a lot of work to be done, and I know it." she said.

She's awake at 6.30 a. m. She studies French in the morning, German in the afternoon, has a voice lesson at midday, works once a day with an accompanist, studies alone in the evening, playing the piano herself.

She stays plump and healthy, although she's often too absorbed to eat. Sometimes in midafternoon she remembers she hasn't had breakfast.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 24 1939

MUSIC NOTES

Today's major events: Aldo Solito de Solis, piano, Carnegie Hall, 8:30 P. M.; Marcel Maas, piano, Town Hall, 8:30 P. M.; Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, and Ruth Posselt, violin; Dorothy Maynor, soprano, and Leonard Franklin, tenor, as soloists, Brooklyn Academy of Music, evening.

A students' recital will be given this afternoon at the Institute of Musical Art of the Juilliard School of Music. Piano, violin and vocal numbers form the program.

The Lotos Club will give a dinner in honor of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 24 1939

CONCERT TALK

Mme. Charbonnel to Speak at Agawam Hunt Sunday

Mme. Avis Bliven Charbonnel will give the second in her series of talks on the programs of the Boston Symphony Concerts Sunday evening at 8 o'clock at Agawam Hunt, under the auspices of the Junior League of Providence. Mme. Charbonnel's talk will concern the program to be given by the orchestra Tuesday under the baton of Stravinsky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

NOV 24 1939

WORDS AND MUSIC By Samuel Chotzinoff

Boston Symphony Gives Program by Americans

Koussevitzky, Seemingly, Does More Than His Share for Native Music

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra handed American composers a large and magnificent turkey at Carnegie Hall last night in the shape of an all-American concert. The Bostonians, especially in Mr. Koussevitzky's regime, have done more than their share for native music. But devoting two of their New York concerts (the second is to take place tomorrow afternoon) to the home product seems like a pioneering gesture of great significance.

For the numbers on the program last night were not first performances, but repeats. The American composer has no trouble in achieving a first performance of his works. Such a performance is chalked up to "novelties," which symphony audiences generally expect to get. The plaint of our composers is that they hardly ever achieve a second performance, and Mr. Koussevitzky may now claim that he has righted a wrong.

Beginning with Arthur Foote's "Suite in E major for String Orchestra, Op. 63," Mr. Koussevitzky traversed the American musical scene with Walter Piston's "Concertino for Piano and Orchestra," Mr. Roy Harris' Third Symphony and Mr. Randall Thompson's Second Symphony in E minor. Among these the Arthur Foote Suite emerged as the most respectable item of the evening, Mr. Thompson's symphony the most pleasant, and the works of the Messrs. Piston and Harris the most provocative. Whether they add up to a distinct American idiom is questionable. But neither do the contemporary works of any European nation appear to reflect national thought and feeling.

Mr. Koussevitzky's gesture was sympathetic and courageous. But equally important was the manner of its reception by the audience. The crowded house appeared to enjoy the native fare immensely, and it seized every opportunity to acclaim Mr. Piston, Jesus Maria Sanroma, the soloist in Mr. Piston's concertino, Mr. Harris, Mr. Thompson and Mr. Koussevitzky.

* * *

The art of cello playing at its finest was exemplified in Mr. Emanuel Feuermann's recital at Carnegie Hall Wednesday evening. It is no longer a secret that this former Austrian and now American artist is without a rival, since no one commands the cello so sovereignly. Formerly an essentially lyric instrument, Mr. Feuermann has explored the technical possibilities of the cello to the utmost, and in his hands it can both sing nobly and provide the technical delights associated with the less cumbersome violin. As for those musical instincts which even the greatest virtuosi must possess to rise to the plane of interpreters, Mr. Feuermann has them in abudance. The sum total of his achievements represent to the listener a musical experience of a high order.

Mr. Feuermann's program embraced a Mendelssohn Sonata in B major, Brahms' Sonata in F major and De Falla's "Suite Populaire Espagnole." Assisted admirably by Mr. Franz Rupp at the piano, the cellist explored these and some shorter works by Dvorak, Faure, Davidoff and Canteloube to the satisfaction of all the demands one can make of interpretative art. If the Mendelssohn sonata is not one of the higher flights of the cello repertoire, neither is the F major of Brahms. However, cello music of the first quality is not exactly abundant, and both sonatas represented at least a change of fare.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 24 1939

BOSTON'S CONDUCTOR

Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, as the orchestra inaugurates its annual series of five concerts here. The first half of the program will be devoted to American works, by Foote, Hill and Carpenter. The second half will be the Cesar Franck Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 24 1939

93

—MUSIC OF THE DAY—

American Composers Put in Limelight

Koussevitzky Turns to Native Works In First Boston Symphony Concert

By MILES KASTENDIECK

All-American programs are so rare an occurrence in the life of our major orchestras that the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night automatically became a starred event of this musical season. Four Americans—Arthur Foote, Walter Piston, Roy Harris and Randall Thompson—contributed the music; Serge Koussevitzky fashioned the performances. Set forth under the most gratifying auspices the native music more than justified being placed in the limelight. The more conservative members of the capacity audience should have been agreeably surprised at the success of the evening.

Except for the music of Arthur Foote, whose Suite in E Major began the program, the compositions belong to the 1930's; except for Roy Harris, the composers have had a Harvard background. The work of Foote and Piston might be contrasted with that of Harris and Thompson as being less essentially American in character and flavor; both Harris and Thompson in writing their symphonies have derived their material from American sources.

Foote's Suite is conventional, but it is exceedingly pleasant as well as polite music. The Prelude, Pizzacato and Fugue are well contrasted; neatly contrived and attractively scored. It had an historical interest not only as a work composed in 1907, but also as a representative of an academic product based on European tradition. Piston's Concertino for Piano and Orchestra (1937) might be set down as an intellectual divertisement based chiefly on rhythmic and harmonic interest with a corresponding percussive treatment of the piano part. Like a certain amount of American composition, it is well made, mildly interesting and possibly serviceable. The soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, was completely at ~~home~~ for this kind of music is his metier.

Of Roy Harris' Symphony No. 3 (1938), which was introduced here last Winter, much might be said. It grows more impressive on second hearing. The reservation persists that in some of his lyrical measures and canonic development sections, Mr. Harris has written some arid measures so far as the performance of the music is concerned. He appears to be most successful when writing in the dramatic and the tragic moods, for the effects he attains in the final sections of his work are stunning. There is little question that here is American music of consequence.

What Mr. Thompson has achieved in his Second Symphony is an enviable simplicity, a persuasive pleasantness, and an intriguing cleverness. The four movements are alive, tuneful and often popular, yet he has retained a certain dignified bearing withal. The finale, for instance, is more or less symphonic ragtime, but ragtime has its place in an American symphony just as much as Hungarian tunes in the work of Brahms. Perhaps the work as a whole is on the lighter side of symphonic writing, but that need not make it trivial.

It is hardly necessary to report that the performances were notable, for that is what one expects from the Boston Symphony. It made little difference what the work was, the playing was of sterling quality.

---

2 American Works Given At Bushnell

Boston Orchestra Plays Schuman's Overture, Randall Thompson's Symphony in E Minor

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Serge Koussevitzky, was heard in concert at the Bushnell Memorial auditorium Tuesday night. The program:

American Festival Overture .... Wm. Schuman
Symphony No. 2 in E Minor .... Randall Thompson
Symphony in D Minor .... Franck

I sincerely hope that Mr. William Schuman, whose "American Festival" Overture was played here by the Boston Symphony and the redoubtable Dr. Koussevitzky Tuesday night, will want to paste these devoted words in his scrapbook this morning. I am only afraid that if he doesn't, he may not find a great many others of Hartford origin that he can later re-read without a blush. With a rawboned, vociferous little composition he curled a great many hairs in the Bushnell auditorium, and this is a city where hair-curling is left strictly to the beauty establishments.

At the conclusion of the Overture performance, there was as much noise in the audience as there had been from the orchestra during its playing. A lad sitting behind me, whose mutterings and fine imprecations even penetrated the gusty to-do set up by the orchestra, slid in right under the last note to demand his neighbor's opinion of Mr. Schuman and all his kind.

"Well," said his neighbor with masterful understatement, "It wasn't exactly Beethoven or Mozart."

"No!", said the frenzy-choked victim, "It wasn't Beethoven or Mozart, and I'd a dam-sight rather heard them play 'Boola-Boola'."

American As Macy's.

It wasn't "Boola-Boola," either. As a matter of fact, I think Dr. Koussevitzky, in presenting Mr. Schuman's Overture, has uncorked something of real American vintage. I would not pretend to offer judgment after hearing this harsh little work once, but I suspect that underneath its homely strident and raucous exterior, there beats one of the most genuinely American hearts since Currier and Ives. I am not sure that it is any more articulate than a newsboy's shout, but I think it is as American as that, too. It's as homely as Ninth Avenue and as native as Macy's Christmas Parade. I hate to think that such homeliness is the essence of American character, but as I looked about me Tuesday night, I had to agree with Howard Hanson who insists it is, just as elegance is French and melodiuma, Italian. I am afraid that this is an execeedingly vague description of Mr. Schuman's work, which sprouts violently in all musical directions with the lustiness and incontinence of children shouting—but it is, a rather strange work and easily beggars description on a single hearing. I can only say I liked very much of it and would gladly hear it again.

Gentle Lark.

Everybody however seemed quite pleased, or at least relieved, by Randall Thompson's Symphony No. 2, as different from Mr. Schuman's boisterous work as chalk from cheese, and practically throstle-voiced. Composite of fantasy and wit, and the peculiar mysteries of E Minor, it is alternately modishly piquant and strangely nostalgic. There is nothing in its orthodoxy of form or harmonic mannerisms to affright the veriest dove among concertgoers, and there is much to charm in its curious distant pipings and horn calls, often pointedly suggestive of the fantastic procession sweeping through Debussy's "Fetes." Its easy, where-have-I-heard-that-tune-before, material is honey to the ear and spirit. In the third and closing movements there is an abundance of quiet humor and swing-on-down entirely captivating. While at the outset I thought the writing a bit too general to seize your attention right off the bat, it soon floods out over you with warm and amusing graces. Fundamentally, even in its nostalgic moods, it is a bright, engaging and witty work, easily endearing itself.

We've Heard Better.

During the first two, new scores, it was difficult to tell exactly how the orchestra was playing, but with the performance of the concluding Franck Symphony, and I hope it will conclude the Franck for a while here, it seemed to me that we have heard better work from the Doctor and his bandsmen. Much of it seemed shrill, harsh and poorly melded across the orchestra, and although the orchestra seemed to be giving with a will at the big points, it was hard to discover where they had their hearts in the business in most other spots. Maybe they are just tired of the D Minor. I can understand that.

The audience's reaction to Mr. Schuman's work did not prevent them from giving a thoroughly courteous and, everything considered, cordial hand to the composer himself, when Dr. Kousseviszky motioned him up from his seat in the middle of the house. But I bet his ears burned before his neighbors found out who he was. I only wish that in incidents like this, works might be re-played after the regular performance, whence all but the interested had fled.

T. H. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

NOV 24 1939

Boston Symphony in Program

Four American Composers Honored

Composition by Roy Harris Praised

By PITTS SANBORN.

There was occasion for thanksgiving in the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening. For the first time this season it visited Carnegie Hall and, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, it proved once more its excellent worth.

Whether the program also invited thanksgiving is another matter. Years ago Edward MacDowell rebelled against any work of his being classed as American music. What he wrote was music and music was universal.

Perhaps he was right, perhaps not. In any event the audience that thronged Carnegie Hall last night was treated to that rarity from a symphony orchestra, an all-American program, and in devising it Mr. Koussevitsky honored particularly the living.

Tribute to Foote.

The late Arthur Foote's pleasant Suite for String Orchestra in E major, which is enjoying a local run this autumn, honored the dead. Otherwise the selection paid tribute to the eminent abilities of Walter Piston, Roy Harris, and Randall Thompson.

In Mr. Piston's Concertino for Piano and Chamber Orchestra, with that favored ward of Boston, Jesus Maria Sanroma, as soloist, we listened to a composition of what for convenience may be termed the Boulanger school.

It gives a good account of the kind and thoroughness of its author's training, and its dissonant prancing is relieved in the approved fashion by a brief interlude of a wistful sentimentality. The Concertino was written about three years ago.

The Third Symphony of Mr. Harris, written one year ago, is probably his most impressive composition. It is in a single movement, for which the composer himself provides a concise but pretentious outline. What counts, though, is how the piece sounds.

To one listener it is a more important and better sustained contribution to music than any previous work by Mr. Harris, nor is the indebtedness to Sibelius to be deplored.

Engrossing Symphony.

If the magnificent exordium, in which the Boston 'cellos distinguished themselves, is not altogether equaled by some of the later pages, the symphony as a whole is nevertheless an engrossing work, which ought to be heard here speedily again.

Mr. Thompson's Second Symphony, in E minor, now more than eight years old, bears up well. Technical competence and a cheerful spirit each have their part in this ingratiating composition in the traditional four movements.

Recollections of Stravinsky, a nod to Die Meistersinger, pages unmistakably Negroid are not to be held against the work; rather the contrary. Its weak point is the Largo, which, in spite of some harmonic ingenuity, melodically grazes the commonplace.

Messrs. Piston, Harris, and Thompson were all on hand to bow acknowledgements from the stage, and the great audience was exceedingly demonstrative.

* * *

Mme. Gainsborg Presents Recital.

Returning to Town Hall Wednesday night for her first recital this season, Lolita Cabrera Gainsborg, the Brazilian-American pianist, offered compositions by Mozart, Mendelssohn and Brahms, in addition to new music by Paul Creston, Mortimer Browning, Marion Bauer and Mrs. H. H. A. Beach. Mme. Gainsborg exhibited the wide variety of color and dynamic range she made known last year.

In a program at Carnegie Hall Wednesday night, devoted to music by Dvorak, Mendelssohn, Brahms and de Falla, Emanuel Feuermann, the eminent 'cellist, again showed the technical and expressive powers that have placed him among the greatest living 'cellists.

L. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 24 1939

Boston Symphony to Open Season Here Tonight; Mrs. Good to Give Dinner Party Preceeding Concert

Box holders for the season's first Boston Symphony Orchestra concert tonight at the Brooklyn Academy of Music will be: Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, the Brooklyn Woman's Club, Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clarke H. Woodward of Brooklyn Navy Yard, the Adelphi Alumnae Association and Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr.

Under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra will present Dorothy Maynor, soprano and Leonard Franklin, tenor, soloists, in the composition "Skyscrapers" by John Alden Carpenter. The program will also include a Violin Concerto by Edward Burlingame Hill, a Suite for Orchestra by Arthur Fote, and the Cesar Franck Symphony in D Minor.

Mrs. Good will give a dinner party before the concert for she will entertain Mr. and Mrs. James G. McDonald, Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, former Judge and Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin and Robert Alfred Shaw, who will be guests in her box later in the evening.

Mrs. Osborne will have as her box guests Supreme Court Justice Lewis L. Fawcett, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred L. Fawcett, Mrs. James M. Fawcett, Miss Lucille Fawcett, Donald G. C. Sinclair and Mrs. Theodore Frohn.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

NOV 24 1939

Bostonians Play American Music

By GRENA BENNETT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra went patriotic in Carnegie Hall last evening when a program limited to music by American composers was presented under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The gesture was a praiseworthy one if for no other reason than the encouragement to native composers whose works are worthy of performance by important symphonic organizations.

Mr. Koussevitzky chose for the Bostonians' first local concert this season Foote's E major suite for strings, Peston's concertina for piano and orchestra, Harris' third symphony and Thompson's E minor symphony. The basic plan of the Foote suite was placed music, smooth flowing melody that avoided the pitfalls of modernistic atonalities. The second movement contained some pages in which the picked strings contributed effects that were interesting.

Mr. Harris possesses a particular and individual style in melodic invention and orchestration. He apparently favored no special school or epoch of composition in his symphony, preferring audacious effects, and economy of melody, much repetition and a meandering style of sequence which ended in something very like a funeral march. The orchestra performed its part valiantly and shared in the applause with the composer.

Tomorrow evening Mr. Koussevitzky will be guest of honor at the Lotos Club, honoring him for his services to American music.

* * *

Lolita Cabrera-Gainsborg, pianist, appeared in Town Hall Wednesday night and at the same time Emanuel Feuermann, 'cellist, was entertaining a large audience in Carnegie Hall.

Observing a renaissance of interest in American music, Miss Gainsborg included in her list pieces by such prominent native composers as Marion Bauer, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Paul Creston and Mortimer Browning.

Mr. Feuermann's fine talent had full play in compositions by Mendelssohn, De Falla, Brahms, Dvorak, Faure, Canteloube and Davidoff.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, O.
PLAIN DEALER

NOV 25 1939

N.Y. PHILHARMONIC PLAYS NEW ROLE

Noted Orchestra Is 'Gift' to Thousand at Toledo

BY JOHN SELBY
Associated Press Arts Editor

TOLEDO, O., Nov. 24—(AP)—For the first time in its nearly a century of existence, New York's Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra today was bought privately for a "throw-away"—a free gift to the members of Toledo's famed Museum of Art.

Even more curiously, considering the habits of large donors the world over, the man who provides this yearly present for Toledo is unknown even to those who enjoy the gift. His check covers the entire expense; he asks no thanks.

Tonight was also probably the first time in its history that the orchestera has played in an art museum, and certainly the first occasion in which one of its concerts has been played in a hall of the sort—classic in design, with a colonnade at the back, and the seats rising on rising tiers in the manner of certain forums of antiquity. The hall is called the Peristyle.

Because the Philharmonic has made no American tour of length since 1929, museum authorities have been unable to include it in the list of first string symphony orchestras which have been given Toledo by its mysterious Maesenas.

Philadelphia Orchestra Was First

The series was begun by the Philadelphia Orchestra in 1933 as the feature of dedicatory services for the great wings which had been added to the Museum through the gifts of Mr. and Mrs. Edward Drummund Libby, whose endowment for Toledo's use in art and music has been estimated as high as 22,000,000.

The Chicago Symphony Orchestra was heard next in line, and then for four years until this winter the Boston Symphony has played the gift concert.

The 1,000 members of the museum have free access to the music, and the only tickets ever sold are to members who wish to buy seats for guests—when and if there are seats to be had. There was no extra room tonight.

John Barbirolli rewarded one of the most understanding audiences of the tour so far with one of his and his men's superior performances. The music played included Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Delius' "Walk to the Paradise Garden," Mendelssohn's G Minor Scherzo, and Elgar's "Enigma" variations, one of the works Barbirolli has given new life in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

NOV 25 1939

Stravinsky Reveals Symphony Program

Igor Stravinsky, often described as the most important and significant of living composers, will visit Providence for the first time as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the second concert of the season in the Metropolitan Theatre, to be given next Tuesday evening, Nov. 28. Mr. Stravinsky will then present his new ballet, "Card Game, in Three Deals," as a concert piece, for its first hearing in New England.

Jesus Maria Sanroma, the brilliant pianist, will appear as soloist on this program in Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra. It was Mr. Sanroma who was the soloist when the "Capriccio" had its first American performances under Koussevitzky's direction several years ago. Suites from the two ballets which first made Stravinsky's fame will also be played, "The Fire-Bird" and "Petrouchka." The "Fire-Bird" is based upon a fairy tale familiar in Russia, and consists of the following movements: Introduction, Kastchei's Enchanted Garden and Dance of the Fire-Bird, Supplication of the Fire-Bird, The Princesses Play with the Golden Apples, Dance of the Princess, and Infernal Dance of All the Subjects of Kastchei.

"Petrouchka" depicts a country fair with its crowds and side shows. "Jeu de Cartes" is Stravinsky's latest ballet and was composed for and first performed by the American Ballet in New York. It describes in music three deals in a poker game. The scene of the ballet is the green table in a gaming house. Each deal is introduced by ceremonial music as the cards are shuffled and distributed. The play is followed minutely, the joker possessing the power of any card, usually controlling the outcome. After each showdown, as the ballet was presented, a giant hand would emerge from the wings and would move the cards.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 24 1939

ARTUR BODANZKY IS DEAD HERE AT 61

Noted Opera Conductor Victim of Arthritis—Known for His Wagnerian Interpretations

Artur Bodanzky, conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Association, died at 1:30 P. M. yesterday at New York Hospital. He was 61 years old.

Mr. Bodanzky returned from a quiet Summer in Vermont early this Autumn, intending to begin his twenty-fifth year at the Metropolitan, which opens its season next Monday evening. He appeared to be in the best of health. Shortly thereafter a severe case of arthritis developed and he was forced to cancel his plans. He went to the hospital on Oct. 28 upon advice of his physician, Dr. Claude Ellis Forkner. Complications ensued which resulted in his death.

Surviving the conductor are his wife, Mrs. Ada Bodanzky, and a daughter, Mrs. William Muschenheim. Private funeral services will be conducted today. His home was at 315 West 100th Street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WAUKESHA, WIS.
FREEMAN

NOV 25 1939

THE lowly saxophone, butt of jokes and purveyor of hot jazz rhythm, is making some headway as a serious instrument, with Sigurd Rascher, young Anglo-Swede, as its apostle.

Rascher appeared first with the Boston Symphony, and was well received by critics in New England's citadel of culture. Now he has played with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under John Barbirolli. The audience was politely appreciative of his performance in Debussy's Rhapsody for Orchestra and Saxophone and Jacques Ibert's Chamber Concertino for Saxophone and Orchestra.

One of Rascher's difficulties is to find enough "classic" music suitable for the saxophone to give him a repertoire. Some pieces have been composed especially for him.

Rascher is professor of saxophone at the Royal Danish conservatory, the Danes having taken to the orphan instrument before America had a chance to "discover" it.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

NOV 25 1939

Dorothy Maynor

Berkshire County had a real interest in the Town Hall debut of Dorothy Maynor Sunday because it was during the Berkshire Symphonic Festival last summer that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky brought her out at his party for members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and friends. The conductor indulged in superlatives over Miss Maynor's singing. There were many skeptics who thought at the time that Dr. Koussevitzky may have been extravagant with his praises. Critics who heard Miss Maynor Sunday were agreed however that she has a brilliant future even though they admitted that she needed more training. Dr. Koussevitzky continues his faith in her by having her appear again this afternoon with the orchestra in its Carnegie Hall concert. She sang with the orchestra last night in Brooklyn.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 25 1939

Boston Orchestra Opens Season at the Academy, Koussevitzky Conducts

Dorothy Maynor, Soprano, and Ruth Posselt Violinist, Soloists

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, last night opened its annual season of concerts in Brooklyn in the Academy of Music, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

Dr. Koussevitzky's brilliance and his meticulous insistence on perfection can usually be depended upon to provide a distinguished musical evening. Last night, these customary attributes of the conductor which are reflected so engagingly in the orchestra were embellished by the appearanc of two soloists, the famed soprano, Dorothy Maynor, whose debut in Town Hall on Sunday was the musical sensation of the year, and Ruth Posselt, young violinist.

This was truly rich musical fare. It was set on a table comprised of music by American composers and Franck's Symphony in D minor. For, to some extent, Dr. Koussevitzky continued where he left off on Thursday in Carnegie Hall, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its first metropolitan appearance of the year, confined itself to the work of Americans.

The program included Foote's Suite in E major, Opus 63; Hill's Concerto for violin, Opus 38; and Carpenter's Skyscarpers (A Ballet of Modern American Life), in addition to the Franck work.

The "Skyscrapers' suite was noteworthy because it called for a soprano and, in this case, the appearance of Miss Maynor. Unfortunately, the part for voice was so limited that one could not obtain a fair appreciation of her genius. It is to be hoped that her next appearance here will be of a more substantial nature.

Miss Posselt's assignment in the Hill concerto was a stern test of her technique. It called for warm interpretation of lush composition. While her bowing was almost perfervid at times, she met the taxing demands of the composer with glowing sensitivity which richly earned the large measure of applause she received from audience and orchestra.

The suite in E major and the Franck work received heart-warming readings, in which the virtuosity played. Well-planned and intelligently presented, this concert was a delight.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
69 POST

NOV 25 1939

Portrait Sculpture

Guitou Knoop, the gifted portrait sculptress, is exhibiting recent work at Wildenstein & Co. The portrait of Katherine Cornell is outstanding for its straightforward, sympathetic characterization. In the study of Serge Koussevitzky the artist again shows his capacity for sharply defining individual traits in forms that retain their basic simplicity. Besides the heads there are a few small full figures and a group of well-handled pencil drawings.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 25 1939

Koussevitzky Conducts Four U.S. Works Here

Leads Boston Orchestra in Music by Foote, Piston, Harris and Thompson

By Jerome D. Bohm

The most adventurous and courageous of our orchestral program builders, Serge Koussevitzky, faced his first audience of the season in Carnegie Hall Thursday night, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in music exclusively by American composers. The works brought forth were Arthur Foote's Suite in E major for Strings, Op. 63; Walter Piston's Concertino, in which the piano solo part was played by Jesus Maria Sanroma· Roy Harris's Third Symphony and the Second Symphony in E minor of Randall Thompson.

All of these had been heard here previously, the Foote Suite as recently as last week when it was performed by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra; but the Harris Symphony had been given here only once before.

The Foote Suite, although penned in 1937, the year the composer died at the age of fifty-four, might easily have been written in the nineteenth century. Both the Prelude and the Fugue with which it closes are romantic treatments of classic forms and the Pizzicato and Adagietto reveal unmistakably the influences of Tschaikovsky, Schumann and Wagner.

A generation separates Mr. Piston's Concertino from the Foote Suite, and Mr. Piston, who does not compose in the manner of Handel, Tchaikovsky, Schumann or Wagner, but who is not unaware of the existence of Hindemith, among others, is one of the technically best-equipped of our music makers. His Concertino crackles with wit and good spirits and is not without its moments of sentiment, although these seem to come less naturally to him than his sprightliness. Mr. Sanroma, whose flair for modern music is well known, set forth the piano part brilliantly.

By far the most impressive music of the evening was the Harris symphony. This is truly autochthonous music. No one but an American could have created this score which is redolent of our soil. There is a genuine sweep and the evocation of the tremendous open spaces of this country therein akin to the "Frontier" of Martha Graham. There can be no question here of mere intellectualization as with so much modern music; the emotional reaction it creates in the listener is direct and immediate.

It was perhaps inevitable that much of Mr. Thompson's well-made. facilely tuneful symphony should sound dated following the powerful impact of the Harris symphony. Its harmonic idiom is definitely of a kind which has become part and parcel of our purveyors of popular music; the thematic material of the largo movement has all the characteristics of a song hit.

The performances were one and all superb—whether in the Foote suite, where the orchestra's strings played with glowing translucence, or in the Harris symphony, where the tonal masses were of overwhelming solidity. Mr. Koussevitzky disclosed the broad scope of his musical sympathies, interpreting each work in the style peculiarly fitted to a veracious conveyance of its contents. The huge audience received some of this music cordially, some of it with unusual demonstrations of approval, and Messrs. Piston, Harris and Thompson were present to acknowledge the applause.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE 94

NOV 25 1939

Symphony Gives First Concert

Society Attends Affair at Academy

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season in Brooklyn last evening and presented its program to a capacity filled opera house in the Academy of Music. Under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky the Boston Symphony presented Dorothy Maynor, soprano, and Leonard Franklin, tenor, soloists in the composition "Skyscrapers," by John Alden Carpenter. The program also included a violin concerto by Edward Burlingame Hill, with Ruth Posselt, as the soloist, a suite for orchestra by Arthur Foote and the Cesar Franck Symphony in D-Minor.

Mrs. William H. Good entertained at a dinner party before the concert for her box guests. They were Mr. and Mrs. James G. McDonald, Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, former Judge and Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin and Robert Alfred Shaw.

Mrs. Dean C. Osborne had as her box guests Supreme Court Justice Lewis L. Fawcett, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred L. Fawcett, Mrs. James M. Fawcett, Miss Lucille Fawcett, Donald G. C. Sinclair and Mrs. Theodore Frohne.

Box guests of Mrs. Benjamin Prince were Mr. and Mrs. Karp Mikhalenkoff, Arthur Newstead, Catherine Bacon, Miss Leslie Dalcher Cooney and Walter Golde.

Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clarke H. Woodward were hosts in the Navy Box. Their guests included Lt. George De Metropolis and Capt. and Mrs. T. B. Richey.

The Brooklyn Woman's Club box was occupied by Mrs. Oliver Goldsmith Carter, Mrs. Jason Davis, Mrs. Frederick W. Burbank, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. George Hillsller, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives and Mrs. Wilson Briggs Zimmer.

In the Adelphi Alumnae box were Miss Emma Jessie Ogg, Mr. and Mrs. William Slater, Mr. and Mrs. Seymour W. Beardsley, Mrs. Lillian Renard and Miss Jacobson.

A box has been taken by the Council for the Brooklyn Girl Scouts and is occupied at each concert by musically gifted Girl Scouts. Another box is occupied by high school students who are leaders and players in high school orchestras in this borough and Queens.

The Brooklyn Institute, of which Mr. McDonald is president; the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, of which Dr. R. Huntington Woodman is president, and the Brooklyn committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman, and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, executive chairman, are sponsoring the Boston Symphony's 54th concert season in Brooklyn.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 25 1939

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens 54th Brooklyn Season; Many Attend Concert with Guests

A capacity audience greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened its 54th borough season last night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. In the audience were representatives of almost all of the professions, busineses and fields of social and civic enterprise which engage Brooklynites in their working hours. They united in expressing war mapproval of the program of three American works and the Cesar Franck Symphony in D Minor, presented by the orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Many attended the concert with guests. Mrs. William H. Good, who entertained in one of the boxes, gave a dinner for her guests earlier in the evening. Other boxes were occupied by Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, the Brooklyn Woman's Club, Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clarke H. Woodward of the Brooklyn Navy Yard, the Adelphi Alumnae Association and Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr. Many young people, home from schools and colleges for the Thanksgiving recess, were in the audience.

A complete review of the program will be found elsewhere in this edition of "The Brooklyn Citizen."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, O.
PLAIN DEALER

NOV 25 1939

N.Y. PHILHARMONIC PLAYS NEW ROLE

Noted Orchestra Is 'Gift' to Thousand at Toledo

BY JOHN SELBY
Associated Press Arts Editor

TOLEDO, O., Nov. 24—(AP)—For the first time in its nearly a century of existence, New York's Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra today was bought privately for a "throw-away"—a free gift to the members of Toledo's famed Museum of Art.

Even more curiously, considering the habits of large donors the world over, the man who provides this yearly present for Toledo is unknown even to those who enjoy the gift. His check covers the entire expense; he asks no thanks.

Tonight was also probably the first time in its history that the orchestera has played in an art museum, and certainly the first occasion in which one of its concerts has been played in a hall of the sort—classic in design, with a colonnade at the back, and the seats rising on rising tiers in the manner of certain forums of antiquity. The hall is called the Peristyle.

Because the Philharmonic has made no American tour of length since 1929, museum authorities have been unable to include it in the list of first string symphony orchestras which have been given Toledo by its mysterious Maesenas.

Philadelphia Orchestra Was First

The series was begun by the Philadelphia Orchestra in 1933 as the feature of dedicatory services for the great wings which had been added to the Museum through the gifts of Mr. and Mrs. Edward Drummund Libby, whose endowment for Toledo's use in art and music has been estimated as high as 22,000,000.

The Chicago Symphony Orchestra was heard next in line, and then for four years until this winter the Boston Symphony has played the gift concert.

The 1,000 members of the museum have free access to the music, and the only tickets ever sold are to members who wish to buy seats for guests—when and if there are seats to be had. There was no extra room tonight.

John Barbirolli rewarded one of the most understanding audiences of the tour so far with one of his and his men's superior performances. The music played included Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Delius' "Walk to the Paradise Garden," Mendelssohn's G Minor Scherzo, and Elgar's "Enigma" variations, one of the works Barbirolli has given new life in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 24 1939

ARTUR BODANZKY IS DEAD HERE AT 61

Noted Opera Conductor Victim of Arthritis—Known for His Wagnerian Interpretations

Artur Bodanzky, conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Association, died at 1:30 P. M. yesterday at New York Hospital. He was 61 years old.

Mr. Bodanzky returned from a quiet Summer in Vermont early this Autumn, intending to begin his twenty-fifth year at the Metropolitan, which opens its season next Monday evening. He appeared to be in the best of health. Shortly thereafter a severe case of arthritis developed and he was forced to cancel his plans. He went to the hospital on Oct. 28 upon advice of his physician, Dr. Claude Ellis Forkner. Complications ensued which resulted in his death.

Surviving the conductor are his wife, Mrs. Ada Bodanzky, and a daughter, Mrs. William Muschenheim. Private funeral services will be conducted today. His home was at 315 West 100th Street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

NOV 25 1939

Stravinsky Reveals Symphony Program

Igor Stravinsky, often described as the most important and significant of living composers, will visit Providence for the first time as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the second concert of the season in the Metropolitan Theatre, to be given next Tuesday evening, Nov. 28. Mr. Stravinsky will then present his new ballet, "Card Game, in Three Deals," as a concert piece, for its first hearing in New England.

Jesus Maria Sanroma, the brilliant pianist, will appear as soloist on this program in Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra. It was Mr. Sanroma who was the soloist when the "Capriccio" had its first American performances under Koussevitzky's direction several years ago. Suites from the two ballets which first made Stravinsky's fame will also be played, "The Fire-Bird" and "Petrouchka." The "Fire-Bird" is based upon a fairy tale familiar in Russia, and consists of the following movements: Introduction, Kastchei's Enchanted Garden and Dance of the Fire-Bird, Supplication of the Fire-Bird, The Princesses Play with the Golden Apples, Dance of the Princess, and Infernal Dance of All the Subjects of Kastchei.

"Petrouchka" depicts a country fair with its crowds and side shows. "Jeu de Cartes" is Stravinsky's latest ballet and was composed for and first performed by the American Ballet in New York. It describes in music three deals in a poker game. The scene of the ballet is the green table in a gaming house. Each deal is introduced by ceremonial music as the cards are shuffled and distributed. The play is followed minutely, the joker possessing the power of any card, usually controlling the outcome. After each showdown, as the ballet was presented, a giant hand would emerge from the wings and would move the cards.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WAUKESHA, WIS.
FREEMAN

NOV 25 1939

THE lowly saxophone, butt of jokes and purveyor of hot jazz rhythm, is making some headway as a serious instrument, with Sigurd Rascher, young Anglo-Swede, as its apostle.

Rascher appeared first with the Boston Symphony, and was well received by critics in New England's citadel of culture. Now he has played with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under John Barbirolli. The audience was politely appreciative of his performance in Debussy's Rhapsody for Orchestra and Saxophone and Jacques Ibert's Chamber Concertino for Saxophone and Orchestra.

One of Rascher's difficulties is to find enough "classic" music suitable for the saxophone to give him a repertoire. Some pieces have been composed especially for him.

Rascher is professor of saxophone at the Royal Danish conservatory, the Danes having taken to the orphan instrument before America had a chance to "discover" it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

NOV 25 1939

Dorothy Maynor

Berkshire County had a real interest in the Town Hall debut of Dorothy Maynor Sunday because it was during the Berkshire Symphonic Festival last summer that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky brought her out at his party for members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and friends. The conductor indulged in superlatives over Miss Maynor's singing. There were many skeptics who thought at the time that Dr. Koussevitzky may have been extravagant with his praises. Critics who heard Miss Maynor Sunday were agreed however that she has a brilliant future even though they admitted that she needed more training. Dr. Koussevitzky continues his faith in her by having her appear again this afternoon with the orchestra in its Carnegie Hall concert. She sang with the orchestra last night in Brooklyn.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 25 1939

Boston Orchestra Opens Season at the Academy, Koussevitzky Conducts

Dorothy Maynor, Soprano, and Ruth Posselt Violinist, Soloists

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, last night opened its annual season of concerts in Brooklyn in the Academy of Music, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

Dr. Koussevitzky's brilliance and his meticulous insistence on perfection can usually be depended upon to provide a distinguished musical evening. Last night, these customary attributes of the conductor which are reflected so engagingly in the orchestra were embellished by the appearanc of two soloists, the famed soprano, Dorothy Maynor, whose debut in Town Hall on Sunday was the musical sensation of the year, and Ruth Posselt, young violinist.

This was truly rich musical fare. It was set on a table comprised of music by American composers and Franck's Symphony in D minor. For, to some extent, Dr. Koussevitzky continued where he left off on Thursday in Carnegie Hall, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its first metropolitan appearance of the year, confined itself to the work of Americans.

The program included Foote's Suite in E major, Opus 63; Hill's Concerto for violin, Opus 38; and Carpenter's Skyscarpers (A Ballet of Modern American Life), in addition to the Franck work.

The "Skyscrapers' suite was noteworthy because it called for a soprano and, in this case, the appearance of Miss Maynor. Unfortunately, the part for voice was so limited that one could not obtain a fair appreciation of her genius. It is to be hoped that her next appearance here will be of a more substantial nature.

Miss Posselt's assignment in the Hill concerto was a stern test of her technique. It called for warm interpretation of lush composition. While her bowing was almost perfervid at times, she met the taxing demands of the composer with glowing sensitivity which richly earned the large measure of applause she received from audience and orchestra.

The suite in E major and the Franck work received heart-warming readings, in which the virtuosity played. Well-planned, and intelligently presented, this concert was a delight.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
69 POST ✓

NOV 25 1939

Portrait Sculpture

Guitou Knoop, the gifted portrait sculptress, is exhibiting recent work at Wildenstein & Co. The portrait of Katherine Cornell is outstanding for its straightforward, sympathetic characterization. In the study of Serge Koussevitzky the artist again shows [illegible]pacity for sharply defining individual traits in forms that retain their basic simplicity. Besides the heads there are a few small full figures and a group of well-handled pencil drawings.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 25 1939

Koussevitzky Conducts Four U.S. Works Here

Leads Boston Orchestra in Music by Foote, Piston, Harris and Thompson

By Jerome D. Bohm

The most adventurous and courageous of our orchestral program builders, Serge Koussevitzky, faced his first audience of the season in Carnegie Hall Thursday night, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in music exclusively by American composers. The works brought forth were Arthur Foote's Suite in E major for Strings, Op. 63; Walter Piston's Concertino, in which the piano solo part was played by Jesus Maria Sanroma; Roy Harris's Third Symphony and the Second Symphony in E minor of Randall Thompson.

All of these had been heard here previously, the Foote Suite as recently as last week when it was performed by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra; but the Harris Symphony had been given here only once before.

The Foote Suite, although penned in 1937, the year the composer died at the age of fifty-four, might easily have been written in the nineteenth century. Both the Prelude and the Fugue with which it closes are romantic treatments of classic forms and the Pizzicato and Adagietto reveal unmistakably the influences of Tschaikovsky, Schumann and Wagner.

A generation separates Mr. Piston's Concertino from the Foote Suite, and Mr. Piston, who does not compose in the manner of Handel, Tchaikovsky, Schumann or Wagner, but who is not unaware of the existence of Hindemith, among others, is one of the technically best-equipped of our music makers. His Concertino crackles with wit and good spirits and is not without its moments of sentiment, although these seem to come less naturally to him than his sprightliness. Mr. Sanroma, whose flair for modern music is well known, set forth the piano part brilliantly.

By far the most impressive music of the evening was the Harris symphony. This is truly autochthonous music. No one but an American could have created this score which is redolent of our soil. There is a genuine sweep and the evocation of the tremendous open spaces of this country therein akin to the "Frontier" of Martha Graham. There can be no question here of mere intellectualization as with so much modern music; the emotional reaction it creates in the listener is direct and immediate.

It was perhaps inevitable that much of Mr. Thompson's well-made, faciiely tuneful symphony should sound dated following the powerful impact of the Harris symphony. Its harmonic idiom is definitely of a kind which has become part and parcel of our purveyors of popular music; the thematic material of the largo movement has all the characteristics of a song hit.

The performances were one and all superb—whether in the Foote suite, where the orchestra's strings played with glowing translucence, or in the Harris symphony, where the tonal masses were of overwhelming solidity. Mr. Koussevitzky disclosed the broad scope of his musical sympathies, interpreting each work in the style peculiarly fitted to a veracious conveyance of its contents. The huge audience received some of this music cordially, some of it with unusual demonstrations of approval, and Messrs. Piston, Harris and Thompson were present to acknowledge the applause.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE 94

NOV 25 1939

Symphony Gives First Concert

Society Attends Affair at Academy

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season in Brooklyn last evening and presented its program to a capacity filled opera house in the Academy of Music. Under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky the Boston Symphony presented Dorothy Maynor, soprano, and Leonard Franklin, tenor, soloists in the composition "Skyscrapers," by John Alden Carpenter. The program also included a violin concerto by Edward Burlingame Hill, with Ruth Posselt, as the soloist, a suite for orchestra by Arthur Foote and the Cesar Franck Symphony in D-Minor.

Mrs. William H. Good entertained at a dinner party before the concert for her box guests. They were Mr. and Mrs. James G. McDonald, Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, former Judge and Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin and Robert Alfred Shaw.

Mrs. Dean C. Osborne had as her box guests Supreme Court Justice Lewis L. Fawcett, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred L. Fawcett, Mrs. James M. Fawcett, Miss Lucille Fawcett, Donald G. C. Sinclair and Mrs. Theodore Frohne.

Box guests of Mrs. Benjamin Prince were Mr. and Mrs. Karp Mikhalenkoff, Arthur Newstead, Catherine Bacon, Miss Leslie Dalcher Cooney and Walter Golde.

Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clarke H. Woodward were hosts in the Navy Box. Their guests included Lt. George De Metropolis and Capt. and Mrs. T. B. Richey.

The Brooklyn Woman's Club box was occupied by Mrs. Oliver Goldsmith Carter, Mrs. Jason Davis, Mrs. Frederick W. Burbank, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. George Hiller, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives and Mrs. Wilson Briggs Zimmer.

In the Adelphi Alumnae box were Miss Emma Jessie Ogg, Mr. and Mrs. William Slater, Mr. and Mrs. Seymour W. Beardsley, Mrs. Lillian Renard and Miss Jacobson.

A box has been taken by the Council for the Brooklyn Girl Scouts and is occupied at each concert by musically gifted Girl Scouts. Another box is occupied by high school students who are leaders and players in high school orchestras in this borough and Queens.

The Brooklyn Institute, of which Mr. McDonald is president; the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, of which Dr. R. Huntington Woodman is president, and the Brooklyn committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman, and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, executive chairman, are sponsoring the Boston Symphony's 54th concert season in Brooklyn.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 25 1939

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens 54th Brooklyn Season; Many Attend Concert with Guests

A capacity audience greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened its 54th borough season last night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. In the audience were representatives of almost all of the professions, businesses and fields of social and civic enterprise which engage Brooklynites in their working hours. They united in expressing war mapproval of the program of three American works and the Cesar Franck Symphony in D Minor, presented by the orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Many attended the concert with guests. Mrs. William H. Good, who entertained in one of the boxes, gave a dinner for her guests earlier in the evening. Other boxes were occupied by Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, the Brooklyn Woman's Club, Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clarke H. Woodward of the Brooklyn Navy Yard, the Adelphi Alumnae Association and Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr. Many young people, home from schools and colleges for the Thanksgiving recess, were in the audience.

A complete review of the program will be found elsewhere in this edition of "The Brooklyn Citizen."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 25 1939

—MUSIC OF THE DAY—

Boston Symphony Plays at Academy

Koussevitzky Devotes First Half Of Concert to American Composers

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Serge Koussevitzky carried part of his "American festival" programs to Brooklyn last night for the first appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music. The first half of the concert was turned over to the cause of the American composer, the second half found the familiar Franck Symphony substantially intrenched. It may be regretted that the program was not All-American, for either of the two symphonies played in Carnegie Hall on Thursday night might have easily been included in the program. It happens that both Roy Harris' Third Symphony and Randall Thompson's Second Symphony were worthy of such attention. Furthermore, if Boston looks favorably on such a program, Brooklyn should be as receptive.

There is little cause for enlarging on the performance of the Boston Symphony. It was superb. As for the interpretations of the American compositions, it is difficult to imagine their being set forth in a more flattering manner. As champion of our native music, Dr. Koussevitzky gave them the fullest expression at his command. From now on they must stand on their intrinsic merit.

Perhaps the Arthur Foote Suite in E Major for String Orchestra, with which the concert began, is old fashioned; it is nevertheless gratifying to hear again and again. When the novelty of its tonal beauty wears off, there is still some fine writing to admire, especially the Fugue. As played last night by the Boston strings, it was a work of art.

Edward Burlingame Hill's Violin Concerto was composed in 1933, more than a quarter century after the Foote Suite. It is surprisingly academic, a little stiff, and more technically than aurally pleasing. The soloist was Ruth Posselt who gave an earnest and a very capable performance. Technical competence appears to be her forte. The composition calls for a more facile brilliance than her careful playing allowed.

John Alden Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," which is a Ballet of American Life, holds its own after a decade. Frankly realistic in its expression of the restlessness, work and play of this age, this music is cleverly contrived and scored. To many ears it may not be pleasing but since the composer accomplishes what he set out to do—"reflect some of the many rhythmic movements and sounds of modern American life"—it deserves tolerant consideration. As a matter of fact there is much to be said in its favor. The performance of it, with Dorothy Maynor and Leonard Franklin assisting, was a brilliant achievement.

The Franck Symphony pursued its course in a traditional Bostonian performance. Dr. Koussevitzky has been known to conduct it with a shade more momentum and incisiveness than he did last night, but that did not detract from the concord of tonal beauty which flows forth whenever this music is sensitively played.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

NOV 25 1939

About Dorothy Maynor.

New York has its second opportunity to hear Dorothy Maynor sing this afternoon, when she appears as a soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Her Town Hall recital last Sunday night left no doubt that the tiny Negro soprano (she is just under five feet tall) possesses a truly great voice, or that, although she may not yet be entitled to be called a great artist, she is potentially one of the finest singers of our time. What has happened to her since her "discovery" by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky last summer might well have turned the head of any young woman, and it is therefore a distinct pleasure to report that it hasn't upset Miss Maynor's sense of values in the least.

I have it on good authority that her managers have been swamped with offers for concert appearances, but if Miss Maynor has her way, and she seems, despite her genuine modesty and amiable disposition, to be a determined little person, very few of these will be accepted for the time being.

"I know that I have a great deal more work to do," she told me the other day. "I don't think I'm ready for a big concert tour yet. I hope I'll still have the opportunity to continue studying very hard."

The day after her Town Hall debut, when an audience that included most of the town's musical notables gave her the season's most excited and exciting ovation to date, she got up as usual at 7 A. M. and went right into her usual routine of study and practice. It never occurred to her that a successful debut was an excuse for even one day's resting on laurels. The critics mentioned certain faults — minor ones, it is true—in her singing, and she immediately set about remedying them.

She is deeply and sincerely grateful to those who have made it financially possible for her to devote herself completely to her musical training, chief among them Miss Harriot S. Curtis of Boston.

More Hard Work.

"What I want most," she said, "is to prove I am worthy of the faith they have in me." She herself doesn't regard the Town Hall recital as sufficient proof, whatever anybody else thinks. She has been studying in New York for the past three years, following a schedule that the average music student would regard as brutally exhausting. She insists, however, that it isn't too much for her, because she loves it. Besides vocal lessons, and hours of practice, she devotes a part of every day to the study of French, German and Italian.

"My only difficulty is keeping from singing too much," she said. "It is hard for me to pass the piano without stopping to sing something."

Despite this overwhelming urge to sing, if it hadn't been for certain determined friends Miss Maynor would never have embarked on her present career, although she had always hoped to earn her living through music. When she went to Hampton Institute she specialized in public-school music. Later, when she won a scholarship at the Westminster Choir School, she took courses in church music, still with the idea of devoting herself to teaching. Only the persuasions of Miss Curtis, former dean of women at Hampton, and other friends, induced her to come to New York and set about preparing for the concert platform.

Neither she nor her backers had any notion of her giving a New York recital this season, but Dr. Koussevitzky's enthusiasm when she sang for him at a private audition, and the general interest stirred by his announcement of his "discovery" made such an event almost inevitable.

Miss Maynor, whose father was a Methodist preacher, was born in Norfolk, Va., twenty-eight years ago. She studied the piano when she was a small child and entered Hampton Institute when she was fourteen. Besides singing in the choir there she also was a member of the school orchestra for two years. She played both the French horn and the flute.

Brooklyn Welcomes Boston's Orchestra

Overflow Audience at Academy Acclaims Opening Symphony Concert of Season

Brooklyn's interest in the Boston Symphony Orchestra soared to new heights last night as a widely representative audience of music lovers accorded a warm reception to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the celebrated conductor, and his 100 musicians at the opening concert of the orchestra's current season in the Academy of Music.

A capacity audience of 2,200 persons and an overflow of standees that packed the opera house of the Academy heard a program that consisted, in its first half, of the music of American composers and, after the intermission, the Symphony in D minor by Cesar Franck.

An account of the box parties given at the concert appears on Page 4 in the society news. Miles Kastendieck's review of the presentation is on Page 18.

Foote's Suite in E major, Opus 63, for String Orchestra was played as the opening selection and followed by Hill's Concerto for Violin, Opus 38, with Ruth Posselt, the American violinist, as soloist.

KOUSSEVITZKY 'TOPS'

An audience, ranging from fashionably dressed members of the smart set to trim office workers and family groups, seemed particularly to enjoy "Skyscrapers" (A Ballet of Modern American Life), by John Alden Carpenter. In this Dorothy Maynor, soprano, who made her Town Hall debut last week, and Leonard Franklin, tenor, appeared as soloists.

Delight over the success of the opening was expressed on every hand and all were agreed that Dr. Koussevitzky was "tops."

"It's a fine concert, modern, of course. There's a great treat in store in the Franck Symphony," said R. Huntington Woodman, the well-known Brooklyn organist and composer, during the intermission.

'JUBILANT AFFAIR'

Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, executive chairman of the Brooklyn Committee sponsoring the Boston Symphony season at the Academy, described it as "a jubilant affair."

"Never has the audience been so warm and hearty in its approval," she said.

And, by way of warning, Mrs. Davenport remarked that "there are but a few season tickets left."

As an "old Brooklynite," Mrs. William H. Good found it "thrilling" and "dynamic." "I thought I never would see a night like this here," she said.

Mingling with the society folk were leading businessmen, professional men, prominent members of the bench and bar.

GIRL SCOUTS PRESENT

Musically gifted Girl Scouts occupied a box taken by the Brooklyn Council of Girl Scouts for the season. High school students who are leaders and players in school orchestras in Brooklyn and Queens occupied another box.

Last night's concert was the first of a series of five to be heard at the Academy during the Boston Symphony's 54th season in Brooklyn. The next concert will be Jan. 12.

Chairman of membership for the Brooklyn Committee is Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow. Mrs. William G. James is the Junior League Committee chairman for the committee.

Members of the Brooklyn Committee, who, with few exceptions, were present for the opening concert, include:

Dr. Joseph Dana Allen
Juan A. Almirall
John Anderson
Mrs. Ernest Ash
Dr. Frank L. Babbott
Miss Phyllis Barnes
Mrs. John L. Bauer
Justice William R. Bayes
Edward C. Blum
Robert E. Blum
Mrs. Samuel T. Brown
Mrs. Glentworth Reeve Butler
Mrs. Edmund H. Cahill
Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll
Mrs. Oliver G. Carter
Mrs. Thomas F. Casey
Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin
Mrs. Ellwood Colahan
Mrs. Gordon Weir Colton
Walter H. Crittenden
Mrs. Russell V. Cruikshank
Mrs. Mary Childs Draper
Mrs. H. Edward Dreier
Mrs. Guy Du Val
Mrs. Merrill N. Foote
Mrs. Lewis W. Francis
Mrs. Charles W. Franklin
Mr. and Mrs. George H. Gartlan
Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin
Mrs. Charles R. Gay
Mrs. Emil Goetsch
Miss Louise Goetze
Miss Theodora Goldsmith
Mrs. William B. Greenman
Mrs. J. Morton Halstead
Mrs. William Peter Hamilton
Mr. and Mrs. Walter Hammitt
Frank R. Hancock
Mrs. Donald Havens
Mrs. James M. Hills
Mrs. Russell S. Hume
Mrs. O. Paul Humpstone
William T. Hunter
Mrs. Henry A. Ingraham
Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives
Mrs. Charles Jaffa
Dr. William A. Jewett
Mrs. Frederick L. Johanns
Mrs. David C. Johnson
Ralph Jonas
Mrs. Hans V. Kaltenborn
Jacob C. Klinck
Mrs. B. Meredith Langstaff
David H. Lanman
Mrs. John Eadie Leech
Mrs. Maxwell Lexter
Mrs. W. H. Lohman
Miss Hilda Loines
Mrs. Frederick D. MacKay
Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock
Mrs. James G. McDonald
Mrs. William W. Marshall
Mrs. E. P. Maynard Jr.
Miss Emma Jessie Ogg
Mrs. Dean C. Osborne
Mrs. Frank H. Parsons
Mrs. Charles Elwell Perkins
Mrs. Charles E. Potts
Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt
Mrs. Benjamin Prince
G. William Rasch
Mrs. Roland Rasch
Mrs. Frank Reynolds
Miss Agnes Ritchie
Miss Jessie Righter
Mrs. Donald Ross
Mrs. Irving J. Sands
Mrs. F. R. Schepmoes
Mrs. John D. H. Schulz
Mrs. Helen Warren Seeley
Robert Alfred Shaw
Mrs. Frank E. Simmons
Mrs. William Slater
Mrs. Harold Irving Small
Mrs. W. C. Spelman
Miss Arrietta Smith
Nelson Sprackling
Mrs. Ernest K. Tanner
Mrs. Franklin Taylor
Miss Marion J. Terry
Mrs. Hollis K. Thayer
Thornton C. Thayer
Carl H. Tollefsen
Mrs. Walter Truslow
Dr. Joshua M. Van Cott
Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen
Mrs. James P. Warbasse
Mrs. Edwin Carrington Ward
Mrs. Clarence Waterman
Mrs. Walter F. Watton
Mrs. Walter F. Wells
Mrs. George N. Whittlesey
Mrs. William H. Whitton
Surrogate George Albert Wingate
Mrs. Maude B. Wood
Mr. and Mrs. R. Huntington Woodman
Miss Elizabeth Wright
Edward J. A. Zeiner

LIST OF SUBSCRIBERS

Subscribers include Mrs. Raymond V. Ingersoll, wife of the Borough President; Philip A. Benson, president of the Dime Savings Bank of Brooklyn; Miss Mabel Ray, Mrs. W. F. Heissenbuttal, Miss B. M. Donaldson, Charles A. Middendorf, Mrs. Austin C. Keough, Dr. Irving Cabot, Mrs. Warner King, Ferdinand Weber, Miss Frances S. Drew, Mr. and Mrs. George S. Frank, Miss M. B. Reimer, Mrs. R. C. Eckhardt, Dr. and Mrs. W. G. Neally, Miss Mae Schenck, Arthur E. Delmhorst, Mrs. Bruce Bromley, Dr. Leo Davidoff, Mr. and Mrs. Francis L. Dirk, Mrs. Robert Walmsley, Richard J. Wulff, Mrs. Bernard Rentrop, Mrs. George Hoskwith, F. W. Nitardy, Mrs. W. J. Merrill, Miss Frances Woodward, Mrs. Almet R. Latson Jr., Hiram A. Tuttle, Mrs. Augustus Harris, Dr. David Feiner, Mrs. Ernest P. Goodrich, Mrs. J. N. Carpenter, Mrs. H. Gainsburg, Dr. L. Martin Segall, Mrs. Ormond M. Gore, Mrs. Edwards L. Cleveland, Sidney W. Davidson, Charles S. Adams, Miss Martha Casamajor, Mrs. Charles L. Babcock, Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, Dr. J. Rosenblum, Ralph Bridgman, Mrs. Edward H. Behr, Miss Katharine E. Campbell, Mrs. Francis D. Dodge, Arthur H. Graves, Mrs. A. C. Leggett, Mrs. H. Kreindler, Mrs. George B. Ray, Frederick R. Lack, Mrs. Maurice Ferrara, Mrs. Stephen Harrison, Mrs. Edwin L. Snedeker, Dr. and Mrs. Richard Pasternack, Miss Harriet A. Kerby, Mrs. John Henry Ernst, Miss Louise M. Coleman, Dr. Samuel L. Cranin, Mrs. Elliott C. DuBois, Dr. H. Barishman, Herbert Wikle, Mrs. Paul E. Vernon, Mrs. John J. McCue, Mrs. M. Messing, Mrs. L. C. Dinsmore, Mrs. George N. Billings, Dr. Max Bakst, Mrs. Henry C. Badgley, Mrs. John T. Underwood, Warner James, Miss Esther Forman, Alfred L. Megill, Mrs. Percy R. Gray, Mrs. Frederick Addinsell, Mrs. W. F. Sherman, Col. Arthur V. McDermott.

Mrs. B. Bernstein, John A. Lynch, William M. Parke, Mrs. E. H. Thatcher, Miss Grace P. Hart, Mrs. Alfred Wise, Miss Catherine Van Brunt, Miss Gertrude Van Brunt, Mrs. Paul Fisher, Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Gomory, John W. James, Mrs. W. B. Carswell, Mrs. W. S. Moorhead, Mrs. J. B. Miller, Dr. William Sidney Smith, Miss Elsie Hepburn, Miss Helen McWilliams, Mrs. J. G. MacLean, Mrs. William Scheele, Mrs. Harry H. Lipsig, Mrs. Henry A. Walton, Miss Elsie Hinchen, Mrs. Harold Fink, Mrs. Edward Haynes, David Heckler, Mrs. Leonard Moore, Miss Dorothy L. Betts, Miss Doris Eldridge, Dr. Tasker Howard, Mrs. L. J. O'Reilly, Miss Emily E. Johnson, J. P. McElroy, Dr. W. S. Collins, Mrs. Francis T. Christy, Miss Jane Langthorne, Mrs. Charles E. Rogers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 25 1939

Music

Stravinsky to Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra in Concert of Own Composition on Tuesday.—Marian Anderson Will Sing in Metropolitan Theatre a Week from Tomorrow.

Within the next two weeks, musicians of national and international renown will visit this city in the not unrelated causes of art and business.

Igor Stravinsky, eminent composer, will conduct a concert of his own music, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Metropolitan Theatre on Tuesday night. Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, will be soloist in the Stravinsky capriccio for piano and orchestra. The other works are the "Petroucka," "Fire-Bird" and "Jeu de Cartes" suites.

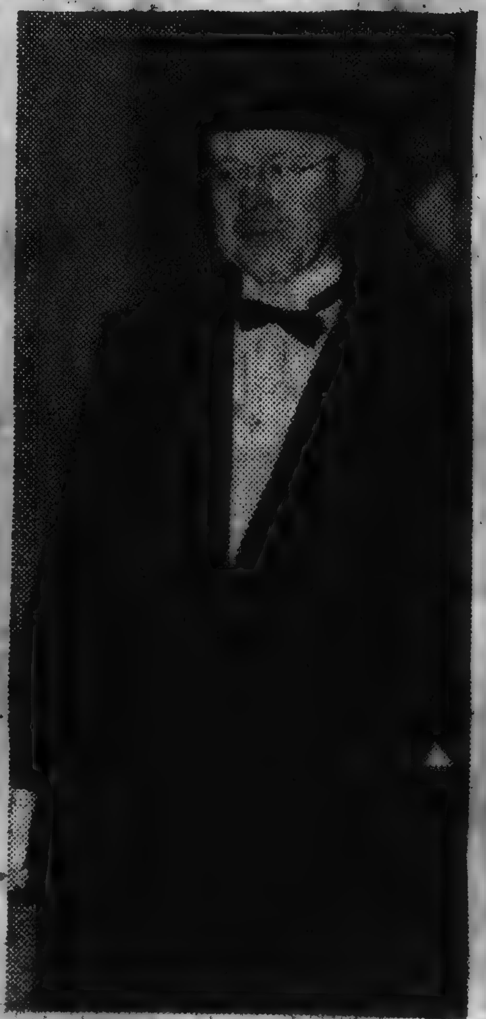
• • •

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 25 1939

Borough's Album of Music Lovers Greets Concert at Academy

Brooklyn turned out in force last night for the opening concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music. Among the 2,200 persons who packed the house were, above, left to right: Supreme Court Justice Lewis L. Fawcett and Miss Lucille Fawcett, his niece; Robert Alfred Shaw with Mrs. Edward C. Blum, chairman of boxes for the concert series; Mr. and Mrs. Leonard P. Moore; Surrogate George A. Wingate with Mrs. Wingate; Miss Gertrude Arvidson and Miss Janet McDonald, daughter of Dr. James G. McDonald, president of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. (Eagle Staff photos.)

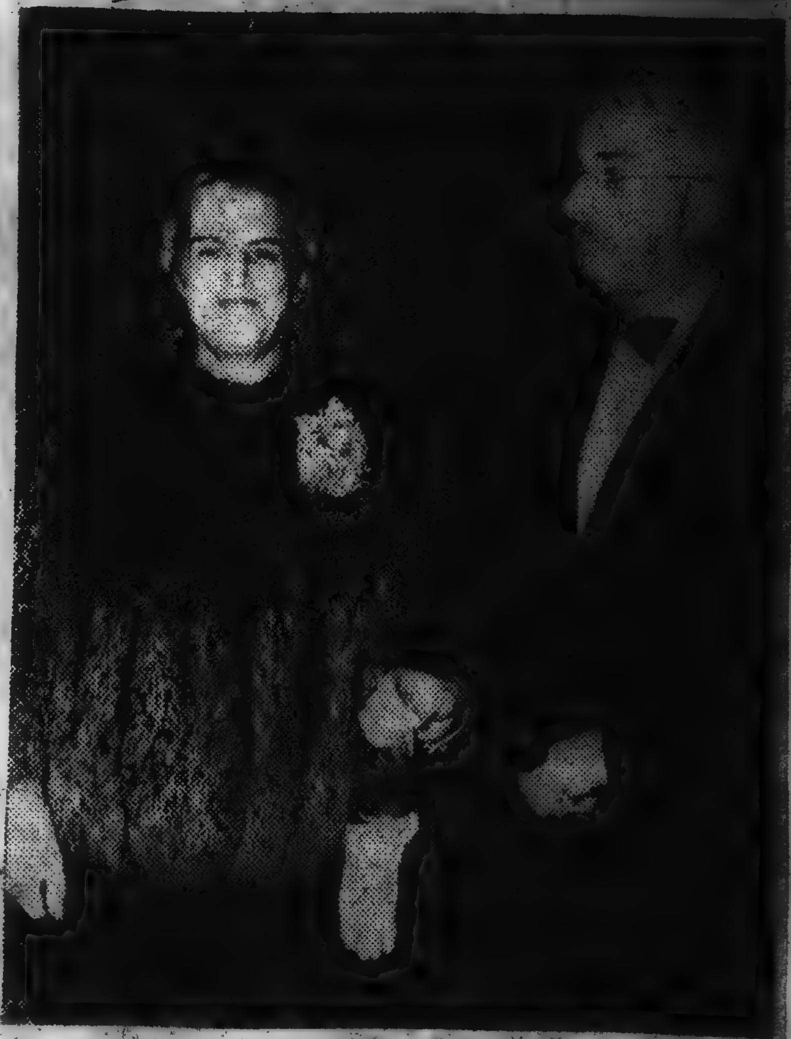
Mrs. Edwin P. Maynard Jr. and Mrs. Mildred Wilcox.



Dr. C. Stuart Gager, director of the Brooklyn Botanic Garden.

Donald G. C. Sinclair, president of Caledonian Hospital, and Mrs. Dean C. Osborne discuss the program.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport. Mrs. Davenport is executive chairman of the Brooklyn Committee sponsoring the concert series.



Mrs. Thomas F. Casey and Col. Alfred C. B. MacNevin enjoyed the music.

97

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

NOV 26 1939

Koussevitzky Ends Programs By Americans

Cheers Greet Climax of Bostonians' Experiment; Dorothy Maynor Soloist

By Francis D. Perkins

The American music festival presented by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra for their first two concerts of the season in Carnegie Hall closed yesterday afternoon when Howard Hanson, whose third symphony closed the program, was cheered, as he took his bows, by an audience whose reception of the concert as a whole implied that the conductor's experiment of beginning his New York season with two all-American lists could be regarded as an undoubted success. William Schuman, represented by his American Festival Overture, and Edward Burlingame Hill, whose violin concerto, Op. 38, [illegible] Manhattan premiere, also were on hand for a personal acknowledgment of the applause for their music, and warm plaudits would also have been heard by John Alden Carpenter, had he been present just after the performance of the music for his ballet "Skyscrapers."

The ballet suite brought the second appearance of Dorothy Maynor, the young Neg[illegible]ho had made a notable recital debut here last Sunday, and the debut of a young Negro tenor, Leonard Franklin, in the brief vocal solos. Mr. Schuman's overture, which opened the program, had been written for the Boston Symphony, which introduced it yesterday to the composer's native city. In Mr. Hill's concerto the soloist was Ruth Pierce Posselt, who had also taken part in its Boston premiere and its first New York hearing last Friday in Brooklyn.

The discovery of durable American works and their gradual incorporation into the regular repertoire is probably best effected in most cases by their presentation in cosmopolitan programs of the usual kind, but nevertheless Dr. Koussevitzky's 100 per cent American program, like its predecessor on Thursday, had its particular value in giving its hearers opportunity for acquaintance or reacquaintance with consequential works of varying type, style and atmosphere, not cut according to one pattern, or suggesting a single predominating contemporary American flavor, but, in the revelation of four different individualities, giving an impression of breadth and diversity. Mr. Schuman, at twenty-nine, was the junior member of yesterday's list of composers; Messrs. Hill and Carpenter, born in the 1870's, represented the elder statesmen among our creative musicians, while Dr. Hanson is one of the next generation of established writers of music.

Mr. Schuman's overture, beginning with three notes which he describes as the call to play for getting groups of New York boys together for an auspicious occasion, has a liveliness and spirit suited to its title, apart from a short section of a more pensive character which provides a contrast corresponding to that in Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. Such influences as there are stem, however, from composers of a much more recent date, although these are ably fused in a style favoring relatively latter-day harmonies.

Shows Mastery of Medium

At a first hearing, however, the fugal part of the work seems to be somewhat loosely constructed, giving an impression of diffuseness and indeterminate destination before the closing climax.

Although Mr. Hill's concerto was his first work for violin and orchestra, it was gratefully violinistic for most of its course, especially in the rhapsodic slow movement, in which the flowing song of the solo and the meditative orchestral background testified to the Cambridge composer's command of musical ideas and mastery of his medium. The first movemen, which, up to the cadenza, treated the violin somewhat less lyrically, was also appealing, suggesting a post-romantic atmosphere combined with a little discreet polytonality. The brief finale left a certain sense of incompletion, but the net impression was one of individuality and expert craftsmanship set forth with considerable imagination.

"Skyscrapers," produced at the Metropolitan in 1926, was familiar here for some time afterward as a concert work, but has not been played for several years. To some extent it might be ranked as a period piece, recalling the days when a wedding of a jazz influence and symphonic music seemed to be near at hand, and its programmatic meaning is not altogether complete away from the ballet stage. Yet it is music worth rehearing, in which the hints of jazz are only one of several elements, and in which the composer's ability to realize his contrasts of atmosphere is still notable.

Miss Maynor, after a little difficulty in getting her tones fully focused in her first measures, sang with clear, fluent notes of ingratiating quality, which left regret that her contribution to the music should be so brief. Mr. Franklin, who was recommended to the Boston Symphony by Roland Hayes, made a very pleasing first impression.

Dr. Hanson's third symphony was played here in part in September, 1937, by the Columbia Broadcasting Symphony Orchestra and six months later in full by the NBC Symphony, but this was its local premiere before a paying audience.

It gains on acquaintance, showing a distinct atmosphere of its own, significant musical ideas and expressive potency. The influence of Sibelius, in theme and structure, especially in the first movement, is hardly to be denied, and there are times when a greater range in the emotional and instrumental color, a contrasting episode or two of lighter character and texture might add to the effectiveness of the work as a whole.

But it is music of unusual consequence, emotional persuasiveness, the work of a composer of increasingly perceptive individuality, and the plaudits were well deserved after an interpretation of imposing excellence.

Much praise was also due to Miss Posselt, whose work is already known here, for the skill and the laudable quality of tone which characterized her playing of the Hill concerto.

Negro Soprano Sings at American Music Festival

Soibelman Syndicate

Dorothy Maynor, who made her local debut last Sunday, photographed with Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, when the orchestra presented its second concert of the season

Koussevitzky Praised For Aid to U. S. Music

Dr. Damrosch Lauds Conductor at Lotos Club Dinner

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was called by Dr. Walter Damrosch the "foremost among all conductors in protecting American music" at a dinner given in his honor last night at the Lotos Club, 110 West Fifty-seventh Street. The dinner was the 194th to be given by the Lotos Club since 1872, in accordance with its custom of honoring distinguished artists and statesmen of all nationalities. More than 200 persons were present.

Dr. Damrosch praised the influence of Russian music and musicians on American music and said that the accomplishment of art in America was an example of what a mixture of races could do under a democratic civilization.

Dr. Koussevitzky spoke briefly of the excellence of modern American music and the vigor and energy it possesses.

The attention paid by Dr. Koussevitzky to American music was also commended by Gene Buck, president of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers, and by Charles O'Connell, young conductor. Among others present were Dr. Harry Woodburn Chase, chancellor of New York University and president of the Lotos Club; Mrs. Clara Clemens Gabrilowitsch, Rose Bampton, Vernon Duke, Arthur Fiedler, Leonard Liebling, Igor Gorin, James Montgomery Flagg, Mrs. Gertrude Robinson Smith, Louis K. Anspacher, Jesus San Roma, Olin Downes and Leon Leonidoff.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 26 1939

Music and Musicians

By John Tebbel

AFTER he has unveiled a program of his own music in Providence Tuesday night, Igor Stravinsky will wind up a busy week by conducting the Boston Symphony Friday afternoon and Saturday night at Symphony Hall. Bostonians will hear substantially the same program performed here—"The Card Game" ballet music (in its Boston premiere), the piano Capriccio with Sanroma again as soloist, and the Petrouchka suite—except that Mr. Stravinsky has dropped the Firebird and substituted his choral "Symphony of Psalms."

THIS CLIPPING FROM MIAMI, FLA.
HERALD
NOV 26 1939

TOSCANINI HERALDED AS BEST CONDUCTOR

Edward Clarke Tells of Musician's First Public Appearance In Lecture

By THOMAS BAIRD
Herald Staff Writer

When you turn on your radio and listen to a symphonic program with Arturo Toscanini wielding the baton, you are hearing music made by the greatest conductor of all time.

This was the opinion of Edward Clarke, of the University of Miami music department, given in his lecture at the Miami Woman's club. "Art of the Orchestra Conductor" was his topic, and it gave the lecturer an opportunity to weave in reminiscences of musical men he has run across and read about in a varied musical experience.

Toscanini, he said, began as a conductor at the age of 19 when he did a bit of pinch hitting at Rio Janeiro in 1886, after the regular conductor went on strike and a temperamental Latin audience threatened a riot. The Italian maestro conducted the opera "Aida" without a score, and it went over big. So, by accident, a great conductor who had played a cello was discovered.

Clarke's recital of the rise of early orchestras was interesting. The first conductors were time-beaters. One of the pioneers, a fine musician, in pounding the floor with a stick to keep his players on the notes, struck his foot, the speaker recounted, and died of blood poisoning. The first real conductor was Felix Mendelssohn, who used the modern baton. He came to the London Philharmonic after his service with the Leipzic orchestra.

The greatest musical organization in America, Clarke said, is the Boston orchestra, as it also is the oldest. Its former director, Karl Muck, was followed by the great Russian, Koussevitsky.

The program ended with vocal selections by Miss Jean Andrews, accompanied by her mother, Mrs. W. H. Andrews.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 26 1939

Out of Town

Igor Stravinsky, who is now associated with Harvard University as a visiting lecturer, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of his music next Friday afternoon and Saturday night in Symphony Hall. The works to be heard by the Boston subscribers are "Jeu de Cartes," the Capriccio for orchestra and piano, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist; the "Petrouchka" suite and the "Symphonie de Psaumes," in which the Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler, will sing.

The Monte Carlo Ballet Russe will fill its sixth annual engagement with the Cleveland Orchestra next Friday, Saturday and Sunday. In the orchestra's regular concerts of next week, on Dec. 7 and 9, under Artur Rodzinski's direction, Jascha Heifetz will be the soloist in the first performances of William Walton's new concerto. Zino Francescatti, who was heard here last week end with the Philharmonic-Symphony, will play three times with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra this week, offering a Mozart concerto Tuesday afternoon and Paganini's concerto in D major on Thursday night and Friday afternoon.

Vladimir Golschmann will conduct the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra in the first performance of Tansman's orchestrations of two Bach chorales next Friday afternoon and Saturday night. Bruckner's seventh symphony will be played for the first time in St. Louis, and Willard McGregor will be the soloist in Beethoven's piano concerto in C major.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat-Chronicle

NOV 26 1939

HANSON MUSIC DRAWS PRAISE AT NEW YORK

Third Symphony On Program in Carnegie Hall

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS
Herald-Tribune Music Critic

New York—Cheers greeted Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall when he took his bows after Serge Koussevitzky had conducted his third symphony in the Boston Symphoney Orchestra's all-American program.

Dr. Hanson's latest symphony had not been heard before in a New York concert hall, although it had been played in part of the Columbia Broadcasting System Orchestra in September, 1937, and in full by the National Broadcasting Company Symphony under the composer in the following March.

It is an important contribution to American symphonic music in scope, emotional content and imaginatively pervasive atmosphere. At times, especially in the first movement, the thematic material and its development suggest the influence of Sibelius, and the effectiveness of the work as a whole might be enhanced by some passages of lighter character and scoring. This is provided to a certain extent by the Scherzo, but its instrumental color does not differ substantially from that of the other movements.

Nevertheless, in his musical ideas and their treatment and instrumental investiture, Dr. Hanson has provided a work which gives a net impression in individuality and imagination, of something significant to say and the ability to set this forth with persuasive conviction. It has breadth and substance, and well merits further hearings.

The well received program began with the first performance here of an American Festival Overture by William Schuman, a young New York composer. Ruth Possolt did laudable work as soloist in Edward Burlingame Hill's violin concerto. Two Negro artists, Dorothy Maynor, soprano, who made a much acclaimed debut here last Sunday, and Leonard Franklin, tenor, sang the short vocal solos in John Alden Carpenter's music for his ballet "Sky Scrapers."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 26 1939

CONDUCTOR HONORED FOR AID TO U. S. MUSIC

Koussevitzky Praised by Buck and Damrosch at Dinner

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was honored last night by the Lotos Club for his aid to American composers.

Among those who praised Mr. Koussevitzky at the dinner in the clubhouse, at 110 West Fifty-seventh Street, were Dr. Walter Damrosch, Dr. Harry Woodburn Chase and Gene Buck, the president of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers.

Mr. Buck, who recently denounced several famous conductors for their neglect of American music, eulogized Mr. Koussevitzky for maintaining 'an open door through which American composers can enter and be assured a fair and understanding hearing."

Dr. Damrosch praised the modern American composers for their mastery of technique and termed Mr. Koussevitzky "the leader in encouraging our young Americans."

Mr. Koussevitzky, in his response, criticized those who deride American composers by saying they are not of the caliber of Brahms and Beethoven.

"Our American composers don't have to be Brahms or Beethoven," he said. "What we need is composers who can give us the youth and the energy of our life. And these things our modern American composers can give us."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 26 1939

Stravinsky to Provide Music Highlight Here

Will Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra in Program of His Own Compositions Tuesday.—Brown to Sponsor Recital

ONE of the season's most notable concerts will take place in the Metropolitan Theatre Tuesday night when Igor Stravinsky a leader among living composers, comes to Providence for the first time as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of his own music.

The bill has been made up largely from Stravinsky's ballets, one of which, "Jeu de Cartes," as a concert piece, will have its first New England hearing. Another feature is the appearance of Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist in Stravinsky's Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra. Mr. Sanroma was the soloist when the Capriccio had its American debut several years ago under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky.

"Jeu de Cartes," describing in music three deals in a poker game, is Stravinsky's latest ballet. It was composed for and was first performed by the American Ballet in New York. The scene is the green table in a gaming house. Each deal is introduced by ceremonial music as the cards are shuffled and dealt. As the ballet was presented the play is followed minutely, the joker possessing the power of any card and usually controlling the outcome. After each showdown a giant hand emerged from the wings and moved the cards.

Suites from the ballets, "The Fire-Bird" and "Petrouchka," which first brought their composer fame, are other works programmed. "Petrouchka" depicts a country fair with its crowds and sideshows. "The Fire-Bird" is based on a fairy tale familiar in Russia. It is played in the following movements: Introduction: Kastchei's Enchanted Garden and Dance of the Fire-Bird, Supplication of the Fire-Bird, The Princesses Play With the Golden Apples, Dance of the Princess, Infernal Dance of All the Subjects of Kastchei.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Sunday Jour. & American

NOV 26 1939

Boston Symphony Heard In All-American Program

By GRENA BENNETT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra went all-American again in the program presented yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Conductor Serge Houssevitzky chose for his second list of music by composers of this country the first local performance of Schumann's American Festival Overture. Hill's Viiolin concerto and Hanton's Third Symphony and included Carpenter's "Skycrapers" (a ballet of American lfie), which had its premiere at the Metropolitan Opera House, Feb. 19, 1926.

The Schumann work is frankly atonal, in most of its pages recalling the sounds emanating from a street parade on New Years eve. Spasmodic episodes of more beguiling character gave solace to the ears of the listeners, but these were of short duration and led to a continuance of the restless and flamboyant measures that dominated the composition.

The concerto introduced Ruth Passelt as the solo violinist. She contributed a commendable and brilliant reading of her share. On the whole her work is interesting, scored in a craftsmanlike manner and is a valuable acquisition to its class, a class that definitely needs new blodo.

"Skyscraper," as its sub-title eloquently confesses, reflects the modern American style of music that is popular in dance halls and their orchestras.

There is no subtle implication or symbolic significance in its lively syncopation and bold, vital rhythms that are jazz and "swing" and the unadorned melodies that one hears in the musical comedies of today.

The music is of the Gershwin type, is dextrously orchestrated and contains the same appeal to popular taste that marked its initial hearing more than a decade ago.

Brief vocal solos were sung by Dorothy Maynor, the sensational young Negro soprano, and Leonard Franklin, Negro tenor.

The Hanson symphony according to its composer, "springs definitely from the north, and has its genesis in the composer's reverence for the spiritual contribution that has been made to Amerca by the sturdy race of pioneers who, as early as 1638, founded the first Swedish settlement on the Delaware."

The work has gusto and vitality with an undercurrent of mysticism and the austere, qualities that operate with intensity and fervor when disclosed by the superb musicianship of the Boston Band.

The many recalls were shared by the composers who responded graciously to the applause of a capacity audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

15

NOV 26 1939

AMERICAN MUSIC APPLAUDED AGAIN

Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra Are Heard at Matinee

WORK OF HANSON HEARD

Carpenter's 'Skyscraper,' Hill's Violin Concerto and Schuman Overture Played

By OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's second program of American music was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under his leadership yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, and the very enthusiastic reception of this program repeated the scenes of the first one given last Thursday night in the same auditorium.

Again the hall was crammed with an extremely interested audience. Again you could not have told, by the quality and duration of the applause, whether the program was by William Schuman of New York, Edward Burlingame Hill of Boston, John Alden Carpenter of Chicago and Howard Hanson of Wahoo, Neb., or whether the musicians represented were named Hindemith, Wienberger, Krenek or Schoenberg—except that the applause might not have been so hearty for some of these latter individuals.

Of course the amount of applause a composition receives has proved on more than one occasion to be in inverse ratio to its artistic merit. The fact that remains is that a highly sophisticated audience found itself much interested and entertained by a second program of American music.

American Soloists Presented

On this program American soloists also figured, for Ruth Posselt, violinist, played for the first time in New York the violin concerto of Mr. Hill, and Dorothy Maynor, the Negro soprano, whose remarkable voice has brought her recently into fame, sang the soprano solo in the performance of Mr. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," and a gifted Negro tenor, Leonard Franklin, took the other solo part in this work.

The concert opened with Mr. Schuman's "American Festival "Overture," heard for the first time here, and it ended with Mr. Hanson's Third symphony, also a first New York performance. With the exception of Mr. Carpenter, each composer made in turn his bow to the audience from the stage.

Mr. Schuman, a student in theoretical studies of Max Persin and Charles Haubiel of this city, and, in a more general sense of composition, of Roy Harris, was first made known by performances of his works given here under the auspices of the WPA. His first quartet and his first symphony were presented at concerts of the Composers Forum Laboratory, then financed by WPA funds.

The advantage of the opportunity thus afforded a young composer of hearing his early manuscripts was shown by the fact that soon after, on its own initiative, Mr. Schuman withdrew these two works from public performance. He composed a second quartet and a second symphony, the latter work receiving its New York première under the direction of Alexander Smallens at the WPA concert given in Carnegie Hall last May 7. At this concert, and later at the Stadium concerts in the Summer-time, also under Smallens' direction, there was heard Schuman's "Prologue" for Chorus and Orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky performed the Second Symphony at the Boston Symphony concerts of last Feb. 17 and 18 in Boston. The overture heard yesterday was composed specifically for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts of American music.

This overture is a lusty piece, full of vitality, and fearless. It is the poorest composed piece of yesterday's program, but far from the least in ideas and creative urge. The harmonic style may not be what the composer will show when he has become completely himself, and more skilled than he is today in the arts of instrumentation and development. But the piece is full of spirit and talent. The principal motive sufficiently intrepid and debonair for any one, is a play-call that Mr. Schuman often heard on his New York streets. "It is yelled," he tells us in the program notes, "on the syllables, 'Wee-Awk-ee' to get the gang together."

There is a second contrasting subject and there is a sizzling fugue, developed in a way which, though highly competent, is personal and not academic. There is wit and imagination in this music.

Violin Concerto Played

Mr. Hill has written his violin concerto, which is in the three customary movements, with the charm and taste, technical skill and adeptness in the treatment of form which the public has long since come to accept on trust from him. His slow movement is conspicuous for its admirably sustained line, and a pervasive and poetical mood. Mr. Hill has always been decisive in never spinning out any part of a composition beyond the length justified by its inherent idea. The violin concerto is conformation of this rule. There is nothing superfluous, nothing unrelated to the central thought in it, and it is so well done that the casual listener might easily fail to realize the fastidiousness of the choice of material and the fineness of the craftsmanship.

Miss Posselt in the performance of this work was completely authoritative, musicianly, sincere in her enthusiastic interpretation, and she observed a refinement and distinction of style appropriate to the music. She felt the form of the concert as a whole; her conception was unified. She allowed no nuance or fineness of phrase to escape her.

The voice of Dorothy Maynor demonstrated more than one of its superb qualities when it mingled with the tone of the orchestra in Mr. Carpenter's vivid score—a voice now rich and sensuous, now brilliantly and unmistakably dramatic over the sonorities of the many instruments.

Mr. Franklin's qualities as tenor and as a musician, were shown to excellent advantage.

These soloists sat, as they should, in the orchestra, not as first soprano and first tenor of the show, but as two human voices, with the beautiful and communicative quality that no instrument can possess, nevertheless used as part of the instrumental ensemble. Neither singer was conspicuous in the ranks of the players till Koussevitzky had them rise and bow after the work was over.

And what a diverting, witty, bravura piece of writing this "Sky-Scraper" suite is! It is American music, albeit of a somewhat exterior sort, designed for the theatre by a perfect master of his tools. The commotion of the opening; the sounds and excitements of the streets; the more introspective moods, including the capital employment of jazz motive and rhythms, and the theme of weariness which casts its shadow of melancholy over the whole, are alike of our scene and time—not too seriously so, but a thing sprung from the popular life and theatre.

It is glitter and amusement, and so intended. Yet there is a symphonic continuity, lacking the element of the spectacle, and it is a master's job.

Mr. Hanson's Third Symphony is more serious than all this, grander in proportions, and of intention more austere. For many pages, especially in the first movement, it is saturated with Sibelius, but in the third movement, however, Mr. Hanson's allegiance wavers, and he turns momentarily to Dvorak of the "New World." But when the derivative or even subconsciously imitative elements are waved away, something is there. It shows most in the slow movement, which has an astonishing, puissant melodic line and a real breadth. In this moment Mr. Hanson seems to us truest in his feeling, least influenced, most distinguished and most affecting in his expression in what he has to say.

That in many places there are mannerisms, the endless repetition of insignificant ideas, persistent pedal points, which crop up like King Charles's head in the consciousness of Mr. Dick, the clinging to fixed tonalities which is all too likely to defeat its own purpose is rather evident. But there is genuinely melodic quality and the feeling for a big form. The choral heard in the first movement is good Lutheranism, and also contrast. Unfortunately there is not enough of such salient material in the score to balance the repetitions of rhythmical figures which are only good when they arrive at something. Repetitions, sequences, are part of every composer's stock in trade. Trimming of superfluous measures, concentration of style, are probably among Mr. Hanson's needs as a creative musician. It might not hurt him to forget that he is a Nordic, so far as the deliberate cultivation of formulas to indicate that fact is concerned. He is not under this necessity, for he proves that underneath certain solecisms he has things real and important that he can say.

As for the performances of the afternoon it would be hard to praise them too highly. It is probably not exaggeration to remark that the composers represented can never hope for a better presentation of their music. Dr. Koussevitzky put every capacity of his superb orchestra at their service and would not have devoted himself more completely to their cause if each work on the program had been an immortal masterpiece.

—BOSTON SUNDAY ADVERTISER

Nov. 26, 1939

98

Symphony Audiences Near and Far

By LEO GAFFNEY

ONE of the near-tragedies of the sunken Athenia at the outbreak of the present war was the case of the drizzled survivor who desperately cabled to Symphony Hall from Ireland:

"Please don't surrender tickets, my return delayed on Athenia."

The powers at Symphony Hall were not surprised. None better than they know the paramount importance of tickets in the souls of their subscribers.

And as for doing business by cable, nothing extraordinary about that. The Boston Symphony is a world institution, not merely local, and from the world at large it draws personnel and public.

There is, for example, the lady from Kent, England, who is a regular subscriber, journeying here in the fall of every year for the express purpose of attending all the concerts. And neither the war nor any other hazard is permitted to interfere.

To most people this ardor is mysterious, even queer. How anyone can spend two mortal hours in a hushed hall "just listening" to an orchestra is beyond understanding. The antique prejudice that music is only for polite ladies and moonstruck men, though considerably shaken of late, still persists.

(The absence of the Orchestra, this week on tour, provokes these armchair reflections.)

"MUSIC is what awakes WITHIN at the sound of the instruments," said Walt Whitman, which would account not only for the nature of the art, but also for the tough hom the oes not a ques-

ide. Mu-to the interior that it the the he case report-
, sub-o "soak s they lug-ugd pro-

people pur-extent in the an as-John on his sposed y and for the y, nat-pensive cribers where

l. And me on the week-end concerts, Friday afternoon and Saturday night, there is the extra series, five each, Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon.

It is possible to get in on the latter series for less than a ten-dollar bill. Season tickets make noble Christmas gifts, too, especially for the student.

IT has often been remarked that the symphony audience is chiefly elderly, that in a few years attendance will die out. Not at all! The young are more and more in evidence as time goes on, readily cultivated by the radio and the splendid Youth Concerts conducted by Wheeler Beckett.

These are a series of six concerts for high school and junior high school students. Membership is a students' club to which it is by no means difficult to belong. Concerts are given on Wednesday afternoons at 3:30. Program notes explaining the works to be played, together with their principal musical themes, are mailed in advance to the membership for purposes of study. Further information on the Youth Concerts will no doubt be gladly supplied on application to Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., Youth Concerts, Symphony Hall.

Next Symphony Program

IGOR STRAVINSKY will conduct four works of his own at the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday.

The Capriccio for piano and orchestra, which had its first American performance at the Boston Symphony concerts with Sanroma as soloist, will again be played, and again with Mr. Sanroma. Stravinsky will open the program with the music of his latest ballet, "Card Game, In Three Deals." This score, written for and first produced by the American ballet in New York, depicts three hands in a poker game, the individual cards repsented by the various dancers.

The suite from the ballet "Petrouchka" will also be played, and to end the program, the "Symphony of Psalms," which Stravinsky composed for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 50th anniversary. The Cecilia Society will combine with the orchestra in these performances.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 26 1939

Stravinsky to Provide Music Highlight Here

Will Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra in Program of His Own Compositions Tuesday.—Brown to Sponsor Recital

ONE of the season's most notable concerts will take place in the Metropolitan Theatre Tuesday night when Igor Stravinsky a leader among living composers, comes to Providence for the first time as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a pro~~gram of his own~~ music.

The bill has been made up largely from Stravinsky's ballets, one of which, "Jeu de Cartes," as a concert piece, will have its first New England hearing. Another feature is the appearance of Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist in Stravinsky's Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra. Mr. Sanroma was the soloist when the Capriccio had its American debut several years ago under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky.

"Jeu de Cartes," describing in music three deals in a poker game, is Stravinsky's latest ballet. It was composed for and was first performed by the American Ballet in New York. The scene is the green table in a gaming house. Each deal is introduced by ceremonial music as the cards are shuffled and dealt. As the ballet was presented the play is followed minutely, the joker possessing the power of any card and usually controlling the outcome. After each showdown a giant hand emerged from the wings and moved the cards.

Suites from the ballets, "The Fire-Bird" and "Petrouchka," which first brought their composer fame, are other works programmed. "Petrouchka" depicts a country fair with its crowds and sideshows. "The Fire-Bird" is based on a fairy tale familiar in Russia. It is played in the following movements: Introduction: Kastchei's Enchanted Garden and Dance of the Fire-Bird, Supplication of the Fire-Bird, The Princesses Play With the Golden Apples, Dance of the Princess, Infernal Dance of All the Subjects of Kastchei.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Sunday Jour. & American

NOV 26 1939

Bos~~ton Sym~~phony Heard In All-American Program

By GRENA BENNETT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra went all-American again in the program presented yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Conductor Serge Houssevitzky chose for his second list of music by composers of this country the first local performance of Schumann's American Festival Overture. Hill's Viiolin concerto and Hanton's Third Symphony and included Carpenter's "Skycrapers" (a ballet of American lfie), which had its premiere at the Metropolitan Opera House, Feb. 19, 1926.

The Schumann work is frankly atonal, in most of its pages recalling the sounds emanating from a street parade on New Years eve. Spasmodic episodes of more beguiling character gave solace to the ears of the listeners, but these were of short duration and led to a continuance of the restless and flamboyant measures that dominated the composition.

The concerto introduced Ruth Passelt as the solo violinist. She contributed a commendable and brilliant reading of her share. On the whole her work is interesting, scored in a craftsmanlike manner and is a valuable acquisition to its class, a class that definitely needs new blodo.

"Skyscraper," as its sub-title eloquently confesses, reflects the modern American style of music that is popular in dance halls and their orchestras.

There is no subtle implication or symbolic significance in its lively syncopation and bold, vital rhythms that are jazz and "swing" and the unadorned melodies that one hears in the musical comedies of today.

The music is of the Gershwin type, is dextrously orchestrated and contains the same appeal to popular taste that marked its initial hearing more than a decade ago.

Brief vocal solos were sung by Dorothy Maynor, the sensational young Negro soprano, and Leonard Franklin, Negro tenor.

The Hanson symphony according to its composer, "springs definitely from the north, and has its genesis in the composer's reverence for the spiritual contribution that has been made to Amerca by the sturdy race of pioneers who, as early as 1638, founded the first Swedish settlement on the Delaware."

The work has gusto and vitality with an undercurrent of mysticism and the austere, qualities that operate with intensity and fervor when disclosed by the superb musicianship of the Boston Band.

The many recalls were shared by the composers who responded graciously to the applause of a capacity audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

15

NOV 26 1939

AMERICAN MUSIC APPLAUDED AGAIN

Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra Are Heard at Matinee

WORK OF HANSON HEARD

Carpenter's 'Skyscraper,' Hill's Violin Concerto and Schuman Overture Played

By OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's second program of American music was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under his leadership yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, and the very enthusiastic reception of this program repeated the scenes of the first one given last Thursday night in the same auditorium.

Again the hall was crammed with an extremely interested audience. Again you could not have told, by the quality and duration of the applause, whether the program was by William Schuman of New York, Edward Burlingame Hill of Boston, John Alden Carpenter of Chicago and Howard Hanson of Wahoo, Neb., or whether the musicians represented were named Hindemith, Wienberger, Krenek or Schoenberg—except that the applause might not have been so hearty for some of these latter individuals.

Of course the amount of applause a composition receives has proved on more than one occasion to be in inverse ratio to its artistic merit. The fact that remains is that a highly sophisticated audience found itself much interested and entertained by a second program of American music.

American Soloists Presented

On this program American soloists also figured, for Ruth Posselt, violinist, played for the first time in New York the violin concerto of Mr. Hill, and Dorothy Maynor, the Negro soprano, whose remarkable voice has brought her recently into fame, sang the soprano solo in the performance of Mr. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," and a gifted Negro tenor, Leonard Franklin, took the other solo part in this work.

The concert opened with Mr. Schuman's "American Festival "Overture," heard for the first time here, and it ended with Mr. Hanson's Third symphony, also a first New York performance. With the exception of Mr. Carpenter, each composer made in turn his bow to the audience from the stage.

Mr. Schuman, a student in theoretical studies of Max Persin and Charles Haubiel of this city, and, in a more general sense of composition, of Roy Harris, was first made known by performances of his works given here under the auspices of the WPA. His first quartet and his first symphony were presented at concerts of the Composers Forum Laboratory, then financed by WPA funds.

The advantage of the opportunity thus afforded a young composer of hearing his early manuscripts was shown by the fact that soon after, on its own initiative, Mr. Schuman withdrew these two works from public performance. He composed a second quartet and a second symphony, the latter work receiving its New York première under the direction of Alexander Smallens at the WPA concert given in Carnegie Hall last May 7. At this concert, and later at the Stadium concerts in the Summer-time, also under Smallens' direction, there was heard Schuman's "Prologue" for Chorus and Orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky performed the Second ~~Symphony~~ at the Boston Symphony concerts of last Feb. 17 and 18 in Boston. The overture heard yesterday was composed specifically for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts of American music.

This overture is a lusty piece, full of vitality, and fearless. It is the poorest composed piece of yesterday's program, but far from the least in ideas and creative urge. The harmonic style may not be what the composer will show when he has become completely himself, and more skilled than he is today in the arts of instrumentation and development. But the piece is full of spirit and talent. The principal motive sufficiently intrepid and debonair for any one, is a play-call that Mr. Schuman often heard, on his New York streets. "It is yelled," he tells us in the program notes, "on the syllables, 'Wee-Awk-ee' to get the gang together."

There is a second contrasting subject and there is a sizzling fugue, developed in a way which, though highly competent, is personal and not academic. There is wit and imagination in this music.

phonic continuity, lacking the element of the spectacle, and it is a master's job.

Mr. Hanson's Third Symphony is more serious than all this, grander in proportions, and of intention more austere. For many pages, especially in the first movement, it is saturated with Sibelius, but in the third movement, however, Mr. Hanson's allegiance wavers, and he turns momentarily to Dvorak of the "New World." But when the derivative or even subconsciously imitative elements are waved away, something is there. It shows most in the slow movement, which has an astonishing, puissant melodic line and a real breadth. In this moment Mr. Hanson seems to us truest in his feeling, least influenced, most distinguished and most affecting in his expression in what he has to say.

That in many places there are mannerisms, the endless repetition of insignificant ideas, persistent pedal points, which crop up like King Charles's head in the consciousness of Mr. Dick, the clinging to fixed tonalities which is all too likely to defeat its own purpose is rather evident. But there is genuinely melodic quality and the feeling for a big form. The choral heard in the first movement is good Lutheranism, and also contrast. Unfortunately there is not enough of such salient material in the score to balance the repetitions of rhythmical figures which are only good when they arrive at something. Repetitions, sequences, are part of every composer's stock in trade. Trimming of superfluous measures, concentration of style, are probably among Mr. Hanson's needs as a creative musician. It might not hurt him to forget that he is a Nordic, so far as the deliberate cultivation of formulas to indicate that fact is concerned. He is not under this necessity, for he proves that underneath certain solecisms he has things real and important that he can say.

As for the performances of the afternoon it would be hard to praise them too highly. It is probably not exaggeration to remark that the composers represented can never hope for a better presentation of their music. Dr. Koussevitzky put every capacity of his superb orchestra at their service and would not have devoted himself more completely to their cause if each work on the program had been an immortal masterpiece.

BOSTON SUNDAY ADVERTISER

Nov. 26, 1939

98

Symphony Audiences Near and Far

By LEO GAFFNEY

ONE of the near-tragedies of the sunken Athenia at the outbreak of the present war was the case of the drizzled survivor who desperately cabled to Symphony Hall from Ireland:

"Please don't surrender tickets, my return delayed on Athenia."

The powers at Symphony Hall were not surprised. None better than they know the paramount importance of tickets in the souls of their subscribers.

And as for doing business by cable, nothing extraordinary about that. The Boston Symphony is a world institution, not merely local, and from the world at large it draws personnel and public.

There is, for example, the lady from Kent, England, who is a regular subscriber, journeying here in the fall of every year for the express purpose of attending all the concerts. And neither the war nor any other hazard is permitted to interfere.

To most people this ardor is mysterious, even queer. How anyone can spend two mortal hours in a hushed hall "just listening" to an orchestra is beyond understanding. The antique prejudice that music is only for polite ladies and moonstruck men, though considerably shaken of late, still persists.

(The absence of the Orchestra, this week on tour, provokes these armchair reflections.)

"MUSIC is what awakes WITHIN at the sound of the instruments," said Walt Whitman, which would account not only for the nature of the art, but also for the tough hides of those to whom the message of music does not penetrate.

But it is not merely a question of toughness of hide. Music can be as appealing to the truck driver as to the interior decorator, and to prove that it still hath charms to soothe the savage breast, consider the case of the two Boston police reporters who, between them, subscribe to a season seat to "soak up some symphony," as they call it, to relieve the plug-ugliness of a case-hardened profession.

There are all sorts of people clubbed together in the purchase of seats. To this extent the obliging gentlemen in the boxoffice co-operate to an astonishing extent. Should John Doe be unable to attend on his turn, tickets are easily disposed in another quarter quickly and without confusion.

Season subscriptions for the best seats run into money, naturally, but it is not expensive to join the body of subscribers in the less costly seats, where one can hear just as well. And for those unable to come on the week-end concerts, Friday afternoon and Saturday night, there is the extra series, five each, Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon.

It is possible to get in on the latter series for less than a ten-dollar bill. Season tickets make noble Christmas gifts, too, especially for the student.

IT has often been remarked that the symphony audience is chiefly elderly, that in a few years attendance will die out. Not at all! The young are more and more in evidence as time goes on, readily cultivated by the radio and the splendid Youth Concerts conducted by Wheeler Beckett.

These are a series of six concerts for high school and junior high school students. Membership is a students' club to which it is by no means difficult to belong. Concerts are given on Wednesday afternoons at 3:30. Program notes explaining the works to be played, together with their principal musical themes, are mailed in advance to the membership for purposes of study. Further information on the Youth Concerts will no doubt be gladly supplied on application to Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., Youth Concerts, Symphony Hall.

Next Symphony Program

IGOR STRAVINSKY will conduct four works of his own at the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday.

The Capriccio for piano and orchestra, which had its first American performance at the Boston Symphony concerts with Sanroma as soloist, will again be played, and again with Mr. Sanroma. Stravinsky will open the program with the music of his latest ballet, "Card Game, In Three Deals." This score, written for and first produced by the American ballet in New York, depicts three hands in a poker game, the individual cards repsented by the various dancers.

The suite from the ballet "Petrouchka" will also be played, and to end the program, the "Symphony of Psalms," which Stravinsky composed for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 50th anniversary. The Cecilia Society will combine with the orchestra in these performances.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 26 1939

99

Our Chance to Ponder the Riddle of Igor Stravinsky

Some Music Was Wildly Acclaimed; Other Works Provoked a Battle Royal

Providence Audience Curious to Hear Him Read His Own Compositions, of Which He Complains of "Interpretations"

BY JOHN TEBBEL

THEY call Igor Stravinsky the greatest enigma in contemporary music. If he is, no Sphinx ever had as many interpreters and no riddle was ever furnished with so many answers.

All the answers, unfortunately, are wrong because Stravinsky himself has never offered any clear explanation of his musical purpose and consequently there is no basis for reliable interpretation.

He came nearest to a pronouncement in his autobiography (Simon and Schuster, 1936) when he said: "For me, as a creative musician, composition is a daily function that I feel compelled to discharge. I compose because I am made for that and cannot do otherwise." But that is no more than what many anoth composer, musician or artist feels about himself.

We doubt if anyone comes out of Metropolitan Theatre Tuesday night much nearer to a solution of the puzzle, after hearing Stravinsky conduct the Boston Symphony in four of his works. Most listeners will either like or dislike the music and they will not like or dislike the same compositions, which has been the public's attitude toward Stravinsky since he began.

COMPOSER AND PUBLIC

But let the man speak for himself. Again, in his autobiography, he says:

"At the beginning of my career as a composer I was a good deal spoiled by the public. Even such things as were at first received with hostility were soon afterwards acclaimed. But I have a very distinct feeling that in the course of the last 15 years my written work has estranged me from the great mass of my listeners. They expected something different from me.

"Liking the music of L'Oiseau de Feu, Petroushka, Le Sacre and Les Noces, and being accustomed to the language of those works, they are astonished to hear me speaking in another idiom. They cannot and will not follow me in the progress of my musical thought. What moves and delights me leaves them indifferent, and what still continues to interest them holds no further attraction for me.

"For that matter, I believe that there was seldom any real communion of spirit between us. If it happened—and it still happens—that we liked the same things, I very much doubt whether it was for the same reasons. . . .

"It is very doubtful whether Rimsky-Korsakov would impressed the Russian ballet producer Diaghileff that he became friendly with the young composer and a collaboration began which marked the beginning of Stravinsky's career.

It was 1909 when Diaghileff asked for the Fire Bird ballet music. When it was first produced at the Paris Opera House in June of the following year, Stravinsky burst upon the music world as Krenek says, "with dramatic suddenness, a crudely prominent personality, sharply and vigorously outlined and vibrant with barbaric force."

BATTLE ROYAL

He followed that work with Petroushka, written as a concert piece and eventually produced by Diaghileff as a ballet, danced by Nijinsky. "At a dress rehearsal at the Chatelet," Stravinsky writes, "to which the press and the elite of the artistic world had been invited, I remember that Petroushka produced an immediate effect on everyone in the audience with the exception of a few hypercritics."

While he was finishing the Fire Bird in St. Petersburg, he had a vision: "I saw in imagination a solemn pagan rite: sage elders, seated in a circle, watched a young girl dance herself to death. They were sacrificing her to propitiate the god of spring. Such was the theme of Sacre du Printemps."

Sacre was performed for the first time at the Theatre des Champs Elysees in May, 1913, and it is history that Stravinsky barely escaped with his clothes. It was the scandal of the decade. Carl Van Vechten described it: "A certain part of the audience, thrilled by what it considered to be a blasphemous attempt to destroy music as an art, and swept away with wrath, began very soon after the rise of the curtain to whistle, to make cat-calls, and to offer audible suggestions as to how the performance should proceed. Others of us, who liked the music and felt that the principles of free speech were at stake, bellowed defiance."

At any rate, the affair was a turning point. The Fire Bird, Petroushka and Sacre du Printemps ballets are now considered the flower of his so-called "middle" period. After the Sacre, he turned to another method of composition which was essentially a return to the simplicity of earlier masters.

CLASSIC NOISE

This does not mean that his music from then on sounded like Bach. The Igor Stravinsky, a recent AP photograph will offer both the Fire Bird and Petroushka suites, his Capriccio for piano and orchestra, and Jeu de Cartes. Of the latter, not having heard it, we can say nothing except that its appearance in New York was given a mixed reception—guarded enthusiasm for the ballet itself, virtual dismissal of the music.

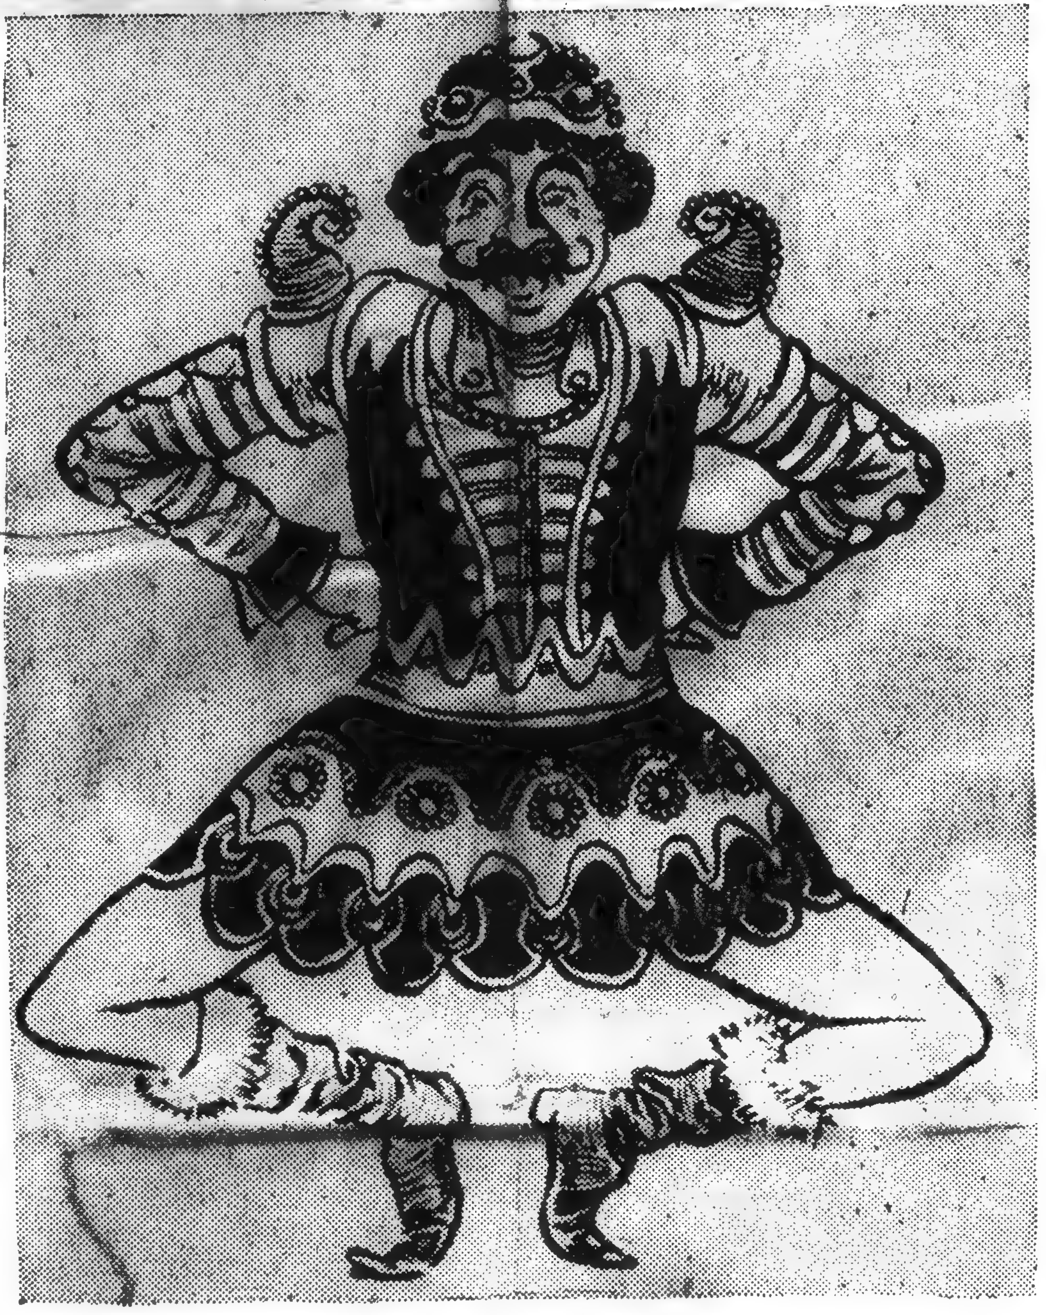
The origin of the Capriccio's composition dampens the popular illusion that music is composed as the result of a sudden, blinding inspiration.

He devoted most of 1929 to it, although it was begun the previous Christmas, and finished it at the end of September. "I played it for the first time on Dec. 6 at a Paris Symphony Orchestra concert, Ansermet conducting," he relates. "I had so often been asked in the course of the last few years to play my Concerto (this I had already done no fewer than 40 times) that I thought that it was time to give the public another work for piano and orchestra. That is why I wrote another concerto, which I called Capriccio, that name seeming to indicate best the character of the music."

COMPOSER WITH BATON

Tuesday night's audience, however, will presumably be more interested in Stravinsky as conductor rather than composer because most of the music itself is familiar.

Probably a good share of honest music lovers will come to the concert in the belief that now, with the composer himself at the helm, they will hear Stravinsky music as it should be conducted. But once again they will come upon a wide gulf, which separates Stravinsky's idea of conducting and the common conception of it.



One of the Bolibochki, member of the ogre's motley court in the "Fire-Bird" part immediately turns into interpretation, a thing I have a horror of.

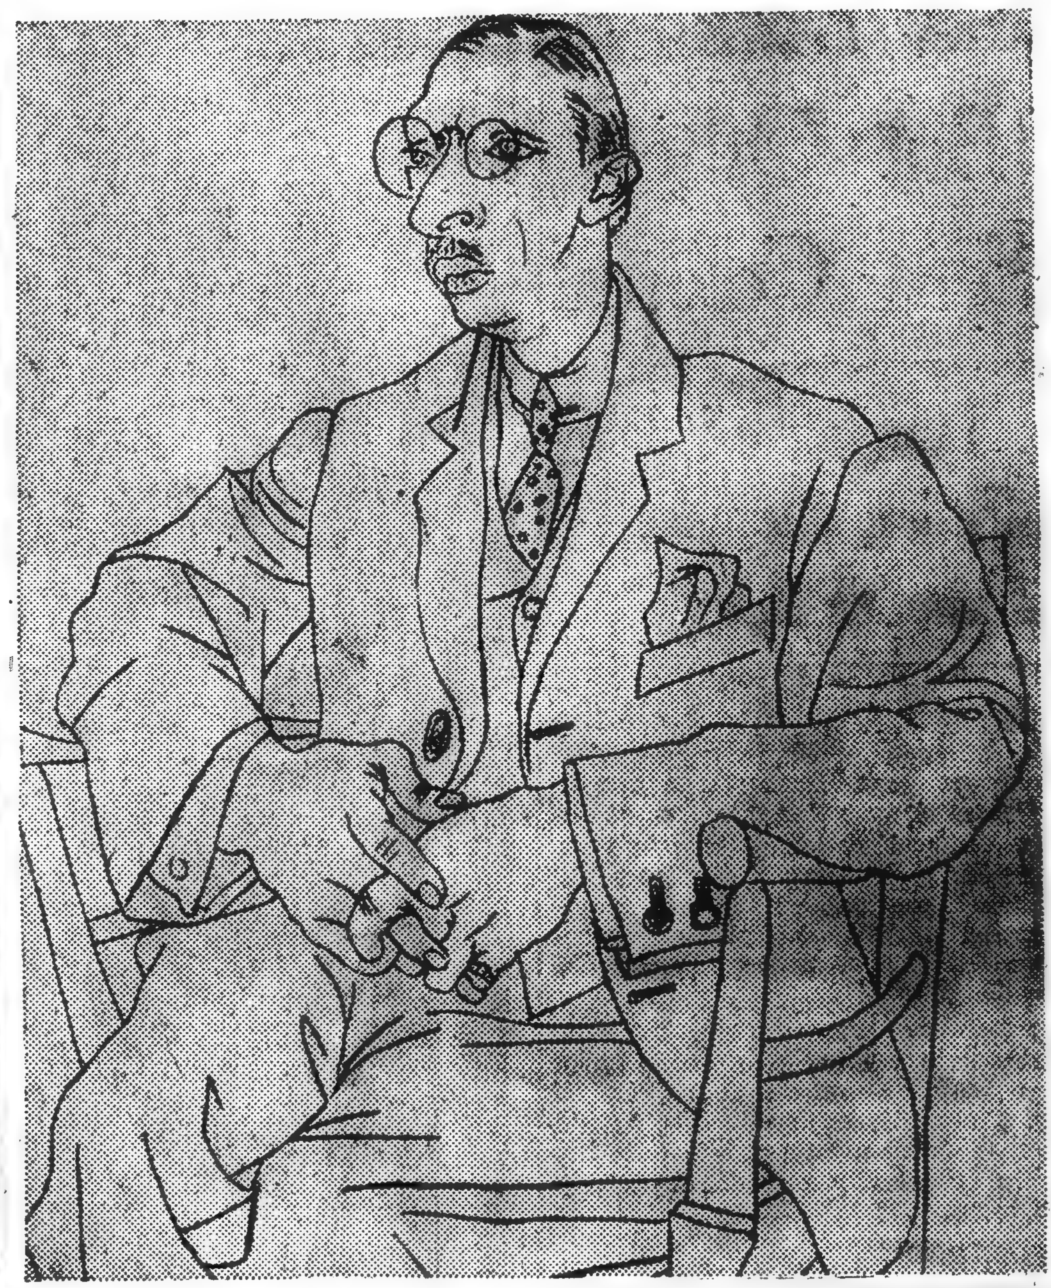
the dynamic character of his compositions, he appears positively colo



And yet this piece is virtually a prophetic cross-section of Stravinsky's work. It has savage, complicated rhythms; a section of pure, classic beauty; the French mysticism of Cocteau in a phrase for strings; a period of wild dissonance and a finale which certainly has overtones of Sibelius.

Any appraisal of Stravinsky must take into account the fact that his work is by no means finished. All that has gone before may be only a prelude to the compositions of which he is capable. His future exhibits may be viewed with the same violent dislike as his earlier work, but again it is not impossible that time will make them as acceptable as the Fire Bird is today.

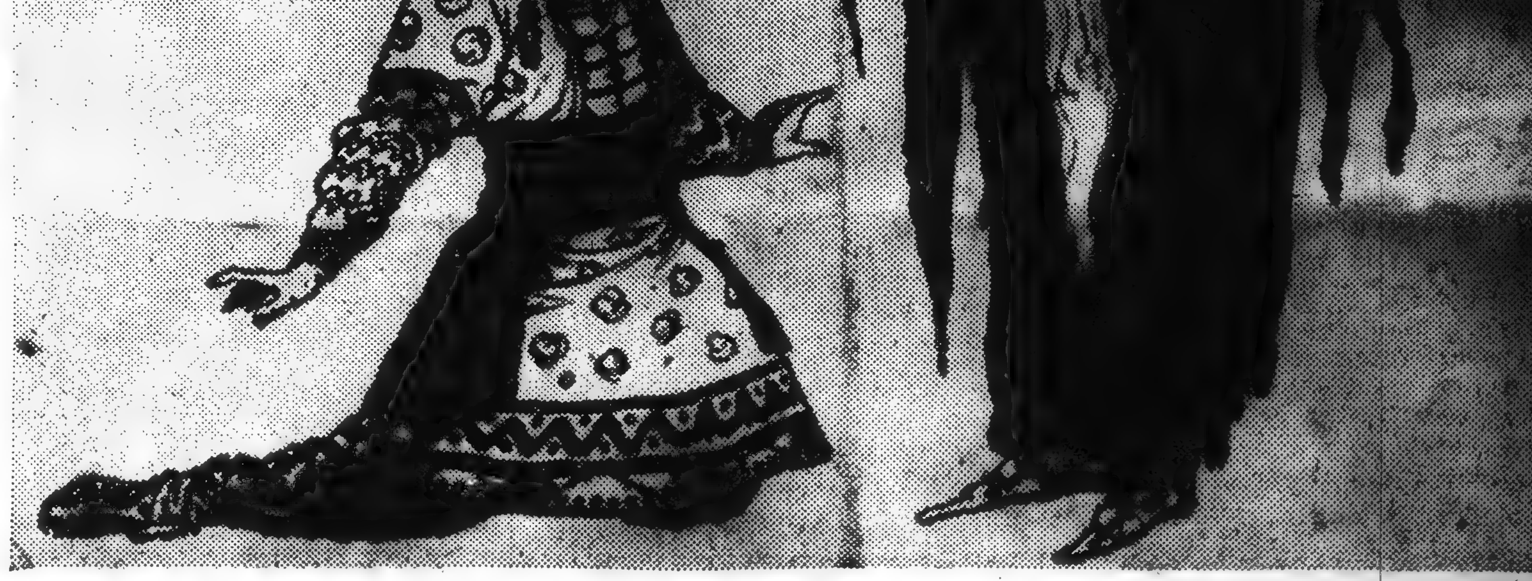
In any event, he will continue to pursue his own way. He is by all odds the most powerful single individual in music since Beethoven, a rugged trailmaker who has traveled an enigmatic but absolutely true course.

"THE TRUTH FOR TODAY"

He asserts in his autobiography: "I shall assuredly not sacrifice my predilections and my aspirations to the demands of those who, in their blindness, do not realize that they are simply asking me to go backwards. It should be obvious that what they wish for has become obsolete for me, and that I could not follow them without doing violence to myself.

"But, on the other hand, it would

Some people think that Picasso's best portraits are those he did of Stravinsky, one of which is to be seen above. Below are a few of the figures which animate the composer's "Fire-Bird" when it is performed as a ballet.



[illegible] Kastchei the ogre, hero and villain of Stravinsky's "Fire- [illegible] arrangement.

But let the man speak for himself. Again, in his autobiography, he says:

"At the beginning of my career as a composer I was a good deal spoiled by the public. Even such things as were at first received with hostility were soon afterwards acclaimed. But I have a very distinct feeling that in the course of the last 15 years my written work has estranged me from the great mass of my listeners. They expected something different from me.

"Liking the music of L'Oiseau de Feu, Petroushka, Le Sacre and Les Noces, and being accustomed to the language of those works, they are astonished to hear me speaking in another idiom. They cannot and will not follow me in the progress of my musical thought. What moves and delights me leaves them indifferent, and what still continues to interest them holds no further attraction for me.

"For that matter, I believe that there was seldom any real communion of spirit between us. If it happened—and it still happens—that we liked the same things, I very much doubt whether it was for the same reasons. . . .

"It is very doubtful whether Rimsky-Korsakov would ever have accepted Le Sacre, or even Pétroushka. Is it any wonder, then, that the hypercritics of today should be dumfounded by a language in which all the characteristics of their aesthetic seem to be violated? What, however, is less justifiable is that they nearly always blame the author for what is in fact due to their own lack of comprehension, a lack made all the more conspicuous because in their inability to state their grievance clearly they cautiously try to conceal their incompetence in the looseness and vagueness of their phraseology."

Which boils down to the plaint of genius and the struggling unknown alike: "They don't understand me." Apparently Stravinsky doesn't care whether the listener likes his music or not. He even declares that "music is, by its very nature, powerless to express anything at all . . ."

The progress of his musical thought may be perfectly clear to Stravinsky, but it is not lucid to the "hypercritics" of which he complains, to the garden variety of critic nor to the public.

So eminent an authority on the music of our times as Providence's visitor last week, Ernst Krenek, says that in his autobiography "Stravinsky speaks of many people and things but is silent about the only cardinal fact of his mysterious career: namely, how he journeyed from the Sacre du Printemps to the Jeu de Cartes." This quotation comes from "Music Here and Now," by Krenek, a book which will make its appearance tomorrow over the imprint of Norton.

ENCOURAGEMENT FROM RIMSKY

An examination of Stravinsky's life to date discloses nothing more revelatory than the sure development of genius. His artistic progress, like that if his friend, Picasso, falls roughly into periods.

Born in a small town near St. Petersburg in 1882, he was introduced to music by his father, an opera singer at the Imperial Opera House. The young Igor Fedorovitch began to study piano at nine, learned to read music readily and studied the scores in his father's library.

He was a poor student and consequently hated school. Like Schumann and Sibelius, he was consigned to the law, but that turned out to be fortunate because, at the University of St. Petersburg, he met the youngest son of Rimsky-Korsakov, the Russian master of orchestration, who could, and did, give him a start. His lessons with Rimsky went on until the teacher died, just as Stravinsky completed Feu d'Artifice in the winter of 1908.

That short orchestral fantasy so

Sacre was performed for the first time at the Theatre des Champs Elysees in May, 1913, and it is history that Stravinsky barely escaped with his clothes. It was the scandal of the decade. Carl Van Vechten described it: "A certain part of the audience, thrilled by what it considered to be a blasphemous attempt to destroy music as an art, and swept away with wrath, began very soon after the rise of the curtain to whistle, to make cat-calls, and to offer audible suggestions as to how the performance should proceed. Others of us, who liked the music and felt that the principles of free speech were at stake, bellowed defiance."

At any rate, the affair was a turning point. The Fire Bird, Petroushka and Sacre du Printemps ballets are now considered the flower of his so-called "middle" period. After the Sacre, he turned to another method of composition which was essentially a return to the simplicity of earlier masters.

CLASSIC NOISE

This does not mean that his music from then on sounded like Bach. The return was only to classic forms and a good part was simply noise to many listeners. Concert-goers could understand and love the color and surge of the Fire Bird and Petroushka, the savage interlacing rhythms of the Sacre, but they found it a bit difficult to grasp Les Noces, 1923; Oedipus Rex, 1926; Apollon Musagette, 1928; the brassy dissonances of Symphonie de Psaumes, which he wrote for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 50th anniversary in 1930; and his ballet, Jeu de Cartes, composed in 1938. He is at work now on a new symphony.

For his concert here, Stravinsky

Christmas, and finished it at the end of September. "I played it for the first time on Dec. 6 at a Paris Symphony Orchestra concert, Ansermet conducting," he relates. "I had so often been asked in the course of the last few years to play my Concerto (this I had already done no fewer than 40 times) that I thought that it was time to give the public another work for piano and orchestra. That is why I wrote another concerto, which I called Capriccio, that name seeming to indicate best the character of the music."

COMPOSER WITH BATON

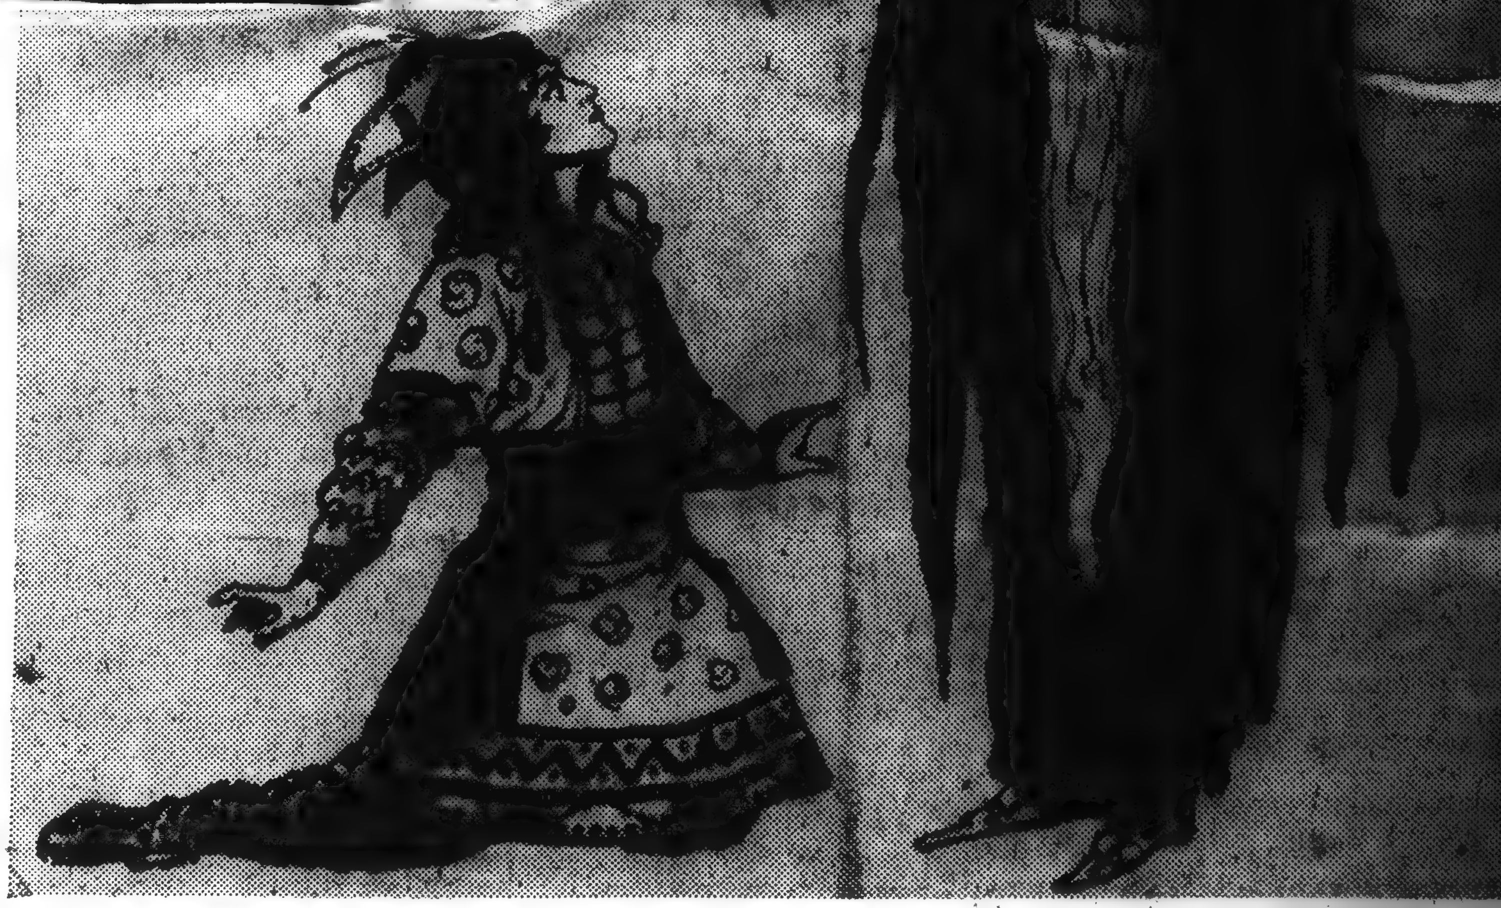
Tuesday night's audience, however, will presumably be more interested in Stravinsky as conductor rather than composer because most of the music itself is familiar.

Probably a good share of honest music lovers will come to the concert in the belief that now, with the composer himself at the helm, they will hear Stravinsky music as it should be conducted. But once again they will come upon a wide gulf, which separates Stravinsky's idea of conducting and the common conception of it.

The popular idea is that music should be interpreted. One talks of Koussevitzky's or Stokowski's or Barbirolli's "interpretations." That is because they are conductors who are part, if not all, of the show and their readings of a score tend to vary as their personalities.

Stravinsky is violent in his opposition to any kind of interpretation. Speaking in his autobiography of rehearsals conducted by Pierre Monteux, he notes that M. Monteux was "able to achieve a very clean and finished execution of my score. I ask no more of a conductor," he continues, "for any other attitude on his part immediately turns into interpretation, a thing I have a horror of. The interpreter of necessity can think of nothing but interpretation, and thus takes on the garb of a translator, tradduttore-traditore; this is an absurdity in music, and for the interpreter it is a source of vanity inevitably leading to the most ridiculous megalomania."

One of the Bolibochki, member of the ogre's motley court in the "Fire-Bird"



Prince Ivan Tsarevitch and Kastchei the ogre, hero and villain of Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird." The composer will conduct the music here Tuesday in its concert arrangement.

Arthur Lourie, in "Serge Koussevitzky and his Epoch," (Alfred A. Knopf, 1931) summarizes this aspect of Stravinsky as neatly as anyone: "The musical essence of Stravinsky's words is based on constructively objective principles of composition, and the emotional content is reduced to a minimum: consequently they lend themselves least of all to interpretation in performance. Therefore no contact has ever existed between Stravinsky and any of his interpreters.

CONDUCTOR'S DILEMMA

"Under these conditions and quite apart from the character and quality of the performance, an almost inevitable conflict arises between the conductor and the music, because the profounder and more significant the interpretation, the more prominent the conductor's individuality becomes and the more opposed to the music he is playing. A dilemma is created, which can be solved only by the entire suppression of the conductor's personality.

"In handling such music he completely effaces himself and becomes, not an interpreter, but merely an impassive impersonal executant. If this does not happen and the conductor asserts himself, he thereby attains a distorted performance of the music.

"Stravinsky has stated the problem of mutual relations between composer and conductor or performer with an acuteness and a power of revelation which have never been equalled by anyone in music. For him it consists in a rigid, logical and law-abiding compliance with the whole of his musical conception. His own conducting of his own compositions he does not regard as in the nature of a composer's diversion, but as a performance on a par with his music."

While the logic of these arguments is sound, it creates a stalemate for the critic who must review new music. If Stravinsky conducts, say, his new symphony, he so subordinates himself that the critics present (both amateur and professional) are compelled to consider the music strictly on its own merits. It might conceivably sound ordinary. But let us say that Barbirolli conducts the same score on the following week and reads it according to his ideas of what the composer was trying to say. The ideas may or may not be correct but it is possible that the music could sound magnificent.

At the least, Stravinsky on the podium is no showman. In contrast to the dynamic character of his compositions, he appears positively colorless, which is presumably the way he wishes to appear.

EYES GLUED TO THE SCORE

He is a nervous little man, partly bald, wears horn-rimmed glasses and looks to be what he is, an intellectual. His conducting is vigorous, very awkward, but absolutely thorough. Unlike the several maestros who conduct from memory, Stravinsky pays strictest attention to the score, even if it is his own.

Because he is a great composer and a superb virtuoso, he is able to extract every last detail from a score, much as a mathematician works out a problem to its logical conclusion. This has led some critics to label his conducting as cold and unemotional but that would vary, one supposes, with the listener.

A musician, or anyone familiar with a score, would find himself stirred by Stravinsky's incredibly exact reading. An average concert-goer, however, who is accustomed to watching other conductors make dramas out of the music will have to close his eyes and let the composition stir him of itself, if it can, which is just what Stravinsky wants.

Practically nothing is known of Stravinsky's personal life. Despite the pagan quality of his music, he is ardently religious and attends the Russian Orthodox Church. Friends know his as a rabid hypochondriac: he worries as much about everyone's health as his own. He supports his wife, who is his cousin, and four children—Feodor and Milena, who are artists; Sviatoslav, a pianist; and Milka, not grown up yet. They get hardly any mention in his autobiography.

Stravinsky's position in contemporary music is a debatable subject but Mr. Lourie offers a fair summary. "Stravinsky," he says, "began as a keen exponent of nationalism, got past this, and became an even more zealous apostle of 'Westernism' than were Tschaikovsky and Scriabin. It is a curious and almost paradoxical fact that Debussy was the only non-Westerner at the beginning of the twentieth century. . . ."

NO MUSICAL MURDERING

And again: "No one has occupied Debussy's place in France, and it remains vacant to this day. Temporarily—in Paris the leadership can never be permanently held by a foreigner even if it remains with him all his life—the young musicians offered it to Stravinsky, as to a Boris Godunov.

"Like Boris Godunov he accepted it reluctantly, but with this difference: that he did not murder any musical tsarevich. He repaid them with interest for the honour they did him. It may be said without exaggeration that French music is entirely indebted to him for the mastering of impressionism and the new discipline.

"I doubt if any of those musicians who have done anything useful during the last 12 years can say that they owe nothing to him or have learnt nothing from him. Such has been his role in connexion with all the new music, not merely of France, but of Europe and America.

"Subsequently his influence penetrated Soviet Russia also, but there, of course, the conditions of life today are such that people have no time to think about music. . . . Stravinsky led music out of a blind alley and provided it with new perspectives and a new discipline. The future was no longer in his power, and the development of the new music was determined by the effectiveness of the available talent and the national musical peculiarities of the various countries."

Those words were written about nine years ago. Only five years before that, Ernest Newman, music critic of the New York Post, had proclaimed: "He is a very interesting phenomenon; but I fancy that posterity will hold up its hands in amazement at the excitement he created in his own day. He is no Titan, no revolutionary; he is just a Little Master who has produced a few incomparable miniatures and a pile of rubbish."

By this time, the process of assimilation has already begun, as we have seen it operate so many times before in the history of music. Petroushka, the Fire Bird, Sacre—all of them regarded with suspicion at one time, now accepted placidly by virtually everyone. The later works still sound like sheer cacophony to many people, but there is no reason to suppose they will not be assimilated, too, in time.

NOW THAT IT'S POPULAR

As a matter of fact, the Fire Bird has become so popular with the public that it is now, oddly enough, looked upon with disdain by super-intellectuals who claim that repetition has made it almost as wearily familiar as a von Suppe overture.

be a great mistake to regard me as an adherent of Zukunftsmusik—the music of the future. Nothing could be more ridiculous. I live neither in the past nor in the future. I am in the present. I cannot know what tomorrow will bring forth. I can only know what the truth is for me today. That is what I am called upon to serve, and I serve it in all lucidity."

If no one else knows what the truth is that Stravinsky is serving, that can scarcely be his fault. It is, of course, not the truth of the early days in Russia, nor the truth of post-war days in Paris, perhaps not even the truth of day before yesterday.

But up there in quiet Cambridge, where he is lecturing in French to Harvard students from his "chair of poetry" and working on his new symphony, it may be that his labors will prove the fruition of struggle and experimentation.

He is already a master of orchestration, as was Rimsky. He has made a profound impression upon the ballet, one that is likely to last for some time to come. His influence on American music very likely will become a matter for future scholars to argue.

All that Igor Stravinsky needs to do now is to blend his aspirations and experiments, consolidate his work in the creation of one musical thought so potent that it will stand at once as permanent and enduring.

It is our sincere hope that we will know it when we hear it.

STRAVINSKY TO DIRECT SYMPHONY

Post Nov 26 '39

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

AN almost constant attendant at the Friday aftertoon Symphony Concerts this autumn has been Igor Stravinksy who, for the academic year, holds the Charles Eliot Norton professorship of "Poetry" at Harvard. Had this happened 20 years ago his fellow-listeners would have been excited or resentful, according to their nature, at the presence in the midst of a dangerous musical radical. But the world has changed since then and so has Stravinsky. In other words, the composer of "The Rite of Spring" has considerably moderated his musical ways since he exploded that tonal bombshell in 1913, and some of his subsequent works have been dismissed by the critics as wholly innocuous.

Naturally, Mr. Stravinsky could not be expected to remain for very long merely an onlooker at Symphony Hall, and this week he will make the first of his appearances this season as conductor of his own music. Two of the pieces on his programme are representative of his later, more innocent manner. They are the music for his recent ballet entitled, "Card Game, in Three Deals," not yet known to Boston, and the Capriccio for piano and orchestra. In the last-named composition, unheard here since it was first presented at Symphony Hall nine years ago,, Jesus Maria Sanroma will again be the soloist. The other numbers are the Suite from "Petrouchka," one of the few compositions by living composers to have become incorporated in the general symphonic repertory, and the "Symphony of Psalms," composed for the Boston Orchestra's 50th anniversary season. The latter, an uncompromising work, much better known here than in most musical centres, has proved to be one whose power over the listener grows with repeated hearings. In the performance of it the chorus will once more be that of the Cecilia Society, Arthur Fiedler, conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD

NOV 26 1939

101

THIS CLIPPING FROM WARREN, O.
TRIBUNE-CHRONICLE

NOV 28 1939

Critics Hail Her Voice

"Discovery of a decade" wrote one critic after New York debut of plump Dorothy Maynor (above), 28-year-old soprano and Methodist minister's daughter from Norfolk, Va. Roaring applause, calls of "Bravo!" greeted her. Milestones in her career include study at Hampton institute, appearance before Conductor Sergei Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CAMBRIDGE, MD.
BANNER

NOV 29 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

NOV 26 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JERSEY CITY, N. J.
JERSEY JOURNAL

NOV 28 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 26 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM PENSACOLA, FLA.
NEWS

DEC 14 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

NOV 27 1939

BOSTONIANS GIVE MORE NEW WORKS

Toscanini Leads Overtures by Beethoven.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

Serge Koussevitzky has conducted many memorable concerts with the Boston Symphony in New York, but it is certain that one section of the local public will remember the two of last week long after others have been forgotten. Those are the listeners devoted to the cause of American music, which had another impressive exposition on Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall where three works had their first performances in a New York concert hall. They were a violin concerto by Edward B. Hill, an overture by William Schuman, and the third symphony of Howard Hanson.

All other considerations aside, one fact emerged with undisguisable clarity. Each of the three works was the product of a definite individuality, of a composer using his musical idiom with surety, a sense of design and straightforward purpose.

In terms of accomplishing the purpose he had set himself, Hill's violin concerto was particularly successful. There was an unusual refinement of feeling in its materials, with a plenitude of virtuoso opportunity woven into the texture of the music. Hill's creative personality is something less than aggressive, but the lento of this work is a thoroughly gracious piece of writing, and the workmanship throughout is of the first order. The soloist was Ruth Posselt, who played the work with splendid artistry, a warm pulsating tone, and fine accuracy.

Works by Hanson and Schuman.

A re-hearing of the Hanson symphony (which has been played twice on the radio, the first time without a finale) confirms the impression that it is the most substantial work he has yet created. That the composer has been affected by the writings of Sibelius is too evident to require either defense or excoriation, save to say that the influence has been filtered through Hanson's own strain of feeling. There is a truly impressive line in the andante, an expansiveness of mood that is beautifully realized. Through the two allegro movements (the scherzo is perhaps its weakest section) there is a grave and sturdy energy which was made especially dynamic by the magnificent performance the work enjoyed. The composer was greeted with cheers when he appeared to bow from the stage.

In respect to originality, the Schuman "American Festival" overture was easily the most distinguished of the program. There is the same boldness of projection that one has remarked in his other works, but rather more diffusion. One could also question the formal logic of the work, which begins with a homophonic section, digresses to a fugue and then resumes its earlier course. However, another hearing might clarify its qualities. The other work of the afternoon was Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" suite with Dorothy Maynor, soprano, and Leonard Franklin, tenor, as the two excellent soloists.

Beethoven by Toscanini.

Arturo Toscanini continued his broadcasts of the Beethoven symphonies on Saturday night with a performance of the eighth symphony with the NBC orchestra (WJZ). However, for all the quality of this performance, there was more compulsion for this listener in Mr. Toscanini's conducting of the other works of this program—the seldom-heard Leonore overtures No. 1 and No. 2, as well as a group of excerpts from the "Prometheus" ballet and two movements of the F major quartet (opus 135).

Whatever may be the eventual decision of the pundits (there being a school which contends that the traditional numbering is actually correct, in distinction to the "advanced" belief that the order of composition was 2, 3 and 1) there can be little doubt that the one known as No. 2 is an authentic masterpiece. As Mr. Toscanini indicated in his intent and forceful performance, it is perhaps a lighter, more genial version of the ideas which subsequently emerged as the magnificent "Leonore No. 3." However, if that work had not come into being, this could well stand as the "great" "Leonore" overture. As on previous occasions, Mr. Toscanini s treatment of the second and third movements of the F major quartet was a richer, more eloquent expression of this music than any quartet could accomplish.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

NOV 27 1939

Koussevitzky Honored by Lotos Club

Dinner Follows Concert at Carnegie Hall

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was guest of honor at a dinner given Saturday night by the Lotos Club of New York. Dr. Koussevitzky was honored for his devotion to the cause of music and particularly his devotion to American music and development of music in America. The dinner followed the second concert of the week of American Music given at Carnegie Hall by the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky's baton.

At the dinner were not only Lotos Club members but American composers including William Schumann, Roy Harris, Edward Burlingame Hill, Aaron Copland, John Alden Carpenter, Dr. Howard Hanson, Randall Thompson, Daniel Gregory Mason.

Tribute was paid by Walter Damrosch, conductor; Eugene E. Buck, president of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers; Charles O'Connell of the RCA Victor Company and one of the assistant conductors of the Philadelphia Orchestra, and others. Telegrams came from John Barbirolli, conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra; Dr. Artur Rodzinski, conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra; Fritz Reiner, conductor of the Pittsburgh Orchestra; Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

The principal talks were given by Dr. Louis Kaufman Anspacher, dramatist and lecturer and Dr. Damrosch, the latter mentioning eloquently, the part Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra have played in development of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

At the head table with Dr. and Mrs. Koussevitzky were Dr. Damrosch, Dr. Harry Woodburn Chase, chauncellor of New York University and president of the Lotos Club; Mr. O'Connell, Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president of the Festival; George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra; George W. Edman, clerk of the Festival trustees; Mrs. Clara Clemens Gabrilowitsch, daughter of Mark Twaine; Rose Bampton, Igor Gorin, Olin Downes, James Montgomery Flagg, and Leonard Liebling who was the master of ceremonies.

Another Berkshire resident at the dinner was Dean Halvden Gregersen of Williams College.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

NOV 27 1939

American Concerts

Almost as though it were an answer to Gene Buck, who complained of the paucity of American music in the repertoire of symphony orchestras, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave two concerts in New York, last week, which were composed entirely of American works. Perhaps, more than any other first-rate conductor, Dr. Koussevitzky has championed American composers. Olin Downes, music critic of the New York Times, says that to the best of his recollection no other leading orchestra of the country has devoted two of its subscription concerts exclusively to symphonic works by native composers.

Although the championing of American music could be carried to absurdity, and indulged in sentimentally, it is encouraging that a man whose musical taste is unquestioned, as is Dr. Koussevitzky's, should consider American music deserving of a major place in his organization

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 27 1939

Dr. Koussevitzky Praises Hartford Orchestra

Francis Goodwin, president of the Hartford Symphony, stopped to pay his respects to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky after the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Tuesday night.

The great conductor said he had heard great things about the Hartford Orchestra and that Ruth Posselt, last soloist with the orchestra, had talked a great deal about it.

"The Hartford Orchestra," he said, "is one of the really important musical movements in America."

The kindly Doctor was generous in his praise of Leon Barzin. "Mr. Barzin is one of the greatest conductors, in my opinion, in America today," said Dr. Koussevitzky.

Mr. Barzin has planned an all-orchestral program for the next concert on Tuesday, Dec. 19.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

NOV 27 1939

Lest any fans in the sports world be misled by headlines, that All-American program which the Boston Symphony played a few nights ago contained no compositions by Red Grange, Jim Thorpe or Bill Osmanski.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

NOV 27 1939

WORDS AND MUSIC By Samuel Chotzinoff

Three Major Orchestras Play During Week End

Boston, Philadelphia and NBC Aggregations Heard in Two Days

Musical doings of a high order that could not be duplicated anywhere else in the world enlivened our city this past week end. On Saturday afternoon the Boston Orchestra, with Dr. Koussevitzky discoursed more American music at Carnegie Hall, and in the evening at Studio 8H, Radio City, the incomparable Mr. Toscanini and the N. B. C. orchestra completed their fifth broadcast of their current Beethoven Cycle. Last night the Philadelphia Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy conducting and Rachmaninoff as soloist, began the first of three concerts devoted to the works of Rachmaninoff. Certainly New York is the World's Fair of Music at the momnt.

As at last Thursday's Boston concert Dr. Koussevitzky's all-American program on Saturday drew a capacity house including many standees. Does this indicate a solid interest in the native output on the part of local music-lovers or is it only one of those unaccountable and temporary enthusiasms which sometimes afflicts us? Of course a pair of concerts featuring American music only and performed by a great orchestra and a celebrated conductor may be considered a stunt as well as a musical event, and a stunt is likely to draw extra-musical attention. However, time will tell. Meanwhile, none can deny that the Bostonians have done a patriotic thing.

Dr. Koussevitzky played William Schuman's "American Festival Overture" (a first New York performance, Edward B. Hill's new violin Concerto Op. [illegible] Ruth Posselt as soloist; Mr. J. A. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," with Dorothy Maynor, soprano, and Leonard Franklin, tenor, and Howard Hanson's Symphony No. 3. Mr. Carpenter's ballet seemed a bit dated. Mr. Schuman's overture, Mr. Hill's violin concerto and Mr. Hanson's symphony appeared to be well-made, in varying degrees derivative and often effective compositions.

Mr. Toscanini's broadcast brought forward Beethoven's First and Second "Leonore" overtures, the Eighth Symphony, the "Lento assai," and "vivace" movements from the last string quartet, and two excerpts from the "Prometheus" ballet. Hearing the two overtures at one sitting and judging both by one's remembrance of the Third is like getting a dramatic glimpse of Beethoven's creative method. Only a Beethoven would have been dissatisfied with the magnificent Second to the extent of writing a Third. And what a Third!

The first concert of the Rachmaninoff cycle at Carnegie Hall last night accounted for the Symphony No. 2 in E minor, the Concerto No. 1 in F sharp for piano and orchestra and the "Rhapsodie" on a Theme of Paganini. A great audience heard Mr. Rachmaninoff in beautiful renditions of his two piano works, and Mr. Ormandy in the Symphony. Many patrons of the Philadelphians will be glad to learn that Mr. Ormandy has reseated the orchestra in traditional Philadelphia fashion.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

NOV 27 1939

A Promising Debut

Pull and build-up frequently play foremost parts in the development of a professional singer. Within memory, there have been songbirds who attracted considerable public attention principally because their husbands had sufficient wealth to promote their activities successfully. There have been others who used the methods that were most in favor in the era of the Broadway ticker-tape and phone-book confetti receptions. They would dazzle for a season or two until the public discovered that their voices were less than divine and they were in need of further training. Thereupon they would return to the farm. Pictures and the radio also have helped to inflate some personalities largely for their own business purposes.

When a new singer appears upon the scene without such artful aids, it is an instance worthy of note. Such a one seems to be Dorothy Maynor who recently made her debut in New York. The critics were unanimous in their opinion that she possesses phenomenal natural talents and a fine musical intelligence, although they held that she needed further training. Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony had previously heard her and had described her as "a native Kirsten Flagstad." Until then, she had lived her 28 years in relative obscurity and had done no concert solo work. She was born in Norfolk, Va., the daughter of a Negro clergyman. It is predicted that she soon will be one of that eminent group of singers that now includes Roland Hayes, Marian Anderson and Paul Robeson and that attests to racial musical gifts. They have won their recognition against varied obstacles.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

NOV 27 1939

Boston Orchestra's New York Concerts Significant

Programs of American Music Cancelled This Fall Because Of Musicians' Union

Particularly significant was the presentation of programs of American music last weekend in New York by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Similar programs were scheduled earlier in the fall as a part of the American Festival Week sponsored by the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers but they were cancelled at the instance of the musicians' union.

Threatened To Withdraw

The union threatened to withdraw all other attractions arranged by Ascap's president, Eugene Buck and his associates if the non-union Boston orchestra appeared. The result of this was the presentation of the programs at Symphony Hall instead with Mr. Buck's blessing.

That the programs met with tremendous enthusiasm in Boston and again in New York is incidental. That they were given in New York though after the earlier difficulty with the union and given under the orchestra's auspices alone is significant. Their presentation is an indication of the importance of the Boston Orchestra, of Dr. Koussevitzky and the fact that American composers despite the many difficulties that have beset them, are a determined lot.

Discussed Unions

Only last week Dorothy Thompson and Westbrook Pegler discussed labor unions, particularly their activities in the amusement, entertainment and artistic fields. The Eagle published their discussions and also the letter of Thurman Arnold, assistant attorney-general in reply to an inquiry from the secretary of the Central Labor Union of Indianapolis. These discussions were prompted by Mr. Arnold's investigation of trade unions relative to alleged operations in "restraint of trade."

The Musicians' Union is affiliated with the stage hands and there often is the rub. Pegler in his column Saturday wrote:

Case of Willie Bioff

Willie Bioff, convicted of pandering in 1922, who became the labor dictator of the entire amusement industry, arrived at his position of power in the guise of the bodyguard for George E. Browne, also of Chicago, who is president of the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees and Motion Picture Operators of the United States and Canada.

This enormous union of the manual and mechanical crafts of the stage, the screen and the night clubs is an important unit of the American Federation of Labor. Like many strictly local Chicago unions, it is ruled by strong-arm methods enforced by racketeers who never have been identified with toil or with the labor movement in the honest sense of the term.

Browne was appointed receiver of the Motion Picture Operators' Union of Chicago, a union legitimate in form but conducted as a racket, when Tommy Maloy, the business agent was killed or "pushed" several years ago. Maloy was shot dead by persons unknown who overhauled his car with another as he was driving on a Chicago boulevard. The job had paid Maloy enormous but incalculable sums.

The union was notorious as a racket and in view of the fate that befell Maloy it was not strange that Browne felt the need of a bodyguard.

Dorothy Thompson in her Friday column discussed the attempt of the American Federation of Musicians to expel Dr. Walter Damrosch in the spring of 1938. If they had succeeded, Dr. Damrosch would have been barred from conducting every orchestra in the country except the Boston Symphony. She added:

Mr. Damrosch's crime was to have testified adversely before the United States Senate on the Pepper-Coffee bill, providing for a reorganization of the Federal Arts Projects, which would have put them into the hands of the unions. Mr. Damrosch thought this would be bad for art and said so.

So he was handed shrdlu shrdl

So he was hauled up on the carpet and threatened with expulsion.

This same musicians' union exercises a veritable terror over any organizations that are dependent on musicians.

Public "Fed Up"

Commenting on Mr. Arnold's investigation of trade unions, Miss Thompson summarizes the attitude of the public in the following.

Now, this unreasonable restraint is constantly practiced by trade unions, and this, rather than their attempts to establish decent working standards, is what is getting the American public thoroughly fed up.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 27 1939

—MUSIC OF THE DAY—

Ormandy Inaugurates Rachmaninoff Cycle

Boston Symphony's All-American List; Pusateri Plays in Young Artist Series.

By MILES KASTENDIECK

This is a season of unusual happenings. One of the most outstanding is the Rachmaninoff Cycle being given by the Philadelphia Orchestra with Eugene Ormandy conducting and Rachmaninoff himself playing. Three concerts will be devoted to the works of the foremost pianist-composer of our day. Since the opening concert of the cycle in Carnegie Hall last night coincided with the 30th anniversary of Rachmaninoff's debut as conductor with the Philadelphia Orchestra, the event may be regarded as a testimonial. Those who knew of this significance rose when the celebrated musician entered the hall for the second half of the evening's program and the capacity audience followed suit in this tribute. Incidentally, the cycle might well observe the 40th anniversary of the founding of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Newly arrived in America, Rachmaninoff conducted the orchestra on Friday, Nov. 26, 1909, at the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, in a program which listed his Second Symphony, the one with which the concert opened last night. Since that time he has been associated with the orchestra on numerous occasions both as composer and as pianist. Among the premieres of his works given by the Philadelphians have been the Choral Symphony, "The Bells" (1920), the Fourth Concerto (1927), the Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini (1934) and the Third Symphony (1936). Thus the cycle had aroused special attention even before the opening program.

In the light of all these associations, an evening given over to the works of one composer has an interest that transcends the sameness which may, and did, result from such intensified concentration. Within this limitation, however, there existed such an essentially rich musical feeling and a display of resourcefulness, to say nothing of creative ability and pianistic achievement, that it was a remarkable experience.

While the orchestrations of Rachmaninoff are of an age that is passing (the strings are the bulwark of this style), thre is an individuality in his use of material that stamps his compositions as distinctive. The long melodic line, the dark-hued tonal effects alternating with brilliant flashes of musical thought, the continuous patter of innumerable notes—these are the familiar characteristics of his music. It has an enduring quality of musicality even when the listener has decided that the composer is overgenerous.

The program last night, besides the Symphony in E Minor, listed the Concerto No. 1 in F Sharp Minor and the Rhapsody on the Paganini Theme. With the Philadelphia strings in their usual form, the symphony sounded particularly well. It is an interesting commentary that the Ormandy arrangement of the orchestra (more or less traditional) led one to speculate on the possibility that the Stokowski arrangement (introduced last Tuesday) might not have brought about better balance since the strings are so prominent in these orchestrations.

The First Concerto, which Rachmaninoff played here last year, again left the impression of a brilliant, virtuoso work which young pianists might consider for their repertoire. But it was the Rhapsody that was the "novelty" of the evening. What a lusty old theme Paganini created that it should have so inspired Paganini himself, Brahms and Rachmaninoff to write variations that are thoroughly engrossing. Rachmaninoff's work is ingenious and rightfully takes its place among the very few symphonic variations in the concerto style.

There was much of dazzling brilliance in this program and this performance, for the rapport between Ormandy and Rachmaninoff and between them and the orchestra led to a series of superb performances.

* * *

ALL-AMERICAN LIST

In a series of performances of superabundant skill and polish, culminating in a magnificent interpretation of Howard Hanson's Third Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra completed their "festival" of American music in Carnegie Hall on Saturday. It was an afternoon of achievement for both composers and performers.

The works on this All-American program were all composed within the last 13 years. Most recent of them was William Schuman's American Festival Overture composed last Summer and given its first New York performance at this time. It is lively music not too well-knit together and inclined on the raucous side, but then the composer says that the first three notes "will be recognized by some listeners as the 'call to play' of boyhood days . . . yelled on the syllables 'Wee-Awk-Eee' to get the gang together for a game or festive occasion of some sort." Even though the implication does not make the work program music, the boys must have had a spirited, noisy and sometimes rough time of it. The music has its American implications, all right.

Edward Burlingame Hill's Violin Concerto (1933) and John Alden Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" (1926), both of which had been heard in Brooklyn the previous evening, completed the first half of the program. Ruth Posselt, violinist, was again the soloist and Dorothy Maynor and Leonard Franklin assisted in the Carpenter work. Marked for a "first performance in New York," the Hill work actually had its first performance in Brooklyn on Friday night, but perhaps up in Boston they may still think of Brooklyn as another city. On second hearing, the concerto left the same impression of expert craftsmanship without much spontaneity. "Skyscrapers" was especially well received.

But Hanson's new symphony was the high point of the afternoon and the festival, too. There will be other opportunity to discuss the merits of this work. Suffice to point out that it had a sense of power, a breadth of vision, and an expression of intensity to place it in the forefront of American music composed on a large scale, and orchestrated with full comprehension of the potentialities of the modern orchestra. The performance of it in all its glory of sonority was stupendous.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL 102

NOV 27 1939

MUSIC

Stravinsky to Conduct Boston Symphony Tomorrow Night

Igor Stravinsky, great but dwindling figure in modern music, will appear before the Rhode Island public tomorrow night in Metropolitan Theatre, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program will be all-Stravinsky. First comes "L'Oiseau de Feu," which, on June 25, 1910, notified the world—or, at any rate, Paris—that a new star was rising. The music to be played tomorrow is a suite from the ballet, which deals with adventures of one Ivan Tsarevich, a folk-hero of Russia. He captures the fire-bird and then lets it go, after receiving a glowing feather as a gift. This feather, and later the fire-bird, protect him from the charms of the magician Kastchei, whom Ivan causes to die and whose captives he liberates.

Another favorite Stravinsky work, the suite from "Petrouchka," is on the program. This ballet is concerned with three puppets used by a magician in an entertainment at a fair. The music is rhythmically exciting, harmonically strange and arresting, wonderfully descriptive.

In the third work, the capriccio for piano and orchestra, Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist of the orchestra will be soloist. Of this music, Stravinsky has written: "I had in mind the definition of a capriccio given by Praetorius, the celebrated musical authority of the 18th century. He regarded it as a synonym of the fantasia, which was a free form made up of fugato instrumental passages. This form enabled me to develop my music by the juxtaposition of episodes of various kinds which follow one another and by their very nature give the piece that aspect of caprice from which it takes its name." It is in three movements, played uninterruptedly.

Stravinsky will end the program with a suite from his "Jeu de Cartes," written for the American Ballet and first performed in 1937 in the Metropolitan Opera House. Lincoln Kirstein, as quoted by Larence Gilman from "Modern Music," says: "Three deals of straight poker are demonstrated, played literally according to Hoyle. Sudden apparitions of the Joker, to whom these rules do not apply, destroy the logical suits of the three hands. At the end of each deal, giant fingers of otherwise invisible croupiers remove the re-rejected cards.

"The musical opening of each deal is a short processional (march, polonaise, or valse) which introduces the shuffling of the pack. For the card-play—deals, passes, bets—there are group dances, solo variations, and finales, according to the familiar uses of classic ballet."

G. Y. L.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

NOV 27 1939

MODERN MUSIC

The Schuman Overture Is Dubbed An "Experimentation"

To the Editor of The Courant:—

What are we to expect from our moderns? Last Tuesday evening, we heard Dr. Koussevitzky and his men in something which William Schuman called an "American Festival Overture." Honestly, for a bit of relief, when I got home, I listened to some swing-band, and that, to my way of hearing, was much more musical than the Overture.

I think many of us had hoped that the age of experimenting was over, but composers are still trying stunts. Had Randall Thompson's E-Minor symphony been of the same order, I think many of the listeners might have been tempted to walk out, but in truth, it was one of the most interesting American symphonies I have yet heard. Forceful in the first movement, vigorous and healthy, languidly beautiful, even in the jazz-idiom in the second movement, with some resemblance to Mr. Gershwin's "American In Paris" and "Porgy and Bess," and yet individual. It had a most interesting Scherzo and a fine grand finale, which Dr. Koussevitzky failed to give the finish it deserved.

As for the Cesar Franck symphony, it is easy to see that Dr. Koussevitzky wasn't "tuned in" to Franck's wave-length, so to speak. It sounded as though he wished to finish the work as soon as he could. At any rate, for the most part, the reading was one of the most uninspired hearings I have yet heard of this all-too-popular and yet ever-noble work.

I talked with some of the boys after the concert and was told that Koussevitzky was giving some of these American works a "try-out." Go to it. Hartford folk haven't yet walked out on you, but we do know what is, and what is not real music. So, be cautious. We do prefer the best, even though we tolerate, and even applaud, that which sounds as though the demons from the inferno were running riot.

JOHN J. DUFFY.

Hartford.

10

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

NOV 27 1939

Toscanini Continues Beethoven Cycle

By PITTS SANBORN.

Arturo Toscanini directed last Saturday night the final program but one of his Beethoven series with the NBC Symphony Orchestra. The concluding concert will be broadcast not from Radio City but from Carnegie Hall.

On Saturday Carnegie Hall was the scene of the first local matinee this autumn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra; yesterday afternoon of a recital by the Canadian violinist Arthur LeBlanc; last evening of the opening concert in the Rachmaninoff cycle of three by the Philadelphia Orchestra and Serge Rachmaninoff.

The town Hall during the week end offered late on Saturday afternoon a characteristic theremin recital by the gracious and gifted Lucie Bigelow Rosen, and in the evening Saturday a recital by the capable French piano team of Violette and Helene Coffer-Chantal. Yesterday, beginning at 3 p. m., this hall presented serially Emile Baume, pianist; the New Friends of Music and Roland Hayes, tenor.

* * *

Mr. Toscanini's program was distinctly and delightfully out of the ordinary. It included two lovely excerpts from the ballet The Creatures of Prometheus, two movements from the last string quartet (op. 135) and the first and the second Leonore overtures, besides the Eighth Symphony, of which Mr. Toscanini's reading is justly celebrated.

The orchestral execution, heard over the air, seemed in every instance to be quite of the first order, and there was special interest in hearing the profoundly felt and exquisitely expressed interpretation of the slow movement of the quartet and the superbly dramatic performance of the second Leonore overture, which as a dramatic tone poem, though not in some other respects, is superior to the third Leonore, with its undramatic adherence to the sonata form. Memorable was Mr. Toscanini's emphasis of the telling pauses in this score.

Mr. LeBlanc again proved himself a fine and sensitive artist. His program opened with a sonata in G minor by Tartini, proceeded to a prelude in E major for violin alone by Bach, continued with the G major sonata of Brahms and A major sonata of Gabriel Faure and concluded with a miscellaneous group of shorter pieces.

It was a list calculated to test a violinist's command of both technic and style. Although the general word for Mr. LeBlanc's performance must be praise, one may select for special mention the poetic feeling and elevation of style that distinguished his reading of Brahms and praise him further for the sympathetic attention he continues to bestow upon Faure, a composer too commonly neglected in New York.

* * *

American Music.

The American composer was given a further hearing by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and a large audience sat in on the demonstration with obvious pleasure. Serge Koussevitzky's program offered first local performances of William Schuman's American Festival Overture, Edward Burlingame Hill's Violin Concerto, op. 38, with Ruth Posselt as the soloist, and Howard Hanson's Third Symphony, besides the John Alden Carpenter Skyscrapers of Metropolitan Ballet memory.

The Schuman Overture is in need of polishing in the scoring, particularly in the first section where several badly distributed chords impede the flow of the music. Nor is the Fugue it boasts especially distinguished for the transparency of the lines. The piece does have a kind of ruthless energy, though, but one could find little of festive spirit in it.

The Hill Concerto, creditably played by Miss Posselt, shows much planning and technical knowledge. Besides an appealing slow movement the work communicates little, however.

Craftsmanship is evident in the Hanson composition, too, but here loudness rules the roost. There are forcefulness and a driving insistency in its favor, and a kind of impassioned speech in the second movement, Andante tranquillo—tranquil passion, in other words.

To one pair of ears Skyscrapers was the program's most rewarding feature. Order is its watchword, in spite of the apparent confusion of its crashing utterances. As writing it represents a thoroughly professional job. Dorothy Maynor, Negro soprano, sang the "bluesy" lines alloted to her excellently. Leonard Franklin, Negro tenor, was the other singer.

The Boston Symphony outdid itself in performing all the items.

* * * R. C. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TAMPA, FLA.
TRIBUNE

NOV 28 1939

The Gulf Gleam

We still hope sometime to persuade Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, to come to Florida and take a fishing trip on the Chassahowitzka River. Koussevitzky could catch fish in the Chassahowitzka, and besides it would be good publicity for Florida, the Chassahowitzka and Koussevitzky. Maybe Mr. Koussevitzky could bring along Andre Kostelanetz. If Mr. Kostelanetz and Mr. Koussevitzky got tired of the Chassahowitzka, Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Kostelanetz could try fishing in Lake Istdpogayoxee instead.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

NOV 28 1939

Serge Koussewitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was honered Saturday night by the Lotos Club of New York for his aid to American composers.

Among those who praised Mr. Koussevitzky at the dinner in the clubhouse, at 110 West Fifty-seventh Street, were Dr. Walter Damrosch, Dr. Henry Woodburn Chase and Gene Buck, the president of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers.

Mr. Buck, who recently denounced several famous conductors for their neglect of American music, eulogized Mr. Koussevitzky for maintaining "an open door through which American composers can enter and be assured a fair and understanding hearing."

Dr. Damrosch praised the modern American composers for their mastery of technique and termed Mr. Koussevitzky "the leader in encouraging our young Americans."

Mr. Koussevitzky, in his response, criticized those who deride American composers by saying they are not of the caliber of Brahms and Beethoven .

"Our American composers don't have to be Brahms or Beethoven," he said. "What we need is composers who can give us the youth and the energy of our life. And these things our modern American composers can give us."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

NOV 29 1939

Stravinsky Leads Boston Symphony

Presents Program of His Own Works at Metropolitan, Providence

The opportunity of hearing an all-Stravinsky program with the composer conducting brought an almost capacity attendance to the ample Metropolitan Theater, Providence, last evening. From comments of the outgoing throng, it was gathered that the thing to do having been done, reactions were not appreciative after all of this first performance for New England of "Jeu de Cartes," being the music for a ballet on the theme of three poker deals.

The orchestration is light, making a novelty in symphonic material that we found entirely intriguing. Also, the conductor worked his will in dynamic control. Composed on commission for the American Ballet which danced the work April 27, 1937 in New York, it holds no hint of Russian themes as in the "Petrouchka" and "Fire Bird" ballet suites of the second part of the program.

Stravinsky, an experienced writer for ballet, is said to have had much influence in the choreography and costuming of "Jeu de Cartes." The day may soon come when Symphony audiences will see coincidentally a screen picture of the ballet in action. Then the shuffle, deal, consideration, draw, bid, and bluff tactics would vivify the music; more clearly reveal its aptitude. G. E. Judd, Boston Symphony manager, who sat near, replied to this sense of lack that once he felt in the same way with the other two ballets in the symphony repertoire, but now he accepts them as pure music.

Taken then as music only for the ear, "Jeu de Cartes" appeals by its originality in use of pleasant melodic sections and for its satisfying integration. Thin it is not ever for a moment; the like may be enthusiastically said of the Capriccio for Orchestra and Piano Solo so charmingly, ably and elfishly featured by Jesus Maria Sanroma, whom the New York Herald-Tribune dubbed recently: "Boston's musical ward"—a phrase that the brilliant young pianist's many friendly admirers will see is not forgotten.

A pleasant surprise, these adjacent near-delicacies on a full orchestra foundation. One could not but liken their savory, admirably adjusted, subtle tangs to an inspired salad tossed together by the masterful, experienced mind of the taut little man on the podium. No heavy food this, but incomparably appetizing.

Unusual use of the flute marked both works, nor was ever this instrument put forward in a strictly solo capacity. It was leader with its fellows of the woodwinds in the engaging qualities of both pieces: arpeggios from the piano as light as a gay flitting of imagination, piano and flute in imitation, and once toward the end of the Capriccio, a strange sensation that Stravinsky had taken the whole body of responsive players upon a lift of his baton; given them a levitation impulse that was something of magic.

Let the people who do not accept new ideas easily go home comfortable in the homely Russian folk themes of "Petrouchka," joy in the perfections of the "Fire Bird" performance—its exciting Infernal Dance and the warmly lovely Berceuse—an exceptionally felicitous presentation.

A. C. R.

THIS CLIPPING FROM OMAHA, NEB.
WORLD-HERALD

NOV 28 1939

A Star Appears

Dorothy Maynor, 28-year-old Negro soprano, was "discovered" only last summer by Sergei Koussevitzky. Yet today, after only one concert performance before critics, she is being acclaimed as an artist ready to take her place beside those other distinguished Negro singers, Contralto Marian Anderson, Baritone Paul Robeson and Tenor Roland Hayes.

Her quick rise from obscurity to the concert stage is a tribute, not only to Miss Maynor, but to the country in which she lives and the race to which she belongs—a race which, despite its troubles and its submergence, has kept a dance in its step and a song in its heart.

Royal flushes in three suits showed up in a Texas poker game. We won't say it was prearranged, although it looks a little like the rassling technique.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

NOV 28 1939

Boston Orchestra Plays In Providence Tonight

Igor Stravinsky, famous Russian composer, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of his own works in the Metropolitan Theater, Providence, this evening. It will be the second for the season in the Boston orchestra's visits.

Music for three ballets: "The Firebird," "Petrushka" and "Jeu de Cartes," having its first New England hearing, are on the program. Besides the interest of Stravinsky's appearance, there will be the pleasure of hearing Jesus Maria Sanroma, Porto Rican pianist, as soloist in the Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra. This gifted and popular Boston musician was soloist when Dr. Koussevitzky gave the Capriccio its first American performance.

"Jeu de Cartes," describing in music three deals in a poker game, is Stravinsky's latest ballet. It was composed for and was first performed by the American Ballet in New York. The scene is the green table in a gaming house. Each deal is introduced by ceremonial music as the cards are shuffled and dealt. As the ballet was presented the play is followed minutely, the joker possessing the power of any card and usually controlling the outcome. After each showdown a giant hand emerged from the wings and moved the cards.

A. C. R.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 29 1939

MUSIC

And Musicians

Igor Stravinsky will conduct a program made up exclusively of his own compositions for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, Boston, this week.

Jesus Maria Sanroma will be piano soloist in the Capriccio for orchestra with piano solo, and the Cecilia Society Chorus conducted by Arthur Fiedler will take part in the "Symphonie de Psaumes" for orchestra and chorus.

Also programmed will be the first performance at these concerts of the noted composer's "Jeu de Cartes" and his Suite from the ballet "Petroushka."

* * *

The Pianoforte Club will give its next recital at the studio of R. Augustus Lawson in the Brown-Thomson Building Friday, Dec. 8, at 8:15 p. m. Composers included on the program will be Brahms, Bach, Chopin, Schumann, Sgambati, Grieg, Scott, d'Albert, Albeniz, Faure and Toch.

New officers of the club are Miss Natalie Katz, president; Albert DeVito, vicepresident; Miss Norma Schwartz, secretary, and Miss Frances Schwartz, treasurer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat-Chronicle

NOV 29 1939

New Honor for Dr. Hanson

One more artistic height was scaled by Dr. Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music, when his Third Symphony was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the all-American program conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky last Saturday in Carnegie Hall, New York.

Just as the performance of Dr. Hanson's grand opera, "Merry Mount," by the Metropolitan Opera Company a number of years ago, was the crowning honor in this field, so the recognition extended by Dr. Koussevitzky and his premier band is about the highest mark to shoot at in the symphonic field.

Dr. Hanson's Third Symphony continues the creative power that caught the interest of the musical world more than fifteen years ago in the "Nordic" Symphony and that blossomed later in the "Romantic" Symphony. Critical estimate of his third work in this form leaves no room for doubt as to his place among the important influences in American music. Suggestions of Sibelius and Dvorak, noted by some of the critics in his new symphony, contrast with striking passages in which the composer speaks clearly in his own voice, presenting a clear, intelligible musical expression entirely his own.

Dr. Hanson's successes and growing fame are gratifying to all in Rochester who appreciate the difficulties in this field of artistic endeavor. He has brought distinction to the Eastman School and the city. Those who have watched the progress of his work have no hesitation in predicting an assured place for him in the nation's musical archives.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

NOV 29 1939

Committee Meets To Discuss Festival Plans

Ernest B. Dane, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and George E. Judd, manager, were in Pittsfield today to meet with a committee from the Berkshire Symphonic Festival to discuss plans for next summer's concerts.

At the meeting with Mr. Dane and Mr. Judd were Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith of Stockbridge, Festival president; Mrs. Bruce Crane, Laurence R. Connor and George W. Edman of the Festival board of trustees. The meeting followed luncheon at the Wendell Hotel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 29 1939

MUSIC

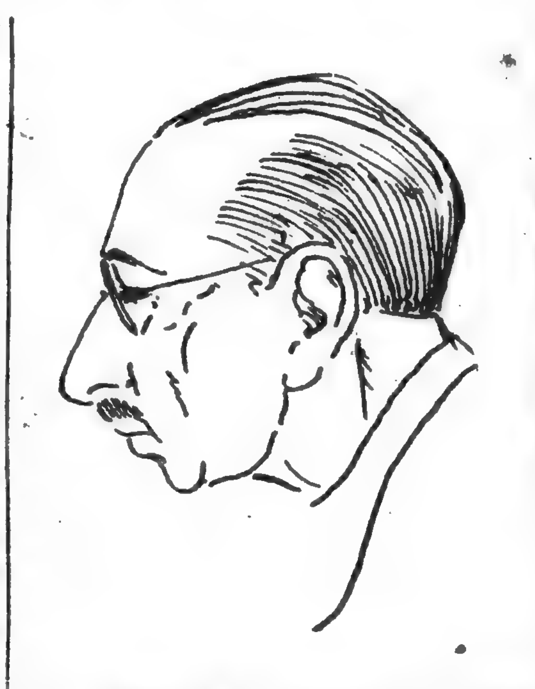
STRAVINSKY BOSTON SYMPHONY GUEST

Gives Reading of Own Works; Evening Is Treasurable

By G. Y. Loveridge

It is time, we think, that the world ceased to be amazed because its great men do not look like Greek statuary, professional weight-lifters, or lunatics. Lincoln was drawn and photographed not for his profile but for what he was. Napoleon could not have made three yards through the Notre Dame line. Many other important people appear quite ordinary and sensible.

So, when the door onto the stage of Metropolitan Theatre opened last night and there walked forth a slight, somewhat stooped, bespectacled man with his scalp showing at the back, no one had any real reason to exclaim: "Can this be the man whose music caused a riot in Paris, who, by his artistic daring and surging vitality, has lifted himself among the renowned members of the race?" It is just such men who do such things.



Pen Drawing of Stravinsky Made From Life by Martha Burnham a Few Hours Before Last Night's Concert.

Here, then, was Igor Stravinsky, surrounded by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and ready to give a reading of his own works. A seemly, but not overwhelming, applause welcomed him to the podium. He went to work without delay upon a program that moved, in general, chronologically backward, musically forward.

As a conductor, Mr. Stravinsky does not, of course, approach Dr. Serge Koussevitzky; but then, as a composer, Dr. Koussevitzky does not approach Mr. Stravinsky. If the orchestra did not have its customary colors and emphasis and single purpose, if it lacked the decisive control and authority of its familiar leader, it nevertheless did well for the guest, and the occasion itself was sufficiently unusual to command sustained attention.

Mr. Stravinsky conducts with energy and precision, if not with finish. Sometimes he waves the baton gently with a motion of the wrist, sometimes sweeps the disturbed air with both arms, again bobs his head, or throws his whole body into a demand for more power as he leads the way through the complicated rhythms and strange harmonies in which he has expressed and established himself as an individual, a man apart. He enjoys applause, and is not too dignified to show it, nor too selfish to share it.

He began with the music for the ballet "Jeu De Cartes," first performed on April 27, 1937, in the Metropolitan Opera House. It is occasionally pretty and occasionally jazzy, it has a surface appeal, but there is nothing about it, we thought, that would make one wish particularly to hear it again. Of course, it is not wholly fair to judge such a work on a single hearing and without sight of the action it is intended to accompany but that is probably the way most people will have to judge it.

The capriccio for orchestra with piano solo (finished in 1929) is far more interesting. Jesus Maria Sanroma, the soloist, executed his share of the score with splendid fire and virtuosity, displaying a variety of touch and a potent pulse of rhythm such as few pianists can hope to equal. It is Mr. Sanroma's kind of music, and he was at his brilliant best. After the performance, Mr. Stravinsky retired to the wings and sent Mr. Sanroma out alone for several rounds of applause.

The suite from "Petrouchka" was heard next. This was the best thing on the program, we thought, although Mr. Stravinsky was not able to make it sound as thrilling as is possible. There was not the atmosphere of revelry and witchery about it that there ought to be. Magnificent music. As he conducted this masterpiece of his 29th year, we wondered what he was thinking.

The still earlier music of "The Fire-Bird" ended the concert. Here, too, one might have asked a more colorful and luminous tone, a more subtle weaving of the spell; but, after all, one had seen the master, the very head in which these splendid fancies were envisioned, the very hands that had felt out the harmonies on the piano and set them down on paper. Such an evening cannot but be treasureable.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER

NOV 29 1939

The two programs of American music played by the Boston Symphony orchestra in New York last week were well received. And the critics praised Dr. Koussevitzky for his efforts to encourage American creative talent in composition. As a matter of fact, no conductor of a great symphonic orchestra in this country has done more toward that end. The programs were the same as those presented in two concerts in Boston free to the public before the opening of the regular season. But in New York they were part of the regular subscription season. And as far as is known, no other orchestra has devoted such concerts entirely to the performance of American music. While it would not be wise to stress native talent too frequently in such a manner, a pair of such programs annually might well be featured in the schedules of our leading orchestras. Dr. Koussevitzky has pointed the way.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 29 1939

Dr. and Mrs. Francis P. Morin of Melrose street had as their overnight guests Mr. Jesus Maria Sanroma and Mrs. Sanroma and their daughter, Marisol Sanroma, of Boston.

Mr. Sanroma is pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and was soloist at last evening's concert at the Metropolitan Theatre.

Dr. and Mrs. Morin had as their concert guest, Marilyn Keach.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 29 1939

Music

By G. Y. Loveridge

It is time, we think, that the world ceased to be amazed because its great men do not look like Greek statuary, professional weight-lifters, or lunatics. Lincoln was drawn and photographed not for his profile but for what he was. Napoleon could not have made three yards through the Notre Dame line. Many other important people appear quite ordinary and sensible.

So, when the door onto the stage of Metropolitan Theatre opened last night and there walked forth a slight, somewhat stooped, bespectacled man with his scalp showing at the back, no one had any real reason to exclaim: "Can this be the man whose music caused a riot in Paris, who, by his artistic daring and surging vitality, has lifted himself among the renowned members of the race?" It is just such men who do such things.

Here, then, was Igor Stravinsky, surrounded by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and ready to give a reading of his own works. A seemly, but not overwhelming, applause welcomed him to the podium. He went to work without delay upon a program that moved, in general, chronologically backward, musically forward.

As a conductor, Mr. Stravinsky does not, of course, approach Dr. Serge Koussevitzky; but then, as a composer, Dr. Koussevitzky does not approach Mr. Stravinsky. If the orchestra did not have its customary colors and emphasis and single purpose, if it lacked the decisive control and authority of its familiar leader, it nevertheless did well for the guest, and the occasion itself was sufficiently unusual to command sustained attention.

Mr. Stravinsky conducts with energy and precision, if not with finish. Sometimes he waves the baton gently with a motion of the wrist, sometimes sweeps the disturbed air with both arms, again bobs his head, or throws his whole body into a demand for more power as he leads the way through the complicated rhythms and strange harmonies in which he has expressed and established himself as an individual, a man apart. He enjoys applause, and is not too dignified to show it, nor too selfish to share it.

He began with the music for the ballet "Jeu De Cartes," first performed on April 27, 1937, in the Metropolitan Opera House. It is occasionally pretty and occasionally jazzy, it has a surface appeal, but there is nothing about it, we thought, that would make one wish particularly to hear it again. Of course, it is not wholly fair to judge such a work on a single hearing and without sight of the action it is intended to accompany but that is probably the way most people will have to judge it.

The capriccio for orchestra with piano solo (finished in 1929) is far more interesting. Jesus Maria Sanroma, the soloist, executed his share of the score with splendid fire and virtuosity, displaying a variety of touch and a potent pulse of rhythm such as few pianists can hope to equal. It is Mr. Sanroma's kind of music, and he was at his brilliant best. After the performance, Mr. Stravinsky retired to the wings and sent Mr. Sanroma out alone for several rounds of applause.

The suite from "Petrouchka" was heard next. This was the best thing on the program, we thought, although Mr. Stravinsky was not able to make it sound as thrilling as is possible. There was not the atmosphere of revelry and witchery about it that there ought to be. Magnificent music. As he conducted this masterpiece of his 29th year, we wondered what he was thinking.

The still earlier music of "The Fire-Bird" ended the concert. Here, too, one might have asked a more colorful and luminous tone, a more subtle weaving of the spell; but, after all, one had seen the master, the very head in which these splendid fancies were envisioned, the very hands that had felt out the harmonies on the piano and set them down on paper. Such an evening cannot but be treasurable.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

NOV 30 1939

School to Present Modern Dancers

Erika Thimey, director of the modern dance department at the King-Smith Studio School, and Hans Weiner, internationally known dancer of Boston, will be presented Sunday night at the Wardman Park Theater in a joint recital. The concert is being sponsored by the school.

Miss Thimey was head of the modern dance department of the North Shore Conservatory in Chicago for six years. During this time she became well known, both as a soloist and as the producer and director of the motion choir in the production of Handel's "Theodora" at the Field Museum, the "Buckingham Fountain Dance Spectacle" in Grant Park and mass dances at Soldiers' Field and Chicago Stadium.

In 1938 Miss Thimey met Hans Weiner and became his partner. Mr. Weiner has appeared for the last eight years with his dance group at the pop concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

NOV 30 1939

His Place Secure

When Howard Hanson's "Merry Mount" was produced by the Metropolitan Opera Company his achievement was widely acclaimed by daily newspapers as well as music journals. The book, picturesque and widely different from the typical grand opera story, coupled with the originality of the music itself, offered opportunities for feature treatment of which writers readily availed themselves.

No less noteworthy, but lacking something in the popular journalistic appeal of the opera premiere, was presentation the other night of Dr. Hanson's Third Symphony in an all-American program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the distinguished Dr. Koussevitzky conducting.

Not new to the field of the symphony is the director of the Eastman School of Music. It was fully 15 years ago that his Nordic Symphony first was played, to be followed a few years later by his Romantic Symphony.

Critical students of music, the reviews make clear, believe that Dr. Hanson, having distinguished himself in the field of teaching and of the opera, now, through his command of the difficult symphony form, has made secure his place as one of the important figures in American music.

That he is still a comparatively young man, means that music lovers may look forward to many more creative works as brilliant and original as those he has already produced.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ISLIP, N. Y.
WEEKLY PRESS

NOV 30 1939

Suffolk Singing Group In New York Concert

The Babylon Festival Chorus will be presented in concert at Steinway Hall in New York City next Tuesday with Thelma Spear Lewisohn, soprano, as guest artist. Included in the program are two ambitious works of contemporary Americans: "Lament for Beowulf" of Howard Hanson and "Stabat Mater Speciosa" of Philip James. The performance of these two works won the praise of a select New York musical audience when presented before The American Society of Composers and Conductors at the Henry Hadley Studio in New York City last winter. A cycle of Walt Whitman poems set to music by Christos Vrionides, conductor of the chorus, will also be heard and will undoubtedly awaken the audience to the beauty of the text and the music.

Now in its third year the chorus continues to gain favor through the direction of its efforts toward the presentation of American works to American audiences.

During the past week there has been much favorable comment bestowed on Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for his encouragement of young American composers by including on one program the works of at least five Americans. Among the works listed was the first performance of Howard Hanson's "Third Symphony."

DOROTHY MAYNOR IN DEBUT RECITAL

N.Y.Times Nov.2-1

Young Soprano of Negro and Indian Descent Sings Before Capacity House in Town Hall

GIVES 'DON GIOVANNI' ARIA

Music of Schumann, Schubert, Bach and Handel and Several Spirituals on Program

By OLIN DOWNES

When Dorothy Maynor, the young soprano of Negro and Indian descent, made her New York debut last night in Town Hall, she faced as many people as had been able to secure seats for the occasion, and volleys of flashlight photography, and a gathering of personages as well as music-lovers. For the fame of Miss Maynor had preceded her. Her performance at an informal occasion last Summer during the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, coupled with the publicity resulting from her achievement, had secured her public in advance of last night's occasion, and predisposed the audience in her favor.

The concert was inexcusably late in beginning. The instant the singer appeared there was a long applause. It was without doubt a difficult situation for a young artist of Miss Maynor's intelligence, seriousness and sensibility. She was evidently aware of the impression she was expected to make, and under exceptional tension. Before many minutes had passed she had proved her exceptional equipment.

Character of Voice

For Miss Maynor's voice is phenomenal for its range, character, and varied expressive resources. It is equally adapted to music of a lyric or dramatic character. The voice has power as well as rich color. The upper tones can be wildly dramatic, and need never be forced. There are many different tone-qualities available, and the voice, because of the singer's sensibility, changes color constantly in response to mood and dramatic inflection. Miss Maynor is also a good musician, with knowledge of style, a fine ear, inherent taste as well as sincerity.

Saying these things, it is immediately to be added that she gave different kinds of performances last night. She proved that she had virtually everything needed by a great artist—the superb voice, one of the finest that the public can hear today; exceptional musicianship and accuracy of intonation; emotional intensity, communicative power. Her breath control is extraordinary, and it enables her to phrase with wonderful beauty and distinction of melodic line, and to maintain an exquisite pianissimo. Elsewhere, and no doubt largely as a result of nervousness, she was not at her tonal or interpretive best, and was inclined to force and to forget properly to "cover" her upper tones, which were not always free.

Sings "Louise" Air as Encore

There were unforgettable performances of such songs as the Handel "Sleep, Why Dost Thou Leave Me"; certain of the Schumann and Schubert songs; passages of Mozart, notably in the Pamina aria, and the superb performance of the air from "Louise," which she sang as an encore and which had better have been heard by the whole audience earlier in the evening. Here she was the consummate artist.

Bach's religious song, sung in English, "To Thee, Jehovah," might better have waited till the voice was warmed, though here again were sculptured phrases that connoted the distinguished interpreter. The great aria, "Tu che invoco," from Spontini's "Vestale," a noble air, showed more of the dramatic capacities of the organ, yet needed greater authority and rhetorical freedom in delivery. The singing of Schumann's "Du bist wie eine Blume" was an example not only of the beauty of the pianissimo but the manner in which, in the very tone itself, as created by Miss Maynor, the mood and emotional color of the situation is inherent—with or without the text; a characteristic of a born singer.

Gives Schubert Composition

The simplicity of Schubert is almost an infallible test of a singer's sincerity, and with the first notes of the "Gretchen am Spinnrade" the singer had seized her audience. The song was less perfectly sung than the "Ave Maria," added to the Schubert group as an encore, where the voice was played upon as an instrumentalist would play upon his violin, with an effect of unforgettable feeling and beauty. "Du bist die Ruh" was given its true intimacy and its difficult sustained line. But "Die Allmacht" was an instance when the singer forced and failed to cover tones.

It was inevitable that Miss Maynor would be asked to sing a group of Negro spirituals. Two of these, including the second "By and By," she did very beautifully. But her voice, singular as it may seem, is not the ideal voice for Negro spirituals. It has not in sufficient degree the negroid coloring. Best of all this group was the encore, sung without accompaniment, with remarkable tonal beauty and intensity of feeling—"The Crucifixion."

Last came a group of Wolf and Strauss, in which, with the exception of the opening phrases of "Zur ruh" and the haunting poetry of "Die Nacht"—a song which might never have been written if Schumann's "Mondnacht" had not preceded it—the singer was not heard to particular advantage. Why should any one sing "Kling," even if there is a high "C" with an "E" vowel on it? There was too much of the "E" sound, anyhow, in Miss Maynor's upper register!

Miss Maynor's first encore, before the "Louise" air, was Strauss's "Zueignung." With her astonishing gifts she should be wary of too much singing and too little deliberate study at this time. She should be able to reach almost any height as one of the leading concert singers of her generation. Arpad Sandor was her accomplished and conscientious accompanist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SPUR ✓
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC - 1939

● Guitou Knoop, a Frenchwoman born in Russia of Dutch parents, is showing at the Wildenstein Gallery a group of sculptures among which are several arresting portrait subjects, including Katharine Cornell, Serge Koussevitzky and Dr. Frederick A. Stock. Outstanding, however, is the Duchess of Windsor.

"The Duchess," said Mlle. Knoop, "is fascinating. She came to me with André Maurois, and returned for nearly twenty sittings, always at the lunch hour. For luncheon she never eats more than a capsule, which she carries, though she eats heartily later at high tea, when the Duke returns from golf. With me she was always punctual. Once she was five minutes late and apologized. When she first came in, her hat was down and I did not perceive her true beauty, but when she removed her hat I saw her very definite charm; it is in her forehead, and also in her smile."

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORK CITY
METRONOME

DEC - - 1939

Serge Likes Swing!

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of Boston Symph made the statement: "The Jumpin Jive, it appears, not only has the power to make people dance, but also the glory to make serious composers think, then write, the most interesting music of these days." He says he loves the swing stuff.

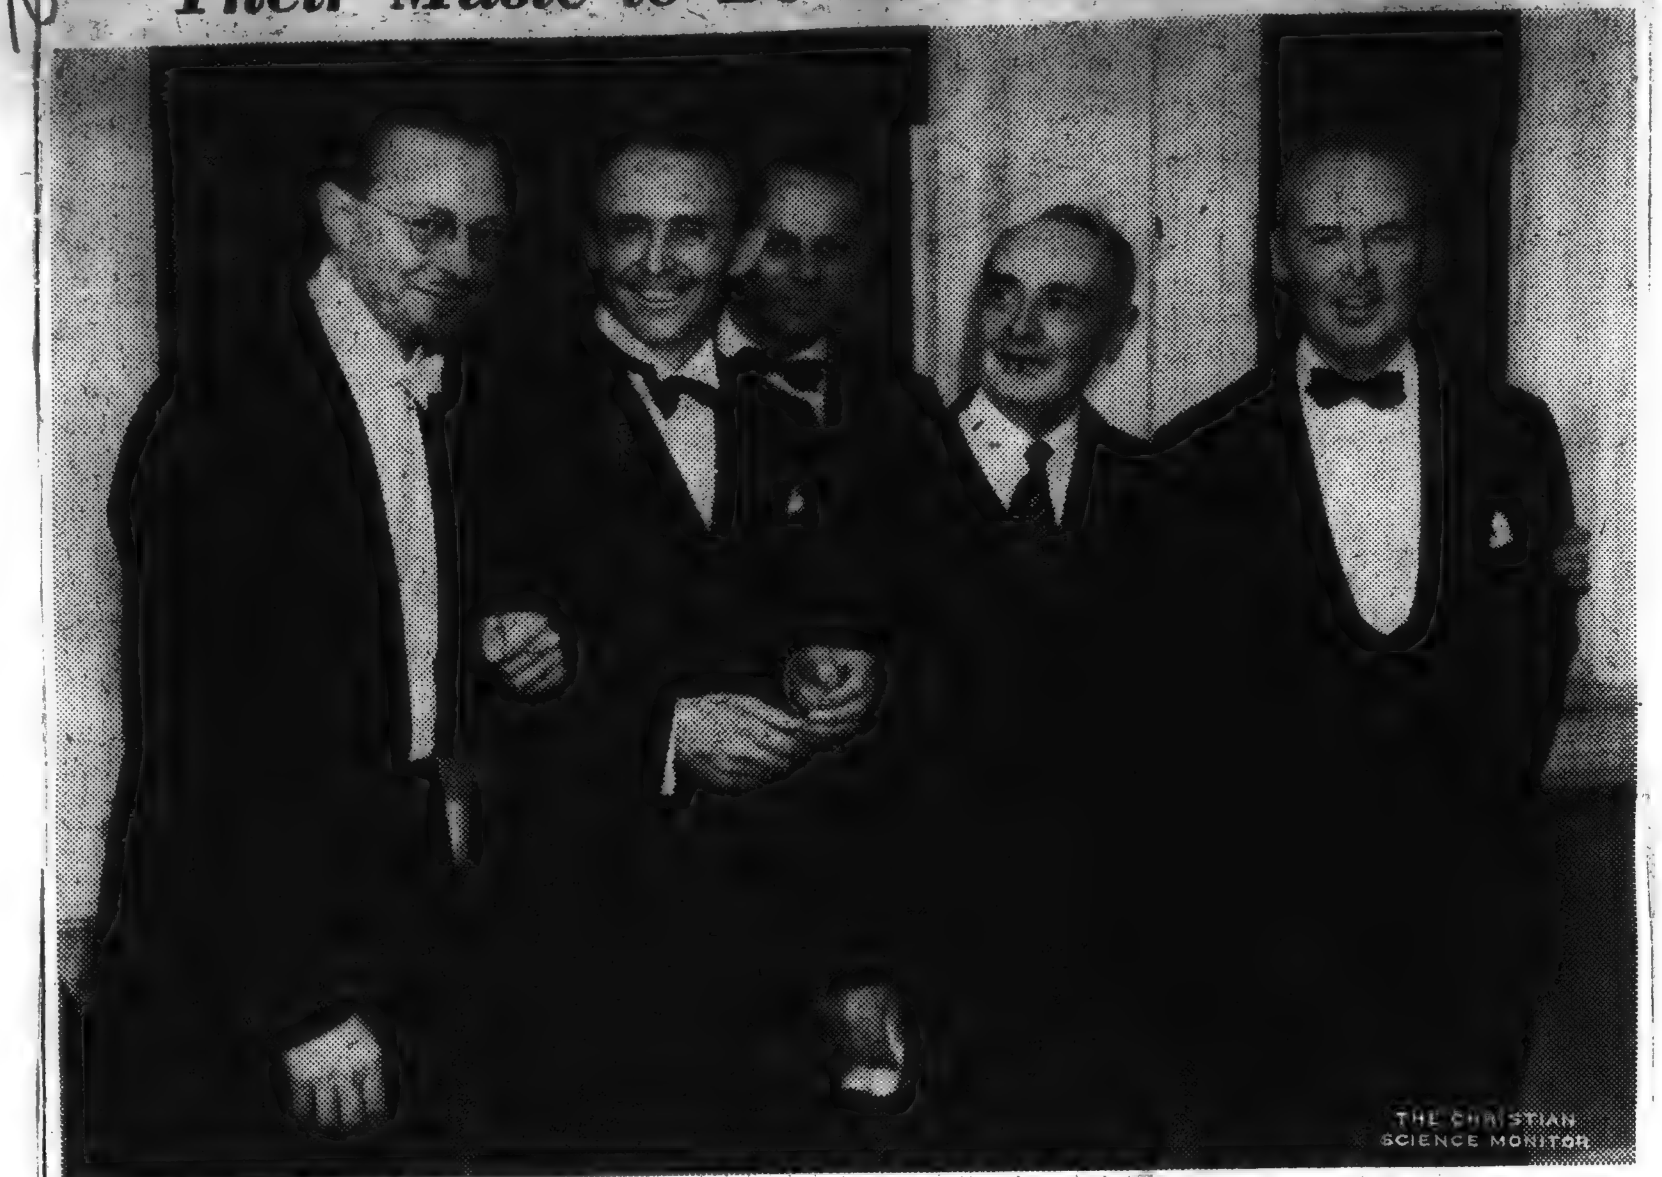
THIS CLIPPING FROM
BEAUMONT, TEX.
JOURNAL

DEC 1 - 1939

A NEW vocal star has risen on the musical horizon, and judging from the reception given her at her New York debut, she should rise high and far. She is Dorothy Maynor, negro soprano. She was "discovered" informally by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky during the Boston Symphony's summer festival a few months ago. Word of a "find" spread in advance and her New York debut was described by critics as a "sensation."

10

Their Music to Be Heard in New York



THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra and Four Composers

Left to right: Howard Hanson, Roy Harris, William Schuman, Dr. Koussevitzky, and John Alden Carpenter. The composers' works will be heard in the American programs to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, Nov. 23 and 25.

Monitor Nov 22 '39

TRANSCRIPT,

Nov 29

MUSIC

Boston Symphony In Providence

Providence music lovers turned out en masse last evening to applaud the all-Stravinsky program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented in the Metropolitan Theater. Led by the composer, the orchestra played four works, consisting for the most part of ballet suites, with a live and animated spirit.

The first of these, "Jeu de Cartes," was written for the American Ballet in 1936 and given at the Metropolitan Opera House the following year. It depicts a card game in ballet form, and is definitely one of Stravinsky's most refreshing works. Bubblingly humorous, the music has such color and verve that make it easy for the listener to form his own mental ballet. The lightning thrusts of instrument against instrument, written as only this master can write them, were a delectable introduction to the rest of the program.

Capriccio Is High Point

The second work, a Capriccio for orchestra and piano, written in 1929, was the zenith of the evening. With Sanroma as soloist in a part that might have been written for him, the three movements fled by gayly, capriciously. In the rapier-like passages, with a subtle orchestral background, the pianist reached his element. This was music that must have captured the imagination of even the dullest. The orchestra, as responsive as puppets on a string, felt the slightest gesture of the conductor-composer. In quicksilver fashion, the rhythms chased back and forth between piano and orchestra evoking picture after picture. The tumultuous applause did not fade until the soloist had been recalled four times.

After intermission audience and orchestra settled back to enjoy two well known ballet suites, "Petrouchka" and "The Fire Bird." It was difficult to discern who received more pleasure from the music, performers or listeners.

This was Stravinsky's night. Masterpieces, led in masterful style, by the master himself. Seldom do music audiences experience such exhilarating moments. As the echoes of the last note resounded through huge Metropolitan Theater, audience and orchestra stood to give this great artist his due. P. D. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR

DEC 1 - 1939

Symphony Soloist

RUTH POSSELT

Ruth Posselt, the distinguished American violinist, who appears as the soloist at the coming symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Music Hall, arrived in Cincinnati Thursday with the applause of New York still ringing in her ears. Last Saturday she appeared as violin soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, at Carnegie Hall, an event which proved outstanding in the eyes of the important musical critics.

Olin Downes, music critic of the New York Times, in writing of Miss Posselt's playing of the violin concerto by the American composer, Edward Burlingame Hill, which was heard for the first time, stated:

"Miss Posselt in the performance of this work was completely authoritative, musicianly, sincere in her enthusiastic interpretation, and she observed a refinement and distinction of style appropriate to the music. She felt the form of the composition as a whole; her conception was unified. She allowed no nuance or fineness of phrase to escape her. The composer, like the audience, may well have been gratified by the manner in which his latest work was placed before the public."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BLOOMFIELD, N. J.
Weekly
Independent Press

DEC 1 - 1939

Boston Symphony Will Give Concert In Unity Course

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY WILL BRING 110 MUSICIANS TO MONTCLTIR.

The entire Boston Symphony Orchestra with 110 musicians, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will appear at the Montclair High School, on Wednesday evening, January 10th, as an extra event in connection with the celebration of the 20th anniversary season of the Unity Concert Course of Montclair.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

As this great orchestra appears only in certain University towns and other large cities of the east beside Boston and New York, it is a great opportunity for the musically minded people of the vicinity to hear, near at hand and with little effort, what a writer in a recent issue of Harper's Magazine calls "the greatest orchestra in the world."

In order to secure choice seats tickets should be procured at once at the Unity Institute office, 6' Church street, Montclair. Telephone Montclair 2-6770.

[illegible] DEBUT RECITAL

N.Y. Times ~~Nov. 21~~

Young Soprano of Negro and Indian Descent Sings Before Capacity House in Town Hall

GIVES 'DON GIOVANNI' ARIA

Music of Schumann, Schubert, Bach and Handel and Several Spirituals on Program

By OLIN DOWNES

When Dorothy Maynor, the young soprano of Negro and Indian descent, made her New York debut last night in Town Hall, she faced as many people as had been able to secure seats for the occasion, and volleys of flashlight photography, and a gathering of personages as well as music-lovers. For the fame of Miss Maynor had preceded her. Her performance at an informal occasion last Summer during the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, coupled with the publicity resulting from her achievement, had secured her public in advance of last night's occasion, and predisposed the audience in her favor.

The concert was inexcusably late in beginning. The instant the singer appeared there was a long applause. It was without doubt a difficult situation for a young artist of Miss Maynor's intelligence, seriousness and sensibility. She was evidently aware of the impression she was expected to make, and under exceptional tension. Before many minutes had passed she had proved her exceptional equipment.

Character of Voice

For Miss Maynor's voice is phenomenal for its range, character, and varied expressive resources. It is equally adapted to music of a lyric or dramatic character. The voice has power as well as rich color. The upper tones can be wildly dramatic, and need never be forced. There are many different tone-qualities available, and the voice, because of the singer's sensibility, changes color constantly in response to mood and dramatic inflection. Miss Maynor is also a good musician, with knowledge of style, a fine ear, inherent taste as well as sincerity.

Saying these things, it is immediately to be added that she gave different kinds of performances last night. She proved that she had virtually everything needed by a great artist—the superb voice, one of the finest that the public can hear today; exceptional musicianship and accuracy of intonation; emotional intensity, communicative power. Her breath control is extraordinary, and it enables her to phrase with wonderful beauty and distinction of melodic line, and to maintain an exquisite pianissimo. Elsewhere, and no doubt largely as a result of nervousness, she was not at her tonal or interpretive best, and was inclined to force and to forget properly to "cover" her upper tones, which were not always free.

Sings "Louise" Air as Encore

There were unforgettable performances of such songs as the Handel "Sleep, Why Dost Thou Leave Me"; certain of the Schumann and Schubert songs; passages of Mozart, notably in the Pamina aria, and the superb performance of the air from [illegible] as an encore and [illegible] rather have been heard [illegible] audience earlier in the evening. Here she was the consummate artist.

Bach's religious song, sung in English, "To Thee, Jehovah," might better have waited till the voice was warmed, though here again were sculptured phrases that connoted the distinguished interpreter. The great aria, "Tu che invoco," from Spontini's "Vestale," a noble air, showed more of the dramatic capacities of the organ, yet needed greater authority and rhetorical freedom in delivery. The singing of Schumann's "Du bist wie eine Blume" was an example not only of the beauty of the pianissimo but the manner in which, in the very tone itself, as created by Miss Maynor, the mood and emotional color of the situation is inherent—with or without the text; a characteristic of a born singer.

Gives Schubert Composition

The simplicity of Schubert is almost an infallible test of a singer's sincerity, and with the first notes of the "Gretchen am Spinnrade" the singer had seized her audience. The song was less perfectly sung than the "Ave Maria," added to the Schubert group as an encore, where the voice was played upon as an instrumentalist would play upon his violin, with an effect of unforgettable feeling and beauty. "Du bist die Ruh" was given its true intimacy and its difficult sustained line. But "Die Allmacht" was an instance when the singer forced and failed to cover tones.

It was inevitable that Miss Maynor would be asked to sing a group of Negro spirituals. Two of these, including the second "By and By," she did very beautifully. But her voice, singular as it may seem, is not the ideal voice for Negro spirituals. It has not in sufficient degree the negroid coloring. Best of all this group was the encore, sung without accompaniment, with remarkable tonal beauty and intensity of feeling—"The Crucifixion."

Last came a group of Wolf and Strauss, in which, with the exception of the opening phrases of "Zur ruh" and the haunting poetry of "Die Nacht"—a song which might never have been written if Schumann's "Mondnacht" had not preceded it—the singer was not heard to particular advantage. Why should any one sing "Kling," even if there is a high "C" with an "E" vowel on it? There was too much of the "E" sound, anyhow, in Miss Maynor's upper register!

Miss Maynor's first encore, before the "Louise" air, was Strauss's "Zueignung." With her astonishing gifts she should be wary of too much singing and too little deliberate study at this time. She should be able to reach almost any height as one of the leading concert singers of her generation. Arpad Sandor was her accomplished and conscientious accompanist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SPUR ✓
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC - 1939

● Guitou Knoop, a Frenchwoman born in Russia of Dutch parents, is showing at the Wildenstein Gallery a group of sculptures among which are several arresting portrait subjects, including Katharine Cornell, Serge Koussevitzky and Dr. Frederick A. Stock. Outstanding, however, is the Duchess of Windsor.

"The Duchess," said Mlle. Knoop, "is fascinating. She came to me with André Maurois, and returned for nearly twenty sittings, always at the lunch hour. For luncheon she never eats more than a capsule, which she carries, though she eats heartily later at high tea, when the Duke returns from golf. With me she was always punctual. Once she was five minutes late and apologized. When she first came in, her hat was down and I did not perceive her true beauty, but when she removed her hat I saw her very definite charm; it is in her forehead and also in her smile."

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORK CITY
METRONOME

DEC - - 1939

Serge Likes Swing!

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of Boston Symph made the statement: "The Jumpin Jive, it appears, not only has the power to make people dance, but also the glory to make serious composers think, then write, the most interesting music of these days." He says he loves the swing stuff. ✓

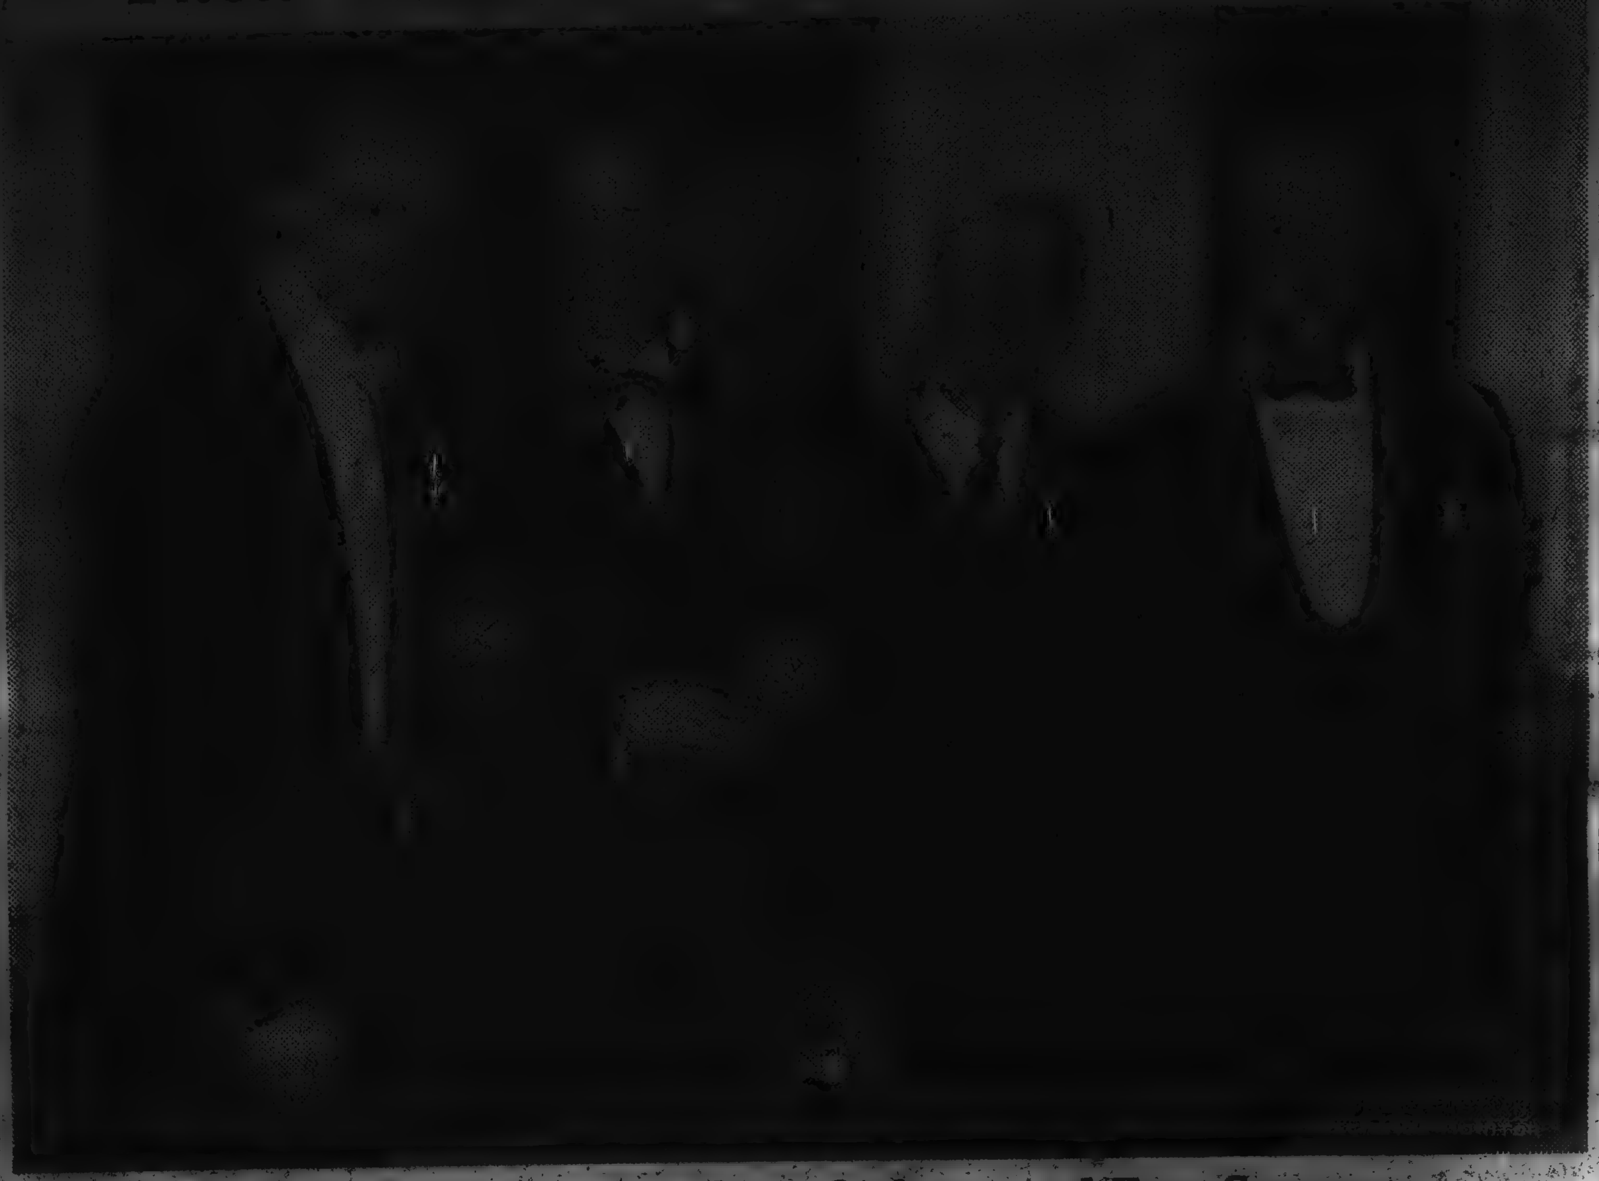
THIS CLIPPING FROM
BEAUMONT, TEX.
JOURNAL

DEC 1 - 1939

A NEW vocal star has risen on the musical horizon, and judging from the reception given her at her New York debut, she should rise high and far. She is Dorothy Maynor, negro soprano. She was "discovered" informally by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky during the Boston Symphony's summer festival a few months ago. Word of a "find" spread in advance and her New York debut was described by critics as a "sensation."

10

Their Music to Be Heard in New York



Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra and Four Composers

Left to right: Howard Hanson, Roy Harris, William Schuman, Dr. Koussevitzky, and John Alden Carpenter. The composers' works will be heard in the American programs to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, Nov. 23 and 25.

Monitor Nov 22 '39

TRANSCRIPT,

Nov 29

MUSIC

Boston Symphony In Providence

Providence music lovers turned out en masse last evening to applaud the all-Stravinsky program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented in the Metropolitan Theater. Led by the composer, the orchestra played four works, consisting for the most part of ballet suites, with a live and animated spirit.

The first of these, "Jeu de Cartes," was written for the American Ballet in 1936 and given at the Metropolitan Opera House the following year. It depicts a card game in ballet form, and is definitely one of Stravinsky's most refreshing works. Bubblingly humorous, the music has such color and verve that make it easy for the listener to form his own mental ballet. The lightning thrusts of instrument against instrument, written as only this master can write them, were a delectable introduction to the rest of the program.

Capriccio Is High Point

The second work, a Capriccio for orchestra and piano, written in 1929, was the zenith of the evening. With Sanroma as soloist in a part that might have been written for him, the three movements fled by gayly, capriciously. In the rapier-like passages, with a subtle orchestral background, the pianist reached his element. This was music that must have captured the imagination of even the dullest. The orchestra, as responsive as puppets on a string, felt the slightest gesture of the conductor-composer. In quicksilver fashion, the rhythms chased back and forth between piano and orchestra evoking picture after picture. The tumultuous applause did not fade until the soloist had been recalled four times.

After intermission audience and orchestra settled back to enjoy two well known ballet suites, "Petrouchka" and "The Fire Bird." It was difficult to discern who received more pleasure from the music, performers or listeners.

This was Stravinsky's night. Masterpieces, led in masterful style, by the master himself. Seldom do music audiences experience such exhilarating moments. As the echoes of the last note resounded through huge Metropolitan Theater, audience and orchestra stood to give this great artist his due.

P. D. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR

DEC 1 - 1939

Symphony Soloist

RUTH POSSELT

Ruth Posselt, the distinguished American violinist, who appears as the soloist at the coming symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Music Hall, arrived in Cincinnati Thursday with the applause of New York still ringing in her ears. Last Saturday she appeared as violin soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, at Carnegie Hall, an event which proved outstanding in the eyes of the important musical critics.

Olin Downes, music critic of the New York Times, in writing of Miss Posselt's playing of the violin concerto by the American composer, Edward Burlingame Hill, which was heard for the first time, stated:

"Miss Posselt in the performance of this work was completely authoritative, musicianly, sincere in her enthusiastic interpretation, and she observed a refinement and distinction of style appropriate to the music. She felt the form of the composition as a whole; her conception was unified. She allowed no nuance or [illegible] of phrase to escape her. [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BLOOMFIELD, N. J.
Weekly
Independent Press

DEC 1 - 1939

Boston Symphony Will Give Concert In Unity Course

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY WILL BRING 110 MUSICIANS TO MONTCLTIR

The entire Boston Symphony Orchestra with 110 musicians, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will appear at the Montclair High School, on Wednesday evening, January 10th, as an extra event in connection with the celebration of the 20th anniversary season of the Unity Concert Course of Montclair.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

As this great orchestra appears only in certain University towns and other large cities of the east beside Boston and New York, it is a great opportunity for the musically minded people of the vicinity to hear, near at hand and with little effort, what a writer in a recent issue of Harper's Magazine calls "the greatest orchestra in the world."

In order to secure choice seats tickets should be procured at once at the Unity Institute office, 6[illegible] Church street, Montclair. Telephone Montclair 2-6770.

106

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

C.E.M.

Simon Barer

Piano soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Dec. 4 and 5.

Herald Dec 2 '39

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The seventh regular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Igor Stravinsky was the guest conductor. Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, was the soloist. The Cecilia Society chorus, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, assisted. The progam was as follows:

Stravinsky............"Jeu de Cartes"
Stravinsky
Capriccio for orchestra and piano
Stravinsky
Suite from the Ballet, "Petrouchka"
Stravinsky
"Symphonie de Psaumes" for orchestra and chorus

This was a singularly representative concert by which to show the qualities of Stravinsky as a composer. Anyone hearing the above program could form a very fair idea of the development and nature of Stravinsky's music. Under the composer's careful and precise direction, at the hands of a splendid orchestra, now if at any time might the merits of this widely and bitterly discussed figure in the world of music be appraised.

Mr. Stravinsky has not been fortunate recently in the kind of criticism he has attracted. The official point of view no longer stands aghast at the radicalism of the composer of the "Sacre;" rather does it shake its head dolefully and deplore the "sterility" of his later scores. This cry has been eagerly taken up by the writers of popular books and seized upon without reflection by those who never cared for Stravinsky's music anyway. No wonder that the composer has been moved to come out in print and on the lecture platform in defense of his own ideas.

An example of this critical hostility, which trounces the artist when he is witty and sneers at him when he is solemn, was the almost unanimous disapproval of "Jeu de Cartes" by the New York press. Why? Here is a score that is certainly both adroit and amusing. Its combinations of instrumental sonorities are ingenious and effective. It does what it sets out to do as ballet music.

Moreover, it stands alone in the concert hall, without benefit of the stage, and can be enjoyed as "music for the theater," a suite of dances for which a program is unnecessary. It is, perhaps, a trifle long and is somewhat indeterminate at the outset. That it is deliberately imitative at certain points is nothing against it, rather does that characteristic add to our pleasure in the composer's wit. The "Card Game" was played yesterday for the first time in Boston, and its success ought to insure it a place in the repertoire.

The Capriccio for orchestra and piano—note that order—is another aspect of Stravinsky's musical wit. Actually the piano is often more of an accompaniment, when the main part of our attention should be focused on the remarkable orchestration. The balance between piano and orchestra, the strong rhythmic propulsion, these are the interesting features of the Capriccio. We are not supposed to look for more in the music than an instrumental tour de force, in short a Caprice. Mr. Sanroma was an admirable interpreter of this work, projecting it with the crispness of attack and cleanness of technique that it requires.

"Petrouchka" needs no introduction here; its marvelous and exhilarating qualities have long been appreciated the world over. Mr. Stravinsky, as might be expected, saw to it that the performance was a straightforward reading with no tricks of expression. There were, thus, changes from other performances that on the whole made the music clearer. As the years pass, it becomes more and more evident that the score of "Petrouchka" does not need the stage action, in spite of the extreme realism of some of the details. Mr. Stravinsky himself seemed happier as conductor in letting us hear all there was in the music, we imagine, than he would had be been hampered by choreographers and stage directors.

We have left little space for discussion of what is, all in all, Stravinsky's noblest orchestral work. As excuse we can plead that the Symphony of Psalms is well known here. It is a remarkable example of economy of means producing a startlingly impressive and original setting for the Latin text of some of the Psalms. It has been called by its enemies "meretricious," but music connected with religion has often been called that out of prejudice. Performed as it was yesterday, with the last movement intoned so deliberately and solemnly, the Symphony of Psalms is the reverse of cheap or shoddy. The curious instrumentation, with such dependence on the wind and with the high strings omitted, is doubtless what gives the Symphony its austere and simple character. It remains the most important work of Stravinsky's later years, and repetitions have served to increase our respect for it.

Mr. Stravinsky was cordially received yesterday, and there were few indications that a whole concert of his works was too much for the Friday afternoon public. Praise should also go to Mr. Sanroma, of course, and to the Cecilia Society chorus, which Arthur Fiedler had trained.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Mozart's Symphony in C major K. 338, the finale of Mahler's 9th Symphony and Schubert's Symphony No. 7 in C major.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MONTCLAIR, N. J.
SEMI-WEEKLY TIMES

DEC 1 - 1939

Boston Symphony Favors Montclair

Orchestra Appears in Few Towns of Its Size.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to Montclair on Jan. 10 to play at Montclair High School as the extra event in the twentieth season of the Unity Concert Course, the management of that orchestra singles out this town as an especial favorite. This musical organization makes it a practice to appear in few places the size of Montclair, specializing in university towns and the larger cities of the East.

In Boston, as well as in other cities where this orchestra appears, it has become an institution. When Dr. Koussevitzky lifts his baton at the beginning of the season in Boston, many seats in Symphony Hall hold the same occupants as in the early days of the concerts, which began in 1881. The same seats have been kept in many a family for generations, to be passed along with the family portraits and silver from mother to daughter.

The Montclair committee which has planned the twentieth season is composed of Mrs. Howard B. Allen, Mrs. Edgar A. Bates, Mrs. Herbert G. Bell, Percival F. Brundage, Mrs. Louis A. Cerf, Harold V. Coes, Frank J. Hutchinson, Karl M. Mann, Mrs. Andrew G. Osborne, John B. Pratt, Mrs. Harold S. Sloan, Mrs. Edgar S. Stehli.

A special committee has bas been appointed to assist with the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Mrs. F. C. Bethell, Mrs. J. Graham Carswell, Mrs. George F. Carnwell, Mrs. Percival T. Gates, Mrs. Adolph Keuffel, Mrs. Burdette E. Snyder, Mrs. Harold C. Stoker, Mrs. Charles D. Whidden, all of Montclair, and Mrs. Charles W. Holton and Mrs. Henry R. Johnston of Essex Fells. Tickets for the concert are on sale at the Unity Institute office, 67 Church Street, telephone Montclair 2-6770.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, O.
Euclid Weekly Observer

DEC 1 - 1939

CONDUCTS CONCERT — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will direct the Boston Symphony orchestra in a concert at Public Music hall Friday, Dec. 15, under auspices of the Cleveland Museum of Art. Beginning at 8:45 p. m., the concert is another in the series sponsored by Cleveland Concert Chorus under direction of Mrs. Emil Brudno. The program includes compositions from Mozart, Debussy, Ravel and Tchaikovsky.

By and From Stravinsky

C.E.M. Dec 2

By L. A. Sloper

Igor Stravinsky, distinguished composer, and presently guest professor of poetry at Harvard, directed the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday in a program of his own works. The concert, which will be repeated tonight in Symphony Hall, offered a suite from the recent ballet, "Jeu de Cartes"; the Capriccio for orchestra and piano solo, with J. M. Sanromá as pianist; the "Pétrouchka" suite, and the "Symphonie de Psaumes," with the Cecilia Society chorus.

Mr. Stravinsky has been a famous figure in the musical world, and even outside it, for a quarter-century. Opinions differ on whether he is the "greatest" composer of his time, but there is no doubt that he has been the strongest musical influence on his generation and on that which has followed it. Only a few individualists among composers, and a larger number of faithful followers of the Romantic tradition, have been able to write, since 1913, as if Stravinsky had not written.

This, therefore, was an occasion. The audience received it accordingly. Mr. Stravinsky was warmly greeted on his appearance, more warmly applauded after the several items of the program, and at the close he received an ovation.

The only work unfamiliar to Boston on this week's list is the suite from the ballet, "Jeu de Cartes." This work was written for the American Ballet, and produced by them at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York on April 27, 1937. At that time it seemed to me that the best thing about the production was the décor and costumes by Irene Sharaff. The score struck me as well adapted to the dancers' needs, but uninteresting as music, and certainly not for the concert hall.

That is the usual story about ballet music: it needs the action of the theater, for which it was written. But yesterday I found the music more interesting in the concert hall than it had been in the theater. It seemed to me to be light, lucid, charming, economically devised, well scored, and even witty. It seemed to bear the same relation to the "Sacre" that Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony bears to "Sept, Ils Sont Sept." But the suite is too long. The charm becomes a little tedious before its length has been run.

The "Capriccio" renewed the good impression it had made on its first performance in 1930, when also Mr. Sanromá was the soloist. Again it was brilliantly played.

"Pétrouchka" is a quite different matter under the composer's baton from the music as we are accustomed to hear it. The interpretation yesterday was straightaway. This must be the way Mr. Stravinsky wants it played, for although he is not a first-line conductor, he knows how to get an orchestra to play his own compositions. After hearing this performance, one understood better Mr. Stravinsky's complaint, some years ago in London, that Dr. Koussevitzky had misinterpreted one of his scores—I think it was the "Sacre"—by giving it too much expression. Certainly "expression" was lacking yesterday—but not rhythmic vitality.

The "Symphonie de Psaumes," you remember, was "composed to the glory of God and dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra" at the time of the orchestra's fiftieth anniversary in 1930. It made an excellent impression on its first performance in Boston. A few years later it struck me as dry. Yesterday it seemed uneven. Without doubt it was sincerely conceived, but much of it sounded cerebral. The most satisfactory parts were the fugal introduction to the second section, and the final chorus—though that is too long.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GLEN RIDGE, N. J.
WEEKLY PAPER

DEC 1 - 1939

Boston Symphony Will Give Concert In Unity Course

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY WILL BRING 110 MUSICIANS TO MONTCLTIR.

The entire Boston Symphony Orchestra with 110 musicians, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will appear at the Montclair High School, on Wednesday evening, January 10th, as an extra event in connection with the celebration of the 20th anniversary season of the Unity Concert Course of Montclair.

As this great orchestra appears only in certain University towns and other large cities of the east, beside Boston and New York, it is a great opportunity for the musically minded people of the vicinity to hear, near at hand and with little effort, what a writer in a recent issue of Harper's Magazine calls "the greatest orchestra in the world."

In order to secure choice seats, tickets should be procured at once at the Unity Institute office, 67 Church street, Montclair. Telephone Montclair 2-6770.

GLOBE—

Dec 2 '39

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Igor Stravinsky, one of the most conspicuous figures in the musical world for the past 30 years, is guest conductor of a program of his own compositions at the Boston Symphony concerts this week. The concerts are, therefore, Occasions with capital O.

When Mr. Stravinsky first appeared on the stage yesterday afternoon, he was greeted by a standing orchestra. The applause that followed each number was cordial—more so than is customary with the Friday audience, which as a rule is not fond of modern music. Whether this favorable demonstration was directed at an artistic personage or his works may be left to individual deduction.

First on the program was the score from "Card Game, Ballet in Three Deals," new to Boston. This was followed by the Piano Capriccio, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, and the suite from the ballet "Petrouchka," one of the true Stravinsky masterpieces. The afternoon ended with the dolorous vocal plangencies and the encircling gloom of the "Symphony of Psalms." The chorus for the latter was the Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler.

As a conductor, Stravinsky's dominant characteristic is that of his later music—rhythm, rhythm and more rhythm. On the stand he is a dynamic figure, at times almost dancing in his efforts to bring out the sharp contrasts and the lively metrical efforts to wants. For subtle inflections of color, emphasis and the like, he apparently has little interest.

"Card Game" was given as a ballet at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York city, two years ago last April, the composer conducting. The characters of the ballet represent cards in a poker game, and the action has some sort of symbolism in which the "malice and knavery" of the Joker are finally routed when he is beaten by a royal flush in hearts.

To judge by a single hearing of the music alone, "Card Game"—like so many other ballet scores—would be much more effective in the theatre. One could sense a grotesque stage action. Purely as music, it is trivial, barren and mechanical. Take away the proverbial "sour" harmony of Stravinsky, and you might be listening to impish tunes by Delibes, Offenbach, Rossini or a Johann Strauss waltz.

The Piano Capriccio, composed 10 years ago, is in much the same vein and style, though perhaps a little funnier. The piano part is most exacting, and enjoyed at the hands of Mr. Sanroma a brilliant performance. Completely different in mood is the "Symphony of Psalms," which has always seemed to this reviewer a wilderness of desolation, a futile searching after strange effects.

Perhaps there were others in the audience who shared this writer's feeling that these three pieces are open to the charge Henry VIII is supposed to have made against Cranmer's sermons—that they "are all sauce and no substance." And rather vinegary sauce, at that.

"Petrouchka" is another story, a descriptive masterpiece, full of tumult, flavored with tenderness and humor as well as wit, conveying an irresistible picture of a motley bourgeois and peasant crowd at a Russian fair. This music has the juice of life.—C. W. D.

Youth Concerts

Trans. Dec 2 '39

The "Sold Out" sign for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., Youth Concerts is a familiar sight these days at Symphony Hall. Many factors have contributed to the success of this low-priced series. One is that Wheeler Beckett, the conductor, understands young people and never talks down to them. Another is that the majority of the audience comes within the same age group. Mr. Beckett has found from long experience with youth symphony concerts in San Francisco and Richmond that this unifying principle is the secret of success. Hence the present Youth Concerts are intended for high school age students only and except for necessary escorts from schools, the attendance of adults is discouraged.

The tie-up between the school music appreciation course and the Youth Concerts includes definite preparation for each concert in the series. The pupils do research on the composers represented on the program. They also study supplementary information on printed program notes prepared by Mr. Beckett.

The Youth Concerts are building future audiences for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Though now officially affiliated with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., the concerts depend for financial support on the sustaining members' committee of the Youth Concerts Association of Boston, which turns to the public for support. The cost of the orchestra of 70 Boston Symphony players and other expenses are twice the admission receipts. When admissions range from 20 cents per concert for young people from the united settlements to a majority of seats at only 33 1-3 cents, with private schools entitled to limited number of seats at $1.00, symphonic music becomes available to thousands of music-hungry girls and boys. But the piper must be paid.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, O.
PLAIN DEALER

DEC 3 - 1939

Music Notes

A change has been made in the program of the Boston Orchestra ppearing on the Cleveland Concer ourse at Public Music Hall, Dec. 5. Instead of Prokofief's "Classi al Symphony" the famed orchestr nder Koussevitsky will open wit he Mozart C Major Symphony, No 38 . . .

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 3 - 1939

Simon Barer, pianist, will play the Rachmaninoff Second concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, tomorrow and Tuesday, in Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DAVENPORT, IA.
DEMOCRAT-LEADER

DEC 3 - 1939

HERE AND THERE

. . . Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, has been eulogized by Walter Damrosch and Gene Buck for his aid in presenting music by American composers . . . Harold Bauer has resigned the office as president of the the Beethoven association, which he has held for 20 years . . . Simplicity marked the funeral services for Artur Bodanzky held last Saturday . . . Mayor LaGuardia of New York was given a life membership in the American Federation of Musicians . . . Bouguslawski, concert pianist and composer, who was heard with Herbert Silberstein's Little Symphony in Davenport a few years ago, will celebrate his 25th anniversary on the concert stage with a recital next Sunday afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHARLESTON, S. C.
NEWS-COURIER

DEC 3 - 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLINTON, ILL.
JOURNAL - REPUBLIC

DEC 3 - 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

DEC 3 - 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM AKRON, OHIO
BEACON-JOURNAL

DEC 3 - 1939

New Star

A NEW VOCAL STAR has risen on the musical horizon, and judging from the reception given her at her New York debut, she should rise high and far. She is Dorothy Maynor, Negro soprano.

Miss Maynor was "discovered" informally by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky during the Boston Symphony's summer festival a few months ago. Word of a "find" spread in advance and her New York debut was described by critics as a "sensation."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

DEC 3 - 1939

Schuman Wins First Award For Composer

Receives Commission by Town Hall and League; Is Writing a Quartet

William Schuman, American composer, who is a member of the faculty of Sarah Lawrence College, has received the first Award in Composition offered by Town Hall and the League of Composers. The choice was made by a committee, representing both organizations, which consisted of Aaron Copland, Mrs. Theodore Steinway, Mme. Olga Samaroff Stokowski and Randall Thompson. The award commissions its winner, who will receive $200 donated by the League of Composers, to write a work for a soloist or for chamber music ensemble suitable for performance in Town Hall. It is to be finished in time for performance this season, and will be offered to a soloist or group who are scheduled to appear in this auditorium. Mr. Schuman, on this commission, is writing his third string quartet, which should be ready in December.

He was born in New York in 1910, received the Bachelor of Science and Master of Arts degrees from Columbia University and later studied abroad. He now holds a Guggenheim fellowship. One of his symphonies has been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his prologue for chorus and orchestra has been performed in Carnegie Hall and at the Lewisohn Stadium.

Walter W. Naumburg, in a statement thanking the selection committee, expresses the hope that this award will become another important part of Town Hall's policy of enlarging the scope of its concert department so as to establish Town Hall as a vital force aiding music and musicians in America. The Town Hall Music Committee, of which Mr. Naumburg is chairman, also hopes that the new award will aid the prestige of creative artists in the manner in which its Young Artist's Award has aided performing artists.

All-Stravinsky

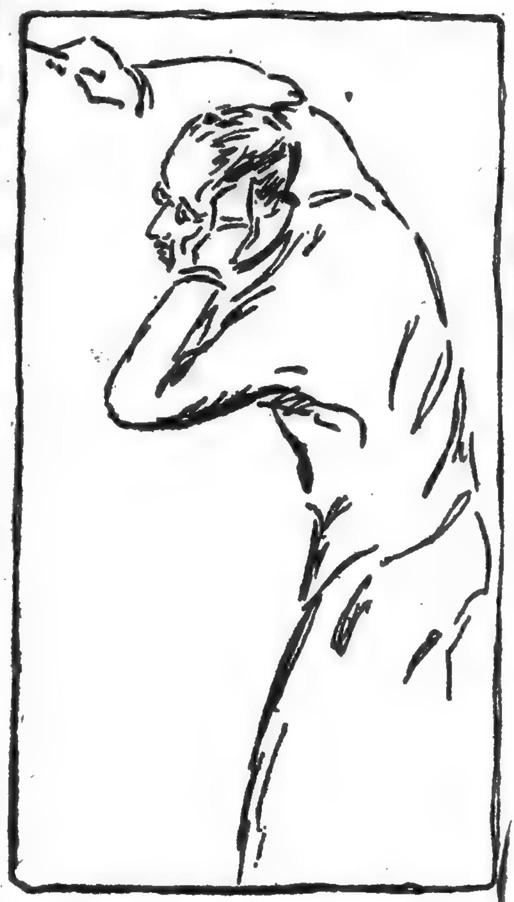
Transcript Dec 2 '39

Eminent Composer Conducts Boston Symphony Program of Own Works

The first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Stravinsky's "Card Game, a Ballet in Three Deals," was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall with the composer conducting. The occasion was an all-Stravinsky program which further included the Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra written in 1929, the suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petroushka" and the "Symphony of Psalms," which was composed in 1930 for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony.

The "Card Game" was composed in 1936 for the American Ballet where George Balanchine was in charge of the choreography, and it was first performed at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York city on April 27 of the following year. Mr. Stravinsky conducted this and the other numbers of the program with a virtuosity that is almost bewildering in one not primarily a conductor. We do not remember ever having heard a leader who managed to instill into his orchestra such an emphatic sense of rhythm.

He himself is all rhythm even when he stands perfectly still, seeming only to listen to the orchestra without moving a muscle. Actually in such moments he has, through his eyes or the play of facial expression, perhaps more perfect control over the orchestra than at other times.



IGOR STRAVINSKY
Testing orchestral sonorities as our artist caught him at a rehearsal for yesterday's program.

Symphonic Poker

This conductor's virtuosity was particularly evident in the "Card Game," which is a piece of virtuoso composition as well. The emotional content of this music, if any, is debatable. Its mastery of style and technique is not. Like most of Stravinsky's late compositions, it is prevailingly neo-classical and, if one must have this trend, then Stravinsky is by far its greatest master. Small wonder that he has fascinated and seduced so many of his contemporaries and juniors into imitations of his works. There was a time when it was the "Sacre" that one imitated. Now it is "Apollon Musagete," "Persephone" or the Piano Capriccio.

It is curious that Stravinsky, who represents, even more than Debussy before him, the revolt against Wagner and all Wagner represented, that Stravinsky himself seems to have hypnotized the generation that followed him much as did Wagner.

With the new Stravinsky style as such (it is not really very new any more), there can be no quarrel. As a style, a manner, it has the greatest charm. It is elegant, quick-witted, smooth, chic and it never commits an error of taste. It is a "smart," a decorative art. It is perhaps the ultimate realization of that divine "leggerezza," which Nietzsche set up as an ideal for all the arts: that art which is consciously shallow because of the profundities which it must veil.

Stravinsky uses quotations from Rossini to Ravel, sarcastic reference and purposeful banality to achieve ends which are consistently amusing, at times absolutely gallic in the dexterity of its wit and intellectual slight-of-hand. Whether one approves or disapproves of his aims, Stravinsky has succeeded brilliantly in what he attempted to do in his "Card Game."

Uninspired Capriccio

The Capriccio on the other hand is a singularly arid piece of music. Possibly it is intended to be dry. There is design to it and perhaps that is all Stravinsky wanted. But if Stravinsky was consciously avoiding emotion he must have intended to be entertaining in some abstract sort of way. Perhaps others were entertained. We just got tired.

Jesus Maria Sanroma polished the solo piano part off with a brilliance and stylistic perfection that must have warmed Stravinsky's heart.

The soloist in the Symphony of Psalms was the St. Cecelia Chorus and they had been superbly prepared by Arthur Fiedler to project such thoughts as were evoked in Stravinsky by the text of the Vulgate.

Curiously enough the eternally youthful score of "Petroushka," a piece which manages to be red-blooded and exciting, even sentimental and at the same time be vastly entertaining, this score deals with human emotions—though they be only those of a puppet. Could there be a connection there?

E. D.

The Boston Symphony, occupying the hall on the evening of the twenty-third and the afternoon of the twenty-fifth, offered two all-American programs, a not unprecedented compliment in New York, however, to the native composer on the part of a conspicuous symphonic orchestra. At the earlier concert Dr. Koussevitzky offered Arthur Foote's E major Suite for strings, Walter Piston's Concertino for piano and orchestra, the Third Symphony of Roy Harris, and the Second Symphony of Randall Thompson, none of these a local "first time" for New York.

The second program comprised William Schuman's "American Festival" Overture, E. B. Hill's Violin Concerto, J. A. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," and Howard Hanson's Third Symphony. Here everything was new to this town except "Skyscrapers." The soloists were Ruth Posselt, violinist; Dorothy Maynor, soprano, and Leonard Franklin, tenor. The performances were admirable throughout and of the soloists Miss Posselt and Miss Maynor gave complete satisfaction.

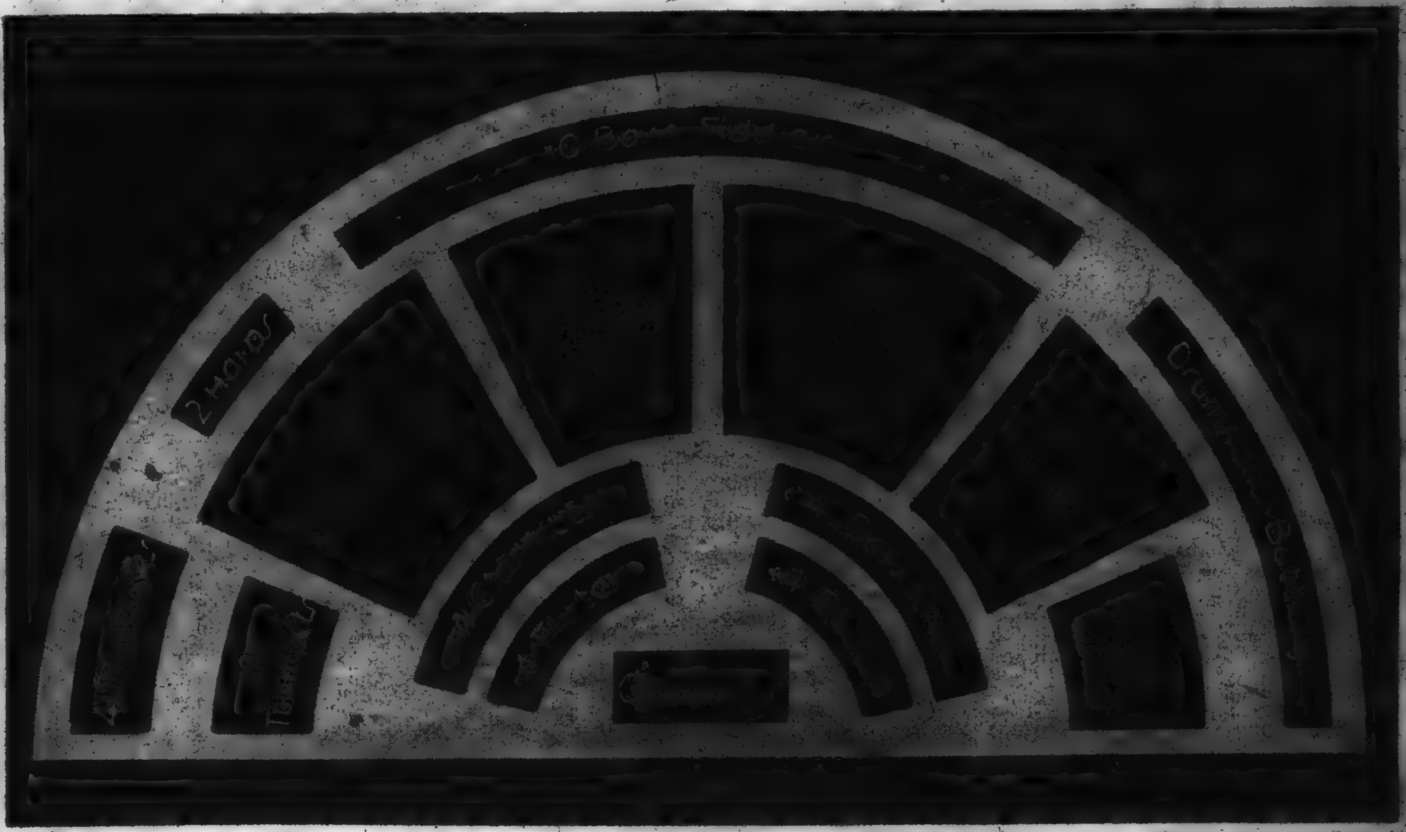
This is hardly the occasion for a detailed disquisition on the imposing array of worthy American compositions. The brief impression is enough. In the Third Symphony Mr. Harris gives convincing proof of his growth. Mr. Schuman, on the contrary, hardly lives up here to the promise shown in earlier work. The Thompson symphony and especially "Skyscrapers" stand up wonderfully well under the burden of gathering years. Of course the compositions of Mr. Piston and Mr. Hill show thorough technical training and valuable experience.

DECEMBER 2, 1939

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 3 - 1939

108



Stokowski maintains this orchestra arrangement gives best results—

THUNDER over the ORCHESTRA

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI has fired the first shot in what may develop into a battle over orchestral seating this Winter. He made some radical changes in the placing of the musicians in the Philadelphia Orchestra and gave the public in Philadelphia and New York a chance to see and hear the new arrangement—the string instruments were moved back and the wind instruments moved forward. John Barbirolli, on tour with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, sounded an opposing salvo when he declared he saw no need for change. Arturo Toscanini and Serge Koussevitzky left their NBC and Boston Symphony Orchestras in their old positions, thus establishing neutrality or agreement with Mr. Barbirolli.

The fact that the issue created so much discussion is an eloquent comment on the increasing importance of the symphony orchestra in America's cultural scheme. Where thousands were acquainted with symphonic music several decades ago only if they chanced to be near a city with an orchestra of its own, now millions have the great virtuoso ensembles at hand through the radio, phonograph and sound film. The orchestra is becoming part of the national heritage.

WHEN you listen to a symphony orchestra you may be so swept up by the power and exaltation, grace and delicacy of the music that you may have no time or inclination to observe what instrument is doing what. If you happen to listen through radio or phonograph you are even less likely to visualize the components of the orchestra.

The modern symphony orchestra of 115 players is reasonably standardized. It has four general sections: strings, woodwinds, brasses and the percussion family. It has taken on its present-day proportions in the course of an evolution of three or four centuries. Three hundred years ago a composer wrote for the instruments that were available. It was only toward the end of the eighteenth century that a composer insisted on having a certain fundamental combination at his disposal. As instruments became better and composers expressed their ideas more grandiloquently, the size of the orchestra grew. There has been no change, however, in the set-up of four general sections.

THE string section is the basis of the orchestra today. Its divisions are not unlike those of the human voice. The violins are the sopranos of the string family; the violas, the altos or tenors; the 'cellos, the baritones, and the contrabasses, known less elegantly in orchestral circles as the bull fiddles, the basso profundos.

The violin is the most sensitive of instruments. It can be manipulated to sing with the slow, gentle pace of a flowing stream, as Beethoven has decreed in the second movement of the Pastorale symphony, or the vertiginous, dizzying speed of the bumblebee in flight, as Rimsky-Korsakoff has required. Because the violin is so flexible, because its tone can be ethereal or grave, it carries a heavy share of the emotional burden of a composition. Essentially, however, the violin's is a small voice, and it can hold its own against its more powerful team-mates in the orchestra only through the weight of sheer numbers. There are as many as thirty-four fiddlers in a modern, full-sized symphony orchestra, divided into a section of eighteen first violins and sixteen second violins. Sometimes these two sections have different parts of a melody to sing; sometimes the second fiddles provide a web of tone while the first violins sing the melody; occasionally they sing the tune together while other instruments paint in the background.

THE fourteen violas, twelve 'cellos and ten bull fiddles are like a stepladder of big brothers to the violin. They let the fiddle behave as the prima donna most of the time, but occasionally they step out on their own. The viola is a sober fellow, but he can be tender. The 'cello is also sober, but he has a heart and a voice of gold. The 'cello tone is rich, dignified, full; composers use it for broad, elegiac music. When Saint-Saëns in his "Carnival of Animals" wished to suggest the sensuous, gliding swan, he called on the 'cello. The bull fiddle sounds like a rough, uncouth fellow; he spends a lot of his time growling and grumbling. And you can't blame him much. For years he served as a sort of echo to the 'cello. Even today composers don't lavish much regard on the bull fiddle. They let him spend most of his time "noodling," an orchestra man's word for playing unexciting background.

The woodwinds are the most excitable

STRING VIOLIN
VIOLA
'CELLO
PERCUSSION CLARINET
HARP DRUMS

Key men of a great orchestra—

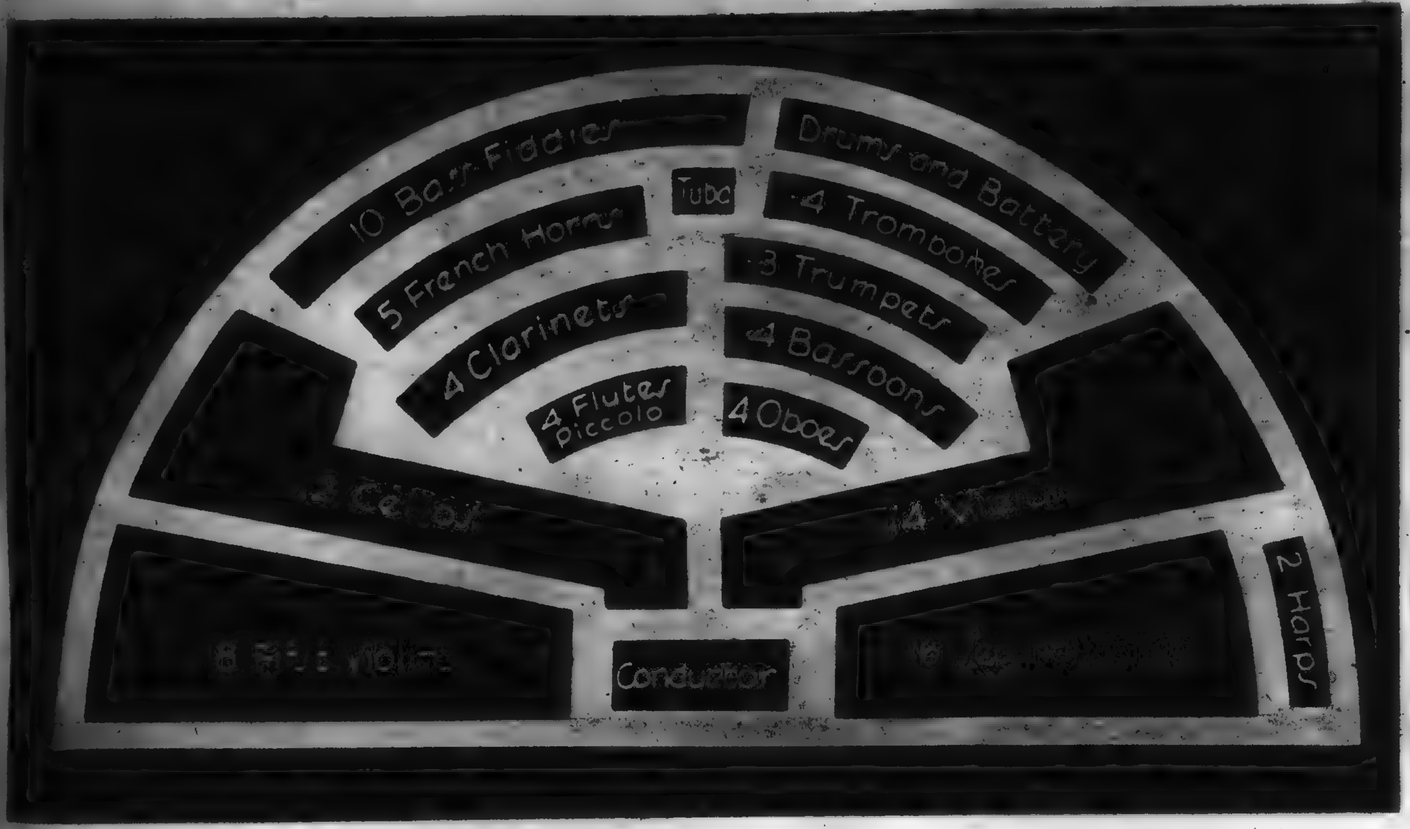
DO NOT FORGET
The Hundred Neediest

16

X

1

107



—but Toscanini keeps to the conventional orchestral seating.

people in the orchestra. They can be sweet and expressive, if they are asked to, but at the slightest provocation they jounce and pirouette. There are actually three separate families in the woodwind clan: the flute, oboe and clarinet groups.

THE unifying element is that the entire clan is made of wood. At least it used to be. Nowadays flutes are often made of silver, and one famous flutist is the proud owner of a platinum instrument.

The four flutes in the orchestra play with a limpid tone. They are extraordinarily airy and agile. When a composer wishes to suggest a bird, he turns to the flute. The fourth-string flute player also deals with the piccolo when that pipsqueak of an instrument is needed, and it is needed when a composer wants an exceptionally, high, piercing effect.

The clarinet family includes the clarinet and the bass clarinet, the latter with a lower range. In symphonic usage the clarinet has a smooth, creamy tone. Emile Zola expressed it felicitously when he said, "The clarinet represents sensual love, whilst the flute at most represents platonic love." There are four clarinets in a large orchestra, and the fourth man also plays the bass clarinet.

The oboe family, because of its double reed, is one of the most expressive in the orchestra. The oboe itself—there are four oboists in the largest orchestras—is given to poignant, sorrowful expression. It is the brooding spirit of the orchestra. Its slightly larger offspring, the English horn, has that quality also; it is well adapted to slow, plangent melodies. The English horn is something of a misnomer. It is not really a horn and the experts doubt whether it is English. The fourth oboist doubles on this instrument. The lowest-voiced chaps in the oboe family are the bassoon and the contrabassoon. The latter, which is played by the fourth bassoon, is the lowest of all. The bassoon itself is a useful instrument, but most valuable of all for rapid, staccato passages. It has been called the clown of the orchestra, and composers from Beethoven to Prokofieff have turned to the bassoon for some of their most charming comic passages.

As leaders argue over its placing, each instrument, from violin to tympani, continues to fill its appointed role.

NOW we come to the brasses. Theirs are the bright, sonorous, throbbing voices. They are rhetorical and oracular, brilliant and thrilling. There are, to begin with, five French horns. They have a golden, lustrous richness of tone. When Wagner wished to give the appropriate lift and heroism to his theme for Siegfried, the young hero, he assigned the music to the French horn. The trumpets—there are three of them—have brighter, more ringing voices. They are ideal for battle-cries and exultation. Then there are four trombones, with their solemn, low, noble and grandiose potentialities. Beethoven, who employed instruments cannily, never wasted the trombones. In the majestic Fifth symphony he saved them for the beginning of the fourth movement. When they enter, the tone becomes triumphantly resplendent. Finally there is the oom-pah man, the tuba. His voice is ponderous and slow-footed. Like the bull fiddle, he had scant shrift from (Continued on Page 19)

CONTRABASS FLUTE OBOE BASSOON

TRUMPET TUBA HORN TROMBONE

Some of the players of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra.

Photos courtesy Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York, Goro from Black Star, NBC and Globe.

16

X

(Continued from Page 5)

composers. Wagner, however, entrusted him with some of his full-bodied melodies.

The percussion family is a heterogeneous assortment of big and little instruments. The unifying factor is that the music—or, as some people say, the noise—is obtained by striking the instrument, rather than bowing or blowing. There are the kettledrums or the tympani, the bass drum, the snare drum, the bells, cymbals, glockenspiel, celesta, xylophone, triangle, castanets, harp and, sometimes, the piano.

THE busiest man in this family is the kettledrum player. He has four drums to look after. He tunes his instruments by increasing or lessening the tension on the drumhead, and if he has a lot of tuning to do, he keeps bobbing up and down, with his ear straining against his menagerie of drumheads.

Besides the tympanist, a large orchestra may have four other percussion manipulators. Their uses are manifold. They provide a rhythmic base and incidental sounds. In his "Danse Macabre," Saint-Saëns achieves an effect of rattling bones with a tune on the xylophone. If a composer wants a delicate tinkling, the triangle is his instrument. The celesta gives off an ethereal tone. Even more ethereal is the harp, and a major orchestra usually employs two.

Despite the size and diversity of the percussion family, composers keep inviting utter strangers in. Erik Satie wrote a score, "Parade," in which he prescribed the tapping of a typewriter. Richard Strauss used a rattle—yes, an ordinary rattle—in "Till Eulenspiegel." Castanets and tambourines are not considered intruders any longer, and gourds and other noisemakers have wormed their way into the orchestra.

WHEN you understand the tonal peculiarities and powers of each instrument, you can see the justification of the established and conventional seating of the orchestra. The instruments with the lightest, thinnest and smallest voices were placed forward. That meant the violins. The violas and 'cellos sat behind each section of fiddles. In midcenter were the woodwinds, and behind them the brasses, with the bullfiddles and percussion helping to bring up the rear. It was based on the simple theory that the loudest and strongest voices could afford to travel the longest distance.

The conventional seating was arrived at by conductors after decades of trial and error. It was only about a hundred years ago that the conductor came forward to lead the ensemble from a podium in the front. The orchestras of the eighteenth century were directed from the harpsichord, the ancient predecessor of the piano. In Dresden of the Seventeen Fifties, the harpsichordist, who was also the conductor, sat in the center of the stage. He was surrounded on all sides by his players.

Even when the orchestra attained what has been regarded as the modern seating there were always conductors who experimented with slight revisions. Mr. Stokowski, however, was not content with trifling experiments. Nor was his latest his first. Some years ago he moved his 'cello section to the right of the conductor where the second violins are seated in the conventional arrangement. He left the first violins in their accustomed places and seated the second violins and violas between the first violins and 'cellos.

His newest change was based, he said, on modern acoustical developments. Band shells are excellent resonators, he maintains, and experiments have shown that the tone that is reflected off the band shell wall behind the orchestra travels with greater intensity than that which moves in a direct line to the audience.

Mr. Stokowski therefore reasoned that the wise procedure would be to place the lighter-voiced strings in the rear of the stage, the woodwinds with their piercing voices in front, center, and the brasses and percussion at the side, up front.

THE critics thought that Mr. Stokowski's arrangement produced a marked improvement in the string tone. On the other hand, they complained of an increased blatancy of the brasses. An inconsistency in Mr. Stokowski's argument was also pointed out: the bull fiddles were placed against the rear of the band shell, whereas their logical place would be in front.

However, if the bull fiddles were lined up in front of the stage the audience would hardly be able to see any of the other instruments. As it was, listeners at the Stokowski concert said that the eye was robbed of some of its accustomed attractions. For the woodwinds and brasses have longer periods of idleness than the strings, and the strings are not clearly visible through the woodwinds.

Mr. Barbirolli, speaking for the status quo, said that he could not see why the woodwinds, for example, could not be made to play louder instead of moving the location of their chairs. He added that the present system had worked for at least a century and that great conductors had agreed in approving it.

It looks as though musicians will have something to discuss this Winter. The layman will pay less attention to the refinements of this dispute and more to the matchless web of tone that a modern orchestra can weave.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 3 - 1939

Audience Divided on Stravinsky Concert

BY JOHN TEBBEL

AN elderly lady who sat in front of us during Stravinsky's concert here last week was evidently disturbed by what she heard. As the Russian wound up conducting the Boston Orchestra in his relatively new Jeu de Carte and the music ended on an indeterminate note, the lady turned to a friend and sniffed:

"It doesn't sound like much to me."

She revived during Sanroma's playing of the Capriccio, apparently enjoyed the Petroushka item and then disintegrated under the pressure of Stravinsky's version of the Firebird suite, conducted without "interpretation" according to his idea on that subject.

"Well," the elderly lady remarked as the concert ended, "I don't think he'll ever replace Bach."

Divided Opinions Heard

Intermission chatter and conversation picked up as the crowd left Metropolitan Theatre ran along two sharply divided lines. There were a good many people like our bewildered friend, to whom the three deals of The Card Game had sounded like nothing at all and the Firebird had fluttered around without fire. On the other side stood the usual crop of intellectuals who were too busy explaining what Stravinsky was trying to say to examine in any detail what he actually said.

However, it added up to the same conclusions: that Stravinsky, as composer, has progressed to the point in his musical thought where his audience is almost completely alienated; that Stravinsky as conductor is simply second-rate, just as most poets are poor readers of their own poetry.

Of course, it may be the audience's fault if it is alienated. Stravinsky has said repeatedly that he doesn't intend to compose what people think they want to hear, which is naturally his privilege but still a little rough on the people and not exactly in accordance with the theory that music is written for the benefit of listeners and not for the composer or his friends.

First Time for Many

Most of us last week heard Jeu de Carte performed for the first time, although it was composed three years ago. It is a ballet, the program says, depicting a poker game in three deals. We doubt if a poker fan, let alone a bridge addict, could have followed the play. Those who expected to hear something in the fiery, rhythmic pattern of Petroushka heard, instead, an odd blending of contemporary and classical ideas.

Jeu de Carte, one concludes, indicates little if anything of the direction Stravinsky's great talent may be expected to follow. It is excellent ballet music but he has written better. As concert music, it is facile and interesting but scarcely anything to stir either intellect or emotion. The horns emerge suddenly in phrases not unlike Beethoven but then they verge into dissonance. A section of pure classic beauty flows out and this is immediately succeeded by a syncopated rhythm strongly suggestive of Dixieland jazz.

It was the Firebird performance, however, which brought on a deal of headshaking in the audience. This early product of the composer is certainly his most successful with the general public and many concert-goers know it by heart. Put on records by Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra, it has long been a best-seller. The Providence audience consequently expected something familiar, something it could follow and applaud itself for knowing, as is the custom of listeners.

Becomes an Interpretation

They found, however, that Stravinsky's literal conducting of the score is a long way removed from the interpretation customarily given it by other maestros. And it is odd that these interpretations, which Stravinsky professes to hate, do not vary greatly except in the response of the various orchestras whereas the composer's own conception of his music, which one assumes is the most accurate, turns out to be so sharply individual that it becomes, in effect, an interpretation.

At the very start, Stravinsky sets a tempo noticeably more rapid than is customary. This made a bad evening for the Boston orchestra's bassoon player, who got a half measure behind and never wholly caught up. It had an odd effect, too, on the weird glissandos which the strings play at the beginning. Ordinarily a section of brief, unearthly beauty it had a dragged-in-by-the-heels aspect as Stravinsky conducted it.

Some listeners were startled, too, by the eight measures or so connecting King Kastchei's dance with the berceuse, which are rarely heard in most versions of the score.

Majority Follow Stokowski

From the berceuse on through the finale, an immense gulf appears between the readings of a majority of conductors and that of the composer. The majority follow Stokowski's lead: they conceive these two sections as a long crescendo beginning with a theme set against a slow rhythm until it climaxes in the brass while the strings sound a thunderous, tense harmony overhead. Stravinsky's climax is not cumulative. It builds up mildly and, at the top, separates into a staccato statement by the brasses so that the tremendous, whirling conclusion comes almost as an anti-climax.

We do not presume to quarrel with Stravinsky; we only echo the complaint of our elderly friend: It doesn't sound like much to us.

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
Weekly Independent

DEC 23 1939

"Peter and the Wolf," Prokofieff's interesting symphonic story for orchestra and narrator, with Richard Hale, barytone, the guest-soloist, will be an arresting feature of the Philharmonic's second concert of the Matinee Subscription Series, at three o'clock on Wednesday (December twenty-seven), in the Music Hall of the Municipal Auditorium. This charming and unique music has been dramatized by the imaginative Russian to provide the audience with a mixture of both concert and theatre. The following "cast of characters" appears in the score: The Narrator, Richard Hale (who has participated in every performance of "Peter" with the Boston Orchestra under Koussevitzky); Peter, the String Quartet; The Wolf, Three Horns; The Bird, The Flute; The Duck, The Oboe; The Cat, The Clarinet; Peter's Grandfather, The Bassoon, and The Shooting of the Hunters, the Kettledrums and Bass drum. The scenes are Peter's yard, a meadow, a pond and a tree. Mr. Hale will also sing five songs by Daniel Gregory Mason titled "Russians" with sub-titles "Drunkard" — Concertina Player—A Revolutionary—A Boy—A Prophet. The English words are by Witter Bynner. The final "Pops" is December thirty-first (Sunday) at three o'clock in the Music Hall. Frank Sykora, first 'cellist of the Philharmonic will be guest soloist in Popper's Hungarian Rhapsody for Violincello and Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PROGRAM
NEW YORK CITY

DEC -- 1939

To Music Add Voice

SYMPHONY Orchestras, striving to win greater popular support, have added many novelties to their programs. Dancers, jazz-players, swing artists have all been comandeered. But now two great orchestras are trying a new experiment, one that appeals to the most cultured senses rather than to the emotions of the mob. Paul Leyssac, supreme master of the human voice, has been selected as Narrator for the performances of Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" to be given by the Chicago Symphony on February 15 and 16 and the Boston Symphony on March 29 and 30. Paul Leyssac is one of those exquisite artists of whom the public, the lecture audience, gets far too little.

(Continued from Page 5)

composers. Wagner, however, entrusted him with some of his full-bodied melodies.

The percussion family is a heterogeneous assortment of big and little instruments. The unifying factor is that the music—or, as some people say, the noise—is obtained by striking the instrument, rather than bowing or blowing. There are the kettle-drums or the tympani, the bass drum, the snare drum, the bells, cymbals, glockenspiel, celesta, xylophone, triangle, castanets, harp and, sometimes, the piano.

THE busiest man in this family is the kettledrum player. He has four drums to look after. He tunes his instruments by increasing or lessening the tension on the drumhead, and if he has a lot of tuning to do, he keeps bobbing up and down, with his ear straining against his menagerie of drumheads.

Besides the tympanist, a large orchestra may have four other percussion manipulators. Their uses are manifold. They provide a rhythmic base and incidental sounds. In his "Danse Macabre," Saint-Saëns achieves an effect of rattling bones with a tune on the xylophone. If a composer wants a delicate tinkling, the triangle is his instrument. The celesta gives off an ethereal tone. Even more ethereal is the harp, and a major orchestra usually employs two.

Despite the size and diversity of the percussion family, composers keep inviting utter strangers in. Erik Satie wrote a score, "Parade," in which he prescribed the tapping of a typewriter. Richard Strauss used a rattle—yes, an ordinary rattle—in "Till Eulenspiegel." Castanets and tambourines are not considered intruders any longer, and gourds and other noisemakers have wormed their way into the orchestra.

WHEN you understand the tonal peculiarities and powers of each instrument, you can see the justification of the established and conventional seating of the orchestra. The instruments with the lightest, thinnest and smallest voices were placed forward. That meant the violins. The violas and 'cellos sat behind each section of fiddles. In midcenter were the woodwinds, and behind them the brasses, with the bullfiddles and percussion helping to bring up the rear. It was based on the simple theory that the loudest and strongest voices could afford to travel the longest distance.

The conventional seating was arrived at by conductors after decades of trial and error. It was only about a hundred years ago that the conductor came forward to lead the ensemble from a podium in the front. The orchestras of the eighteenth century were directed from the harpsichord, the ancient predecessor of the piano. In Dresden of the Seventeen Fifties, the harpsichordist, who was also the conductor, sat in the center of the stage. He was surrounded on all sides by his players.

Even when the orchestra attained what has been regarded as the modern seating there were always conductors who experimented with slight revisions. Mr. Stokowski, however, was not content with trifling experiments. Nor was his latest his first. Some years ago he moved his 'cello section to the right of the conductor where the second violins are seated in the conventional arrangement. He left the first violins in their accustomed places and seated the second violins and violas between the first violins and 'cellos.

His newest change was based, he said, on modern acoustical developments. Band shells are excellent resonators, he maintains, and experiments have shown that the tone that is reflected off the band shell wall behind the orchestra travels with greater intensity than that which moves in a direct line to the audience.

Mr. Stokowski therefore reasoned that the wise procedure would be to place the lighter-voiced strings in the rear of the stage, the woodwinds with their piercing voices in front, center, and the brasses and percussion at the side, up front.

THE critics thought that Mr. Stokowski's arrangement produced a marked improvement in the string tone. On the other hand, they complained of an increased blatancy of the brasses. An inconsistency in Mr. Stokowski's argument was also pointed out: the bull fiddles were placed against the rear of the band shell, whereas their logical place would be in front.

However, if the bull fiddles were lined up in front of the stage the audience would hardly be able to see any of the other instruments. As it was, listeners at the Stokowski concert said that the eye was robbed of some of its accustomed attractions. For the woodwinds and brasses have longer periods of idleness than the strings, and the strings are not clearly visible through the woodwinds.

Mr. Barbirolli, speaking for the status quo, said that he could not see why the woodwinds, for example, could not be made to play louder instead of moving the location of their chairs. He added that the present system had worked for at least a century and that great conductors had agreed in approving it.

It looks as though musicians will have something to discuss this Winter. The layman will pay less attention to the refinements of this dispute and more to the matchless web of tone that a modern orchestra can weave.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 3 - 1939

Audience Divided on Stravinsky Concert

BY JOHN TEBBEL

AN elderly lady who sat in front of us during Stravinsky's concert here last week was evidently disturbed by what she heard. As the Russian wound up conducting the Boston Orchestra in his relatively new Jeu de Carte and the music ended on an indeterminate note, the lady turned to a friend and sniffed:

"It doesn't sound like much to me."

She revived during Sanroma's playing of the Capriccio, apparently enjoyed the Petroushka item and then disintegrated under the pressure of Stravinsky's version of the Firebird suite, conducted without "interpretation" according to his idea on that subject.

"Well," the elderly lady remarked as the concert ended, "I don't think he'll ever replace Bach."

Divided Opinions Heard

Intermission chatter and conversation picked up as the crowd left Metropolitan Theatre ran along two sharply divided lines. There were a good many people like our bewildered friend, to whom the three deals of The Card Game had sounded like nothing at all and the Firebird had fluttered around without fire. On the other side stood the usual crop of intellectuals who were too busy explaining what Stravinsky was trying to say to examine in any detail what he actually said.

However, it added up to the same conclusions: that Stravinsky, as composer, has progressed to the point in his musical thought where his audience is almost completely alienated; that Stravinsky as conductor is simply second-rate, just as most poets are poor readers of their own poetry.

Of course, it may be the audience's fault if it is alienated. Stravinsky has said repeatedly that he doesn't intend to compose what people think they want to hear, which is naturally his privilege but still a little rough on the people and not exactly in accordance with the theory that music is written for the benefit of listeners and not for the composer or his friends.

First Time for Many

Most of us last week heard Jeu de Carte performed for the first time, although it was composed three years ago. It is a ballet, the program says, depicting a poker game in three deals. We doubt if a poker fan, let alone a bridge addict, could have followed the play. Those who expected to hear something in the fiery, rhythmic pattern of Petroushka heard, instead, an odd blending of contemporary and classical ideas.

Jeu de Carte, one concludes, indicates little if anything of the direction Stravinsky's great talent may be expected to follow. It is excellent ballet music but he has written better. As concert music, it is facile and interesting but scarcely anything to stir either intellect or emotion. The horns emerge suddenly in phrases not unlike Beethoven but then they verge into dissonance. A section of pure classic beauty flows out and this is immediately succeeded by a syncopated rhythm strongly suggestive of Dixieland jazz.

It was the Firebird performance, however, which brought on a deal of headshaking in the audience. This early product of the composer is certainly his most successful with the general public and many concert-goers know it by heart. Put on records by Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra, it has long been a best-seller. The Providence audience consequently expected something familiar, something it could follow and applaud itself for knowing, as is the custom of listeners.

Becomes an Interpretation

They found, however, that Stravinsky's literal conducting of the score is a long way removed from the interpretation customarily given it by other maestros. And it is odd that these interpretations, which Stravinsky professes to hate, do not vary greatly except in the response of the various orchestras whereas the composer's own conception of his music, which one assumes is the most accurate, turns out to be so sharply individual that it becomes, in effect, an interpretation.

At the very start, Stravinsky sets a tempo noticeably more rapid than is customary. This made a bad evening for the Boston orchestra's bassoon player, who got a half measure behind and never wholly caught up. It had an odd effect, too, on the weird glissandos which the strings play at the beginning. Ordinarily a section of brief, unearthly beauty it had a dragged-in-by-the-heels aspect as Stravinsky conducted it.

Some listeners were startled, too, by the eight measures or so connecting King Kastchei's dance with the berceuse, which are rarely heard in most versions of the score.

Majority Follow Stokowski

From the berceuse on through the finale, an immense gulf appears between the readings of a majority of conductors and that of the composer. The majority follow Stokowski's lead: they conceive these two sections as a long crescendo beginning with a theme set against a slow rhythm until it climaxes in the brass while the strings sound a thunderous, tense harmony overhead. Stravinsky's climax is not cumulative. It builds up mildly and, at the top, separates into a staccato statement by the brasses so that the tremendous, whirling conclusion comes almost as an anti-climax.

We do not presume to quarrel with Stravinsky; we only echo the complaint of our elderly friend: It doesn't sound like much to us.

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
Weekly Independent

DEC 23 1939

"Peter and the Wolf," Prokofieff's interesting symphonic story for orchestra and narrator, with Richard Hale, barytone, the guest-soloist, will be an arresting feature of the Philharmonic's second concert of the Matinee Subscription Series, at three o'clock on Wednesday (December twenty-seven), in the Music Hall of the Municipal Auditorium. This charming and unique music has been dramatized by the imaginative Russian to provide the audience with a mixture of both concert and theatre. The following "cast of characters" appears in the score: The Narrator, Richard Hale (who has participated in every performance of "Peter" with the Boston Orchestra under Koussevitzky); Peter, the String Quartet; The Wolf, Three Horns; The Bird, The Flute; The Duck, The Oboe; The Cat, The Clarinet; Peter's Grandfather, The Bassoon, and The Shooting of the Hunters, the Kettledrums and Bass drum. The scenes are Peter's yard, a meadow, a pond and a tree. Mr. Hale will also sing five songs by Daniel Gregory Mason titled "Russians" with sub-titles "Drunkard" — Concertina Player—A Revolutionary—A Boy—A Prophet. The English words are by Witter Bynner. The final "Pops" is December thirty-first (Sunday) at three o'clock in the Music Hall. Frank Sykora, first 'cellist of the Philharmonic will be guest soloist in Popper's Hungarian Rhapsody for Violincello and Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PROGRAM
NEW YORK CITY

DEC -- 1939

To Music Add Voice

SYMPHONY Orchestras, striving to win greater popular support, have added many novelties to their programs. Dancers, jazz-players, swing artists have all been comandeered. But now two great orchestras are trying a new experiment, one that appeals to the most cultured senses rather than to the emotions of the mob. Paul Leyssac, supreme master of the human voice, has been selected as Narrator for the performances of Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" to be given by the Chicago Symphony on February 15 and 16 and the Boston Symphony on March 29 and 30. Paul Leyssac is one of those exquisite artists of whom the public, the lecture audience, gets far too little.

"World Must Hear Her Voice!"

Dorothy Maynor's Golden Tones Startled the Hub's Famous Symphony Conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Out of His Weariness

BY HAZEL CANNING

A young girl stood, her eyes shut, on the stage of The Town Hall, New York, singing as few had ever sung there before her.

Through the whole evening, an entire programme, she sang Bach, Mozart, Handel, Strauss, as naturally, as easily, as the birds in her own Virginia.

When she was finished, the critics, the great singers in the audience who had heard, proclaimed her 'the voice of a generation; perhaps the voice of a hundred years."

After several encores, the audience applauded for 20 minutes, standing on their feet, smiling, cheering, waving, they registered their approval.

Then happened something rare in these days. Great personages of the world of music, Rose Bampton, Mme. Elizabeth Schumann, John Erskine, Marian Anderson and others moved out of the audience up to the platform to congratulate the unknown yet marvelous performer.

The name of the young lady, as most everybody knows, is Dorothy Maynor.

Called for Dr. Koussevitzky

When the news of her great success flashed over the country, there was one man, living in Boston, who felt more interested and more concerned than anybody else. Also prouder. For he was the man who had discovered the great talent of Dorothy Maynor, young colored singer.

And he is Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Even before the story of Dorothy Maynor is told, the drama of Dorothy's discovery should be narrated. . . . Miss Dorothy tells it herself . . . but so modestly, so quietly and humbly that it is difficult for the reporter to believe such a great talent can be so very shy and unselfconscious. For, when Miss Maynor tells the story of her discovery she hardly does it justice.

Here is the tale. Dorothy Maynor, as a student at Hampton Institute, impressed Miss Harriot Curtis, dean at Hampton, and a Boston woman. Miss Curtis and Miss Mary Hayden helped Dorothy to go to New York and study music. She hoped, one day, to become a teacher of music.

Then, last summer, her two women friends decided that Dorothy ought to have a vacation. It would be her first in several years. Miss Dorothy said she would like to take her vacation listening to the Festival at Tanglewood Farm, the estate which Boston's Mrs. Gorham Brooks turns over, each summer, for the great musical event of the Massachusetts Mountains.

"All right, my dear," said Miss Curtis, "go there and listen to the music."

Arrived in the Berkshires, Dorothy sang, one day, for Mrs. Brooks. That lady was impressed. . . . She made up her mind. . . . She sought out Dr. Koussevitzky. . . .

"You must hear this young person sing," she said.

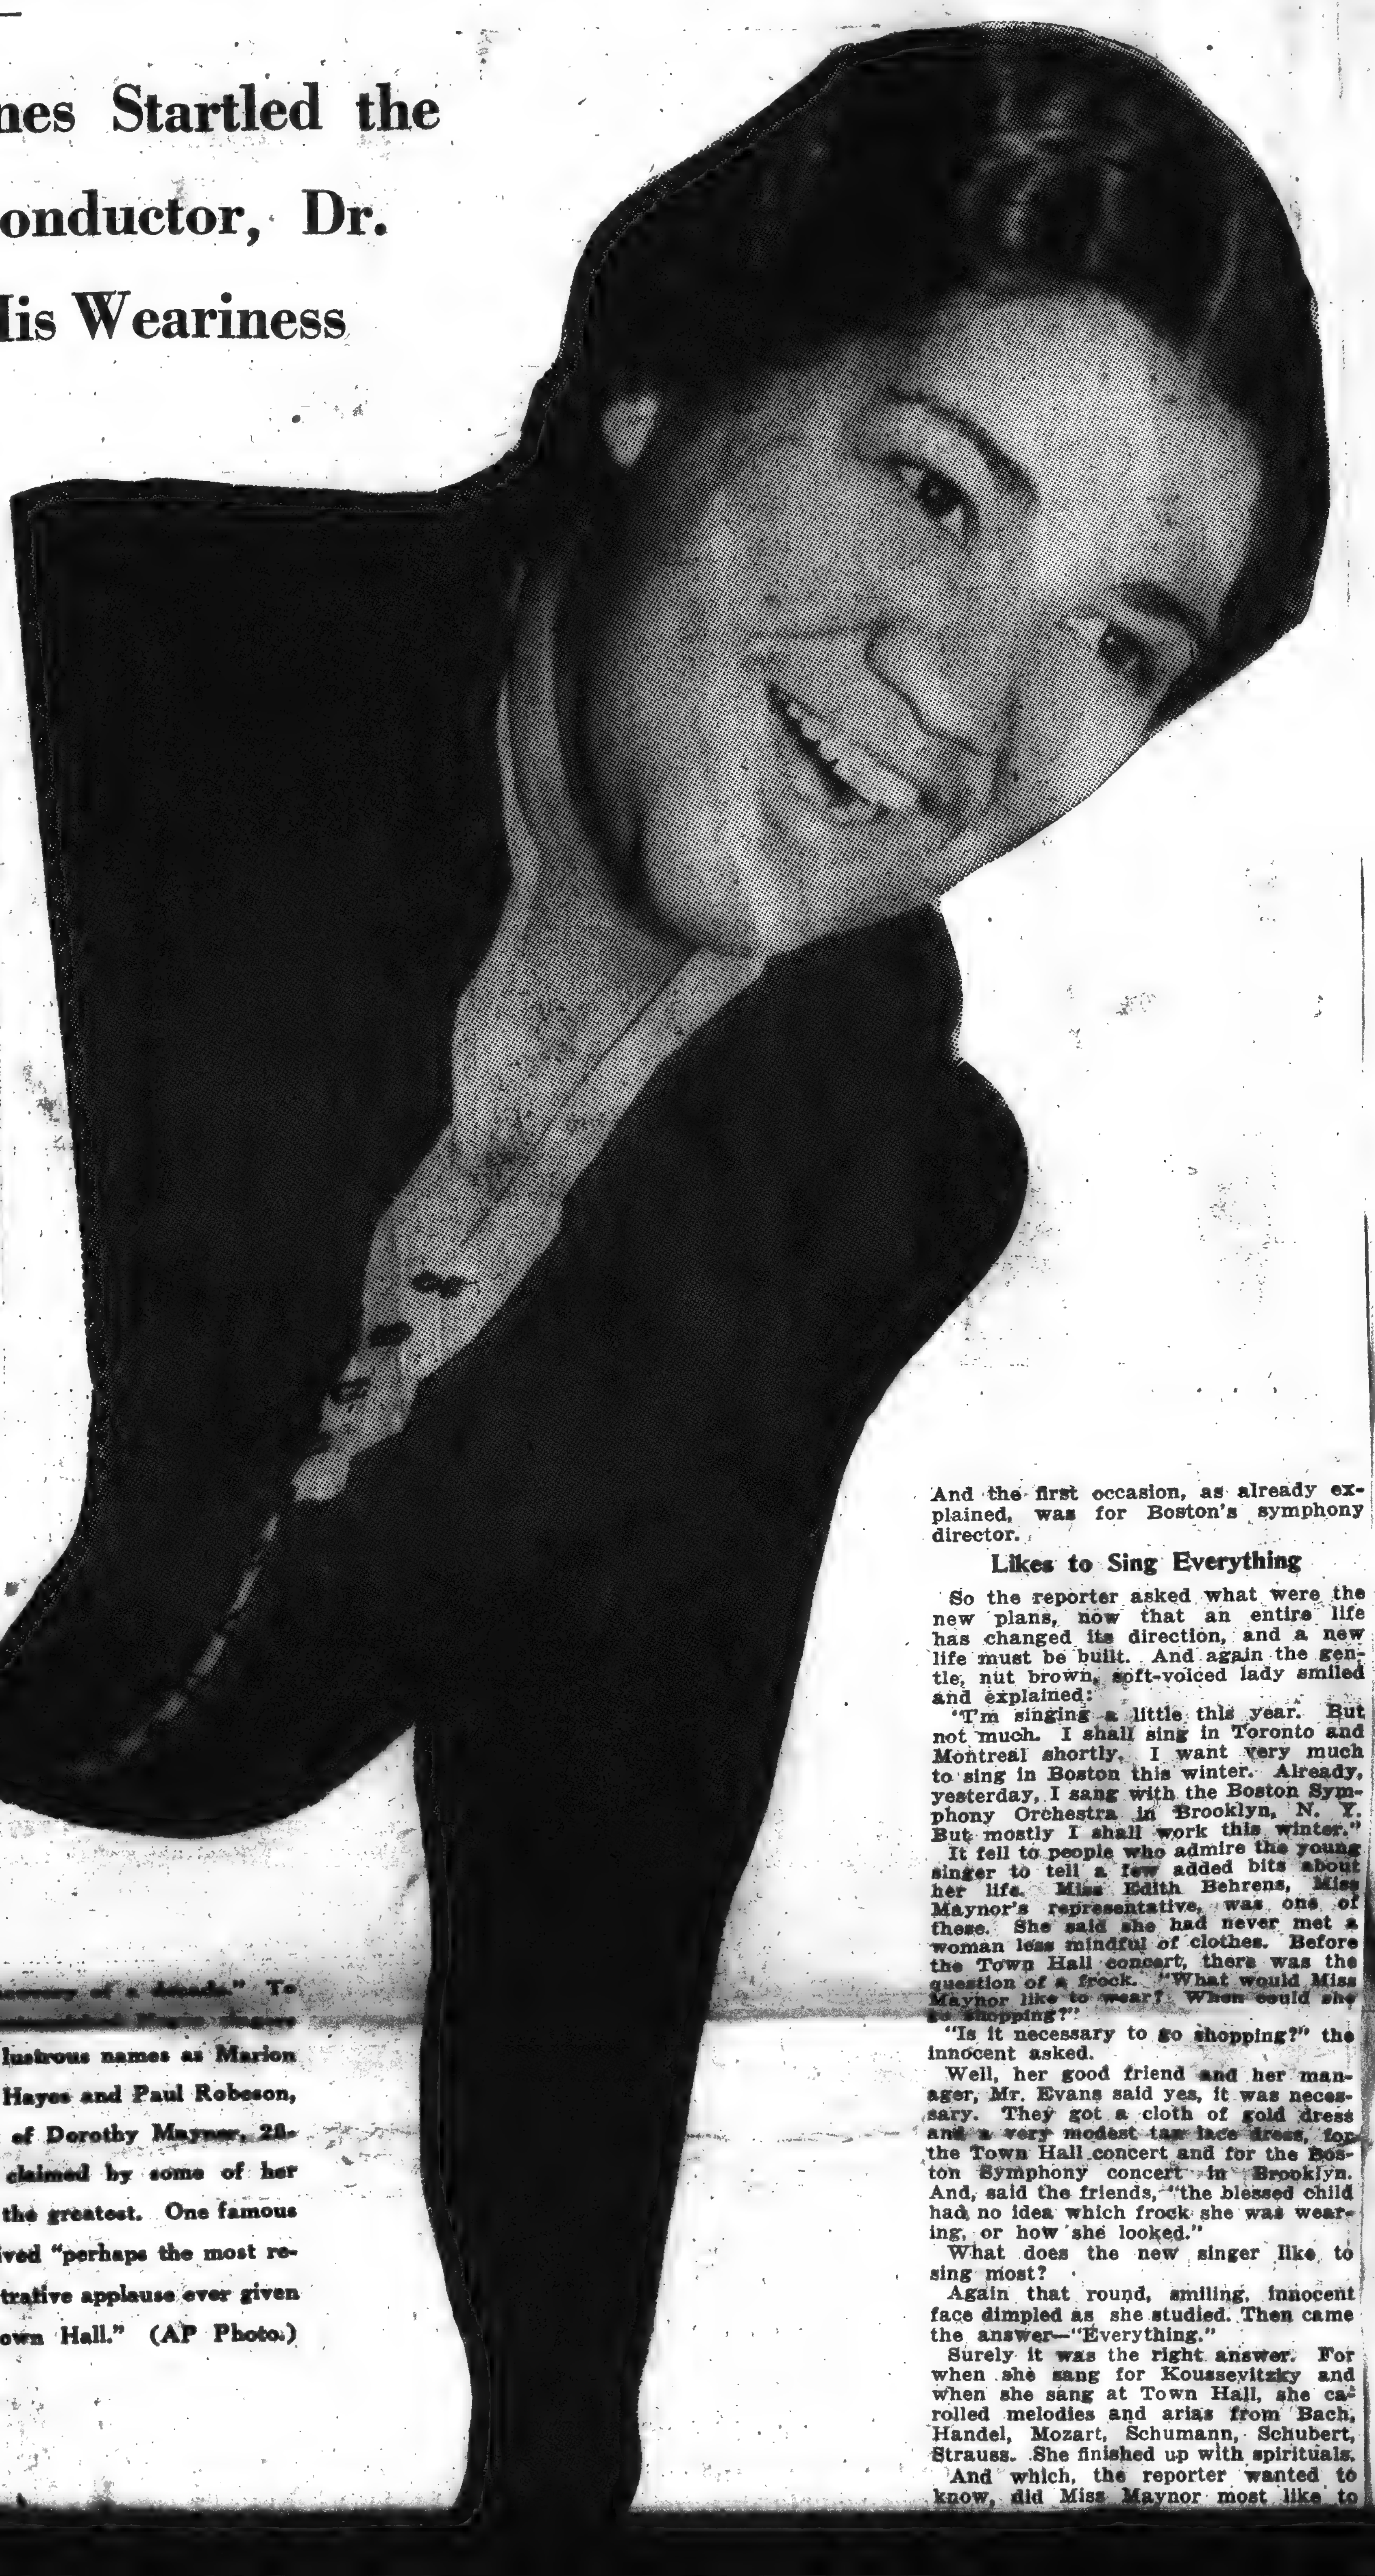
The World Must Listen!

The good doctor was hurried and over busy . . . Finally he said:

"Well, all right. I'll find a few moments for her some time tomorrow. But really, there are so many [illegible]

Next day the young singer presented herself. Dr. Koussevitzky had just finished rehearsing the bass viols. He was tired. He wished almost anything might happen except an audition. Perhaps Miss Maynor realized this. At any rate, shyly she stepped out into the great empty shell of the big, open air auditorium, and shyly she started to sing. She had hardly begun before Koussevitzky sat up. Halfway through her first song, he began to fidget. When she had finished, the great musician

Dorothy Maynor, sensational young Negro soprano, is shown with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This photo was taken just before her New York appearance with the orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky first recognized her talent when she sang for him at the Berkshire Festival last summer. (Soibelman Syndicate Photo.)



Hailed as the "Discovery of a decade." To [illegible] that includes such lustrous names as Marion Anderson, Roland Hayes and Paul Robeson, now is added that of Dorothy Maynor, 28-year-old soprano, claimed by some of her listeners as one of the greatest. One famous critic sad she received "perhaps the most resoundingly demonstrative applause ever given in New York's Town Hall." (AP Photo.)

And the first occasion, as already explained, was for Boston's symphony director.

Likes to Sing Everything

So the reporter asked what were the new plans, now that an entire life has changed its direction, and a new life must be built. And again the gentle, nut brown, soft-voiced lady smiled and explained:

'I'm singing a little this year. But not much. I shall sing in Toronto and Montreal shortly. I want very much to sing in Boston this winter. Already, yesterday, I sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn, N. Y. But mostly I shall work this winter."

It fell to people who admire the young singer to tell a few added bits about her life. Miss Edith Behrens, Miss Maynor's representative, was one of these. She said she had never met a woman less mindful of clothes. Before the Town Hall concert, there was the question of a frock. "What would Miss Maynor like to wear? When could she go shopping?"

"Is it necessary to go shopping?" the innocent asked.

Well, her good friend and her manager, Mr. Evans said yes, it was necessary. They got a cloth of gold dress and a very modest tan lace dress, for the Town Hall concert and for the Boston Symphony concert in Brooklyn. And, said the friends, "the blessed child had no idea which frock she was wearing, or how she looked."

What does the new singer like to sing most?

Again that round, smiling, innocent face dimpled as she studied. Then came the answer—"Everything."

Surely it was the right answer. For when she sang for Koussevitzky and when she sang at Town Hall, she carolled melodies and arias from Bach, Handel, Mozart, Schumann, Schubert, Strauss. She finished up with spirituals.

And which, the reporter wanted to know, did Miss Maynor most like to Curtis. [illegible] music."

Arrived in the Berkshires, Dorothy sang, one day, for Mrs. Brooks. That lady was impressed. . . . She made up her mind. . . . She sought out Dr. Koussevitzky. . . .

"You must hear this young person sing," she said.

The World Must Listen!

The good doctor was hurried and over busy . . . Finally he said:

"Well, all right. I'll find a few moments for her some time tomorrow. But really, there are so many things . . ."

Next day the young singer presented herself. Dr. Koussevitzky had just finished rehearsing the bass viols. He was tired. He wished almost anything might happen except an audition. Perhaps Miss Maynor realized this. At any rate, shyly she stepped out into the great empty shell of the big, open air auditorium, and shyly she started to sing. She had hardly begun before Koussevitzky sat up. Halfway through her first song, he began to fidget. When she had finished, the great musician was dancing up and down.

"My dear young lady," he exulted, "my dear young lady. The world must listen to that voice. The world must, the world shall and will listen."

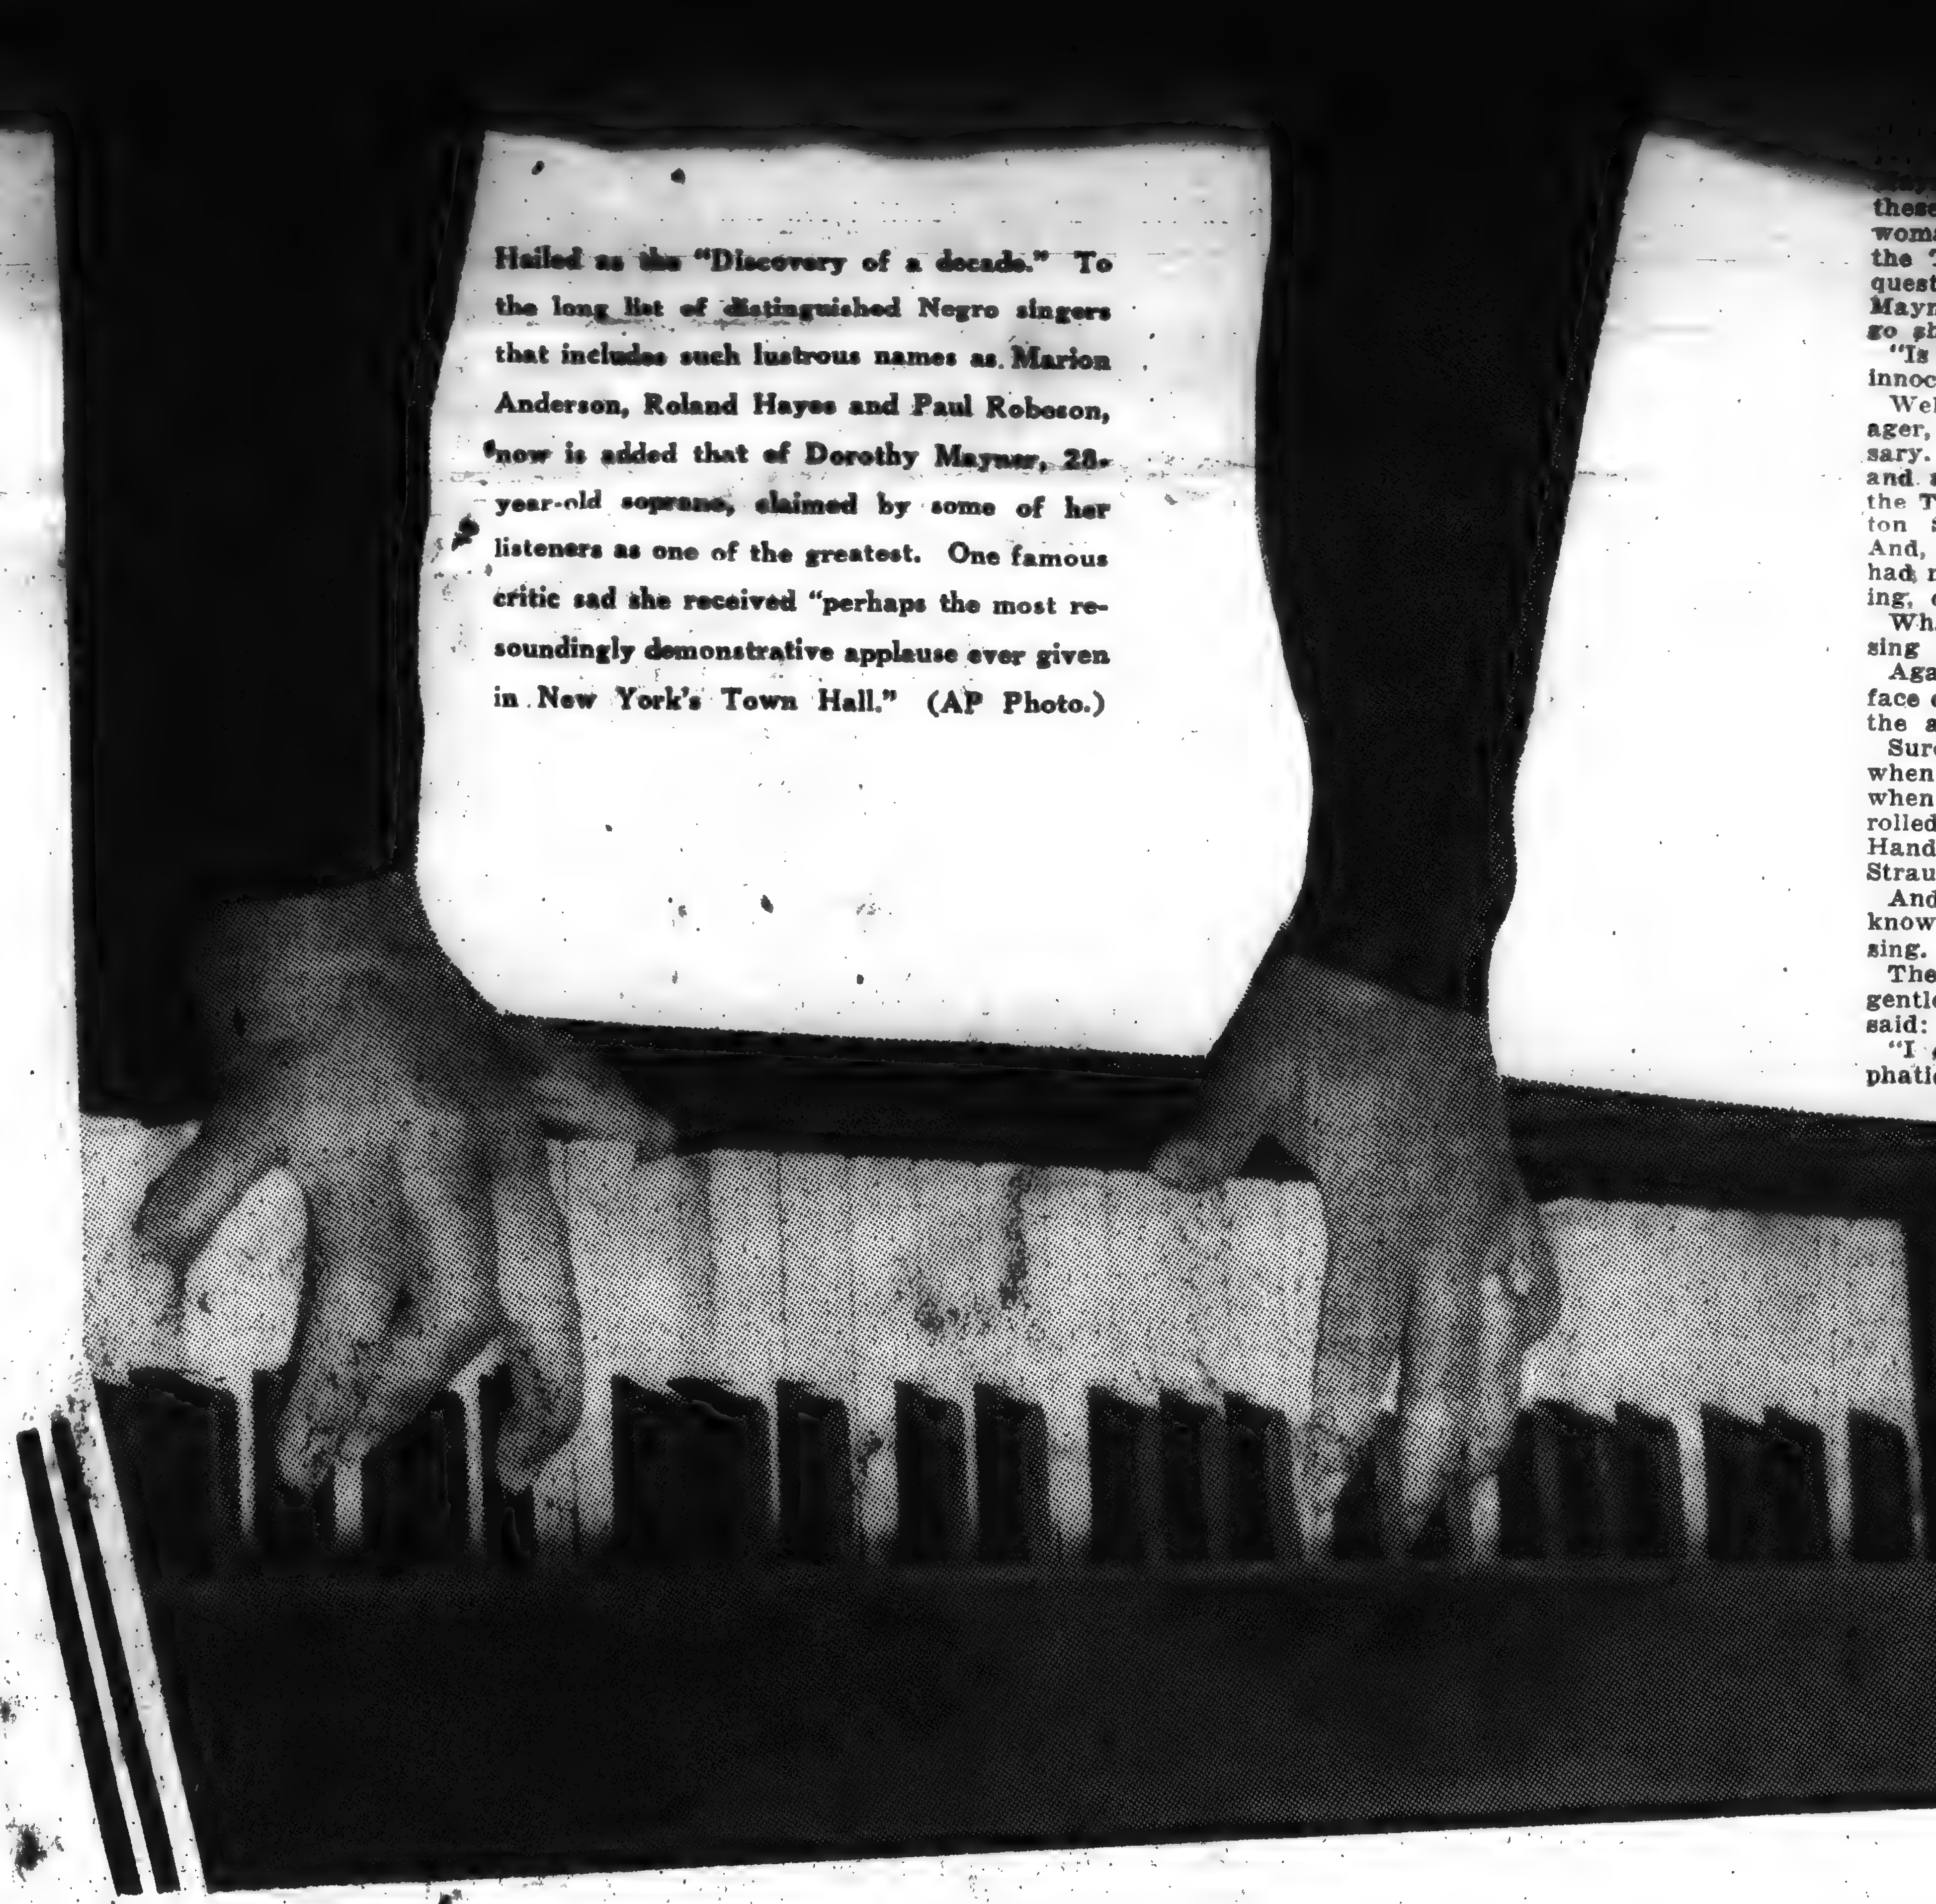
That was the beginning. Four months ago, in Massachusetts, the modest, simple young woman from Virginia faced life as a possible teacher of music . . . Today, all who know about music say hers is to be the career of a century . . . And so, the other night, after her concert in Town Hall, the congratulations began to pour in, the praise of the critics, the wonder of laymen that such a talent could have been unnoticed till the singer was 28 years old. And some of this the reporter said to the young woman.

She smiled. She has a lovely smile, soft and gentle and very, very merry. She sings so naturally, as though music is such an unconsidered birthright, that the miracle of her success seems, to her, not such a miracle. But, as she sat in the simple living room of the small, Seventh avenue apartment which she and her mother share, she mildly explained that this was not so.

No Work for Her

"I was terribly nervous at the concert," she said. "I prayed that I might do my best. I know of quite a few things in my performance which were not so good as I hope they will be later. But people seemed to like what I did. It makes me want to try hard, to reach the goal I have set myself."

She smiled. Her gentle eyes looked down. She is the most modest person in the world, and her shyness, her State of Virginia gentleness, are something new to the concert stage of New York. . . . And so the talk turned to what this young person does with her time, how she works, where she will sing, and what about her early life.



Hailed as the "Discovery of a decade." To the long list of distinguished Negro singers that includes such lustrous names as Marion Anderson, Roland Hayes and Paul Robeson, now is added that of Dorothy Maynor, 28-year-old soprano, claimed by some of her listeners as one of the greatest. One famous critic sad she received "perhaps the most resoundingly demonstrative applause ever given in New York's Town Hall." (AP Photo.)

"I work most of the time," she smiled, ever so merrily. "I get up at 5:30 or 6. Don't seem surprised. I have always got up early. I like to. I have a French lesson and a German lesson each morning. I have a music lesson. I practise by myself two or three hours. Then comes luncheon. Then afternoon and, days when I am not singing, I repeat the morning's programme—with the exception of the lessons."

The reporter said this seemed like rather a hard work day.

"No," said Miss Maynor, "it is not work for me. I love it. It is pleasure."

But now a few words about the singer's beginning. That was in Norfolk, Va., where she was one of the three children of a negro Baptist minister. Her education was at Hampton Institute. There she studied home economics, specializing in dietetics and dress designing. She was a member of the Hampton choir, and, for a year or two, she travelled with that choir, when they gave concerts about the country. But until this last summer, she never had sung alone in public.

[illegible] these. She said she had [illegible] woman less mindful of [illegible]. Before the Town Hall concert, there was the question of a frock. "What would Miss Maynor like to wear? When could she go shopping?"

"Is it necessary to go shopping?" the innocent asked.

Well, her good friend and her manager, Mr. Evans said yes, it was necessary. They got a cloth of gold dress and a very modest tan lace dress, for the Town Hall concert and for the Boston Symphony concert in Brooklyn. And, said the friends, "the blessed child had no idea which frock she was wearing, or how she looked."

What does the new singer like to sing most?

Again that round, smiling, innocent face dimpled as she studied. Then came the answer—"Everything."

Surely it was the right answer. For when she sang for Koussevitzky and when she sang at Town Hall, she carolled melodies and arias from Bach, Handel, Mozart, Schumann, Schubert, Strauss. She finished up with spirituals.

And which, the reporter wanted to know, did Miss Maynor most like to sing. . . .

The gentle face was lowered . . . gentle smile dimpled again. And she said:

"I don't think I have any very emphatic favorites. I reckon, perhaps, I like to sing best what I happen to be singing at the time. . . . So long as it's music, I'm happy, I reckon."

She said it with much gentle sincerity. And anyone who heard her must have been convinced it was just as she explained.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEWS
DEC 4 - 1939

MAINLY ABOUT MANHATTAN

By JOHN CHAPMAN.

If anybody is figuring on a benefit for poor little Finland, the perfect thing would be an all-Sibelius concert at Madison Square Garden. With Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony doing the music. . . . The Wine and Food Society's "tasting" of holiday punches last week turned up some noble numbers and a fine batch of recipes for subscribers. . . . Scientists report a vitamin in molasses will prevent hair from turning gray—but Denney Kenney thinks it will never get very far. Think, he says, how long it would take a barber to finish a haircut. . . . When Oscar Levant got married last week reporters sought to make sure of the identity of his bride, June Gale. They called two of Levant's fellow know-it-alls on Information Please—Franklin P. Adams and Clifton Fadiman. Mr. Adams and Mr. Fadiman said they didn't know from nothing . . . and failed to reward the inquirers with ten bucks and an encyclopedia.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS TRIBUNE
DEC 4 - 1939

Symphony Player Addresses Club

Tracing the development of present symphony orchestra, Boaz Piller of Boston, for 23 years a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, where he plays the contra-bassoon, last night addressed members of the Sunday Evening Club meeting in the Central Congregational Church, Newtonville. Members of the Student Group of the Old South Church, Boston, were guests.

Born at The Hague on August 26, 1887, the speaker first played in The Hague Symphony Orchestra. He stated that documentary evidence proves that as early as the 14th century there were symphony orchestras, although they were unbalanced groups comprising strings and some woodwind instruments, the latter mostly obsolete today. Bach directed the nearest thing to the present day symphony orchestra, the speaker said.

To Berlioz, a Frenchman, is attributed present day orchestration with the Russian composer Igor Stravinsky, now lecturing at Harvard, going to the outmost extremes in modern orchestration.

Introduced by Philip Margolin, president, Mr. Pilier concluded his talk by recounting amusing experiences of a symphony player. Guests included another member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Norbert Rene Lauga, violinist.

On Sunday night, Dec. 17, the speaker will be Prof. Albert Schaefer of Boston, professor of business law at Massachusetts Institute of Technology. He will discuss "Legal Aspects of Marriage."

THIS CLIPPING FROM MILWAUKEE, WIS.
POST
DEC 5 - 1939

'Paganini of Saxophone' to Be Heard Here

Sigurd Rascher, professor of music, member of the Royal Conservatory of Denmark, Copenhagen, and saxophonist par excellence, will perform for local audiences on Thursday night at the Athenaeum.

His first American appearance was made on Oct. 21 as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra, the first saxophone soloist in all the 58 years of the orchestra's existence. On Nov. 12 he appeared with the New York Philharmonic orchestra. Eastern critics hailed him as the "Paganini" of his instrument.

Appearing here under the sponsorship of Miss Ida Schroeder, Rascher will offer the following program:

Sonata	Handel
Prelude to Cantata 12	J. S. Bach
Sarabande and Tamburin	J. M. Leclair
Waltz, C sharp minor	Chopin
Andaluza	DeFalla
Minstrels	Debussy
Feux d'Artifice	Debussy
La Fille aux Cheveux de Lin	Debussy
March	Prokofieff
Aus den Bergen	Kaun
Nature Suite	Freda Swain
Sonatine	Wolfgang Jacobi

113

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

DEC 4 - 1939

Music:

Stravinsky Conducts All-Stravinsky Program

By Carl E. Lindstrom

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston—Igor Stravinsky, whose name ranks among the greatest living composers—and some will not hesitate to give him topmost place—appeared Saturday night in Symphony Hall as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was an all-Stravinsky program which in its parts represented all the significant phases of a career that has been notable for its changes of direction.

There were: "Jeu de Cartes" (Card Game Ballet in Three Deals) the Capriccio for Orchestra with piano solo, the Petrouchka Suite and finally the "Symphonies de Psaumes." The Cecilia Society Chorus, whose director is Arthur Fiedler, collaborated in the last work and Jesus Maria Sanroma was at the piano for the Capriccio.

Stravinsky was greeted with the utmost cordiality, not to say enthusiasm. When he first appeared, the entire orchestra arose to greet him and after every number the players, to a man, applauded admiringly as though they themselves had had nothing to do with the performance. It was quite obvious that the respect for him was tremendous, either because of his power as a composer or because of his conductorial ability. Perhaps the former, because Stravinsky, though he has authority with the baton, would probably never have built an extraordinary reputation solely as a director.

In fact, at one point in the Petrouchka Suite, he gave up conducting entirely and stood passively watching the orchestra. It was not so much in the proud satisfaction that Koussevitzky will upon occasion give the orchestra its head, but in pure astonishment at the sweep and power that the Boston players can develop by spontaneous combustion, as it were.

* * *

He is short, bald, broad-shouldered and moves nimbly. The music engrosses him and one must think of him as the creative artist rather than as the re-creative agent. For him the audience does not exist. That is unlike Koussevitzky who, though they are unaware of it, plays upon his listeners as he does upon the orchestra.

And what does a solid evening of Stravinsky's music sound like? Before deciding, two factors must be taken into consideration: That it was instrumented by an orchestra whose virtuosity is such that it cannot but speak with a beguiling voice; secondly, that Symphony Hall was populated by a wholly sympathetic audience.

Stravinsky in the length and breadth of this program revealed himself as a persuasive advocate, reasonable, inventive, artistic and compelling. He left the impression of a salesman of excellent manners, hortatory gifts and unimpeachable sincerity.

There was no feeling of exaltation, no afterglow of spiritual experience. Even the "Symphonie de Psaumes," whose very text has mystical implications, was impressive chiefly for its ingenuity. It was the last number on the program and left your reviewer somewhat disappointed, for he has been moved by it in the past. The "Symphonie" is the particular property of the Boston Orchestra, having been composed for and dedicated to that body on the occasion of its 50th anniversary celebration a few years ago.

* * *

A large part of the program was devoted to Stravinsky's ballet music, the early "Petrouchka" and the recent "Jeu de Cartes" which was composed for the American Ballet to choreography by George Balanchine and was first presented at the Metropolitan Opera House April 27, 1937, with the composer conducting.

Both the early and the late excerpts are intrinsically interesting but that has been said before. Something ought to be done about music and the ballet in order to make a lady out of the latter. Either you have dancing to music so execrable and so execrably performed that the fastidious cannot help but suffer, or else you have worthy music, worthily performed and not a dancer in sight. This is merely to say that "Jeu de Cartes" and "Petrouchka" end to end are pretty tiresome—but of course you can always watch the tympanist, or one of the other virtuosi. For in ballet scores, as with so much chamber music, the players have most of the fun.

* * *

The bright spot of the evening came later and worked the audience into such a pitch of enthusiasm that there came near being no intermission. There are all kinds of applause, even several varieties of heavy applause, but only once in a great while is to be encountered that type whose actual pitch is so high and whose vibrations are so rapid that it may truly be called deafening. It literally assaults the ear.

This din was set up by the performance of Jesus Maria Sanroma at the solo piano in Stravinsky's ever so successful Capriccio. Sanroma was the man who first played it in this country after the composer himself had won many laurels with it abroad. Sanroma was the man, too, who brought down the house with MacDowell's D minor piano Concerto at Bushnell Memorial not long ago. Everyone who was there will remember it vividly.

Sanroma polished off the Capriccio with characteristic brilliance. There was a score on the music rack in front of him but the only eyes that followed it were those of the page turner who watched the notes religiously. Sanroma executed the most bewildering complexities without once taking his gaze from Stravinsky, who was conducting over behind the piano.

This is merely a detail. Actually Sanroma is the only orchestral pianist it has been my fortune to hear. That doesn't mean that he draws orchestral sonorities or their imitations from the piano, but that he has a marvelous intuition for the relationship between piano timbres and the whole orchestral prism. He is a part of the orchestra. He turned an especially expressive phrase with an elegant rubato and yet landed with the baton on the next beat. Stravinsky's enjoyment of it was almost a palpable thing. The composer clapped the pianist on the back when it was over and declined to share in the ovation that followed.

The "Symphonie" is worthy of more discussion than space allows. The Cecilia Society joined forces with the strangely reduced orchestra for this major offering. The higher strings are not used at all, the basses and cellos being arranged across the front of the stage. There are no clarinets, but four flutes and a piccolo; also four trumpets including a high trumpet in D.

The first and last sections proved the most persuasive, especially the last wherein the iterative figures on the tympani, which Stravinsky kept more subdued than usual, in conjunction with the sustained voices invoked an awesome spirit that was quietly ecstatic. The singers were responsive and effected an artistic partnership with the orchestra.

DECEMBER 5, 1939

C. S. Monitor

Barer Soloist With Symphony

Bliss Leads Suite From His Ballet

The second Monday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's current season, conducted, for the greater part, by Dr. Koussevitzky, offered two elements of novelty. There were, from England, three dances from Arthur Bliss's ballet, "Checkmate," which the composer conducted; and, from Russia, via Germany, the pianist Simon Barer, who was heard in Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto.

Schumann's B flat Symphony (No. 1) occupied the second half of this shrewdly made program, in which (for an average audience) the sturdy dissonances of Bliss' music found their antidote in the harmoniously lush and languorously elegant romanticism of Rachmaninoff, to which in turn, Schumann's more youthful, vernal, and optimistic romanticism brought welcome contrast.

Of Mr. Bliss' ballet music this audience was permitted to hear only half as many excerpts as had recently been offered to New York audiences by the Philharmonic Society. Originally performed as a ballet in Paris by an English company during the Exposition Internationale of 1937, the music (to risk a critical cliché) appears at a disadvantage in concert form. The composer undoubtedly has selected the portions of his score that best stood separation from the action of this ballet of a chess game, yet their form at times is weakened by features that seem pointless or repetitious to ears unaided by the testimony of the eyes.

Yet this music (Dance of the Four Knights; Entry of the Black Queen; Finale—Checkmate) held the interest, partly by its strong and sharply defined characterization of the participating characters and its intense and even poignant expression of their symbolic drama, partly by the inherent qualities of the score itself. Its evidently well-assimilated idiom, often uncompromisingly dissonant harmonically and untraditional in its melodic progress (whose intervals often reflect the conventional moves of the various chessmen), effectively served its purpose. The bounding vigor of the knights, the sinister majesty of the Black Queen, the pathetic feebleness of the doomed Red King, were painted with a sure hand. The audience expressed its approval with evident cordiality.

Mr. Barer, too, by his agile, vigorous, and self-assured performance of Rachmaninoff's Concerto, won the plaudits of his hearers. His command of the beauties of piano tone, though ample, was employed without great subtlety, however; and the graces of his phrasing were of a rather conventional pianistic sort, and occasionally false to the normal punctuation of the music. Yet, in general, Mr. Barer is a highly competent exponent of the romantic school. S. S.

Herald Dec 5, 1939

MUSIC

MONDAY SYMPHONY

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The second concert in the subsidiary series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting was given last night in Symphony Hall. Simon Barer, pianist, was the soloist. The guest conductor in the opening number was Arthur Bliss, composer. The program was as follows:

Three Dances from the Ballet, "Checkmate" .... Bliss
Piano Concerto No. 2 in C minor Op. 18 Rachmaninoff
Symphony No. 1 in B flat Op. 38 Schumann

If we had not Stravinsky's witty and astringent ballet music still ringing in our ears from the week-end concerts, perhaps we should have found Mr. Bliss' suite wholly admirable. It is true that we were given a chance to hear only a portion of the orchestral suite, which in turn was excerpted from the ballet. Possibly the more extended version would have enabled us to have appreciated the composer's aims and his success in achieving them. As it is, we found these dances only moderately effective. Induced by the account in the program notes, we wanted to see something of the stage action.

Bliss' music to "Checkmate" was hailed by the English critics as altogether remarkable. They found in it both the stately nature of the game of chess and the fierceness of the symbolic representation of relentless human cruelty, a lesson the ballet sought to convey. It is hard for us, however, to see more in these three dances than good music for a stage production. With the program in hand we can see excellent opportunities for dramatic dancing. But really great ballet music—and this is dangerous ground for controversy—should be independent of program in the long run, as we hear it in concerts. Of such are the Stravinsky ballets and Ravel's, Falla's "Tricorne" and the Symphonic Dances and "St. Francis" of Hindemith. Just short of that is Bliss' "Checkmate," as far as can be judged from the composer's conducting of the three numbers for the first time in Boston last night.

The Rachmaninoff Second Piano Concerto is, in these days, almost foolproof. A thoroughly competent pianist, and such obviously is Mr. Barer, can always manage to bring down the house. Mr. Koussevitzky gave him a rich, at times rather too rich, orchestral support. Mr. Barer appeared to seek for brilliance, the conductor for romantic poetry; and each was quite capable of obtaining his aim. The trouble is that two aims should not be courted in one performance. The result, last night at any rate, was not completely satisfying.

It thus came about that we fell back for the keenest pleasure of the concert on a splendid performance of Schumann's "Spring" Symphony. We had heard this lovely work, which only requires an understanding interpretation to make its original qualities stand out, eloquently realized at one of the Friday concerts. It was beautifully played again last night.

The concert will be repeated this afternoon. The third concerts in this series will be given on Jan. 1 and 2.

BLISS DIRECTS THE SYMPHONY

Dec. 5, 1939 Post

English Composer's Ballet Heard—Barer in Debut

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Clearly it is Dr. Koussevitzky's wise intention to see to it that the Symphony Concerts of Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon have an interest and importance of their own. Only one number on the programme of last evening's concert, namely Schumann's First Symphony, was an inheritance from the longer series, and the first part of the evening was rich in incident.

To begin with, Arthur Bliss, eminent English composer, made his first official appearance in Boston, conducting three numbers from his ballet, "Checkmate," composed for the Paris Exposition of 1937. After that, Simon Barer, Russian pianist of rising reputation, made his Boston debut in a performance of Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto.

It was a curious coincidence that brought Mr. Stravinsky, leading his ballet based on a poker game and Mr. Bliss, directing part of his ballet, inspired by a game of chess, in two successive pairs of Symphony Concerts. With the Stravinsky "Jeu de Cartes" so freshly in mind, comparisons were unavoidable, and they might be epitomized thus: Whereas the Russian is somehow positive in his negation, the Britisher, to continue the paradox, is negative in his positiveness. It is only fair to add that both works need the stage action which the Symphony Hall performances denied them.

Rachmaninoff's Concerto, essentially an orchestral piece with obligato piano part, is not a particularly good work by which to judge the powers of a new pianist. Mr. Barer plainly has a brilliant technical equipment and he plays musically. Yet for some reason, the whole performance seemed curiously restrained and subdued. Even the final apotheosis was not as enkindling as it has been on certain other occasions. However, there was enough excitement engendered to produce a storm of applause.

114

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NORFOLK, VA.
VIRGINIAN PILOT

DEC 6 - 1939

Dorothy Maynor
From the New Yorker

(Editor's Note—The following article from the New Yorker of November 18 appeared, as the text shows, before the recent concert in New York's Town Hall of this Norfolk-born soprano.)

The great discovery of the new musical season is undoubtedly Dorothy Maynor, the Negro soprano. Season, hell! Let's make her the discovery of the decade. Miss Maynor is the protegee of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony. It's a matter of public record that the first time she sang for him, last August, he called her "a native Flagstad." After giving him plenty of time to cool off, a friend of his recently asked him if he still meant it, and he cried heatedly, "I mean more than that!" And if you don't believe Koussevitzky, maybe you'll believe the Times: "One of the outstanding voices of the day." Anyway, most of the musical folk we know think that her debut, which takes place this Sunday evening, will be an event comparable to the debuts of Galli-Curci and Heifetz. Town Hall has been sold out for more than a week, and you couldn't get a seat now for love or money.

Miss Maynor was absolutely unknown last August when she turned up at the Berkshire Musical Festival, an annual outdoor affair held near Stockbridge. She had come to hear the music, and to try her luck at getting an audition with Koussevitzky. This was arranged for her by one of the patronesses of the festival, and she sang one afternoon after a concert. The conductor jumped up and down, shouting, "It is a miracle! It is a musical revelation! The world must hear her!" This happened to be the day before a picnic which Koussevitzky was giving for his men, and he insisted that she sing for them. On less than 24 hours' notice, Miss Maynor did a little program of German Leider, Negro spirituals, and the "Ho-Yo-To-Ho!" from Wagner's "Walkure." It was kind of a tough job, since she had never sung solo in public and her audience was made up of professional musicians, with a sprinkling of critics; but she did so satisfactorily that the next thing she knew, she was making records with the Boston Symphony.

Miss Maynor is 28. She's very short, very buxom, very dark, and excruciatingly modest. She told us (speaking with no trace of a Southern accent) that her reactions when the heavens opened last August were "fear and daze." "I didn't sleep for three nights," she added. She has been training only three years for solo work, but her musical background is extensive. She was born in Norfolk, Va., where her father, now dead, was a Methodist minister. When she was 14, she entered Hampton Institute, near Norfolk. Four years later, in 1929, she toured Europe as a member of the Institute's famous choir. After Hampton, she attended the Westminster Coir School in Princeton, planning eventually to become a voice teacher. Her friends kept urging her to study for concert work, however, and in 1936 she came to New York to do it; first she studied with Wilfred Klamroth, then with John Alan Haughton, who is still her teacher.

She and her mother have a small apartment on Seventh avenue, near 114th street, where, at the moment, she is working like a dog. "It has all come so suddenly that I must make every moment count," she told us. She's up at 6, does two hours of memorizing, then an hour of French and an hour of German. Then she has a lesson, lunches, takes a walk in Central Park, and returns to her apartment for an afternoon of study almost as concentrated as the morning's.

We asked if she felt nervous about her debut, and she said, "Well, you can say I'm anxious. You can say I'm hoping and praying I'll prove acceptable." At this point, her modesty almost floored the interviewer completely. "You can say," she said, "that I hope I'll be able to give the best interpretations I'll be able to give."

THIS CLIPPING FROM OTTAWA, CAN.
CITIZEN

DEC 9 - 1939

THIS CONDUCTOR GIVES AMERICAN A FAIR HEARING

According to Francis D. Perkins, music editor of the New York Herald-Tribune, American composers have had fair treatment from Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in the fifteen years he has conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There have been 149 performances of 119 works by American composers. Francis Perkins comments: "This total is not far below the number of all the American compositions played by the orchestra in its previous forty-three seasons, 137 works by forty-seven composers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CALDWELL, N.J.
PROGRESS
12/8/39

Symphony Orchestra In Montclair Soon

The entire Boston Symphony Orchestra of 110 musicians, with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, will appear at the Montclair High School January 10. This is an extra event in connection with the twentieth anniversary season of the Unity Concert Course of Montclair and vicinity. Tickets may be secured at the office, 67 Church street, Montclair.

This orchestra has appeared only in certain university towns and other large cities of the east. Recently in Harper's magazine the Boston Symphony was called "the greatest orchestra in the world."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN

DEC 8 - 1939

MAX FIEDLER DIES; NOTED CONDUCTOR

Father of Phila. Manufacturer Succumbs in Stockholm

Max Fiedler, internationally-known musical conductor, died in Stockholm, Sweden, last Saturday, it became known here today.

Word of his death was received by his son, also named Max, vice president of the Fiedler-Sellers Corporation, subsidiary of William Sellers & Co., machine tool manufacturers, 1600 Hamilton st.

The elder Fiedler, who would have been 81 in January, conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1908 to 1912. He was on the podium when the orchestra made a guest appearance here at the Academy of Music on November 8, 1909, with Sergei Rachmaninoff, pianist, as soloist.

The conductor was born in Zittau, Saxony, and first gained attention as a pianist at the age of ten. After being graduated from the Conservatory of Leipzig in 1880, he went to Hamburg, later to Boston, returning to Germany in 1916.

His son, Max, lives in Media, and is a former son-in-law of the late Hugo Stinnes, German industrial magnate. Surviving also are another son, William, musical director of Antioch College, Yellow Springs, O., and a daughter, May, of Copenhagen.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE

DEC 9 - 1939

MISCELLANEOUS items:

Speaking of Hollywood singers: Michael Barllett, the tenor, was christened "Edwin Alonzo" but his pals at Hotchkiss school, called him plain "Mike." Later, when he was at Princeton, he became "Michael," the name by which he is known to radio and movie fans.

In Rochester Monday night the Boston Symphony will present "Symphony No. 3," by Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School. As a novelty Serge Koussevitzky will introduce Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," a children's orchestra fairy tale which we heard for the first time in Cleveland this fall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS

DEC 9 - 1939

SERGE Koussevitzky, who makes his third Chicago appearance conducting the Boston Symphony next Wednesday, was born in a small provincial town in Russia and at 14 ran away from home to study in the Philharmonic school in Moscow, where no position was open to him save as contrabassist. His first attempts at conducting were made at Berlin, whence he transferred them to Moscow and St. Petersburg. Eventually he chartered a steamer to take his orchestra on tour through the Volga basin.

After the revolution Koussevitzky conducted for a while under government subsidy, but soon left Russia for Paris, where his concerts became famous. He was appointed to Boston in 1924.

Globe—Dec [illegible]

WHET THEIR TEETH

"Youth," says a French proverb, "has the imagination to know when a thing is great." Those who make the programs of the Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall might have adopted that for their motto and they could hardly have done better: Mozart, Dvorak, Wagner, Sibelius: classic, romantic and classic modern, the children devour them. Not asked to swallow the whole ration at one gulp, previous instruction is given by radio and brief talks are interspersed during the concerts.

Talking down, writing down, thinking down to the supposed level of an audience is the first infirmity of mediocre minds. It is an insult to maturity, but to childhood it is an outrage. For it is in childhood that we are best able—in the language of the adage "pour saisir toutes les grandes choses"—to seize upon forms of greatness.

The Abbe Dimnet in his life of "The Bronte Sisters" drives home this spike with the hammer of a veteran teacher: that the child of nine has a capacity of mind and imagination which he may never have again, a capacity akin to genius, since genius is keeping the wonder of childhood with the intellect of maturity. If we were as bright, his point is, at thirty as we are at ten, we would be a race of world-beaters. Remember the omnivorous voracity with which you devoured books, good, bad, indifferent, in your adolescence: what wouldn't you give to be able to read with such gusto now?

Old Patrick Bronte (or, as some called him "Prunty") allowed no children's books, no pap, no chalk-and-water, no tripe to come into that grim stone parsonage above Haworth Church on the moor's edge. The imaginations of his four eaglets were nourished on the classics, on Dante, Milton, the Bible. Charlotte at the age of eleven could discuss Parliamentary affairs with him and, in their twenties, his three daughters were scaling the ramparts of the position they now occupy in English letters.

This illustration is in italic. But to verify the principle no one need go outside the lower case type of his own experience. Ask yourself: Have you not, between the ages of nine and nineteen, not once only but many times, in reading, in a theatre, in hearing music, in listening to the talk of elders, or in the presence of some vivid personality —have you not been brought up standing by a sudden perception that struck like a pang to the heart, and you thought: "Here is greatness! This is what it is to be a man. Now I know why I am living." In fact, all who reach intellectual adulthood know that it was in some such moment, or moments, that the growth began. You suddenly, without effort, almost without thought, on a flash of divination identified some form of excellence outside yourself with an answering quality inside yourself. Then if children are fed nothing but easy textbooks (as the present fad is) when, where, how shall they make these assignations with greatness?

Such encounter goes deeper than intellect. It comes to the unschooled, to the underprivileged. It is an affair of the spirit. Like October's foliage color it touches alike the mountain oaks and the maple in a slum alley. So let us mind our manners in the presence of this manifestation of the divinity in common clay. Let us not water down the wine and mash the food into a pulp for children. Let them whet their teeth and their appetites on tough chewing. "It does not matter so much whether children understand—understanding will come later—if the intelligence is excited." The genuine article given, and given pure, may in many, and in some it will germinate and be a live force. One cannot tell how a young imagination will work; only, that work it will. When the wine is good there is no need to preach over the liquor.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BLOOMFIELD, N. J.
Weekly
Independent Press
DEC 8 - 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GLEN RIDGE, N. J.
WEEKLY PAPER

DEC 8 - 1939

Boston Symphony In 59th Season, To Play in Montclair

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY IS IN 16TH YEAR AS CONDUCTOR OF OUTSTANDING ORCHESTRA.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it appears at the Monday High School on Wednesday evening, January 10th, as the special event in the Unity Concert Course in Montclair, opened this autumn the 59th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The great orchestra this year retains its illustrious peronnel without notable change. This season will be the 16th of Koussevitzky in America—the longest uninterrupted tenure of any conductor.

Koussevitzky's seasons have been a continuous quest for current scores of importance in Europe and America, and that beauty and vitality in the presentation of classics which may be obtained only by a leader to whom the past is at every instant a living art.

In the New York Times, Olin Downes recently summed up this great conducotr's ability in this fushion: "Koussevitzky's originality, enterprise in program making, his rare gifts as an interpreter, the quality of the wonderful orchestra, which he has not only developed technically to a fine edge of virtuosity, but endowed with a sensibility and tone quality, has set this famous organization apart from any other, whenever and wherever it plays."

Tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert are on sale at the Unity Institute office, 67 Church street, Montclair. Telephone Montclair 2-6770.

Herald

MUSIC

Dec 9, 1939

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The eighth regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Mozart......Symphony in C major K. 338
Mahler
Finale, adagio, from Symphony No. 9
Schubert......Symphony No. 7 in C major

We had heard not much more than a month ago this delightful Mozart symphony at the hands of the New York Philharmonic, and for the gratification of local pride it can be said that yesterday's was considerably the better performance. Dr. Koussevitzky's marvelous ear for sonorities in orchestral tone is the answer, for Mozart's music does not admit of much liberty with tempo and phrasing. Sentimental phrasing and uneven tempi stand out with distressing effect in both Mozart and Haydn. Therefore, of two good prformancs the one to be preferred is that where the tone seems just right, not too refined on the one hand and not too coarse on the other.

This symphony has a decided whiff of the opera about it, except for the delicate, purely instrumental andante. Possibly Mozart was subconsciously boiling the pot from which "Don Giovanni" was to emerge. The finale, for example, sparkles and bubbles as irresistibly as the Don's champagne song. If Mr. Mould, the undertaker in "Martin Chuzzlewit," had ever need of mutes for his funeral processions, he could have found no richer field for them than a Boston Symphony audience during the performance of a comic masterpiece. Perhaps yesterday they were rehearsing for Mahler on the subject of death.

We do not mean to be flippant about the finale of Mahler's ninth Symphony, for it contains some of the noblest pages he ever wrote. It provides, aside from its emotional gloom, the most curious contrast between lushness and austerity. At one time you feel that romanticism can go no further; at another that Mahler is seeking the sparse quality of, say, Debussy's "St. Sebastian" music or Stravinsky's "Persephone."

While admiring the sincerity and eloquence of much of this movement, it is fair to criticize the ending. On paper it is a reasonable use of the principle of augmentation. The theme, which we have heard all along, is stretched out over greater and greater lengths until it disappears. Listening to it in the concert hall it is interminable. At the end of the whole symphony, in fact, it is scarcely to be endured. Is it unjust to say that this is just as pretentious writing as when another composer will pound out a peroration at the top of the orchestra's lungs?

The performances were admirable yesterday. The strings sounded superbly in the Mahler, where they have no simple task to do. Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of Schubert's familiar and lovable symphony was beautifully carried out. The concert as a whole was intended to commemorate the greatness of Vienna's musical past. Ernst Krenek, in his recent book, "Music Here and Now," asserts that real symphonies have only been written in Vienna and under Hapsburg domination! He could have pointed to this program as convincing proof of his theory.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra travels to the west. The concerts of Dec. 22 and 23 offer Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12, Lopatnikoff's Symphony No. 2 (for the first time) and Beethoven's Piano Concerto in G major No. 4 (Rudolf Serkin, soloist).

Globe

MUSIC

Dec 9, 1939

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Music having associations of Vienna was chosen by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for the Boston Symphony concerts this week—the C major Symphony, No. 34 (K. 338), by Mozart; the adagio finale from Gustav Mahler's Ninth Symphony, and the C major Symphony "of heavenly length" by Schubert.

Actually but the last of these three was born in Vienna—an edition of Grove's dictionary refers to Schubert as "the one great composer native to Vienna." Schubert spent all of his pitifully few years in the once fabulous center of art; Mozart and Mahler made part of their careers there, and both died at Vienna.

In pre-Hitler days, all good musicians wanted to go to Vienna, just as all good Americans aspired to visit Paris. Vienna was a shining star in the artist's firmament. One remembers, still with considerable heat, of what some English novelist said in a radio broadcast, about Vienna and the Viennese. Incidentally the name of the novelist has gone from memory, but his argument was that the Viennese deliberately cashed in upon their world-wide reputation as a haven of cordial feeling.

That is a wicked thought, not to be believed even if it was true. Now that a barbaric twilight has settled over Europe, Vienna is only a City of Memories. Thus we can afford to cherish whatever illusions we may have concerning the former stronghold of the Hapsburgs and the waltz.

The Mozart Symphony heard at Symphony Hall this week is not so familiar to most concert-goers as the G minor, the E-flat and the "Jupiter," the great trinity Mozart created later in his life. It is, however, one of his best, cheerful, typically elegant and distinctive in all three of its movements. At the risk of heresy, this reviewer admits he prefers the work to the Jupiter. Dr. Koussevitzky performed it superbly, with a reduced orchestra.

There are two sides to the question of performing isolated movements from symphonies; as a general practice it is not to be recommended. Few would pass by the pleasure of listening to the great Schubert Symphony, yet could not that masterpiece, presented at the Symphony concerts only last April, have been postponed so that all of Mahler's Ninth might be played?

Mahler's music cannot be discussed logically or calmly. Either you are emotionally stirred or you are bored. Though divorced from its context, the sublime finale made its effect yesterday. A spiritual affinity exists between the Ninth Symphony and Mahler's later, perhaps greatest, composition, "The Song of the Earth." Each is "other-worldly," the voiced emotion of a tired man who welcomed an end of life, music of a transcendental radiance akin in more respects than that of mood to the last quartets and piano sonatas of Beethoven.

Dr. Koussevitzky's mettlesome presentation of the Schubert Symphony, a score that in the past has not always brought out his genius as interpreter, was the best one ever heard from him. A few obscured or mannered details were noted in passing, but the whole had admirable style and an overwhelming sweep of energy. C. W. D.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER
DEC 10 1939

DOROTHY MAYNOR, young negro soprano, is the newest sensation in the realm of vocal art. Born in Norfolk, Virginia, the daughter of a Methodist minister, this talented artist received her first training in the choir of her father's church. At 14 she entered Hampton institute, where she received her first vocal lessons, and a few years later toured Europe with the institute's famous negro chorus. Since that time, she has continued her vocal study, first with Wilfred Klamroth, then with John Alan Haughton, her present teacher.

In August, Miss Maynor made a surprise appearance at a private picnic given by Serge Koussevitzky for his orchestra and a few critics and musicians. Koussevitzky threw up his hands and cried: "A native Flagstad!" while New York Times critic Noel Straus referred to the singer as "a new songstress of startling powers . . . the mature and fully equipped artist of prime rank."

Dorothy Maynor's first appearance in Boston and New York have created such a sensation that we believe readers will be particularly interested in hearing about this recording.

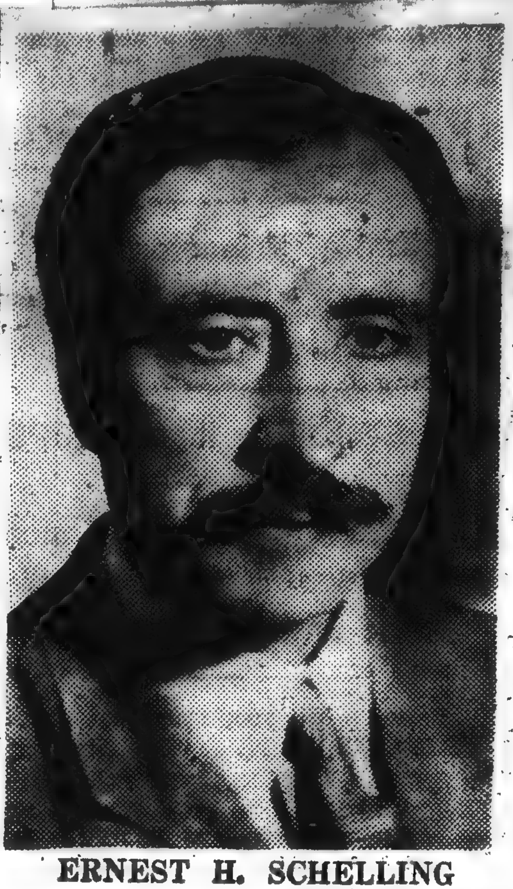
THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 9 - 1939

ERNEST SCHELLING, FAMED PIANIST, DIES

Composer Who Led Children's Concerts of the Philharmonic Since 1924 Was 63

A PUPIL OF PADEREWSKI

Conquered Neuritis in Hands and Gained Brilliant Career —Captain in World War



ERNEST H. SCHELLING
Times Studio, 1932

Ernest Henry Schelling, pianist, composer and since 1924 conductor of the famous children's concerts of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, died suddenly yesterday at 7 A. M. at his home, 863 Park Avenue. Death was caused by a cerebral embolism. Mr. Schelling was 63 years old.

The noted musician was stricken Thursday, but his condition was not considered serious. His bride of four months, the former Miss Peggy Marshall, and her aunt, Mrs. Vincent Astor, were at his bedside. Mr. and Mrs. Schelling were married in Berne, Switzerland, in August.

At yesterday afternoon's regular concert of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, John Barbirolli, the conductor, led his men in Edward MacDowell's "Dirge" in tribute to Mr. Schelling.

A memorial program of Mr. Schelling's own compositions was broadcast last night by Radio Station WQXR to take the place of a half-hour program which Mr. Schelling had been scheduled to conduct.

Played in Public When 4

Mr. Schelling began his career as a pianist with his first public appearance at the age of 4. He had also composed many well known works, including "The Victory Ball," based on Alfred Noyes's bitter Armistice Day poem, and he had conducted the leading orchestras of this country and Europe.

Born on July 26, 1876, at Belvedere, N. J., of Swiss parentage, he was the son of Felix and Rose White Schelling. His father had long been a familiar figure in the social centers of Europe and this gave his boy Ernest access to the salons drawing rooms at an early age.

Something of a prodigy, Mr. Schelling learned to play the piano when an infant. Much of his youth was spent abroad, where he studied at the Paris Conservatoire before he was 8 years old. At that age he took lessons under Mathias, who had been a pupil of Chopin; met and played before the great Rubinstein and was a guest of Mrs. John Mackay in Paris, playing before her guests, and making friends with youthful Clarence Mackay, later to be chairman of the group which made Mr. Schelling's years of conducting for children possible.

Brahms Advises His Father

When he was 10 years old Ernest Schelling was placed in the hands of the teacher Leschetizky, under whom Paderewski, Gabrilowitsch and Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler had studied. While studying with Leschetizky the boy met Brahms, who heard him play, and then took him in his arms and kissed him. Turning to his father the great composer said:

"What this boy needs is more oatmeal, more fresh air!"

But he wrote to young Schelling's father, saying nice things about the lad's playing.

While Leschetizky's pupil he often played for the crowned heads of European States, making many appearances and working hard. His other teachers in his early years were Moszkowski, Huber and Barth. His youthful prodigiousness, however, took its toll. When 16 he returned to the United States crippled with neuritis of the hands.

Momentarily he gave up music and entered the University of Pennsylvania, but he stayed only a brief time. The next four years he spent meagerly supporting himself by giving piano lessons and playing the organ. By the time he was 20 he had regained his health. A concert in Philadelphia by Ignace Paderewski stirred the old fire. He had met the great pianist when he was 12 at Basle and now he arranged to play for him in New York.

"You have little technique, not much flexibility," said Paderewski, "but I see a spark still in you. Come to Switzerland and I will take you under my wing as my only disciple."

Some time passed before young Schelling was able to go to Europe. He located Paderewski, then living incognito at Morges, Switzerland. The next four years he worked eight hours a day under his instruction. His first concert won him scant praise from the master. Discouraged, he sought solace in a monastery, but he soon returned and began his brilliant career as a concert pianist, the field in which he always excelled.

Toured Europe in 1903

In 1903 he toured Europe and South America, developing a repertory that was soon extended to twenty-four concertos. In 1904 he returned to the United States and appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the next eighteen months he gave 186 concerts.

Shortly after his marriage in 1905 to Miss Lucy How Draper of New York he was once again crippled with neuritis and he had to cease work for several years. With the outbreak of the first World War he came to New York and threw himself wholeheartedly into the work of Polish relief.

In 1917 he entered the United States Army, attended the war college, and after training at Fort Myer, Va., went to France, with the rank of Captain of Cavalry. From October, 1917, to April, 1920, he served with the army abroad. He received the decoration of the Legion of Honor in 1919, the Distinguished Service Medal in 1923. He was mustered out a major, and retained that rank in the Military Intelligence Reserve until his death.

In 1922, when the Philharmonic was reorganized, with Clarence Mackay as chairman of the board, Mrs. E. Roland Harriman, Mrs. Charles E. Mitchell and others conceived the idea of having an annual series of concerts for children, where they would learn to love great music and its history. The first, with Mr. Schelling conducting, was given on Jan. 26, 1924. Most critics agreed that Mr. Schelling was a far better pianist than conductor, but it was, however, lately as children's conductor that he was best known. Hundreds of New York children went to his concerts, where he presented a combination lecture, picture, and orchestral concert. They hailed him as "Uncle Ernest," and each year presented him with a gift. He conducted similar concerts in Boston, Philadelphia, and other American cities and at Utrecht and Rotterdam. The war prevented him doing so this season in London. From 1936 through 1938 he was regular conductor of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra.

Author of Many Works

As a composer Mr. Schelling was author of many works. His "Impressions From an Artist's Life" was first given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1916. His "The Victory Ball" was first played by the Philadelphia Orchestra in 1923. Others of his works are "Legendes Symphoniques," "Concerto for Violin and Piano," "Morocco," and "Symphony in C Minor" for orchestra; "Divertissement for Strings and Piano," "Sonata for Violin and Piano"; "Fatalisme," "Gavotte," "Two Morceaux," "Romance," "Theme et Variations" and "Valse Gracieuse" for the piano.

Mr. Schelling's first wife died in February, 1938. Surviving besides his widow are a brother, Felix E. Schelling, retired Professor of English at the University of Pennsylvania, and a sister, Miss Julia E. Schelling of Washington, D. C.

TRIBUTES TO SCHELLING

Leaders in Music Praise His Work for Youth of Country

Leaders in music expressed yesterday shock over the death of Ernest Schelling. Some of the tributes to Mr. Schelling follow:

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Boston Symphony Orchestra — Deeply shocked to learn of the sudden death of Ernest Schelling, whose friendship I have enjoyed for many years.

YEHUDI MENUHIN, violinist—I am heartbroken to learn of the sudden death of this beloved man Ernest Schelling.

ALBERT SPALDING, violinist—I am deeply shocked and grieved to hear of the sudden death of Ernest Schelling, a grief that will be shared by all music lovers.

FREDERICK STOCK, Chicago Symphony Orchestra—In the departure of Ernest Schelling the world of music loses one of its most brilliant exponents, a remarkable pianist and composer of unquestionably high achievements.

Sir ROBERT MAYER of London, Fellow of the Royal College of Music, now in New York—On behalf of the youth of musical England may I be permitted to join in paying tribute to one who has done so much for musical education in his country?

HOWARD BARLOW—It was my privilege to be associated for a number of years with Ernest Schelling in the young people's concerts of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society. The seeds he sowed in awakening a love and understanding of great music in the minds and hearts of thousands of our younger generation will in time yield a rich harvest.

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor San Francisco Symphony Orchestra—It is with a feeling of deep regret that I say au revoir to my dear friend Schelling, a great artist, a sincere friend and a comrade of the last war.

JOHN BARBIROLLI, Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra — The shock of hearing the news of the passing of my friend, Ernest Schelling, is still with me as I try to think of a word to say. It is hard to realize he is no more.

Mrs. VINCENT ASTOR—The auxiliary board of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society mourns the loss of a great artist and a good friend in Ernest Schelling.

MISS LUCREZIA BORI—The death of Ernest Schelling is a serious loss for the musical world. To me he was not only an artist-colleague but for many years a very dear friend whose loss I feel profoundly.

FRITZ KREISLER—I am terribly shocked. Ernest Schelling was not only a fine musician, conductor and pianist, but a great American composer. His Violin Concerto is a lovely work and certainly his "Victory Ball" will live.

DR. WALTER DAMROSCH—All musicians who have known Ernest Schelling deeply regret his loss, not only as a fine musician but as a gentleman through and through.

THEODORE E. STEINWAY—In the death of Ernest Schelling the New York music world loses one of its most colorful figures. His loss will be deeply mourned by his friends and all who have to do with music and musicians in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, O.
NEWS

DEC 9 - 1939

MUSIC

Sin
Rin

BY ELMORE BACON

THE Cleveland Orchestra Twilight Concert, the Singers Club winter program and the Boston Symphony Orchestra feature the coming music week. And there's the Cleveland Orchestra's Public Hall concert with Martinelli at its close.

Tonight another opportunity is given to hear Jascha Heifetz and the Cleveland Orchestra under Dr. Artur Rodzinski's direction present the new William Walton concerto at Severance Hall, repeating the program of last Thursday which aroused so much interest.

Choral programs tomorrow and midweek light opera offerings by student and other groups, with the usual recitals complete the week's musical offerings.

Twilight

Rudolph Ringwall directs the Cleveland Orchestra in another interesting Twilight Concert program at Severance Hall, tomorrow at 5. His program is nicely varied and he will make his usual enlightening comments on some of the music items presented.

The program follows:

Overture "Sakuntala"	Goldmark
Symphonic Suite "Scheherazade"	Rimsky-Korsakoff
The Sea and Sinbad's Ship
Festival At Bagdad—The Sea—Shipwreck
Conclusion
Slavonic Dance No. 1	Dvorak
Entre'Acte from "Khovantschina	Moussorgsky
Rhapsody Espana	Chabrier

Symphony

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky brings the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra here for a program at Music Hall Friday evening, December 15, as a feature of the Cleveland Concert Course, under direction of Mrs. Emil Brudno.

KOUSSEVITSKY

Dr. Koussevitzky eschews the Three B's in making up his program this time. He opens with the Mozart Symphony in C Major No. 338. The familiar "Afternoon of a Faun" by Debussy, is followed by the Ravel Orchestral Fragments from "Daphnis and Chloe" Second Suite, and the program closes with Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, in F Minor.

This famous orchestra of 110 men is in its fifty-ninth season.

Singers Club

Boris Goldovsky directs the Singers Club in its winter concert at Severance Hall, Tuesday evening, in a program of wide variety and with John Brownlee, Australian baritone, as guest star.

Brownlee, now on the Metropolitan Opera roster, replaced Lawrence Tibbett here at the last grand opera festival at Public Hall and scored a great personal success. In the concert Tuesday he sings a group of French songs, three Mozart arias and joins the club in performances of excerpts from the Berlioz "Damnation of Faust" and the Williams "Fantasia on Christmas Carols."

The program in full:

Creation's Hymn	Beethoven
Plorate, Filii Israel	Carissimi
Dainty, Fine Sweet Nymph	Morley
In These Delightful Pleasant Groves	Purcell
The Club
Le Manoir De Rosamonde	Duparc
Carmen	Clergue
Chanson Des Noisettes	Dupont
Chanson a Boire	Ravel
Mr. Brownlee
Damnation of Faust	Berlioz
Chorus of Drinkers
Amen; Fugue on the theme of Brender's Song
Song of the Flea
Mr. Brownlee and Club
Tarantella	Thompson
The Club
Fantasia On Christmas Carols	Williams
Mr. Brownlee and Club
Non Piu Andrai (Marriage of Figaro)	Mozart
Deh Vieni Alla Finestra (Don Giovanni)	Mozart
Finch 'Han Dal Vino "Don Giovanni"	Mozart
Mr. Brownlee
The Galway Piper	Irish Folk Song
Sweet and Low	Barnby
Viking Song	Coleridge-Taylor
The Club

Templeton

Alec Templeton amazed and delighted an audience of more than 2,000 at Severance Hall last night with his piano virtuosity. The stage was nearly filled with the audience overflow.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1937

'The Second Mozart'

JOSEF HOFMANN
As he appeared when he first played in the old Boston Music Hall on Dec. 23, 1887. The quoted caption above the lithograph is from the headline in the Transcript of the following day. The pianist makes his jubilee appearance here next Sunday at a recital in Symphony Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHARLESTON, W. VA.
GAZETTE

DEC 9 - 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS

DEC 9 - 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM JACKSONVILLE, FLA.
TIMES-UNION

DEC 9 - 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOUISVILLE, KY.
COURIER-JOURNAL

DEC 9 - 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

DEC 9 - 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM ATLANTA, GA.
CONSTITUTION

DEC 9 - 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM TOLEDO, O.
BLADE

DEC 9 - 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ELKHART, IND.
TRUTH

DEC 9 - 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER

DEC 9 - 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
TIMES

DEC 9 - 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TAMPA, FLA.
TRIBUNE

DEC 9 - 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES

DEC 9 - 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM DALLAS, TEXAS
NEWS

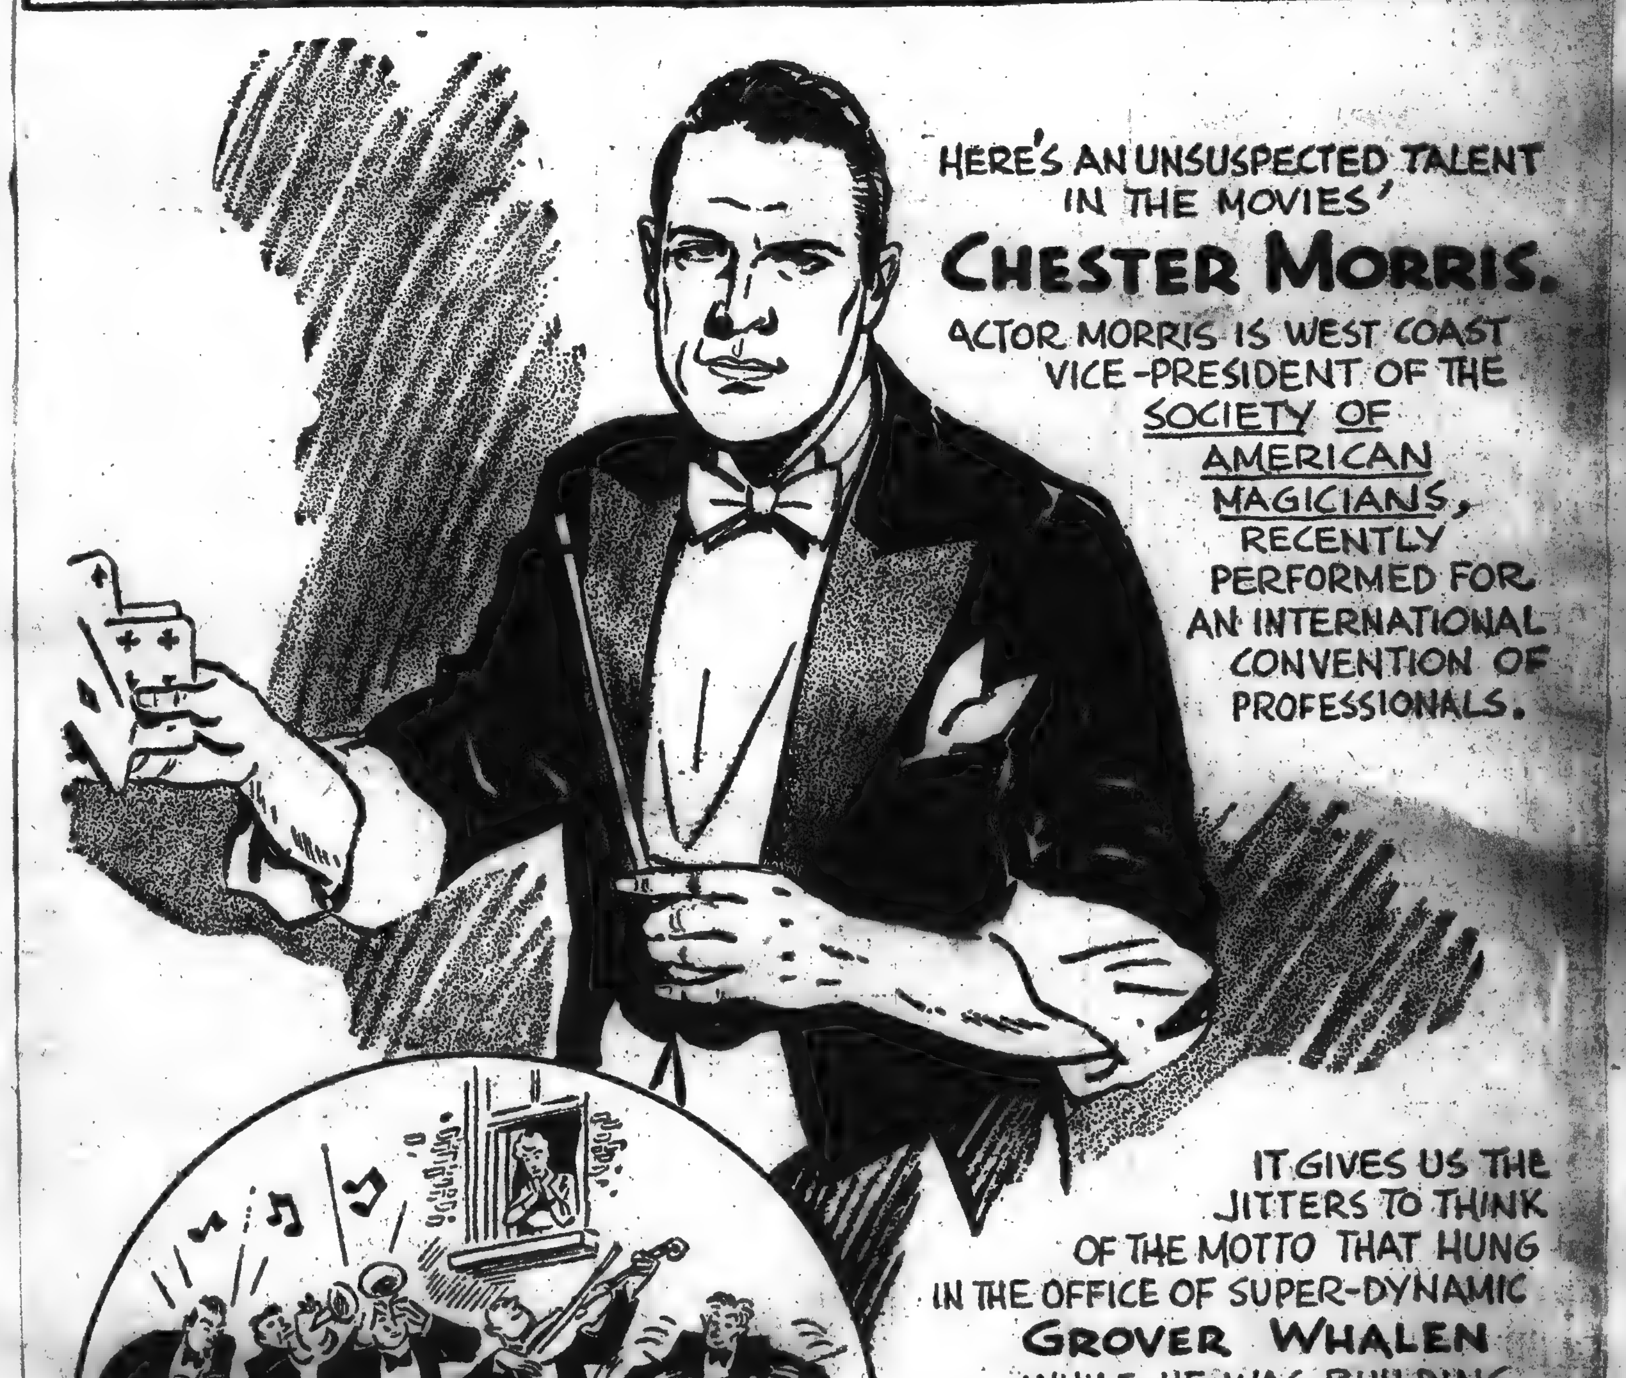
DEC 9 - 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHICAGO, ILL.
TIMES

DEC 10 1939

Private Lives

By Edwin Cox



HERE'S AN UNSUSPECTED TALENT IN THE MOVIES'
CHESTER MORRIS.
ACTOR MORRIS IS WEST COAST VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE SOCIETY OF AMERICAN MAGICIANS, RECENTLY PERFORMED FOR AN INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION OF PROFESSIONALS.
IT GIVES US THE JITTERS TO THINK OF THE MOTTO THAT HUNG IN THE OFFICE OF SUPER-DYNAMIC GROVER WHALEN WHILE HE WAS BUILDING THE NEW YORK WORLD'S FAIR: TIME TEARS ON!
ONE NICE THING ABOUT BEING A SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR IS THAT YOU CAN SEND THE ORCHESTRA OUT TO SERENADE YOUR WIFE, AS SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY DID ON MME. KOUSSEVITZKY'S SIXTIETH BIRTHDAY.
12-9 Bliss

"FINLANDIA"

By Finland's Famous Composer, Sibelius

Soul of the Brave Little Nation Expressed in Beautiful Music Which Has Inspired World's Most Famous and Appreciative Audiences

The Boston Sunday Post presents exclusively the words and music of the patriotic song which can give courage to the hearts of Finnish people everywhere in New England today, "Dear Land of Home," from the tone poem "Finlandia," by the great Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius.

As you play it or sing the lines you will not only be deeply moved by the matchless music but you will be impressed by the words—once so beautiful—now so tragic.

"This fair land" is now a land torn by air-bombs and shells. "This pleasant place of home" is now a country of homeless refugees fleeing from the cruel Soviets.

As you join the countless chorus which sings the poem today, you sing the song of a free and independent nation, whose art and skill made it great in peace and whose loyalty and courage makes it is great in war.

FIRST VERSE (same music for both verses)

Dear land of home, our hearts to thee are holden
By loyal love for each familiar scene;
Thy mountains guard the fields of grain all golden,
Thy rivers flow thro' meadows of green.
Thy mountains guard the fields of grain all golden,
Thy rivers flow thro' meadows of green.

SECOND VERSE

Andante cantabile p
SOPRANO
Thy chil-dren we, our love and pride con - fess - ing
ALTO TENOR BASS
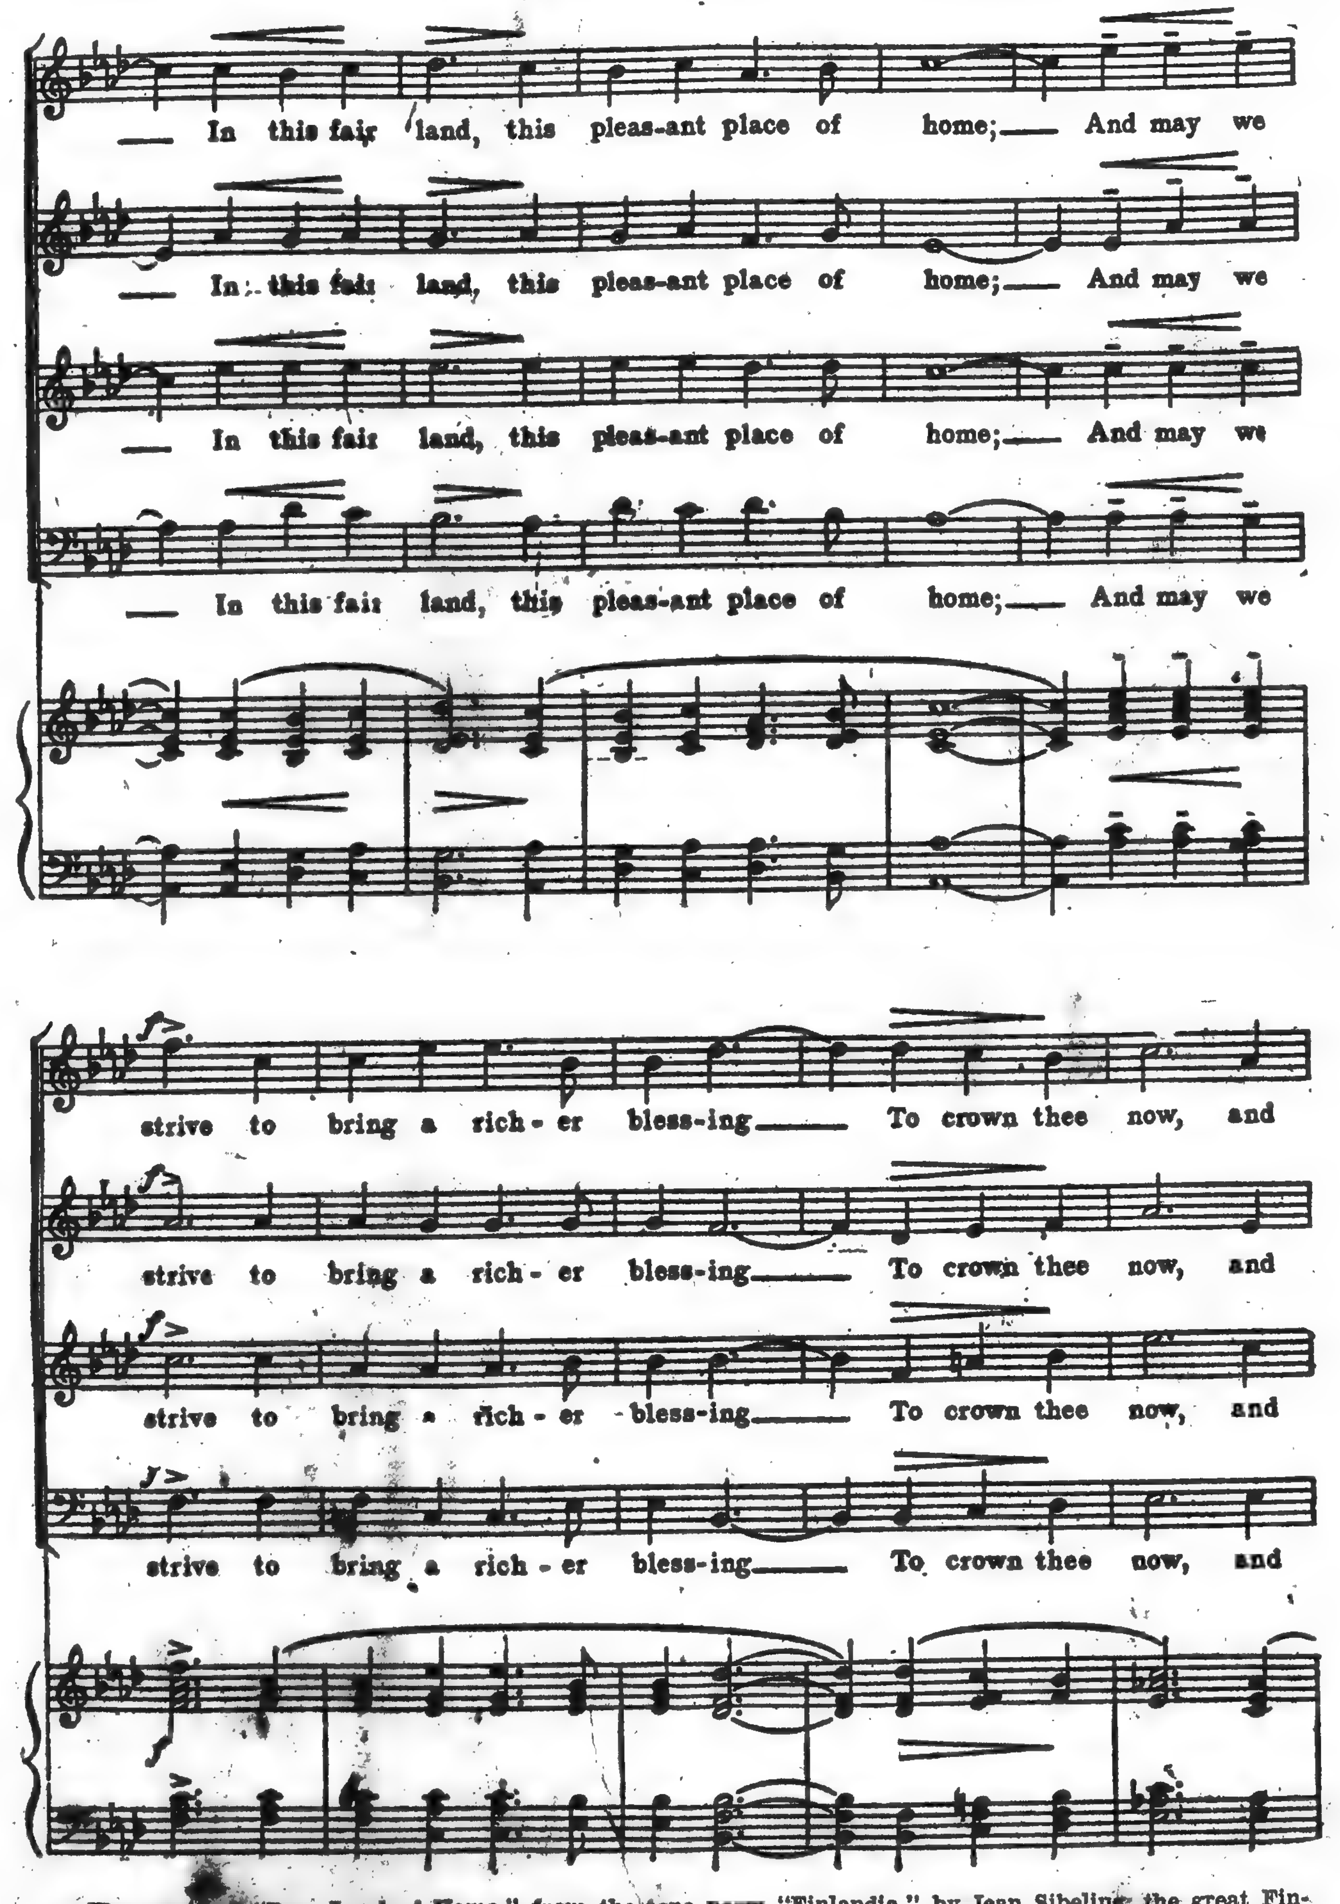
PIANO



In this fair land, this pleas-ant place of home; And may we strive to bring a rich-er bless-ing To crown thee now, and f thro' years to come. And may we strive to bring a rich-er ff bless-ing To crown thee now, and thro' years to come.

rit.

The music of "Dear Land of Home," from the tone poem "Finlandia," by Jean Sibelius, the great Finnish composer. These are the words of the second verse. The music for both verses is the same. It is from the Wood Octavo Series, copyrighted by the B. F. Wood Music Co., 88 St. Stephen street, Boston, and used here by special permission. Words by C. F. M. Music by Sibelius arranged by Charles F. Manney, former Boston poet and composer.

[illegible] are facts that may surprise you about Finland's most [illegible] Sibelius.

About his overwhelmingly popular tone-poem, "Finlandia," sung by choruses as "Dear Land of Home."—

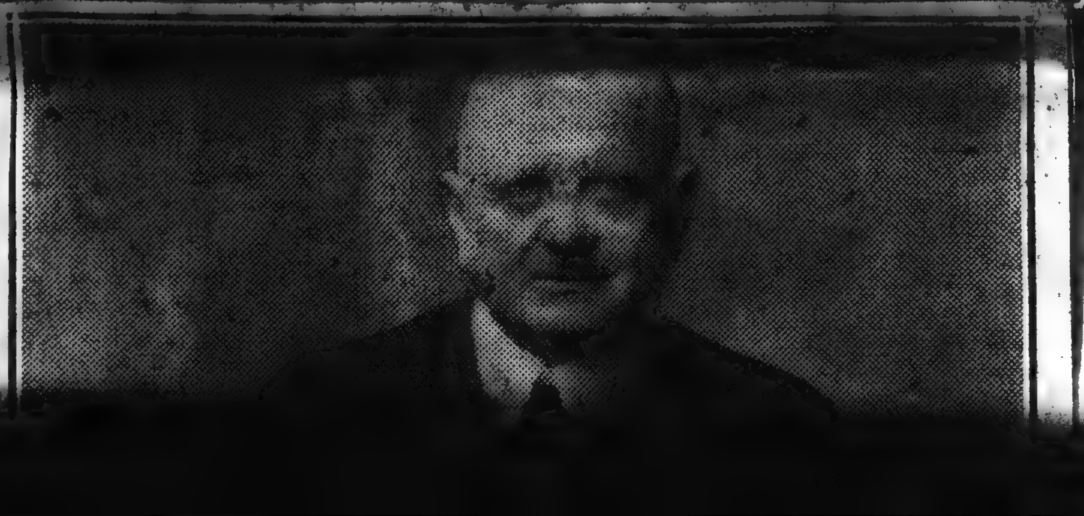
About Russia's effort to suppress it.—

About the tribute paid to it by officers in Russian service.—

With something about Boston and New England connections with Sibelius.

BY LANING HUMPHREY

of their feet as they clear the land for homes in the wilds, or drive back in-



Harmoni
Boston

If the Americas
the culture of the
of a war-torn Euro at "Tanglewood" i
ments for so doing
The sessions, co
Festival, though o run from July 8 to mer will be the fi dinarily distinguis ductors, performe name them in the Institute is for adv music their career who, as that wor own sake. There quirements: if you and no degrees, d awarded: if you c and don't lean on Musicians, mus idyllic landscape quarters comfort and women in a with the finest a great art. Where poisons of an ag than here, is an A coming-of-age?
of discord.

118

Harmonious Songsmiths

Boston Globe, Dec.11,1939

If the Americas are, indeed, to carry forward the culture of the Western world independently of a war-torn Europe, the Berkshire Music Center at "Tanglewood" is assuredly one of the instruments for so doing.

The sessions, concurrent with the Symphonic Festival, though overlapping on the hither side, run from July 8 to August 18. This coming Summer will be the first convocation of an extraordinarily distinguished faculty: composers, conductors, performers, professors and critics—to name them in the order of their importance. The Institute is for advanced study, for those making music their career; the Academy is for amateurs who, as that word denotes, love the art for its own sake. There are no formal entrance requirements: if you can do the work, come along; and no degrees, diplomas or academic credits are awarded: if you can practice the art, practice it, and don't lean on a sheepskin.

Musicians, music lovers and public, this is it: idyllic landscape at the summit of Summer, living quarters comfortable, companionship with men and women in a shared enthusiasm, association with the finest artists, daily communion with a great art. Where, if not here, is antidote to the poisons of an age of hate? And where, better than here, is an American assertion of its cultural coming-of-age? A space of harmony in a world of discord.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

DEC 12 1939

Dorothy Maynor to Sing In Philharmonic Benefit

Negro Soprano to Aid Pension Fund Concert Jan. 16

Dorothy Maynor, Negro soprano, who made her New York recital debut at Town Hall Nov. 19, will be the soloist with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in its annual special concert for the benefit of its Pension Fund on Tuesday night, Jan. 16, in Carnegie Hall, according to an announcement yesterday from Mrs. Henry Martyn Alexander, chairman of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society's Pension Fund Committee. Miss Maynor will sing "Depuis le jour" from Charpentier's "Louise"; "L'amero, saro costante," from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore" and "Leise, leise," from Weber's "Der Freischutz."

Her singing made a notable impression last August at a picnic given by Serge Koussevitzky for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's members ~~at Lenox~~, Mass., and in her Town Hall debut. She also sang one of the brief vocal solo roles in Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" with the Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall on Nov. 25.

The pension fund committee has been actively functioning for the last thirteen years. Eighteen musicians who had played with the orchestra for long periods, including seven with more than thirty years' service each, are now receiving annual pensions. Six other retired members of the orchestra were on the pension list until the time of their deaths.

In addition to the proceeds of the annual special concerts, the pension fund is sustained by income from investments, private contributions, and by the dues of members of the Philharmonic - Symphony Society. These annual dues of $10 each are applied entirely to the fund, and each member is entitled to two tickets for the benefit concert. Tickets not reserved by members will be placed upon public sale at Carnegie Hall and at the society's office, 113 West Fifty-seventh Street, where applications for membership can be made.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

DEC 12 1939

I'd Rather Be Right

By Samuel Grafton

On the afternoon of Saturday, March 16, 1918, seven blind children and five elderly blind ladies stood on the pavement before the main entrance to Carnegie Hall. It was a clear but windy day, quite cold. The little group, in charge of several severely official persons, huddled until, at a signal from the lobby, it marched into the concert hall.

* * *

There, in the main aisle, the twelve blind persons removed their overcoats. Pinned on the breast of each was disclosed an American flag, twelve inches by nine. Members of the audience craned their necks, wondering; only a few knew what was going on. If the tall, straight man on the platform saw the tableau, he gave no sign. He was Dr. Karl Muck and he was conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As the twelve blind persons filed into their orchestra seats, making a row of flags, Dr. Muck began the Mozart E-flat major symphony. By all accounts, he gave one of the typically good, classical, if rather dry performances.

Mrs. William Jay, social leader and patriot, had rounded up the blind and arranged for them to attend the concert. It was her notion that America at war should not tolerate a German, Dr. Muck, as head of a symphony orchestra. The blind children and the blind old ladies were "symbolic of the blindness of America to German autocracy." It was her belief that only the blind "who could not see the face of the Kaiser's friend" could properly listen to the orchestra's "beautiful music."

* * *

Dr. Muck had begun his concert with "The Star-Spangled Banner," but the twelve blind had waited outside until the number was finished. It was not Mrs. Jay's wish that they should hear the national anthem conducted by a German. "I consider myself an American," Dr. Muck had said, but that didn't go with Mrs. Jay. Her war against Dr. Muck was the chief item in her newspaper biographies when she died on January 29, 1931.

Eleven days after the concert Dr. Muck was forcibly seized on the podium in Boston while conducting a rehearsal. He was lodged in the East Cambridge jail, in a cage with a bootlegger. He was denied the right to smoke, a serious blow, because his normal quota was 100 cigarettes daily. For one awful moment a deputy stood before Dr. Muck with a pair of handcuffs, wondering whether to put them on the hands that had become famous for their evocation of Wagner and Mozart.

* * *

Dr. Muck, it happened, was a Swiss citizen. The Swiss Legation certified that when Dr. Muck was eight years old his family had moved to Switzerland and become naturalized. On reaching his majority, in 1880, the young Muck had taken out his own Swiss papers. But Mrs. Jay and the Federal investigators could not forget that he had been born in Wuerzburg, Germany, on October 22, 1859. He was officially interned and sent to Fort Oglethorpe, Georgia, where he remained on unspecified charges until late August, 1919, nine months after the Armistice.

Since he was not a German citizen, he was interned as a German "denizen." Probably this was correct. He had been a "denizen" of Germany for years—as conductor of the Berlin Royal Opera. "I am not a German," he said as he sailed for Europe on August 21, 1919. "I considered myself an American." But now it was in the past tense.

* * *

It remained in the past tense. The other day Dr. Muck quietly celebrated his eightieth birthday in Stuttgart, Germany, where he lives in retirement. He gets along well with the Nazi authorities. Perhaps he ought to be told that this is shameful, that he should fight for the American way with its civil liberties for all. I would not care to have the job of explaining this to him.

* * *

This is the color and taste of war. Memory shies from it, as it shies from the recollection of old fevers.

Here are facts that may surprise you about Finland's most famous genius, Sibelius:

About his overwhelmingly popular tone-poem, "Finlandia," sung by choruses as "Dear Land of Home."—

About Russia's effort to suppress it.—

About the tribute paid to it by officers in Russian service.—

With something about Boston and New England connections with Sibelius.

BY LANING HUMPHREY

When Russian aviators bombed the Finnish capital, Helsinki, Americans who had never been there, and living at the farthest points from Finland, winced with as much pain and resentment as if they were intimately acquainted with the little far northern republic and its people.

Didn't that happen to you, reader?

And why?

Because of a piece of music, of course—"Finlandia."

In reading of the havoc wrought by the Soviet bombings of Finnish civilian territory, weren't you disturbed by the unverified report of the killing of one particular Finnish citizen? Then weren't you greatly relieved by the news of his safety? That man would have been Jean Sibelius. Of course—the composer of "Finlandia."

No orchestra or band ever has played anything with such a power to give the foreign listener an electrifying sense of acquaintanceship with a distant people, and above all, their land. Boston audiences at the Pops and the Esplanade concerts clamor year after year for Conductor Arthur Fiedler to add to the repetitions of "Finlandia."

Sibelius explained the composition with no published plot, no words. He sent it forth as a "symphonic poem" for orchestral performance. But when his music issues from the orchestra, the instruments seem to speak and to paint pictures.

The Music Speaks

The music seems to say:

"This is the voice of a bold and liberty-loving people. Hear the mighty beat of their hearts, the resolute march of their feet as they clear the land for homes in the wilds, or drive back invaders. Behold this rugged, this challenging, this inspiring land!

"Can you not hear the ocean-like surge of the wind through the limitless forests? Can you not feel the bite of the cold that bids men be men? Do you not glimpse the glitter of 60,000 lakes twining their lashings of silver this way and that among 80,000 islands? Can you not hear the banter of rapids, the exultation of mighty falls?"

This comes from the music. How did the music come to Sibelius?

Russia took Finland under its "protection" in 1809. For seven centuries it had lived its own life under the kings of Sweden, willing to fight in their name and giving valiant service in all of Sweden's wars. Russia claimed that after 1809, Finland should be an autonomous grand duchy.

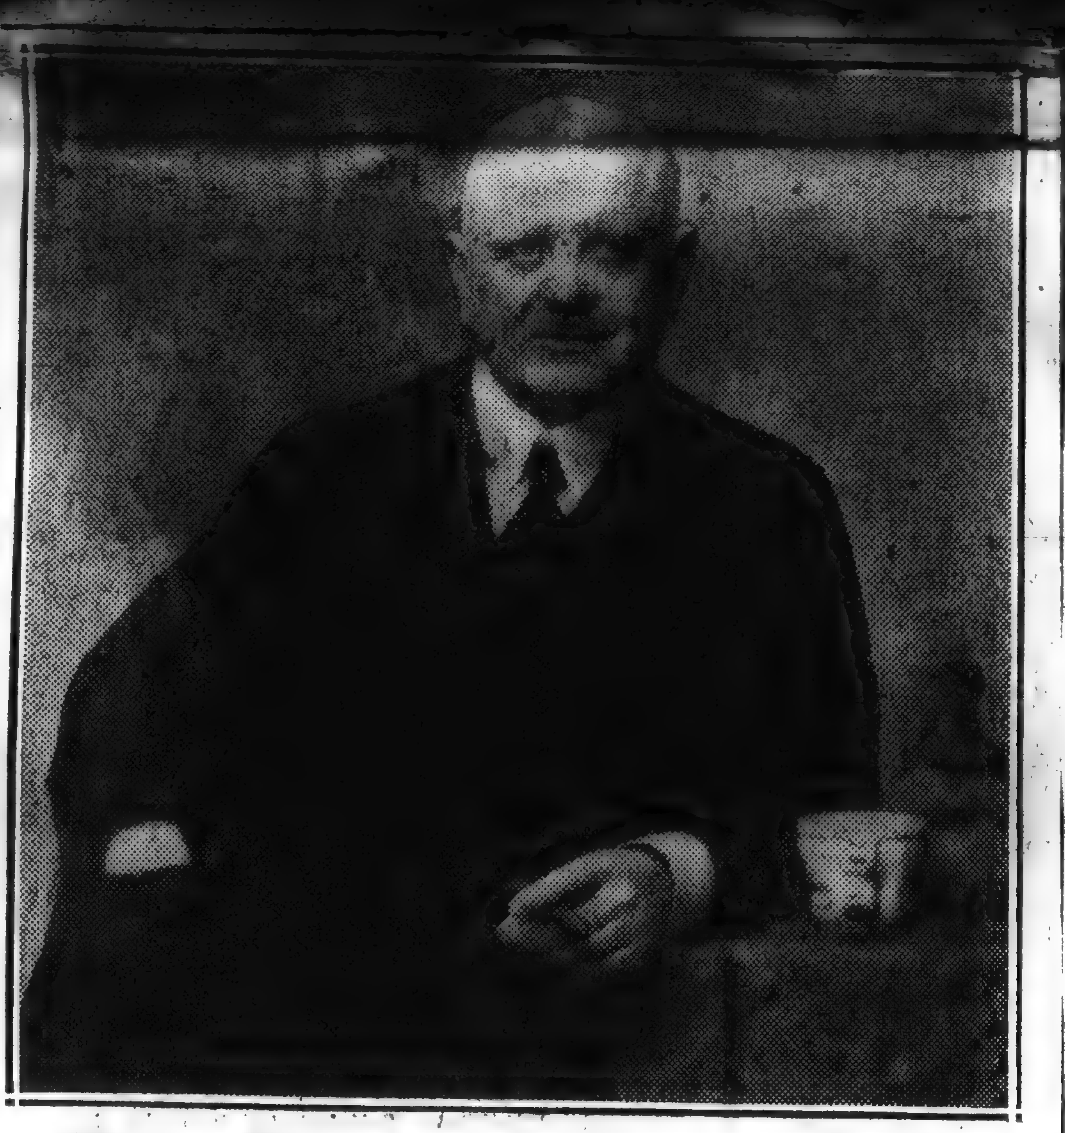
But as the century rolled on the Russians began to bear down increasingly. "Autonomy" was becoming a mockery. The Finns fought back—through their poets and their press. There came the presentation of a pageant of Finnish history, at Viborg University, in 1898. To the Russians this did not seem dangerous.

But pointed allusions hidden in the poetic text were driven home by music written especially for the occasion by a young Finnish composer, named Sibelius.

Fighting the Russians

The Russian overlords abolished the Finnish newspapers. Promptly the whole country broke out with "Press Benefits." Money poured in to take care of the dismissed journalists and their families—and, also, to show the burning resentment of the people at loss of their freedom of expression.

There were benefit concerts, an historic pageant in Helsinki. Again, there was special pageant music by Sibelius—seven compositions. Apparently, this occasion, added to the former pageant, had affected the composer deeply.



Sibelius, in the later years of his career. He now is 74. This remarkably vivid portrait was inscribed by the composer for Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who often has played the difficult Violin Concerto of the Finnish master. Sibelius wrote: "To my dear friend, the great violinist, Richard Burgin."

He set his seventh number before him and wrote things into it that gave it new power.

A World's Fair was to be given in Paris. The so-called autonomous government of Finland refused to supply any money to enable the Finns to show their attainments alongside delegations to Paris from the rest of the world. The people raised a fund. They decreed that it should finance a presentation of Finnish musical genius in song, choral and orchestral composition. Sibelius was invited to contribute music and also himself as a conductor. He accepted both offers, and in his music included the rewritten version of his seventh number from "Historic Scenes." Now he gave it the title, "Suomi," which, as every stamp collector will tell you, is Finnish for Finland.

In Paris, it appeared on programmes as "La Patrie," later, in Germany, as "Der Vaterland." The result was startling. Finland had seemed until then a distant land, small in extent, smaller in consequence.

Now the French and the Germans were filled by this music with feelings of a country of grandeur, a people of strength and nobility—and a young man from this country, and this people, who already deserved a place with the masters of composition in more southerly and, until now, supposedly more advanced musical development.

Sibelius up to now has completed seven great symphonies, all given magnificent performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at home and on tour, under the conductorship of Serge Koussevitzky. He excels in their presentation, and has won acceptance for some of the symphonies which once were considered difficult to understand.

Inspiration to the People

Back in Finland, the tone-poem, "Suomi," renamed "Finlandia," exerted an intensifying spell over the people. Hearing this music, they were confirmed in their feeling as a great people in a great land, instead of vassals in a Russian province.

The Russian overlords forbade performances of "Finlandia." But the Russian respect for the musical art led to the inviting of Sibelius to conduct in Russia. Among the tentative programme selections, the title "Finlandia" was observed.

Officials had no objection to performance of the admirable music . . . but there was a difficulty about the title. Please, any title except "Finlandia." Sibelius has always been known as obliging to a degree. The piece was listed as "Impromptu."

But at the end of the programme, several dozen military and naval officers called on Sibelius to express appreciation for the concert. They left their cards. Sibelius observed that the names were unmistakably Finnish for the most part—and the rest could be.

No matter how faithfully Sibelius has presented his own land and people, however, he has infused his music with qualities which appeal especially to American listeners.

It seems imposible for them to refrain from humming when the instruments of the orchestra sing out in robust melody.

Hence, it was the most natural thing in the world for a Boston composer, arranger and poet Charles Fonteyn Manney to fit words to the tune and arrange it for mixed voices, so that it could be sung by American school children and their elders.

Throughout the country, from Portland, Me., to Portland, Ore., this arrangement is sung with the fervor of an American patriotic anthem, under the title, "Dear Land of Home."

It may be a surprise to many to learn that Sibelius once was in New England. In 1914 he was guest conductor in music of his own at the Norwalk, Conn., music festival. Yale University conferred on him the honorary degree of doctor of music.

"Finlandia" was played as all the candidates for honorary degrees advanced in procession at the Yale ceremonial.

In the period between the end of the Norfolk Festival and the receiving of the degree at Yale, Sibelius was feted in Boston at a banquet. There many of America's leading composers were introduced to him—notably George W. Chadwick, Henry Hadley and Charles M. Loeffler.

Doing His Big Little Bit

Lolli Kalvere, 7-year-old lad of Finnish extraction has donated his lollypop money to aid Finland. (Acme.)

ROCKLAND, ME.
COURIER
12/12/39

119

REALM OF MUSIC

by Gladys St. Clair Heistad

For the first time in its history, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave two concerts immediately preceding the formal opening of the season, dedicated to the works of American composers. Works by ranking Americans were played in as nearly perfect form as one might hope to hear them. The two concerts were offered to the public free of charge, the only stipulation being that application be made for tickets. The response was instantaneous, and more than 5,000 applications had to be refused, some of which came from Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont. It was obvious that many listeners were having their first experience at a symphony concert and liking it tremendously.

The program notes revealed an imposing list of 46 American composers, and 123 of their compositions in 156 performances, given by the Boston Symphony. Almost 50 percent of these were first performances. This record gives evidence of Dr. Koussevitzky's deep interest in the American composer. Composers represented in the two concerts aforementioned included Arthur Foote (Suite in E, for String Orchestra, Op. 63); Henry Hadley ('Angelus' from the Symphony No. 3 in B. minor); Deems Taylor (excerpts from 'Through the Looking-Glass'); John Alden Carpenter ('Skyscrapers'); Howard Hanson (Symphony No. 2); William Schuman (American Festival); George Gershwin (Concerto in F) for piano and orchestra—Abram Chasins as soloist); Roy Harris (Symphony No. 3, in one movement); Randall Thompson (Symphony No. 2 in E minor).

Randall Thompson, I might add, is the new director of The Curtis Institute of Music, succeeding Josef Hofman. He is a composer of marked ability, and a testimony to this was the enthusiasm which greeted the performance of his Symphony in this Boston Symphony concert—the work eliciting cheers from the audience. The reviewer remarked—"The reason, musically speaking, is not difficult to discover, for Mr. Thompson looks about him and finds that America is not altogether typified by 'the big city' noise and confusion."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MONTCLAIR, N. J.
SEMI-WEEKLY TIMES

DEC 12 1939

Conductor for Unity Concert Next Month

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will appear on the auditorium platform in Montclair High School on Wednesday night, Jan. 10, for the concert to be given as the extra event of the Unity Concert Course. Tickets are still available at Unity Institute office, 67 Church Street, telephone Montclair 2-6770.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MONTCLAIR, N. J.
SEMI-WEEKLY TIMES

DEC 12 1939

Koussevitzky Praises American Orchestras

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, coming to Montclair High School, Jan. 10 as the extra event in connection with Unity Concert Course, recently said: "Today the concert public has awakened to the fact that a symphony orchestra is the most perfect, the most complete and satisfying of all existing means serving to convey tonal wealth and beauty.

"To this country goes the honor of founding and maintaining great symphony orchestras, the virtuosity and perfection of which have never been attained in the past. America may be justly proud of this achievement, for the highest standard of orchestral performance has stimulated interest for symphony music and has revealed its significance in the artistic and cultural life of a nation." Tickets to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert are on sale at the Unity Institute office, 67 Church Street, telephone Montclair 2-6770.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LIFE
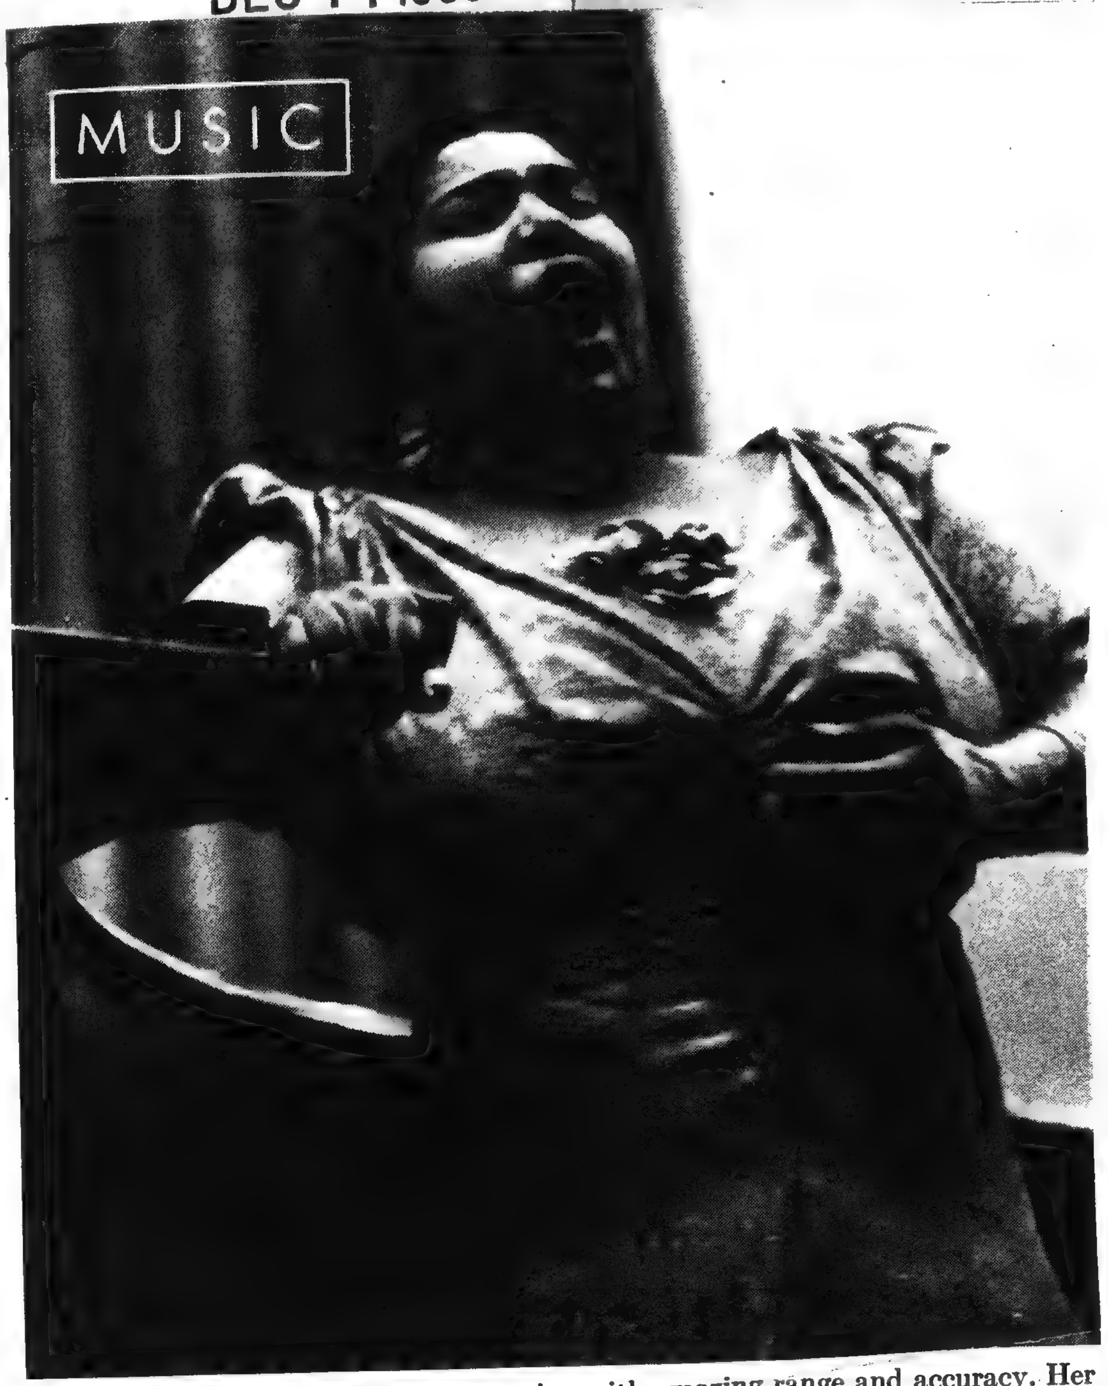
CHICAGO, ILL.

DEC 11 1939



Maynor sings in a powerful soprano voice, with amazing range and accuracy. Her pianissimo notes are lovely. Her face shows that she has Indian blood in her veins.

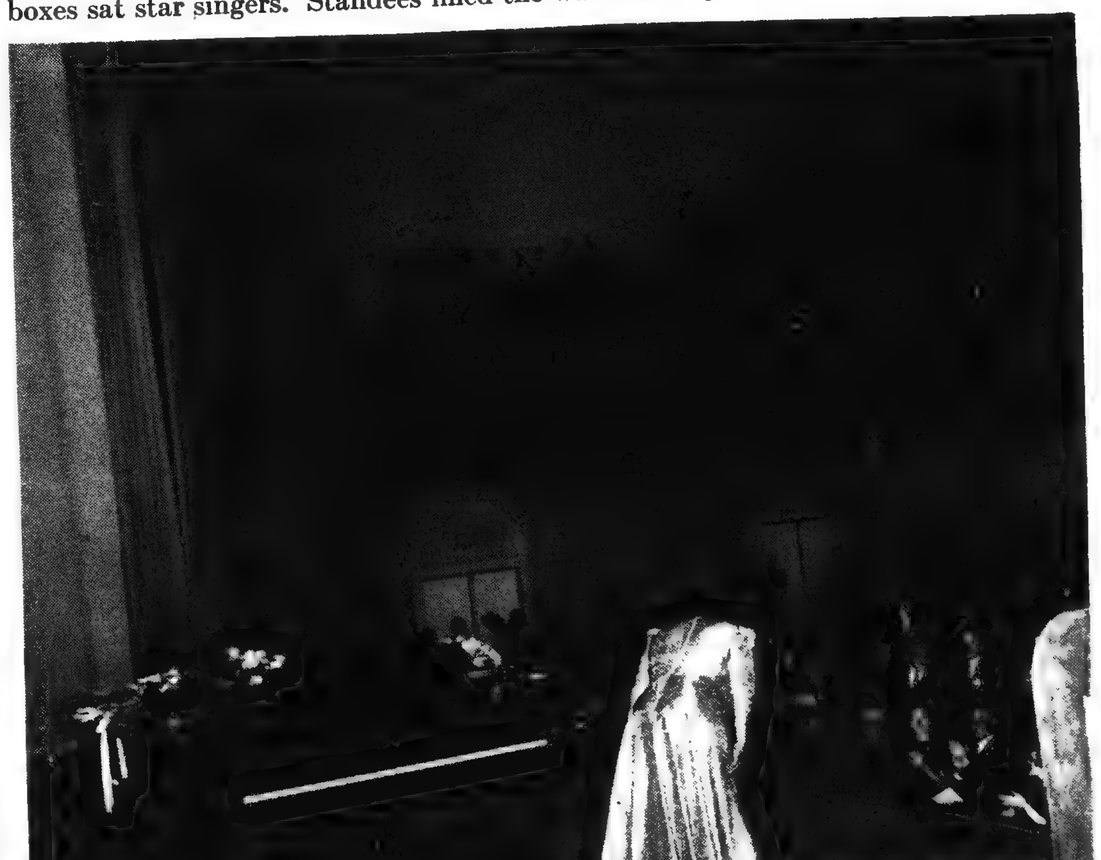
A NEGRO SINGER FROM VIRGINIA MAKES EXCITING CONCERT DEBUT

When Dorothy Maynor came out for her first appearance at Town Hall in New York, Nov. 19, the house was packed with music professionals. Their grapevine had advised them the debut of this Negro soprano was going to be something to hear. Serge Koussevitzky had called Maynor "a native Flagstad."

Dorothy Maynor was so nervous that her knees shook and tears were in her eyes. But there was no nervousness in her sweet, clear voice. The audience, at the end of an exacting program, stood up and yelled excited approval. The Times critic next day said: "She has virtually everything needed by a great artist. . . . Her voice [is] one of the finest the public can hear today." No Marian Anderson, she showed that she might some day rival that great Negro singer's artistry.

Only 29 years old, Dorothy Maynor is the daughter of a Norfolk, Va., Methodist preacher. She studied at Hampton Institute, toured Europe in its choir. She is 4 ft. 10 in. tall, weighs 145 lb. In operatic arias, she stands in conventional fashion, hands folded in front. But when she comes to spirituals, she leans elbow on piano, jounces her chunky body up and down as she sings.

An ovation greeted Maynor as she came out to bow at the end of the concert. In the boxes sat star singers. Standees lined the walls. Everybody wanted more encores.



TINUED ON NEXT PAGE

119

REALM OF MUSIC

by Gladys St. Clair Heistad

For the first time in its history, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave two concerts immediately preceding the formal opening of the season, dedicated to the works of American composers. Works by ranking Americans were played in as nearly perfect form as one might hope to hear them. The two concerts were offered to the public free of charge, the only stipulation being that application be made for tickets. The response was instantaneous, and more than 5,000 applications had to be refused, some of which came from Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont. It was obvious that many listeners were having their first experience at a symphony concert and liking it tremendously.

The program notes revealed an imposing list of 48 American composers, and 129 of their compositions in 156 performances, given by the Boston Symphony. Almost 60 per cent of these were first performances. This record gives evidence of Dr. Koussevitzky's deep interest in the American composer. Composers represented in the two concerts aforementioned included Arthur Foote (Suite in E, for String Orchestra, Op. 63); Henry Hadley ('Angelus' from the Symphony No. 3 in B minor); Deems Taylor (excerpts from 'Through the Looking-Glass'); John Alden Carpenter ('Skyscrapers'); Howard Hanson (Symphony No. 2); William Schuman (American Festival); George Gershwin (Concerto in F) for piano and orchestra—Abram Chasins as soloist); Roy Harris (Symphony No. 3, in one movement); Randall Thompson (Symphony No. 2 in E minor).

Randall Thompson, I might add, is the new director of The Curtis Institute of Music, succeeding Josef Hofman. He is a composer of marked ability, and a testimony to this was the enthusiasm which greeted the performance of his Symphony in this Boston Symphony concert—the work eliciting cheers from the audience. The reviewer remarked—"The reason, musically speaking, is not difficult to discover, for Mr. Thompson looks about him and finds that America is not altogether typified by 'the big city' noise and confusion."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MONTCLAIR, N. J.
SEMI-WEEKLY TIMES
DEC 12 1939

Conductor for Unity Concert Next Month

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will appear on the auditorium platform in Montclair High School on Wednesday night, Jan. 10, for the concert to be given as the extra event of the Unity Concert Course. Tickets are still available at Unity Institute office, 67 Church Street, telephone Montclair 2-6770.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MONTCLAIR, N. J.
SEMI-WEEKLY TIME
DEC 12 1939

Koussevitzky Praises American Orchestras

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conduc of the Boston Symphony Orchest coming to Montclair High Scho
Jan. 10 as the extra event in conne tion with Unity Concert Course, cently said: "Today the concert pu lic has awakened to the fact tha symphony orchestra is the most p fect, the most complete and satisfy of all existing means serving to c vey tonal wealth and beauty.
"To this country goes the honor founding and maintaining great sy phony orchestras, the virtuosity perfection of which have never b attained in the past. America ma justly proud of this achievement, the highest standard of orches performance has stimulated inte for symphony music and has reve its significance in the artistic and tural life of a nation." Tickets the Boston Symphony Orchestra con cert are on sale at the Unity Insti tute office, 67 Church Street, tele phone Montclair 2-6770.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LIFE
CHICAGO, ILL.
DEC 11 1939

MUSIC

Maynor sings in a powerful soprano voice, with amazing range and accuracy. Her pianissimo notes are lovely. Her face shows that she has Indian blood in her veins.

A NEGRO SINGER FROM VIRGINIA MAKES EXCITING CONCERT DEBUT

When Dorothy Maynor came out for her first appearance at Town Hall in New York, Nov. 19, the house was packed with music professionals. Their grapevine had advised them the debut of this Negro soprano was going to be something to hear. Serge Koussevitzky had called Maynor "a native Flagstad."

Dorothy Maynor was so nervous that her knees shook and tears were in her eyes. But there was no nervousness in her sweet, clear voice. The audience, at the end of an exacting program, stood up and yelled excited approval. The Times critic next day said: "She has virtually everything needed by a great artist. . . . Her voice [is] one of the finest the public can hear today." No Marian Anderson, she showed that she might some day rival that great Negro singer's artistry.

Only 29 years old, Dorothy Maynor is the daughter of a Norfolk, Va., Methodist preacher. She studied at Hampton Institute, toured Europe in its choir. She is 4 ft. 10 in. tall, weighs 145 lb. In operatic arias, she stands in conventional fashion, hands folded in front. But when she comes to spirituals, she leans elbow on piano, jounces her chunky body up and down as she sings.

An ovation greeted Maynor as she came out to bow at the end of the concert. In the boxes sat star singers. Standees lined the walls. Everybody wanted more encores.

CONTINUED ON NEXT PAGE

Day after the concert, Maynor relaxed with her crocheting. An untiring worker, she practices three hours a day, would practice longer if her teacher would let her.

Paul Robeson, baritone, heard Dorothy Maynor. So did Roland Hayes, tenor. Marian Anderson sent a wire. These Negro singers would make an unsurpassed quartet.

REALM OF MUSIC

by Gladys St. Clair Heistad

For the first time in its history, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave two concerts immediately preceding the formal opening of the season, dedicated to the works of American composers. Works by leading Americans were played in as nearly perfect form as one might hope to hear them. The two concerts were offered to the public free of charge, the only stipulation being that application be made for tickets. The response was instantaneous, and more than 5,000 applications had to be refused, some of which came from Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont. It was obvious that many listeners were having their first experience at a symphony concert and liking it tremendously.

The program notes revealed an imposing list of 46 American composers, and 128 of their compositions in 156 performances, given by the Boston Symphony. Almost 30 per cent of these were first performances. This record gives evidence of Dr. Koussevitzky's deep interest in the American composer. Composers represented in the two concerts aforementioned included Arthur Foote (Suite in E, for String Orchestra, Op. 63); Henry Hadley ('Angelus' from the Symphony No. 3 in B. minor); Deems Taylor (excerpts from 'Through the Looking-Glass'); John Alden Carpenter ('Skyscrapers'); Howard Hanson (Symphony No. 2); William Schuman (American Festival); George Gershwin (Concerto in F) for piano and orchestra—Abram Chasins as soloist); Roy Harris (Symphony No. 3, in one movement); Randall Thompson (Symphony No. 2 in E minor).

Randall Thompson, I might add, is the new director of The Curtis

120

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHICAGO, ILL.
Journal of Commerce

DEC 14 1939

ON THE AISLE

Serge Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony Play Magnificent Debussy at Auditorium

By Claudia Cassidy

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to the Auditorium last night after about eight seasons' absence and won the cordial acclaim of a capacity audience furnished in part by the Northwestern Series. The Boston orchestra is a marvelous instrument—like a cast of superb actors it could make any text interesting by sheer wealth of tone, beauty of phrasing and range of dynamics. Yet there was some disappointment, which I shared, about the program. Of the three composers represented, only Debussy was what we (the dissenters) wanted to hear the orchestra tackle, because the score was "La Mer," and it is music content with nothing less than magnificent playing.

It got just that, and it got something I for one never before heard in Debussy—a touch of the Russian, to be explicit, a touch of "Petrouchka" in the glitter of the distant brass and a kind of Slavic implication in the strings. Not that Mr. Koussevitzky distorted Debussy, rather that, being Russian, he can be olympian one instant and frenzied the next without in the least seeming inconsistent. His music is a constant interplay of moods and his orchestra is so rare an instrument the moods are mirrored as in crystal, if crystal had a heart. Debussy like that made you long for Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," some Stravinsky, or some Prokofieff with his scoffing tongue in his witty cheek.

But the program opened with Haydn, the Symphony in B Flat numbered 102, and to be entirely frank, I did not like Mr. Koussevitzky's Haydn. It was filled with orchestral beauty, of course, but the largo was so slow as to threaten disintegration, and while the vivacity of the menuetto was virtuosity in performance, the robust quality of Haydn simply did not emerge.

The Tschaikowsky Fouth, which closed the program, was played here by Mr. Koussevitzky on his last visit. It is an orchestral stunt, to be sure, particularly the pizzicato scherzo, and it was beautifully played. But when we (still the dissenters) remembered the marvelous Debussy and the intense beauty of the cellos in the first movement, we were disconsolate. It was, if the Tschaikowsky Fourth fans will forgive me, like using a superb instrument for something a well trained hack orchestra can play. After all, we only get Mr. Koussevitzky once in eight years. More music like the Debussy please.

• • •

TWO soloists have canceled their engagements to appear with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra this season. Georges Enesco is ill and Myra Hess is too busy with war work in England to make an American tour. Rudolph Ganz will delay his Chicago recital because he has been called to New York to conduct the Concerts for Young People Jan. 20 and 22, replacing the late Ernest Schelling.

• • • •

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CALDWELL, N.J.
PROGRESS
12/15 '39

Symphony Orchestra In Montclair Jan. 10

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the distinguished leader, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its appearance on Wednesday evening, January 10, at the Montclair High School, where this great orchestra will give the extra concert in connection with the celebration of the twentieth anniversary of the Unity Concert Course.

At the opening of the New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the evening of November 23 and the afternoon of November 25 at Carnegie Hall Dr. Koussevitzky presented programs made up entirely of American symphonic works. Because of Dr. Koussevitzky's eminent service to the cause of American music, through the conductor's programming of many works of American composers now and earlier, the Lotus Club of New York tendered him a dinner on December 2, at which Chancellor Chase, president of the Lotus Club, presided. Walter Damrosch, Olin Downes, Charles O'Connell and Dr. Louis Anspacher spoke.

The program in Montclair will, however, be made up of other than American works.

Tickets for this concert are on sale at the Unity Institute office, 67 Church street, Montclair. Telephone Montclair 2-6770.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BLOOMFIELD, N. J.
Weekly
Independent Press

DEC 15 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GLEN RIDGE, N. J.
WEEKLY PAPER

DEC 15 1939

KOUSSEVITZKY CONDUCTS ALL-AMERICAN CONCERT

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the distinguished leader, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its appearance on Wednesday evening, January 10th, at the Montclair High School, where this great orchestra will give the extra concert in connection with the celebration of the 20th anniversary of the Unity Concert Course.

At the opening of the New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the evening of November 23rd and the afternoon of November 25th at Carnegie Hall, Dr. Koussevitzky presented programs made up entirely of American symphonic works. Because of Dr. Koussevitzky's eminent service to the cause of American music, through the conductor's programing of many works of American composers now and earlier, the Lotus Club of New York tendered a dinner to him on December 2nd, at which Chancellor Chase, president of the Lotus Club, presided. Walter Damrosch, Charles O'Connell, Olin Downes and Dr. Louis Anspacher spoke.

The program in Montclair will, however, be made up of other than American works. Tickets for this concert are on sale at the Unity Institute office, 67 Church street, Montclair. Telephone Montclair 2-6770.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MONTCLAIR, N. J.
SEMI-WEEKLY TIMES

DEC 15 1939

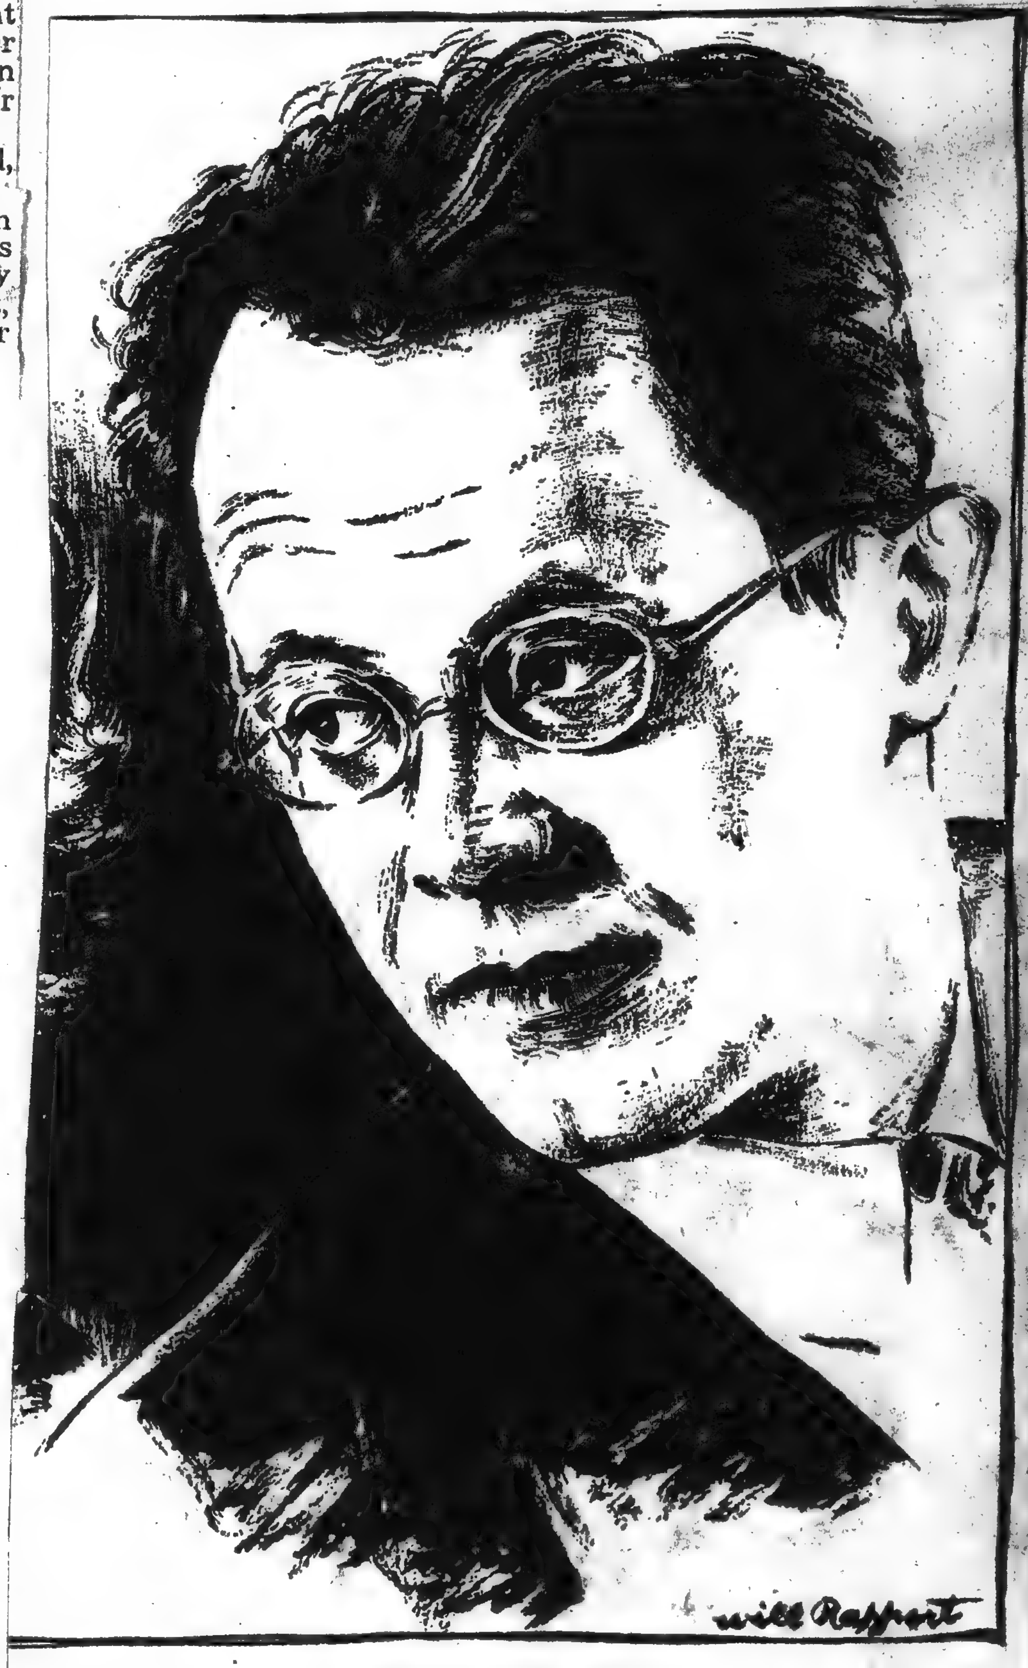
Out-of-Town Followers To Attend Concert Here

Boston Symphony Will Appear at High School Jan. 10.

When Dr. Serge Koussevitzky lifts his baton on Jan. 10 at Montclair High School as conductor of the Boston Symphony he will be greeted by followers from other parts of the metropolitan area as well as Montclair. From 1923 to 1929, inclusive, this orchestra appeared in Montclair and came to have friends galore.

During the depression years the orchestra appeared in large cities, but was persuaded to return to Montclair in 1938 and now again. In one of his last reviews, the late Lawrence Gilman, music critic, commented: "What an orchestra this is, with is triumphant discipline, its precision and suppleness and clarity, its tonal splendor and exquisiteness."

Tickets are on sale at Unity Institute office, 67 Church Street, telephone Montclair 2-6770.



RUDOLF SERKIN

Distinguished pianist who will play Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto in G major with the Boston Symphony next week.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MAPLEWOOD, N. J.
WEEKLY RECORD
DEC 15 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SOUTH ORANGE, N. J.
WEEKLY RECORD

DEC 15 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SOUTH ORANGE, N. J.
WEEKLY RECORD

DEC 15 1939

Old Boston Orchestra Coming to New Jersey

Now in its fifty-seventh season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, founded by Major Henry Lee Higginson, which had its first concert in the autumn of 1881, will appear Wednesday evening, January 10, at Montclair High School as an extra event in connection with the celebration of the twentieth anniversary season of the Unity Concert Series of Montclair.

Dr. Serge Kouseevitzky has been at the helm of this orchestra fifteen years and has enjoyed a regime longer than any of his predecessors. He will conduct the orchestra when it comes to Montclair.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

DEC 16 1939

Comment

DOROTHY MAYNOR'S DEBUT
(Boston Herald)

To be described as "a native Kirsten Flagstad" by Serge Koussevitzky and then, without previous experience as a solo performer, to be required to justify that appellation before a critical New York audience is an arduous ordeal. That was the lot of Dorothy Maynor, a 28-year-soprano from Norfolk, Va., and graduate of the Hampton Institute's famous choir, when she walked on the stage of New York's Town Hall recently. To say that she achieved an unequivocal triumph would not be truthful, because the critics agreed that she needs further training, especially in the control of her high notes. But they are also unanimous in their opinion that she possesses phenomenal natural talents and a fine musical intelligence.

Miss Maynor bravely made no concessions to her inexperience. She chose a most difficult program from Bach, Handel, Mozart, Schubert and Strauss. Jerome D. Bohm of the Herald Tribune noted that she "gave evidence of nervousness in her opening Bach air," but "in the ensuing 'O, Sleep, Why Dost Thou Leave Me' of Handel, the warm, transparent texture of the soprano's voice and the beautifully proportioned phrasing in mezza voce which was to characterize so much of her later efforts were already observable." Olin Downes of the Times concluded that "with her astonishing gifts she should be wary of too much singing and too little deliberate study at this time. She should be able to reach almost any height as one of the leading concert singers of her generation."

Thus it seems that with expert guidance Miss Maynor will join that eminent group of Negro singers which now includes Roland Hayes, Marian Anderson and Paul Robeson. Endowned with superb natural talents and trained in the musical lore of the world, they need yield to no other artists of whatever race. Prof. Earnest A. Hooton, the Harvard anthropologist, believes we should recognize—rather than overlook—distinguishing racial traits, and when they are beneficial, as in the case of the Negro's affinity for music, encourage them. The public's support of Miss Maynor's career is a step in this direction. As fellow-Americans, we may all be proud of her.

Only in a few strong professions, notably medicine and law and the older branches of engineering, can it be said that the possession of a degree today necessarily means anything.—Dr. Frederick P. Keppel, president, Carnegie Corporation of New York.

Japan would find it costly to go deeper into China, and it looks now as though it would settle down and try to hold what it has.—Rear Admiral Harry E. Yarnell, former commander of U. S. Asiatic fleet.

I am satisfied from all that I have seen that the British soldier today at least is the equal of his predecessor both in efficiency and spirit.—King George VI of England.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 17 1939

AMERICAN COMPOSER

Question Raised Once More of Whether He Has Support of Press

By OLIN DOWNES

CORRESPONDENTS complain that the American composer and American music in general are not properly supported by the American press. Certain of these letters, two of which are published elsewhere on this page, make statements which invite comment.

Did the critics "throw such cold water on the all-American programs given by the Boston Symphony in New York?" THE TIMES, in a special Sunday article, praised Dr. Koussevitzky for his enterprise in giving such prominence and encouragement to native American music. Long reviews were written of both programs; their general conclusions were flattering to the composers represented as also to the leader and orchestra who interpreted them. Nor was THE TIMES alone in its commendation.

As for Mr. Hanson's "Romantic" Symphony, when played here on another occasion, it gave evidence of a gifted composer who was finding himself. As remembered, it had not as much depth and richness as the Third Symphony, which Dr. Koussevitzky directed at his recent New York concert. We doubt if many people consider the "Romantic" Symphony the equal of Franck's or believe it necessary to make such a claim in order to value fully the score of a talented American.

* * *

THE argument about nationalism in music is waged afresh every few years. We believe that all great music confesses to its national origin. We do not think that Tchaikovsky created Russian music, and we do think that Russian music and Russian spirit had a great deal to do with the shaping of Tchaikovsky's expression. It seems rather obvious that all the great Russian composers whose works live in the repertory today are quite unmistakably Russian in idiom and in racial consciousness, even though, as individual composers, they stood as far apart as were Tchaikovsky from Rimsky-Korsakoff and Rimsky-Korsakoff from Mussorgsky, etc.

To give more space to American composers is exactly what would be done if a sufficient amount of significant American music, comparing creditably with the products of European masters, should materialize. As the matter stands American creative effort in music receives constantly more encouragement, because the quality of national composition is steadily improving, while the music that comes from Europe is showing unmistakable signs of disintegration. But, with the best will in the world, a newspaper reviewer cannot create composers of towering genius to write about. In composition the Yanks are coming, always faster, and in increasing numbers, and we wait, with high anticipation, for their arrival.

Are the efforts of American composers unjustly minimized? From the standpoint of the newspaper desk it seems that a great deal of attention is given the American composer, and quick recognition of the fact when he makes the grade. But this is not to say that any writer or any American newspaper would be so provincial as to claim for the native composer a rank equal to that of representative men of genius whose music the public quite logically prefers to hear in greater quantity than the native product.

* * *

WHEN an American's music is not praised he doubtless is hurt, and his fortunes are not furthered by adverse estimates. But that is not neglect or gratuitous "caning." What reason in the world would any newspaper have to disparage its home product? America, its public and its press want very much to discover an American creative musician who will stand as a representative of his people and a world figure in his art. The country will fall prostrate at his feet when he comes.

There is certainly disparity in the space expended upon American and foreign music, if "disparity" means giving equal attention to production which, on the one hand, is formative and seldom of the highest quality, and, on the other hand, music which in quantity and quality furnishes us with the major part of our performing material. Have all the American composers together produced the equivalent and the value to the repertory of the works of a Chopin or a Brahms? Have we yet a Stravinsky in our midst? A Hindemith? A Sibelius? Should a newspaper load its columns with news of the activities of a national group which is only now finding its feet and which, neither in this nor any preceding generation, has produced a score certain to outlive its period?

* * *

DO our composers trouble to read what is said of most musical importations from overseas? Do they recall the savagely critical comment that very frequently has followed the American première of a foreign composition? What was said when young Sonzogno came over and his piece was played under Mr. Toscanini at a Philharmonic-Symphony concert? It is one of many examples of forthright condemnation which could readily be brought to mind.

This is not to say that every one of our composers has received his due, or that every score of any merit existing in America has been performed. Or that, due to the preponderance of conductors of foreign birth and tradition in our midst, the native composer has always been regarded by them with the wholly exceptional interest shown by Dr. Koussevitzky. There is much to be done to remedy disparities in the situation.

But before Koussevitzky the Boston Symphony played frequently the works of leading New England composers.

Frederick Stock in Chicago performed a similar service for native composers, especially those of the Middle West and farther afield, in addition to the works of the Eastern group. Few of these compositions remained in the repertory, but John Alden Carpenter emerged from the list, as did a certain few others, and Mr. Carpenter is well known over America, and he has had European performances. Mr. Stokowski in lesser degree has cultivated the music of certain Americans. Mr. Toscanini has done little in the field and has on occasions shown a predelection for Italian and other music of little importance. But in the sum, the best American orchestral scores seem to have had hearings and to have been given much attention in the newspapers. Of course, there have been wide divergences between the critical reactions of the composers themselves, their friends and the critics.

* * *

OUTSIDE these particular fields we find many more performances of American music, as, for examples, the hundreds of performances of American works, by composers living and dead, which the WPA orchestras have played through the country; the many opportunities that were given young composers here and in some other centers to try their wings out of sight of the great public at the Composers Forum concerts; the immense impetus given American chamber music by the society which publishes chamber compositions by Americans and encourages their performance; the commissions Mrs. Coolidge has given native composers, in numbers, to produce music for which she provides wide opportunities of hearing. Then there are the radio organizations, the special prizes they and many other institutions have offered. There is Mr. Hanson's very important series of orchestral concerts of manuscript works by Americans which also offers opportunity for the publication of the best scores that he discovers. This list could be greatly extended.

Conditions are not so unpropitious for the native composer. Isn't it time for him to buckle to, with all the energy and unsparing self-criticism he can muster, and concentrate on producing the music?

COMPARISON OF LOCAL CONCERTS

Post Dec 17, 39

Showing How Those Symphony Tastes Change

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

TO AVOID any misunderstanding, let it be said at the outset that Dr. Koussevitzky is a conductor of unusually catholic tastes, probably the most broadminded of all the conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. We may well remind ourselves, however, that for many years the orchestra was led by men of Teutonic birth or affiliation: Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, Fiedler and Muck. Then came the Frenchmen, Rabaud and Monteux, followed in the autumn of 1924 by the present incumbent, whose reign has been the longest and in many respects the most brilliant of all.

The other day Max Fiedler died, leaving only Muck, Monteux and Rabaud, of the pre-Koussevitzkian conductors, among the living. It so happens that the Post's music critic acquired his first season ticket to the Symphony Concerts in the first of Mr. Fiedler's four consecutive seasons, that of 1908-09. In those years German music still dominated the tonal scene. Even the ephemeral imported novelties, pieces played for the first and last times, were largely German or Austrian as afterwards they were to be chiefly French and then French and Russian.

Impelled by both sentiment and curiosity, your correspondent compared the programmes of Mr. Fiedler's four seasons with those of the last four complete seasons under Dr. Koussevitzky. Before stating the sometimes surprising figures, it should be suggested that in Mr. Fiedler's day no assistant conductor or guest-conductors took over from three to five of the 24 pairs of concerts.

Of the greater Germanic composers the only ones who have made a gain are Bach, Handel, Haydn and Mahler (by birth a Bohemian Jew.) Stating the Fiedler performances first, here are the scores: Bach, 3-11; Handel, 2-3; Haydn, 3-9; Mozart, 17-11; Beethoven, 37-25; Schubert, 12-2; Weber, 12-2; Schumann, 13-8; Mendelssohn, 7-6; Liszt, 10-3; Wagner, 40-16; Bruckner, 4-3; Brahms, 19-19; Mahler, 0-5; Strauss, 24-14.

To what extent a conductor's programmes exemplify his own predilections and to what degree they reflect the tastes of the public cannot definitely be said, but certain of the above comparisons are significant. For example, Bach is more highly thought of than he was at one time, and the popularity of Beethoven has undoubtedly waned. That Mahler, after years of neglect, is on the up-and-up cannot be denied, even if he squeezes into the repertory through single movements of his symphonies. This afternoon the New York Philharmonic-Symphony is playing and broadcasting the Adagietto of the Fifth, as Dr. Koussevitzky recently played the Adagio of the Ninth. Some day, no doubt, this kind of pussy-footing will end.

To return to Mr. Fiedler's programmes as compared with Dr. Koussevitzky's over the above four-year period, here are two astonishing ratios: Debussy, 10-7; Tchaikovsky, 21-9. . . . Who said we were getting an overdose of Russian music? Although the later symphonies of Sibelius were not then available, Mr. Fiedler introduced to Boston many of the tone poems and suites, and his Sibelius score was 11 to Dr. Koussevitzky's 19.

The English composers had rather the better of it then. Mr. Fiedler played here for the first time, and also the last, Elgar's First Symphony and, had it not been for the repetition under Sir Adrian Boult, the same might be said of his performance of Elgar's Second. Delius was also heard from and the almost forgotten Bantock.

We have heard a lot about the neglect of the American composer, but that individual never had reason to complain of a raw deal at Symphony Hall. In Mr. Fiedler's time the native composers were those of another generation, but during his four years he offered, generally as novelties, compositions by MacDowell, Chadwick, Hadley, Converse, Gilbert and Foote.

Only the other day, at a luncheon in New York, President Gene Buck, of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers, was berating the conductors of symphony orchestras for their "snobbishness" toward the American composer. This makes a good point for the musical jingoist, and it always gets a hand from the unthinking, patriotically-minded listener. But when we get down to cases, it is mostly hooey.

* * * *

Two American compositions will be heard in Boston this week, although not at Symphony Hall. On Wednesday evening at Jordan Hall Quincy Porter, Dean of the New England Conservatory, will conduct the season's second concert of the Conservatory Orchestra. On his programme are Walter Piston's Prelude and Fugue, already played here by the State Symphony Orchestra, under Alexander Thiede, and "Work No. 22," by Robert Delaney. Born in Baltimore, Mr. Delaney was once connected with the Concord School of Music and his wife is a granddaughter of Ralph Waldo Emerson. Mr. Porter's other numbers are Beethoven's Overture to "Coriolanus," Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" and Bach's D-minor Concerto for Harpsichord, to be played by Margaret Mason of the faculty.

At the Symphony Concerts of this week Dr. Koussevitzky will bring to its first performances the Second Symphony of Nicolai Lopatnikov, who has recently made America his home. Rudolf Serkin will appear as soloist in the Fourth Piano Concerto of Beethoven, and the programme will open with Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor, No. 12 of the set composed in London 200 years ago last September.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 17 1939

MUSIC and MUSICIANS

BY JOHN W. TEBBEL

FRESH from a tour of six mid-western cities, the Boston Symphony opens up shop ~~at home~~ again this week. The regular concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday night offer something old, something new and a piece of piano virtuosity thrown in.

The old is Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings in B minor, which opens the program. The new is a world premiere of Nicolai Lopatnikov's Second Symphony, a work by a Russian who now lives in this country. Rudolf Serkin provides the virtuoso touch with Beethoven's fourth piano concerto in G major.

On Thursday night, the orchestra jaunts out to Sanders Theatre in Cambridge for its third concert there, the program to include Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia In Aulis," Schumann's First Symphony, Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and the second "Daphnis and Chloe" suite of Ravel.

◆ ◆ ◆

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 17 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
DEC 17 1939

More Consideration For American Music

Music Editor, New York Herald Tribune:

Why did your critics throw such cold water on the all-American programs by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in ~~New York?~~ I am not an advocate for American music per se—I am an advocate for good American music, and we have many composers in America today who are writing good music. For example, the Romantic Symphony of Howard Hanson's is just as worthy a work, in my opinion, as the Cesar Franck Symphony.

Your critics are always talking about expressing Americanism in music, always saying that American composers are merely imitators of European composers. They want nationalism in music! What is nationalism in music? I wish these good critics could explain it to us. Music is music no matter where it is written. It is absurd to put the stamp of nationalism on such composers as Bach, Beethoven, Brahms or even Sibelius and Tchaikovsky. These composers have something to say which is individual to them, irrespective of the countries in which they were reared. What they express is universal in its appeal, not national.

You should give more space to the worthy composers of American compositions and less space to mediocre compositions of comparatively unknown European composers. I think your critics in general have a snobbish attitude toward music. Certainly the American musician is entitled to more consideration than is given him by the metropolitan press.

EDWARD KURTZ,
Head, Department of Music,
Iowa State Teachers College.
Cedar Falls, Iowa, Dec. 11, 1939.

122

THIS CLIPPING FROM PUEBLO, COLO.
STAR JOURNAL

DEC 17 1939

MUSICAL MUSINGS

By MAX KAPLAN
Director of Music Department,
Pueblo Junior College

America is proud of calling itself the haven of the oppressed, the land of tolerance and of independent thot. We point to the great musicians who have come to our shores — Schoenberg, Hindemuth, Semlinsky, Jaromir Weinberger—men not wanted by their native country. Lest we be carried away by our own grandeur and magnanimity, I shall relate a story.

Come back with me to 1915, to Boston, the proud and provincial seat of American culture. We are in a concert hall, listening to the Boston Symphony orchestra, which was then (and some say, is now) the greatest of all orchestras. Who is that ghost-like spirit on the conductor's podium, with a face of "tense muscles, eyes of penetrating sharpness, lips with hard corners, and an assertive chin that speaks power?" It is Dr. Karl Muck, one of the world's great masters. His doctorate came from study at Heidelburg and Leipzig. He has won his artistic spurs with the Philharmonic in Vienna, at the Covent Garden in London, with the Boston orchestra in 1915. He is world-famous. Boston is proud to have and honor him.

The other day, Dr. Muck was met at the pier by a reporter. Anything Muck says is front-page stuff. He is asked his opinion of Germans cutting off children's ears in Belgium. Muck should have refused to answer such cheap journalisms, but he is intellectually honest. "I cannot believe these stories about my countrymen." The reporter got his story.

We are at the concert, Muck's first of the season. One hears rumblings. Our neighbor remarks something sotto voce about "damn German music". A few bald-heads cough even more than usual to attract attention to themselves as they wiggle in their seats like overfat worms. But it is still 1915. We Americans are neutrals, and music is universal, international.

Some months later. America has entered the fray. We must be patriots! Be on the lookout for "alien enemies"! Watch for foreign propaganda! This Karl Muck, why does he play German music? Didn't the professors at the University of Wisconsin just issue their great volume proving conclusively that the German culture has always been inferior? This Muck must be an enemy agent! The newspapers must be right!

CONCERT IS CANCELED TO PREVENT RIOT

So goes the public mind in 1917. Muck answers that he is a naturalized Swiss; that, as every one knows, he has for some time been at odds with the kaiser. But public feeling boils on. It is Oct. 30, 1917. Providence, R. I. The Boston orchestra plays here tonight. Citizens write to the papers. Women's clubs sign petitions. They demand that Muck open with The Star Spangled Banner. He refuses. It is a poor piece of music, he says.

Four days pass. Dr. Muck announces that he will play our national anthem—his own arrangement. It is in his arrangement combined with very Germanic figures from Wagner's Tannhauser. But the distinguished conductor fails to turn to the audience to acknowledge the applause. The Americans sulk. More headlines.

Another four days pass. In Baltimore, the Boston orchestra's concert has been cancelled by the police to avoid a riot. A great mass meeting is held to denounce this enemy Muck. The governor of Maryland speaks, and recommends mobbing this musical propagandist. One of the town's refined ladies cries from the balcony, "Let's kill him!" The meeting is a success.

Headlines continue. Boston orchestra concerts are boycotted by women's clubs. It is now March of 1918. The announcement goes out that Dr. Muck will resign at the end of the season. The public is not satisfied. Twenty-five days of hunting German witches have gone by in March. It is 9 p. m. That dirty Hun Muck is in his home. He is tired from rehearsing Bach's St. Mathew Passion. A knock at the door. Policemen enter with a warrant. The enemy is captured in his lair! He goes to prison.

Ten days of waiting. Then, the sentence comes from Washington, the fount of American liberty—Dr. Karl Muck is an obvious enemy of the American nation. He must be locked up in a Georgia cell until the war is over. Prisoner No. 1337. The public is relieved. As one leading music magazine writes editorially, "good ridance—".

Fourteen months go by. Quietly, for this man is dangerous, the government deports Dr. Muck.

The story is ended. In December of 1939, Dr. Muck is still alive, but apparently incorrigible. For he still conducts the operas of Wagner. But I wonder what are his thots this season of "brotherhood and good-will toward all men" as he looks westward across the seas to the land that is a strange compound of liberty and neutrality and tolerance and Boston culture?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

DEC 18 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM TORONTO, CANADA
STAR

DEC 20 1939

RUSSIAN PLAYS FINLANDIA

Boston, Dec. 20. —(UP)— As a gesture of good will and sympathy toward Finland, the Boston Symphony orchestra's Russian-born conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, said today that the orchestra's programs this week-end will be augmented by Jan Sibelius' "Finlandia."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

DEC 20 1939

Thus on the calendar for this week there are no formal concerts listed except those in the regular series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. At these Rudolf Serkin, pianist, will be assisting artist, playing the Beethoven Concerto No. 4 in G major. Lopatnikoff's Second Symphony will be given its first performance anywhere. Rounding out the program will be the Handel Concerto Grosso No. 12 in B minor for String Orchestra.

Nikolai Lopatnikoff was born in Russia, March 16, 1903. After the revolution of 1917 with his family he fled from Russia and settled in Helsinki, Finland, although subsequently he studied in Heidelberg with Toch and Rehberg. Virtually, however, he is a man without a country. He has written a symphony in addition to the one to be presented in Boston, an opera, a good deal of chamber music and numerous pieces for the piano. His suite "Toccata, Canzonetta and Burlesca" was played for the first time in America by Helen Teschner in February of last year.

In the advertising columns of this newspaper the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has suggested the pleasure one may afford to musical friends by the Christmas gift of tickets for one of the two series of concerts by the orchestra, some of which are available for the remainder of the season, which has still some months to run. From Chicago comes word that tickets for concerts are having quite a vogue there as Christmas gifts. Some of these gifts, for example, will enable the recipients to hear Flagstad in her only recital of the season in Chicago on Jan. 17. And friends of the Chicago Symphony are advocating similar expression of Christmas goodwill.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

DEC 18 1939

The Bohemians Fete Steinway At Club Dinner

Musicians Express Their Gratitude; Artists Offer Entertainment Program

By Francis D. Perkins

With Theodore Steinway, president of the long-established piano firm of Steinway & Sons, as guest of honor, the New York musicians' club known as The Bohemians gave its annual benefit dinner last night in the grand ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel. The club, it was noted in the dinner programs, thus expressed its grateful recognition of the many courtesies which have been extended to it by Mr. Steinway and his firm, and this was also one of the keynotes in the address of Ernest Hutcheson, president of The Bohemians.

Mr. Steinway, saying that to be a guest of honor of this club was one of the ambitions to which he had aspired from the early days of his career, spoke of various notable personalities whom he had met in the course of his early musical experiences, and, in particular, Ignace Jan Paderewski, whose association with the house of Steinway had begun with the eminent pianist's first American tour in 1891. Mr. Steinway warmly expressed the wish that "all of us may once more gaze on that grave and beautiful face."

Rudolf Serkin, pianist, who had volunteered at short notice to replace the indisposed Carl Friedberg, began the musical program with Schumann's Abegg Variations. Marjorie Lawrence, Metropolitan Opera soprano, sang the Immolation Scene from Wagner's "Gotterdammerung." Jascha Heifetz, violinist, played Saint-Saens's "Havanaise" and a waltz by Tchaikovsky, and Vitya Vronsky and Victor Babin played two-piano music by Busoni, Rachmaninoff and Rimsky-Korsakoff. Felix Wolfes and Emanuel Bay accompanied for Miss Lawrence and Mr. Heifetz. All the artists answered an eager demand for encores. Mr. Serkin added a scherzo and a Song Without Words by Mendelssohn to the scheduled list, and Miss Lawrence also sang a Scottish folksong and Richard Strauss's "Zueignung."

Mr. Hutcheson, who praised the piano as the most complete of all musical instruments, except for the organ, called for a special toast for Mrs. Steinway. He read a telegram from Mr. Friedberg regretting his inability to make his scheduled appearance, owing to a severe cold, and messages from Josef Hofmann, Albert Spalding, and Dr. and Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, regretting their inability to be present.

The entertainment committee which made the arrangements for the dinner consisted of Albert von Doenhoff, chairman; Carl Deis and James Friskin. The club holds a large-scale dinner each year for a prominent personality in the musical world—Kirsten Flagstad was the guest of honor last year and Josef Hofmann in 1937—and devotes the net proceeds to the Musicians' Foundation, Inc., an affiliate of the club which, with Carl Deis as treasurer, aids musicians in need. This is The Bohemians' thirty-third season.

Those listed at the guest table, in addition to the speakers and artists, included Mr. and Mrs. John Barbirolli, Mr. and Mrs. Georges Barrere, Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Brailowsky, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Damrosch, Jacques Danielson, Olin Downes, Mr. and Mrs. Mischa Elman, Mr. and Mrs. George Engles, John Erskine, Mr. and Mrs. Fraser Gange, Emilio de Gogorza, Mrs. Heifetz, Fannie Hurst, Mr. and Mrs. Hermann Irion, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Jagel, Edward Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. Josef Lhevinne, Leonard Liebling, Mr. and Mrs. Emanuel List, Mr. and Mrs. Sergei Rachmaninoff, Mr. and Mrs. Moriz Rosenthal, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Rubinstein, Olga Samaroff Stokowski, Mr. and Mrs. David Sarnoff, Mr. and Mrs. Friedrich Schorr, Mrs. Frederick T. Steinway, Mrs. Theodore E. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. William R. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Stoessel, Deems Taylor, Oscar Thompson, Oscar Wagner, Mrs. Herbert Witherspoon, Princess Irina Wolkonsky, Helen Worden and Edward Ziegler.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DALLAS, TEXAS
[illegible]-JOURNAL

DEC 21 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM HERKIMER, N. Y.
TELEGRAM

DEC 21 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM HOUSTON, TEX.
PRESS

DEC 21 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN

DEC 21 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, OHIO
POST

DEC 21 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM KINGSTON, N. Y.
LEADER

DEC 21 1939

'FINLANDIA' PUT ON PROGRAM BY RUSSIAN-BORN CONDUCTOR

Boston, Dec. 20, (UP)—As a gesture of good will and sympathy toward Finland, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Russian-born conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today that the orchestra's programs this weekend will be augmented by Jan Sibelius' "Finlandia."

MUSIC

Trans. Dec. 22 '39

Racine Memorial By Koussevitzky

In honor of Jean Baptiste Racine, who was born 300 years ago yesterday, Dr. Koussevitzky opened the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program last night in Sanders Theater with the Overture to Gluck's "Iphigenie en Aulide" which is based on Racine's tragedy of the same name. It was a vigorous and impressive interpretation which included Wagner's concert ending of the overture.

Schumann's "Spring" Symphony, which followed, has been played several times by the orchestra this season. If details of this performance were not as meticulous as on former occasions, Dr. Koussevitzky conducted with more sweep and intensity than he had given the symphony yet this season, and the audience gave both leader and orchestra a resounding ovation.

Prokofieff and Ravel

The second half of the program consisted of Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" and the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe." Written long before "neo-classicism" as a program existed, the Prokofieff Symphony is yet one of the best works in that idiom for it is light and witty without eschewing emotional content. Its spare orchestration fared exceedingly well under the expert baton of Koussevitzky and with the polished execution of his instrumentalists.

"Daphnis et Chloe" is a work which has become particularly identified with Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony. Doubtless the acoustics of Sanders Theater had something to do with it, but last night there seemed to be more brilliancy and intensity of tone than we had eved heard in the Ravel masterpiece before. There was considerable subtlety of nuance and delicate dynamics as well. Dr. Kousevitzky again outdid himself and he found his audience more than appreciative.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CAMDEN, N. J.
POST

DEC 21 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 21 1939

KOUSSEVITZKY FOR FINNS

Boston, Dec. 20.—(UP) — Russian-born Conductor Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will show his sympathy for invaded Finland by augmenting the orchestra's week-end program with Jan Sibelius's "Finlandia."

MONITOR, BOSTON, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1939

123

—Koussevitzky to Offer New Work

Herald Dec. 23 '39

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The ninth regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Rudolf Serkin, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows.

Handel
Concerto Grosso for strings in B minor No. 12
Lopatnikoff Symphony No. 2 Op. 24
Beethoven
Piano Concerto No. 4 in G major Op. 58
Sibelius "Finlandia," Tone Poem, Op. 26

Nikolai Lopatnikoff's Second Symphony, which was heard yesterday for the first time anywhere, is a work that is chiefly interesting on the rhythmical side and in the writing for wind instruments. The rhythms are energetic and uncomplicated. In fact the Symphony is a kind of ballet suite and has little either of emotional impulse or intellectual problems for us to fall back upon.

When the music gets away from the dance-like beat, it quickly fades. In the slow movement, for example, the vitality which sustained us in the first movement and the allegretto is drained out. Nor does the finale, with its reference to the first movement, revive our attention. The symphony, then, is remarkable for the adroit and beguiling scherzo. This is highly agreeable music and would be ideal for the ballet stage.

We suspect that the vigor of the first movement would not wear well. Heard once it is effective enough, though naturally such conjecture would have to wait a second hearing for confirmation. The second movement offered a splendid chance for the wind instruments of the orchestra, and they took full advantage of it. The new symphony was certainly very eloquently set forth under Mr. Koussevitzky's guidance. Mr. Lopatnikoff came forward to acknowledge the applause.

So superb was Mr. Serkin's playing in the Beethoven G major Concerto and so admirable the accompaniment by Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra that we shall be forced to grub around for a few of those superlatives so dear to the press. Mr. Serkin's fluent, clearly articulated technique, his firm touch that was never brutal, his thoroughly musical interpretation must have been the envy of every pianist in the hall. Both orchestra and conductor perfectly united their talents to his, so that the performance was in every way memorable.

Hardly less memorable, under the shadow of present conditions in Finland, was the performance of Sibelius' "Finlandia." Here is a tone poem that is correctly considered among the master's lesser works. Yet its political implications bring an extra emotional meaning to it in the sympathies of all save the friends of Stalin. The effect of the reading yesterday afternoon was positively shattering.

The concert opened with a Handel Concerto Grosso, with the two fast movements transposed from their usual order. Aside from the over-long allargando at the end, the performance was one of great dignity. If it did nothing else, it served to remind us of the excellence of the Boston Symphony's strings.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky will lead Debussy's music from "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," with the assistance of the Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler, and [illegible]ra Wood, soprano. The opening numbers will be Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande" Suite and Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

THIS CLIPPING FROM WILMINGTON, DEL.
STAR
DEC 24 1939

DOROTHY MAYNOR, the sensational Negro soprano who was discovered only last summer by Serge Koussevitzky at the Berkshire music festival, will be soloist with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony at a special concert on January 16 for the benefit of the orchestra pension fund.

Miss Maynor made her New York concert debut last month. Almost unheralded except by word of mouth, she was an instant success. Since then, she has been acclaimed in Boston, Toronto, Montreal and a few other cities.

She plans to limit her concert engagements during the coming year, devoting her time to study and enlargement of her repertoire.

Lopatnikoff's New Symphony

By Alfred H. Meyer

To the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra returns Nikolai Lopatnikoff with a new symphony, his second, completed this year in New York City. His music has heretofore been known to Bostonians principally through his Scherzo, which Dr. Koussevitzky played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1928.

Mr. Lopatnikoff, a Russian by birth, studied music in Russia, in Finland and in Germany. In this latter country he was for a time under the guidance of Ernst Toch. His interest, however, has not been entirely in music, for in 1927 he was graduated from the Technical High School at Kalsruhe with an engineer's diploma. Shortly afterward he returned to music.

The breadth of his interests is further exemplified by his ability in games and sports. For he is said to be not only an excellent chess and bridge player, but also to have played tennis with most of the world champions in that sport. After residence in Russia, Finland, Germany, again Finland, then England, he came to America in April of the present year, with the intention of making his permanent home in this country.

* * *

Mr. Lopatnikoff's musical ancestry stems through Bach, Borodin and Moussorgsky, Hindemith and Stravinsky. He has written mostly in atonal or near-atonal idioms. At Symphony Hall yesterday morning he gave information to the effect that the present symphony is his first major orchestral work in which he departs definitely from the atonal manner and which he has cast into a definite tonal scheme. It is distinctly Russian in mood and spirit, but uses no Russian folk material. It avoids both the pessimism of Tchaikovsky and the barbaric brilliance of some of the nationalist "Five." Yet it is nearer to the occasional mild Orientalism of some of the "Five" than to Tchaikovsky.

The Symphony begins with an introduction, "Allegro moderato," in F minor. The theme presented here is of importance in that it is used again in the final coda at the end of the fourth movement—now in altered form in the key of F major.

The main body of the first movement of the symphony, "Allegro molto," though not in the conventional sonata form, nevertheless presents the two basic contrasted ideas always found in such a form. The first is objective, aggressive, well rhythmed, mounts to its own considerable, agitated climax. The second is more introspective and lyrical. Out of the interplay of these two groups of thematic material grows the form of the movement. For Mr. Lopatnikoff believes that the material of a composition should always dictate its form. At the supreme climax of the movement there is a return to the introductory material and eventually a short coda.

* * *

The second and third movements are more relaxed in character. The second corresponds somewhat to the character of the scherzo in the conventional symphony. But the mood is that of a wistful allegretto rather than of a true scherzo. In this movement the strings play pizzicato throughout. There is but a single thematic idea, and that is developed entirely in wind instruments.

The third or slow movement is rhapsodic in character and form. Again the wind instruments are prominent. Mr. Lopatnikoff's information is that he had in thought the telling of a tale or a legend. Probably a romanticist might have labelled it "Ballade" or "Legende."

The finale is again a more fully developed movement. There is a short introduction which ascends to a turbulent "Allegro con fuoco." After it has worked out its own material it ends with the repetition, in F major, of the introduction to the symphony, thus rounding out finally the unity of the symphony as a whole.

Hartley Art at Symphony Hall

By Dorothy Adlow

The first Boston exhibition of Marsden Hartley is to be shown in the first balcony gallery of Boston Symphony Hall during the concerts through Jan. 6. In Boston art life this exhibition is an event, for Mr. Hartley is a native New Englander to whom fame and recognition have come, despite native indifference. Born in Lewiston, Maine, in 1877, he now lives in Bangor, where he paints local themes. For many years he has been associated with the vanguard of Americans who introduced French modern pictures and ideas to America in the Armory Show of 1913. He was first recognized by Alfred Stieglitz, who showed his pictures in 1909 at the renowned "291" Gallery. A great deal has happened in the unfolding of American art since those days, and if Mr. Hartley was looked upon as an untamable revolutionary then, American painters of the younger generation are catching up with him.

The pictures on view at Symphony Hall were made in the last half dozen years. We may, consequently, see Mr. Hartley in his most mature style, painting with the benefit of years of experience, revolt, and mellowing. It is a most interesting record of achievement, reflecting as it does the convictions of a man in his sixties who is still looked upon as an unpredictable enfant terrible. Were he younger, it might be said by a critical observer that he displays youthful ebullience, and boundless energies which will be tempered with the passage of time. But, no. Such is not the case. Some of the most propulsive, the most fearless and forceful artists of today are in their sixties, and they seem to show no signs of subdual with advancing years.

* * *

Mr. Hartley by returning to the native scene shows one trait in common with a fellow artist of Maine, Winslow Homer. In fact, he provides us with a sort of twentieth-century version of the material which Homer painted with comparable vigor and independence. Some of the most compelling pictures at Symphony Hall are views of Maine, dense emerald-green fir trees darkening to gleaming black in shadows. At one stage in a career strongly marked by new and radical influences, Mr. Hartley was devoted to Courbet. And despite other sources of derivation in the post-Cézanne and Post-Impressionist manner, he seems to adhere most to the earthly realism of Courbet. Hartley heightens that realism by employing a more opulently loaded brush, by applying it with a powerful swing to the canvas. Waterfalls, surf, clouds, looming ledges are all emphatically visualized as they are perceived by a romantic artist. The textures are thickened, the colors deepened and enriched. But a fundamental orderliness is basic in all his pictures, an underlying structure.

Mr. Hartley was receptive. First it was Courbet, the realist, then Maillol, the master of the plastic; later he was won over by the nihilistic protestations of Dadaism. He wrote in the cynical and lawless manner of this German-bred group, abandoning for the time accepted rules of syntax and logic. But that is all in the distant past, for today Mr. Hartley is devoted to logic and order, even protestingly when he composes with deliberate symmetry, and drafts forms such as gulls in conventionalized manner.

* * *

There are portraits which favor a provincial simplicity, and which look back to spare, simplified Byzantine imagery. There are some depictions of Nova Scotian fishermen around whose tragic lives Mr. Hartley has spun a legend. It was not uncommon in times past for the artist and poet to be one. It is one of the features of modern life to specialize. In Mr. Hartley there is a blend of the literary and the plastic, the decorative and philosophic. What makes him important is the fact that he possesses the varied talents in balanced measure, and he makes no effort to subordinate one art to the other.

For us the most handsome pictures are the small portrayals of that extraordinary stretch of landscape which lies somewhat secluded on Cape Ann. We mean the historic Dogtown. Few artists have been able to translate the peculiar distinction of its terrain to canvas—the rocky land, the cedars, the shrubs, and above all, the prevailing silence. Mr. Hartley is one of the successful few. For him nature seems to liquefy, the trees are like molten gems, the rocks, like those of El Greco, become fluid.

Mr. Hartley loves white—warm, shimmering white, cool, chill white, gray, flowing white. He has discovered that white is a favorable tone for promoting an emotional effect. He uses it for contrast, for accents, and, in the case of a charming Chinese Sea Horse, as the dominant hue.

The exhibition is enlarged by the addition of many drawings and three lithographs, and by the writings of Mr. Hartley.

French Program For Next Symphony

Debussy's music for "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," the mystery play of d'Annunzio, will be performed under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky at the tenth pair of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Symphony Hall, Dec. 29 and 30. The Suite from the incidental music, one of Debussy's later scores, includes: "The Court of Lilies," "The Magic Chamber," "The Council of the False Gods," "The Broken Laurel," and "Paradise." The Cecilia Society Chorus, prepared by its conductor, Arthur Fiedler, and Cleora Wood, soprano, will assist.

Two other French composers, Gabriel Fauré and Paul Dukas, will be represented in the program. Three numbers will be played from the incidental music which Fauré wrote for Maeterlinck's "Pelléas et Melisande." Dukas' Scherzo "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," is the remaining number. The Scherzo has not been played at these series of concerts since 1925.

Sanromá for Soloist

Jesús María Sanromá will appear at the third pair of concerts of the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series to be given in Symphony Hall, Jan. 1 and 2. The noted pianist will appear with the orchestra in the Capriccio of Igon Stravinsky. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will open the program with the First Symphony of Beethoven, in C major, and close it with the Symphony in D minor by César

---

Globe Dec 23

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon was an emotional crescendo that reached its peak in Rudolf Serkin's glorious playing of the Beethoven Fourth Piano Concerto, and a hair-raising performance of Sibelius' "Finlandia." The afternoon began with the lovely, if longish, B minor Concerto, No. 12, by Handel. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky also conducted the first performance of the new Second Symphony by Nikolai Lopatnikoff.

Since the Sibelius tone poem was added to the program originally announced, it seems logical to assume that events in Finland prompted its inclusion. A quick look around the hall failed to show any signs of sympathetic demonstration such as were reported from New York a few days ago when some people stood during a performance at Carnegie Hall. At any rate, Dr. Koussevitzky drew from the Boston Symphony, playing about as fiery as one is likely to hear. When it was over there were cheers.

Glorious is just the word to convey some idea of how Rudolf Serkin re-created the G major Concerto of Beethoven. Here was a performance that seemingly could not be improved: of sculptured beauty in its outlines, fastidious as to style yet neither dry nor over-refined, and so perfectly done that the matter of piano technic was not even thought about. The orchestral accompaniment was in the same vein, moreover, and soloist and conductor were completely agreed in their interpretation.

The G major Concerto, more than its fellows, the fanciful, almost prophetic side of Beethoven's art. Some places in the brief slow movement look ahead to the end of the 19th Century. A correct performance of this work, therefore, would not be nearly so effective as in the case of the "Emperor" or C minor concertos; what is wanted is a great deal of musical imagination. Mr. Serkin was fully equal to that demand. The Friday audience, forgetting its usual reserve, applauded, stamped and cheered.

Nikolai Lopatnikoff is not a familiar name to Boston Symphony subscribers, although his orchestral Scherzo was performed here in 1928. His Second Symphony, designated as in F minor, was finished this year in New York, where he has permanently settled. It requires a large, virtuoso orchestra, and runs in the customary four movements.

Mr. Lopatnikoff's music is pleasant enough; it is also lively and to a degree absorbing. But if it were half so long, what he has to say would be in better proportion to length. The harmony is not too dissonant for the enjoyment even of a casual listener, and there is nothing austere about the Symphony. But he is inclined to dwell on rhythmic or melodic patterns to the point of sheer monotony. His orchestral colors are piquant, recalling Russian masters of the 19th century, though he uses them sparingly. Mr. Lopatnikoff bowed from the stage after the performance.

The strings made the most of the opportunity furnished them in Handel's Concerto Grosso to show off their dazzling beauty of tone.

C. W. D.

Gala Symphony

Trans- Dec. 23, 1939

Serkin Wins Ovation in Beethoven; Koussevitzky Does Brilliant Handel

A program of symphonic music as varied as it was brilliantly executed was presented by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Rudolf Serkin was the soloist of the day in Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto in G major. The occasion was further distinguished by the first performance anywhere of an interesting symphony by young Nikolai Lopatnikoff, who is now living in New York. Sibelius' "Finlandia" was played as a gesture of friendship to Finland and the program opened with Handel's 12th Concerto Grosso for string orchestra in B minor.

This Handel Concerto, a type of work we do not hear enough of, was one of the most distinguished interpretations Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra have given us this season. Our excellent strings were at their best, the tone was firm and clear and their execution well-nigh flawless. Dr. Koussevitzky achieved that rare balance between form and content, between strong emotion and the conscious architectural ordering of compositional line, which entitle a style or a performance to the adjective "classical."

The Larghetto was to this reporter a truly great piece of interpretation. This music is of the utmost simplicity, there is nothing daring or new about it, in fact it abounds in the harmonic and melodic cliches of the 18th century. But it has a compelling masculine lyricism such as only Handel ever achieved. The performance was aristocratic without ever becoming precious. It was sturdy, but never lost its refinement. It was charged with emotion but never became sentimental.

In a performance that came so near to the ideal, one was the more disappointed that Dr. Koussevitzky had not seen fit to include a harpsichord in his orchestra as Handel intended. There was a day when asking for a harpsichord at a concert was like asking for nightingale's tongues on toast. But today they are easily available.

It is hard to feel that the harpsichord in this work or others like it is optional. Not only does the usage of Handel's day demand it, Handel himself was perfectly explicit on the point. His orchestral voices include the "basso continuo" which mean 'celli and harpsichord, and the harmonies of the harpsichord part are clearly indicated. There are many places in the concerto where the harmony, without harpsichord sounds thin. This is particularly so in the Larghetto which is written in three voices and where there can be no question of the necessity of the harpsichord.

There is one argument more: the blending of the tones of the harpsichord with the strings of an orchestra has a particular charm. It produces a timbre which is peculiar to this period of music and without which the character of the work is, to a certain degree, falsified. We have been promised programs with a special emphasis on 18th century masters this winter. Let us hope we shall not be without harpsichord for all of them.

Lopatnikoff Premiere

Mr. Lopatnikoff's Second Symphony, the work of a man who is turning away from atonalism, turned out to be a rather uneven work with some eytremely entertaining qualities. The energetic and persistent dotted rhythms of his first movement had individual color. There was considerable humor in the development of Mr. Lopatnikoff's orchestra and there is a suave and dexterous coda. The second movement, an allegretto, was of an exotic mood with solo wood-wind chanting in semi-oriental or near-eastern fashion, while pizzicato strings supplied the accompaniment.

The slow movement which is so often the bane of modern composers, did not flow convincingly from Mr. Lopatnikoff's pen. It was the least distinctive of all four sections. Nor was the finale memorable. It was long, and diffuse, with echoes of Sibelius and other great men, episodic in character rather than architectural and perhaps for that reason not very effective as the cap to a symphonic structure.

The audience received the new work cordially and Mr. Lopatnikoff was on hand to acknowledge the applause.

Rudolf Serkin's performance of the Beethoven Fourth Concerto was a model of self-effacing, sound musicianship and quick pianistic charm. Mr. Serkin and Dr. Koussevitzky made music together with a unanimity of impulse and an understanding of each other's beat and phrasing that were phenomenal. Never did one noticeably wait or slow down for the other and yet there never was anything but harmony of rhythm and dynamics.

Mr. Serkin is no colossus at the piano and fortunately he did not try to make up for it by pounding. His tone was always limpid, his control of volume sensitive, his phrasing deeply felt and skillfully executed. One of his most beautifully conceived and effectively projected passages was the soft close of the Andante, leading into the vivacious rondo of the last movement. It was the kind of performance, ensemble as well as solo, that one wishes might have been preserved on records. The audience had sensed the unusual quality of the performance, unusual even for two such artists as Koussevitzky and Serkin, and it responded with an enthusiastic ovation for both men.

The crashing applause that followed the performance of "Finlandia" was as much a demonstration of friendship for doughty Finland as it was for the distinguished playing of orchestra and conductor. All in all, it was a concert of rare beauty, interest and excitement.

E. D.

Symphony Programs For Holiday Week-End

Debussy's music for "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," the mystery play of d'Annunzio, will be performed under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky at the tenth pair of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Symphony Hall, Dec. 29 and 30. The Suite from the incidental music, one of Debussy's later scores, includes: The Court of Lilies, The Magic Chamber, The Council of the False Gods, The Broken Laurel, and Paradise. Cleora Wood, soprano, and the Cecilia Society Chorus, prepared by its conductor, Arthur Fiedler, will assist the orchestra in this performance.

Two other French composers, Gabriel Faure and Paul Dukas, will be represented in the first portion of the program. Three numbers will be played from the incidental music which Faure wrote for Maeterlinck's "Pelleas and Melisande." Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," is the remaining number. The Scherzo has not been played at this series of concerts since 1925.

Jesus Maria Sanroma will appear at the third pair of concerts of the Monday Evening and Tuesday afternoon series to be given in Symphony Hall, Jan. 1 and 2, in the Capriccio of Igor Stravinsky. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will open the program with the First Symphony of Beethoven, in C major, and close it with the Symphony in D minor by Cesar Franck.

For the concerts of Friday and Saturday, Jan. 5 and 6, Joseph Szigetti will be the soloist in Block's Violin Concerto.

NEW SYMPHONY BY ORCHESTRA

Post- —— Dec 23 '3

Lopatnikoff's Second Is Given First Performance

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

What may well have been the most dramatic reading of Sibelius' "Finlandia" in that tone poem's history ended, as a sort of afterthought, yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert. Into it there seemingly went not only Dr. Koussevitzky's admiration for the heroic Finns, but also his opinion of their oppressors. So seldom does he play blood and thunder music nowadays that one had almost forgotten his capacities in that direction. They are considerable.

This concert, rich enough in incident for two, offered other thrills, if of a milder sort. At the beginning there was a performance of the 12th and last of the Concerti Grossi for strings that Handel wrote in London, in the space of 30 days, in the fall of 1739. This important anniversary was fitly commemorated, both in the music itself and in its presentation. It is to Dr. Koussevitzky's credit that he added this particular concerto to the orchestra's repertory, and it well deserves such place if only by reason of its broadly songful Larghetto.

Next in order was a new symphony, the Second of Nicolai Lopatnikoff, who has recently come to New York to live and who was on hand to hear his music and acknowledge from the stage the cordial plaudits of the audience. And a third commemorative performance, though probably not so intended, was that of Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto, with Rudolf Serkin as soloist, 131 years to a day after its first public hearing in Vienna.

Mr. Serkin, who plays the piano as though his 10 fingers were as many pianists, accomplished the expected miracles in the matter of pellucid runs, widely ranging and always beautiful tonal effects and brilliant bravoura. If any criticism could be made of playing so rich in perfections, it would be that Mr. Serkin's Beethoven savored a little of Mozart. But, after all, this Concerto represents the more gracious and feminine side of Beethoven's genius, thus making it a fitting mate for its imperial successor. To say that the audience liked Mr. Serkin is to resort to the emphasis of understatement.

And so, back to Mr. Lopatnikoff, whose Symphony was well nigh crowded out of the memory by the excitements which followed it. Energetic, straightforward, decidedly Russian, harking back to Tchaikovsky and Borodin, this Second Symphony (save for a tedious and ineffective slow movement), is agreeable but undistinguished. Its performance may be set down as a graceful gesture by the conductor to a former compatriot and now a brother in exile; but to it, as is his wont, he gave the best that he had. Fortunate is the composer who hears his music for the first time at Symphony Hall.

Serkin Symphony Soloist

C.E.M. Dec. 23 '39

The Arts in Boston

Nikolai Lopatnikoff's Second Symphony, in F minor, having its first performance anywhere, was the novelty of yesterday's Boston Symphony concert, the first of the ninth pair of the season in Symphony Hall.

Mr. Lopatnikoff is a young Russian who, as already noted in these columns, has with this symphony deserted the atonalists for more conventional procedures. He was represented at these concerts more than 11 years ago by his Scherzo for Orchestra, which Dr Koussevitzky gave its first performance. Since then he has written much, but none of his other works has been played here. Now he has come to the United States, and Dr. Koussevitzky has looked with favor on his latest composition. And so, apparently, did yesterday's audience, which applauded cordially.

The word "symphony" is not very accurately used as a title for the new work, which is not in symphonic form, and hardly can be said to have a content of symphonic proportions. Its chief quality is a strong rhythmic vitality. Its thematic material is not salient and the use of this material does hold the interest.

Listening to it, one felt that it must have been written for the dance. It has the barbaric tang and the variety of rhythms characteristic of its composer's compatriots in the field of the lyric theater. What a pity that Massine could not have come upon this piece for one of his dance compositions, instead of meddling with symphonic masterpieces that have their own artistic integrity.

The concert opened with a splendid performance of Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor, No. 12, which served to display the superb tonal quality and musical expressiveness of the orchestra's strings. It served also, one suspected, as a salute to the holiday season; if it was so intended, it was a gracious and appropriate gesture, because this music has a devotional quality.

Musically, the high point of the afternoon was the performance of Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto No. 4, in G major, with Rudolf Serkin as soloist. Mr. Serkin's liquid tones, exquisite lyricism, and musical sensibility, were paralleled by like qualities in conductor and orchestra, and the result was a performance of rare eloquence and moving power. There was an ovation for everybody concerned.

The expected tribute to Finland came, not through a program made up of the works of Sibelius, but through his "Finlandia," set at the end of the concert. The symphonic poem was played with a brilliance of tone and an emotional fervor that roused a lingering audience to renewed manifestations of enthusiasm.

L. A. S.

AS OTHERS SEE US

Trans- Dec 23 '39

Last week, in the course of their annual western trip, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a series of concerts in Rochester, Buffalo, Chicago, Ann Arbor, Cleveland and Pittsburgh. Some of the critical, but cordial voices that received them are recorded here.

IN CLEVELAND

The appearance of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Cleveland Concert Course was one of those rare events so electrically charged with emotional dynamite that words are feeble things to convey its overwhelming effect. And whatever is written about it can only be an extension of that audience tribute which made Public Music Hall resound last night with a mighty, heartfelt thank you.

Starting with the Mozart C Major Symphony, the famed Bostonians reached from the crystal purity of 18th century classicism through coloristic explorations of Debussy and Ravel, and found potent material for the conclusion of a perfectly built program in the breathless surge of Tschaikowsky's Fourth.

But if any one thing is more striking than another it is his (Koussevitzky's) uncanny ability to make one feel an accent without hearing it, to articulate every detail of design and preserve the singing line which achieves the highest kind of expressiveness in beauty of proportion. This was particularly notable in the Mozart which attained an almost incredible simplicity and graciousness, with reeds sounding through the silken texture of strings in a way that seemed to diffuse light in all directions. (Herbert Elwell in the Cleveland Plain Dealer).

IN ANN ARBOR

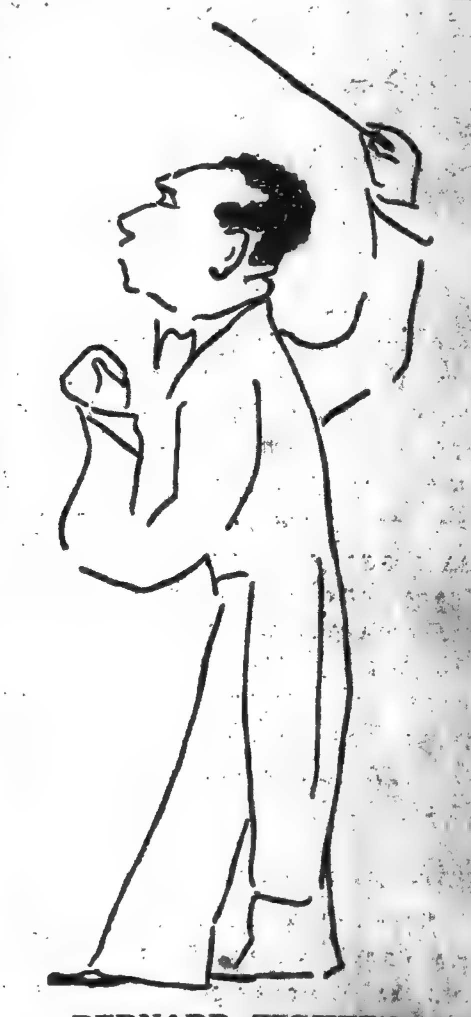
The Mozart C Major Symphony was played as though a philosopher had inscribed the score between the lines of the "Critique of the Pure Reason." Who is to say that this is not all to the good? For is there anyone who will deny that the amazing Austrian wrote a deeper music than most of his interpreters give him credit for having done. Dr. Koussevitzky's rendition was unquestionably scholarly and imbued with a conscious endeavor to maintain that severe concentration upon the pure musical thought which is accomplished by the select few. (Richard Bennett in the Michigan Daily).

IN CHICAGO

"Serge Koussevitzky, peer of all symphony conductors, who has molded the Boston Symphony Orchestra into an instrument that brooks no rival, gave us a concert at the Auditorium Theater last night that will live in memory as the musical event of the past decade.

"For the past thirty years this department annually has been harassed by music lovers desirous of obtaining our opinion on the status of symphony orchestras in America. The past few weeks have brought us beside our own, three other orchestras: the Philadelphia, New York Philharmonic and the Boston Symphony, four orchestras to conjure with. I, therefore, without further ado, proclaim the Boston Symphony to be the winner, followed closely by the Chicago Symphony and a dead heat between the New York and the Philadelphia in this year's symphonic tournament. . . .

"Debussy's 'La Mer,' three symphonic sketches that we have heard repeatedly these past twenty years or more, was a novelty for us last evening, for never did we feel the surge of the waves lashed by the wind more strikingly expressed in tone color, nor the gambols of the waves so playfully and pictorially portrayed than by this perfect orchestra (Herman Devries in the Chicago Herald-American).



BERNARD ZIGHERA
Who conducts his own Chamber Orchestra at Jordan Hall on Jan. 8, Feb. 5, March 11.

C.E.M. Nov 24 '39

Bliss With Symphony

Arthur Bliss will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Finale of his "Color" Symphony at the concerts of Monday evening, Dec. 4 and Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 5. This work will replace the Bliss Suite for String Orchestra, which was to have had its first presentation in America at these concerts, under Dr. Koussevitzky. The other numbers of the program will be Rachmanioff's Second Piano Concerto, with Simon Barer as soloist making his first Boston appearance, and Schumann's B flat Symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct these two works.

Globe- Dec 24 '39

Symphony Soloist

CLEORA WOOD
Boston soprano, who will be soloist in "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," at the Boston Symphony concerts, Friday and Saturday.

125

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

DEC 23 1939

An Issue of Musical Snobbery

Again, the Complaint That American Music Is Sniffed At by the Reviewers.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

"Why did your critics throw cold water on the all-American programs by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York?" writes Edward Kurtz, head of the department of music of the Iowa State Teachers College at Cedar Falls.

Re-examination of the reviews which appeared in The Sun after the concerts of November 23 and 25—the all-American programs to which Mr. Kurtz refers—has failed to disclose anything resembling cold water. Perhaps in the time that has elapsed since they were written, these reviews have become dehydrated. Criticisms usually seem pretty dry a month after the events with which they deal.

So far as this commentator can discover in rereading the articles in question, they argue neither for nor against American music. The name of any other nationality might be written in wherever the word "American" appears; the names of composers of that nationality, hypothetical or otherwise, might then be substituted for the names of the Americans. The reviews, thus altered, could scarcely be construed as casting cold water on any one. They would conform to the jog-trot of day-to-day criticism. They would be deficient in puffery and innocent of propaganda. The music under discussion would appear to stand or fall on its merits, precisely as any other music does.

Presumably that is what the most active champions of the native composer believe should be the case. If American music has come of age—and surely American composers, American critics and American audiences are one in trusting that it has—there is no more reason for coddling the home product than for sniffing at it. The big boost, for boosting's sake, is as out of place as any conscious heaving of cold water. If criticism is to ring true, it must be the same for American as for imported music.

Opinions Still May Differ.

All this admitted, there remain inevitable differences of opinion about the merits of the works performed. Mr. Kurtz contends, and with a certain finality, that "the Romantic Symphony of Howard Hanson is just as worthy a work as the Cesar Franck Symphony."

But what if the reviewer doesn't think so? Supposing he has reasons for believing that there is a very appreciable gulf between the two works? Whose opinion is he to express? Surely, his own. And is he throwing cold water, or otherwise being unfair to the American's symphony, if he writes about it precisely as he would write concerning an imported work toward which his reactions are identical? It so happens that The Sun's reviewer dealt mostly in terms of praise in speaking of Mr. Hanson's latest symphony. But was his failure to wax more lyrical and to bring in a comparison with the Franck symphony—which it only faintly suggests—to be construed as a case of "praising with faint damns"?

In further contending that "your critics in general have a snobbish attitude toward music," Mr. Kurtz asks of the metropolitan press that it "give more space to the worthy composers of American compositions and less to mediocre compositions of comparatively unknown European composers." It would be interesting and instructive to sit down with a ruler and measure the space given to "comparatively unknown European composers." The perennial and probably justifiable complaint of the new music advocates is that only the well-worn, time-tried music of the universal masters—the Bachs, Mozarts, Beethovens, Brahmses, Wagners, &c.—is played, year in, year out. These are not the names of "comparatively unknown European composers."

Novelties from Abroad.

It also would be interesting and instructive to note what happens when an occasional novelty by some European nobody—or even a fairly well known somebody—comes along. Is it exalted and rhapsodized over? Or does the English language come in for some blunt usage? Even men like Sibelius, Strauss, Stravinsky, Prokofieff and Hindemith have given us music that was not accepted as of their best. Then the bucket brigades really got busy. The water was sometimes hot, sometimes tepid, sometimes icy cold. If the ordinarily painstaking reviewer can be trusted to write what he thinks about a Hindemith or a Stravinsky work that he considers something less than a manifestation of genius, is a similar expression of opinion concerning a Hanson or a Harris opus the proof positive of his snobbishness?

This season has presented at least two instances in which highly ingenious examples of contemporary European craftsmanship were dealt with much more sharply by the critics than any work on either of Mr. Koussevitzky's all-American programs.

The simple truth is that most metropolitan critics feel that they err a little on the side of giving the American composer the "break." They would like nothing better than to be able to greet as really outstanding some new work by an American. There was nothing of snobbishness in the remark which one reviewer addressed to another in the aisle at one of the recent Rachmaninoff concerts after a performance of "The Bells," which is a Russian's setting of a translation of Poe's celebrated American poem. What he said was: "Why couldn't that score have been written by an American?"

If it had been, is it reasonable to believe that a dash of cold water would have been the reward? There may be differences of opinion about this, as about other works, native or foreign. Masterpieces are few and far between, whatever their origin. One fault in America's musical life may well be that we have little appetite for anything else.

But can good come of altering the perspective for particular works for particular reasons? This writer is reluctant to believe that any true friend of the American composer would prefer to see American criticism take on the chauvinistic spirit that at times has influenced criticism in some European nations. If that is to be ruled out as something essentially un-American, the issue that remains is principally one of just how good is the music that the disagreement is all about. Surely the critic, quite as much as the musician or the layman, is entitled to his opinion.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DALLAS, TEXAS
[redacted]-JOURNAL

DEC 27 1939

Dorothy Maynor With Philharmonic

New York, Dec. 27.—(UP)—Dorothy Maynor, the sensational Negro soprano who was discovered only last summer by Serge Koussevitzky at the Berkshire music festival, will be soloist with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony at a special concert on Jan. 16 for the benefit of the orchestra pension fund.

The singer made her New York concert debut last month. Almost unheralded except by word of mouth, she was an instant success. Since then, she has been acclaimed in Boston, Toronto, Montreal and a few other cities.

She plans to limit her concert engagements during the coming year, devoting her time to study and enlargement of her repertoire.

CONSIDERING SYMPHONY MUSIC

Post
Dec 24 '39

Composer Krenek's Book on Subject Stimulating

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

WHAT is a symphony? Until about 1750 it meant no more than instruments, playing together, at the beginning of or in the midst of an oratorio or opera. The so-called Pastoral Symphony, from Handel's "Messiah," as opposed to the Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven is a case in point. However, in the hands of Haydn and his immediate precursors it became a sonata for orchestra, the independent instrumental form cultivated by Mozart and Beethoven and by hundreds of composers since.

Of late years that form has undergone radical changes. Following the example of Beethoven in his Ninth, Mahler in four of his symphonies made use of voices: choral, solo or both, and the number of his movements ranged from two to seven. Sibelius wrote his Seventh Symphony in one movement, having no relation to the traditional structure, and we have recently heard at Symphony Hall one-movement symphonies, by the Americans Roy Harris and William Schuman.

Why this pedagogical dissertation? Well, because of a statement, challenging in its arbitrariness, made by Ernest Krenek in his thoughtful and stimulating book, "Music Here and Now," published by W. W. Norton and Company, Inc. Says composer-author Krenek, "So far as I know, little attention has yet been paid to the fact that the short history of the symphonic form is inescapably bound up with the Hapsburg empire and its centre, Vienna. Real symphonies have been composed in no other city; the names of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Brahms, Bruckner and Mahler are proof of this contention. Schumann, Mendelssohn, Tchaikovsky and Franck can scarcely be called real symphonic composers; they merely employed the patterns of the Viennese classics with more or less luck or originality. Music produced under the title of 'symphony' since Mahler is either imitative or carries the title without justification. Soon after Mahler was called away from his unfinished task, the empire of the Hapsburgs, misunderstood as no other political entity in the entire history of mankind had ever been, met with its undeserved downfall; and this event also marked the end of the symphonic form."

In view of the fact that Cecil Gray holds his idol Sibelius to be the one true symphonist since Beethoven and dismisses all the others as incompetents and impostors, the layman is apt to ask with Shakespeare: "What's in a name?" And who can blame him?

In case you don't recognize Mr. Krenek, he is the composer of the first jazz opera, "Jonny Spielt Auf," which set Europe agog and found its way to New York's Metropolitan. A disciple of Arnold Schoenberg, he is now—after a few falls from grace—both a practitioner of and a propagandist for the kind of writing known at atonality. His much debated piano concerto, which he played at the symphony concerts last season, embodies his faiths, as does the book here under discussion. Officially damned by the Third Reich, he is one of the many European musicians who has decided that America is a pretty good place in which to live, and he is now teaching at Vassar.

Mr. Krenek mentions Strauss, Sibelius and Stravinsky as virtually the only living composers who have "successfully invaded" the orchestral repertory and Strauss as about the only opera composer "who has one or two works permanently included in the repertory programmes." He might have remembered poor Mascagni, who will conduct at Venice this year the 50th anniversary performance of "Cavalleria Rusticana." What Mr. Krenek does not admit is that the fault here may lie not with the public but with the composers themselves. Only a few years ago there were a great many more living composers who had invaded one repertory or both.

Three of these last will be represented at the Symphony Concerts of this week: Faure, by his Incidental Music to "Pelleas Melisande"; Dukas, by his "Sorcerer's Apprentice," and Debussy, by his "Martyrdom St. Sebastian," in the performance of which the Cecilia Society and Cleora Wood, soprano, will assist.

Globe MUSIC Dec 30 '39

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

That curious choral work of Claude Debussy's later life, "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," was heard at the Boston Symphony concert at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. The soprano soloist was Cleora Wood, of Boston, and the chorus was the Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler.

Hardly a piece for observance either of Christmas or New Year's, the Debussy music formed, with the "Pelleas and Melisande" Suite of Faure, and "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" by Dukas, a French program.

Dr. Koussevitzky first presented "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian" complete to Boston in 1930, and repeated it three years ago. If only because it is one of Debussy's least known scores, the conductor may be thanked for providing local concert-goers opportunity to become more or less familiar with it. A great master such as Debussy ought to be known "in the round": by his minor works as well as by his masterpieces. Apart from such considerations, however, "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian" is a good deal less than enjoyable.

Debussy composed his incidental music for the mystery play by Gabrielle d'Annunzio upon the request of the Italian poet, in 1911. Debussy was then about 49, the genius who had created the opera "Pelleas and Melisande," the orchestral Nocturnes, the "Afternoon of a Faun" and "The Sea."

Since he wrote "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian" on commission, some have professed to find it negligible just because it was bought and paid for. That opinion is probably wrong, as may be another to the effect that "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian" is Debussy's "Parsifal"—the effusion in late years of a sensualist become pre-occupied with religious faith.

At any rate, this music is about as far removed from the warmth, vitality and richly decorative beauty of earlier Debussy scores as could be possible. Debussy's orchestra has lost its evocative power; the instruments are treated dryly, the choral writing is of unrelieved bleakness.

It is not a question of austerity; after all the B minor Mass, the "Missa Solemnis" and the "German Requiem" are austere, but they are full of spiritual intensity. "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," to put it bluntly, is merely dull, almost unbearably long, fabricated by one whose creative forces had vanished.

In fairness, it must be pointed out that most in yesterday's audience listened attentively—though some walked out—to a performance that Dr. Koussevitzky conducted with loving care. Mme. Wood, an admirable musician, made the most of her solos. While the choral tone was inclined to be thin, the singers of the Cecilia Society had been carefully prepared, and they enunciated the French text clearly.

Faure's incidental music to the play "Pelleas and Melisande," by Maeterlinck, is like that which Sibelius wrote on the same subject, nice rather than great. Faure's delicate talents were well suited to so evanescent a literary basis. He labored, unfortunately, under the shadow of Debussy's great and spacious opera, whom none could hope to equal. It was as if he had attempted to capture a dramatic seascape in water colors.

"The Sorcerer's Apprentice" is a masterpiece in miniature, fastidiously composed, which can make its full effect only at the hands of a virtuoso orchestra like the Boston Symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky and his colleagues cutdid themselves in a performance the like of which one had never heard before—superlative in every respect.—C. W. D.

FRENCH MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Post
Dec 30 '39

Cecilia Society Heard in Debussy's "Saint Sebastian"

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Three pieces by French composers, having little but that fact in common, made the programme of yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert. They were the Suite from Faure's incidental music to "Pelleas and Melisande," Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" and Debussy's music to d'Annunzio's mystery play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian." In the performance of the last-named the Cecilia Society and Cleora Wood, sopràno, assisted.

FAURE'S SUITE PLEASANT

Faure's suite, revived by Dr. Koussevitzky last April, after a silence of 16 years, is dedicedly pleasant to hear and might be both suggestive and significant, as well, had not Debussy later set Maeterlinck's play to music a thousand times more appropriate. Dukas' witty and brilliant scherzo had not been heard at Symphony Hall since 1925, and it deserved a comeback. There have, of course, been plenty of chances to hear it in the interim, via the ether waves. Naturally, the performance, together with that of Faure's suite, was a fine one.

Reminded by Mr. Burk's notes that both of these compositions were products of that period known both as the Mauve Decade and the Gay Nineties, one got to thinking of how much these derided years did for music.

Some of the Best

To mention only a few high spots, they gave us Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," "Zarathustra," "Don Quixote" and "Ein Heldenleben;" Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and the Nocturnes, Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, the Second and Third Symphonies of Mahler and Bruckner's Ninth; d'Indy's "Istar" and Elgar's "Enigma" Variations; the First Symphony of Sibelius and "Finlandia;" Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko" and "The Tsar's Bride;" Verdi's "Falstaff" and Puccini's "La Boheme;" those operatic twins, "Cavalleria" and "Pagliacci" and the "New World" Symphony of Dvorak. The 1930's, so soon to be gone, had better look to their laurels.

Seems Decrepit

Evidently Dr. Koussevitzky has a particular fondness for Debussy's "Saint Sebastian." Yesterday's performance was the third here in 10 years and the second in three. For some reason, it seemed more tedius yesterday than ever before, the only engrossing music being that descriptive of the martyrdom (which derives straight from "Parsifal") and the final ecstatic measures for chorus. Fitted to a play that is hopelessly decadent in its mingling of Greek mythology and Christian mysticism, the music is also decadent and at times even decrepit.

There are those who say that the Symphonies of Bruckner and Mahler are long and dull! As George S. Kaufman has put it: "One man's Mede is another man's Persian," and nowhere is this question of taste so vexing as in the opera house and concert hall. Again, a superlative performance, with credit going to the chorus and to Miss Wood for their handling of none too grateful tasks. There was considerable applause at the end, but in the pause between parts III and IV many surfeited listeners left the hall, thus missing the only pages worth hearing.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BEAUMONT, TEX.
JOURNAL

DEC 29 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM GALVESTON, TEX.
TRIBUNE

DEC 29 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM DALLAS, TEXAS
NEWS

DEC 31 1939

Russian Guest Conductor For Boston Symphony

NEW YORK, Dec. 30 (UP).—Nicolai Malko, Russian conductor, will make his American debut as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the series from Jan. 15 to 22. Malko is well known in Europe, where he is permanent conductor of the Copenhagen symphony.

DECEMBER 31, 1939.

THE DISCUSSION OF AMERICAN MUSIC CONTINUES

Correspondents Take Up Question of the Composer and the Press

Composers and Critics

To the Music Editor:

There is a popular belief that music critics can "either make or break" contemporary music. This belief has been expressed by Victor Bennett in the English monthly Music and Letters. "The principal forces in the politics of music are the composer, the critic and the public, and the maintenance of good relations between these three is a matter of life and death to the art."

The purpose in fact of the second named is diplomatic—to reconcile those unruly forces he finds—one on either hand. When he loses control of the situation and there is no accord between contemporary composition and the public, tradition itself is threatened with breakdown.

Actually no such condition ever existed in the history of the art, and certainly does not exist now. If a real style of music grows in the midst of a people, succinctly expressing a time and place, it must, perforce, have new qualities which mark its authenticity. These qualities may or may not have been striven for by the composers who fixed them forever into translatable forms serviceable to their fellowmen. Those new qualities may have been the result of revolt against old idioms worn thin by repetition; they may have been the flowering of tendencies long evolving. But the unique qualities must be there. No skillful pastiche has ever reconstituted an art or added a new room to the archives of tradition.

Those new qualities must have sprung forth with a prodigal fecundity which feels only that life is there with a pulsing vitality ever to spare. They must have come as the naive offerings of one bearing gifts to an eager, waiting world. It matters little if the people who wait are not yet born. They shall be born to herald the event. From such lyric belief—such new wine in the blood—has music been reborn to live again, passing among peoples and centuries. And against such rebirths kings, potentates, prejudices and dictums have been quite powerless. They could only aid and abet, never discourage, such high curves in the graph of music's course.

So with the power of the press. Our music critics can only hail the event of an American music as it begins to arrive in our midst. They can do little to forestall it. Those who attempt will soon be exhausted with the effort to swim against a current too strong for any man in any position.

Such a rebirth of music has not yet happened in America. But the evidences of the coming event are legion, and the evidences are in themselves so exciting that they ferment the whole changing scene of our musical world. They are both social and economic. The social and economic acclaim of the ASCAP Festival, the Boston Festival, and Dr. Koussevitzky's Western tour are accepted and established proofs that American music is already good enough to stand up in our concert halls with the best of Europe's past and present.

But our music is not yet what it must be if it is to be worthy of other American achievements. Even our very "popular" music has a whole world in which to grow, both technically and expressively. The time is at hand when "slick" arrangements will not suffice. That everybody can do it is part of our growth. If we are to reconstitute a music which justifies a separate existence independent of theatre, dance and radio script, it must indeed be an exciting and vital experience. It might have a swift organic form continuity and yet be so clearly unified that redundance is avoided without the loss of sufficient emphasis. Our composers might employ a new luminous harmonic texture which serves clarity of form through cadence, while preserving weight of sonority.

They might reinstate counterpoint with new, long melodic materials which are closely related to folk experience, and yet are not a patched-up mosaic of folk idioms. With these materials a new rhythmic vitality, which is indigenous to our people, must be preserved. And the whole form must be presented with an orchestral palette which is so clear, brilliant and impressive that it can compete with the music of the nineteenth century, which leaned so heavily on orchestration for its effectiveness.

When American composers walk onto the stage of their time which history has set and is setting for them, they will give forth with abundance a new organic music. As this condition develops, many seasoned concertgoers will be ruffled. The most self-satisfied may even be enraged. That, also, is part of the process and only adds zest to the pageant. If among such stand-patters are to be found a few disgruntled music critics, their lot will not be an easy one, especially if they are inclined to pontifical self-righteousness. The composer has always won, for the indisputable reason that if he is an authentic composer he is only an instrument of his people in their time and place.

Roy Harris.

New York, Dec. 20, 1939.

From Another American Composer

To the Music Editor:

Mr. Downes's recent interesting article on American composers really calls for a reply.

The complaint that the American press in general and the metropolitan press in particular do not properly support the American composer and American music is widespread. Particularly the younger generation of American musicians and audiences feels this keenly, and, as a result, newspaper reviews which should be considered seriously by them are either not read at all or given scant consideration. This, even though they are aware that a few critics in this country are sympathetic and conscientious, and even though The Times and another New York paper seem to have developed a much more inclusive policy recently.

Of course Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra were praised by the press for their recent festival, and the American compositions also received their due; but neither he nor his orchestra could very well be ignored, and, had the event taken place under less glamorous auspices, would the press have been as interested? Would the critics have attended at all?

This writer has had the opportunity to hear, study and perform a vast number of American works in the last ten years, and many of them can properly be called "American" music—American in the sense that they are non-European in content and structure. Some of this "American" music has even been composed by our naturalized citizens!

During the past few years at least three eminent foreign conductors, resident in this country, have stated to the press that the works of contemporary American composers compare most favorably with those of their European colleagues. In fact, they suggest that the world center of musical creative effort may now be in this country. The press has been less cordial in its estimates.

During the past few years this writer knows of a large number of first performances of American works in New York which were not reviewed at all!

American composers do not expect indiscriminate praise, but, having worked sincerely for American musical culture, they expect serious consideration. Some of them who have lived abroad were given such consideration by the press of foreign countries and by great foreign artists. They expect the same treatment at home.

Why does the press use up columns to state the obvious? We all know that Beethoven, Mozart, Wagner, Debussy and Mussorgsky are great composers. We know that Brahms's Symphonies are fine, that Josef Hofmann can play the piano, that Toscanini and Walter know how to conduct. Many of us would rather see the press take a more active, imaginative and creative part in the building of our American musical culture.

Of course it is well known that the reviewers of every period had a hard time to properly estimate the efforts of contemporary artists. The Russian school was not received with cheers, Wagner was maligned by many, Franck's Symphony was not well received at its first hearing, Mozart had to combat the predominating Italian influence in the Austria of his day before he could establish German opera. Even some of Beethoven's works were considered "bizarre" by the reviewers of his day, though his genius was recognized. In France Brahms was not popular.

Would it not be possible for the American music critic to inaugurate a new tradition, one which begins with the acceptance of the contemporary and local scene and which presents the past in its proper perspective?

The dramatic critics and book reviewers no longer write mostly about Shakespeare, Voltaire, Goethe and Tolstoi. They introduce us to a living world of the theatre and of literature, good, bad and indifferent; and we are left to make up our own minds about the present and to take the past for granted.

In American music the job may be more difficult, but there is much that is significant and rewarding for those who are willing to explore the field.

The cultural light is burning low in the Europe of today. If American critics, composers, musicians, audiences and musical promoters can work together selflessly and with mutual respect, they may live up to their great responsibility, which is that of allowing the age-old art of music, which is ever being reborn, to sound its harmonies, old and new.

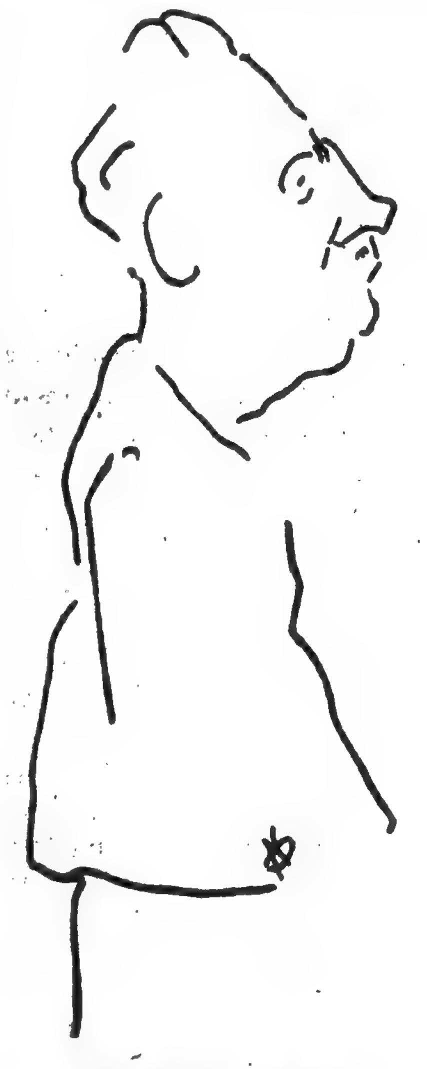
Otto Luening.

Bennington, Vt., Dec. 26. 1939.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 31 1939

Youth Chamber Music Series

The programs for the Youth Chamber Music series, which take place on Wednesday afternoons at four in Jordan Hall, include the Roth Quartet in Haydn's D major Quartet, Op. 76, Theme and Variations from Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge's E major Quartet and the Schumann Piano Quintet on Jan. 24; on Feb. 14, Schubert's "Trout Quintet" and Bach's Fifth Brandenburg Concerto; on March 6, the Roth Quartet in Beethoven's F major Quartet, Op. 18, the Andantino from Debussy's Quartet, Parisian Valse and two movements from Dohnanyi's Piano Quintet.



GEORGE FOOTE
Whose Suite, "In Praise of Winter," will be played by the Boston Symphony Friday and Saturday.

'Saint Sebastien'

Trans. Dec 30 '39

Boston Symphony Gives Interesting Debussy Work with Cecilia Society

Debussy's infrequently heard music for Gabriele d'Annunzio's mystery play, "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien," was the principal subject of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's tenth subscription program of the season yesterday afternoon under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky in Symphony Hall. Assisting artists were the soprano, Cleora Wood, and the Chorus of the Cecelia Society which had been prepared by Arthur Fiedler. The remainder of the program consisted of the Suite from Faure's stage music to Maeterlinck's tragedy, "Pelleas et Melisande" and Dukas' roisterous scherzo, "L'Apprenti Sorcier."

Dr. Koussevitzky is an apt arranger of programs of brilliant contrast and yesterday, even though all three works chosen fell within little more than a decade of French composition, there was again contrast, albeit of a more subtile kind.

Though "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," which was composed in 1911, has little of the lush, resplendant manner of the period of the "Apres-Midi d'un Faune," yet it is still a predominantly pictorial, sensuous art. The ecstatic religious vision is shot through and through with beauties more than suggestive of this world. D'Annunzio's conception of St. Sebastian was a combination of an ascetic Christ and the fair Adonis. The figure of the beautiful bleeding youth also roused Debussy's enthusiasm. He clothed this highly sophisticated conception in an equally sophisticated orchestral fabric, declaring the while that he wished "to sing of my interior visions with the naive candour of a child."

Sophisticated Naivete

But he sang with the naivete which only the extremely sophisticated ever achieve or desire to achieve. "In my opinion," he said in an interview on "St. Sebastien" which is quoted in Mr. Burke's instructive program notes, "the writing of religious music ceased with the sixteenth century. The beautiful child-like souls of those days were alone capable of expressing their passionate, disinterested fervour in music free from all admixture of worldliness." A truly remarkable statement when one considers that it excludes Bach as a religious composer, but illuminating in relation to Debussy's aesthetic, and not unconnected with the pre-Raphaelite enthusiasms of the painters of a previous decade.

The score of "St. Sebastien" seems to us today prophetic of much that was to come after it. At the same time Debussy's indebtedness to "Parsifal" seems clearer here than in most of his other works. The composition for chorus is admirable, especially for a man who wrote as little for chorus as Debussy.

Skillful Choral Composition

In the first act, "The Court of Lilies," the effect of the sopranos a cappella on the words, "Salut! O lumiere," is incandescent. The climax which is reached by chorus and orchestra with the line, "Tout le ciel chante," is suggestive of the heavens resonant with song.

The Cecilia Society acquitted itself creditably of a difficult task, though some cleaner attacks and a little more temperamental response to Dr. Koussevitzky's promptings would not be out of place.

The soprano solos were sung by Cleora Wood with excellent feeling for style and security of intonation in some cruelly trying passages. Miss Wood did not force her voice which thus preserved its smooth timbre even in those high pianissimo phrases which are the terror of mediocre singers. Her interpretation of the voices in "The Magic Chamber" were subtily, sensitively imagined.

The third part, "The Council of False Gods" has a remarkable festive introduction for the brass instruments suggestive of the paen, the golden lyre and the silver bow with which the opening lines of the text glorify the god, Apollo. There follows a chromatic lament of the Women of Byblos for the slain Adonis, and alternate jubilation for his resurrection and dirges for his passing.

The fifth part, "Paradise," begins with unaccompanied choruses of glorification. Then the Soul of Sebastian, soprano solo, describes its flight to heaven and there is a last transcendental "Hallelujah" sung by all the saints.

If there is a fault to be found with "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian" it is perhaps in overmuch emphasis and dilation on one or two moods and a certain lack of variety. However, Dr. Koussevitzky it to be thanked and congratulated for giving us the opportunity to hear, in such an excellent performance, this seldom heard work of a frequently heard composer.

E. D.

Music Calendar

Today

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Cleora Wood, soprano; Cecelia Society Chorus; Symphony Hall, 8.15 Debussy: "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian"; Faure: Suite from "Pelleas and Melisande"; Dukas: "L'Apprenti Sovcier."

Monday, Jan. 1

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist; Symphony Hall. 8.15. Beethoven: First Symphony; Stravinsky: Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra; Franck: Symphony in D minor.

Tuesday, Jan. 2

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Jesus Maria Sanroma; Symphony Hall, 2.30. Repeating Monday's program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MONTCLAIR, N. J.
SEMI-WEEKLY TIMES
DEC 29 1939

Concert Will Be Lead By Dr. Koussevitzky

Boston Symphony Director Came to U. S. in 1924.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest orchestra leaders of our time, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its appearance in Montclair High School, Jan. 10, as the extra event in connection with the Unity Concert Course.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who for the past fifteen seasons has conducted this orchestra, was born during the Czar's regime in Northern Russia and received his early musical education in his home town. At the age of 14, he went to Moscow to continue his studies and soon became the double bass soloist in the orchestra of the Imperial Opera. In a few years he succeeded his teacher as professor of that instrument at the Conservatoire.

In 1909 he organized the Koussevitzky Orchestra, made up of the best players from other Russian orchestras. With this orchestra he toured Russia and European cities until the beginning of the first World War, He remained in Russia until 1920 when he left to settle in Western Europe. In 1921 he formed his "Paris Concerts" which made him famous in France. He soon became popular in London and other Western European cities, and in 1924 he came to America as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Transcript Dec. 30 '39

Political Music

Discussion of an Old Tabu Apropos Of Pertinent Modern Developments

By EDWARD DOWNES

According to latest advices from Symphony Hall, the government at Helsinki has released the Finnish conductor, Tauno Hannikainen, from military duties and there is now every expectation that he will be able to keep his imminent engagement here to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. By the time this is printed he will probably be on his way to us. It is pleasant to think that his artistic activities among us may achieve as much more than he could accomplish were he bearing arms beside his heroic countrymen in the fastnesses of Karelia. Estimates of Hannikainen's conductorial powers must wait until after he has been heard in this city, but there can be little doubt about the welcome that will await him, for he comes to us as the representative of a country for which we have a very special sympathy and affection.

Our sympathy is not based merely on Finland's integrity in financial matters nor on the enlightened intelligence alone with which it has solved social and political problems; it springs increasingly from our love for the music of Sibelius as well as a talented group of younger Finnish composers about whom we may hope to hear more from Mr. Hannikainen.

This respect and affection have, of course, received a sudden impetus from the Russian invasion, which has called to the fore all our native American sympathies for oppressed peoples. Our feelings have been finding expression in a hundred ways—among them a large number of benefit concerts all over the country, whose programs naturally give a prominent place to Finnish music. The applause that follows such a work as Sibelius's "Finlandia" which Koussevitzky played on the Boston Symphony programs a week ago, is not only for the music itself and its performance but for the idea behind the music—the epic struggle for Finnish liberty and independence. "Finlandia" heralded this struggle long before Finland had achieved independence. Its political and racial implications excited Finnish audiences at that time even more than they excite American audiences today. And it is safe to say that national, racial and even political factors played a role in the shaping of Sibelius's other compositions. Certainly they play a role in our appreciation of them. The fructifying power of Finnish epic, both legendary and political, on the music of Sibelius can hardly be denied. And it is fitting that we should be conscious of this background in listening to this music today.

Mixing Music and Politics

But is this not mixing music and politics—a thing which we have been told time and time again is destructive of true art and should never be done by a self-respecting public and still less by composers and artists?

Music and politics, however, have always been mixed and they always will be. We know that music reflects the culture of which it is a part. How then could it possibly ignore as vital a part of that culture as politics? Our task is not to attempt what is often undesirable and usually impossible: to keep music and politics apart. Our problem is to try to arrange that when music and politcs do react upon one-another it may be with as fruitful and liberating results as possible.

A Negative Example

A good example of the destructive effect politics may have on art, not only of the present but of the past as well, is present-day Germany. Our Modern Art Museum here in Boston has shown us in a brilliant exhibition examples of classics of the last 30 years of German painting which the present German Government has labeled "degenerate art." German museums have long since been purged of all such works and the Government has obtained some much needed cash by selling them as fast as they can to foreign collectors and museums.

Music in the Third Reich keeps pace with this example. Not only is Mendelssohn and all music of any Jewish connection banned, but it is impossible to perform much of the most significant work of the post-war years.

As for the official attitude towards performing musicians we may quote here some Viennese press comments on the changes in Austria which followed the Anschluss:

"One thing must be said openly—we spit, if we may respectfully say so, on Toscanini and on his Jewish boosters and express our preference for Hans Knappertsbusch. Joyously do we renounce Toscanini's baton prima donna business and delight in the performances of a real German conductor."

Another paper, expressing its satisfaction with the change in the Salzburg Festival, wrote:

"Let us recall the festival of the past years. Arturo Toscanini, the champion of Jewish art in German countries, stood surrounded with false adulation, in the forefront of Salzburg conductors. In the Festspielhaus, the Mozorteum or the Felsenreitschule sat not German art enthusiasts but chirping young women from America or from England who chattered through the "Meistersinger" Prelude about lipsticks and brands of face powder."

The Explanation

It is of examples like this or of silly excesses in our own country during the last war that most people think when they lay down the law that art and politics should never be mixed. For Bostonians can still remember the time when one of the greatest conductors the Boston Symphony ever had and a gentleman of the greatest personal integrity could be referred to in the Boston press as "the unspeakable Dr. Muck."

Others can remember how Wagner disappeared from the Metropolitan Opera repertory and was missing during the years of anti-German feeling that followed the war. Almost the last words of that poet and Wagnerite, the late Lawrence Gilman, music critic of the New York Herald Tribune, were to ask whether this war would make any difference to Wagner performances at the Metropolitan. So far it has not. General Manager Edward Johnson has warned his public that this war is fighting an ideology, not a race or a nation, and there is every sign that the American public has an infinitely more mature attitude in the matter than it did in 1917.

Hitler and Wagner

Hitler's worship of Wagner's music dramas and their romantic nationalism might have been expected to have a sinister effect on their appreciation abroad. And in point of fact, at least one provincial English city has banned Wagner's music. But this adoration and ban alike are based on a misapprehension. For Wagner's Ring of the Niebelung" is one long tirade against political power, coercion and all Naziism stands for. Hans Sachs' final address in the "Meistersinger," which is wont to rouse great enthusiasm, says in essence: "What does it matter if the imperial power of Germany dissolves to dust as long as we have our sacred German art?" In a country which cheerfully sacrifices its sacred German art to politics every day in the week, such sentiments would probably be high treason if uttered in public by anyone else than a stage Hans Sachs. Coming from him, however, they are misinterpreted or misunderstood and few people notice the difference, least of all, apparently, Hitler.

As for the Nazi's claim to Wagner as their patron saint, it was answered before the Nazis came to power by Thomas Mann in one of the most eloquent essays ever penned on Wagner, in which he said: "It is by no means permissible to give Wagner's nationalistic gestures and speeches a modern significance—the significance they would have today. That is to falsify and misuse them, to sully their romantic purity. . . .

"This man of the people who hated power, money, violence and war all his life long—this man who, no matter what his epoch made of it, planned his festival theater for a classless society—this man cannot be claimed by the spirit of reaction and insidious backward tendency. He belongs to those wills which are directed into the future."

Wagner has a deep political significance, one that may be discussed with profit for both music and politics if it be done with understanding. This is true also of the music of Sibelius and of his gifted countrymen, composers and performers.

We need not be ashamed of recognizing that fact.

Monday, Tuesday Symphony

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give the third pair of concerts of the shorter series tomorrow evening and Tuesday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Sanroma will appear as soloist in Stravinsky's Capriccio for orchestra and piano. The program will open with Beethoven's First Symphony in C major. Dr. Koussevitzky will conclude with Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 31 1939

Music and Musicians

By John Tebbel

MAESTRO Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony, intend to begin [illegible] year with some old music. To that end, the maestro announces for tomorrow night and Tuesday afternoon a program in Symphony Hall made up of Beethoven's first symphony, the Stravinsky "Capriccio" for piano, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, and the Cesar Franck symphony.

Page 14—BOSTON SUNDAY ADVERTISER Dec. 31 '39★

Symphonic Program Minus a Symphony

By Leo Gaffney

MYSTICAL and mysterious matters, drastically opposed, furnished the Boston Symphony Orchestra program at the formal week-end concerts.

One shuddered at the devilish predicament of Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice"; melted at the Maeterlinckian tragedy of Faure's "Pelleas et Melisande" suite, then glowed in the Debussyan fires of faith enkindled in that famous Frenchman's "Music From the Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," for which the Cecilia Society provided the chorus.

The glowing, it must be confessed, did not extend to all of the Friday audience. The length of the Debussy, all in the same deeply contemplative mood, proved too much for many listeners. And there was the extraordinary spectacle of small groups leaving the hall before the performance was over.

Those that stayed—and glowed—were well repaid by a well nigh flawless performance of this most complex music. The Cecelia Society and its director, Arthur Fiedler, deserve an especial cheer on their own account.

PERHAPS some of those that left early did so from religious scruple, unable to feel any community of spirit with the pantheistic composer, who could not side with the Church in matters of faith—any more than Wagner—who persisted in expressing the great Christian saint purely on his own artistic terms.

To some also, the mating of Gregorian themes with Oriental is of itself a profanation . . . The point could be argued till doomsday. The immediate consideration is the great Suite's meaning as music, without too much inquiry into the composer's individual dreams.

Cleora Wood, soprano, sang the solo parts faithfully and with clear understanding of the rapt mood to be so long sustained.

IT was a good thing Dr. Koussevitzky had placed "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" on the same program; it provided the necessary burst of color and dynamics to offset what must have been to many an otherwise dreary stretch of austerity.

On the side of the walkers-out, it must be confessed that there is no more exciting ex-

---

THE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1939

Extraordinary Work Given Superb Performance

Cleora Wood Sings Solo Role; Program to Be Repeated Tonight

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 10th concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Assisting were Cleora Wood, soprano, and the Cecilia Society chorus, directed by Arthur Fiedler. The program was as follows:

Faure
Suite from the music to Maeterlinck's play, "Pelleas et Melisande," Op. 80
Dukas......"L'Apprenti Sorcier," Scherzo
Debussy
Music from "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien"

Historically Debussy's "St. Sebastian" music is a most interesting score, for it showed him doing the same kind of thing that Stravinsky switched to 20 years later. It is true that a contemporary, Erik Satie, was writing similar music in his "Socrate;" but there would be few to deny the palm to Debussy as the creator of far the more remarkable work.

If historical significance were the chief merit of "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," there would be little reason to go to the trouble of preparing it. It is, though, unusually beautiful music. It has a mysterious and ethereal quality in such sections as "The Magic Chamber," and again it is stonily austere. Its effects are achieved through simple means, but the general impression is one of great complexity. So too, although the music seems to be monotonous, it is actually varied with marvelous subtlety.

Debussy had, from our point of view, the misfortune to compose music to literature which we no longer hold in high esteem. Maeterlinck offers little fascination to the modern reader; and certainly anyone who has ever read d'Annunzio's turgid and pretentious play will not do so soon again. Yet it was to Maeterlinck's words that Debussy wrote his immortal opera and to d'Annunzio's the masterpiece of his later years.

That it is still not a masterpiece to a great many listeners was evident yesterday as it was three years ago. Mr. Koussevitzky, whose obvious love for the score has given us so inspiring a performance, must see the wisdom of placing so long and so difficult a work at the beginning of the program. Those of us who did enjoy the music were forced to put up with the exit arrangements of a great many people. Doubtless they were on their way to sit perfectly still for four hours at "Gone with the Wind" up the street, whereas one hour where a little mental effort was needed could not be endured. Mr. Koussevitzky, as a matter of fact, might perfectly well change the order for tonight's performance.

This extraordinary work was superbly performed, except for the chorus, which was not always up to its usual mark. Cleora Wood sang the far from easy solo role with sympathetic skill and a lovely quality of voice. The orchestra was splendid.

Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande" music is charming, even if it makes no very striking impression. We are ashamed to admit that we had forgotten that it had been played as recently as last April. It sounded almost as if it were a new work. As such we took pleasure in the evocation of a mood and the beauty of the orchestral playing. Only later did the shock come that we must have experienced the same emotions before.

Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice" is, of course, a much more familiar work than its presence so rarely on the Boston Symphony's programs would indicate. The performance yesterday was astonishing, though it left us in two minds about it. For one thing it seemed a much more important and spacious work than it usually does. On the other hand it had less gaiety. Mr. Koussevitzky's choice of a rather deliberate pace was probably the reason. At any rate the interpretation was, as we have said, astonishing.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky will offer George Foote's Suite, "In Praise of Winter;" the Bloch Violin Concerto, with Joseph Szigeti as soloist, and Brahms's Second Sym-

128

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, O.
NEWS

NOV 30 1939

The advent of the Boston Symphony on December 15 heightens the excitement which will have everybody on a diet of bromos by the holidays. The famous eastern orchestra plays here on the Cleveland Concert course December 15, at the Music Hall. The limited box capacity for the concert will be completely absorbed by the B. J. Murtfeldts, the Leslie Nichols, the Charlie Dawes, Josephine Forsythe Myers, the Charles Rushes, the Beryl Rubinsteins, the Thomas L. Sidlos, William M. Milliken and Dr. and Mrs. Emil B. deSauze.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

NOV 30 1939

Society—

musical horizon each winter is the visit to Dec. 15 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which comes as part Cleveland Concert Course under the sponsorship of the Cleveland Museum of Art.

Music lovers look forward to the event from year to year and the boxholders for this concert at the Music Hall is a larger group than usual. You'll see in the charmed circle: Eliot Ness and his new bride, the Herbert Buckmans, the Thomas L. Sidlos, Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Benesch, Dr. and Mrs. Emil De Sauze, the B. J. Murtfelds, Rabbi and Mrs. Barnett R. Bricker, E. G. Treat, Mr. and Mrs. Isadore Morris, the Leslie Nichols, the Rev. and Mrs. O. G. King, Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Furth, Mr. and Mrs. Charles G. Dawe.

Of course, William Milliken will have his usual box in the center. Others to be in the box circle are Mr. and Mrs. Harry Kirtz, the Russell Morgans, the Vernon Pribbles, Mrs. Philip A. Meyers, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Rush, the S. J. Kornhausers, Beryl Rubenstein, Richard Rychtarik, Mr. and Mrs. Will Schoenberger and Harry L. Aiken, as well as the editors of the three newspapers, Mr. and Mrs. Paul Bellamy, Mr. and Mrs. Nat Howard and Mr. and Mrs. Louis Seltzer.

Western Trip

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

DEC 1 - 1939

Koussevitzkys Will Be Guests at Small Party

BY JUDITH CASS.

IT will be good news to those who know Mme. Serge Koussevitzky to learn that when Koussevitzky comes to Chicago with the Boston Symphony orchestra he will be accompanied by his wife. They will be the guests of the John Alden Carpenters during their brief stay in Chicago.

Mr. and Mrs. Carpenter will give a small supper party for their distinguished guests following the concert the orchestra, conducted by Koussevitzky, will give on Wednesday night, Dec. 13, in the Auditorium theater. The concert is the fourth of the series of musical affairs presented by the university college of Northwestern university.

Today Mrs. Carpenter is giving a luncheon and symphony concert party for the Marquise d'Ivanrey, who is arriving this morning to be here until Dec. 10. The marquise, formerly Italia Blair, will be with the Bruce Borlands while she is here. She is on her way from her home in Biarritz to Hollywood, where she will spend the winter with her mother, Mrs. Chauncey J. Blair.

Gives Tea Today for Opera Committee.

This afternoon, after the concert, Mrs. Carpenter is entertaining at tea for the women who will work with her to help raise the Opera Foundation fund necessary to continuing opera in Chicago. Mrs. Jacob Baur, one of the vice chairmen of the committee, will not be there, for she has gone to New York and Washington for a short trip. Mrs. Charles H. Swift, who will act in an artistic advisory capacity to the committee, will be among the guests this afternoon.

On Monday Mrs. Carpenter is opening her home at 4 o'clock for a meeting of the American Friends of China. Mrs. Harley A. MacNair [Florence Ayscough] will speak on "The Far East at the Moment."

Blairs to Entertain Assembly Governors.

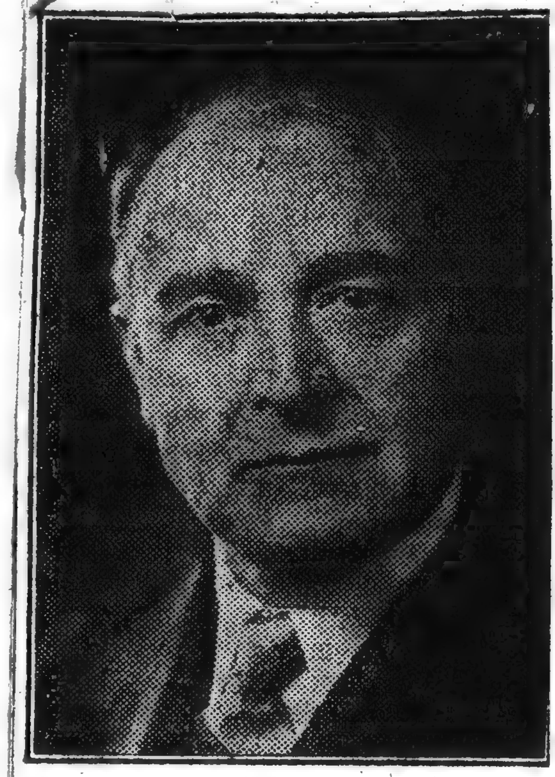
Mr. and Mrs. William McCormick Blair will give a dinner at home for the governors of the Assembly and their wives preceding the Assembly next Friday night. Mr. Blair is chairman of the governors.

Mrs. Bartholomay Osborne and Mr. and Mrs. John L. Cochran, who have given many joint pre-Assembly dinners, will give another this year. The party will be given in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Bartholomay, Mrs. Osborne's parents. Mrs. Osborne will return next Thursday from New York.

Mrs. Arthur Krock [Martha Granger Blair] is planning to come from her home in Washington for the Assembly. She will spend that week-end in Lake Forest with the Clarence Prentices.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BEDFORD, O.
TIMES
12/1/39



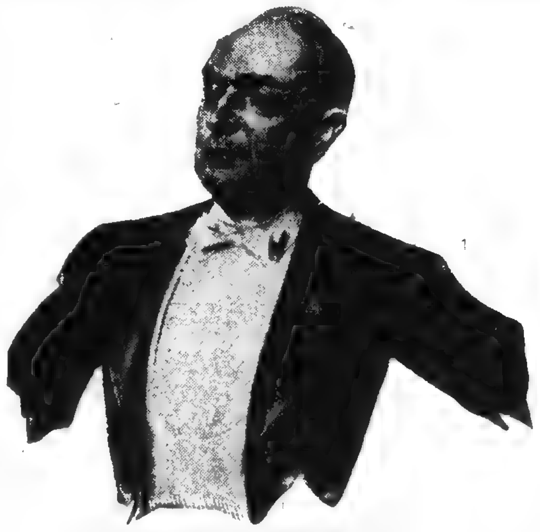
CONDUCTS CONCERT — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will direct the Boston Symphony orchestra in a concert at Public Music hall Friday, Dec. 15, under auspices of the Cleveland Museum of Art. Beginning at 8:45 p. m., the concert is another in the series sponsored by Cleveland Concert Chorus under direction of Mrs. Emil Brudno. The program includes compositions from Mozart, Debussy, Ravel and Tchaikovsky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, OHIO
JEWISH REVIEW & OBSERVER

DEC 1 - 1939

CLEVELAND CONCERT COURSE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear at the Public Hall on Friday, December 15. The orchestra of 110 men are in their 59th season and are under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky. They will play the "Symphony in C major No. 338" by Mozart, Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune," "Orchestral Fragments" by Ravel, and Tchaikovsky's "Symphony O 4 in F minor, Op. 36."



DR. KOUSSEVITZKY

This concert is under the direction of Mrs. Emil Brudno and the auspices of the Cleveland Musium of Art.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS

DEC 2 - 1939

Koussevitzky.

Serge Koussevitzky, to conduct the Boston Symphony at the Auditorium Dec. 13, has listed Hadyn's 102d symphony, Debussy's "La Mer" and the fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky in his program for the Northwestern University college series on the history and enjoyment of music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

DEC 2 - 1939

Boston Symphony Here Dec. 11

One of the major events of the Rochester concert season will be the annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, scheduled for Monday evening, Dec. 11, in the Eastman Theater.

Indications point now to a capacity audience.

It marks the fifty-ninth season for the orchestra which is generally considered the greatest symphonic body existing in the world today. It is also the sixteenth season with the orchestra for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who will wield the baton in the concert here.

Mozart, Howard Hanson, Prokofieff and Ravel will be the composers represented on the program, with the orchestral "fairy tale" of "Peter and the Wolf" as the distinctive symphonic novelty of the evening. With the music will be a narrator, Richard Hale, who will be remembered as leading man with the Lyceum Players here.

The Program

Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" .... Mozart
Symphony No. 3 .... Hanson
I Andante lamentardo
II Andante tranquillo
III Tempo scherzando
IV Largamente e pesante
INTERMISSION
"Peter and the Wolf" ....Prokofieff
An Orchestral Fairy Tale for Children, Op. 67.
Narrator: Richard Hale
"Daphnis et Chole," Second Suite .... Ravel
Lever du Jour—Pantomine—Danse Generale.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

DEC 3 - 1939

CONDUCTOR

Serge Koussevitsky, renowned conductor of the Boston Symphony, who will lead the orchestra in concerts at Syria Mosque on Saturday night, December 16, and the following afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, O.
NEWS

DEC 2 - 1939

Symphony

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky directs the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program in the Cleveland concert course at Music Hall, December 15, playing the Mozart Symphony in C Major No. 338, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," the Ravel "Daphnis and Chloe" second suite, and the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

DEC 3 - 1939

Good for musically-progressive Serge Koussevitzky! No conductor of a major symphony band has given American composers so many opportunities to have their writings performed under the best conditions possible. The two all-American programs given this past week in Carnegie Hall were excellent, in the main. Howard Hanson, Randall Thompson, Edward Burlingame Hill, Walter Piston, and Roy Harris were among those honored. We thought the Hanson third symphony and the Tompson piece among the best played.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

DEC 3 - 1939

Most interesting are the two separate programs to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Serge Koussevitzky at Syria Mosque on Dec. 16, and Dec. 17. The first of these events will bring to performance three symphonies: Mozart's No. 34 in C-major (Koechel 338); Roy Harris' 3rd symphony and Schumann's 1st symphony.

The matinee list consists of Howard Hanson's 3rd symphony; Prokofieff's Classical symphony; Debussy's Afternoon of a Faun, and Ravel's 2nd suite from Daphnis and Chloe.

The presence of a representative American work on each of these programs reflects Dr. Koussevitzky's keen interest in foremost American contributions to the repertory.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat-Chronicle

DEC 3 - 1939

Boston Group Here Dec. 11

A MAJOR event of the Rochester concert season will be the annual visit of the renowned Boston Symphony Orchestra, scheduled for Monday evening, Dec. 11, in the Eastman Theater. A capacity audience is anticipated.

This season marks the 59th for the orchestra, generally considered the greatest existing symphonic body. It also is the 16th season for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who will conduct.

Aside from the perfection of ensemble playing, chief reason for pre-eminence of the Boston orchestra is the virtuosity of the individual musicians. Attitude of critics toward the organization is summarized by Olin Downes in last Sunday's New York Times:

"As for the performance of the afternoon, it would be hard to praise them too highly. It is probably not exaggeration to remark that the composers represented can never hope for a better presentation of their music. Dr. Koussevitzky put every capacity of his superb orchestra at their service."

Mozart, Dr. Howard Hanson, Prokokieff and Ravel will be the composers represented on the Rochester program, with the orchestral fairy tale "Peter and the Wolf" as the distinctive symphonic novelty. Richard Hale will be narrator. He will be remembered as a leading man in the former Lyceum Theater Company. The program:

Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" .... Mozart
Symphony No. 3 .... Hanson
"Peter and the Wolf" .. Prokokieff
An orchestral fairy tale for children
Narrator: Richard Hale
"Daphnis et Chloe," Second Suite .... Ravel

128

Western Trip

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

NOV 30 1939

Society—

musical horizon each winter is the visit to Dec. 15 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which comes as part Cleveland Concert Course under the sponsorship of the Cleveland Museum of Art.

Music lovers look forward to the event from year to year and the boxholders for this concert at the Music Hall is a larger group than usual. You'll see in the charmed circle: Eliot Ness and his new bride, the Herbert Buckmans, the Thomas L. Sidlos, Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Benesch, Dr. and Mrs. Emil De Sauze, the B. J. Murtfelds, Rabbi and Mrs. Barnett R. Bricker, E. G. Treat, Mr. and Mrs. Isadore Morris, the Leslie Nichols, the Rev. and Mrs. O. G. King, Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Furth, Mr. and Mrs. Charles G. Dawe.

Of course, William Milliken will have his usual box in the center. Others to be in the box circle are Mr. and Mrs. Harry Kirtz, the Russell Morgans, the Vernon Pribbles, Mrs. Philip A. Meyers, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Rush, the S. J. Kornhausers, Beryl Rubenstein, Richard Rychtarik, Mr. and Mrs. Will Schoenberger and Harry L. Aiken, as well as the editors of the three newspapers, Mr. and Mrs. Paul Bellamy, Mr. and Mrs. Nat Howard and Mr. and Mrs. Louis Seltzer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

DEC 1 - 1939

Koussevitzkys Will Be Guests at Small Party

BY JUDITH CASS.

IT will be good news to those who know Mme. Serge Koussevitzky to learn that when Koussevitzky comes to Chicago with the Boston Symphony orchestra he will be accompanied by his wife. They will be the guests of the John Alden Carpenters during their brief stay in Chicago.

Mr. and Mrs. Carpenter will give a small supper party for their distinguished guests following the concert the orchestra, conducted by Koussevitzky, will give on Wednesday night, Dec. 13, in the Auditorium theater. The concert is the fourth of the series of musical affairs presented by the university college of Northwestern university.

Today Mrs. Carpenter is giving a luncheon and symphony concert party for the Marquise d'Ivanrey, who is arriving this morning to be here until Dec. 10. The marquise, formerly Italia Blair, will be with the Bruce Borlands while she is here. She is on her way from her home in Biarritz to Hollywood, where she will spend the winter with her mother, Mrs. Chauncey J. Blair.

Gives Tea Today for Opera Committee.

This afternoon, after the concert, Mrs. Carpenter is entertaining at tea for the women who will work with her to help raise the Opera Foundation fund necessary to continuing opera in Chicago. Mrs. Jacob Baur, one of the vice chairmen of the committee, will not be there, for she has gone to New York and Washington for a short trip. Mrs. Charles H. Swift, who will act in an artistic advisory capacity to the committee, will be among the guests this afternoon.

On Monday Mrs. Carpenter is opening her home at 4 o'clock for a meeting of the American Friends of China. Mrs. Harley A. MacNair [Florence Ayscough] will speak on "The Far East at the Moment."

Blairs to Entertain Assembly Governors.

Mr. and Mrs. William McCormick Blair will give a dinner at home for the governors of the Assembly and their wives preceding the Assembly next Friday night. Mr. Blair is chairman of the governors.

Mrs. Bartholomay Osborne and Mr. and Mrs. John L. Cochran, who have given many joint pre-Assembly dinners, will give another this year. The party will be given in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Bartholomay, Mrs. Osborne's parents. Mrs. Osborne will return next Thursday from New York.

Mrs. Arthur Krock [Martha Granger Blair] is planning to come from her home in Washington for the Assembly. She will spend that week-end in Lake Forest with the Clarence Prentices.

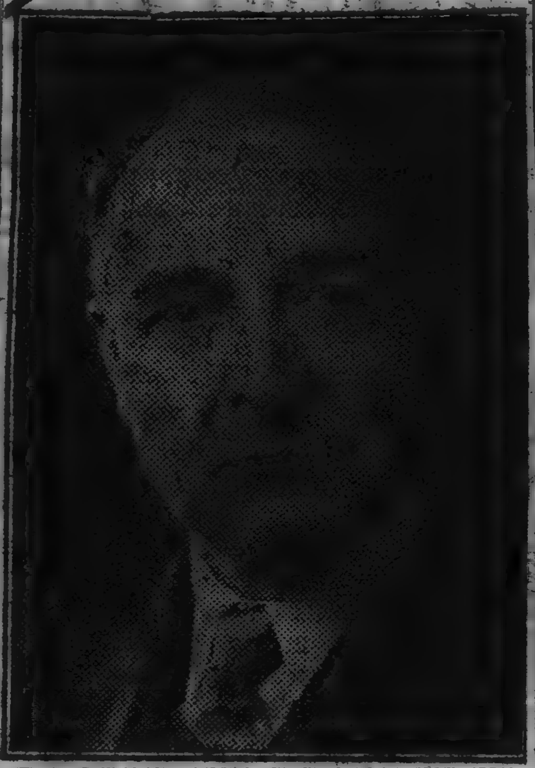
THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, O.
NEWS

NOV 30 1939

The advent of the Boston Symphony on December 15 heightens the excitement which will have everybody on a diet of bromos by the holidays. The famous eastern orchestra plays here on the Cleveland Concert course December 15, at the Music Hall. The limited box capacity for the concert will be completely absorbed by the B. J. Murtfeldts, the Leslie Nichols, the Charlie Dawes, Josephine Forsythe Myers, the Charles Rushes, the Beryl Rubinsteins, the Thomas L. Sidlos, William M. Milliken and Dr. and Mrs. Emil B. deSauze.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BEDFORD, O.
TIMES
12/7/39



CONDUCTS CONCERT — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will direct the Boston Symphony orchestra in a concert at Public Music hall Friday, Dec. 15, under auspices of the Cleveland Museum of Art. Beginning at 8:45 p. m., the concert is another in the series sponsored by Cleveland Concert Chorus under direction of Mrs. Emil Brudno. The program includes compositions from Mozart, Debussy, Ravel and Tchaikovsky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, OHIO
JEWISH REVIEW
& OBSERVER

DEC 1 - 1939

CLEVELAND CONCERT COURSE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear at the Public Hall on Friday, December 15. The orchestra of 110 men are in their 59th season and are under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky. They will play the "Symphony in C major No. 338" by Mozart, Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune," "Orchestral Fragments" by Ravel, and Tchaikovsky's "Symphony O 4 in F minor, Op. 36."

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY

This concert is under the direction of Mrs. Emil Brudno and the auspices of the Cleveland Musium of Art.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS

DEC 2 - 1939

Koussevitzky.

Serge Ko[illegible], to conduct the Boston Symphony at the Auditorium Dec. 13, has listed Hadyn's 102d symphony, Debussy's "La Mer" and the fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky in his program for the Northwestern University college series on the history and enjoyment of music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

DEC 2 - 1939

Boston Symphony Here Dec. 11

One of the major events of the Rochester concert season will be the annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, scheduled for Monday evening, Dec. 11, in the Eastman Theater.

Indications point now to a capacity audience.

It marks the fifty-ninth season for the orchestra which is generally considered the greatest symphonic body existing in the world today. It is also the sixteenth season with the orchestra for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who will wield the baton in the concert here.

Mozart, Howard Hanson, Prokofieff and Ravel will be the composers represented on the program, with the orchestral "fairy tale" of "Peter and the Wolf" as the distinctive symphonic novelty of the evening. With the music will be a narrator, Richard Hale, who will be remembered as leading man with the Lyceum Players here.

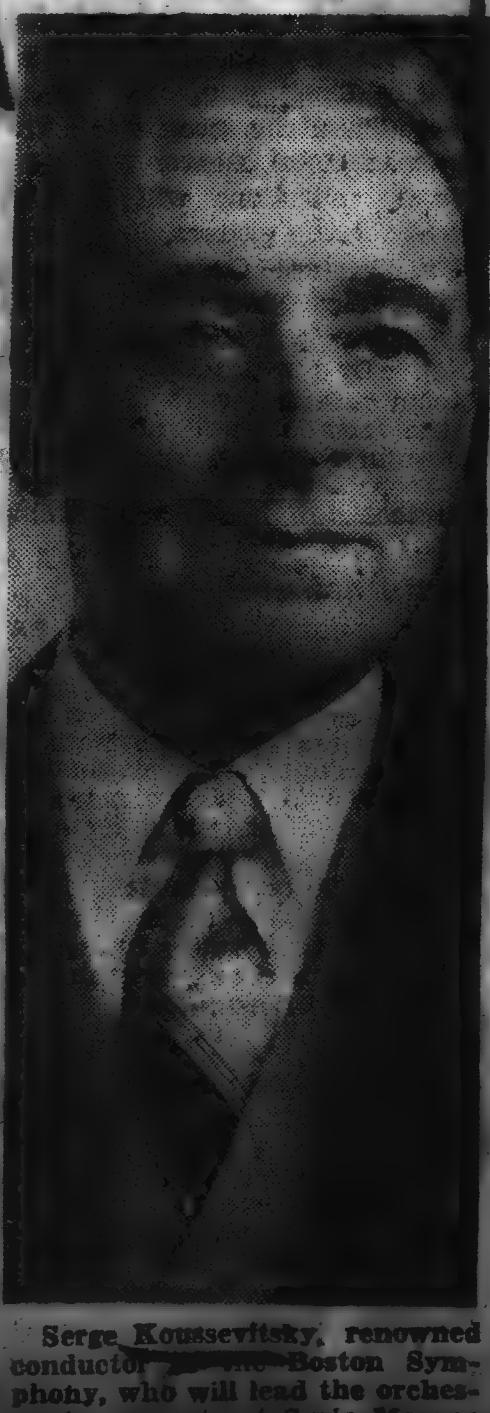
The Program

Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" .... Mozart
Symphony No. 3 .... Hanson
I Andante lamentardo
II Andante tranquillo
III Tempo scherzando
IV Largamente e pesante
INTERMISSION
"Peter and the Wolf" ...Prokofieff
An Orchestral Fairy Tale for Children, Op. 67.
Narrator: Richard Hale
"Daphnis et Chole," Second Suite .... Ravel
Lever du Jour—Pantomine—Danse Generale.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

DEC 3 - 1939

CONDUCTOR



Serge Koussevitsky, renowned conductor [illegible] Boston Symphony, who will lead the orchestra in concerts at Syria Mosque on Saturday night, December 16, and the following afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, O.
NEWS

DEC 2 - 1939

Symphony

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky directs the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program in the Cleveland concert course at Music Hall, December 15, playing the Mozart Symphony in C Major No. 338, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," the Ravel "Daphnis and Chloe" second suite, and the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

DEC 3 - 1939

Good for musically-progressive Serge Koussevitzky! No conductor of a major symphony band has given American composers so many opportunities to have their writings performed under the best conditions possible. The two all-American programs given this past week in Carnegie Hall were excellent, in the main. Howard Hanson, Randall Thompson, Edward Burlingame Hill, Walter Piston, and Roy Harris were among those honored. We thought the Hanson third symphony and the Tompson piece among the best played.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

DEC 3 - 1939

Most interesting are the two separate programs to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Serge Koussevitzky at Syria Mosque on Dec. 16, and Dec. 17. The first of these events will bring to performance three symphonies: Mozart's No. 34 in C-major (Koechel 338); Roy Harris' 3rd symphony and Schumann's 1st symphony.

The matinee list consists of Howard Hanson's 3rd symphony; Prokofieff's Classical symphony; Debussy's Afternoon of a Faun, and Ravel's 2nd suite from Daphnis and Chloe.

The presence of a representative American work on each of these programs reflects Dr. Koussevitzky's keen interest in foremost American contributions to the repertory.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat-Chronicle

DEC 3 - 1939

Boston Group Here Dec. 11

A MAJOR event of the Rochester concert season will be the annual visit of the renowned Boston Symphony Orchestra, scheduled for Monday evening, Dec. 11, in the Eastman Theater. A capacity audience is anticipated.

This season marks the 59th for the orchestra, generally considered the greatest existing symphonic body. It also is the 16th season for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who will conduct.

Aside from the perfection of ensemble playing, chief reason for pre-eminence of the Boston orchestra is the virtuosity of the individual musicians. Attitude of critics toward the organization is summarized by Olin Downes in last Sunday's New York Times:

"As for the performance of the afternoon, it would be hard to praise them too highly. It is probably not exaggeration to remark that the composers represented can never hope for a better presentation of their music. Dr. Koussevitzky put every capacity of his superb orchestra at their service."

Mozart, Dr. Howard Hanson, Prokokieff and Ravel will be the composers represented on the Rochester program, with the orchestral fairy tale "Peter and the Wolf" as the distinctive symphonic novelty. Richard Hale will be narrator. He will be remembered as a leading man in the former Lyceum Theater Company. The program:

Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" .... Mozart
Symphony No. 3 .... Hanson
"Peter and the Wolf" .. Prokokieff
An orchestral fairy tale for children
Narrator: Richard Hale
"Daphnis et Chloe," Second Suite .... Ravel

129

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

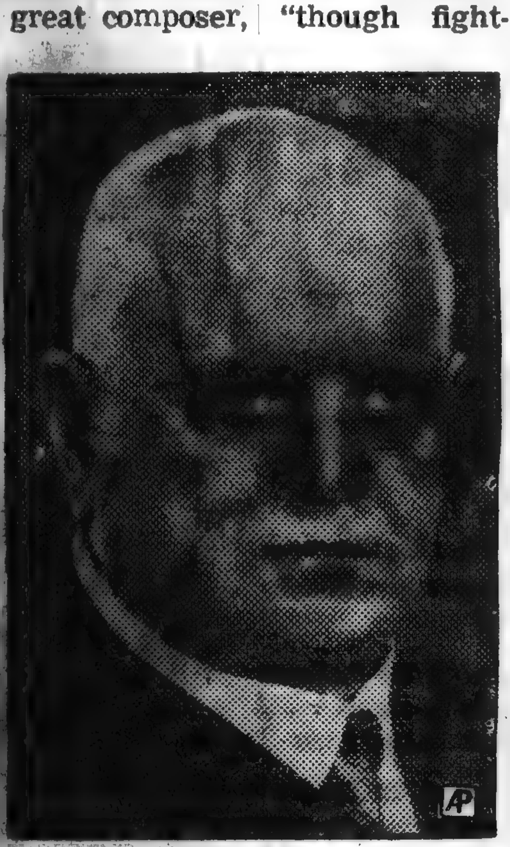
DEC 6 - 1939

Rochester Orchestra Plays Finnish Music as Part of Concert

Sibelius' Great Tone-Poem 'Finlandia' Played by Request for 2000 Audience at Smith Last Evening

The vigor, ruggedness and strength that is Finland's rose in tonal majesty from the Rochester Philharmonic orchestra, at the close of its concert in John M. Greene hall last evening, to reaffirm the spirit of man in 2000 listeners.

It was "Finlandia," Sibelius' great tone-poem, played as an encore through request by the young band of musicians in their first Northampton appearance. So overwhelming was its force, impelled by the pulse and sincerity of Jose Iturbi's leadership, that it outweighed in heroic significance even Beethove's "Eroica" symphony which was performed earlier on the program.



JEAN SIBELIUS
Whose "Finlandia" was played last evening.

From Helsinski yesterday came the news that Finland's great composer, "though fighting illness, voiced faith that his homeland, battling Russian invasion, would come out all right in the end. 'I am deeply convinced all that is happening now will end well,' he declared."

This conviction is probably no where or way better expressed than in "Finlandia." Is not this "the feeling of the heroic will, the interior power through which the embattled individual stands up to the world," of which Rosenfeld speaks in regard to the "Eroica?" Do we not recognize this power as "that of all men in all times who have known themselves ultimately the match for their circumstances?" (Rosenfeld speaking again in regard to the Beethoven symphony.)

The "Eroica" was "composed to celebrate the memory of a great man," according to the composer's markings. It may be that "Finlandia" will become a celebration of the memory of a great little nation. As it was interpreted last night it suggested that likelihood.

Mr. Iturbi's presence as a pianist here a few years ago was greeted with frantic enthusiasm; his return as a conductor was no less fortunate. He presented a popular program, including besides the two previously mentioned works, the overture to Weber's "Oberon," waltz sequences from Act III of "Der Rosenkavalier," by Richard Strauss, Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante defunte," Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes" and the first prelude to "Lohengrin," by Wagner, an encore. The applause for each performance was hearty.

It was particularly heartening when one considered that most of the audience was listening to this musical organization for the first time. The stamping of feet and cheers for Koussevitsky and his Boston band or Ormandy and his Philadelphians are certain elements in John M. Greene hall concerts. That a less famous orchestra—one that is not, in modern terms, a "name band"—could receive such encouragements was indeed rewarding. It testified to the good health of American music today and promised well for the future.

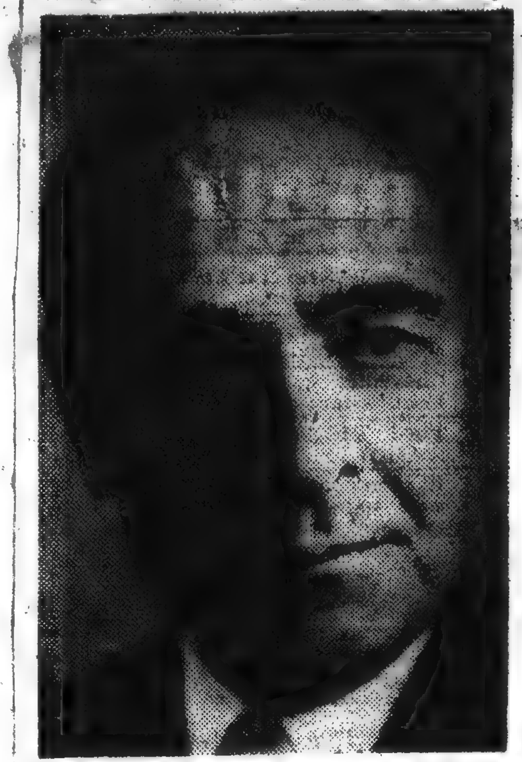
Mr. Iturbi's interpretations, done without scores, were unfailingly authoritative and with few exceptions, notably the case of a man with crashing cymbals, he kept his young players within the bounds of musical exuberance.

D. H. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, O.
NEWS

DEC 6 - 1939

Offers Symphony



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor, brings the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Music Hall here Friday evening, December 15, as a feature of the Cleveland Concert Course directed by Mrs. Emil Brudno. The program includes the Mozart Symphony in C Major No. 338, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Ravel's "Daphnis and Chole" Second Suite, and the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

DEC 7 - 1939

Boston Symphony Here Next Week

Makes Ninth Appearance In Last Nine Years

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky as conductor, will make its 16th Ann Arbor appearance in one of the outstanding concerts of the current Choral Union season at 8:30 o'clock Thursday night in Hill auditorium. This will be the orchestra's ninth program here in nine years.

In its 59 years of performances, the 110-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra has had as members world-famous ensemble and solo performers and its repertoire has grown to include foremost works of all times, including important contemporary compositions.

Koussevitzky arrived in America from Russia in the fall of 1924 to become conductor of the orchestra, having quit his native land because of bitterness toward the Bolshevik regime. He had been decorated by the czar of Russia in 1903. In leaving Moscow, he relinquished the post of conductor of the Russian state orchestra.

His musical education was begun as a child by his father, a violin teacher, and at the age of 12, he became the orchestra leader at the town theater in Vyshny, Volochek, Tver (north Russia). He left home when 14 years old, going to Moscow, where he later became soloist of the imperial opera orchestra and also replaced his teacher as professor at the conservatory when the latter died.

He will direct the orchestra in the following program here:

Symphony in C major (K.V. 338)	Mozart
Symphony No. 3 (in one movement)	Roy Harris
"Peter and the Wolf", an Orchestral Fairy Tale for Children, Op. 67 Narrator: Richard Hale	Prokofieff
Orchestral Fragments from "Daphnis et Chloe," Second Suite	Ravel

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, OHIO
JEWISH REVIEW
& OBSERVER

DEC 8 - 1939

CLEVELAND CONCERT COURSE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will app~~ear~~ at the Public Hall on Friday, December 15th. The orchestra of one hundred and ten men are in their 59th season and are under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky.

This concert is under the direction of Mrs. Emil Brudno and the auspices of the Cleveland Museum of Art.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

DEC 8 - 1939

Boston Symphony At Eastman Monday

New standards of orchestral performance have been achieved by the famed Boston Symphony in the 59 years of its existence.

That this perfection of tone and ensemble work is not wasted on the concert-going public is evidenced by the capacity audiences that always greet Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra in Rochester.

Monday evening this great symphonic body will give its annual concert in the Eastman Theater.

Two of the works to be performed are completely familiar to local audiences. They are the overture to Mozart's opera, "The Marriage of Figaro," and the Second "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite by Ravel.

New to the Rochester audience will be the latest symphony written by Dr. Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music, whose stature as an important American composer is growing year by year. Conductor Koussevitzky has played this symphony. No. 3 in the composer's career, both in Boston and New York this season.

Another novelty will be the musical fairy tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf." Written by Serge Prokofieff, contemporary Russian composer, it has gained applause wherever it has been performed. The music will be augmented by a dramatic narration of the basic story. This will be the task of Richard Hale, baritone singer and once a popular leading man with the Lyceum Players here.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

JEWISH INDEPENDENT
CLEVELAND, O.
12/8/39

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Appear in Concert at Public Music Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear in ~~a~~ concert in Cleveland on Friday evening, Dec. 15, at the Public Music Hall in the Cleveland Course under the sponsorship of the Cleveland Museum of Art and under the direction of Mrs. Emil Brudno.

One hundred and ten men, in their 59th season, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky will give the following program: Mozart, Symphony in C major No. 338, Allegro vivace, Andante de molto, Allegro vivace; Debussy, "Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune (Eglogue de S. Mallarme," (Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun (Eclogue by S. Mallarme)"; Ravel, Orchestral Fragments, from "Daphnis et Chloe" (Second Suite), Lever ju Jour—Pantomime — Danse Generale; Tschaikovsky, Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36, I. Andante sostenuto. Moderato can anima in movimento di Valse. II. Andantino in modo di canzona. III. Scherzo: Pizzicato ostinato. IV, Finale: Allegro con fuoco; the Little White Dcnkey, Ibert; I Palpiti, Paganini, ((Arr. Francescatti). Dr. O. Herz at the piano.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHICAGO, ILL.
Journal of Commerce

DEC 9 - 1939

Maestro Returns

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Boston Symphony Orchestra
Auditorium — Wednesday at 8:30

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

DEC 6 - 1939

Rochester Orchestra Plays Finnish Music as Part of Concert

Sibelius' Great Tone-Poem "Finlandia" Played by Request for 2000 Audience at Smith Last Evening

The vigor, ruggedness and strength that is Finland's rose to tonal majesty from the Rochester Philharmonic orchestra, at the close of its concert in John M. Greene hall last evening, to reaffirm the spirit of man in 2000 listeners.

It was "Finlandia," Sibelius' great tone-poem, played as an encore through request by the young band of musicians in their first Northampton appearance. So overwhelming was its force, impelled by the pulse and sincerity of Jose Iturbi's leadership, that it outweighed in heroic significance even Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony which was performed earlier on the program.

From Helsinski yesterday came the news that Finland's great composer, "though fighting illness, voiced faith that his homeland, battling Russian invasion, would come out all right in the end. 'I am deeply convinced all that is happening now will end well,' he declared."

JEAN SIBELIUS
Whose "Finlandia" was played last evening.

This conviction is probably no where or way better expressed than in "Finlandia." Is not this "the feeling of the heroic will, the interior power through which the embattled individual stands up to the world," of which Rosenfeld speaks in regard to the "Eroica?" Do we not recognize this power as "that of all men in all times who have known themselves ultimately the match for their circumstances?" (Rosenfeld speaking again in regard to the Beethoven symphony.)

The "Eroica" was "composed to celebrate the memory of a great man," according to the composer's markings. It may be that "Finlandia" will become a celebration of the memory of a great little nation. As it was interpreted last night it suggested that likelihood.

Mr. Iturbi's presence as a pianist here a few years ago was greeted with frantic enthusiasm; his return as a conductor was no less fortunate. He presented a popular program, including besides the two previously mentioned works, the overture to Weber's "Oberon," waltz sequences from Act III of "Der Rosenkavalier," by Richard Strauss, Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante defunte," Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes" and the first prelude to "Lohengrin," by Wagner, an encore. The applause for each performance was hearty.

It was particularly heartening when one considered that most of the audience was listening to this musical organization for the first time. The stamping of feet and cheers for Koussevitsky and his Boston band or Ormandy and his Philadelphians are certain elements in John M. Greene hall concerts. That a less famous orchestra—one that is not, in modern terms, a "name band"—could receive such encouragements was indeed rewarding. It testified to the good health of American music today and promised well for the future.

Mr. Iturbi's interpretations, done without scores, were unfailingly authoritative and with few exceptions, notably the case of a man with crashing cymbals, he kept his young players within the bounds of musical exuberance.

D. H. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, O.
NEWS

DEC 6 - 1939

Offers Symphony

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor, brings the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Music Hall here Friday evening, December 15, as a feature of the Cleveland Concert Course directed by Mrs. Emil Brudno. The program includes the Mozart Symphony in C Major No. 338, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Ravel's "Daphnis and Chole" Second Suite, and the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

DEC 7 - 1939

Boston Symphony Here Next Week

Makes Ninth Appearance In Last Nine Years

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky as conductor, will make its 16th Ann Arbor appearance in one of the outstanding concerts of the current Choral Union season at 8:30 o'clock Thursday night in Hill auditorium. This will be the orchestra's ninth program here in nine years.

In its 59 years of performances, the 110-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra has had as members world-famous ensemble and solo performers and its repertoire has grown to include foremost works of all times, including important contemporary compositions.

Koussevitzky arrived in America from Russia in the fall of 1924 to become conductor of the orchestra, having quit his native land because of bitterness toward the Bolshevik regime. He had been decorated by the czar of Russia in 1903. In leaving Moscow, he relinquished the post of conductor of the Russian state orchestra.

His musical education was begun as a child by his father, a violin teacher, and at the age of 12, he became the orchestra leader at the town theater in Vyshny, Volochek, Tver (north Russia). He left home when 14 years old, going to Moscow, where he later became soloist of the imperial opera orchestra and also replaced his teacher as professor at the conservatory when the latter died.

He will direct the orchestra in the following program here:

Symphony in C major (K.V. 338)	Mozart
Symphony No. 3 (in one movement)	Roy Harris
"Peter and the Wolf", an Orchestral Fairy Tale for Children, Op. 67	Prokofieff
Narrator: Richard Hale
Orchestral Fragments from "Daphnis et Chloe," Second Suite	Ravel

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, OHIO
JEWISH REVIEW
& OBSERVER

DEC 8 - 1939

CLEVELAND CONCERT COURSE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear at the Public Hall on Friday, December 15th. The orchestra of one hundred and ten men are in their 59th season and are under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky.

This concert is under the direction of Mrs. Emil Brudno and the auspices of the Cleveland Museum of Art.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

DEC 8 - 1939

Boston Symphony At Eastman Monday

New standards of orchestral performance have been achieved by the famed Boston Symphony in the 59 years of its existence.

That this perfection of tone and ensemble work is not wasted on the concert-going public is evidenced by the capacity audiences that always greet Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra in Rochester.

Monday evening this great symphonic body will give its annual concert in the Eastman Theater.

Two of the works to be performed are completely familiar to local audiences. They are the overture to Mozart's opera, "The Marriage of Figaro," and the Second "Daphnis and Caloe" Suite by Ravel.

New to the Rochester audience will be the latest symphony written by Dr. Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music, whose stature as an important American composer is growing year by year. Conductor Koussevitzky has played this symphony, No. 3 in the composer's career, both in Boston and New York this season.

Another novelty will be the musical fairy tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf." Written by Serge Prokofieff, contemporary Russian composer, it has gained applause wherever it has been performed. The music will be augmented by a dramatic narration of the basic story. This will be the task of Richard Hale, baritone singer and once a popular leading man with the Lyceum Players here.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

JEWISH INDEPENDENT
CLEVELAND, O.
12/8/39

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Appear in Concert at Public Music Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear in ~~a~~ concert in Cleveland on Friday evening, Dec. 15, at the Public Music Hall in the Cleveland Course under the sponsorship of the Cleveland Museum of Art and under the direction of Mrs. Emil Brudno.

One hundred and ten men, in their 59th season, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky will give the following program: Mozart, Symphony in C major No. 338, Allegro vivace, Andante de molto, Allegro vivace; Debussy, "Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune (Eglogue de S. Mallarme," (Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun (Eclogue by S. Mallarme)"; Ravel, Orchestral Fragments, from "Daphnis et Chloe" (Second Suite), Lever ju Jour—Pantomime — Danse Generale; Tschaikovsky, Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36, I. Andante sostenuto, Moderate can anima in movimento di Valse. II. Andantino in modo di canzona. III. Scherzo: Pizzicato ostinato. IV. Finale: Allegro can fuoco; the Little White Donkey, Ibert; I Palpiti, Paganini, ((Arr. Francescatti). Dr. O. Herz at the piano.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHICAGO, ILL.
Journal of Commerce

DEC 9 - 1939

Maestro Returns

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Boston Symphony Orchestra
Auditorium — Wednesday at 8:30

130

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

DEC 9 - 1939

Boston Symphony Plays Here Friday

Once a concert "bull fiddler," Koussevitzky now is the famed orchestral head of the Boston Symphony

* * *

Orchestra to Play Debussy, Tchaikovsky, Ravel, Mozart

Symphony With 110 Men Plays "Return Engagement" at Public Music Hall as Part of Concert Course

By MILTON WIDDER

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra's conductor, Sergei Alexandrovich Koussevitzky, has in the past 16 years built the Boston orchestra from a mediocre group to one of the three foremost symphonic groups in the country—possibly in the world.

Today Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony are synonymous. The musical accomplishments of master and his 110 musicians are manifold, ranging from introducing many new American composers to re-working the familiar classics with freshness and vitality.

The aggregation will be in Cleveland's Public Music Hall Friday night as one of the Cleveland Concert Course attractions, managed by Mrs. Emil Brudno.

Two Koussevitzkys

KOUSSEVITZKY is not an emotional conductor. After he raps for attention in front of the orchestra, he goes through his musical paces meticulously—or so it seems from the audience.

The orchestral response, however, is different. They sing and play and preform in perfect unison, and if there seems to be no outward emotional demonstration by the conductor, there is plently of it emanating from the orchestra.

But that is at the concert. During rehearsals the picture is quite different. Here emotion rules the orchestra roost. Koussevitzky is a tyrant, a dictator, a man given to scolding and floods of words.

Otherwise, Koussevitzky is a quiet man. He is 65 years old, conservative in his tastes. His days are carefully planned and executed. He allows certain hours for work on scores, for reading philosophy, for rehearsals, for rests, for walks with his two cocker spaniels named Bemol (flat) and Diese (sharp).

Doesn't Like Soviets

HE took over the Boston Symphony in 1924 after he left Russia, dissatisfied with the Soviet regime that tried autocratically to run his musical life. When he left Petrograd, Koussevitzky and his wife left most of their fortune there.

The Koussevitzky musical career began at Moscow's Philharmonic School where he won a scholarship. Because he applied late only a few instruments were open for his study and he chose the "bull fiddle." He became so efficient in this instrument that he toured Russia as well as Europe as a "bull fiddle" soloist and won continent-wide recognition.

In fact, he became known as the world's number one "bull fiddler."

He and his wife, formerly a sculptress, formed an orchestra and by 1910 Koussevitzky was the best known orchestral conductor in Czarist Russia. He left his mother country four years after the Bolshevists took over.

Likes New Works

ALTHOUGH not sympathetic to the present regime, Koussevitzky plays much of the contemporary Russian music produced in his former fatherland. But he pays just as much attention to native American composers, the classicist, and the modernists of other countries.

Insatiably in his search for good modernists, Koussevitzky is credited with indroducing to this country the works of Zoltan Kodaly, the Hungarian master; William Walton, whose English violin concerto Jascha Heifetz introduced to the world at Severance Hall the night before last, and Paul Hindemith, the German composer now also a refugee from his fatherland.

The program for Friday night will open with Mozart's Symphony in C Major; Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun;" Ravel's orchestral fragments from "Daphnis et Chloe" (second suite) and Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
ENQUIRER NEWS

DEC 1 0 1939

Boston Symphony To Play

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, outstanding among the conductors in the country and the director of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the last 15 years, will make his ninth consecutive annual appearance in Ann Arbor with the symphony Thursday evening in Hill auditorium. This is included in the University of Michigan Choral Union series of concerts. Dr. Koussevitsky has become a tradition in Ann Arbor and patrons from all over Michigan ,including many from Battle Creek, will attend this concert.

Though Koussevitsky himself has become tradition in many parts of the country, he doesn't abide by this in his music or the programs he plans, for he recently took New Yorkers "off their feet" by starting the season at Carnegie hall with two concerts by all American composers. Peculiarly, this breaking of precedent and establishing a new idea in musical trends in this country met with little rebuff.

The program Thursday evening will include "Symphony in C major," Mozart; "Symphony No. 3" (in one movement), Roy Harris; and "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale for children, Prokofieff. Richard Hale will be the narrator. Concluding the program will be orchestral fragments from "Daphnis and Chloe," second suite, Ravel, including "Lever du jour," "Pantomime," and "Danse generale."

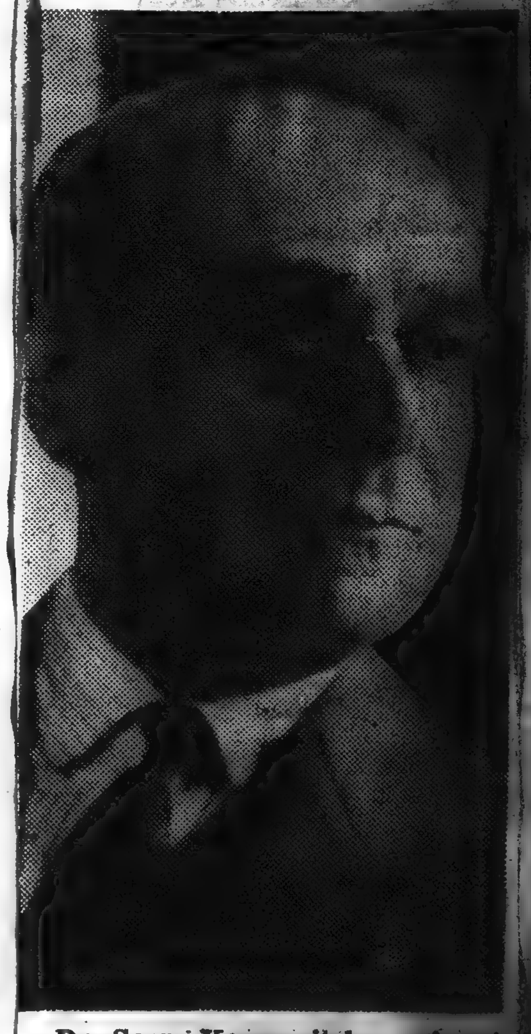
CONDUCTOR

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

DEC 1 0 1939

Conductor



Dr. Serge Koussevitzky eminent conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in different programs at Syria Mosque the night of Dec. 16 and afternoon of Dec. 17.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DAVENPORT, IA.
DEMOCRAT-LEADER

DEC 1 0 1939

INTERESTING BITS

. . . Serge Koussevitsky has listed Haydn's 102nd symphony, Debussy's "La Mer" and Tschaikowsky's Fourth symphony for his Chicago concert with the Boston Symphony next Wednesday night . . . William Schumann, American composer has received the first award in the competition sponsored by the Town Hall league of composer . . . Zinka Milanov, Metropolitan soprano, will make her first extensive American tour this season . . . Mario Castelnuovo has completed musical settings to all of the songs in Shakespeare's works. . . 1,000 records both swing and symphonic are included in the music library at Colgate university, having been presented by the Carnegie Foundation. . . Efrem Kurtz has been engaged to conduct at Robin Hood

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM KALAMAZOO, MICH.
GAZETTE

DEC 1 0 1939

Boston Symphony to Play at Ann Arbor

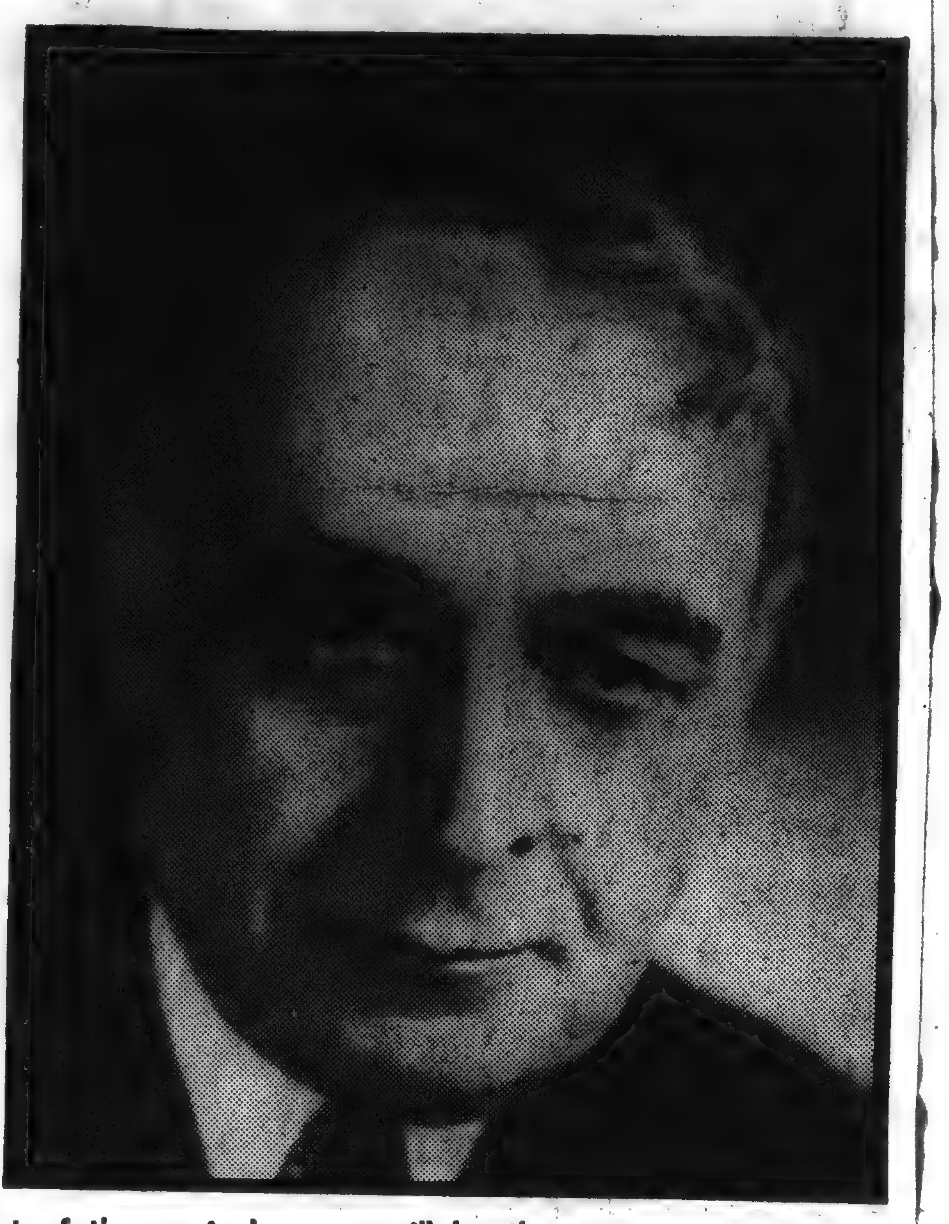
ANN ARBOR- For the ninth consecutive year, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in Hill Auditorium, Ann Arbor, Dec. 14. So traditional has its University appearance become, that concert patrons from far and wide look upon it as one of Michigan's outstanding musical events.

For this occasion the orchestra has prepared an interesting program as follows: Symphony in C major (K. V. 338), Mozart; Symphony No. 3 (in one movement), Roy Harris; "Peter and the Wolf," an Orchestral Fairy Tale for Children, Op. 67, Prokofieff, narrator: Richard Hale; Orchestral Fragments from "Daphis et Chloe," second suite; Lever du Jour, Pantomime, Danse Generale, Ravel.

131

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
DEC 1 0 1939

CONDUCTS HERE WEDNESDAY



A highlight of the musical season will be the appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Auditorium theater on Wednesday night. Serge Koussevitzky is the ensemble's pre-eminent conductor.

Koussevitzky Brings Last of East's Groups

By Cecil Smith.

After an absence of six years the magnificent Boston Symphony orchestra will return to Chicago for a concert in the Auditorium theater Wednesday evening, the fourth event of Northwestern university's "History and Enjoyment of Music" series. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, sole conductor of the orchestra since 1924, will direct a program of Haydn, Debussy, and Tschaikowsky.

This concert completes the roster of the three great eastern orchestras playing here this fall. Eugene Ormandy led off with the Philadelphia orchestra, and John Barbirolli followed more recently with the Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra of New York.

The Boston Symphony orchestra is 39 years younger than the Philharmonic, but it has been one of the world's great orchestras ever since Henry Lee Higginson founded it in 1881. The first conductor was Sir George Henschel, a noted German-British musician first known as a singer and later as a valuable composer and conductor. He was followed at the head of the Boston orchestra by a succession of world famed conductors—Wilhelm Gericke, Artur Nikisch [who is called an even greater conductor than Dr. Koussevitzky by many who remember his work in the '90s], Emil Paur, Karl Muck [perhaps the finest of all Wagner exponents], Max Fiedler, Henri Rabaud [the composer of "Marouf" and "La Procession Nocturne"], and Pierre Monteux [now the conductor of the San Francisco Symphony orchestra].

• • •

In his fifteen years of service to Boston's principal musical institution Dr. Koussevitzky has always held his head high. His insistence upon perfection in public performance is almost legendary. If a work is not in impeccable shape when the date of its performance approaches he will postpone its appearance until every blemish has been polished away. He has always demanded and been allowed a liberal rehearsal schedule, and with this freedom he has been able to make the Boston Symphony orchestra a virtuoso ensemble of dazzling brilliance.

Toward the beginning of his tenure of office Dr. Koussevitzky caused consternation among many of his conservative subscribers by placing enormously increased emphasis upon new and contemporary music. Mr. Monteux, his predecessor, was—and still is—one of the foremost interpreters of the Ballet Russe literature, which was still quite novel in the years before 1924, but he had not succeeded in winning his audience to any great enthusiasm for modern music.

When Dr. Koussevitzky began programming an even larger number of contemporary works than Mr. Monteux had ventured, loud wails were to be heard from all directions. But Dr. Koussevitzky was not to be deterred from his plan of making Boston contemporary minded in its musical tastes, and he kept right on. Because his performances were so spectacular in their finish and mastery he found that opposition to his programs gradually decreased. By this time I think it can justly be said that Boston has the most open minded musical public in the country, so far as the acceptance of new works is concerned. When I analyzed the répertoire of a Boston season two or three years ago I found that over 45 per cent of the music played had been composed since 1900.

• • •

But Dr. Koussevitzky is not a maniac on the subject of new music. His taste in romantic, classical, and preclassical music is wide and comprehensive. He conducts Haydn fully as well, I believe, as Toscanini. Yet he has a special predilection for the symphonies of Bruckner and Mahler, and has, unless I am mistaken, outstripped even Dr. Frederick Stock in the frequency with which he has included these orphaned composers upon his programs. He discovers magical sonorities in Debussy and can make your hair stand on end with Ravel's "Daphnis and Cholë."

His Beethoven may possibly be a little overdramatized by his Russian temperament, but nevertheless his Ninth symphony is majestic in its breadth, driving in its energy, and rapt in its lyricism. Nobody in America can equal him in a Tschaikowsky symphony. Nowadays he can even play Brahms superbly, though ten years ago he had not yet understood the Brahms symphonies.

Many American composers look gratefully upon Dr. Koussevitzky. With the single exception of our own Dr. Stock, he has performed more works by native composers than any other American conductor. Only a fortnight ago he devoted his orchestra's first two subscription programs in New York to two different all-American programs covering about forty years in the recent history of music in this country. His belief in the American composer is wholly genuine, for he never gives American works inferior performances.

Wednesday evening's program does not, unfortunately, offer an opportunity to become acquainted with the conductor as an enthusiast for new music. It does, however, provide the audience with a chance to hear him and the orchestra in three styles with which they are equally successful—classicism, impressionism, and Russian romanticism.

The program is as follows:

Symphony No. 102, B-flat Major	Haydn
"La Mer"	Debussy
Symphony No. 4, F Minor	Tschaikowsky

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
DEC 1 0 1939

Koussevitzky Plays Foremost American Composers' Works

Famous Conductor of Boston Symphony Recognizes Worth of Native Musical Talent

By RALPH LEWANDO
Press Music Editor

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will come here to Syria Mosque for concerts Saturday night and Sunday afternoon with a different program listed for each event, are always the signal for a huge outpouring of music lovers, for long since have this eminent conductor and the distinguished organization from the Hub become an institution.

The Saturday program comprises Mozart's C-major symphony, No. 34 (Koechel 338); Roy Harris' 3rd symphony, and Schumann's 1st symphony. The matinee event will feature Howard Hanson's 3rd symphony; Prokofieff's Classical symphony; Debussy's Afternoon of a Faun and the 2nd suite from Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe.

Mr. Lewando

The arrangement of these programs is characteristic of Dr. Koussevitzky's recognition of foremost American composers.

Throughout the 15 years that he has led the Boston Symphony Orchestra Dr. Koussevitzky has served the cause of indigenous representative creative musicians with consistent devotional interest.

Only in recent years have eminent European conductors on the American scene shown interest in worthy compositions of American creative artists to the extent of programming them.

Ever since he has been musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's artistic destinies Mr. Koussevitzky has been in the forefront in recognizing our composers and programming their works. He has done this, not as a polite gesture but in the belief that music as a creative art in this country has found a definite and unmistakable character and importance. The two special concerts given by the Boston Orchestra in the Hub, that preceded the opening of the regular season there and featured only representative American works by living composers, is indicative of a sane attitude that might well be emulated by others.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS
DEC 1 2 1939

Boston Symphony Holds Concert Here Tomorrow

The 105 musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will arrive in Chicago tomorrow morning for a concert tomorrow night at the Auditorium Theater in the adult education series sponsored by the University College of Northwestern University. Serge Koussevitzky, who has conducted the orchestra since 1924, has been frequently praised for the emphasis he places on the work of American composers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat-Chronicle
DEC 1 1 1939

Noted Orchestra Plays Tonight At Eastman

THE world famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will arrive in Rochester today under guidance of the veteran conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, for its annual concert in this city.

That headline musical event will be staged tonight in the Eastman Theater, beginning at 8:20.

Indications point to a capacity crowd to welcome this orchestra, which is recognized by most critics as the greatest symphonic organization of the present day.

Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen for his Rochester concert an unusual program, with a variety of modern and classic works listed. The complete program to be played follows:

Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"	Wolfgan Mozart
Symphony No. 3	Howard Hanson
"Peter and the Wolf"—an Orchestral Fairy Tale	Serge Prokofieff Richard Hale, narrator
"Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2	Maurice Ravel

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
DEC 1 1 1939

Koussevitzky Lauds Hanson

Serge A. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Rochester today for a concert tonight at Eastman Theater and praised Dr. Howard Hanson, director of Eastman School of Music.

S. A. Koussevitzky

"The equal of any of the great symphonies" was the 65-year-old Russian exile's term for Hanson's Third Symphony, which will be played on the Boston group's concert this evening. He lauded Hanson as "one of the outstanding living composers in the United States."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE
DEC 1 1 1939

TO GIVE CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Play in Buffalo Tomorrow Evening.

BUFFALO, Dec. 11.—The Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will present a concert in the Consistory auditorium tomorrow evening, starting at 8:30 o'clock. The program will include "Symphony in B Flat, No. 102," by Haydn; "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral Fairy Tale for Children; Opus 67, by Prokofieff, and "Symphony in F Minor, No. 4," by Tchaikovsky.

The concert is one in a series arranged by Zorah Berry, concert management. Other concerts in the series will be given by Richard Crooks, January 23; Alexander Brailowsky, February 6; Helen Jepson, February 20, and Lawrence Tibbett, April 9.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

DEC 10 1939

KOUSSEVITSKY TO LEAD BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE

Group of Symphonies Listed for Concerts

By J. FRED LISSFELT
Sun-Telegraph Music Critic

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its celebrated director, Serge Koussevitsky, will occupy our attention over the week-end with a concert Saturday night and Sunday afternoon at Syria Mosque. The Saturday concert offers a formidable program of three symphonies, totally diverse in content and importance, and marking three epochs in symphony history.

Mr. Lissfelt

Of the Mozart C Major we can prophesy an excellent interpretation, what with the Boston strings and their director's discipline, if Koussevitsky sufficiently reduces the number of his players not to overweight the ensemble. Schumann's First symphony also will doubtlessly fare well in his hands, for he has the emotion for this romantic style.

Roy Harris' Third Symphony will be the novelty, and its playing is a sign of good will on the part of Koussevitsky for the modern and especially the American composer. He holds the record among leaders of American orchestras for the playing of native music, an honor not to be overlooked by the public.

Harris is an Oklahoman, who, though he has consulted with the best cosmopolitan teachers, has remained as pure an American artist as we possess.

Hanson Symphony

For Sunday, another American work, new to Pittsburgh, Howard Hanson's Third Symphony, opens the program. As director in Rochester, Hanson, also, is the propagandist for American music through his annual festivals during which he permits composer's to direct their own works. We know Hanson through his choral writings and his opera, "Merry Mount," but this is our first hearing, except by radio, of his symphonic music.

Prokofieff's "Classic Symphony" should prove interesting, since our own orchestra has invited the composer to appear soon after the new year.

The second half of this program repeats two works which Reiner has recently played for us, both of which are well known, but none the les welcome, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and Ravel's second suite from "Daphnis and Chloe."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

DEC 11 1939

Boston Symphony Features Native Works

Serge Koussevitzky announces for each of the two concerts to be given in Syria Mosque by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon two new and significant symphonies by American composers. Each is the third work of its writer in this form, and each has had its first public presentation within the year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Roy Harris, a native of Oklahoma, is the composer of the evening program; Howard Hanson, born in Nebraska, is the composer to be heard at the matinee.

The other works listed for the Saturday program are Mozart's Symphony in C major, No. 34 (K. No. 338), and the Schubert Symphony No. 7 in C Major.

Hanson's Third Symphony on Sunday afternoon will be introduced by Mozart's Overture to the "Marriage of Figaro." The second part of the program will include Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony;" Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun;" and Ravel's Second Suite from the Ballet "Daphnis and Chloe."

The Third Symphony of Harris had its first performance by this orchestra in Boston last spring. It is a concentrated work, written in one movement, on an unusual structural scheme, music provocative and arresting in quality, which has been called the most important score which has come from Ray Harris until now. The Symphony of Howard Hanson is more traditional in character, having the usual succession of four movements. It is music of Nordic suggestion, and is plainly influenced by the composer's ancestry.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its opening concerts of the season in Carnegie Hall, New York, in November, Serge Koussevitzky presented two programs entirely of American music. The Symphony of Harris stood upon the first and the Symphony of Hanson upon the second.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

DEC 12 1939

Boston Symphony Wins Ovation in Eastman Concert

By A. J. WARNER

★ The incomparable Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, gave their annual concert in the Eastman Theater. last night and were according a welcome of ovational proportions.

An audience of capacity size filled the house and at the end of the evening there was a demonstration of enthusiasm which brought the musicians to their feet many times as their leader, repeatedly recalled to acknowledge the applause, beckoned them to rise.

It was, indeed, a festal occasion at which neither flowers nor palms were needed to emphasize the atmosphere of celebration, for the appearance of the illustrious visitors from Boston was sufficient cause in itself. ★

In the face of their present magnificent status it is almost impossible to believe that a little over 20 years ago the Boston Symphony, through the misfortunes suffered during the Great War and other unhappy circumstance, had fallen upon such evil days that the prosperity and position it had won in the course of its long and honorable history were all but lost. And yet out of that valley of problems and troubles there has gradually emerged an organization which has eclipsed its former records until it stands today as one of the two or three greatest orchestras now extant, a glorious instrument for the transmission of beauty, which many of the knowing believe is without a peer.

★ Last night's concert suggested the singular fact that, under the magic of Mr. Koussevitzky's baton, the Boston Symphony has arrived at a point where the play (the music or the program) seems no longer to be necessarily the thing, and that it is their performance which counts primarily. For the program, although it may have reflected the conductor's famous sense of public psychology, was, perhaps, for some of those in the audience, disappointing in its content. Yet there was no sign of any such disappointment in the frenetic quality of the applause. Alchemy is no secret to the Bostonians, and merely to hear them play is enough. ★

The evening began with an enchanting performance of the Overture to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," the perfect opera buffa, which was played with the perfection characteristic of the music. Howard Hanson's Third Symphony, which followed, was given a superb presentation into which went the full resources of the orchestra, with Mr. Koussevitzky surpassing himself in the power and vigor of his interpretation. This music, which creates the feeling of a driving force behind it and which, in derivative terms that strike one as essentially Nordic and European rather than American, might be said to mirror something of the restless uncertainty and the feeling of frustration of the America of today, has moments when a broad melodic line breaks through the dissonance and the harsh tonalities which punctuate the score as a whole. Dr. Hanson received the acclaim of the house at the close of the symphony and was led to the podium by Mr. Koussevitzky to accept the plaudits accorded him by his "home town."

After the intermission there came a novelty to Rochester in the shape of Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," An Orchestral Fairy Tale for Children, Opus 67, a charming example of musical humor in which the bird of the story is represented by a flute, the duck by an oboe, the cat by "a clarinet in a low register," Peter by the string quartet, and the wolf by sinister and discordant horns. Richard Hale as the narrator was admirably blood-curdling in the horrific emphasis with which he recited the poem, and the orchestra played the music with delightful elan.

The concert was brought to a glowing close by the second "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite of Ravel—the first of two concert suites drawn from the ballet Ravel composed for Diaghileff before the Great War included a four-part chorus in the orchestral score—in which the playing of Mr. Koussevitzky's superlative band exquisitely reflected the prismatic splendor of the composer's brilliantly ingenious music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat-Chronicle

DEC 12 1939

Koussevitzky Receives Ovation Shared by Dr. Howard Hanson

By NORMAN NAIRN

★ A SUPERB performance by one of the great artistic organizations of the country—the Boston Symphony Orchestra—and tribute to Dr. Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music, whose new Third Symphony was given its first Rochester hearing, marked the concert last night in the Eastman Theater.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, in his 16th year as conductor of the orchestra which long has been acknowledged as having no superiors and few equals among the great orchestras of the world, gave a standing-room-only audience a tremendously effective and fascinating evening. ★

Dr. Koussevitsky believes that music as a creative art in this country has found a definite character and importance, hence his two programs of American music in Boston this fall. He likes the new Hanson symphony immensely, considering it one of the most important works yet produced by an American. He has now played it four times, in Boston, New York and Washington, and will introduce it again on the present tour.

Written for Tercentenary

Other than its number, the newest Hanson work is not titled. It was completed last year in commemoration of the tercentenary of the founding of the first Swedish settlement on the Delaware.

The first movement, andante lamentando-agitato, is rugged in its sweep, the chords for the brass being mightily effective. The woodwinds introduce a grand theme in the second movement — andante tranquillo—which has the quality of brooding, and here it was particulary evident that the conductor himself was enjoying the work immensely.

Unique and with definite individuality is the third movement—tempo scherzando—with the vigorous impact of the kettle drums in a treatment of genuine interest and recurrence. The fourth movement is one of the grandeur and power, developing from the impressive mood of the first movement through a chorale and into a tremendous climax.

There were many understanding musicians who last night thought the Third Symphony Dr. Hanson's most significant work. Certainly it is of broad scope and definite individuality, an imposing work that again stamps Dr. Hanson as one of the technically best-equipped of our American composers.

Whimsical Tale Introduced

There was no question that the audience enjoyed throughly the eloquent interpretation by Dr. Koussevitzky, and they greeted Dr. Hanson with an ovation when the conductor stepped from the podium and insisted that the composer take his bows.

A decidedly exquisite novelty was Prokofieff's orchestra fairy tale, "Peter and the Wolf," with Richard Hale as the narrator. To most Rochesterians this was their first opportunity to hear this fascinating work, and Dr. Koussevitzky deserves the thanks of the community for introducing the whimsical and ingratiating tale of the lad who lassoed the wolf by the tail.

Each character is represented by an instrument in the orchestra, the bird by a flue, the duck by an oboe, the cat by a clarinet, the grandfather by a bassoon, the wolf by three horns, Peter by a string quartet, the hunters' shooting by the drums. Engaging the fancy of the listener, the number was delicately and colorfully played.

Mr. Hale's flawless enunciation and the extraordinary artistry with which he announced the tale made for a perfect combination.

Dr. Koussevitzky opened the program with the tuneful and ever-popular Mozart overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," and closed with the Second Suite of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," where the strings played with a glowing translucence and the entire orchestra in a wide range of color. Prolonged applause greeted the noted visitor as the program was brought to an end.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CANANDAIGUA, N. Y.
MESSENGER

DEC 12 1939

HEAR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Among those in Rochester last evening to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra were Mrs. Clarence C. Keehn, Miss Shirley Case, Mr. and Mrs. John J. Handrahan, Mrs. Phisterer, Miss Isabel Phisterer, Mrs. Earl Clapp, Miss Marion Clapp, Miss Esther McKerr, Miss Margery K. McGarraugh, Mrs. Burnett De Witt, Misses Barbara Willson and Katherine Fairley, Kenneth Lord and Fritz Aebischer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN-PATRIOT

DEC 12 1939

Boston Symphony In Ann Arbor Dec. 14

For the ninth consecutive year, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in Hill Auditorium, Ann Arbor, Thursday evening. So traditional has its University appearance become, that concert patrons from far and wide look upon it as one of Michigan's outstanding musical events.

For this occasion the orchestra has prepared an interesting program as follows: "Symphony in C major," (Mozart); "Symphony No. 3," (Roy Harris); "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral Fairy tale for children, Op. 67, (Prokofieff), narrator, Richard Hale; Orchestral Fragments from "Daphnis et Chloe," Second Suite, (Ravel.)

133

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat-Chronicle

DEC 12 1939

Society Thrills To Music of Symphony

AN auspicious beginning to a brilliant holiday season, the concert last evening brought society out to pay tribute to one of Rochester's musical traditions—the winter visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under ~~the baton~~ of Serge Koussevitzky.

The light snowfall and the icy streets seemed an appropriate touch for the winter season. It interfered, however, with the long line of cars, which usually hold such a decorous parade down East Avenue, and they slipped and twisted toward Gibbs Street, bringing their passengers earlier than is customary.

Hurrying into the lobby, out of the nip of winter one saw that veteran concert-goer Florus Baxter, who, accompanied by his daughter, Mrs. Ray C. Milow, and his granddaughter, Mrs. William Homer De Witt. Mrs. Milow was smartly gowned in black, over which was worn a graceful fur wrap. Mrs. DeWitt was charmingly attired in a gown of turquoise blue satin and wrap of black velvet.

Chatting in the lobby were Miss Helen Ryder, stunningly attired in a wrap of mink, Miss Delight Carson and Mrs. Paul Smith, formerly Miss Hazel Dossenbach, well known musician and daughter of Herman Dossenbach.

Mr. and Mrs. Harold Deshon came in with their daughter Nancy, who had chosen this concert as the outstanding one of the season to attend. Mrs. Thomas A. Sharp was with her daughter, Miss Gloria, whose four years at college had deprived her of the privilege, she said, of attending the concerts she enjoys so much, and also Miss Virginia.

The lobby soon was thronged with hurrying arrivals. Mrs. J. Frank Duffy stopped for a minute's chat with Mr. Duffy and said she had been quite thrilled to have entertained in her home at luncheon two members of the orchestra, Boaz Pillar and Norbet Lauga. Mrs. Duffy looked unusually attractive in a vivid wrap of red velvet.

Mr. and Mrs. William G. Stuber, Mrs. John J. Finucane, Mrs. James C. Dryer and her son, Rufus K. Dryer 2nd, and Mrs. Dryer (the former Miss Elizabeth Baird), Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. Carson and Mrs. Carson's sister, Miss Winifred Knight, and Mrs. Charles P. Ford, who was wearing an all-white costume and white ermine coat, also were noted as they paused to chat with friends.

Mrs. James Sibley Watson arrived with her daughter-in-law, Mrs. James Sibley Watson Jr. One caught a glimpse of Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Eisenhart and their daughter, Miss Eleanor, who was gowned in scarlet, a most becoming contrast to her white fur jacket; Mrs. Robert Ranlet and her daughters, Mrs. William B. Macomber and Mrs. Samuel E. Durand, and Mrs. Charles Wright Dodge and her daughter, Mrs. Adrian G. Devine.

Close by was Mrs. Bailey Pratt, exquisitely gowned in blue faille, and directly across the aisle sat Miss Cora Warrant with her mother, Mrs. C. F. Warrant; Mr. and Mrs. John W. Scott Jr. Mr. and Mrs. Lee Carpenter with Mrs. Butrbank Engert; also Mrs. Vincent S. Bennett with her daughter, Miss Jane; Mr. and Mrs. Richard M. Wilson, the latter attractive in a gown of wine red crepe; Mr. and Mrs. Edgar Jensen, the latter gowned in deep rose chiffon with wrap of fur, and Miss Louie Hall and her niece, Mrs. Joseph D. Paterson.

The promenade intermission had it's own place on the evening program . . . a time for visiting, for a walk, or for a glimpse of the picture exhibit in the upper corridor.

Little groups strolled around the theater, stopping to speak to friends who preferred to "sit this number out" and the lobby was full of bright evening gowns and swirls of cigaret smoke.

Up in the mezzanine were Miss Bertha Hubbell and her sister, Mrs. Herbert R. Lewis and Mrs. Lewis' son, David Hubbell Lewis, with his bride, the former Miss Barbara Cheney of Waban, Mass. Young Mrs. Lewis will leave the end of the week for a visit to her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Harold W. Cheney, of Waban, Mass., and will be joined at Christmas time by her husband. Also glimpsed were Mr. and Mrs. Neil McMillan, Mr. and Mrs. Verner C. Kreuter and their son, Verner C. Kreuter Jr., who was accompanied by Miss Jean Reed:

On the staircase were Mr. and Mrs. Harold Gleason, Mrs. Gleason lovely in a gown of soft gray with green accessories; Miss Jean Hargrave, wearing a gay scarlet velvet jacket over her filmy frock of white tulle; Mr. and Mrs. Wendell J. Curtis, Mrs. Curtis charming in a dress of delicate blue crepe; Miss Monica Mason and her fiance, Donald E. McConville, whose marriage will take place Saturday; Mr. and Mrs. David F. Lawless, Dr. and Mrs. Dexter Perkins, Mrs. Perkins gowned in firefly red crepe, the gown made with a bodice of wide pleats and full skirt, and Mr. and Mrs. H. Dean Quinby.

As the charming final number of Ravel from "Daphnis et Chloe, second suite" came to an end, the audience, reluctantly realizing that the delightful event, so long anticipated was over, slowly left the theater to their waiting cars. Seen among the hurrying groups were Mr. and Mrs. John Robert Holmes, Mr. and Mrs. Neil D. Preston and their daughter, Miss Betty; Mrs. Robert Douglas, Mrs. William Rebasz, Mr. and Mrs. Harrison L. Chapin, Mrs. Walter W. Lyons wearing an effective wrap of white fur with handsome collar of white fox; Dr. and Mrs. Charles B. F. Gibbs, Dr. and Mrs. John Aikman and their daughter, Julie; Mr. and Mrs. Smith Sheldon, Miss Eva Howe, Mr. and Mrs. A. F. Sulzer, Mrs. Walter Farley, Miss Isabel and Miss Augusta Schmitt, Mrs. Jessie B. Millham and Mrs. Harold W. Soule.

In Gay Throng Lured by Boston Orchestra

Glimpsed as they entered the Eastman Theater last night to enjoy the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are Mr. and Mrs. David Hubbell Lewis of Buckland Avenue, left, and Dr. and Mrs. William A. MacVay, Oakdale Drive.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ADRIAN, MICH.
TELEGRAM
FLINT, MICH.
SEMI-WEEKLY NEWS

DEC 12 1939

Serge Koussevitzky

Ann Arbor, Dec. 11—For the ninth consecutive year, ~~Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston~~ Symphony orchestra will be heard in Hill auditorium, Ann Arbor.

So traditional has its university appearance become, that concert patrons from far and wide look upon it as one of Michigan's outstanding musical events.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

DEC 13 1939

Boston Symphony to Present Three Phases of Music

A classical orchestral program that covers three phases in music will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it appears in Public Music Hall Friday night under the auspices of the Cleveland Concert Course.

Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky will conduct the "C Major Symphony" of Mozart for the early classical presentation, Tchaikowsky's "Fourth Symphony" for the romantic classical work, and Ravel and Debussy to represent the moderns.

The Ravel work will be orchestral fragments from "Daphnes et Chloe" (second suite), while Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun"—the famous ballet—will round out the program.

Friday night's appearance is the second of the Boston Orchestra here in two years under the same management and the concert is the third in the series which is sponsored by the Cleveland Museum of Art.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, O.
NEWS

DEC 13 1939

Boston Sends Its Symphony Here Friday

WITH the coming here Friday evening of the ~~Boston Sym~~phony Orchestra, the announcement of plans for the Berkshire Music Center at "Tanglewood" near Stockbridge, Mass., next summer are of particular interest.

The Center, which is the orchestra's summer home, will be opened July 8 and continue until August 18, with Serge Koussevitzky and 30 members of the orchestra as the chief attractions. Koussevitzky conducts a class in directing, there's to be a student orchestra, an amateur orchestra, a chorus and courses in composition, operatic interpretation, choral conducting and other subjects.

The Center's chorus will appear in the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, singing the Bach B Minor Mass. The festival coincides with the last three weeks of the Center term.

Dr. Koussevitzky brings his 110 men to Music Hall, Friday evening, as a feature of the Cleveland Concert Course directed by Mrs. Emil Brudno. His program includes the Mozart Symphony in C Major, op. 338; Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun"; The Orchestral Fragments "Daphnis and Chloe," Second Suit by Ravel; and the Tschaikowsk Fourth Symphony.

134

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat-Chronicle

DEC 12 1939

There's Music in the Air!

Serge A. Koussevitsky, right, famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Dr. Howard Hanson, Eastman School of Music director, go over the score of Dr. Hanson's new "Third Symphony," played by Boston group last night.

Rochesterian's Symphony Extolled by Koussevitzty

Two musicians bent over the score of a symphony, still in manuscript form, seemingly unmindful of the coming and going of visitors or the flash of a photographer's bulb in the Hotel Sagamore suite.

They were Serge Koussevitzky conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Dr. Howard Hanson, composer of the symphony—his third—which the famed musician pronounced "one of the greatest symphonies ever written."

Because he believes that "music is enough to fill any man's life," Dr. Koussevitzky, who conducts the Boston group at the Eastman Theater last night, has pushed a thoughts of politics and world affairs from his mind and never mentions Russia, the homeland from which he escaped after the revolution.

His growing interest and belief in the importance of American composers in the musical world is attested by the all-American concerts he has given and the frequency with which such names as Dr. Hanson, Handall Thompson and Arthur Foote dot his programs.

Close friend of the Eastman School of Music director since 1928 when he played his First Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky said Dr. Hanson is "one of the outstanding living composers in the United States." He has played Dr. Hanson's 40-minute Third Symphony, which a Rochester audience heard for the first time last night, in four concerts this season.

Chief enthusiasm of the 65-year-old conductor and double-bass virtuoso is a novel school of music he will open July 8 at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home near Stockbridge, Mass.

Offering no credit for attendance and no diploma, the institute is designed, Koussevitzky said, for "those who seek the best in music and related arts, who are anxious to refresh mind and personality through contact with the elite in art and culture, and who long for a creative rest in summer."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

DEC 12 1939

Noted Orchestra's Visit Proves Major Event of Season with Socialites

By RUTH B. CHAMBERLAIN

BRILLIANT . . . was the audience which listened and the artists who contributed to one of the most memorable evnings on the 1939-40 social and musical program. The event was the annual concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, third of the Series A concerts, at the Eastman Theater last evening.

The audience, filling the theater to capacity, was captivated immediately by the wizardry of this famous conductor, and the glamor of Ermine and Top Hat only served to enhance the brilliance of the occasion . . . one long to be remembered if the signs are correctly read. In fact, the Boston Symphony brings forth an audience surpassed in social and sartorial elegance only by that drawn by the famous Metropolitan Opera Company.

Not in years have we heard such applause as greeted Mr. Koussevitzky and Dr. Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music, whose Symphony No. 3 was the piece de resistance of the program, while to Richard Hale, narrator with the orchestra, and former favorite in stock here was given also a hearty welcome.

Among the distinguished patrons and patronesses of art and music in Rochester who were present last evening were Mrs. James Sibley Watson and her daughter-in-law, Mrs. J. Sibley Watson Jr., the former wearing a gown of pale blue satin and the latter smartly attired in a candy striped taffeta frock in tones of blue. Mrs. Warren G. Cutler wearing a simple gown of black transparent velvet was greeted by many friends who have missed seeing her at the many artistic and musical affairs this season since her illness. Mr. and Mrs. Wendell J. Curtis were among the early arrivals, the latter clad in a becoming gown of powder blue crepe.

Mr. and Mrs. James C. Dryer, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs Rufus K. Dryer, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert R. Lewis, Mr. and Mrs. David H. Lewis and the Misses Anna and Bertha Hubbell, Mrs. L. Walton Smith and Miss Marie Sanford, were noted among the early arrivals.

Chatting together during intermission were Mrs. Frank Gannett and Mrs. Brewster Lee while nearby were noted Mrs. Basil McLean and Mrs. George H. Whipple, Dr. and Mrs. Karl N. Wilson, Miss Louise Harris, and Mrs. George D. Bonbright, Mrs. J. Foster Warner and Mr. and Mrs. David Lawless.

Wearing a becoming gown of cerise crepe was Mrs. John R. Sibley who attended the concert with Mrs. Kenneth Keating while Mrs. T. Banford Jones attired in a hunter's green velvet gown with a matching velvet wrap was seen chatting with Mrs. Jeffress Gouverneur wearing dark red crepe in the princess mode.

Outstanding in chic was Mrs. Charles W. Weis who was the cynosure of many admiring eyes during the promenade. Her gown of garnet red velvet was adorned with a bustle sash of matching red taffeta and the decolletage edged with a band of gold beads. She was gaily chatting with Miss Jean McCurdy whose frock of deep purple satin in princess style was adorned with a single band of American beauty crepe.

Then, too, were noted Mrs. Rush Rhees, Mrs. Henry Danforth, Miss Jeanette Huntington, Mrs. Rudolph Hofheinz, Mrs. William Rebasz, Mrs. William Woodbury, Miss Caroline Milliman, Mrs. James E. Gleason and her son, E. Blakeney Gleason, Mrs. S. E. Shepard, Mr. and Mrs. William G. Stuber, Mrs. George Johnston, Mr. and Mrs. W. Herbert Wahl, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Sulzer, Mrs. Walter Farley, Mrs. Harry Gorton, Farley J. Withington.

Also Mrs. James T. Dickinson and her daughter, Mrs. Albert D. Kaiser, Mr. and Mrs. Swayne Goodenough, Mr. and Mrs. Lester Wilder, Mr. and Mrs. Raymond Thompson, Mrs. Schuyler H. Earl and her daughter, Barbara.

Other socially prominent Rochesterians seen during the evening were Miss Eva Howe, Mrs. C. Schuyler Davis, Mrs. J. Dewitt Butts, Mrs. Buell P. Mills, Mrs. J. Clifford Kalbfleisch and her daughter, Mrs. Clarence P. Thomas, Mr. and Mrs. John Hill Kitchen, Dr. and Mrs. Wesley A. Pommerenke, Mr. and Mrs. Maro Hunting, Mrs. Mary Atkinson Allen, Mrs. Adrian Devine and Mrs. Charles Wright Dodge, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Beardsley.

Mrs. Harry Ramsey, Miss Alice Ramsey, Miss Mary Harrison, Mrs. Louise Foote Jessup, Mrs. George Aldridge, David B. Jewewtt, Mr. and Mrs. Daniel M. Beach, Miss Marion Beach, Judge George A. Carnahan, Mr. and Mrs. Hiram Sibley 2nd, Mrs. Edard Wellington, Mrs. Warren C. Daly and her daughter, Miss Carolyn, Mrs. William A. Hardy and her daughter, Eiizabeth, Mrs. Frederick F. Church, Mrs. Salah Harris, Mr. and Mrs. Irving Booth and many others.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS

DEC 13 1939

Kreisler, Kurtz, Koussevitzky —World Music Peers Here

Chicago became a mecca for world-famous musicians today as Violinist Fritz Kreisler, Serge Koussevitzky and 105 members of the Boston Symphony, and Efram Kurtz, musical director of the Monte Carlo Ballet Russe, were added to the stars already here, many for the Chicago Opera.

Kreisler and Kurtz, in interviews today, repeated an opinion expressed by Dr. Frederick Stock earlier this year that the United States is becoming the musical and cultural center of the world as a result of the European wars.

War Called Harmful to Music.

"War can bring nothing but harm to music," Kreisler said. "Music reflects the current tempo of life. In time of war and strife the trouble is reflected in the work of the composers. Jazz was an outgrowth of the last war. It's hard to predict what will come from the present one."

The noted violinist, who now lives in New York, was enthusiastic about American music. He said it is very young, but is shaping itself.

"Jazz is the only real American music," Kreisler asserted. "And jazz can be good music. I play it in private sometimes, although I couldn't do so in public because it needs its own color and adaptations. George Gershwin was an outstanding musical figure—he could write symphonic music because he was a composer—not a jazz writer."

Scoffs at Accident to Fingers.

Kreisler, whose hands are squat, with short, thick fingers, laughed off a recent accident to his fingers. He said that hands are only secondary in playing a violin. He referred to the play, "Golden Boy," remarking that if the prize-fighting violinist, Joe Bonaparte, had really wanted to play, his injured hands could not have stopped him.

Kreisler will play with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra tomorrow night and Friday afternoon.

Conductor Kurtz, who is here to arrange for the Ballet Russe programs opening Dec. 26 for two weeks, commented on the number of great musicians who are coming to America as a result of the European disturbances.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

DEC 13 1939

MUSIC REVIEW

By Isabelle Workman Evans

The beauties of great symphonic music were presented inspirationally last night in Consistory Auditorium by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the unsurpassed Boston Symphony Orchestra. The capacity assembly gave Dr. Koussevitzky and his men a prolonged ovation. In fact, the enthusiasm was so pronounced that one wonders why the Buffalo public is not accorded the privilege of hearing more first rate symphony orchestras as they tour the country.

The program comprised two outstanding examples of symphonic writing, the Haydn Symphony in B flat, No. 102 (ninth of the London Series) and the monumental Tschaikowski fourth symphony in F minor, as well as the ingenious and humorous writing of Prokofieff in his Orchestral Fairy Tale for Children, Peter and the Wolf. The amazing technical finesse of this body of fine musicians could be demonstrated to no better advantage than in the Haydn symphony. The performance was truly the meeting of two perfectionists, Haydn from the standpoint of creation and Koussevitzky from that of interpretation.

The "lift" and pulsation of phrasing, the remarkable tonal beauty and arresting color effects, the unity of style and balance of tone left the listener in a state of blissful contentment. No affectation on the part of either the conductor or his men was present to mar the beauty of effect; all was straightforward sincerity.

The novelty of Peter and the Wolf as played by the orchestra and narrated by Richard Hale captivated the fancy of the audience. Mr. Hale, whose stage presence depicts the charm of his native Southland and whose dramatic ability has served him equally well as actor and vocalist, offered a moving narration of the text of the work.

After the introductory part, which makes known the various instruments used to depict the characters in the Fairy Tale, the exciting experiences of Peter (played by the strings), the bird as played by the flute, the duck by the oboe, the cat by the low register of the clarinet, the grandfather by the bassoon, the wolf by three horns and the shooting of the hunters by the kettledrums and the bass drum, progress to a dramatic conclusion of the experiences of Peter and the canary in capturing the wolf. The final procession, which leads the wolf to the zoo, includes the cat, which was saved; the hunters, who were too late to effect a rescue; the disgruntled grandfather, who still contends that Peter was in danger; of course, the happy bird, who assisted Peter in capturing the wolf, and last, but not least, the poor little duck, whom the wolf swallowed whole in his haste.

Dr. Koussevitzky is noted as a great interpreter of Tschaikowski and last night he did full justice to his reputation. Infallible sense of proportion allowed the conductor to lead his men to a finished product which aroused the listeners to frenzied expressions of enthusiasm. The concert was an event which will not be forgotten soon.

Among Those Present

Among those in the audience were Mr. and Mrs. Stuart C. Welch, the latter attired in a sable coat and a black velvet dinner gown. Mr. and Mrs. Charles A. Criqui were present, Mrs. Criqui wearing a stunning black velvet wrap, fashioned with a deep collar of ermine. Her gown was made with a black velvet skirt and a bodice of silver metallic cloth. Mrs. William C. Warren, Mrs. Charles L. Gurney and Mrs. James Carey Evans arrived at the concert together.

Mrs. Norman P. Clement attended wearing a mink coat and a gown of deep pink crepe. Mr. and Mrs. Frank N. Farrar, Jr., were present with Mrs. William H. Daniels. Mrs. Daniels wore a wrap of black velvet, and Mrs. Farrar was attired in a burgundy velvet coat, collared in fox. Mrs. Thomas B. Carpenter wore a sapphire blue velvet wrap.

Others present were Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Penney, Jr., Mrs. Frank F. Henry, Mrs. Risely Tucker, Mrs. George F. B. Johnson, Mrs. Ernest M. Hill, Mrs. L. L. Kahle, Miss Mabel Wilcox, Dr. Maude J. Frye, Miss Margaret Frye, Miss Leetta McWilliams, Miss Marion Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. Oliver S. Bruce, Jr., Mrs. Mildred Cowan, Mrs. Katherine B. McNaughton, Mrs. James W. Greene, Miss Emily Warren, Mrs. Adrian W. Smith, Mrs. Jesse C. Dann, Mrs. Edward W. Butt, Mrs. Clark L. Ingham, Miss Esther McWilliams, Mrs. Hamilton H. Wende, and Mrs. Sidney Wertimer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
DEC 13 1939

135

Boston Orchestra Wins Favor of Capacity Throng

Conductor Koussevitzky and His Fine Musicians Interpret Masters in Consistory Concert.

By THEODOLINDA C. BORIS

The annual concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has become an institution for Buffalo's music-lovers, and with due anticipation and excitement they came from all parts of the city Tuesday evening to fill every available seat in the Consistory Auditorium for the orchestra's local appearance under the management of Mrs. Zorah B. Berry.

An orchestra can be only as fine as its conductor, and, equally, a conductor can fully express his interpretations only when he has the finest of players. In the Boston Symphony both requirements are fulfilled to the highest degree.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, distinguished conductor of the orchestra, has, besides his deep and abiding love for music, a passionate enthusiasm for the score at hand, an enthusiasm that immediately and thoroughly communicates itself to the listener. So it was Tuesday evening. From the first measure of the Haydn Symphony in B flat major, No. 102, through the diverting Prokofieff orchestral fairy tale, "Peter and the Wolf," to the final cadence of the Tchaikowsky Fourth Symphony in F minor, there was so much life and humor and beauty and re-creation as to give it all a personal significance for each one who really listened.

* * *

Seconding their conductor in his task of a re-creation with the pliancy and sensitivity for which they have become noted were the players, their tone beautiful in richness and transparency.

For those who previously may not have heard the B flat symphony of Haydn (No. 9 in the London series) and who settled back to hear a serene and cheerful Haydn, the romantic breadth and buoyancy of the work must have come like a stimulating and sprightly breeze. Haydn's inventive genius, his spontaneous good humor and the clarity of his design are nowhere more engagingly in evidence than in this symphony.

After the quiet humor of 18th century Haydn came the jeu d'esprit of contemporary Serge Prokofieff's droll fairy tale, scored for small orchestra and using a narrator, in this instance Richard Hale, whose resonant voice and obvious relish in the tale added considerably to the presentation. The tale concerns one Peter, very young and jaunty, and his routing of the big, bad wolf. Each character is represented by an instrument—the bird by a flute, the duck by an oboe, the cat by a "clarinet in low register," the pompous grandpapa by a bassoon, the wolf by three dissonant and menacing horns, Peter by the string quartet, and the shooting of the hunters by the drums and percussion.

There is irresistible musical humor and satirical savor in the motives of each character and the unfolding of the tale by the orchestra. Was there ever a motive that so aptly pictured a lovable little male strutter as that of Peter?

* * *

The most memorable moments of the evening, however, came in the Tchaikowsky Fourth, in which Dr. Koussevitzky and his men achieved a moving eloquence. As they set forth the fluently expressive first movement with its insistent Fate theme, the song-like tenderness of the Andantino, the almost Puckish Scherzo, and the onrushing Finale, there seemed to be all the passion, melancholy and moodiness of the emotional Slav. It became noble music nobly played.

Enthusiastic Audience Enjoys Orchestra Concert

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave a thrilling performance Tuesday evening in the Consistory Auditorium, faced the largest assemblage of the season. Every available seat was taken and many extra ones were placed in the side aisles.

Among the many enthusiastic members of the audience were Miss Margery F. Sawyer and Mrs. James McCormick Mitchell. Miss Sawyer wore a black skirt which featured a white chenille bodice with which she wore a short ermine coat. Mrs. Mitchell wore a long mink coat over her black dinner gown.

Miss Mildred Snow chose dahlia taffeta and Miss Eleanor Sharp, a green satin gown and black velvet evening coat. Miss Ruth P. Chapin was in black velvet with silver fox cape and Mrs. Joseph B. Thebaud chose a gown of black velvet, also wearing a cape of silver fox.

Wears Dark Frock.

Miss Virginia Nye wore over her dark frock a black velvet wrap trimmed with narrow bands of ermine. Mrs. Charles W. Goodyear Jr. was in dark blue chiffon with sequined trimmed bolero and Mrs. Glenn W. Flickinger, present with Mr. Flickinger, wore a black velvet coat with mink collar.

Mrs. William H. Walker Jr. wore a dark blue coat with Red Ridinghood cape and Miss Leslie H. Chisholm, a crepe gown of burgundy. Mrs. Edgar F. Wendt was in black with white ermine coat with crushed collar and her daughter, Miss Susanne B. Wendt, chose black crepe trimmed with wide bands of crimson.

Also attending were Mrs. Edward J. Barcalo, Mrs. Clifford Hubbell, Mrs. David W. Baker, Mrs. Frank G. Cooban, Mr. and Mrs. Harvey D. Blakeslee Jr.

Others Present.

Miss Viola Bryant, Mrs. William H. Prentice, Mrs. Eva S. Potter, Dr. and Mrs. R. Montfort Schley, Mr. and Mrs. Dorr Temple Denton.

Dr. and Mrs. Samuel P. Capen, Mrs. Fred D. Corey, Miss Margaret L. Wendt, Mr. and Mrs. Hubert L. Perry, Mrs. George B. Barrell.

Mrs. Frank F. Henry, Mrs. Stephen M. Clement, Mrs. Frank G. Webster, Mrs. Norman P. Clement, Miss Jane Keeler.

Mrs. William C. Warren, Mrs. James Carey Evans, Mrs. Charles L. Gurney, Mrs. Kellogg Mann, Mr. and Mrs. Howard Kellogg.

Mr. and Mrs. James F. Foster, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Penney Jr., Mrs. Frederick C. Gratwick, Miss Frances Potter.

Dr. and Mrs. Franciscus Visser't Hooft, Mr. and Mrs. Percival V. Bowen, Mrs. Louis E. Wettlaufer, Mrs. Crawford Wettlaufer and Mrs. Samuel D. Wettlaufer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH
DEC 13 1939

BRINGING BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY—The famous conductor of ~~the Boston~~ Symphony pictured during a rehearsal. He brings his orchestra here for concerts Saturday night and Sunday afternoon.

Concerts to Feature Works Of American Composers

Works by two American composers will be featured by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Sergei Koussevitzky, in concerts at Syria Mosque Saturday night and Sunday afternoon.

At the Saturday performance Director Koussevitzky will present the unusually-constructed Third Symphony by Roy Harris, Oklahoma-born composer. On Sunday the symphony will present the Third Symphony by Howard Hanson, a native of Nebraska and head of the Eastman School of Music in Rochester, N. Y.

Both of these works were presented for the first time by the Boston Symphony this year.

For 15 years the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, has continually emphasized musical creative activity in this country. An individual culture produces an individual music, he believes, and that has been shown in his program choices.

His Pittsburgh concerts, of which May Beegle is the manager, will also include on Saturday Mozart's Symphony in C Major, No. 34, and Schubert's Seventh Symphony in C Major, and on Sunday Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and Ravell's Second Suite from his ballet "Daphais and Chloe."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHICAGO, ILL.
AMERICAN
DEC 13 1939

Brings Boston Symphony KOUSSEVITZKY HERE

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY AND GEORGE JUDD
Maestro and his aid.

Single Concert Tonight Under N. U. Auspices

Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra of 105 members arrived here today by special train for a single appearance tonight at the Auditorium Theater.

Koussevitzky made the 1,000-mile trip under the sponsorship of the university college of Northwestern University.

Native of Russia, where he conducted the Moscow Philharmonic School, Koussevitzky fled the country because of Soviet restrictions. He has conducted at Boston since 1924.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
DEC 13 1939

Give Supper Tonight for Koussevitskys.

Mr. ~~and Mrs. John~~ Alden Carpenter are giving a small supper party tonight at their home in Lake Shore drive for Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Mme. Koussevitsky.

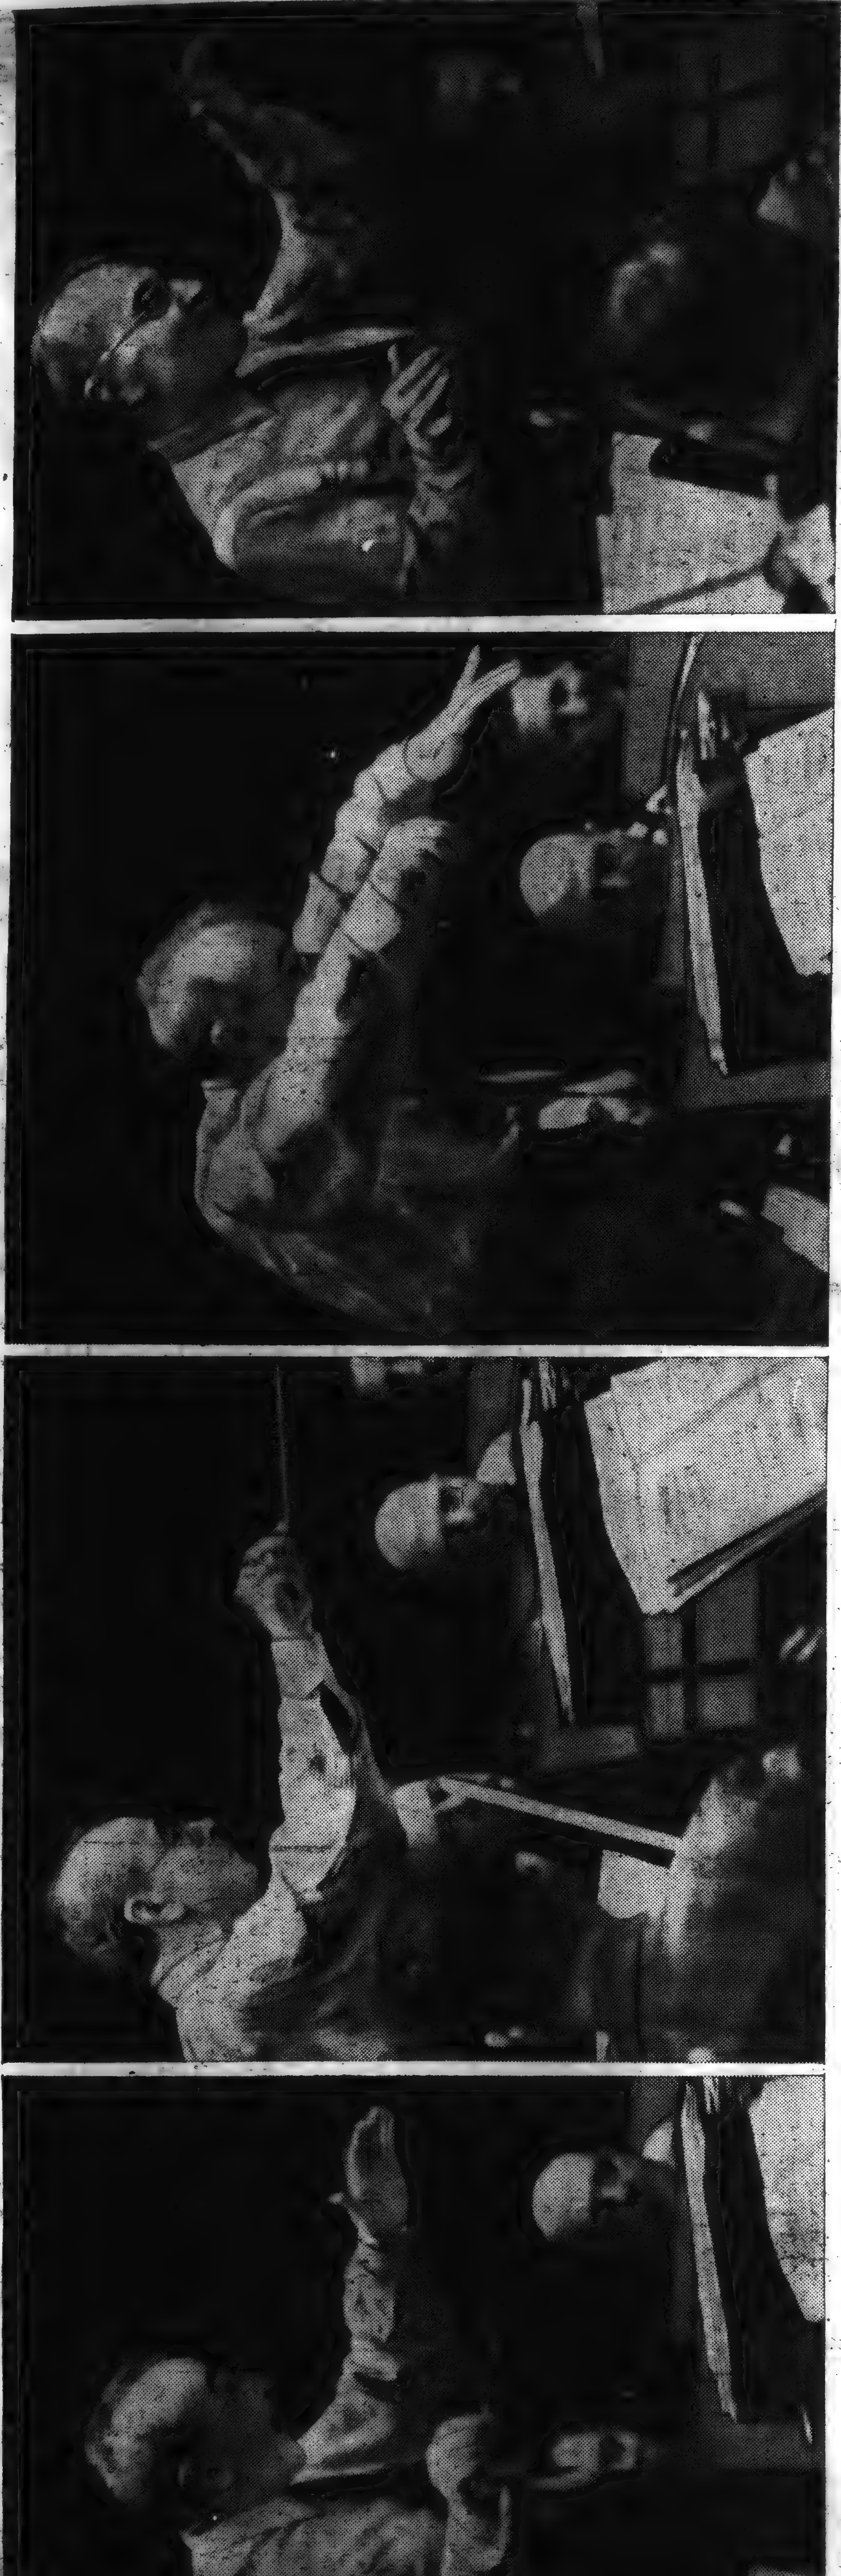
The orchestra is playing tonight in the Auditorium theater in the fourth concert of the History and Enjoyment of Music series sponsored by the University College of Northwestern university.

The return of Jacques Gordon, who used to be concertmaster with the Chicago Symphony orchestra, always occasions much entertaining for he is popular as a man as well as a violinist. Mrs. Ewald Herbert Siebel of 3920 Lake Shore drive is giving a reception for him and Izler Solomon, conductor, next Monday afternoon from 3 until 6 o'clock. The Woman's Symphony Associates will be her guests.

Mr. Gordon is appearing with the Woman's Symphony Tuesday night in Orchestra hall. Monday night the Cordon is giving a "homecoming" dinner for Mr. Gordon. Edward Collins, pianist, will give a short musical program following dinner.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHICAGO, ILL.
AMERICAN
DEC 14 1939

'Peer of Conductors' Shows How He Does It



The candid camera watches Serge Koussevitzky conducting his Boston Symphony Orchestra. The "peer of all symphony conductors" gave his single Chicago concert last night at the Auditorium Theater. Herman Devries, music critic of The Chicago Herald-American and dean of this city's critics, called the concert "the musical event of the decade." Mr. Devries' review appears on Page 15. (Herald-American photos.)

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

DEC 14 1939

This Tells Why Boston Calls Its Symphony Best

BY EDWARD BARRY.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, modestly called by its admirers the world's finest orchestra, came to the Auditorium theater last night to give a concert in Northwestern university's History and Enjoyment of Music series and to make its first Chicago appearance in six years. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

Better than the dull statement that the event was successful is the testimony of an usher—a man of seventeen years' experience—to the effect that he had never heard anything to equal the ovation which the audience tendered to orchestra and conductor at the conclusion of the concert.

The immediate occasion for the demonstration was a performance of Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony which for splendor of tone, ease and naturalness of flow, richness of detail, and dramatic interest we can hardly hope to hear excelled this side of paradise. Dr. Koussevitzky himself, despite all the hundreds of times he must have conducted this work, seemed to exult as much as any one in the beauty of this cosmos of opulent, controled, organized sound which he and his orchestra were building.

But the Tschaikowsky was not alone responsible for the ovation. Enthusiasm had been gradually accumulating thru the Haydn symphony [No. 102] and the Debussy "La Mer," which had preceded it.

The Haydn was straightforward, healthy, and possessed of an almost rough vigor. The Debussy was soft, evocative, and glorified by a thousand subtle rhythmic and tonal effects. It was in the latter work that we had the best oportunity which the evening afforded to study and marvel at the rapport between conductor and orchestra. It seemed as if Dr. Koussevitzky's ideas of interpretation, right down to the tiniest nuance, were executed in sound as quickly as he could conceive them in mind. This, on sober thought, is simply the result of painstaking rehearsals, but the perfection and the instantaneous quality of the orchestra's responses were startling enough at the time.

At the Civic Opera house last night the Chicago City Opera company repeated Verdi's "Otello." The name part and Iago remained in the hands of Giovanni Martinelli and Carlo Morelli, respectively. Edith Mason sang Desdemona.

* *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS
DEC 14 1939

Music Views
Koussevitzky

BY EUGENE STINSON

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY made his third Chicago appearance conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday evening at the Auditorium.

The first testimony to a visiting conductor's qualities is his program, and of Mr. Koussevitzky's choice of the fourth Tschaikowsky symphony we may say that if he is an all-round conductor his choice was a suspiciously easy one.

If on the other hand he wanted to do Tschaikowsky a good turn, we may say that we owe Mr. Kousseviizky this tribute, that his orchestra's playing, as playing, is definitely the very best that Chicago has heard, and that on Wednesday anyone capable of appreciating what he was doing for Tschaikowsky was not listening to Tschaikowsky but to Koussevitzky. The choice of the symphony remains unfortunate. As for the performance, it was excellent indeed.

Haydn and Debussy on Program.

The rest of the program, Haydn's 102d symphony and Debussy's "La Mer," were but a prelude to the Russian work in F minor. The Haydn is a big and magnificent work and Mr. Koussevitzky performed it as that in a superb performance.

The Debussy score he played in the spirit of its title, as three symphonic sketches. It too was a big performance, but the performance was bigger than Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of the score and not so big as the score itself. If we never quite got to the sea, at least we were engrossed in remaining with the Boston Symphony, which played it with the magnificent incisiveness of statement and the remarkable clarity of perception which marked Mr. Koussevitzky's work all evening.

Scale of Inflection Extensive.

As for the orchestra, headed by the excellent concertmaster, Richard Burgin, it plays in a scale of inflection extensive beyond the imagining of a Chicagoan, and with a length of climax altogether heroic, depending upon Mr. Koussevitzky's willingness to demand of himself quite as much as he demands of his players. But what he demands of his players is always most shrewdly based on what support will naturally be given them by the development of volume in a composer's scoring. That is to say, that in addition to a superb ear for instrumental nuance Mr. Koussevitzky possesses a supremely intelligent sense of structure.

His performances are as economical, of effort, then, as they are unsparing in power, and throughout his program we had the impression of coming into contact with a mind whose intellectual force easily as it worked, worked at any rate with a vigor and a natural conscientiousness quite equal to the distinguished technical mastery and the penetrating musical taste which are other components of his style.

Conducting Has Style.

For Mr. Koussevitzky, whatever the extent of his musical perception may be, has most certainly one asset which virtually no other conductor known here possesses, and that is that his conducting itself, regardless of his taste, has not method merely, it has style. This style is based on the principle that the utmost of vitality must be discovered alike in a composer's turn of phrase and his orchestra's. It may be that with him execution can overshadow a composer when Mr. Koussevitzky has less enthusiasm for the composer than he has for work. At any rate, he is a master of performance and whatever the nature of his musical conviction may be it is based on a sincere, discerning desire for the best.

* * *

137

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHICAGO, ILL.
AMERICAN
DEC 14 1939

Music in Review

BY HERMAN DEVRIES.

Serge Koussevitzky, peer of all symphony conductors, who has molded the Boston Symphony Orchestra into an instrument that brooks no rival, gave us a concert at the Auditorium Theater last night that will live in memory as the musical event of the past decade.

For the past thirty years this department annually has been harassed by music lovers desirous of obtaining our opinion on the status of symphony orchestras in America.

The past few weeks has brought us, including our own, three other orchestras: the Philadelphia, New York Philharmonic and the Boston Symphony, four orchestras to conjure with. I, therefore, without further ado, proclaim the Boston Symphony to be the winner, followed closely by the Chicago Symphony and a dead heat between the New York and the Philadelphia in this year's symphonic tournament.

Koussevitzky, a man of ideals and of reserved manner, at the podium employs a tiny stick to direct his phalanx of 104 artists; he also makes use of the score and sings his lay along with the melodies, so that a singing tone is imparted to every section.

Climax, to Koussevitzky, means building up from ant hills to mountains that seem to reach Valhalla. Contrasting with these stupendous but never jarring fortissimos were the softer passages in which was employed a tone of celestial beauty.

Debussy's "La Mer," three symphonic sketches that we have heard repeatedly these past twenty years or more, was a novelty for us last evening, for never did we feel the surge of the waves lashed by the wind more strikingly expressed in tone color, nor the gambols of the waves so playfully and pictorially portrayed than by this perfect orchestra.

The playing of the Haydn Symphony in B-flat, the introductory number, was made to sound so simple in its delicate handling that we were prone to believe part of the men had been left at home, for the effect was that of a chamber music ensemble, as it should be, and abounded with myriads of pretty nuances and graceful turns that surprised the mammoth audience, soon to be turned into ecstasy as the great Koussevitzky unfolded his wizardry and the orchestra its unmatched virtuosity.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
TIMES
DEC 14 1939

Skill shown by Boston orchestra

By ROBERT POLLAK

Temporarily on leave from the hallowed home of the bean, the cod and the Cabot, the Boston symphony rode into town ~~last night~~ to regale the Northwestern university patrons at the Auditorium. It has been a long time since Serge Koussevitsky and his men have visited us. In the meantime he has grown greyer at the temples and world-famous as an inspiring and exploratory conductor.

His Auditorium concert was not designed to reveal him in his character as a musical pathfinder. The program proceeded from the joyous Haydn Symphony in B flat, superbly read, through Debussy's "La Mer" and the Tschaikowsky Fourth. Duties at the Opera prevented me from hearing anything but the Haydn which was enough to convince anyone that he was in the presence of a fine orchestra and a great conductor.

The City Opera's "Otello" was a thrilling performance. The name part is tenor Martinelli's richest role and last night he gave it abundant artistry and fire. Edith Mason, the Desdemona, sang beautifully with a voice still youthful and with the charm and sincerity of mature experience on the opera stage. Carlo Morelli's Iago compares favorably with Tibbett's, and that is saying a mouthful. It seems to me that Morelli has seldom sung as well as he did last night and his notion of the part was convincing throughout.

Conductor Henry Weber went to work on a great score to make his best impression of the season. This music of Verdi causes most operas to seem trivial by comparison. And the forces that joined to give it rebirth last night may well be proud. Is every evening on Wacker drive were like this one the deficits would take care of themselves.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PEORIA, ILL.
Journal Transcript
DEC 14 1939

Boston Music Group Scores

Symphony Wins Big Chicago Praise

By WILLIAM DONOVAN

CHICAGO, Ill., Dec. 14. (Special)—Making one of its rare midwest appearances, the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky gave a memorable concert in the Auditorium here last night before a capacity audience.

Tremendous enthusiasm in the form of applause, bravos and cheers greeted the Bostonians at every turn. America's premier symphonic organization programmed only three works, those of Haydn, Debussy and Tschaikowsky, but they were works calculated to display every facet of this orchestra's seemingly unlimited technical, acoustical and interpretative resources.

Opens With Haydn

Haydn's poetically rococo and classic Symphony in B Flat Major opened the program, while Tschaikowsky's melodious, virile and brilliant Fourth Symphony concluded the program. In between was Debussy's most pretentious orchestral work, the shimmering and impressionistic La Mer (The Sea).

These contrasting works allowed the orchestra ample opportunity to turn the spotlight on its individual sections, the component parts that make the Boston Symphony the superlative organization it is.

Perfectly matched strings, golden brass and marvelous woodwinds are the foundation upon which a business-like precision in performance, plus an elasticity in matters of tempo and orchestral glow as brilliant as morning sunrise cause this great orchestra to be the supremely fine organization it is.

Conductor Merits Praise

Much of the credit for last night's fine performance by the Boston symphony is due to its incomparable conductor Koussevitzky. He not only is a sensitive musician and a genius with the baton, but a great showman as well.

Never before have we heard such splendid playing in a string section as in tonight's concert. The performance of the Haydn was poetic, the Debussy exquisite while the Tschaikowsky was a brilliant tour de force.

Noticed Fritz Kreisler and Dr. Stock in the boxes nearby and they seemed to be getting a tremendous musical kick from their busman's holiday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH
DEC 14 1939

U. S. Composers To Hear Works

Two American composers will hear their works played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky in Syria Mosque this week-end.

Roy Harris, an Oklahoman, will hear his third symphony Saturday night in a program that includes Mozart's Symphony in C Major and Schubert's Symphony No. 7.

Dr. Howard Hanson, a Nebraskan, will hear his third symphony Sunday afternoon in a program that includes the overture to the "Marriage of Figare," Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony, Debussey's "Afternoon of a Fawn" and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe."

THIS CLIPPING FROM ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS
DEC 14 1939

Koussevitzky And Boston Symphony Here Tonight

Serge A. Koussevitzky, dynamic Russian-born genius, again will conduct the world-renowned Boston Symphony Orchestra here in a program at 8:30 o'clock tonight in Hill auditorium. This will be the seventh concert of the Choral Union season.

Koussevitzky, though a hard taskmaster, has received testimonials from members of the orchestra expressing their respect for his ability and their admiration of him.

His surprising energy has found many outlets. He always has been eager to give young composers a chance to be heard, and, to help to develop new artists, he organized a musical publishing company in Russia that for years was one of the foremost.

Disputes have some times been provoked as to whether Koussevitzky is a classicist or a modernist. On Jan. 29, 1932, he conducted his orchestra in the first public performance of George Gershwin's "Second Rhapsody in Blue" and called the performance "masterful."

He has said, "I would like to make it clear I am neither a modernist nor a classicist in my preference. The works of the great classic masters are indispensible, but music is not a static art. Music constantly is being made which is an expression of the period in which it appears. As to the value of new works, conductors must use their own best judgment, and the rest depends on time."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
DEC 14 1939

Conductor To Be Guest

Koussevitzky to Be Honored After Concert Here

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will play at Syria Mosque Saturday night and Sunday afternoon, and two composers, Roy Harris of New York and Dr. Howard Hanson of Rochester, N. Y., whose compositions the orchestra will play, will be guests of honor at a reception while here.

Mrs. Nathaniel Spear will entertain the distinguished visitors, as well as members of the board of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, sponsor of the concerts, at a reception in her home on Northumberland St., Sunday afternoon.

Patrons and patronesses for the concert are Mrs. William Thaw Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Horace Forbes Baker, Mrs. Alexander Laughlin, Mr. and Mrs. Charles K. Robinson, Mrs. Thomas W. Phillips Jr., Mrs. Samuel G. Cooper, Mrs. Robert M. Keeney, Mrs. Enoch Rauh, Mrs. James Lyall Stuart, Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Affelder, Mrs. Robert D. Campbell, Mrs. Clifford S. Heinz, Mrs. T. Clifton Jenkins, Mrs. George M. Laughlin III, Mrs. John R. McCune, Mrs. John S. Patterson, Mrs. James G. Pontefract, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic Schaefer, Mrs. Howard S. Evans, Mrs. Tracy W. Guthrie, Mrs. David A. Pitcairn and Mrs. H. H. McClintic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLDWATER, MICH.
REPORTER
DEC 14 1939

Boston Symphony At Ann Arbor

Ann Arbor, Dec. 14—For the ninth conseoutive year, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in Hill Auditorium, tonight. So traditional has its University appearance become, that concert patrons from far and wide look upon it as one of Michigan's outstanding musical events.

For this occasion the orchestra has prepared an interesting program as follows:

Symphony in C major (K. V. 338) .... Mozart
Symphony No. 3 (in one movement) .... Roy Harris
"Peter and the Wolf," an Orchestral Fairy Tale for children, Op. 67 .... Prokofieff
Narrator: Richard Hale
Orchestral Fragments from "Daphnis et Chloe," Second Suite .... Ravel
Lever du Jour
Pantomime
Danse Generale

THIS CLIPPING FROM BIRMINGHAM, MICH.
WEEKLY ECCENTRIC
DEC 14 1939

Boston Symphony Tonight at U. of M.

For the ninth consecutive year, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in Hill Auditorium, Ann Arbor. So traditional has its University appearance become, that concert patrons from far and wide look upon it as one of Michigan's outstanding musical events. It is Thursday, Dec. 14 at 8:30 p. m.

The program follows:

Symphony in C major (K. V. 338) ---- Mozart
Symphony No. 3 (in one movement) ---- Roy Harris
"Peter and the Wolf," an Orchestral Fairy Tale for Children, Op. 67 ---- Prokofieft
Narrator: Richard Hale
Orchestral Fragments from "Daphnis et Chloe," Secound Suite ---- Ravel
Lever du Jour
Pantomime
Danse Generale

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, O.
NEWS
DEC 14 1939

Boston Symphony

CLEVELAND music enthusiasts have the "welcome" sign out for Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall tomorrow evening.

Last year the Boston orchestra won an ovation here playing Haydn, Debussy and Sibelius. Tomorrow they perform the Mozart C Major Symphony No. 338, and three more familiar items, the Debussy "Afternoon of a Faun," Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Fragments, and the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony.

Music lovers won't mind this hauling of musical coals to Newcastle. They are indebted to the Cleveland Concert Course, Mrs. Emil Brudno, director, for this annual opportunity, for the Koussevitzky orchestra still is one of the great ones.

138

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS
DEC 15 1939

Music Views

Fritz Kreisler

BY EUGENE STINSON

FRITZ KREISLER'S performance of the Beethoven violin concerto with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra Thursday evening came after Mr. Stock's extremely animated and brilliant performance of the second Rachmaninoff symphony.

The symphony is one of Mr. Stock's peculiar masterpieces; he plays it regularly, though few other conductors touch it. He always plays it spellbindingly and from season to season he plays it in a more diverse variety of approach than most of the works in his repertoire.

On this occasion he gave it a more active performance than it is usual for him to give any work and the results, of course, were wholly good. The performance came on the evening after the Boston Symphony's concert at the Auditorium, and while comparisons are generally futile, there is a definite point in the fact that the playing of the Boston Symphony is immeasurably better than the playing of our orchestra, and in the fact that Mr. Koussevitzsky's men put three times ~~as much~~ playing into a concert as do Mr. Stock's.

Mr. Stock's Performance.

Now this difference is certainly a part of Mr. Stock's character as a conductor, but it is by no means the whole of it nor it is necessarily a partial factor—of course it is by no means the sole factor—in determining the stature of his greatness as a conductor. This question may be deferred; it is timely merely to point out that Mr. Stock's treatment of the Rachmaninoff, whether so intended or not, was in the nature of decreasing the difference of performance interest which this week was found to exist between Mr. Koussevitzky's excellent orchestra and our own. As for musical interest, that is something in which Mr. Stock can't be excelled.

Mr. Kreisler's performance of the Beethoven concerto was something which summed up all the attributes of his acknowledged eminence among living artists. The concerto is one of the most beautiful of all Beethoven's works; its final secret is all but inaccessible to its performers. Mr. Kreisler was not merely familiar with its secret, which has, indeed, been a spiritual companion to him for many years; his performance of it set the work alight.

Kreisler Has Olympian View.

Those of us present who love not merely the concerto but all of Beethoven's music, which for all its greatness always looks out beyond what it has accomplished, felt that what he suffered to have written as he did was in a sense compensated in the fullness of Mr. Kreisler's realization of Beethoven's spirit and of his workmanship. We felt even that Mr. Kreisler had accomplished that rarest of wonders, that he had more than found the true substance of a Beethoven score, and that through the consummateness of his playing he had actually enlarged upon its beauty.

He could do this because his Olympian view, seasoned to start with, has of late grown even more matured. And so has his skill. He played on Thursday with a wealth of resource, refined, spontaneous and minute such as there is no other personality in present-day music to have developed for the sake of a sense of style which is both fastidious and generous in the faultlessness of its taste.

When he came onto the stage of Orchestra Hall he was received with that solemn but joyous fervor he always evokes, and the ovation grew and grew as if the public were determined to force upon him a sense of honor in which he is everywhere held.

A few days ago his right hand was caught in an automobile door two of his fingers are still black at the tips.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DAVENPORT, IA.
DEMOCRAT-LEADER

DEC 15 1939

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Memorable Concert in Chicago

By INA WICKHAM.

THE Boston Symphony orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitsky, gave one of the most memorable concerts in the symphonic annals of Chicago, when it appeared at the Auditorium in Chicago as one of the attractions on the Northwestern University History and Enjoyment of Music series. Fourteen years under the direction of Dr. Koussevitsky, the orchestra has become as almost one instrument in the hands of its leader and is truly one of the great orchestras of the day. That the audience deemed it meritorious was shown by the fact, that not only applause, but cheers and bravos greeted Koussevitsky and his orchestra after each number and at the conclusion of the program, the audience tendered them an ovation which has not been equalled in Chicago, rising to applaud and cheer and seeming loath to leave the theater.

In the 14 years that he has conducted the Boston Symphony, Koussevitsky has put great stress upon rehearsals and no number not fully prepared for presentation has ever been played. He will not give an inferior performance of any number. He seems a quiet man; he came upon the stage very slowly and deliberately, not with the nervous rush of Toscanini or the dramatic entrance of Stokowski but with the air of a man calm and sure of himself. He uses a light baton but directs largely with his hands. He does not use eccentric motions or waving of hands and arms but when the occasion arises he leads with fervor and enthusiasm.

The Program.

The past few weeks Koussevitsky has been in the news in the music world thruout the country for his advocacy of American music and for his program devoted to compositions by American composers. We had hoped to hear some of these American compositions on Wednesday night but his program was a standard symphony program, consisting of the Haydn B Flat symphony, Debussy's symphonic suite "La Mer" and the Fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky.

The Haydn symphony, written in 1759 for the Salomon concerts in London, is one of the composer's last and greatest compositions in this form. It is big and really magnificent and Koussevitsky gave it a splendid reading. In this number he used only the strings. The Debussy number was perfect in every detail. Koussevitsky has a keen conception of Debussy's style and all of the subtlety and fantasy of the music was reflected by the orchestra in the coloring and rhythm, depicting the voices of the sea and the wind and the melodies of the storm and the waves, and in the artistic understanding of the entire composition.

The Tschaikowsky Fourth symphony was really the highlight of the evening. Here was the splendor of tone such as we had never before heard in an orchestra, with rich sonorous brasses and the beautiful songs of the woodwinds and strings. The "Pizzicato" movement was unusually rhythmic and the finale increased in power and energy as the theme recurred in the various choirs, until it reached a stirring climax. No matter how familiar the symphony or how many times we have heard it we felt that Koussevitsky gave it a new and more beautiful interpretation and we could not help but be amazed at the perfect understanding between conductor and orchestra and the manner in which they responded to and interpreted his reading of the music. It was the finest symphony concert that we have heard in a long time and one fully deserving the plaudits of the audience that filled the theater to capacity.

* * *

FRIDAY, DEC. 15, 1939

THE MICHIGAN DAILY

MUSIC

By RICHARD BENNETT

There is something so stimulating in a program of music of our own day that it is surprising how Americans can continue to tolerate the musty material submitted to them daily over the radio and on the concert stage. The kind of music we ought to want is the kind which shocks us, arouses our anger, affords us something to discuss—not as we discuss historical events and their significance (though that is good too), but as we would discuss the ideology of Signor Mussolini or the innovations of M. Picasso. We ought to want, in other words, the kind of music which makes us take a stand, a very definite stand, on the problems of present world-culture. And music can do that just as surely as any of the other art-forms. All we need to do is demand that it be given to us, fast as it comes from the composer's hand.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's recitals, at least as long as they have been under the guidance of Mr. Koussevitzky, are indeed a healthful influence in pointing the way toward what the modern symphony orchestra's program should be like. And, as a by-the-way, how such programs should be rendered.

The Mozart C Major Symphony was played as though a philosopher had inscribed the score between the lines of the "Critique of the Pure Reason." Who is to say that this is not all to the good? For is there anyone who will deny that the amazing Austrian wrote a deeper music than most of his interpreters give him credit for having done. Mr. Koussevitzky's rendition was unquestionably scholarly and imbued with a conscious endeavor to maintain that severe concentration upon the pure musical thought which is accomplished by the select few.

Actual listening to the Harris Symphony made our review of Wednesday sound like a dormant understatement. One wonders what we have missed of the land we are living in, if Mr. Harris' work is an expression of its wide tragic beauty. Mr. Koussevitzky held the long lines out solidly and saved the center from any impressionistic muddling. It was the high point on the program and was rendered as such.

"Peter and the Wolf" of Prokofieff was truly unique. It was not the idea of it so much as the way the music worked into the "plot." The orchestra kept the music intact—a none too easy task when music is written in fragments and yet implies a running continuity throughout—but chief credit must go to Mr. Richard Hale as the narrator. Both in inflection and bodily movement he fitted the narration in with the music so sympathetically that the illusion was perfect.

The Ravel "Daphnis and Chloe" was done with extreme sensitiveness, while the vigor employed in the Danse formed a fitting climax to a thoroughly enjoyable and significant evening.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1939

THE ANN ARBOR NEWS, ANN ARBOR, MICH.

Boston Symphony Closest To Orchestral Perfection

By William Lichtenwanger

There are orchestras and orchestras, but there is only one Boston Symphony. There are today several great conductors, but only one Koussevitzky. Inevitably, it seems, the combination of the two produces what is probably the nearest approach to perfection in orchestral performance the world has ever heard.

At the present time, certainly, there is no other orchestra which has a composite tone so lustrous, so richly and evenly sonorous, so magnificently brilliant and golden mellow by turns, as that of the Boston Symphony. There is no other orchestra that can so exactly and so fluently surmount the greatest technical problems.

No Strange Reason

For this there is no strange reason. Man for man, the Boston probably does not have as many outstanding virtuosi in its ranks as do some other orchestras. But its members have developed a unanimity of style, of spiritual outlook, that is found nowhere else. They have developed it under the iron hand of a leader who rules by the strength of his ideas and the inexorableness of his ideals rather than through sheer domination of personality, who does his work so well in rehearsal that in concert he becomes the most potent of conductors. A leader, also, who not only has this perfect control of orchestral technique but whose tastes are more eclectic, his capacities more varied, than those of any other present conductor; who does all things well and many things, including Haydn, Richard Strauss, and Sibelius, better than anyone else has done them.

Last night, for the ninth time in as many years, Ann Arbor heard Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony as the sixth of the season's Choral Union series became—and made—history. It is safe to say that none of the works heard during the evening constitute "great" music. It was a program of variety and a multitude of interests rather than one of overpowering inherent appeal. Yet it was a memorable program for the beauty with which its potentialities were achieved.

Sparkling Tapestry

The opening symphony, for instance—Mozart's 34th, in C major—is not in itself an outstanding masterpiece. It is thoroughly Mozartean, delightful, refreshing, music to stimulate the senses after a heavy meal; it betrays the 18th century Mozart of the "Eine kleine Nachtmusik" rather than the 19th century poet of the G minor Symphony and Quintet. Needless to say, Koussevitzky spun its melodic threads out of the finest silver and wove into a tapestry that sparkled with luminous colors.

Another symphony, this time the recent one-movement Third of Californian Roy Harris, succeeded. The two symphonies are not entirely unlike, despite the difference in their ages. Both can be called "classical" in that they are compact in form and lucid in style, with no aims towards expressionism. But where Mozart's classicism is brightly objective and extravertish, Harris' is the considered, self-imposed severity of the modern introspective thinker. Briefly, we liked the Symphony, more than we have liked anything else of Roy Harris. It is short, even terse; its texture is largely based on a dissonant counterpoint which gives rise to some fascinating sonorities and which is not so lacking in melodic appeal as the majority of contemporary works. Rhythmically it has the nervous, even neurotic vitality that is a distinguishing feature of serious contemporary music. And we felt that the concluding Fugue achieved a climax, a climax which, if it did not completely satisfy in the conventional sense, failed to because contemporary life itself is not self-sufficient and satisfying.

Delightful Score

In Serge Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale of "Peter and the Wolf" we again herald a new work by a contemporary composer. Here is ample proof that our time is not entirely lacking, as it often appears, in gentleness and winsome humor. Better music for children, young or old, has never been written. The score is as delightful to hear as it is clever and amusing; it is more than merely atmospheric. The deliciously written lines of the narrator were read by Richard Hale with all the elocutionary charm that only a Bostonian can command.

Finally there was the second suite of orchestral fragments from Maurice Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe", music essentially for ballet yet conveying plenty of substance in itself. At times, especially in the daybreak scene, the texture is quite Debussyesque in its impressionism. But there is more virility in this score, more rhythmic energy and instrumental color, than in "La Mer". It is music that soothes, allures, but also excites. It is music that displays colorfully if not brilliantly the virtuosity of the Boston Symphony.

Though encores are foreign to the policy of the orchestra, last night, Dr. Koussevitzky announced, was "exceptional". In tribute to the Finnish people, the Russian who is first a man and a musician played Sibelius' "Finlandia", the national hymn of that beleaguered race. At the close and with tumults of applause the huge audience stood, itself paying tribute both to the Finns and to Koussevitzky and his orchestra.

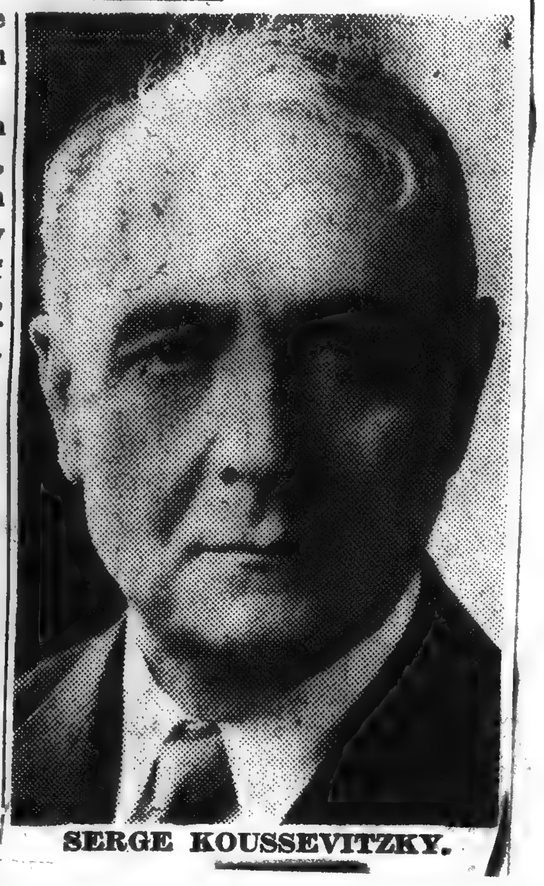
139

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

DEC 15 1939

Finland Will Receive Stirring Salute Here

Famous Tone Poem of Sibelius, "Finlandia," Will Be Added to Boston Symphony Programs Tomorrow Night and Sunday.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

Brave little Finland will receive a stirring salute in Pittsburgh Saturday night and Sunday.

As a special feature, in addition to programs previously announced, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play "Finlandia," famous tone poem of Jan Sibelius, the great composer, who has remained at his home near Helsinki despite the Red army invasion.

Tying in with the appeal for Finnish relief funds, which has been made through the newspapers of the country, and with the observance of "Finland Day" in many states on Sunday, the suggestion for a musical salute to the courageous country was made by the Post-Gazette and conveyed to the Boston Orchestra through the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association early this week.

In response to a telephone call from May Beegle, manager for the Orchestra Association, the Boston management promised to forward the request to Dr. Koussevitzky in Chicago. George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, said that it did not have the scores for Finlandia with it on the present tour, but he would see that they were dispatched to Pittsburgh if the conductor agreed.

Dr. Koussevitzky is a personal friend of Sibelius and is recognized as the world's foremost interpreter of his music. He agreed to add it as a special feature of both the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon programs as a special tribute to the Finnish people and as a recognition of the work which is being done in Pittsburgh to relieve their distress.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

DEC 15 1939

Tea To Follow Sunday Concert

After the Sunday afternoon concert in Syria Mosque by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mrs. Nathaniel Spear will give a tea in her home in honor of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, and Dr. Howard Hanson and Roy Harris, whose symphonies will be played tomorrow night and Sunday afternoon.

Members of the Pittsburgh Alumnae Club of Mu Phi Epsilon, national musical sorority, will be guests of Miss May Beegle Sunday afternoon at the concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

DEC 15 1939

Salute to Finland On Symphony Program Here

As a salute to the Finnish people, the tone poem "Finlandia" will be included on the concert program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it appears at the Syria Mosque with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky tomorrow and Sunday.

The composition is the work of Jan Sibelius, noted Finnish composer, who is a warm personal friend of Dr. Koussevitzky.

Orchestral scores for the number will be rushed to Pittsburgh from the orchestra's headquarters in Boston. Both Dr. Koussevitzky and George E. Judd, orchestra manager, readily agreed to include the number in connection with Finland Day being celebrated here Sunday.

Cleveland Plain Dealer

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1939

MAGIC DISPLAYED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Symphony Plays Superbly in Concert Here

BY HERBERT ELWELL

The appearance of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Cleveland Concert Course was one of those rare events so electrically charged with emotional dynamite that words are feeble things to convey its overwhelming effect. And whatever is written about it can only be an extension of the audience's tribute which made Public Music Hall resound last night with a mighty, heartfelt thank you.

Starting with the Mozart C Major Symphony, the famed Bostonians reached from the crystal purity of eighteenth century classicism through coloristic explorations of Debussy and Ravel, and found potent material for the conclusion of a perfectly built program in the breathless surge of Tschaikowsky's Fourth.

Through it all was a vitality and perfection of tonal language such as one dreams about but seldom hears realized. And foremost in the impression carried away is that of a conductor who has something like magic resourcefulness. There seems to be no specific thing upon which his extraordinary command of his splendid players rests. He represents a synthesis of so many musical virtues they would be impossible to enumerate.

Like Light Diffusion

But if any one thing is more striking than another it is his uncanny ability to make one feel an accent without hearing it, to articulate every detail of design and preserve the singing line which achieves the highest kind of expressiveness in beauty of proportion. This was particularly notable in the Mozart which attained an almost incredible simplicity and graciousness, with reeds sounding through the silken texture of strings in a way that seemed to diffuse light in all directions.

Equally mysterious is the attack of this orchestra which seems to form itself out of the ether. The tone quality continues to be a part of the rare atmospheric substance out of which it grew and however intense it may become, it always seems to relate itself back to some ineffable silence which, one imagines, is the true abode of the soul. For, indeed, the soul seemed to live and expand and flourish in the wonderful transition of colors which came out of "The Afternoon of a Faun." Some of its phrases seemed to come to light for the first time.

Emerging from the same tranquility of spirit, Ravel's suite from "Daphne and Chloe" mounted with almost imperceptible graduations to a pitch of intensity that fairly lifted one out of one's seat. And the frenzy of the finale became the more intoxicating for the awareness of its being under absolute control.

What struck home deepest perhaps was the revelation of a Tschaikowsky whose heart rests deep in spiritual recesses of the real Russia, for here at the close of the program was a Fourth Symphony neither melancholic nor melodramatic nor in way way extravagant with those bursts of passion superficially associated with the great Slavic genius. It was a symphony heavy with the sense of destiny and therefore tragic, but at the same time wistful, charming, gay and above all permeated with an irresistible dance impulse that held sway even when song was uppermost, and blazed forth amid all the Russian's love of bright color in an unforgettable climax. The dignity and power of this work as recreated by Koussevitzky will live long in the memory, as, for obvious reasons, will the entire program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, O.
NEWS

DEC 16 1939

MUSIC

Koussevitzky Wins Fine Ovation; Martinelli to Star at Public Hall

BY ELMORE BACON

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra won a notable ovation at Music Hall last night.

Their thrilling performance of the Ravel "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet music and the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony brought them storms of applause and cheering. Orchestra and director took bow after bow as a near-capacity audience, stirred by their artistry, gave them a notable demonstration of approval.

This orchestra of seasoned players—most of them have been members for more than a score of years—performs with a fine virtuosity in all its choirs. The singing violins play as one man. And Dr. Koussevitzky obtains an attention to nuance, expression and dynamic shading that is marvelous.

His performance of the Mozart Symphony in C Major, No. 338, one of the earlier ones from the pen of this master, was a gem of delicacy. He maintained an atmosphere of classic reserve and obtained the most exquisite shadings.

We prefer a more virile "Afternoon of a Faun," Koussevitzky succeeding in shrouding this sensuous Debussy item in a rather too nostalgic, dreamy atmosphere. While the Mallamarme text indicates the faun's impressions of his surroundings are vague, still he was not taking an afternoon nap.

Brilliant

The brilliant performance of Ravel's Second "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite was breath-taking in its vividness. Koussevitzky cunningly piled forte on forte, leaped from astounding climax to shimmering pianissimo, carried the melodic line through it all with a notable clarity and brought out all the beauty in this colorful music.

The opening murmuring and the trickling of the dew streams in the pastoral scene in which the revived Daphnis finds Chloe, and the two plight their troth, were beautifully portrayed. The closing general dance was dramatic and colorful, its brilliance heightened by the clever building of the climaxes.

The Tschaikowsky Fourth was a performance that rather dramatized the weakness and terror pictured in it. The melancholy and restlessness were emphasized. The Pizzicato Scherzo was a marvel of precision, expression and clarity.

The finale with its fitful brilliance, whirling strings and the folk song that leaps from choir to choir, finding its most sonorous expression in the brasses, was a performance that brought the audience to its feet at the close.

The Cleveland Concert Course and Mrs. Emil Brudno, director, are to be congratulated upon the Boston visit.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

DEC 16 1939

Yule Program Will Be Given By Bach Choir

Group in Concert Tuesday; Boston Symphony Here Today, Tomorrow.

The holiday lull will find most of the city's concert stages quiet next week, with the Bach Choir of Pittsburgh practically monopolizing major music activity with its first performance of the season Tuesday night in Carnegie Music Hall.

This week-end, however, will bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitzky, to Pittsburgh for a pair of concerts. Two American composers, Roy Harris and Howard Hanson, will be represented on the programs.

At the suggestion of the Post-Gazette, Dr. Koussevitzky will direct special performances of Sibelius' "Finlandia" at each concert. The symphonic poem will be played in tribute to the Finnish people, for whom this newspaper is aiding in the collection of a relief fund.

Three symphonies will be played tonight—Schubert's Seventh, Harris' Third and Mozart's Symphony in C Major, The Sunday afternoon program includes the Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" of Mozart. Howard Hanson's Third Symphony, Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune" and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" (second suite).

Bach Choir Program.

The Bach Choir will present its Christmas program Tuesday night in costumes of the period of Johann Bach. The stage will be decorated with evergreen. Soloist with the choir, directed by J. Julius Baird, will be Yella Pessl, harpsichordist. Miss Pessl has a happy faculty for extracting lively music from the outmoded instrument, which, for the benefit of those who never saw "Godey's Lady's Handbook," resembles a harp lying down.

At any rate, Toscanini was sufficiently impressed with the qualities of Miss Pessl's playing to have her make solo appearances with the NBC Symphony. So one can expect more than mere museum music from her performance.

The choral numbers include compositions of Bach, Praetorius, Scarletti, Handel and Harvey Gaul.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

DEC 17 1939

This afternoon at three o'clock the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert at Syria Mosque featuring the third symphony of Dr. Howard Hanson, distinguished American composer, and Director of the Eastman School of Music in Rochester.

Dr. Koussevitzky has played the new symphony four times this season. Another feature of the concert will be the playing of the Tone Poem "Finlandia" by Jean Sibelius, celebrated Finnish composer. The complete program:

Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" .... Mozart.
Symphony No. 3...Howard Hanson.
"Classical" Symphony Op. 25 .... Prokofieff.
"Afternoon of a Faun"....Debussy.
"Daphnis et Chloe" (Second Suite) .... Ravel.
Tone Poem "Finlandia" (By request) .... Sibelius.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

DEC 17 1939

Concert Today At Mosque

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert at Syria Mosque at 3 o'clock this afternoon featuring the third symphony of Dr. Howard Hanson, distinguished American composer. Another feature of the concert will be the playing of the Tone Poem "Finlandia," by Jean Sibelius, celebrated Finnish composer. This will be played as an extra number as a tribute to Finland and to Sibelius, a friend of the orchestra's conductor, Serge Koussevitsky.

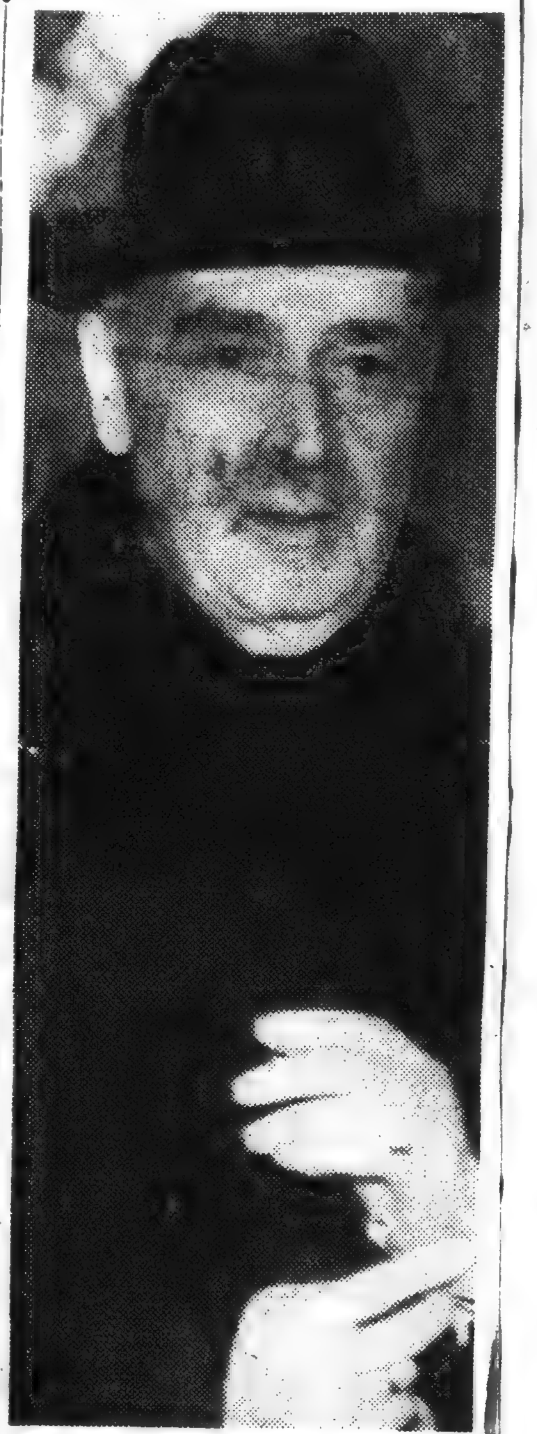
The program:

Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro".. .... Mozart
Symphony No. 3.............Howard Hanson
"Classical" Symphony Op. 25....Prokofieff
"Afternoon of a Faun"...........Debussy
"Daphnis et Chloe" (Second Suite)..Ravel
Tone Poem "Finlandia" (By request)... .... Sibelius

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH
DEC 17 1939

'American Composers Best In World'–Koussevitzky

American composers are the best in the world at present, declared Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, as he arrived in Pittsburgh yesterday.



DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
..conducting Boston Symphony..

Koussevitzky, a Russia, selected for one of his numbers at Syria Mosque last night and today the tone poem "Finlandia," by the Finn, Sibelius.

When he was asked about that, he replied:

"When you talk with a musician, ask him about music; when you talk with a politician, ask him about politics."

'FINLANDIA' POPULAR

He said he had conducted "Finlandia" at Ann Arbor, Mich, and it had been very well received.

Discussing his selection of symphonies by the Americans Roy Harris and Howard Hanson, the conductor said:

"The composers in America are better today than in any other country. No other country can produce such leaders as Harris and Hanson, and such music as they compose.

'UNIVERSAL MUSIC'

"Their music has grown from American life and is American—but more than that, it is universal. All music is universal. In this case, its universality is reflected by America.

"These symphonies will take their place beside the great European classics."

THIS CLIPPING FROM ERIE, PA.
DISPATCH-HERALD
DEC 17 1939

Mrs. Henry Hampel, Buffalo Rd., went to Cleveland for the weekend to attend a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Cleveland Music Hall, on Friday evening. She will also attend a concert of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra with Artur Rodzinski as conductor and Giovanni Martinelli as soloist on Sunday afternoon in Severance Hall. She will be the guest of her son, Alfred R. Hampel, cellist with the Cleveland Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH
DEC 18 1939

Koussevitsky Repeats Symphonic Triumph

By FRED J. LISSFELT

Yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Sergei Koussevitsky, repeated its triumphs of the former evening. There was another capacity audience, and when "Finlandia" came at the end of the program as a reminder of America's suffering friend, there was an almost frenzied response.

The program was confusing as to materials, but each work was an entity unto itself; the playing was so brilliant no one was concerned in the least about unity of program. The opening Mozart Overture to "Figaro" set a merry pace for the orchestra that never relaxed during the concert.

Howard Hanson's Third Symphony was new to Pittsburgh. Its performance emphasized again what was so nobly demonstrated Saturday evening—Koussevitsky's devotion to the cause of good American music. It was done in all sincerity, a memorable exhibition of all the talents of the Boston Orchestra and its director, applauded by the joyous composer who was present on the stage and shared the ovation.

The symphony is frankly programmatic, symbolizes the early struggles of Swedish settlers in America, and like a good movie has a happy ending. There are vague reminders of Sibelius and Wagner, not strong enough to detract from Hanson's own individuality. The score seems to abound in difficulties which another less skillful orchestra might not surmount. There are no innovations in orchestration in evidence on first hearing.

Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony" is a more serious work than one is led to believe from the implications of his clowning the bewigged music of Haydn and Mozart. These two symphonists would have doubtless praised it. Koussevitsky's reading was brisk and witty.

Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" were once again flooded in the luscious tone color of this wonderful orchestra.

PITTSBURGH SUNDAY SUN-TELEGRAPH

Dec 17 '39

Boston Orchestra Sensation Here, Lissfelt Says

Kousswitsky Praised For Expression in Dramatic Scores

By J. FRED LISSFELT

An orchestra program of three symphonies such as offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Director Serge Koussevitsky last night in Syria Mosque is always a sensation in Pittsburgh.

Since Koussevitsky has taken to expressing in his own physiognomy all the dramatic implications of the scores he plays, one is carried to greater ecstatic heights than this great orchestra alone gives us.

MOZART SYMPHONY

An usually fresh Mozart symphony in C Major opened the program. Koussevitsky kept his tone within the limitations set by Mozart's time. With the sonorous Boston strings and their virtuoso woodwinds, the director achieved a perfect precision without losing any of the intended romanticism.

Roy Harris' third symphony was, indeed, congenial music for Koussevitsky, who has so whole-heartedly sponsored American music. The symphony is in one movement with all the usual variety of the symphonic form.

The long cello theme with its melody immediately bespeaks a stark originality, music like none other. If one wished to find a dramatic program it would be easy to read into it the vast pageantry of our West, not omitting a few Redman rhythms, but I prefer on first hearing to record it musically.

POLYPHONIC SKILL

One is conscious of tremendous polyphonic skill, a flair for effective orchestration without sensationalism and a feeling for steadily mounting climax. The pastorale might be termed an Oklahoma Waldwebes although it suffers not a whit from Wagner.

One feels the force of a youthful country and a young pioneering mind. Harris was called to the stage and received an ovation from the orchestra as well as from the audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TOLEDO, O.
BLADE
DEC 18 1939

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, the genius who directs the Boston Symphony Orchestra, broke a tradition Thursday night at his concert in Ann Arbor when he played an encore. But it was done magnificently and purposefully . . . Catharine Gallagher, whose love of good music is almost as great as her appreciation of good literature, told me of the thrilling program in Hill Auditorium. At its close the usually stern and silent conductor returned to the stage in response to the tremendous applause, held up his hand and said he would break a precedent by playing an encore—Sibelius' "Finlandia" in tribute to Finland. It seems that set the audience wild with emotion and at the close of the masterful rendition, the listeners rose in a body in tribute to the musicianship of the orchestra and to the courage of a high-minded little nation . . . The incident is the more significant in that Mr. Koussevitzky is a native of Russia.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE
DEC 18 1939

Findandia

TO HEAR Sibelius' tone poem "Finlandia" played by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his magnificent Boston orchestra would be a thrilling musical treat at any time. But for the Pittsburgh audiences which heard it Saturday or Sunday, with Finland's courageous struggle so vividly in mind, it was a moving and memorable experience. The conductor and his men played as if wishing to express their admiration for the composer and their sympathy for his country.

It was particularly appropriate as Pennsylvania and many other states observed Finland Day as part of the effort to relieve the distress and suffering of a stricken people. We are grateful to Dr. Koussevitzky for including the number on his program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
DEC 18 1939

Two Memorable Concerts Led by Dr. Koussevitzky

By RALPH LEWANDO
Press Music Critic

The two brilliant concerts of the incomparable Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's distinguished and inspiring conducting, given yesterday afternoon and Saturday night in Syria Mosque under Pittsburgh Orchestra Assn. auspices, not only were marked by eloquent expression and communicative interpretative power in performance of a different program on each occasion, but also were notable by inclusion of two new important major works of two representative American musicians.

Mr. Lewando

The items were Roy Harris' one-movement Third symphony, played Saturday; and the four-movement Third symphony of Howard Hanson, director of Eastman School of Music.

Ever since Dr. Koussevitzky assumed the baton of the orchestra more than 15 years ago, he has shown deep interest in the outstanding compositions of this country's composers and has presented 123 concerts in which their works have been played. This recognition and co-operation by a foremost conductor and orchestra not only has given superb articulation to artistic creative thought, but has brought home vividly to the public that America has composers of whom to be proud. Among these are Messrs. Hanson and Harris. Both men are highly endowed. Both are masters of their craft, pioneers in the new awakenment that has come to American musical activity in the creative field. Each composer possesses a potent and definite individuality of expression. Each approaches his respective goal in a manner that is singularly interesting and provocative. Although each achieves an artistic end through differing idiomatic processes which at times may not be fully realized by the average listener, the fact remains that here are two works that are important and which are bound to leave a beneficial influence in their wake, for they were evolved in a spirit of lofty idealism.

Dr. Hanson's work is forthright in concept, masterly in the handling of thematic material, and surcharged with vitality of expression—elements that were set forth by Dr. Koussevitzky through the orchestra with marvelous power. Its success was instantaneous and when the conductor motioned for the composer to come to the stage for acknowledgment of appiause Dr. Hanson reaped an ovation.

Roy Harris' Third symphony proved a striking endeavor. Entirely different in type from the Hanson work, it is an imposing composition of abstract rather than of descriptive values. Superb instrumental combinations of evocative quality utilize the different orchestral choirs most effectively. Most original is the manner in which these are balanced. No less impressive in effect are the skillful and colorful contrapuntal developments in the fourth section of this work, achieved in a style that stamps Mr. Harris as an expert in this sort of treatment. This symphony is not one to be immediately understood by an average listener. It is complex, to be sure, with diatonism and polytonalism comporting with advanced conterpoint in fugal and canonic forms. Yet for all this complexity the work is compact, reasonable and tremendously exciting. One hearing of either the Hanson or Harris works is insufficient for the trained listener to properly or thoroughly uncover their fullest values and qualities.

Mr. Harris' work likewise achieved success, evoking prolonged approbation. When Dr. Koussevitzky called him to the stage the composer was accorded a demonstrative reception which he shared with leaders and players.

The other orchestral items played during the two concerts included Mozart's C-major symphony, No. 34; Schubert's C-major; Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony; Debussy's Afternoon of a Faun; Ravel's 2nd suite to Daphnis and Chloe; and, by request, Sibelius' sonorous and stentorian Finlandia, which was given at the end of each performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE
DEC 18 1939

Sibelius, Noted Composer, In Finland, Conductor Says

Dr. Koussevitzky of Boston Symphony Sure Friend Will Stay With Countrymen.

Conjecture as to the whereabouts of Jan Sibelius, famed Finnish composer, brought assurance yesterday from Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that Sibelius never would desert his country.

Dr. Koussevitzky made his statement in discounting rumors that Sibelius had taken refuge in Norway. The foremost interpreter of Sibelius music, and his intimate friend, Koussevitzky, said in an interview after his concert at Syria Mosque:

"He will never go from his people. He will die with them, but he will not go."

Only a few minutes before, the audience had heard Koussevitzky direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a stirring performance of "Finlandia"—a performance the more significant for the fact that a Russian-born conductor was paying tribute to a country his homeland invaded.

Perspiration dripping from his face, Koussevitzky was bundled into an overcoat the instant he left the stage. The conductor, noted for the vigor of his direction, still was perspiring 20 minutes later.

He said that Sibelius' home was not in Helsinki, but nevertheless "is in the battle zone."

"All Finland is in the battle zone," he commented, "because of aerial warfare."

Dr. Koussevitzky frequently has visited Sibelius in Finland. The two are steady correspondents, but since the invasion of Sibelius' homeland, Koussevitzky has not heard from him.

However, the conductor expects news when a mutual friend, the Finnish Conductor Hannikainen, comes to this country in January to guest-conduct the Boston Symphony.

141

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

DEC 18 1939

Boston Orchestra Proves Musical Leadership Again

In Two Programs Symphony, Under Dr. Koussevitzky, Gives Masterly Programs Brilliantly.

That incredible organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, made its annual appearance in Pittsburgh over the week-end, and in two memorable concerts at Syria Mosque Saturday night and yesterday afternoon, re-established its claim as America's foremost symphonic ensemble.

Moses Smith, who had the incomparable pleasure of hearing the Boston Symphony regularly every week for 10 years as music editor of the Boston "Transcript," once called it "a human machine of 110 parts." This is an apt description if one can dissassociate the idea of mechanics with anything about the orchestra. True, it seems superhuman in its uncanny ability to follow Dr. Koussevitzky's every wish and his difficult beat, but it reaches superhuman heights more importantly in its uncountable refinements of tone and technique, the sweep of its string sections when the music calls for such treatment and in the power of its brass, which manages to avoid the suggestion of blatant stridency.

Saturday night's performance included three symphonies; the C Major of Mozart No. 34, the third of Roy Harris and the great C Major of Schubert. It was in the Mozart work, perhaps more than in anything else played by the Boston Symphony, that we were able to judge of the greatness of Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretive abilities. For Mozart can be over-refined and too polished in lesser hands. This is not one of the greater Mozart masterpieces, yet, as performed Saturday night, it reached heights of sparkling spontaneity. The tone of the strings was just coarse enough and yet not too fine. And the tempo was correct to establish the ornateness and elegance of the music without disturbing its basic simplicity.

What more can be said of the familiar Schubert Symphony which Schumann once called "of heavenly length."? The Boston Symphony is fully routined in its performance, in spots, in fact, a little too routined. Yet it received a performance of perfection particularly in the overpowering splendor of the final movement.

Dr. Koussevitzky has long been one of the patron saints of American music. He has introduced more native composers to American audiences than any other top-flight conductor, and Pittsburgh is to be congratulated that he thought sufficiently of our intelligence to give us two new American scores—the Third Symphony of Roy Harris played Saturday and the Third Symphony of Howard Hanson played yesterday. Without taking refuge behind the usual critical reservation of a "first hearing," this reviewer would like to state quite emphatically that he found the Roy Harris work a stimulating and exciting piece of writing. Mr. Harris has avoided commonplaces and at the same time kept away from dissonances and atonalities. The work is particularly strong at its inception with its opening phrases in the lower strings and at the close with an insistant pulsing, surging rhythm. It follows no program, yet in its guantness and starkness so reminiscent of Sibelius in spots, one can perhaps find some reference to the landscape of the composer's native Oklahoma. Mr. Harris knows his orchestra fully and the work is colored with all the hues of the symphonic pallette and if there are phases where there are evidences of string doubling, we may be sure that they are deliberate and not due to paucity of ideas, as in the case of the Schumann Symphony for example. Altogether, Mr. Harris has made a notable contribution to the literature of American symphonic music.

Yesterday's program included the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" played in a brilliant and sprightly Mozartean style, Howard Hanson's Third Symphony, new to Pittsburgh; Prokofieff's delightful Haydenesque Classical Symphony, and two works long in the Bostonians' Pittsburgh repertory, the "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" by Debussy, and the "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2 of Ravel.

It is doubtful if a new modern work has ever received a more heart-warming welcome on first hearing than Dr. Hanson's Third Symphony and with good reason. Dr. Hanson has written a most pleasant work, and one that requires no effort on the part of the audience to understand. It is rich in melodic ideas, sincere in workmanship and colorful in its orchestration, with a decided leaning to Sibelius. Dr. Hanson evidently believes that the form of the nineteenth century composers is sufficient to express his views, for he makes no break with the past in either style or rhythm. There are no dissonances or harsh atonalities to interrupt the even melodic flow and as Dr. Hanson reflects the scene about him in his music, it is conservative, even reactionary, though pleasant to contemplate. The audience enjoyed the Symphony immensely and extended a warm greeting to Dr. Hanson in person as it did to Mr. Harris on Saturday night.

Though an oft-told story, one cannot hear Dr. Koussevitzky's playing of either the Ravel or the Debussy works without amazement at the sensuosity of the strings in the case of the Debussy or the clarity of the woodwinds and the might climax of the Ravel. Here is surely virtuoso playing unmatched in our time.

At the suggestion of the Post-Gazette, Dr. Koussevitzky graciously added to both programs the poem "Finlandia" of Jan Sibelius. There is nothing in all music that equals this tribute of affection to a home-land by a devoted son, and this gesture to a brave and stricken liberty-loving people struck a wide chord of acceptance by both large audiences. The orchestra played the Finlandia with a moving warmth and feeling enhanced undoubtedly by the connotation caused by present conditions.

D. S. STEINFIRST.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOUISVILLE, KY.
TIMES

DEC 18 1939

Russian Lauds Finn

Pittsburgh, Dec. 18 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed two week-end performances here of "Finlandia"—put on the program in tribute to a country his homeland invaded.

Later in an interview Dr. Koussevitzky praised Jan Sibelius, one of his intimate friends and composer of "Finlandia." The conductor said rumors that Sibelius had taken refuge in Norway are false.

"He will never go from his people," Koussevitzky said. "He will die with them, but he will not go."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

DEC 18 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

DEC 18 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

DEC 18 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN

DEC 18 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
UNION

DEC 18 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM ERIE, PA.
TIMES

DEC 19 1939

PRAISES COMPOSER

Pittsburgh, Dec. 19.—(INS)—Jan Sibelius, famed composer of Finland, is still in his own country, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, believes. He said:

"He will never go from his people. He will die with them, but he will never go."

Dr. Koussevitzky and Sibelius, despite the enmity of their native lands, were fast friends. Dr. Koussevitzky frequently visiting the famed Finn at his home before hostilities began.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

DEC 20 1939

Musicians' Group Honors Composer

Roy Harris, noted composer who was a guest at the December meeting of the Musicians' Club of Pittsburgh, was made an honorary member. The composer's Third Symphony was performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday evening in Syria Mosque. Election of officers was held with Victor Saudek named president; Burton Mustin, vice president; Stevan G. Ambrits, secretary, and Alfred Demmler, treasurer. The board of directors includes Ferdinand Fillion, August Fischer and Vernon Porter.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat-Chronicle

DEC 20 1939

Eastman School Orchestra Shows Notable Skill in Concert

By NORMAN NAIRN

IT was an ambitious program of delightful music that Dr. Paul White chose for the Eastman School Symphony Orchestra in its concert last night at the Eastman Theater, but it was entirely within the capabilities of the young musicians who gave a splendid account of themselves.

From the pianissimo strings in the opening of Wagner's prelude to Act 1 of "Lohengrin," to the vivacious finale of the Brahms Symphony Number 2, Dr. White led the orchestra in fine verve and feeling for the niceties of expression and dynamics that held the interest of the good sized audience.

With well over 100 members, this orchestra is of symphonic proportions, boasting 10 string basses (the Boston Symphony carried nine in its concert here), five harps and a brass choir that plays with particularly warm and brilliant tone.

Following the "Lohengrin" Prelude came the Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde" and the Wagner Rienzi Overture where the climaxes were broad and effective. The players seemed to know just what they were doing under Dr. White's baton and there was life and vitalty in the strings and woodwinds.

Miss Helen Louise Riedy, soprano, was the soloist, singing Wagner's "Traume" with orchestral accompaniment. Her voice, although not big in volume, has a sweet and carrying quality that found favor with her hearers.

As the major work on its program, the orchestra played the Brahms Symphony with notable skill and precision. The strings had a lovely singing quality in the first movement. The third movement was delightfully graceful in its minuet tempo interrupted by a delicate presto played fascinatingly, while the finale made a brilliant conclusion to a performance which merits great praise and shows the results of careful preparation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TELEGRAPH

DEC 21 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR

DEC 21 1939

Russian Director Calls for 'Finlandia'

BOSTON, Dec. 21—(UP)—As a gesture of good will and sympathy toward Finland, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Russian-born conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today that the orchestra's programs this week-end will be augmented by Jan Sibelius' "Finlandia."

THIS CLIPPING FROM KALAMAZOO, MICH.
GAZETTE

DEC 24 1939

* * *

AT THE recent Ann Arbor concert, Kussevitzky, a Russian, dedicated the Boston Symphony Orchestra's playing of Sibelius' great tone poem, "Finlandia," to the composer's embattled countrymen. The musicians gave a fiery, impassioned reading of the number. Under ordinary treatment it is irresistibly exciting. This evening the circumstances made it a wild musical intoxicant. Applause started as the last note died. It swelled and grew. Suddenly listeners as one rose in their seats and gave rein to an fervent, thunderous ovation, a spontaneous outburst thrilling in its intensity. It is not hard now to understand why Russia for years prohibited the playing of the number where Finns might hear it.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 24 1939

Most people, of course, are concerned about Finland. If concert music had a hit parade, "Finlandia" would be number one: We heard it five times last week and nearly all of the country's great orchestras have programmed it. Dr. Koussevitzky, Russian-born, performed the tone poem twice last week-end and with good reason, since Jan Sibelius is one of his best friends.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE
DEC 19 1939

Show To Aid Finnish Fund

Ruth Norris and June Williams were busily at work yesterday making some of the miniature characters who will perform, for the benefit of the Finnish relief fund being collected through the Post-Gazette, in a marionette show to be staged Saturday afternoon by the "Y" Triangle Players in the auditorium of the Downtown Y. M. C. A.

Sibelius Admirers Help Send Finn Aid Fund Past $10,000

48 New Donations Received by Post-Gazette In Campaign Launched by Hoover.

Bolstered by a widow's mite and by contributions from admirers of Composer Jan Sibelius, the amount raised for a nationwide Finnish relief fund through the Post-Gazette scaled the $10,000-mark yesterday.

As the campaign launched by former President Herbert Hoover moved into its second week, 48 new donations aggregating $324.91 were received during the day by this newspaper, bringing its total up to exactly $10,083.30.

Heading the list of donations was the sum of $95.66, which was collected Saturday night and Sunday afternoon at Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Syria Mosque. The music of Sibelius, a native of Finland and probably the world's greatest living composer, was featured at the two concerts.

Another of the latest gifts came from William R. Stamey of Reynoldsville, whose money order was accompanied by a note which read in part:

"This small contribution is being made out of respect for the heroic Finnish people, and especially out of my deep admiration for the great composer, Jan Sibelius, whose national hymn 'Finlandia' so beautifully exemplifies that nation's undying ideal of liberty."

Mrs. John S. Bryan of Ford City, Pa., sent in with her check merely the brief, pencil-written explanation that it was "a 79-year-old widow's mite."

Here follows a complete list of yesterday's donors:

Collection at Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts at Syria Mosque	$ 95.66
Peggy, Betsy, and Annie Tener	30.00
A. R. Robinson	25.00
C. W. Heppenstall	25.00
The Gentlemen's Club	22.00
D. M. Miller	15.00
Anonymous	10.00
O. W. Oppenheimer	10.00
Almeda F. Curtin	10.00
Anonymous	5.00
Mrs. W. V. Flanagan	5.00
Anonymous	5.00
Caroline Fruit	5.00
Helen S. Fisher	5.00
Kittanning Jewish Mothers' Club	5.00
Eugenia E. Heinle	5.00
James E. Stewart	4.00
R. E. Hanna	2.50
P. A. Agnew	2.50
L. F.	2.50
Ann S. Haskell	2.50
Raymond H. Stohner	2.00
Class 16 Fourth U. P. Sunday School	2.00
Marie Steinecke	2.00
Dorothy E. Pinkerton	2.00
C. W. Glotfelty	2.00
Anonymous	2.00
Anonymous	2.00
Edith Hall	1.00
Anonymous	1.00
William R. Stamey	1.00
J. W. Preusse	1.00
Ada R. Preusse	1.00
Anna C. Chesebrough	1.00
D. A. Brinker	1.00
Anonymous	1.00
Anonymous	1.00
Burk Kight	1.00
Andy	1.00
Anonymous	1.00
Anonymous	1.00
Harvey Burgess	1.00
Helen Semonite	1.00
Anonymous	1.00
Anonymous	1.00
H Too Zee	1.00
I Too Zee	1.00
Anonymous	.25
Total receipts December 18	$ 324.91
Total receipts to date	$10,038.30

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 31 1939

CAREERS BEGAN, FADED AND TOOK NEW DIRECTIONS IN 1939

LA GUARDIA
Became concert promoter

FLAGSTAD
Will retire

RACHMANINOFF
Wants to Quit

DOROTHY MAYNOR
Made Koussevitzky weep

STOKOWSKI
Switched musicians' hats

KOUSSEVITZKY
Had tiff with union

MONTCLAIR, N.J
TIMES
12/26/39

Koussevitzky Is Veteran Boston Symphony Head

Conductor's Term of Service Longer Than Any Other.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert at Montclair High School on Jan. 10, as the extra event in connection with the twentieth anniversary season of Unity Concert Course, began his term as conductor in 1924 and has continued for a period longer than that of any of his predecessors.

The long association of the orchestra and such a leader is eloquently justified by the results. The conductor has brought new beauties to the Boston Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction, the festivals, especially the Berkshire Symphonic Festival at Tanglewood, special choral concerts, the broadening repertoire of the regular concerts and the quality of the performance which indicates the direction of a master.

Tickets are on sale at Unity Institute office, 67 Church Street, telephone Montclair 2-6770.

Greetings From Three Spokesmen

Edward Johnson

for the Opera:

EDWARD JOHNSON
General Manager,
The Metropolitan Opera

Opera is no longer limited to the conceptions of the past. It is still a great art form; it continues to provide legitimate entertainment; it is constantly recognized as a factor in cultural education; it is always a major business enterprise.

Today, however, Opera has become something more: it is a refuge which a world in conflict seeks from problems that loom too great for them to solve.

Music speaks a universal language, which can be understood by men and women whose spoken tongues are as various as Babel itself. By means of that language, Opera conveys a spirit that is more powerful, more lofty than any individual emotion. The essence of such a spirit is to me akin to religion. Wherever we may find it, we realize that we need it today more than ever before.

In spite of the difficulties of conscription, internment and transatlantic hazard, in spite of the new tests in tact and mutual forbearance among our own international company, we of the Metropolitan face the current season with a high and happy faith.

Our artists realize that their function to reveal new vistas to the human spirit by their own disciplined craft provides an essential therapy. Our management recognizes the challenge that a European war offers to art in America. For us it is a golden opportunity.

Metropolitan executives and artists alike, we approach our winter's work with a new sense of consecration, born from the needs of the day.

Serge Koussevitzky

for the Orchestra:

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor,
Boston Symphony Orchestra

If symphonic music is the nobler and higher expression of musical creative genius, the Symphony Orchestra is the highest existing medium to bring that music to life. It is a perfect, many-voiced instrument, the mysterious possibilities of which are yet to be exploited and used by the composer of tomorrow

It is interesting to follow the development of the Symphony Orchestra from one generation to another. Let us take the orchestra as used by Haydn, Mozart, then Beethoven, then Wagner and, finally, Stravinsky. What a vivid demonstration of the far-reaching possibilities afforded by that powerful, living instrument!

Real interest for symphony music and for orchestral performance is, comparatively, of short standing, for the wide public was slow to realize the importance of the Symphony Orchestra and its aesthetic and cultural value.

Today, however, the concert public has awakened to the fact that a Symphony Orchestra is the most perfect, the most complete and the most satisfying of all existing means serving to convey tonal wealth and beauty. To this country goes the honor of founding and maintaining great Symphony Orchestras, the virtuosity and perfection of which have never been attained in the past.

America may be justly proud of this achievement, for the high standard of orchestral performance has stimulated interest for symphony music and has revealed its significance in the artistic and cultural life of a nation.

Lawrence Tibbett

for the Artist:

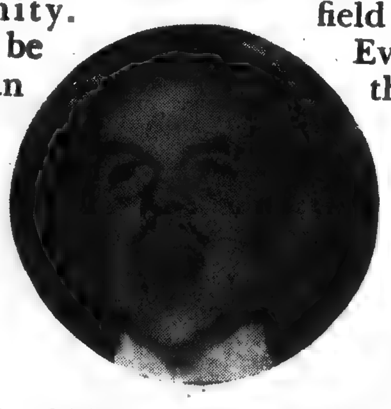
(Portrait On Cover)

Our nation needs Opera because Opera opens a new world of enchantment, color, and romance for the average person; an oasis where he can find solace mentally, physically, and spiritually.

For the singer, more Opera is needful in our country as an outlet for the great outpouring of vocal talent.

Local opera companies when competently directed, must be steadfastly supported by the community. The use of English must be encouraged; our American composers should be able to find fruit for their creative work in the field of Opera. Every year should witness the premiere of new operas by American composers in the various communities.



LAWRENCE TIBBETT

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
DEC 27 1939

WORDS About MUSIC And Musicians

The Cecilia Society, of which Arthur Fiedler is conductor, with Cleora Wood as soprano soloist, will assist in the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's direction at Boston's Symphony Hall this week.

The chorus will take part in Debussy's music from "Le Martyre de Saint-Sebastien," the mystery play of Gabriele d'Annunzio. Also programmed are Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande" Suite from the stage music to Maeterlinck's Tragedy, Op. 80, and the Dukas "Sorcerer's Apprentice."

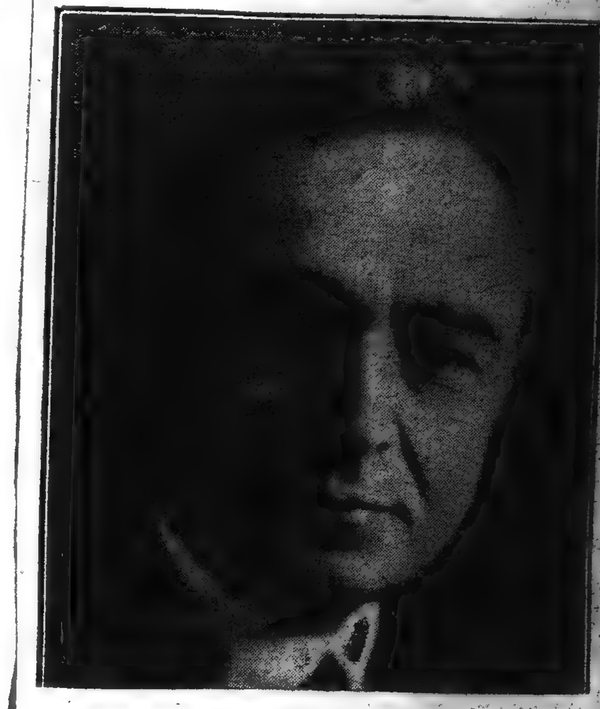
* * *

The third concert in the Boston Symphony's series of Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts will be given next week with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. The program lists Beethoven's Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21, Stravinsky's Capriccio for orchestra with piano solo by Jesus Maria Sanroma and Franck's Symphony in D minor.

CALDWELL, N.J.
PROGRESS
12/29/39

Boston Symphony Will Come to Montclair

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it appears at the Montclair High School on Wednesday evening, January 10, as the special event in the Unity Concert Course in Montclair, opens this autumn the fifty-ninth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The great [illegible] year retains its illustrious personnel without notable change. This season will be the sixteenth of Koussevitzky in America—the longest uninterrupted tenure of any conductor.



DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

Koussevitzky's seasons have been a continuous quest for current scores of importance in Europe and America, and that beauty and vitality in the presentation of classics which may be obtained only by a leader to whom the past is at every instant a living art.

In the New York Times, Olin Downes recently summed up this great conductor's ability in this fashion: "Koussevitzky's originality, enterprise in program making, his rare gifts as an interpreter, the quality of the wonderful orchestra, which he has not only developed technically to a fine edge of virtuosity, but endowed with a sensibility and tone quality, has set this famous organization apart from any other, whenever and wherever it plays."

Tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert are on sale at the Unity Institute office, 67 Church street, Montclair.

MUSICAL AMERICA for December 25, 1939

Bostonians Open N. Y. Series with American Program

Koussevitzky Begins Manhattan Season with Further Service to Native Tonal Cause

By LEONARD LIEBLING

A foreign New York Philharmonic conductor said years ago that to give a Carnegie Hall concert of nothing but American symphonic works was to play to many empty seats and a few occupied by rebellious listeners.

Those who attended the Boston Symphony seasonal opening in the metropolis on the evening of Nov. 23, and the afternoon of the 25th, had reason to think that times have changed greatly since the dictum of the pessimistic leader just quoted. Carnegie Hall was crowded for the pair of events, and if any rebellious ones were among the hearers, their presence was hard to discover, for everyone seemed to be consistently attentive, interested, and frequently enthusiastic.

Serge Koussevitzky has given much more than lip service to the cause of American music since he began his leadership of the Boston orchestra fifteen years ago. He believes that our best composers have something of importance to voice, and his programs show a proud record of performances of their works, many of them having their initial hearings under his baton.

(Continued on page 10)

Berkshire Academy Members Hold Conference

Nilsson

Some Members of the Faculty of the New Berkshire Academy Hold Conference at Symphony Hall in Boston. Seated (Left to Right), F. Gillet, First Oboe; Richard Burgin, Concertmaster; G. Mager, First Trumpet; Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor of the Boston Symphony and Director of the Berkshire Music Center; G. Laurent, First Flute; J. Bedetti, First 'Cello. Standing Are (Left to Right), J. LeFranc, First Viola; V. Polatschek, First Clarinet; R. Allard, First Bassoon, W. Valkenier, First Horn, and J. Raichman, First Trombone. All Are Members of the Boston Symphony

Koussevitzky Plays Native Scores in N. Y.

(Continued from page 5)

This past autumn saw the one-week mammoth festival of American music at Carnegie Hall, under the auspices of ASCAP, and Koussevitzky lent warm cooperation to the endeavor, offering to bring his orchestra and to conduct one or more of the symphonic concerts. However, that was not to be, and through no fault of his own. The local Musical Union objected to the Bostonians (they are a non-Union orchestra) appearing in a series together with Union bands and soloists, and so New York Philharmonic players were secured instead. Unwilling to have his contribution denied altogether, Koussevitzky arranged to devote his New York concerts of last week entirely to American music, thereby supplying a brilliant aftermath to the successful festival achieved by ASCAP.

He did it with a Thursday evening list of Arthur Foote's E major suite for strings, the concertino by Walter Piston for piano and orchestra, Roy Harris' third symphony, and the second symphony by Randall Thompson; and a Saturday afternoon presentation of Edward B. Hill's violin concerto, opus 38 (first time in New York), Walter Schuman's American Festival Overture (first time anywhere), excerpts from John A. Carpenter's Skyscrapers, and (also a world premiere) Howard Hanson's symphony No. 3. Of these two groups, all except Foote are alive. Hill, at 67, is the oldest; then follow in order of age, Carpenter, 63; Piston, 45; Hanson, 43; Harris, 41; Thompson, 40; Schuman, 29.

The music as a whole proved what Koussevitzky has said often of recent years, that the time has come when American composers are writing vitally, with a wealth of ideas, admirable technical mastery, and an idiom no longer helplessly imitating that of Europe.

He also told an interviewer not long ago that it matters little whether or not all our symphonists have found a tonal language immediately recognizable as American, and added: "Music may reflect either folklore of a people for a certain epoch, or great ideals. Thus in America some composers are influenced by folk melodies, by dance rhythms, while others produce music of universal scope and motion."

The Thursday Program

The Foote suite, dating from 1910, need not halt this review for detailed consideration. The flowingly written music, in the romantic style characteristic of the Boston composer, made its customary agreeable impression.

The Piston concertino is an entirely different matter, for it came to creation only a couple of years ago and speaks mostly in the incisive accents and free harmonies of our own period. There is also softer presentment with several extended passages of reflection almost sentimental. The other themes are motifs with pith and point, manipulated deftly and often humorously. The last-named quality and the percussive rhythms of the opus give it a close relationship to Americanism. The concertino made an unmistakable hit with the auditors.

Believer in a new classicism, Roy Harris in his third symphony adheres to the old style of contrasting parts, but joins them in one movement. Its subtitles as given in the program notes, indicate the composer's basic purposes. He describes the moods as Tragic (low string sonorities) Lyric (strings, horns, woodwinds) Pastoral (emphasizing woodwind color) Fugue (dramatic), Dramatic-Tragic. His materials he calls Melodic Contours, Diatonic, Polytonal, Harmonic Textures, Consonance. The melodies have quite long-breathed continuity. The orchestration is resourceful, clear, well-knit. An impression of largeness and the absence of morbidness, suggest Harris' Western origin and his years spent in the open. Excellent are the organic developments. (Too many other composers say their piece in episodes.) His third symphony finds Harris in possession of ampler ideas and more convincing utterance than appeared in his previous symphony done in 1935.

Randall Thompson's example (1931) offers no "program" with the score, but he says that he "wished merely to write four contrasting movements, separate and distinct, which together should convey a sense of balance and completeness." His intent is achieved successfully. The flavor is idiomatically American, but without rhythmic overuse of percussion. Especially the first movement features syncopation. The short Largo has a lovely subject, expressively set forth. A capricious scherzo precedes the healthy, vigorous and strongly native finale. There are traces of aristocratized blues and jazz throughout this symphony of free, unaffected and mostly joyous expression.

In the Piston concertino, Jesus Maria Sanroma furnished scintillant and knowing pianism as the soloist, and won a resounding personal ovation. The composer as well as Messrs. Harris and Thompson were present and took bows on the stage.

Unfortunately press hour for the MUSICAL COURIER is at hand, and discussion of the matinee concert must be deferred until the next issue.

(Continued on page 44)

Buck Flays Leaders Who Ban U. S. Works

Conductors of American orchestras who fail to give scores by American composers a hearing were denounced by President Gene Buck, of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers at a luncheon of the New York State Federation of Music Clubs on Nov. 17, at the Hotel Great Northern.

"We brag about our money, our bridges, politicians, and statesmen, but we are reluctant to talk about American music, something we ought to be proud of," President Buck declared. He cited Arturo Toscanini's tour, in 1929, of Europe with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra when this conductor, he said, "did not play one American work." Mr. Buck styled as the "toughest thing we are up against" the fact that conductors refuse to play American composers' works and assailed this form of "snobbishness."

Mr. Buck spoke of the work done in the light opera field by American composers and he also praised swing music pointing out that "22,000,000 children love swing and are learning the masters through swing music although the melody is carried in a drum pot."

Mr. Buck assailed the boards of directors of orchestras, whom he characterized as "newborn rich people in the hands of subtle gentlemen who tell them what to play" and concluded by making a plea for audiences to support American composers and American works.

"When an American gets a hearing, write to the Philharmonic to play it again," he said.

On motion of Mrs. Edmund H. Cahill, President of the Federation, the members pledged themselves to support Mr. Buck's plea.

George Engles, managing director of NBC Artists Service subsequently took issue with Mr. Buck and cited Walter Damrosch's "hundreds of performances of American compositions."

Lotos Club Honors Koussevitzky

The Lotos Club of New York is tendering a dinner to Serge Koussevitzky on Dec. 2, in recognition of his eminent services to the cause of American music through that conductor's programming of many works by our composers. The guest of honor will be eulogized by Chancellor Chase (president of the Lotos Club), Walter Damrosch, Charles O'Connell, Olin Downes and Dr. Louis Anspacher. With Leonard Liebling as master of ceremonies, a musical program follows the dinner, which is expected to be attended by about 300 members and guests.

144

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
DEC 27 1939

WORDS About
Music
And Musicians

The Cecilia Society, of which Arthur Fiedler is conductor, with Cleora Wood as soprano soloist, will assist in the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's direction at Boston's Symphony Hall this week.

The chorus will take part in Debussy's music from "Le Martyre de Saint-Sebastien," the mystery play of Gabriele d'Annunzio. Also programmed are Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande" Suite from the stage music to Maeterlinck's Tragedy, Op. 80, and the Dukas "Sorcerer's Apprentice."

* * *

The third concert in the Boston Symphony's series of Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts will be given next week with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. The program lists Beethoven's Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21, Stravinsky's Capriccio for orchestra with piano solo by Jesus Maria Sanroma and Franck's Symphony in D minor.

CALDWELL, N.J.
PROGRESS
12/29/39

Boston Symphony Will Come to Montclair

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it appears at the Montclair High School on Wednesday evening, January 10, as the special event in the Unity Concert Course in Montclair, opens this autumn the fifty-ninth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The great [illegible] year retains its illustrious personnel without notable change. This season will be the sixteenth of Koussevitzky in America—the longest uninterrupted tenure of any conductor.

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

Koussevitzky's seasons have been a continuous quest for current scores of importance in Europe and America, and that beauty and vitality in the presentation of classics which may be obtained only by a leader to whom the past is at every instant a living art.

In the New York Times, Olin Downes recently summed up this great conductor's ability in this fashion: "Koussevitzky's originality, enterprise in program making, his rare gifts as an interpreter, the quality of the wonderful orchestra, which he has not only developed technically to a fine edge of virtuosity, but endowed with a sensibility and tone quality, has set this famous organization apart from any other, whenever and wherever it plays."

Tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert are on sale at the Unity Institute office, 67 Church street, Montclair.

MUSICAL AMERICA for December 25, 1939

Berkshire Academy Members Hold Conference

Nilsson

Some Members of the Faculty of the New Berkshire Academy Hold Conference at Symphony Hall in Boston. Seated (Left to Right), F. Gillet, First Oboe; Richard Burgin, Concertmaster; G. Mager, First Trumpet; Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor of the Boston Symphony and Director of the Berkshire Music Center; G. Laurent, First Flute; J. Bedetti, First 'Cello. Standing Are (Left to Right), J. LeFranc, First Viola; V. Polatschek, First Clarinet; R. Allard, First Bassoon, W. Valkenier, First Horn, and J. Raichman, First Trombone. All Are Members of the Boston Symphony

---

Bostonians Open N. Y. Series with American Program

Koussevitzky Begins Manhattan Season with Further Service to Native Tonal Cause

By LEONARD LIEBLING

A foreign New York Philharmonic conductor said years ago that to give a Carnegie Hall concert of nothing but American symphonic works was to play to many empty seats and a few occupied by rebellious listeners.

Those who attended the Boston Symphony seasonal opening in the metropolis on the evening of Nov. 23, and the afternoon of the 25th, had reason to think that times have changed greatly since the dictum of the pessimistic leader just quoted. Carnegie Hall was crowded for the pair of events, and if any rebellious ones were among the hearers, their presence was hard to discover, for everyone seemed to be consistently attentive, interested, and frequently enthusiastic.

Serge Koussevitzky has given much more than lip service to the cause of American music since he began his leadership of the Boston orchestra fifteen years ago. He believes that our best composers have something of importance to voice, and his programs show a proud record of performances of their works, many of them having their initial hearings under his baton.

(Continued on page 10)

Koussevitzky Plays Native Scores in N. Y.

(Continued from page 5)

This past autumn saw the one-week mammoth festival of American music at Carnegie Hall, under the auspices of ASCAP, and Koussevitzky lent warm cooperation to the endeavor, offering to bring his orchestra and to conduct one or more of the symphonic concerts. However, that was not to be, and through no fault of his own. The local Musical Union objected to the Bostonians (they are a non-Union orchestra) appearing in a series together with Union bands and soloists, and so New York Philharmonic players were secured instead. Unwilling to have his contribution denied altogether, Koussevitzky arranged to devote his New York concerts of last week entirely to American music, thereby supplying a brilliant aftermath to the successful festival achieved by ASCAP.

He did it with a Thursday evening list of Arthur Foote's E major suite for strings, the concertino by Walter Piston for piano and orchestra, Roy Harris' third symphony, and the second symphony by Randall Thompson; and a Saturday afternoon presentation of Edward B. Hill's violin concerto, opus 38 (first time in New York), Walter Schuman's American Festival Overture (first time anywhere), excerpts from John A. Carpenter's Skyscrapers, and (also a world premiere) Howard Hanson's symphony No. 3. Of these two groups, all except Foote are alive. Hill, at 67, is the oldest; then follow in order of age, Carpenter, 63; Piston, 45; Hanson, 43; Harris, 41; Thompson, 40; Schuman, 29.

The music as a whole proved what Koussevitzky has said often of recent years, that the time has come when American composers are writing vitally, with a wealth of ideas, admirable technical mastery, and an idiom no longer helplessly imitating that of Europe.

He also told an interviewer not long ago that it matters little whether or not all our symphonists have found a tonal language immediately recognizable as American, and added: "Music may reflect either folklore of a people for a certain epoch, or great ideals. Thus in America some composers are influenced by folk melodies, by dance rhythms, while others produce music of universal scope and motion."

The Thursday Program

The Foote suite, dating from 1910, need not halt this review for detailed consideration. The flowingly written music, in the romantic style characteristic of the Boston composer, made its customary agreeable impression.

The Piston concertino is an entirely different matter, for it came to creation only a couple of years ago and speaks mostly in the incisive accents and free harmonies of our own period. There is also softer presentment with several extended passages of reflection almost sentimental. The other themes are motifs with pith and point, manipulated deftly and often humorously. The last-named quality and the percussive rhythms of the opus give it a close relationship to Americanism. The concertino made an unmistakable hit with the auditors.

Believer in a new classicism, Roy Harris in his third symphony adheres to the old style of contrasting parts, but joins them in one movement. Its subtitles as given in the program notes, indicate the composer's basic purposes. He describes the moods as Tragic (low string sonorities) Lyric (strings, horns, woodwinds) Pastoral (emphasizing woodwind color) Fugue (dramatic), Dramatic-Tragic. His materials he calls Melodic Contours, Diatonic, Polytonal, Harmonic Textures, Consonance. The melodies have quite long-breathed continuity. The orchestration is resourceful, clear, well-knit. An impression of largeness and the absence of morbidness, suggest Harris' Western origin and his years spent in the open. Excellent are the organic developments. (Too many other composers say their piece in episodes.) His third symphony finds Harris in possession of ampler ideas and more convincing utterance than appeared in his previous symphony done in 1935.

Randall Thompson's example (1931) offers no "program" with the score, but he says that he "wished merely to write four contrasting movements, separate and distinct, which together should convey a sense of balance and completeness." His intent is achieved successfully. The flavor is idiomatically American, but without rhythmic overuse of percussion. Especially the first movement features syncopation. The short Largo has a lovely subject, expressively set forth. A capricious scherzo precedes the healthy, vigorous and strongly native finale. There are traces of aristocratized blues and jazz throughout this symphony of free, unaffected and mostly joyous expression.

In the Piston concertino, Jesus Maria Sanroma furnished scintillant and knowing pianism as the soloist, and won a resounding personal ovation. The composer as well as Messrs. Harris and Thompson were present and took bows on the stage.

Unfortunately press hour for the MUSICAL COURIER is at hand, and discussion of the matinee concert must be deferred until the next issue.

(Continued on page 44)

Buck Flays Leaders Who Ban U. S. Works

Conductors of American orchestras who fail to give scores by American composers a hearing were denounced by President Gene Buck, of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers at a luncheon of the New York State Federation of Music Clubs on Nov. 17, at the Hotel Great Northern.

"We brag about our money, our bridges, politicians, and statesmen, but we are reluctant to talk about American music, something we ought to be proud of," President Buck declared. He cited Arturo Toscanini's tour, in 1929, of Europe with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra when this conductor, he said, "did not play one American work." Mr. Buck styled as the "toughest thing we are up against" the fact that conductors refuse to play American composers' works and assailed this form of "snobbishness."

Mr. Buck spoke of the work done in the light opera field by American composers and he also praised swing music pointing out that "22,000,000 children love swing and are learning the masters through swing music although the melody is carried in a drum pot."

Mr. Buck assailed the boards of directors of orchestras, whom he characterized as "newborn rich people in the hands of subtle gentlemen who tell them what to play" and concluded by making a plea for audiences to support American composers and American works.

"When an American gets a hearing, write to the Philharmonic to play it again," he said.

On motion of Mrs. Edmund H. Cahill, President of the Federation, the members pledged themselves to support Mr. Buck's plea.

George Engles, managing director of NBC Artists Service subsequently took issue with Mr. Buck and cited Walter Damrosch's "hundreds of performances of American compositions."

Lotos Club Honors Koussevitzky

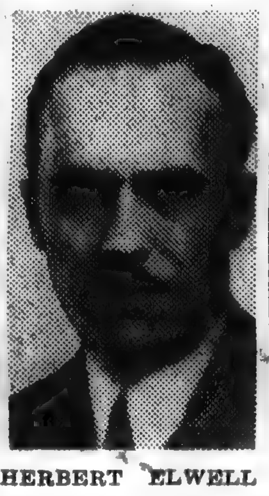
The Lotos Club of New York is tendering a dinner to Serge Koussevitzky on Dec. 2, in recognition of his eminent services to the cause of American music through that conductor's programming of many works by our composers. The guest of honor will be eulogized by Chancellor Chase (president of the Lotos Club), Walter Damrosch, Charles O'Connell, Olin Downes and Dr. Louis Anspacher. With Leonard Liebling as master of ceremonies, a musical program follows the dinner, which is expected to be attended by about 300 members and guests.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, O.
PLAIN DEALER
DEC 10 1939

Boston Symphony Orchestra Under Serge Koussevitzky Appears Here Friday Night

BY Herbert Elwell

THE Boston Orchestra under its famed conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, again visits Cleveland this week, appearing at Public Music Hall Friday night as the third event of the Cleveland Concert Course managed by Mrs. Emil Brudno and sponsored by the Cleveland Museum of Art.



HERBERT ELWELL

The return of this great orchestra, which last season brought cheers from a packed house here, marks a red-letter day in the local music season. The fact that Cleveland offers hospitality to this visiting orchestra is a sign of liberality and musical advancement. There may have been a time when the Boston Orchestra could have filled a hall here on its reputation alone. Curiosity to see and hear one of the world's greatest orchestras would have been a sufficiently strong motive for drawing out a large audience.

Today the picture has changed to the extent that this orchestra is now welcomed not merely because of its name but because 21 years of local symphonic music has developed a musical public capable of appreciating and enjoying the best in symphonic performance. The result is that when the Boston Orchestra comes here now it is greeted with enthusiasm that is based on real understanding of its high merit.

Anyone who was close enough to see the smile on Dr. Koussevitzky's face during the uproar at the end of his last year's concert here knows how he and his men felt about the reception they got. They were pleased beyond words at the intelligent, sympathetic response. And this is a pretty good guarantee that they again will give of their best. Cleveland is lucky to be included in their itinerary, for they travel only one week in the year.

The program contains works familiar to all symphonygoers. The opening "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart and Tschaikowsky's Fourth which closes the program is first grade as well as first rate material, and sure box office. Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and the Orchestral Fragments from Ravel's ballet, "Daphne and Chloe" rank only second in tabulations of the relative popularity of symphonic works, and both are masterpieces.

110 Players

The appearance of the Boston Orchestra here should be an inspiration and an incentive to higher achievement for local music. There is no reason, except one, why our own orchestra cannot aspire to and achieve equality with this big league organization. The thing that prevents the Cleveland Orchestra at present from being considered in the same category is size. The Boston Orchestra has 110 players. We have 81. Of the Boston's 110, 67 are strings. Our own string section totals 54 men, two of which double on percussion.

With this small number of strings we cannot compete with Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago or even Cincinnati, which has 60 string players. In size we are definitely in a class with the minor league orchestras such as Kansas City with 52 strings, Washington 51 and Detroit 52. Something should be done about it.

A large string section is necessary to balance the heavy scoring for brass that has been the fashion since the days of Wagner. The music of Haydn, Mozart and other Eighteenth Century composers can be creditably presented with fewer strings, because they wrote lightly for the other choirs. But when a small string choir is asked to balance trombones, tuba, contra bassoon, wood winds in threes instead of twos, and eight instead of two horns, as is frequently the case in modern scoring, the strings push for all they are worth and the result is a hard, metallic tone. This is too frequently the case with the Cleveland Orchestra which does its best under the obvious handicap. This situation easily could be remedied by the addition of about ten more strings. And the Cleveland Orchestra could then play New York engagements with a degree of success that would immeasureably increase its prestige. The Boston Orchestra appears about six times annually in New York.

"Twilight" Today

The third in the series of popular "twilight" concerts by the ~~Cleveland~~ Orchestra under the direction of the associate conductor, Rudolph Ringwall, will be played in Severance Hall this afternoon at 5. Ringwall has chosen the following program: Overture to "Sakuntala" by Goldmark, two movement from Rimsky-Korsakoff's Symphonic Suite, "Sheherazade," Dvorak's Slovanic Dance No. 1, Entr'acte from "Khovantchina" by Moussorgsky and Chabrier's Rhapsody, "Espana."

Next Sunday afternoon at 4 the Cleveland Orchestra under Dr. Rodzinski will present the renowned Metropolitan Opera tenor, Giovanni Martinelli, in the second of a series of gala, all-star popular concerts at popular prices in Public Auditorium. The program will consist mainly of works by well-known Italian composers, Rossini, Puccini, Ponchielli, Verdi and Mascagni.

Brownlee With Singers

John Brownlee will be remembered as the Australian baritone who scored a distinct hit here last spring with the Metropolitan Opera. He will be soloist with the Singers Club under Boris Goldovsky at their concert in Severance Hall Tuesday night.

Brownlee's operatic career began with encouragement from Dame Nellie Melba, who was also an Australian. His debut was made in Paris and less than three years later, 1926, he sang opposite Melba at her farewell appearance in Covent Garden. Brownlee has since sung with the opera companies of Brussels, Antwerp, Monte Carlo, Barcelona, Buenos Aires, Rio de Janeiro and Montevideo. He recently made a round-the-world tour in opera and concert.

He will be heard in a modern French group and a Mozart group, and will sing with the club in excerpts from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" and in Vaughan Williams' "Fantasia on Christmas Carols." The club opens with Beethoven's "Creation's Hymn," to be followed with numbers by Carissimi, Morley and Purcell. A novelty on the program is a Tarantella by Randall Thompson, recently appointed head of the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia.

"Beggar's Opera" at Reserve

Students of music and the theater in Western Reserve University are collaborating for a production of "The Beggar's Opera" at Eldred Hall, which will open Tuesday night and run through next Sunday. "The Beggar's Opera," written by John Gay in 1728, is one of the oldest and most renowned of ballad operas. It has a political as well as artistic history. It has delightful tunes and witty dialog that sounds contemporary even today. Nagel Playfair's revival of it with Gordon Craig's sets at the Hammersmith Theater in London ran for four years.

The cast includes Howard Feiten, Haline McGugin, William Boehm, Ilona Herman, Alvin Beck, Elizabeth Wilson, William Rosenfield, Harvey Rowe, Yvonne Danielson, Carol Garden and Ann Jones. Miriam Cramer is in charge of the dances. Ralph Richey has designed settings and costumes. Barclay S. Leathem is supervising theatrical direction by Nadine Miles, and F. Karl Grossman directs the music, with Gerard and Marie Gentile in charge of scenes and costumes.

Oberlin Concerts

The Oberlin Conservatory Musical Union and the Conservatory Orchestra, totaling 290 student musicians under Prof. Maurice Kessler, will present a joint concert at Finney Chapel, Oberlin, this evening at 7:30. There will be eleven soloists in a program that includes Bach's Cantata based on Luther's chorale, "Ein Feste Burg Ist Unser Gott;" the Adagio from the string quintet of Anton Bruckner, and the latter's "Te Deum Laudamus."

Some 70 stage seats already sold for the Marian Anderson recital at Finney Chapel, Oberlin, have had to be returned for a refund because of an established policy of Miss Anderson which the Oberlin Conservatory was not informed of before the seats were sold.

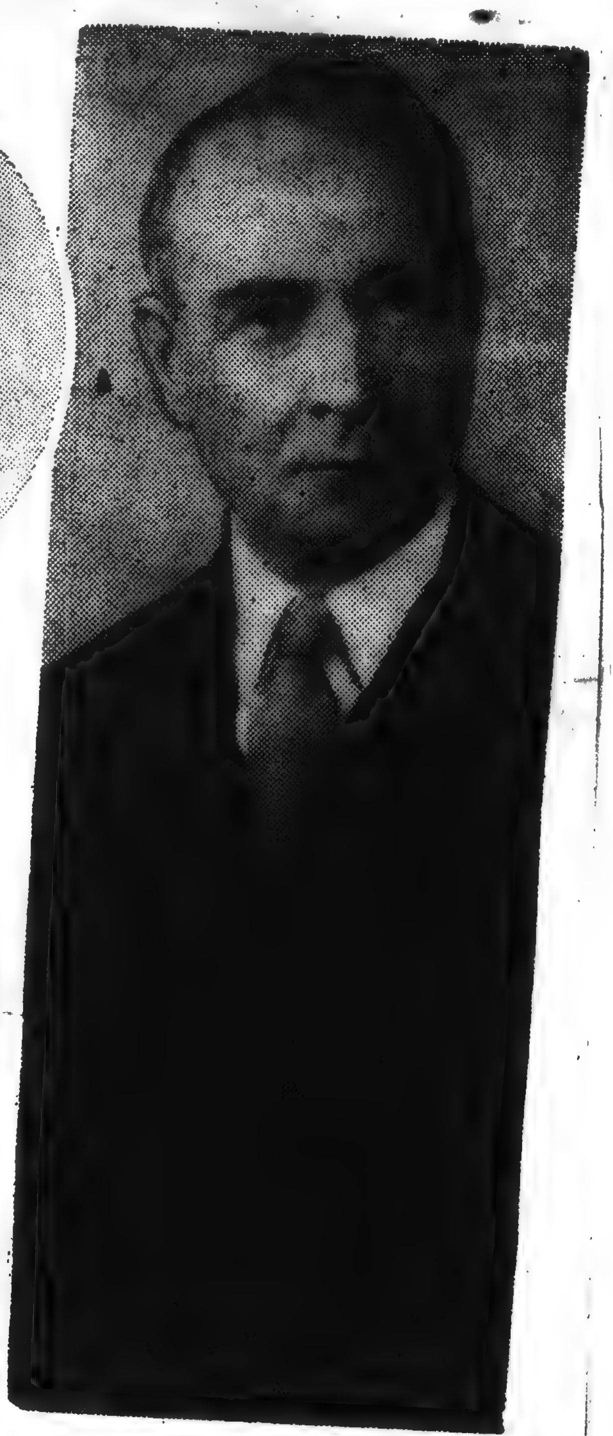
Rubenstein Performs

Beryl Rubinstein, distinguished Cleveland pianist, will participate as guest artist on the program of the donor reception of the Cleveland Chapter of Hadassah Wednesday evening at 8:30 at Hotel Cleveland. Maurice Goldman, former choirmaster at Euclid Avenue Temple who has returned from Hollywood, will sing the traditional Chanukah (a Jewish holiday) chants during the ceremony of the kindling of the lights. The guest speaker is Emil Lengyel, foreign correspondent of the New York Times.

Stars of the Week in Music

ILONA HERMAN

JOHN BROWNLEE



Underwood & Underwood
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

BERYL RUBINSTEIN

CARLTON BULLIS

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NORWOOD, MASS.
MESSENGER

DEC 30 1939

Stravinsky To Be Center Of Big Program

BOSTON—That very provocative composer, Igor Stravinsky, is to be the centre of a provocative program arranged by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who thereby keeps up his reputation for originality in building programs. According to today's issue of the Boston Symphony Concert Bulletin, Stravinsky's much-discussed "Capriccio for Orchestra with Piano Solo" is to be thrust by Koussevitzy between the delightful one-hundred-and-forty-year - old First Symphony of Beethoven, and Cesar Franck's melodious and widely popular Symphony in D-Minor, written fifty years ago. This will be done at the extra concerts in Symphony Hall on Monday night, and Tuesday at three o'clock ("Commuters' Matinee").

Why put the work of the obstreperous modernist, Stravinsky, in such apparently incongruous company—between such innocent, old-fashioned, favorites—with Jesus Sanroma, ace of modernist pianists, as soloist?

Inquiry divulged that Beethoven in 1800, and Franck in 1889, were accorded about the same sort of disappreciation as some listeners show for Stravinsky today. Hence, Koussevitzky's program plot offers the hint that, given time, Stravinsky's "Capriccio" may win such a reversal of bitterness among audiences as, in the cases of Beethoven and Franck, resulted in high popularity today for the two symphonies on the same program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DALLAS, TEXAS
NEWS

DEC 31 1939

Russian Guest Conductor For Boston Symphony

NEW YORK, Dec. 30 (UP).—Nicolai Malko, Russian conductor, will make his American debut as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the series from Jan. 15 to 22. Malko is well known in Europe, where he is permanent conductor of the Copenhagen symphony.

WORLD AFFAIRS
WASHINGTON, D.C.
DEC., 1939

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
DEC 31 1939

"Music, a Democratic Art"

By HOWARD HANSON

(Dr. Hanson, National Chairman of National Committee for Music Appreciation, is Director of the Eastman School of Music at the University of Rochester.—Editor.)

AT CERTAIN TIMES in the development of a state or of a culture it becomes both wise and necessary to take inventory, to take stock of accomplishments, to record both our failures and our successes and to attempt to guide our plans for a productive future. In music this is as necessary as in any other field of human endeavor. It is perhaps particularly pertinent now that conditions in the world at large seem to demand that the Western Hemisphere assume a leadership in the arts which has formerly been the responsibility of Europe.

Since music is the one field in which I feel somewhat slightly qualified to speak, I shall attempt to make some estimate of our status in the new era in which we now find ourselves. For the sake of a broad evaluation we might divide the field into four large subdivisions — professional performance, creative development, education and general public participation and appreciation.

I

We do not run any great danger of appearing unduly nationalistic if we frankly admit that in the field of performance we are already assuming leadership. Fifty years ago we had in this country only a few struggling orchestras, not necessarily professional in character and some probably of dubious technical proficiency. Today the American symphony orchestras are undoubtedly the best in the world, a fact to which I feel sure any conductor who has conducted both in the United States and Europe will freely subscribe. It is not too much to say that orchestras such as the Boston Symphony, the NBC Symphony, the Philadelphia Symphony and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestras do not today exist in Europe, nor have they existed for some time. The fact that our own orchestras number many foreign-born musicians need not concern us as these m too, are Americans, having chosen this cou try as the land in which they wish to pra tise their profession. Then, too, into the splendid orchestras are going every y young American musicians who are prov themselves entirely capable of carrying and forward these great traditions.

Our ventures into the fields of chamb music and the solo virtuoso are prov equally successful, though there is still dearth of opportunity for young Ameri conductors.

In the field of opera we have been successful—but for financial, or per social, rather than artistic reasons. T there are innumerable gifted singers the ter of young artists amply proves. Whet the hybrid form of opera will ever rec the same attention as has been given symphony is a matter for prophecy in wh I shall not indulge.

II

The development of creative talent is rather slower and more difficult task tha the development of performing organ tions or individuals. In this country th development has been slow due partially t a lack of opportunity for the young com poser and partially to a curious snobbish ness which has obtained in the art strange feeling that anything creative mus come from abroad and that anything "hom grown" must necessarily be inferior. Thi is not strange. Rather it is a consta recurring phenomenon in music history. the late sixteenth century Europe took musical cue from Italy. England was pr diced against its own music, preferrin music of the French court. The F preferred the ballets and operas of Later the whole musical world took its from Germany and later again from R

Now, however, the pendulum seems wly swinging to a point where Americans becoming interested in the music of ir own composers, and the snobbishness ich militated against the natural growth our own art is very rapidly vanishing. examples of which I might quote the two- Festival of American Symphonic Music ented by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony Orchestra early in ober and, simultaneous with this, the en-day Festival of American Music in York, which included orchestras from ny Goodman to the New York Philmonic-Symphony and music from Irving lin to Roy Harris. In this connection ight also mention the significant remark Dr. Koussevitzky that the best contemrary music is now being created in the ted States.

54

III

I am not, therefore, belittling either our velopment as a nation of performers or ators when I state that, in my opinion, greatest work—greatest because it has n successful on a scale never dreamed of ore in the history of the world's music— been in the field of music education and ticularly education in the public schools. do not know whether or not the maity of readers realize that this musical velopment in the public schools of our ntry is unique in the whole world. It is mocratic education on a scale and of a ality never before dreamed of. I have rd performances of symphonic music by h school orchestras which sounded almost e major symphony orchestras. I recall a rformance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's Span- Caprice played by the High School Orestra at Ottawa, Kansas, which was a rvel of technical and musical proficiency. recall the same sort of playing by an orestra from a small town in Iowa. The se Technical High School of Chicago asts a symphony orchestra which would the pride of any city; and Cleveland, hio, has three similar orchestras all comting with each other with a verve usually ssociated with the football field or the seball diamond.

Anyone who could listen to these orches as or to such an organization as the Naonal Music Camp Symphony of Interchen, Michigan, and feel that there is any earth of talent in America must have both of his ears securely stopped and his mind tightly closed.

IV

There is, therefore, in this country a wealth of performing talent both professional and amateur and a wealth of creative talent. What is the other side of the picture? What is the status of the large group of people for whom our composers write their music and for whom our singers and players perform their songs and their symphonies? For we must admit, I believe, that, at least for a long time to come, the great majority of our public will participate in music passively rather than actively, as listeners and appreciators rather than as creaters or performers.

Here, too, the picture is rapidly changing. I believe that we must admit that the early part of the twentieth century showed a dangerous development toward the complete professionalization of music and the service of this group for a small and limited audience. The great orchestras were the property of a very few and their operation benefited the great mass of people only to a very small extent.

The advent of radio brought about a change so radical that I doubt if many of us even yet realize how important the change is. Almost in a moment radio changed music from an aristocratic to a democratic art. The Metropolitan Opera Association is no longer the property of a small number of Americans in and around New York City but belongs to the entire radio public of millions. The NBC Symphony is essentially an orchestra for America even though millions of its most ardent fans may never see it. A Brahms Symphony is no longer an appurtenance of Carnegie Hall. It is equally welcomed in the farmhouse miles from the nearest population center.

The phonograph and the record accompany the radio in its work of spreading the democracy of music. The radios are the scout troups; the phonographs follow through, consolidate and educate. Whereas the radio gives us a fleeting glimpse of many beauties, the phonograph allows us to concentrate upon one until it becomes our own. In music, not unlike other arts, we like what we know and understand, and great music once become familiar has that rare quality of unfolding new beauties upon repetition

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
DEC 27 1939

LOPATNIKOFF SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky added another "first performance" in Boston last week—of the Second Symphony by Nikolai Lopatnikoff, a composer in his early thirties, who is Russian by birth. His family went to Finland after the revolution and there, at Helsinki, Lopatnikoff finished his education. He has lived and worked subsequently in Berlin and London and only last April made his home in New York. Engineering was his major subject at college and his knowledge of structure and material seems to have aided him greatly in his building of music.

Lopatnikoff's music holds the attention and one gets the impression that here is a composer of great originality who is aware that all the possibilities of the diatonic scale are not yet exhausted. His tunes may be followed by do, re, mi. They are short and the kind one remembers. His knowledge of counterpoint is never obtrusive and his orchestration is so skillful that never does a theme become obscured by thickness of instrumental sound. His choice of instruments may in a measure account for this effect. Two flutes and a piccolo are used instead of three flutes. To the two clarinets a bass clarinet is added, to the oboes, an English horn, and to the bassoons, a contra-bassoon. Melodies are sung in octaves for reinforcement. Rhythmically, his music has a strong pulse with as much variety, in a modern way, as the music of Brahms.

This Symphony No. 2 has the usual four movements not too conventional in form. A march rhythm, well punctuated by percussion, marked the opening allegro. For sheer beauty, the allegretto overshadowed the remainder of the work. Suave reed voices discoursed agreeably over an accompaniment of pizzicato strings which were delicately imaginative. The andante was decidedly lyric and the final allegro came swiftly back to the strong rhythm of the opening movement.

Lopatnikoff has an abundance of dissonance but of a sort which says something. His sinewy horizontal line of writing is suggestive of a suspension bridge. Perhaps here is the musician who can take modern music over the depths of polytonality, atonality, 12-tone scales and all the rest of the experimental torrents to a safe shore and a fresh start. In a long time, we have not felt so hopeful about the state of new music.

R. T.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
DEC 31 1939

EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERTS THIS WEEK

(Special to The Lowell Sunday Telegram.)

BOSTON, Dec. 29.—That very provocative contemporary composer, Igor Stravinsky, is to be the centre of a program provocatively schemed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who excels in that knack. The occasion, it was announced in today's issue of the Boston Symphony Concert Bulletin, is to be the extra concert in Symphony Hall on Monday night, Jan. 1, with a repetition on Tuesday at three o'clock—"the Commuters' Matinee."

Koussevitzky will present Stravinsky's "Capriccio for Orchestra, with Solo Piano" between the one-hundred-and-forty-year-old First Symphony of Beethoven, and the fifty-year-old D Minor Symphony of César Franck.

Concertgoers today are charmed with the pleasing old-fashionedness of Beethoven's First Symphony, and the chromatic melodiousness of Franck's. But when the "Capriccio" was revived recently by Stravinsky himself, audiences and critics more or less restricted their admiration to the prowess of the soloist, Jesus Sanroma, the young ace of modernist pianists who again will play the solo on Monday and Tuesday. Laudation of the pianist ran very high.

A little investigation made Koussevitzky's apparently mismated program seem arranged quite to the point. Beethoven in 1800, and Franck in 1889 met with about the same sort of sweeping misappreciation as Stravinsky in 1939. Koussevitzky is offering the hint in this program that since time has seen the original adverse decisions swerve to popularity for the two symphonies, the same thing may be in store for the "Capriccio" with [illegible] [illegible]rings.

[illegible] obligation to be pontifical to a certain extent, for the musical [illegible] looks to us for opinions with which it can either agree or disagree. Often this public does not know exactly what it does think about an unfamiliar work, and it wants help in making up its mind. It is our [illegible] as servants of this public to be helpful in the measure of [illegible].

[illegible] complaint is, and has been for many years, that we are not more frequently called upon for judgments on American music. Unfamiliar American works, new or old, are rare oases in the wearisome waste of a standardized repertoire. It is against this standardization that the A. G. A. might wage a vigorous campaign. The way to keep the musical public mentally alert is not to deaden its mind with repetitions of music that it has known ever since it began to listen, but to give it fresh materials upon which to exercise its wits.

Musicians themselves, from orchestral conductors to recitalists, are responsible for the limited opportunities which the American public has for hearing what American composers have done and are doing. Conductors might be asked to give us not only symphonies by Howard Hanson, Harl McDonald and Daniel Gregory Mason, but also symphonies by John Knowles Paine, William Wallace Gilchrist and William Henry Fry. Pianists might be asked why they do not forget Chopin and Liszt for a while and play the sonatas of Edward MacDowell; singers might be reminded of the songs of Clayton Johns and Margaret Ruthven Lang; and all recitalists might be advised to look at the lists of contemporary American works awaiting their attention.

WORLD AFFAIRS
WASHINGTON, D.C

5+

as an old friend reveals new qualities which endear him more to us as the years pass.

V

This unfolding of the aesthetic and spiritual joy of music to everyone who has ears to hear and a heart to understand is to me the democratization of music.

It is, therefore, with particular pleasure that I take this opportunity of paying my respects to all laboring for music appreciation. For out of their efforts will come many by-products, greater and more understanding audiences, greater numbers of amateurs led from passive to active participat in music, finding that joy which comes those who learn to make music for th selves, and, last, greater numbers of ev day Americans who have caught at lea glimpse of the spiritual sustenance w great music can afford.

Surely in these days of strain, of hatred and suspicion, the great art of m is more necessary than ever before. F can lift men above strife and bring t peace, it can replace suspicion with und standing, ugliness with beauty, and b to men not hatred but love.

Interparliamentary Union Oslo Jubilee Conference

(Thirty-fifth Interparliamentary Conference)

August 15-19, 1939

By ARTHUR DEERIN CALL

WHEN on that fair summer day in Oslo, Norway's charming capital city, the Thirty-fifth Conference of the Interparliamentary Union ended its labors, Europe was just fourteen days from the outbreak of war. Before adjournment the members of the Conference, over 350 in number and representing twenty-two parliaments—of Europe, America and the Far East—solemnly sensed the gravity of the situation. On that final day, by a unanimous vote, they sent a telegram reminding all the Powers of the obligations which they had assumed with a view to the settlement of their differences by means of conciliation and arbitration. The telegram closed by urging them to spare no effort to bring about the settlement of their international disputes in a spirit of justice and good will, and to resort in full confidence to those peaceful methods for the success of which the Union was created. War came. Yet the values in that Oslo Conference remain, sure to play their honest part in the long struggle of the friends of law and order for the nations. "As for the Union as a whole," writes Count de Wiart, "it is important that it should at all events study how b it may preserve and use for the gene good the contacts which it has establish the aspirations which it represents, and sum-total of experience and enthusiasm sulting from its half-century of activity. The Interparliamentary Union stood test of the war from 1914 to 1918. It keep its torch alight in the present tempe

I

The Interparliamentary Union devot its first session, August 15, to a fitting servance of the fact that there had been fi years since its first conference, held in t City of Paris back in 1889. The form ceremonies of that beautiful morning we held in the Aula of the University of Os in the presence of His Majesty the Kin of His Highness the Crown Prince, and an appreciative audience of delegates a invited guests that filled the large aud torium.

The morning's program opened with march—Sigurd Jorsalafar by Edward Grie played by the Philharmonic Orchestra

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

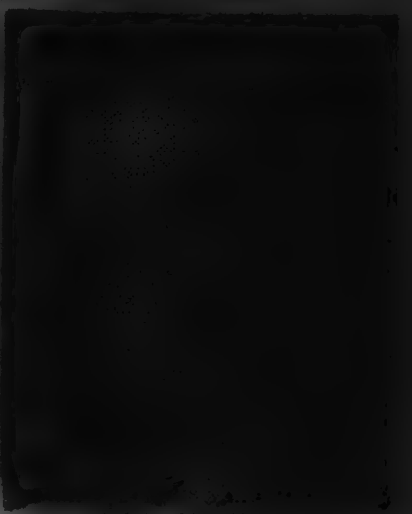
DEC 31 1939

Composers Say Critics Neglect Native Music

American Composers Alliance Alleges That Home Works Are Treated With Coolness, Indifference and Faint Praise

By Ray C. B. Brown.

In keeping with the spirit of the times, a state of undeclared war exists between the American Composers Alliance and the principal music critics on New York newspapers, with the offensive coming from the composers. It seems that the trouble arose from the reviews of two recent all-American concerts played by the Boston Orchestra in New York, and the immediate reaction of the A. C. A. was a letter from the investigation committee to the membership.



RAY C. B. BROWN.

The gist of the message was this: "There is a long record of misstatements, off-handedness, lack of interest about American music on the part of the daily press which we can change by a consistent campaign of protest to the papers, demanding more space, more information and more intelligent reviews for American composers. To be effective, this action must be taken by all members individually, and by as many friends as can be persuaded to do likewise."

The letter states that, even before Dr. Koussevitzki's performances, two of the critics began questioning their value and dampening audiences' enthusiasm. "After these concerts were over, the same doubts and reserves were noticeable in the daily columns, where the critics never fail to consider American music as being of less importance than that of almost any other nation. The comments, forced out of the unwilling critics by the prestige of the Boston Orchestra, are much more favorable and sympathetic than is usually the case."

One of the individual letters of protest, from Edward Kurtz, head of the music department of Iowa State Teachers College, was published in the Times and the Sun, and answered by Olin Downes and Oscar Thompson. Both these critics found in Mr. Kurtz's armor the same weak point in his statement that "the Romantic Symphony of Howard Hanson is just as worthy a work, in my opinion, as the Cesar Frank symphony." Through that little phrase "in my opinion" the critics thrust their rapiers, saying in effect: "Your opinion is yours and my opinion is mine, and who is to choose between them?" Their major defense, however, was a flat denial of aloofness toward American music just because it is American, and an assertion of fair play toward all American composers who produce works worthy of praise.

Judging from the one review of these concerts which came to my notice, my symphanies are with the A. C. A., for the comments on compositions by Edward Burlingame Hill, Howard Hanson, Arthur Foote and Walter Piston were evasive, noncommittal and excessively wordy in saying nothing of real import. A critic should have the courage of his convictions; if he does not like a work he should say so definitely and give the reasons why, and if a work pleases him he should be just as emphatic in his endorsement. The American composer does not ask to be ranked with the acknowledged old masters of the craft, but for a reasoned consideration of his music. He asks, as Bernard Rogers put it in a letter to the Times, "for criticism that proves the case, for or against."

We critics, each and every one of us, have a very simple duty to perform as best we can: To appraise honestly and frankly whatever new music comes to our hearing. None of us, I believe, flatters himself that his verdict is so infallible as to be conclusive, or that it sways public opinion as the moon moves the ocean tides. That would be the height of egotistic folly. Nevertheless, our status as critics carries with it the obligation to be pontifical to a certain extent, for the musical public looks to us for opinions with which it can either agree or disagree. Often this public does not know exactly what it does think about an unfamiliar work, and it wants help in making up its mind. It is our [illegible] as servants of this public to be helpful in the measure of [illegible].

[illegible] complaint is, and has been for many years, that we are not more frequently called upon for judgments on American music. Unfamiliar American works, new or old, are rare oases in the wearisome waste of a standardized repertoire. It is against this standardization that the A. C. A. might wage a vigorous campaign. The way to keep the musical public mentally alert is not to deaden its mind with repetitions of music that it has known ever since it began to listen, but to give it fresh material upon which to exercise its wits.

Musicians themselves, from orchestral conductors to recitalists, are responsible for the limited opportunities which the American public has for [illegible] American composers have done and are doing. Conductors might be asked to give us not only symphonies by Howard Hanson, Harl McDonald and Daniel Gregory Mason, but also symphonies by J[illegible] Paine, William Wallace Gilchrist and William Henry Fry. Pianists might be asked why they do not forget Chopin and Liszt for a while and play the sonatas of Edward MacDowell; singers might be reminded of the songs of Clayton Johns and Margaret Ruthven Lang; and all recitalists might be advised to look at the lists of contemporary American works awaiting their attention.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

DEC 27 1939

LOPATNIKOFF SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky added another "first performance" in Boston last week—of the Second Symphony by Nikolai Lopatnikoff, a composer in his early thirties, who is Russian by birth. His family went to Finland after the revolution and there, at Helsinki, Lopatnikoff finished his education. He has lived and worked subsequently in Berlin and London and only last April made his home in New York. Engineering was his major subject at college and his knowledge of structure and material seems to have aided him greatly in his building of music.

Lopatnikoff's music holds the attention and one gets the impression that here is a composer of great originality who is aware that all the possibilities of the diatonic scale are not yet exhausted. His tunes may be followed by do, re, mi. They are short and the kind one remembers. His knowledge of counterpoint is never obtrusive and his orchestration is so skillful that never does a theme become obscured by thickness of instrumental sound. His choice of instruments may in a measure account for this effect. Two flutes and a piccolo are used instead of three flutes. To the two clarinets a bass clarinet is added, to the oboes, an English horn, and to the bassoons, a contra-bassoon. Melodies are sung in octaves for reinforcement. Rhythmically, his music has a strong pulse with as much variety, in a modern way, as the music of Brahms.

This Symphony No. 2 has the usual four movements not too conventional in form. A march rhythm, well punctuated by percussion, marked the opening allegro. For sheer beauty, the allegretto overshadowed the remainder of the work. Suave reed voices discoursed agreeably over an accompaniment of pizzicato strings which were delicately imaginative. The andante was decidedly lyric and the final allegro came swiftly back to the strong rhythm of the opening movement.

Lopatnikoff has an abundance of dissonance but of a sort which says something. His sinewy horizontal line of writing is suggestive of a suspension bridge. Perhaps here is the musician who can take modern music over the depths of polytonality, atonality, 12-tone scales and all the rest of the experimental torrents to a safe shore and a fresh start. In a long time, we have not felt so hopeful about the state of new music.

R. T.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

DEC 31 1939

EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERTS THIS WEEK

(Special to The Lowell Sunday Telegram.)

BOSTON, Dec. 29.—That very provocative contemporary composer, Igor Stravinsky, is to be the centre of a program provocatively schemed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who excels in that knack. The occasion, it was announced in today's issue of the Boston Symphony Concert Bulletin, is to be the extra concert in Symphony Hall on Monday night, Jan. 1, with a repetition on Tuesday at three o'clock—"the Commuters' Matinee."

Koussevitzky will present Stravinsky's "Capriccio for Orchestra, with Solo Piano" between the one-hundred-and-forty-year-old First Symphony of Beethoven, and the fifty-year-old D Minor Symphony of César Franck.

Concertgoers today are charmed with the pleasing old-fashionedness of Beethoven's First Symphony, and the chromatic melodiousness of Franck's. But when the "Capriccio" was revived recently by Stravinsky himself, audiences and critics more or less restricted their admiration to the prowess of the soloist, Jesus Sanroma, the young ace of modernist pianists who again will play the solo on Monday and Tuesday. Laudation of the pianist ran very high.

A little investigation made Koussevitzky's apparently mismated program seem arranged quite to the point. Beethoven in 1800, and Franck in 1889 met with about the same sort of sweeping misappreciation as Stravinsky in 1939. Koussevitzky is offering the hint in this program that since time has seen the original adverse decisions swerve to popularity for the two symphonies, the same thing may be in store for the "Capriccio" with enough hearings.

WORLD AFFAIRS
WASHINGTON, D.C

216 5 +

World Affairs, December, 19

as an old friend reveals new qualities which endear him more to us as the years pass.

V

This unfolding of the aesthetic and spiritual joy of music to everyone who has ears to hear and a heart to understand is to me the democratization of music.

It is, therefore, with particular pleasure that I take this opportunity of paying my respects to all laboring for music appreciation. For out of their efforts will come many by-products, greater and more understanding audiences, greater numbers of amateurs led from passive to active participat in music, finding that joy which comes those who learn to make music for the selves, and, last, greater numbers of ever day Americans who have caught at least glimpse of the spiritual sustenance which great music can afford.

Surely in these days of strain, of war, hatred and suspicion, the great art of music is more necessary than ever before. For can lift men above strife and bring the peace, it can replace suspicion with unde standing, ugliness with beauty, and bri to men not hatred but love.

Interparliamentary Union Oslo Jubilee Conference

(Thirty-fifth Interparliamentary Conference)
August 15-19, 1939

By ARTHUR DEERIN CALL

WHEN on that fair summer day in Oslo, Norway's charming capital city, the Thirty-fifth Conference of the Interparliamentary Union ended its labors, Europe was just fourteen days from the outbreak of war. Before adjournment the members of the Conference, over 350 in number and representing twenty-two parliaments—of Europe, America and the Far East—solemnly sensed the gravity of the situation. On that final day, by a unanimous vote, they sent a telegram reminding all the Powers of the obligations which they had assumed with a view to the settlement of their differences by means of conciliation and arbitration. The telegram closed by urging them to spare no effort to bring about the settlement of their international disputes in a spirit of justice and good will, and to resort in full confidence to those peaceful methods for the success of which the Union was created. War came. Yet the values in that Oslo Conference remain, sure to play their honest part in the long struggle of the friends of law and order for the nations. "As for the Union as a whole," writes Count de Wiart, "it is important that it should at all events study how best it may preserve and use for the general good the contacts which it has established, the aspirations which it represents, and the sum-total of experience and enthusiasm resulting from its half-century of activity. The Interparliamentary Union stood the test of the war from 1914 to 1918. It will keep its torch alight in the present tempest."

I

The Interparliamentary Union devoted its first session, August 15, to a fitting observance of the fact that there had been fifty years since its first conference, held in the City of Paris back in 1889. The formal ceremonies of that beautiful morning were held in the Aula of the University of Oslo in the presence of His Majesty the King, of His Highness the Crown Prince, and of an appreciative audience of delegates and invited guests that filled the large auditorium.

The morning's program opened with a march—Sigurd Jorsalafar by Edward Grieg, played by the Philharmonic Orchestra of

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

DEC 31 1939

Composers Say Critics Neglect Native Music

American Composers Alliance Alleges That Home Works Are Treated With Coolness, Indifference and Faint Praise

By Ray C. B. Brown.

In keeping with the spirit of the times, a state of undeclared war exists between the American Composers Alliance and the principal music critics on New York newspapers, with the offensive coming from the composers. It seems that the trouble arose from the reviews of two recent all-American concerts played by the Boston Orchestra in New York, and the immediate reaction of the A. C. A. was a letter from the investigation committee to the membership.

The gist of the message was this: "There is a long record of misstatements, off-handedness, lack of interest about American music on the part of the daily press which we can change by a consistent campaign of protest to the papers, demanding more space, more information and more intelligent reviews for American composers. To be effective, this action must be taken by all members individually, and by as many friends as can be persuaded to do likewise."

RAY C. B. BROWN.

The letter states that, even before Dr. Koussevitzki's performances, two of the critics began questioning their value and dampening audiences' enthusiasm. "After these concerts were over, the same doubts and reserves were noticeable in the daily columns, where the critics never fail to consider American music as being of less importance than that of almost any other nation. The comments, forced out of the unwilling critics by the prestige of the Boston Orchestra, are much more favorable and sympathetic than is usually the case."

One of the individual letters of protest, from Edward Kurtz, head of the music department of Iowa State Teachers College, was published in the Times and the Sun, and answered by Olin Downes and Oscar Thompson. Both these critics found in Mr. Kurtz's armor the same weak point in his statement that "the Romantic Symphony of Howard Hanson is just as worthy a work, in my opinion, as the Cesar Frank symphony." Through that little phrase "in my opinion" the critics thrust their rapiers, saying in effect: "Your opinion is yours and my opinion is mine, and who is to choose between them?" Their major defense, however, was a flat denial of aloofness toward American music just because it is American, and an assertion of fair play toward all American composers who produce works worthy of praise.

Judging from the one review of these concerts which came to my notice, my symphanies are with the A. C. A., for the comments on compositions by Edward Burlingame Hill, Howard Hanson, Arthur Foote and Walter Pison were evasive, noncommittal and excessively wordy in saying nothing of real import. A critic should have the courage of his convictions; if he does not like a work he should say so definitely and give the reasons why, and if a work pleases him he should be just as emphatic in his endorsement. The American composer does not ask to be ranked with the acknowledged old masters of the craft, but for a reasoned consideration of his music. He asks, as Bernard Rogers put it in a letter to the Times, "for criticism that proves the case, for or against."

We critics, each and every one of us, have a very simple duty to perform as best we can: To appraise honestly and frankly whatever new music comes to our hearing. None of us, I believe, flatters himself that his verdict is so infallible as to be conclusive, or that it sways public opinion as the moon moves the ocean tides. That would be the height of egotistic folly. Nevertheless, our status as critics carries with it the obligation to be pontifical to a certain extent, for the musical public looks to us for opinions with which it can either agree or disagree. Often this public does not know exactly what it does think about an unfamiliar work, and it wants help in making up its mind. It is our privilege as servants of this public to be helpful in the measure of our ability.

My complaint is, and has been for many years, that we are not more frequently called upon for judgments on American music. Unfamiliar American works, new or old, are rare oases in the wearisome waste of a standardized repertoire. It is against this standardization that the A. C. A. might wage a vigorous campaign. The way to keep the musical public mentally alert is not to deaden its mind with repetitions of music that it has known ever since it began to listen, but to give it fresh material upon which to exercise its wits.

Musicians themselves, from orchestral conductors to recitalists, are responsible for the limited opportunities which the American public has for hearing what American composers have done and are doing. Conductors might be asked to give us not only symphonies by Howard Hanson, Harl McDonald and Daniel Gregory Mason, but also symphonies by John Knowles Paine, William Wallace Gilchrist and William Henry Fry. Pianists might be asked why they do not forget Chopin and Liszt for a while and play the sonatas of Edward MacDowell; singers might be reminded of the songs of Clayton Johns and Margaret Ruthven Lang; and all recitalists might be advised to look at the lists of contemporary American works awaiting their attention.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

DEC 27 1939

LOPATNIKOFF SYMPHONY

Koussevitsky added another "first performance" in Boston last week—of the Second Symphony by Nikolai Lopatnikoff, a composer in his early thirties, who is Russian by birth. His family went to Finland after the revolution and there, at Helsinki, Lopatnikoff finished his education. He has lived and worked subsequently in Berlin and London and only last April made his home in New York. Engineering was his major subject at college and his knowledge of structure and material seems to have aided him greatly in his building of music.

Lopatnikoff's music holds the attention and one gets the impression that here is a composer of great originality who is aware that all the possibilities of the diatonic scale are not yet exhausted. His tunes may be followed by do, re, mi. They are short and the kind one remembers. His knowledge of counterpoint is never obtrusive and his orchestration is so skillful that never does a theme become obscured by thickness of instrumental sound. His choice of instruments may in a measure account for this effect. Two flutes and a piccolo are used instead of three flutes. To the two clarinets a bass clarinet is added, to the oboes, an English horn, and to the bassoons, a contra-bassoon. Melodies are sung in octaves for reinforcement. Rhythmically, his music has a strong pulse with as much variety, in a modern way, as the music of Brahms.

This Symphony No. 2 has the usual four movements not too conventional in form. A march rhythm, well punctuated by percussion, marked the opening allegro. For sheer beauty, the allegretto overshadowed the remainder of the work. Suave reed voices discoursed agreeably over an accompaniment of pizzicato strings which were delicately imaginative. The andante was decidedly lyric and the final allegro came swiftly back to the strong rhythm of the opening movement.

Lopatnikoff has an abundance of dissonance but of a sort which says something. His sinewy horizontal line of writing is suggestive of a suspension bridge. Perhaps here is the musician who can take modern music over the depths of polytonality, atonality, 12-tone scales and all the rest of the experimental torrents to a safe shore and a fresh start. In a long time, we have not felt so hopeful about the state of new music.

R. T.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

DEC 31 1939

EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERTS THIS WEEK

(Special to The Lowell Sunday Telegram.)

BOSTON, Dec. 29.—That very provocative contemporary composer, Igor Stravinsky, is to be the centre of a program provocatively schemed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who excels in that knack. The occasion, it was announced in today's issue of the Boston Symphony Concert Bulletin, is to be the extra concert in Symphony Hall on Monday night, Jan. 1, with a repetition on Tuesday at three o'clock—"the Commuters' Matinee."

Koussevitzky will present Stravinsky's "Capriccio for Orchestra, with Solo Piano" between the one-hundred-and-forty-year-old First Symphony of Beethoven, and the fifty-year-old D Minor Symphony of César Franck.

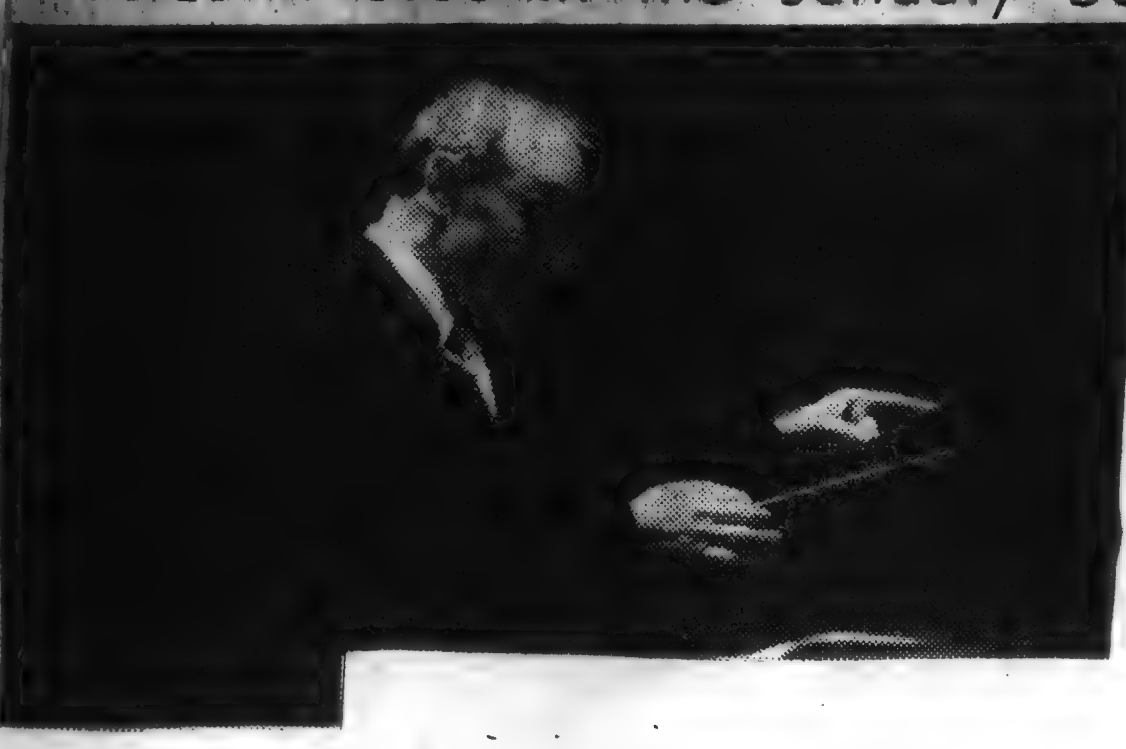
Concertgoers today are charmed with the pleasing old-fashionedness of Beethoven's First Symphony, and the chromatic melodiousness of Franck's. But when the "Capriccio" was revived recently by Stravinsky himself, audiences and critics more or less restricted their admiration to the prowess of the soloist, Jesus Sanroma, the young ace of modernist pianists who again will play the solo on Monday and Tuesday. Laudation of the pianist ran very high.

A little investigation made Koussevitzky's apparently mismated program seem arranged quite to the point. Beethoven in 1800, and Franck in 1889 met with about the same sort of sweeping misappreciation as Stravinsky in 1939. Koussevitzky is offering the hint in this program that since time has seen the original adverse decisions swerve to popularity for the two symphonies, the same thing may be in store for the "Capriccio" with enough hearings.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 1- 1940

147

Musical Notes in the January Scale



THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHARLESTON, S. C.
NEWS-COURIER
JAN 1- 1940

Nicolai Malko, Russian conductor, will make his American debut as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the ~~series from~~ January 15 to 22. Malko is well known in Europe, where he is permanent conductor of the Copenhagen Symphony.

MONTCLAIR, N.J
TIMES
1/2/40

Next Week's Concert Program Announced

Two symphonies will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it appears for its program in Montclair Wednesday night of next week, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting. They are Brahms' Second, in D major, which will open the concert, and Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, also in four movements.

The orchestra will also play Faure's "Pelleas et Melisande" Suite and the well known and often played "Finlandia," Sibelius' symphonic poem relating to the northern republic which is now fighting for its existence. Tickets are still available at Unity Institute office, 67 Church Street, telephone Montclair 2-6770.

Globe Jan 2

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Subscribers to the Monday Boston Symphony concerts last night heard the D minor Symphony of Cesar Franck given a performance that was breathtaking. It was one of those rare, "miraculous" occasions when even a great conductor and orchestra seem to excel their best, when a masterpiece is recreated with so much virtuosity, fire and sheer beauty of sound that one could say: "Here, for the first time, I have heard all there is in this music!"

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted, had placed Franck's well-worn piece last on a program that began with the First Symphony of Beethoven, and included the Piano Capriccio by Stravinsky, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist.

Only a few years ago the Franck Symphony turned up so often that many crossed and went down the other side of the street every time they saw it coming. A little rest has done much good; now it again sounds fresh and lovely, a masterpiece entirely of sensuous appeal, quite like nothing else in the realm of symphonies.

Dr. Koussevitzky followed his usual practice of reducing the strings to a foundation of only six double-basses for the Beethoven Symphony. This naive, utterly joyous music, like the Franck, showed the conductor at his best. From first to last it had a precision that almost crackled. If some of the tempi, especially the fast ones, were more Koussevitzky than classic, who would deny their logic and their effect?

Mr. Sanroma deserved the full-bodied reception that was his when he had finished a truly brilliant performance of Stravinsky's odd little Capriccio. It takes more than accurate manipulation of notes to play the Capriccio as Mr. Sanroma did. What is required is understanding of the modern spirit, a psychological grasp of our wisecracking period as it has affected the art of music.

The Capriccio is devilishly clever, and there is enough humor to justify appraisal as a fairly good musical joke. But as fairly good jokes can stand only a certain number of tellings, so a judiciously applied syllogism brings the conclusion that the Capriccio should be put to bed for a long Arctic Winter. The program will be repeated this afternoon at 3.—C. W. D.

REPEAT MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Post Jan 2

Sanroma Soloist in Stravinsky's Piano Capriccio

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

So far as the programme was concerned last evening's Symphony concert offered only music already heard this season in the concerts of the longer series. The one touch of novelty lay in the fact that the second of the three numbers, Stravinsky's Capriccio for orchestra and piano, with Mr. Sanroma as the soloist, was conducted not by the composer himself but by Dr. Koussevitzky. The remaining pieces were the First Symphony of Beethoven and the Symphony of Franck.

For two reasons the Capriccio was heard to better advantage last evening than at the recent all-Stravinsky concert—Dr. Koussevitzky is an abler conductor of Stravinsky's music than Stravinsky himself and the Capriccio did not suffer from being placed after the too-long and too-similar "Card Game." If anything, too, Mr. Sanroma's playing of the piano part, which suits him to a "t," was more brilliant and high-spirited than heretofore.

The Capriccio itself, a piece designed purely and solely for entertainment, is hardly more than enormously clever fooling, a virtuoso parodying of styles from a Liszt Rhapsody to jazz. It reminds one of Alec Templeton's pianistic cuttings-up and much of it could be played in a night club without arousing a flicker of astonishment. If the piece had not been finished in September, 1929, one might well say that it epitomized musically the decade which has just been left behind.

Music of 3 Centuries

Transcript Jan 2

Beethoven, Stravinsky and Franck Presented At Third Monday Evening Symphony Program

By EDWARD DOWNES

Three extremely brilliant orchestral performances from the current repertory of the Boston Symphony made up the program of that organization's third Monday evening concert at Symphony Hall last night under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Jesus Maria Sanroma drew some of the evening's most enthusiastic applause for his glittering execution of the piano part in Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra. The warmth of his audience no less than the friendly congratulations of his colleagues on the stage must have warmed Mr. Sanroma's heart. They left no doubt about the position he has won for himself in Boston.

For Performance or Work?

Or was this outburst of feeling directed to Mr. Stravinsky's address? It did not appear so. But it is easy to be mistaken in these matters. Hearing the Stravinsky Capriccio for the fourth time in recent months, this reporter found it superficially entertaining. It has the light touch, the incredible dexterity, the finish and sophistication of a master, but none of the significant utterance that many Stravinsky works of an earlier period still have. It seems almost neurotic in its purposelessness. It reflects admirably the mental confusion, the nervousness, the lack of direction, of any large, unifying idea from which the entire world has been and still is suffering.

If the function of the artist is to hold up a mirror to the world about him Mr. Stravinsky has perhaps succeeded better than any of us would like to admit.

Beethoven's First

The program opened with a deeply satisfying performance of Beethoven's First Symphony, though it is possible to disagree with Dr. Koussevitzky in matters of tempo. There is perhaps no other orchestra in the world that could bring off that finale with such breath-taking delicacy, such sensitive precision and at the fleet pace Dr. Koussevitzky demands. It is a vertiginous pleasure to listen to. Whether the music might not profit from a less hasty unfolding is another question. The writer feels that a pace one shade easier, a little more breathing-space for each phrase would add to the grace of this incomparable finale.

In the other movements Koussevitzky and his men brought to life the composer's vision with all its native profundity and charm.

Cesar Franck's popular D minor Symphony which closed the program is a work which for today's symphonic audiences can be made to sound flashy and trite. It was not so last night. It was presented in a subjective and extremely personal manner, with Koussevitzky's never-failing sense of drama and appreciation of color. Neither did the lament of the English horn turn to bathos, nor were the mystic premonitions and final triumphant proclamation of the first movement debased to pompous platitude.

It was a performance for the most jaded concert-goer to enjoy.

Monday Symphony Concert

For the third program of the Monday-Tuesday series of programs given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky arranged the following items: Beethoven, Symphony No. 1 in C major, Stravinsky, Capriccio for Orchestra with Pianoforte Solo (J. M. Sanromá, soloist); Franck, Symphony in D minor.

It was pleasant to hear the early Beethoven played with such evident understanding of the composer's intentions, and while the wind section did not especially distinguish itself at the close of the first repeat in the exposition of the first movement, the slip was trifling and in subsequent passages was redeemed manyfold. The criticism, as most persons are aware, has been made of this symphony that it contains an overabundance of material for the wind choirs. The performance last night served to emphasize this idiosyncrasy. There are moments during performances of our orchestra when one might wish for less vociferousness from the brass section, yet this is a thing which concerns only the individual interpretation placed upon a work. If you wish to attain such and such an effect, you must call up all your reserves. In the instance of this Beethoven First, there seems to be room for a little argument in favor of milder brass—or so it seemed to this commentator last night.

The Stravinsky Capriccio is by this time fairly familiar music, and Mr. Sanromá's expertness in presenting the pianoforte portion is now taken somewhat as a matter of course, yet with each performance the piece yields new revelations of finely developed coordination. The timing last night was again amazingly accurate and it seemed to one listener that Mr. Sanromá had discovered some new approaches to the pianoforte score, especially in the Andante rapsodico. The audience recalled him many times at the close of his brilliant performance.

The question which presented itself to this writer during the playing of the piece, however, was whether the work might not lend inspiration to some choregrapher. Possibly we are becoming excessively dance-conscious, but certainly there is a story here to be mimed which would be both interesting and amusing.

A sympathetic performance of the Franck symphony brought manifestations of great enthusiasm from the audience and closed one of the most satisfying programs which Dr. Koussevitzky has given his Monday-Tuesday patrons.

G. M. S.

Herald Jan 2

MUSIC

Herald Jan 2

MONDAY SYMPHONY

The third concert in the Monday-Tuesday series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given last night in Symphony Hall. Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Beethoven...Symphony No. 1 in C major Op. 21
Stravinsky...Capriccio for orchestra and piano solo
Franck...........Symphony in D minor

All of the music on this attractive and well-balanced program has been heard this season already at the regular concerts and consequently does not require much comment just now. Beethoven's First Symphony is a perfectly charming Haydnesque work that merely has to be very precisely played by such an orchestra as the Boston Symphony to make its full effect at once upon all those not deaf to the beauties of late 18th century music. It is common among professional musicians and critics to deplore frequent performances of the Franck Symphony, and this is meant honestly and on good grounds. But we forget that the symphony is firmly entrenched in the popular imagination as a truly great work of musical art. Hence it is only fair to repeat it from time to time, regardless of the suggestions of those who approach symphony concerts with a somewhat more blase attitude.

The Stravinsky Capriccio made an excellent foil between the classic Beethoven and the romantic Franck. This effective and dryly entertaining caprice for orchestra and piano has a glitter and fascination that also has its place in music. Mr. Sanroma, who had successfully played the solo part under the composer exactly a month ago, repeated his achievement as sympathetic virtuoso last night. Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation had a little more "joie de vivre" than Stravinsky's, and that is only natural. Some of the modern composers—Stravinsky and Hindemith are good instances of this tendency—desire their works performed with as little expression as possible. This is in revolt against the over-conducting that has at times been the fashion. Last night's performance, however, would not have bothered the composer and might even have shown him a point or two.

The concert will be repeated this afternoon. The next pair of concerts in the series will be given on Monday evening, Jan. 29, and Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 30. Richard Burgin will conduct; and Albert Spalding, violinist, will be the soloist.

A. W. W.

148

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, THURSDAY, JANUARY 4, 1940

Foreword to Symphony Programs

Two Novelties Scheduled

By Alfred H. Meyer

Two novelties grace this week's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Together with Brahms' pleasant Second Symphony Dr. Koussevitzky offers his listeners the violinist Joseph Szigeti for Boston's first hearing of Ernest Bloch's Violin Concerto, and for first performance anywhere, George Foote's Suite for Orchestra, entitled "In Praise of Winter."

The first performance of Mr. Bloch's concerto took place in Cleveland on Dec. 15, 1938, with Mr. Szigeti as violinist and Dimitri Mitropoulos as guest conductor. It was also played in London by the same violinist with the Philharmonic Orchestra, Beecham conducting, on March 9, 1939.

Mr. Bloch has stated that the concerto was assembled from various sketches, each the inspiration of the moment, made between 1930 and 1937. The work as a whole was completed in January, 1938. Mr. Bloch disclaims any programmatic scheme or significance for the work, insists further that it has had no Jewish inspiration or intention. Several critics and commentators have remarked, however, that its idiom has Eastern connotations. A hasty glance at the score reveals numerous inflections of musical thought which carry Oriental suggestions, some of them no doubt similar to those traits which in his early works carried so strong a Jewish connotation.

* * *

Curiously, however, the principal theme, which is heard at the very beginning and is repeated frequently throughout the first and last movements, the composer describes as being "undoubtedly of an American-Indian character." It is by no means a far stretch of the imagination to assume that much of the feeling which musical association commonly deems "Oriental" is in the composer's thought a development of the implications of this pseudo-Indian theme. In any case, the pungent idiom which by common consent has been thought to be Bloch's most individual and characteristic vehicle of expression, has again, in this work, ample opportunity for free play.

For the first performance of the concerto in Cleveland Mr. Bloch wrote a detailed analysis, from which, in consultation with the score, the following analytical facts are gathered. Mr. Bloch's analysis lists some 15 themes or motives from which the concerto is constructed. Evidence from the score and remarks of Mr. Block, such as ". . . and a few other themes of importance are added," show that the 15 are by no means a complete catalogue of the thematic material of the concerto. The work, then, is one of considerable complexity, rich in invention.

The first movement begins with an introduction, "Allegro deciso," in which the orchestra at once exposes the Indian theme. After a few measures the violin enters meditatively with a quiet theme of its own. Both of these are used repeatedly throughout the concerto After a very brief cadenza the orchestra brings a complex of four new motives, all of which are extensively developed.

* * *

The main body of the movement enters "Allegro." It is a fre sonata-allegro in which the first theme section is an elaborate working of many of the motives presented in the introduction. The second theme is a melody played by the solo violin, "Meno mosso," repeated presently by cellos. The development comes quickly, the tempo "Moderato." After a climax "of great vehemence" the recapitulation begins with the solo violin singing its theme from the introduction. The cadenza occurs between the first and second themes in the recapitulation. After it, the second theme is begun by flute and oboe, is continued by the solo violin. "The tempo gradually increases, and the music becomes more and more animated, leading finally to the conclusion of the movement, on a fortissimo chord."

The second movement, "Andante," "is curiously and quite unconsciously related to the violin theme of the introduction." After nine measures of an introductory character, "it starts with a kind of folk song of a very quiet and dreamy character." Ae few other themes and a few references to the first movement, all of related character, bring it to its conclusion.

The third movement again begins with an introduction, "Deciso." The orchestra begins in a "tragic and vehement mood." There are again references to the first movement and a few new motives of importance. The movement proper "Allegro Moderato," "is of a joyful character, like a lively 'Pastorale.' " The movement is again a free sonata-allegro. The second theme, played by the solo violin, "Piu Calmo," consists of motives already heard. In the development the theme of the beginning of the movement is used "with tragic accent." The recapitulation is similar to the exposition but with music frequently of more abandon. A coda recapitulates material from the first and last movements, and the solo violin "pronounces the initial Indian motive for the last time—broadly and 'moderato'—and brings the concerto to its conclusion."

* * *

George Foote, whose suite, "In Praise of Winter," receives its première at these concerts, is a Bostonian of New England stock. His "Variations on a Pious Theme" were played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1935. Other works of his have been played at the Flute Players' Club and at other local concerts.

In spite of the title the composer disavows a program, indeed does not give title to the four movements of the suite. "It adheres rather closely to accepted symphonic forms," he writes, "without attaining perhaps to the stature of a symphony. It is not intended to be descriptive in any way, although I hope that it may have something of the atmosphere of what Thomas Wolfe called 'the beautiful frozen north.' "

The first and second movements are sonata-allegros. The third "scherzando," is a concise ternary form; the last is a rondo. The first, third and fourth are gay in mood, the second is tranquil. Mr. Foote uses the large modern orchestra with winds in fours.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Brooklyn Spectator

JAN 5 - 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT AT ACADEMY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will give its second Brooklyn concert in a series of five for the current season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, on Friday evening, Jan. 12th. The following program will be played: Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozzart; Symphony in B-flat, No. 1, Op. 38, Schumann; Classical Symphony, Op. 25, Prokofieff; "Pelleas and Melisande," Suite from the stage music to Maeterlinck's Tradgedy, Op. 80, Faure; "Finlandia," Symphonic Poem, Op. 26, Sibelius.

On the Tuesday afternoon preceding this concert (Jan. 9), a discussion of the program will be held by Jonathan Schiller, lecturer in music at the Institute and Director of the RCA Victor Lecture Bureau. Mr. Schiller will speak in the lecture hall of the Brooklyn Academy of Music at 4 p. m.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 4 - 1940

'Peter and Wolf' Feature of Boston Symphony Program

"Peter and the Wolf," Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale for children, is to be one of the features of the program to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Bushnel Memorial under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky next Tuesday evening. Richard Hale will be the narrator

The program, which is the fourth event of the Bushnell Conert Series of 1939-1940, includes also the Second Symphony of Sibelius and Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12. The Sibelius symphony is considered particularly appropriate at this time. All over the world musicians have signified their interest in Finland's present struggle by scheduling repeatedly the works of the great Finnish composer.

The Prokofieff suite was programmed by the Boston Symphony at the Tanglewood Festival in Stockbridge last summer, having previously been hailed by New York and Brooklyn audiences when the orchestra played it there after it had been the hit of the Pension Fund concert given by the organization in Symphony Hall, Boston, last winter.

"Peter and the Wolf" was written in 1936 and was first performed at a children's concert in Moscow in December of that year. Its subsequent performances, however, have proved that, like all great fairy tales, it is as interesting for adult listeners as for children.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WILSON, N. C.
TIMES

JAN 3 - 1940

ARTS: Plain People Rescue Culture Of America

By JOHN SELBY
Associated Press Arts Editor

Because even millionaires must eat, the entire cultural picture of the United States has changed in 10 years. Now the village doctor helps support the New York Philharmonic and Uncle Joe helps guarantee the Metropolitan Opera.

There was a day when one family, the Esterhazys, supported an opera, an orchestra and even a great composer for their own exclusive enjoyment. Later a Colonel Higgins could shoulder the deficit of the Boston Symphony, and Harry Harkness Flagler could assume the burden of the New York Symphony.

There was also October, 1929.

The virus of October, 1929, worked slowly but effectively. The first break came in March, 1932, when bearded and remote Giulio Gatti-Casazza announced that the Metropolitan's financial backlog was exhausted.

There were many similar breaks over the country.

Yet there were no important casualties among great American orchestras, opera companies, or art museums. Even book publishing, which took a severe beating, lost few important practitioners. Public libraries were hardest hit. Art dealers drew in their horns, and a few important ones closed out. Museum endowments lost income steadily—no final answer has yet been found to that, either.

But generally an answer was found. It was forced on the world. The answer was to broaden the base of support.

One instance was governmental: the federal art projects. By and large these proved there was a popular market for "art," and that "art" could be produced to fit it.

LINE-UP AT THE OPERA: Uncle Joe helps guarantee it.

Privately the situation is similar. Once you could count the men who supported the New York Philharmonic on your fingers and toes; now there are more than 10,000 guarantors.

Where once the Metropolitan opera was almost wholly controlled by the owners of the lower tier boxes, now the owners thereof are trying to sell their holdings to the operating company, and the Metropolitan Opera Guild is lining up other thousands to help. Etchings are being sold for $5 or less; sculpture can be had at bargain rates; popular-priced books are on the make.

The decade closes with the country at large advancing to pay the deficits left behind by art's patrons in their dash for the automat.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, N. J.
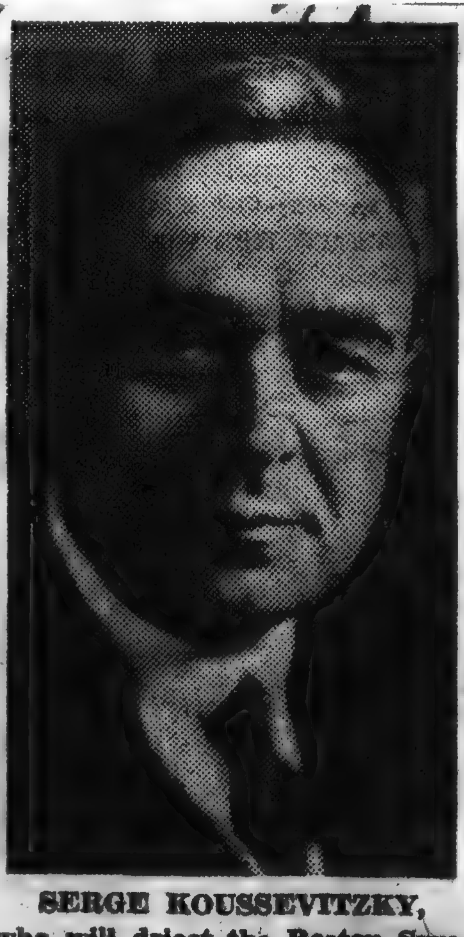
NEWS

JAN 4 - 1940



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY,
who will driect the Boston Symphony in Montclair High School next Wednesday night in a special concert sponsored by Unity Institute.

SOUTH ORANGE, N.J
RECORD
1/5/40

Unity Concert

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest orchestra leaders of our times, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Olin Downes calls "the unsurpassed," at its appearance in the Montclair High School, on January 10, as the extra event in connection with the Unity Concert course.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

JAN 4 - 1940

Boston Symphony Contrasts Styles

Beethoven, Franck, Stravinsky in Sympathetic Reading

The program heard in the Monday-Tuesday series of the Boston Symphony this week was of unusually high character, even for the orchestra that is receiving growing acceptance as the finest in the country. Its contrast choice held interest to the end; it represented three periods of orchestral music, and both Dr. Koussevitzky and his pliant forces were functioning at their best.

The Beethoven First was presented with a magic lightness and fluent grace in the strings that was a veritable fragrance, a restraint in brasses and percussion and infinite variety in repetitive passages. Dr. Koussevitzky gave the impression that he was offering the work of the young Beethoven with a becoming tentative modesty. The Finale reminded of a spirited riding horse kept under perfect control yet allowed its moments of canter.

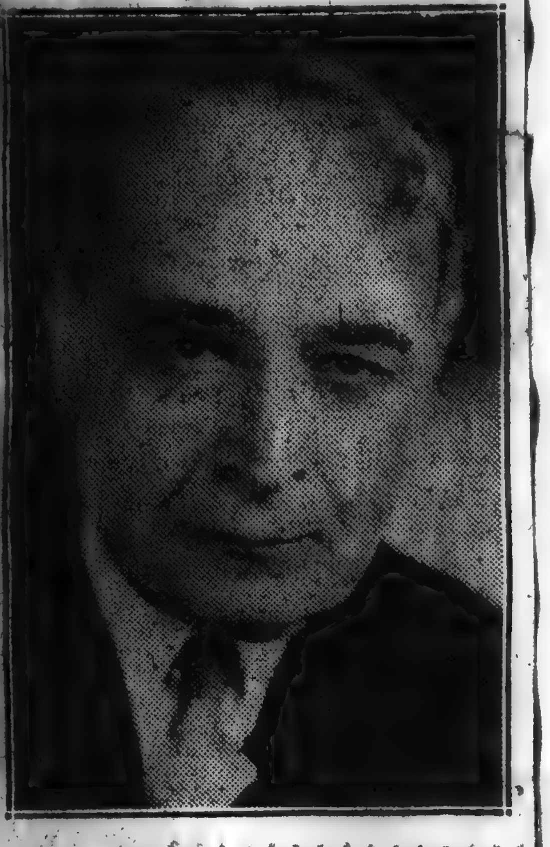
Stravinsky's 10-year-old Capriccio for orchestra with piano solo followed. Jesus Maria Sanroma dominated with arpeggios and trills on the keys while, as an amused hearer remarked, "The orchestra seemed to be expressing individual ideas, now from one corner, now from another, each quite sure of the importance of his own thought." It was in odd tonalities that these conversational outbursts were couched while the piano went on its assured way. Every oddity was a pleasant incident. They will be playing Stravinsky's third movement in the night clubs yet, and like it. The odd thing about a second hearing of this Capriccio in Boston under Koussevitzky is that it appeared a much less fleet tour de force than in Providence recently when the composer directed the same orchestra and pianist.

Completing the program came a Cesar Franck D minor revivified—such freshness of spirit inspired the performers. The first movement seemed contrastingly grandiose after the gay, rippling flow of the Beethoven and the flitting qualities of the Capriccio; but there was a well integrated clarity conceived by a devoutly musical soul. Who could resist the Allegretto, introduced by harp, carried on across the orchestra by plucked strings, warm in instrumental voices merging into Oriental langors and scaling heaven again in its sounded harp at the close? A sharper brilliance than in the first movement was read into the last Allegro non troppo by a quickened spirit in the playing and a responsiveness that sent the themes through subtle changes. A fair and noble symphony.

The first balcony foyer is hung for this week with 25 recent paintings by Marsden Hartley, Maine artist. This is Mr. Hartley's first representative show for Boston. Highly individual in a modern trend, this exhibit is not to be taken lightly. Odd portrait types intrigue, a shadowy dark riverway of Maine wilds carries across the gallery to masterly effect and in French Impressionist mood a "Still life with Rose" may be greeted with real aesthetic joy. A. C. R.

MONTCLAIR, N.J
TIMES
1/5/40

Here Next Week



DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Mixed Program Scheduled Here

Boston Symphony Concert to Include Classical and Modern Music.

Noted for his choice of programs, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct one which combines classical and modern music at Montclair High School Wednesday night, when the Boston Symphony appears as the extra event in connection with Unity Concert Course. His choice of Brahms' Second Symphony and Prokofeff's "Classical" Symphony illustrates the sweep of his program.

In regard to programs Dr. Koussevitsky recently declared: "I would like to make it clear that I am neither modernist nor classicist in my musical preferences. The works of the classic masters are absolutely indispensible to me as a musician and in my life. None would less willingly be without them than I. But music is not a static art. . . .

"Music is constantly being made which is an expression of the period in which it appears. It is as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done. As for the value of new works, a conductor uses his best judgment in producing them. He must leave the rest to the judgment of time."

The orchestra will also play Faure's "Pelleas et Melisande" Suite, written for the Maeterlinck play, and Sibelius' "Finlandia." The two symphonies will precede the shorter numbers, with the Brahms opening the program.

The next concert in the Unity Course series will be given on Jan. 19, when Kerstin Thorborg, Metropolitan Opera contralto, and Emanuel Feuermann, violoncellist, appear in joint recital. Tickets for both concerts are obtainable at Unity Institute, 67 Church Street, telephone Montclair 2-6770.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat-Chronicle
JAN 5 - 1940

A DECADE PASSES—IX

ARTS: Plain People Rescue Culture of America

By JOHN SELBY
Associated Press Arts Editor

Because millionaires must eat, the entire cultural picture of the United States has changed in 10 years. Now the village doctor helps support the New York Philharmonic and Uncle Joe helps guarantee the Metropolitan Opera.

There was a day when one family, the Esterhazys, supported an opera, an orchestra and even a great composer for their own exclusive enjoyment. Later a Colonel Higginson could shoulder the deficit of the Boston Symphony, and Harry Harkness Flager could assume the burden of the New York Symphony.

There was also October, 1929.

The virus of October, 1929, worked slowly but effectively. The first break came in March, 1932, when bearded and remote Giulio Gatti-Casazza announced that the Metropolitan's financial backlog was exhausted.

There were many similar breaks over the country.

Yet there were no important casualties among great American orchestras, opera companies or art museums. Even book publishing, which took a severe beating, lost few important practitioners. Public libraries were hardest hit. Art dealers drew in their horns, and a few important ones closed out. Museum endowments lost income steadily—no final answer has yet been found to that, either.

But generally an answer was found. It was forced on the world. The answer was to broaden the base of support.

One instance was governmental: the federal art projects. By and large these proved there was a popular market for "art," and that "art" could be produced to fit it.

Privately the situation is similar. Once you could count the men who supported the New York Philharmonic on your fingers and toes; now there are more than 10,000 guarantors.

Where once the Metropolitan Opera was almost wholly controlled by the owners of the lower tier boxes, now the owners thereof are trying to sell their holdings to the operating company, and the Metropolitan Opera Guild is lining up other thousands to help. Etchings are being sold for $5 or less; sculpture can be had at bargain rates; popular-priced books are on the make.

The decade closes with the country at large advancing to pay the deficits left behind by art's patrons in their dash for the automat.

BLOOMFIELD, N.J
INDEPENDENT
1/5/40

GLEN RIDGE, N.J
PAPER
1/5/40

KOUSSEVITZKY IS AMONG GREATEST OF CONDUCTORS

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest orchestra leaders of these times, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Olin Downes calls "the unsurpassed," at its appearance in the Montclair High School, Montclair, on January 10th, as the extra event in connection with the Unity concert course.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who for the past 15 seasons has conducted this great orchestra, which a recent magazine writer has called "the greatest orchestra in the world," was born during the Czar's regime in Northern Russia and received his early education in his home town. At the age of 14, he went to Moscow to continue his studies and soon became the double bass soloist in the orchestra of the Imperial Opera. In a few years, he succeeded his teacher as professor of the instrument at the Conservatoire. In 1909, the organized the Koussevitzky Orchestra. It soon became famous in Moscow and was made up of the best players from other Russian orchestras. With this orchestra, he toured Russia and European cities until the beginning of the war. He remianed in Europe until 1920, when he left his native country to settle in Western Europe. In 1921, he formed his "Paris Concerts," which made him famous in France. He soon became popular in London and other Western European cities. In 1924, he came to America as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and, as Olin Downes has said, "America has found Koussevitzky's musicianship and orchestral technique equal to any demands that have been made upon them."

Tickets for this concert are available at the Unity Institue office, 67 Church street, Montclair. Telephone is Montclair 2-6770.

NEW PIECES BY SYMPHONY

Post
Jan 6

Foote's Winter Suite and Bloch's Violin Concerto

A timely, if not altogether tactful gesture on Dr. Koussevitzky's part, was the performance at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon (for the first time anywhere) of George Foote's Suite, "In Praise of Winter." Another first performance, at least so far as Boston was concerned, was that of Ernest Bloch's Concerto for Violin with Joseph Szigeti as soloist. Brahms' very familiar Second Symphony brought the end.

Had Mr. Foote aimed to write a work in dispraise of winter the result might have had made recognizable connection with this particular season. As it turned out, the general mood of the music is so aimiable that it might as well have been inspired by spring. But this is the reaction of the soured city-dweller. The composer's intention, as the programme book disclosed it, was to suggest "the atmosphere of what Thomas Wolfe called 'the beautiful frozen north.'" Wisely, since such literalism is now out of fashion, he gave no titles to the separate movements, presenting them merely as Allegro moderato: Larghetto vivace; Allegretto scherzando and Vivace.

To come to the music as music, it is eclectic in style: sometimes self-consciously contemporaneous, sometime guilelessly reactionary. But reaction or not, it was a pleasure to hear for a change a new work that aimed to please and to stimulate the imagination, rather than to impress, startle or perplex. And that "In Praise of Winter" did please was abundantly proven by applause that was more than polite commendation of a fellow-townsman. Brought to the stage by Dr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Foote was twice brought back by the plaudits of the audience.

A little of Mr. Foote's aimiability would not hurt Mr. Bloch, who in this Concerto, as in many other works, stands badly in need of cheering up. As a matter of fact, much of the last movement has a gaiety and exuberance that was as unexpected as it was welcome. The rest, while often engrossing and sometimes moving, tends to somberness. There is the wailing of "Schelomo" without the compensating splendor. There are outside influences, too, and rather incongruous ones: American Indian and modern French, which is to say, Debussy and Ravel.

The orchestral portion is, on the whole, more rewarding that the solo part. This last was superbly played by Mr. Szigeti, who assisted at the world-premiere of the Concerto in Cleveland in December, 1938, and introduced it to London last April. Since new violin concertos of the calibre of this one are rare indeed, we may be grateful to him and to Dr. Koussevitzky for giving it to us in place of one of the violinistic war-horses.

Globe

MUSIC IN BOSTON

Jan. 6

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Two novelties and the Second Symphony of Brahms were conducted by Serge Koussevitzky at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The new pieces were a suite, "In Praise of Winter," by the Boston composer, George Foote, and the Violin Concerto of Ernest Bloch. Joseph Szigeti was the soloist in the Concerto, which he introduced to Boston. The Foote suite was given its first performance anywhere. . .

When a composer calls his work a violin concerto, anyone who says it isn't lays himself open to being ridiculous. One may nevertheless venture that Bloch's interesting new score is not a concerto according to the traditional rules of the form, but a rhapsody in three movements with a solo violin as leading instrument.

The orchestra plays quite as important a part as the violin, much more so in many places, and in that respect the score is not dissimilar to Strauss' "Don Quixote" or the "Poem" of Chausson. Bloch seems to have given the bigger share of interesting music to the orchestra; while the slow movement contains a solo part of the utmost lyrical beauty, the violin is on the whole treated in a subdued fashion, not to say a little crabbedly.

Bloch disclaims any intended "Jewish" character of the sort that has distinguished other of his works. But his orchestra is full of that Oriental color, opulence and the long-phrased melodies of Hebraic poignance by which we have come to recognize one side of Bloch's art.

During a period when it has been fashionable to compose dry, inexpressive music, Bloch has continued to speak out, to be as emotional—romantic if you like—as he pleased. That independence has given us a number of notable scores which apparently are going to endure. The Violin Concerto may take its place with them. Certainly it ought to be heard again, and before long.

Joseph Szigeti is probably an ideal soloist for the Concerto. A musician of great skill and high standards, he played with a sort of apostolic devotion, completely free from superficial display, an exacting part which the public may not like the first time they hear it. Mr. Szigeti was, it is pleasant to report, cordially applauded.

If George Foote had not given his suite a title, he could have called it a small symphony. The four short movements are analogous in treatment and the way they are placed, to symphonic movements. Esthetically the suite bears out a conviction long felt by this reviewer: that music, untitled and without an acknowledged literary program, may mean many things to many people, no matter what was in the mind of the composer.

This reviewer listened first, then read the program notes. According to the ear, there was nothing especially wintry about Mr. Foote's pleasant suite; according to the composer's statement, it was not intended to be descriptive, beyond the fact that he hoped it "may have something of the atmosphere of what Thomas Wolfe called 'the beautiful frozen North.'"

Mr. Foote's style is eclectic, a style one may judge to be fundamentally diatonic, overlaid with devices of the French impressionists and the modern practice of writing in more than one key at the same time. There is much use of the repetitive formula called the sequence.

When the music is plainly diatonic, then is it most flavorsome, most original, and in a way, American. Mr. Foote bowed from the stage.

Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were at their best the afternoon through. Brahms' D major Symphony was radiantly performed. No wonder applause broke in before the last chord was ended.

C. W. D.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
JAN 6 - 1940

Concert to Be Given By Boston Symphony Next Friday Evening

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will give its second Brooklyn concert in a series of five for the current season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music next Friday evening. The following program will be played: Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" by Mozart; symphony in B flat, No. 1, Op. 38, by Schumann; classical symphony, Op. 25, by Prokofieff; "Pelleas and Melisande," suite from the stage music to Maeterlinck's Tragedy, Op. 80, by Faure, and "Finlandia," symphonic poem, Op. 26, by Sibelius.

The Academy of Music concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are held under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society an da Brooklyn committee.

Next Tuesday afternoon a discussion of the program will be held by Jonathan Schiller, lecturer in music at the institute, who will speak in the lecture hall of the Brooklyn Academy of Music at 4 p. m.

150

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 6 - 1940

Second Sibelius Symphony Called Most Nationalistic

Three outstanding compositions make up the program in which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Bushnell Memorial Tuesday evening in the fourth event of the Bushnell Concert Series.

The program has been announced as follows: Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" and Sibelius' Symphony No. 2 in D major.

Regarding the symphony, Herbert Elwell comments as follows:

"The music of Sibelius has two dominant characteristics. Deeply rooted in the soil of the composer's native Finland, it is perhaps more nationalistic in feeling than almost any other contemporary musical expression. It also reflects the thought of one who finds comfort and expansion of the spirit in his communion with nature.

'Dreamer and Poet'

"'It is true,' writes Sibelius, 'I am a dreamer and a poet of nature. I love the mysterious sounds of the fields and forests, water and mountains.'

'And through his music runs that unmistakable impress of his from urban conventionality. He has captured something of the imponderable silence of snow and ice, the barrenness of windswept plains, the majesty and mystery of the vast raw expanses of the North.

"This response to the call of wild, primal forces Sibelius inherited from his ancestors, whose legends and epics he has translated into his music, as Wagner did the stories of Teutonic gods, in his music dramas. The nationalistic impulse was too strong in Sibelius to be stilled by electicism, or the influence of German scholasticism with which the composer must have come into contact during his years of study in Berlin.

'National Hero'

"It communicates itself in a language so completely in harmony with the qualities and aspirations of his countrymen that it has made of its author a national hero. Not only has Sibelius received from the people of Finland high honor, affection and admiration, but—unparalleled in the annals of music—his government provides him with a generous annuity which allows him to devote himself completely to the art which, in a large measure, he has consecrated to the unfolding of racial genius.

"Of Sibelius' seven symphonies, the second completed in 1902, and produced at Helsingfors the same year, is tinged even more than the others with nationalistic sympathies. According to Georg Schneevoigt, its first movement depicts the peaceful rural life of the Finns, the second, their brooding under foreign oppression; and the third, their hope of independence."

Herald Jan 6

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 11th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Joseph Szigeti, violinist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Suite, "In Praise of Winter"..George Foote
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra.....Bloch
Symphony No. 2 in D major Op. 73..Brahms

Bloch's Violin Concerto is certainly the most interesting of the unfamiliar scores heard so far this season. Its virtues do not lie in any remarkable success as a violin concerto, if we take that term a little more strictly than most modern composers bother to do. In that genre Bloch's work is inferior to Sibelius's Violin Concerto or the Second of Prokofieff. But as a symphonic rhapsody, with a great deal of independent melodic line handed to the violin, it must be regarded as of unusual significance.

Its fault for us is one that is common to all of Bloch's better scores and is quite properly ignored by the composer's admirers, because for them it does not exist as a blemish. We refer to the singular monotony of mood, sustained by the harmony, which is only broken by the "pastoral" section in the finale and not very sharply broken even then. This "sort of universal dovetailedness," as Mr. Curdle observed to Nicholas Nickelby, is for some listeners a merit. As the Concerto was not long, a spirited defense could be made in support of this contention. We can only repeat that for us it constitutes a defect, particularly in music that involves a solo instrument.

Bloch's idiom is very individual and profoundly emotional. It is always impressive in his better works and sometimes tedious. In the work under discussion he wrote, we may hazard, at his best. The compactness and density of the music, wrought by the close relation of themes, is propelled by the sincere, and gloomy, emotional force.

The commentator in the leaflet accompanying the recording by Columbia of this Concerto finds a great deal more emotional variety than we do. He also rather wistfully gropes about for a program. We cannot keep him company. Bloch's music is almost always a wail, and here it is a more eloquent wail than ever.

Mr. Szigeti gave an extraordinarily fine performance of the solo part. He has made it very much his own, for as far as we know there have been no performances without him as soloist. His playing as playing was superb; and we may be confident that the interpretation by him and Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra was all that the composer could ask.

A Suite, "In Praise of Winter," by the New England composer, George Foote, was played for the first time yesterday. "Sinfonietta" might be a better title, for we are accustomed to think of suites as comprising a selection of dance or theater music. Also Mr. Foote has only remotely written descriptive music, for this work could quite as well make its way without any program at all.

The best movements are the first and the scherzo. Mr. Foote is inclined to overdo his sequences, so that we get a little tired of this trick where it is most prominent in the finale. The slow movement is a bit tenuous for what it has to say. (Mr. Foote might retort that winter is like that. But recollect that he is supposed to be hailing that season with cries of pleasure.) The other two movements are agreeable music attractively set forth. Mr. Foote came forward to receive the cordial applause.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave a most sonorous and vital performance of Brahms's Second Symphony. This thrice-familiar music emerged as freshly under his guidance as if we were coming back to it after long absence. What with the radio nowadays, that is hardly possible in practice. Therefore we rely on conductor and orchestra to renew it for us spiritually by the qualities of their interpretation.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will be out of town. In its place Symphony Hall will be visited by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy on Saturday night only.

BLOCH CONCERTO

Premiere by Koussevitzky, Szigeti Reveals Bloch Turned Philosopher

Two premieres adorned the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which was given under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall: George Foote's pleasant suite, "In Praise of Winter." performed for the first time anywhere, and Ernest Bloch's deeply introspective Violin Concerto which had its first Boston performance with Joseph Szigeti as soloist. The remainder of the afternoon was given over to Brahms' Second Symphony in D major.

Though Ernest Bloch speaks a familiar language in his new work, a language which is unmistakably his own, yet he speaks it with a new accent. His intuitions and feelings have changed with time more than the vocabulary he uses to express them. Thus though he has left behind him the savage exultation,' the wild laments and volcanic emotions, the barbaric colors and stressful rhythms of such works as the Three Jewish Pieces or his Piano Quintet—though he has turned philosopher and sings with greater reticence and depth, yet his fundamental materials remain the same. There are the familiar stark fourths, the poignant major and minor seconds, rhythmic patterns that in anyone else's hands would long since have become stereotypes but which in Bloch give an impression of endless fertility.

One reason Bloch's musical speech has not the shop-worn sound of many styles that are chronologically younger than his is that he has never been primarily interested in style, but in what he had to say. This is one of the most fundamental differences between Bloch and certain of his contemporaries who took seriously the dictum: "It's not what you say, but how you say it." Bloch thought differently. To paraphrase Lewis Carroll, he took care of the sense and lo-the sounds have taken care of themselves.

As the medium to present this new thing which Bloch has to say, Joseph Szigeti is a felicitous choice. A smooth craftsman, an artist who thinks subtlely, he plays with an intense inward glow which never breaks into gaudy flame or mere catchpenny pyrotechnics.

Above all the Andante of the Concerto benefited from these characteristics — an andante different from those of the early Bloch, so much quieter, one had almost said simpler, for the total effect is of simplicity, and yet probably one of the finest slow movements Bloch thas penned.

Here, and in the other movements of the Concerto, the themes grow organically, spread and develop into luxuriant foliage, which is governed by the logic of its own natural laws. Nothing is forced. On the contrary, the whole work has a subdued beauty which, though it may lack the immediate appeal of some earlier Bloch works, grows upon the listener even at a first hearing.

"In Praise of Winter," George Foote's suite, that opened the program, though no world-storming masterpiece, is written with a strong lyric vein, a mildly exuberant tone and refreshing optimism. It is entertaining without being oppressviely clever about it or terrifyingly sophisticated. Its chief weakness lies in the modern passages that are thrown, without much conviction or logic, here and there, into a prevailingly conservative muscial structure. The rest of the work has a spontaneous, native grace.

After the intermission, Dr. Koussevitzky and his men gave an interpretation of Brahms's Second Symphony that made everything that had gone before, important as it may have appeared, seem Lilliputian. Not only its tonal and architectural splendor but an emotional impact from which no one in the hall could escape made the hearing of this performance a privilege which the audience showed they appreciated when the time came for applause. E. D.

Nikolai Malko, the Russian conductor, a resident of Copenhagen, now visiting this country, will come to Boston to conduct the next pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. These concerts will follow the orchestra's second visit to New York (which occurs the coming week), and will take place in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, Jan. 19, and Saturday evening, Jan. 20.

Rossini's Overture to "La Gazza Ladra"; the First Symphony of Shostakovitch; Max Reger's Variations on a Theme of Mozart; and Tchaikovsky's Capriccio Italien will be offered at these two concerts as well as for the program at Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on Thursday evening, Jan. 18.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
JAN 6 - 1940

Champion of American Music

By THEODOLINDA C. BORIS

HERE and there throughout the land has been heard of late a new counterpoint on an old theme—the American composer and the press. From the typewriters and ink-pots of native composers, music-lovers and music critics have come fugal treatments of the theme in article and letter.

The current discussion arose after the presentation in New York City by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky of two concerts devoted entirely to works by native composers. Edward Kurtz, head of the music department in Iowa State Teachers College, took the New York critics to task for "throwing cold water on the all-American programs."

Composers Roy Harris, Bernard Rogers and Otto Luening are among those who have taken up the cudgels for the American composer, while the comment of Gene Buck, president of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers, in his recent address before the New York Federation of Music Clubs that American symphonic orchestras, prominent conductors as well as music critics are "snobbish" in their attitude toward American music has been widely noted.

This column was reminded of this lively subject—a discussion of which, because of space considerations, must be postponed to a future date—by the lecture-recital to be given Thursday evening by Dr. Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music, and a recognized promoter of American music. Here is a man, a noted musician, composer and educator, who has made his name blessed among American composers, for he has championed their cause not only with words but with concrete service in the form of orchestral concerts of manuscript works by native composers.

Dr. Hanson will speak on the subject "From a Composer's Workshop," and those who know his sense of humor know that the lecture will be entertaining as well as educational. The lecture, sponsored by the Music Forum for Piano Teachers, will be held in Norton Hall, University of Buffalo campus, at 8:45 o'clock. Miss Mary E. Moore is chairman of arrangements.

—Dr. Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music, who will address the Music Forum for Piano Teachers here on Thursday evening in Norton Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM AKRON, OHIO
BEACON-JOURNAL
JAN 7 - 1940

HIS U. S. DEBUT

Nicolai Malko, Russian conductor, will make his American debut as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the series from Jan. 15 to 22. Malko is well known in Europe, where he is permanent conductor of the Copenhagen symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
JAN 7 - 1940

International

Finland has given permission for the distinguished conductor, Tauno Hannikainen to fulfil his engagement in America next month. Listed to conduct the Boston Symphony during Dr. Koussevitsky's mid-winter holiday, it was feared that the war situation would change all that. Finland fulfills its obligations, as we know by this time—politically and

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL
JAN 7 - 1940

Negro Soprano Will Sing At Benefit for Orchestra

Dorothy Maynor, the senational Negro soprano who was discovered only last summer by Serge Koussevitzky at the Berkshire music festival, will be soloist with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony at a special concert on Jan. 16 for the benefit of the orchestra pension fund.

Miss Maynor made her New York concert debut last month. Almost unheralded except by word of mouth, she was an instant success. Since then, she has been acclaimed in Boston, Toronto, Montreal and a few other cities.

She plans to limit her concert engagements during the coming year, devoting her time to study and enlargement of her repertoire.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
JAN 6 - 1940

Szigeti and Sanroma Soloists With Koussevitzky

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its second visit of the season to New York concerts in Carnegie Hall, next Thursday evening, January 11, and Saturday afternoon, January 13.

At the Thursday evening concert the Violin Concerto of Ernest Bloch will have its first New York performance, the soloist being Joseph Szigeti, who presented the Concerto at its first hearings in America and in London. Mr. Szigeti performed the Concerto in Boston at the symphony concerts of the week past. the program will open with Mo- First Symphony of Beethoven in C major, and close with the Second Symphony of Sibelius in D major.

The Capriccio for Orchestra with Piano Solo, by Igor Stravinsky, will be presented at the matinee performance, Jesus Maria Sanroma appearing as soloist. It was Mr. Sanroma who, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky, gave the Capriccio its first American performances in 1930. The program will open with Mozart's Symphony in C major, No. 34, and close with the Second Symphony of Brahms in D major.

The orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky will play at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Friday evening, January 12. The program will be the following: Mozart, Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"; Shumann, Symphony in B flat; Prokofieff, Classical symphony; Faure, "Pelleas and Melisande" Suite, and Sibelius, "Finlandia."

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES-DISPATCH
JAN 7 - 1940

151

THIS CLIPPING FROM BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS
JAN 7 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DURHAM, N. C.
HERALD
JAN 7 - 1940

'All Women' Symphony Group to Make Debut in Boston

By Bernard Freeman

BOSTON, (AP)—On the theory that women are as good musicians as men, a new symphony orchestra composed entirely of women has been organized here and will give its first concert January 16.

Every one connected with the venture, from the 69-year-old white-haired grandmother who plays the French horn down to a 16-year-old high school girl violinist, is on the distaff side—that is, every one except the conductor, a tall handsome Pennsylvanian named Alexander Thiede.

A "boy prodigy" of the violin who at the age of 17 was first violinist of the Detroit Symphony under Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Thiede has some pretty definite ideas on what makes a symphony orchestra click.

There have been several women's orchestras in America—all led by women—but none of them ever has lasted.

Thiede says it's because they lacked a man at the helm.

Play As Well As Men

"Women are every bit as good players as men," he said, "but they simply won't take orders from another woman. You know how it is—personal jealousies and outbursts of temperament—one woman thinks the conductor is wearing a better dress than the one she has on, and they simply don't co-ordinate.

"But this group, I am glad to say, is working very harmoniously, and because of that I believe we are attaining a degree of proficiency comparable to some men's orchestras of standing."

Thiede, who at the age of 29 was concertmaster of the St. Louis Symphony, says his bassoon player, Miss Anne de Guichard, is one of the world's finest players, male or female.

"A top-ranking conductor told me recently that 'if she only wore pants I would take her into my orchestra in a minute.'"

In addition, there are two Junior Leaguers, Mary Driver, who plays the violin, and Peggy Stuart, pianist, as well as numerous music teachers and wives of symphony musicians.

The symphony of 75 players has drawn commendation from famed Conductor Serge Koussevitzky for the calibre of programs it will play.

Anton Rubinstein's "Ocean Symphony," which hasn't been played in Boston since 1903, is on the first program, and Alexander Borodin's second symphony, also infrequently heard, is on the fourth and last concert.

Encourage Players, Composers

Thiede, who also was first violinist for 10 years under Leopold Stokowski in Philadelphia, lists two major objectives.

The first is educational—to encourage women to express themselves in a field in which they, by natural equipment and conscientious study and support, have a rightful place—and the second is to provide a hearing for the less frequently played works of both American and foreign-born composers—especially women.

Thiede hopes to make his orchestra the model from which other women's orchestras will be organized all over the nation.

"Up to now, most women's orchestras—and men's, too, for that matter,—have been 'angelled' by three or four wealthy subscribers.

"However, our group is out for mass support. Each of our players pays dues for an active membership in the society. The public is invited to purchase associate memberships. Through these memberships we expect to pay whatever expenses we may incur, leaving box office receipts to go towards reimbursing the players. Obviously, mass support is far preferable to leaving the fate of an orchestra to the whims of a handful of benefactors."

Meanwhile, the orchestra rehearses at least once a week without any squabbles—all because, one said, "Mr. Thiede wears the pants."

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
JAN 7 - 1940

~~A Composer~~ Here Friday

Copland to Speak for Pro Musica

"Modern Piano Music" will be discussed by Aaron Copland, American composer, next Friday evening in the Detroit Institute of Arts lecture hall at the second Pro Musica concert of the season.

Copland will illustrate his remarks by playing selections from the works of Milhaud, Stravinsky, Poulenc, Chaves, Prokofieff, and others.

The composer recently returned from Hollywood, where he wrote the music for the motion picture version of Steinbeck's "Of Mice and Men." He has been appointed teacher of composition at the new Berkshire Music Center, headed by Serge Koussevitzky. He is also a member ~~of the~~ executive board of the League of Composers and a director of the International Society for Contemporary Music, United States section.

A native of Brooklyn, N. Y., Copland studied piano and later composition. His teachers were Rubin Goldmark and Nadia Boulanger, who was presented by Detroit chapter of Pro Musica last season. He was first composer to be awarded a Guggenheim Fellowship.

As soloist in his own works, he has appeared with the leading American symphony orchestras. Recently his "El Salon Mexico" was performed in St. Louis, Chicago and Dallas and in November his "Outdoor Overture" was played by the Pittsburgh Symphony, Fritz Reiner conducting.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Brooklyn
JAN 7 - 1940

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS HERE FRIDAY

Sibelius's 'Finlandia' Included in Koussevitzky Offerings at Academy of Music

STEINBERG RECITAL TODAY

Violinist to Appear in Young Artists Series—Other Plans of Local Concert-Givers

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conducting, wil give a concert Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, it was announced yesterday. The concert is the second in a series of five under the sponsorship of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

The program will include Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"; Schumann's Symphony in B flat, No. 1, Op. 38; Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, Op. 25; Fauré's "Pelléas and Mélisande" Suite, Op. 80, and Sibelius's "Finlandia," Symphonic Poem, Op. 26.

On Tuesday at 4 P. M. Jonathan Schiller will discuss the program at the Brooklyn Academy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM JACKSON, MISS.
NEWS
JAN 7 - 1940

RECITAL DUE THURSDAY IN MUSIC SERIES

The Jackson Music Association, as its second number on the 1940 concert series, will present Rosalyn Tureck, gifted young American pianist, and Orlando Barera, noted violinist, in joint recital at the City Auditorium, Thursday evening.

Jackson for the first time is included on one of Miss Tureck's tours of the United States. Hailed by music lovers as one of the most brilliant artists to appear on the concert stage in years, Miss Tureck should prove one of the most interesting artists to appear in Jackson this season.

Linked with her will be Mr. Barera, who is on his third American tour. Appearing as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Koussevitsky, a year ago, he won great praise. The Washington Evening Star said:

"Orlando Barera, whose debut here last year left a vivid impression of his artistry, confirmed that remembrance by his smooth and soulful playing yesterday. While confining himself to a purely lyric program with even Paganini's "I Palpiti" conforming to that classification, his beautiful tone and suave delivery had ample occasion to work their spell an appreciative audience. Gifted with abundant temperament, he nevertheless holds it discreetly from any rough display and bends it to an elegant and warmly-hued line of expressiveness. His technique is clear and swift, yet graceful and his tone carries modulation of feeling of no mean dimensions."

The Tureck-Barera concert here is the second presentation of the Jackson Music Association this season. The Don Cossacks Russian chorus previously appeared, and the Jooss European Ballet is scheduled in February, followed by the St. Louis Symphony in March.

Persons who do not have season membership in the concert association may secure tickets for a single concert through Armand Coullet, concert manager, whose headquarters are the lobby of the Robert E. Lee hotel. Dr. A. P. Hamilton is president of the association.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHARLESTON, W. VA.
MAIL
JAN 7 - 1940

Artist Series Will Resume

State College Plans Recital by Pianist

After a holiday vacation, the West Virginia State college Artist series will resume Sunday, Jan. 14 with a recital by William Allen, pianist and pupil of Egon Petri, T. D. Phillips, director of music at the college, announced Saturday.

Mr. Allen is a graduate of Oberlin conservatory, where he obtained both his bachelor and master of music degrees. Upon completing his musical studies there, he spent two years at the Institute of Musical Art in New York City. He also studied several seasons with Mr. Petri and completed a term with him just before the beginning of the war.

The pianist has been a member of the Howard university faculty, Washington, D. C., and is now a member of the staff at Fish university, Nashville, Tenn. He is at present studying at the Juillard School of Music. His program will include music by Bach-Busoni, Cesar Franck, Chopin and a group by Negro composers.

The outbreak of the war in Europe has forced a change in the artist program, Mr. Phillips said. Members of the Pasquier Trio, scheduled to play at Institute on Feb. 11th, have been unable to leave France because they are subject to call for military duty. Dorothy Maynor, young Negro soprano, whose debut in New York this winter was hailed as the "discovery of the season," will replace the trio with a recital March 18.

Since her discovery by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, and her Town Hall debut, Miss Maynor has been booked to appear with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony society, the Boston Symphony, the St. Louis Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Post

IT SEEMS ~~HE~~ WILL BE A FIREMAN

6-Year-Old Wonder Doesn't Intend to Become a Critic

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

THE recent Cantabrigian pother about the names Lenin and Leningrad recall to some an incident which occurred shortly after Dr. Koussevitzky came to Boston. Setting down Tchaikovsky's dates in the programme book, Philip Hale had the composer dying, not in St. Petersburg, or Petrograd, but in Leningrad, the then new official name for the city on the Neva. Immediately a certain publication thought that it smelled a rat and, putting two and two together to make five, jumped to the conclusion that the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra was a Bolshevik and had dictated the use of the odious name in the programme notes.

If the City Council's resolution were to become a law, the good Cambridgeites could not carry home their symphony programmes, nor could these be distributed at the Sanders Theatre concerts, when Leningrad was mentioned in the notes, unless Mr. Burke were to change his ways. Fortunately for all concerned, that situation will not have to be faced.

* * * *

Speaking of music critics, 6-year-old Alan Bendiner of New York city, whose precocious skill in identifying musical themes made him the winner of a recent radio-quiz, has already acquired one important part of the music reviewer's equipment. But it seems that his ambition is to be a fireman. Perhaps he is right. That life would be less monotonous. Very few buildings burn more than once.

Probably if would be just as well if the music critics in a body did not have to take one of these tune-identification tests, even in their own particular sphere. There are too many instances of the boners they have pulled in this direction when commenting on things they thought they heard but didn't. At one of his summer concerts in Paris, not so many years ago, Dr. Koussevitzky played a Brahms symphony that was not the one he had first announced. Too frugal to spend an extra franc for a house programme, the critics, to a man, discussed the wrong symphony. With Beethoven, of course, they would have been on solider ground. Brahms never was a popular composer in France.

* * * *

And speaking of Russia, Nikolai Malko, a native of that country who for the past 10 years has been located in Denmark, will appear as guest-conductor at the next pair of Symphony Concerts, those of Jan. 19 and 20. He will give us the First Symphony of the Soviet composer, Shostakovitch, introduced here by Mr. Burgin, and Tchaikovsky's "Italian Caprice," together with two by no means new works which have never been played at these concerts, Rossini's Overture to "La Gazza Ladra" and Reger's Variations on a Theme of Mozart.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JAN 7 - 1940

Symphony Concert on Friday

The second concert af the season in Brooklyn of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place on Friday evening in the Opera House of the Academy of Music.

Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, executive chairman of the Brooklyn Committee for Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman, has announced the following box holders for this concert: Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Banjamin Prince, the Brooklyn Woman's Club, Adelphi Alumnae, Berkeley Alumnae, Mrs. Helen Jones Quinn and officers and guests of the Fort Hamilton Army Post.

Under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony will present a program of orchestral music, including works by Mozart, Schumann, Prokofieff, Faure and Sibelius.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts are in their 54th season in Brooklyn and are given under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which James G. McDonald is president; the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, of which R. Huntington Woodman is president, and the Brooklyn Committee.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES-DISPATCH

JAN 7 - 1940

157

THIS CLIPPING FROM BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS

JAN 7 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DURHAM, N. C.
HERALD

JAN 7 - 1940

'All Women' Symphony Group to Make Debut in Boston

By Bernard Freeman

BOSTON, (AP)—On the theory that women are as good musicians as men, a new symphony orchestra composed entirely of women has been organized here and will give its first concert January 16.

Every one connected with the venture, from the 69-year-old white-haired grandmother who plays the French horn down to a 16-year-old high school girl violinist, is on the distaff side—that is, every one except the conductor, a tall handsome Pennsylvanian named Alexander Thiede.

A "boy prodigy" of the violin who at the age of 17 was first violinist of the Detroit Symphony under Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Thiede has some pretty definite ideas on what makes a symphony orchestra click.

There have been several women's orchestras in America—all led by women—but none of them ever has lasted.

Thiede says it's because they lacked a man at the helm.

Play As Well As Men

"Women are every bit as good players as men," he said, "but they simply won't take orders from another woman. You know how it is —personal jealousies and outbursts of temperament—one woman thinks the conductor is wearing a better dress than the one she has on, and they simply don't co-ordinate.

"But this group, I am glad to say, is working very harmoniously, and because of that I believe we are attaining a degree of proficiency comparable to some men's orchestras of standing."

Thiede, who at the age of 29 was concertmaster of the St. Louis Symphony, says his bassoon player, Miss Anne de Guichard, is one of the world's finest players, male or female.

"A top-ranking conductor told me recently that 'if she only wore pants I would take her into my orchestra in a minute.'"

In addition, there are two Junior Leaguers, Mary Driver, who plays the violin, and Peggy Stuart, pianist, as well as numerous music teachers and wives of symphony musicians.

The symphony of 75 players has drawn commendation from famed Conductor Serge Koussevitzky for the calibre of programs it will play.

Anton Rubinstein's "Ocean Symphony," which hasn't been played in Boston since 1903, is on the first program, and Alexander Borodin's second symphony, also infrequently heard, is on the fourth and last concert.

Encourage Players, Composers

Thiede, who also was first violinist for 10 years under Leopold Stokowski in Philadelphia, lists two major objectives.

The first is educational—to encourage women to express themselves in a field in which they, by natural equipment and conscientious study and support, have a rightful place—and the second is to provide a hearing for the less frequently played works of both American and foreign-born composers—especially women.

Thiede hopes to make his orchestra the model from which other women's orchestras will be organized all over the nation.

"Up to now, most women's orchestras—and men's, too, for that matter,—have been 'angelled' by three or four wealthy subscribers.

"However, our group is out for mass support. Each of our players pays dues for an active membership in the society. The public is invited to purchase associate memberships. Through these memberships we expect to pay whatever expenses we may incur, leaving box office receipts to go towards reimbursing the players. Obviously, mass support is far preferable to leaving the fate of an orchestra to the whims of a handful of benefactors."

Meanwhile, the orchestra rehearses at least once a week without any squabbles—all because, one said, "Mr. Thiede wears the pants."

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

JAN 7 - 1940

~~A Composer~~ Here Friday

Copland to Speak for Pro Musica

"Modern Piano Music" will be discussed by Aaron Copland, American composer, next Friday evening in the Detroit Institute of Arts lecture hall at the second Pro Musica concert of the season.

Copland will illustrate his remarks by playing selections from the works of Milhaud, Stravinsky, Poulenc, Chaves, Prokofieff, and others.

The composer recently returned from Hollywood, where he wrote the music for the motion picture version of Steinbeck's "Of Mice and Men." He has been appointed teacher of composition at the new Berkshire Music Center, headed by Serge Koussevitzky. He is also a member of the executive board of the League of Composers and a director of the International Society for Contemporary Music, United States section.

A native of Brooklyn, N. Y., Copland studied piano and later composition. His teachers were Rubin Goldmark and Nadia Boulanger, who was presented by Detroit chapter of Pro Musica last season. He was first composer to be awarded a Guggenheim Fellowship.

As soloist in his own works, he has appeared with the leading American symphony orchestras. Recently his "El Salon Mexico" was performed in St. Louis, Chicago and Dallas and in November his "Outdoor Overture" was played by the Pittsburgh Symphony, Fritz Reiner conducting.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Brooklyn
JAN 7 - 1940

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS HERE FRIDAY

Sibelius's 'Finlandia' Included in Koussevitzky Offerings at Academy of Music

STEINBERG RECITAL TODAY

Violinist to Appear in Young Artists Series—Other Plans of Local Concert-Givers

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conducting, wil give a concert Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, it was announced yesterday. The concert is the second in a series of five under the sponsorship of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

The program will include Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"; Schumann's Symphony in B flat, No. 1, Op. 38; Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, Op. 25; Fauré's "Pelléas and Mélisande" Suite, Op. 80, and Sibelius's "Finlandia," Symphonic Poem, Op. 26.

On Tuesday at 4 P. M. Jonathan Schiller will discuss the program at the Brooklyn Academy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM JACKSON, MISS.
NEWS

JAN 7 - 1940

RECITAL DUE THURSDAY IN MUSIC SERIES

The Jackson Music Association, as its second number on the 1940 concert series, will present Rosalyn Tureck, gifted young American pianist, and Orlando Barera, noted violinist, in joint recital at the City Auditorium, Thursday evening.

Jackson for the first time is included on one of Miss Tureck's tours of the United States. Hailed by music lovers as one of the most brilliant artists to appear on the concert stage in years, Miss Tureck should prove one of the most interesting artists to appear in Jackson this season.

Linked with her will be Mr. Barera, who is on his third American tour. Appearing as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Koussevitsky, a year ago, he won great praise. The Washington Evening Star said:

"Orlando Barera, whose debut here last year left a vivid impression of his artistry, confirmed that remembrance by his smooth and soulful playing yesterday. While confining himself to a purely lyric program with even Paganini's "I Palpiti" conforming to that classification, his beautiful tone and suave delivery had ample occasion to work their spell [illegible] an appreciative audience. Gifted with abundant temperament, he nevertheless holds it discreetly from any rough display and bends it to an elegant and warmly-hued line of expressiveness. His technique is clear and swift, yet graceful and his tone carries modulation of feeling of no mean dimensions."

The Tureck-Barera concert here is the second presentation of the Jackson Music Association this season. The Don Cossacks Russian chorus previously appeared, and the Jooss European Ballet is scheduled in February, followed by the St. Louis Symphony in March.

Persons who do not have season membership in the concert association may secure tickets for a single concert through Armand Coullet, concert manager, whose headquarters are the lobby of the Robert E. Lee hotel. Dr. A. P. Hamilton is president of the association.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHARLESTON, W. VA.
MAIL

JAN 7 - 1940

Artist Series Will Resume

State College Plans Recital by Pianist

After a holiday vacation, the West Virginia State college Artist series will resume Sunday, Jan. 14 with a recital by William Allen, pianist and pupil of Egon Petri, T. D. Phillips, director of music at the college, announced Saturday.

Mr. Allen is a graduate of Oberlin conservatory, where he obtained both his bachelor and master of music degrees. Upon completing his musical studies there, he spent two years at the Institute of Musical Art in New York City. He also studied several seasons with Mr. Petri and completed a term with him just before the beginning of the war.

The pianist has been a member of the Howard university faculty, Washington, D. C., and is now a member of the staff at Fish university, Nashville, Tenn. He is at present studying at the Juilliard School of Music. His program will include music by Bach-Busoni, Cesar Franck, Chopin and a group by Negro composers.

The outbreak of the war in Europe has forced a change in the artist program, Mr. Phillips said. Members of the Pasquier Trio, scheduled to play at Institute on Feb. 11th, have been unable to leave France because they are subject to call for military duty. Dorothy Maynor, young Negro soprano, whose debut in New York this winter was hailed as the "discovery of the season," will replace the trio with a recital March 18.

Since her discovery by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, and her Town Hall debut, Miss Maynor has been booked to appear with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony society, the Boston Symphony, the St. Louis Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Post
Jan 7

IT SEEMS ~~HE~~ WILL BE A FIREMAN

6-Year-Old Wonder Doesn't Intend to Become a Critic

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

THE recent Cantabrigian pother about the names Lenin and Leningrad recall to some an incident which occurred shortly after Dr. Koussevitzky came to Boston. Setting down Tchaikovsky's dates in the programme book, Philip Hale had the composer dying, not in St. Petersburg, or Petrograd, but in Leningrad, the then new official name for the city on the Neva. Immediately a certain publication thought that it smelled a rat and, putting two and two together to make five, jumped to the conclusion that the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra was a Bolshevik and had dictated the use of the odious name in the programme notes.

If the City Council's resolution were to become a law, the good Cambridgeites could not carry home their symphony programmes, nor could these be distributed at the Sanders Theatre concerts, when Leningrad was mentioned in the notes, unless Mr. Burke were to change his ways. Fortunately for all concerned, that situation will not have to be faced.

* * * *

Speaking of music critics, 6-year-old Alan Bendiner of New York city, whose precocious skill in identifying musical themes made him the winner of a recent radio-quiz, has already acquired one important part of the music reviewer's equipment. But it seems that his ambition is to be a fireman. Perhaps he is right. That life would be less monotonous. Very few buildings burn more than once.

Probably if would be just as well if the music critics in a body did not have to take one of these tune-identification tests, even in their own particular sphere. There are too many instances of the boners they have pulled in this direction when commenting on things they thought they heard but didn't. At one of his summer concerts in Paris, not so many years ago, Dr. Koussevitzky played a Brahms symphony that was not the one he had first announced. Too frugal to spend an extra franc for a house programme, the critics, to a man, discussed the wrong symphony. With Beethoven, of course, they would have been on solider ground. Brahms never was a popular composer in France.

* * * *

And speaking of Russia, Nikolai Malko, a native of that country who for the past 10 years has been located in Denmark, will appear as guest-conductor at the next pair of Symphony Concerts, those of Jan. 19 and 20. He will give us the First Symphony of the Soviet composer, Shostakovitch, introduced here by Mr. Burgin, and Tchaikovsky's "Italian Caprice," together with two by no means new works which have never been played at these concerts, Rossini's Overture to "La Gazza Ladra" and Reger's Variations on a Theme of Mozart.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 7 - 1940

Symphony Concert on Friday

The second concert af the season in Brooklyn of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place on Friday evening in the Opera House of the Academy of Music.

Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, executive chairman of the Brooklyn Committee for Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman, has announced the following box holders for this concert: Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Banjamin Prince, the Brooklyn Woman's Club, Adelphi Alumnae, Berkeley Alumnae, Mrs. Helen Jones Quinn and officers and guests of the Fort Hamilton Army Post.

Under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony will present a program of orchestral music, including works by Mozart, Schumann, Prokofieff, Faure and Sibelius.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts are in their 54th season in Brooklyn and are given under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which James G. McDonald is president; the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, of which R. Huntington Woodman is president, and the Brooklyn Committee.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 7 - 1940

ON CONTEMPORARY AMERICAN MUSIC

The author of the following article has been director of the Composers' Forum-Laboratory since its inception.

By ASHLEY PETTIS

THERE is no phase of music which is more ineptly discussed than the music of our own day, variously referred to as "modern" or "contemporary" music. The description of unfamiliar music is a task of great difficulty. By the use of technical terms, analogies from other arts or means of expression, descriptive words or phrases, some idea of the nature of a composition may be conveyed to those who have not heard it. Such "analyses" of a composition are eminently successful, when expertly treated, in the case of familiar music, let us say Beethoven's Fifth symphony. However, this success is not due primarily to the skill with which the analysis is made but because we all know the Fifth. We have heard it. We have experienced it.

* * *

The technical methods employed in the handling of the composer's materials may be adequately described; his technical shortcomings, as well as his achievements, weighed with considerable accuracy. Yet the ultimate result depends, not solely upon the manner of the composer's handling of these materials, but upon their nature. The latter is primarily what the audience responds to. Their quality may be either enhanced or damaged in the usage. Ultimately, there exists an interdependence between the nature of the materials and their "handling" in any work of art which may be described as successful in the highest sense.

The Composers' Forum-Laboratory, a unit of the Music Education Division of the Federal Music Project, Work Project Administration, since 1935, has afforded an invaluable and unique opportunity to become intimately acquainted with a vast amount of music which has been or is being written in America. The various case histories of composers who have appeared show conclusively that the Composers' Forum-Laboratory has supplied an enormous incentive to the contemporary creative musician. He has learned how to handle his materials more adequately. He has discovered what "reaches" the audience. If he has the capacity for self-criticism (and he should give up composition if he has not), he has in many instances either rewritten compositions or rejected them, as a result of his experience in the forum-laboratory. His capacity for self-criticism has been increased. Some composers affect a defensive attitude. They excuse anything, no matter how ineffective, on the grounds that they "felt" or "heard" it that way. If no one else "hears" or "feels" it the same way, some one is at fault—and it is not always the audience.

* * *

Much of the "new" music comes under the heading of that which adequately may be described, inasmuch as it resembles something we have formerly experienced. It is merely an old friend in new or different trappings. In that case one is spared the trouble of analysis. Perhaps it is a case of "history repeating itself."

In one of the concerts of the Forum-Laboratory, I thought I detected a familiar quality in the opening subject of a work which was performed. In itself this "familiar" quality is not the logical basis for rejecting a composition. Instances could be cited in which many great composers have used identical motives, each in a manner not to be confused with another. A notable example of this is to be found in the beginning of Scarlat-ti's so-called E minor "Pastorale," which is also the initial motive of the three part Invention of Bach in the same key, used elsewhere by Bach on other occasions, and on down the line by Beethoven, Schumann, Chopin, Brahms, Grieg, et al. The point to be made is that this in no case constitutes plagiarism, as the dominating individuality and character of each master imbue the motive with entirely different meaning. The similarity is superficial and may be ascribed merely to coincidence.

Experience of Composers' Forum Throws Light On Issue

* * *

The case of the composer in the Forum-Laboratory was entirely different. His three-note motive was identical with one used by César Franck in the first part of the Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, both in intervals and harmonic color. But Franck used the motive episodically, whereas our composer used it constantly, without disguising it from the original with fresh harmonic treatment. Of course, he did this unconsciously and it required the experience of the Forum-Laboratory to bring it to his attention.

I do not wish to give the impression that either approval or a "thumbs-down" rejection by the audience of the Composers' Forum-Laboratory is the final word in the acceptance or rejection of a composition. Rather it is the opportunity given the composer to evaluate his own work through a variety of tests; through rehearsal, performance, and public discussion. Many instances might be cited of composers discarding works in toto, of making extensive cuts, of rewriting and revising, as a result of their experience in the Forum-Laboratory. In rehearsal it is frequently discovered that passages are ineffectively or inexpertly written for an instrument. Our performing musicians collaborate with the composer to bring about a clarification of such passages. If he learns at all, the composer whose easy sequences run the gamut of the instrument, if not the emotions, learns to curb his flights, if not his fancy. Through experience he learns what to retain, what to discard; that all is not "grist that comes to his mill."

* * *

A book on music of our day has described history as a "procession of mediocrity." While I envy the author the aphoristic quality of his utterance, I cannot agree. Rather is history a process of elimination. If this were not true, the present would be futile; the future hopeless. Frequently, at the moment, this is difficult to grasp. In music, as in life, the elements of decay and the forces of life exist simultaneously. In historical retrospect these may be perceived in clearer perspective. Those tendencies or works which survive are the result of living, progressive forces. In the crucible of the Forum-Laboratory the processes of elimination are taking place. The elements of a contemporary idiom are being fused. They are compounded of many seemingly remote and diverse qualities, even of imponderable elements—yet deeply impregnated with those environmental characteristics which are recognizably "American." All of this may not be dismissed superficially, as has recently been done, as "international dissonance." This might have been true several years ago. But much has happened since then——

There has been much discussion recently of the lack of an "American" musical idiom. The observation was made that "nationalism is an essential element of a great art," and that the American quality found in a book of prints has not as yet manifested itself in our music. The profoundly subjective elements which are the necessary components of great music will not come out of an objective attempt to write nationalistically "American" music. It will not even come from those who try to write "American," who write about the Grand Canyon, whose greatness has been reduced to an absurdity by being observed through the wrong end of a telescope—which fact is not concealed by means of extravagant orchestration.

* * *

A characteristic idiom—"American," if you will—is crystallizing here and now. This is not an academic proposition. It is to be perceived in the sessions of the Composers' Forum-Laboratory. In due course of time, with the natural elimination of the dead and dying, it will emerge as an idiom indissolubly linked with this period, made up of musical, ethnic roots of all peoples and times, as heterogeneous as our own racial and cultural backgrounds, yet fused into an integrated style easily recognized as "twentieth century American." We are already coming into our own, in spite of the welter of "new" music which is neither contemporary nor new.

Serge Koussevitzky recently said: "Some have criticized me for playing American music, saying America has not produced a Beethoven or a Brahms. I replied, 'No, it has not produced a Beethoven or Brahms. Why should it? We have the spirit of Beethoven and Brahms always with us. But America is producing something new, youthful and vital in music. We should honor the American composer.' "

Yet there are those who still are seeking the Northwest Passage!

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JAN 7 - 1940

Bostonians Give Second Concert

Schumann, Sibelius On Academy Program Friday Evening

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will give its second Brooklyn concert in a series of five at the Brooklyn Academy of Music next Friday evening, Jan. 12. The following program will be presented:

Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," —— Mozart
Symphony in B-flat, No. 1, Op. 38, —— Schumann
Classical Symphony, Op. 25 —— Prokofieff
"Pelleas and Melisande," Suite from the stage music to Maeterlinck's Tragedy —— Faure
"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem, Op. 26, —— Sibelius

The Academy concerts by the Boston Orchestra are held under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

Next Tuesday afternoon, preceding the concert, a discussion of the program will be held by Jonathan Schiller, lecturer in music at the Institute and director of the R. C. A. Victor Lecture Bureau. Mr. Schiller will speak in the lecture hall of the Academy at 4 p.m.

Copland Lectures

Aaron Copland, the American composer, will be guest speaker in the series "The Background of Contemporary Music," held every Thursday afternoon at the Academy. Mr. Copland will discuss "The Influence of Jazz on Modern Music" this Thursday, Jan. 11, at 4 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR
JAN 7 - 1940

Boston Symphony Plans Summer Music Center

Boston, Jan. 6.

ANNOUNCEMENT is made of the faculty, subjects and detailed activities of the Berkshire Music Center which is to be inaugurated by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next July 8 at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home. These details will be set forth in the catalogue of the Music Center which is published forthwith, and which is obtainable by application to Symphony Hall, Boston.

"Tanglewood," the orchestra's historic 200-acre estate between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass., will be in the six weeks between July 8 and Aug. 18, 1940, a place of busy musical life of an unprecedented sort. Serge Koussevitzky, 30 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, other prominent musicians, and distinguished lecturers will provide the faculty for the center where those who attend will have the opportunity of "living and working in music," in close association with a great orchestra and its conductor.

Koussevitzky to Teach.

There will be a class in orchestra conducting under Serge Koussevitzky, director of the school, a student orchestra of skilled players, an amateur orchestra, a chorus, courses in composition, operatic interpretation, choral conducting, and other subjects. Members of the Music Center will be trained as a festival chorus which will appear in the Berkshire Symphonic Festival in a performance of Bach's Mass in B Minor.

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival, extended from two to three weeks next year, will coincide with the last three weeks of the school term. All who attend the Music Center will be admitted to specified Boston Symphony rehearsals, and to all of the festival performances.

Defines Aims of Center.

Serge Koussevitzky, as director, makes a statement at the beginning of the catalogue in which he outlines its character and purposes:

"The Berkshire Music Center will serve those who seek the best in music and related arts, who are anxious to refresh mind and personality through contact with the elite in art and culture and who long for a creative rest in the summer." Pointing out that the center will be concerned primarily with collective performance, Dr. Koussevitzky adds that "it will thus supplement, rather than duplicate, the training available in the established schools of music where, although some time is devoted to ensemble playing, attention is centered upon developing the technical equipment of the individual. . . . We have chosen a practical method so that the students may draw from us some of the essence of the knowledge and experience we have acquired in our years of work."

For Skilled, Unskilled.

The music center will be in two sections—the institute, limited to those with a thorough preliminary musical training, and the academy, with "no formal entrance requirements." The academy will comprise the school chorus and the amateur orchestra. The main part of its work will be carried on in general sessions, devoted about equally on the one hand to lectures and concerts, and on the other to participation in music through singing and playing.

Koussevitzky, renowned conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is to be the director of the school, and will take a few pupils in orchestral conducting, give lectures and supervise the institute orchestra.

Courses in advanced composition will be given by Aaron Copland, the brilliant American composer, and by Paul Hindemith who is considered one of the most significant composers of today. Each of these celebrities has done significant work in musical education.

Dr. Herbert Graf will have charge of a class in operatic interpretation. Dr. Graf has had a brilliant career in the mounting of operas in Europe and America. He is at present the stage director of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York.

To Conduct Chorus.

G. Wallace Woodworth, assistant director of the Berkshire Music Center, will conduct the chorus. Mr. Woodworth is chairman of the department of music at Harvard University. He is the conductor of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

Olin Downes will give a series of lectures concerned with the historical background of the music being studied by the school orchestras and chorus. Mr. Downes is the music editor of the New York Times.

A course in folk dancing, open to the entire school without extra charge, will be conducted by Douglas Kennedy, president of the English Folk Dance Society.

The Institute Orchestra will be conducted by Richard Burgin, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the Academy Orchestra by Malcolm Holmes, conductor of the college orchestras of Harvard, Radcliffe and Wellesley. Howard Abell will have a class in the methods of teaching music in schools. Mr. Abell is the head of the music department of Milton Academy.

Special lecturers for 1940 will be Dr. Archibald T. Davison, professor of choral music at Harvard University; Randall Thompson, the director of the Curtis Institute of Music at Philadelphia; Carleton Sprague Smith, head of the music department of the New York Public Library, and Augustus D. Zanzig, director of music, National Recreation Association. Further lecturers will be announced at a later date.

The faculty will include the principals o fthe Boston Symphony Orchestra, 16 in all, and 14 additional members—making an orchestra of 30 who will be at the service of the student players for consultation, coaching and joint performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& Republican
JAN 7 - 1940

Music for the Young Plentiful at Boston

The supply of good music for Boston young people seems to have increased materially since the advent of Wheeler Beckett, former conductor of the Richmond (Va.) Symphony orchestra. Under his direction, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., Youth concerts for young people of high school age have taken firm root in Boston's music world. Initiated last year by the Youth Concerts Association of Boston, these low-priced concerts proved so worthwhile and popular that last spring they were officially affiliated with the Boston Symphony orchestra, inc.

At these concerts, a capacity audience from Boston and 40 surrounding towns, crowds Symphony hall in Boston to listen enraptured to music by the masters.

Warren Storey Smith, music critic of the Boston Post said of Mr Beckett, following his last concert, "As these concerts continue, it becomes more and more evident that Mr Beckett is an extremely able and versatile conductor. He goes about his business with considerable dispatch and a minimum of external fuss, yet the music always sounds forth clearly, eloquently and with its personal and characteristic voice.'

There are four remaining youth concerts scheduled in Symphony hall for this season: January 17, February 7. March 27, and April 10.

Latest news of Beckett's activities is the announcement of three Youth Chamber Music concerts (also under the auspices of the Youth Concerts Association of Boston) which will take oplace in Jrdan hall, January 24, February 14, and March 6. The Roth quartet is scheduled for the first and last of this series, a woodwind and string ensemble for the second. Beckett plans and wil discuss the programs which were in great part made possible by the generosity of Mrs Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 7 - 1940

Boston Symphony

Beginning its second visit of the season the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, will give the first New York performance of Ernest Bloch's violin concerto next Thursday night in Carnegie Hall, with Joseph Szigeti as the soloist. Beethoven's first symphony and Sibelius's second symphony complete the program. Mr. Szigeti was the soloist for the first public performances of Mr. Bloch's concerto with the Cleveland Orchestra under Artur Rodzinski on Dec. 15-17, 1938, and for the London premiere by the London Philharmonic under Sir Thomas Beecham last March. Mr. Bloch began his sketches for the work in 1930, but did not begin the actual composition until 1935. He finished it in the summer of 1938. The composer has stated that it has no Jewish inspiration. Mr. Szigeti played the concerto with the Bostonians in their home concerts last Friday and Saturday.

Jesus Maria Sanroma, the Boston Sy[illegible]ist, will be the soloist next Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall in Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra, which he introduced to New York with this orchestra on Jan. 8, 1931. It was played by the Philharmonic-Symphony under the composer in January, 1937, with Beveridge Webster as soloist. Mozart's symphony in C, No. 34, and Brahms's second symphony complete the program.

None of these works will be heard in Dr. Koussevitzky's program for next Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, which includes Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Schumann's symphony in B flat, Prokofieff's classical symphony, Fauré's suite from his stage music for Maeterlinck's "Pelleas et Melisande" and Sibelius's "Finlandia."

Nicolai Malko, a Russian conductor, who is well known in Great Britain and Denmark, will make his American debut as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony in its home concerts of Friday and Saturday, Jan. 19 and 20, when he will conduct Rossini's overture to "La Gazza Ladra," Shostakakovitch's first symphony, Roger's Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart, and Tchaikovsky's Italian Caprice.

Tchaikovsky Series

A series of three Tchaikovsky programs to be presented by the New York City Symphony Orchestra under Eugene Plotnikoff's direction under the sponsorship of Mayor F. H. LaGuardia and the New York City W. P. A. Music Project, will begin tonight at the Center Theater. Rose Bampton, Metropolitan Opera [illegible] the soloist in arias from "Pique Dame" and "Jeanne d'Arc." Albert Spalding, violinist, will be the soloist next Sunday night, and Josef Lhevinne, pianist, on Jan. 21. [illegible] from 25 cents to $1.10.

In the second concert of his engagement with the N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra, which will be broadcast Saturday night from 10 o'clock to 11:30 over the blue network, Bernardino Molinari will conduct Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, Saint-Saens's "Carnaval des Animaux," his own arrangement of a concerto in A major by Vivaldi and the suite from Stravinsky's "Petrouchka."

Philadelphia Orchestra

The Philadelphia Orchestra, now on a short Eastern tour, will give a concert at the Westchester County Center, White Plains, next Friday night, as the fourth event in Mrs. Julian Olney's subscription series. Eugene Ormandy's program includes arrangements of two Bach chorales, the Franck symphony, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and the suite from Stravinsky's "Fire Bird." The next concert in Carnegie Hall will be on Tuesday night, Jan. 23, with Rudolf Serkin as soloist in Brahms's piano concerto in D minor.

In the next home concert in the Philadelphia Academy of Music, Monday night, Jan. 15, Mischa Elman will play Mendelssohn's violin concerto and Vivaldi's concerto in G minor. Iso Briselli, young Russian violinist, [illegible] the Dvorak concerto on Friday and Saturday, Jan. 19 and 20, when Mr. Ormandy's program will also include a scherzo for strings, "Heavenly Children at Play" by Frances McCollin, young Philadelphia [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM AKRON, OHIO
BEACON-JOURNAL

JAN 7 - 1940

WITH THE MUSIC MAKERS

A.S.C.A.P. Contest Offers Fellowship

College Composers, Authors Eligible
Plan Is To Further Creative Talents

By OSCAR SMITH
Beacon Journal Music Editor

DON'T be surprised if in the next year or two young composers from colleges and universities—maybe from Akron university—land musical plays on Broadway or in a Hollywood movie studio.

That is, if they take advantage of the fellowship competition sponsored by the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers, to be inaugurated in all universities, colleges and normal schools of the United States.

This A.S.C.A.P. competition will be for composers and authors of college musical plays, and all students in institutions of higher learning will be invited to submit the scripts of original college musicals produced during the current or preceding academic year.

It is announced that for purposes of the contest, the country has been divided into eight regions according to the natural geographical and scholastic subdivisions.

Ohio is in region four, along with Indiana, Illinois, Tennessee, Kentucky and Michigan.

The author and composer of the best play will be awarded an A.S.C.A.P. fellowship in the sum of $720, in each of the regions, divided equally between the authors, and to be used by the winners in assisting the continuance of their work at any educational institution which they may subsequently decide to attend.

The award contemplates financial assistance to the extent of $30 a month to each of the two winners in each region over a full period of one calendar year. If the winning musical play is written by a single person, the entire fellowship award will be made to him or her.

Judging of the merits of the plays produced in the respective regions will be by a committee of three chosen from among the leading college teachers in the fields of music, drama and creative writing in each of the regions.

Final date for submission of scripts to the respective judging committee in each region will be March 15 of each year, and final judgment upon the scripts will be made by the respective committees not later than May 15.

For Creative Talent

PURPOSE of theA.S.C.A.P. fellowship competition, according to Prof. S. Stephenson Smith, educational counselor of the society, is to further the development of creative talent among the students in institutions of higher learning, and to afford an opportunity to such of them as may show embryo genius to continue in their creative work.

Winning plays from the eight regions will be given a reading and careful consideration by a group of the leading Broadway play producers and also a group of the outstanding Hollywood photoplay producers.

"Since the founding of A.S.C.A.P. by Victor Herbert and a group of his contemporaries more than a quarter of a century since, the organization has always taken a deep interest in the development and furtherance of American culture in the field of the fine arts," says Professor Smith.

To Play American Symphony

DR. ARTUR RODZINSKI will conduct the Cleveland orchestra's 12th pair of symphony concerts on Thursday and Saturday evenings in Severance hall, introducing there the Symphony No. 3 by Dr. Howard Hanson, American composer and conductor.

In a recent interview, Dr. Rodzinski said that the present generation of composers in the United States is "far superior" to any other country's products. He believes that the younger generation of American composers, especially, must get full representation on the programs of our major symphony orchestras, but he feels that the cooperation of the audiences is necessary for that.

The Cleveland conductor hopes that symphony-goers will overcome the "psychological hostility" which can be sensed when an unknown American work is presented and will be more receptive, especially since, in his own case, he makes it a rule to contrast well-known classical works on the same program.

For this pair of concerts, Dr. Rodzinski has included Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and Beethoven's great Symphony No. 7. Dr. Hanson's symphony, first performed over the radio in 1937, was played last November by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. Dr. Hanson's opera, "Merry Mount," was produced at the Metropolitan in 1934.

Rudolph Ringwall, associate conductor of the Cleveland orchestra, will conduct the fifth concert in the popular "Twilight" series this afternoon at 5 o'clock.

Akron Musicians Praised

THREE talented Akron musicians, members of the Tuesday Musical club, have been receiving praise for the recent program they presented for Cleveland's Fortnightly Musical club in Steinway hall. The Akronites also are members of the Cleveland group.

Mrs. D. M. Bird sang the aria, "Suicidio," from the opera "La Gioconda," by Ponchiello, and her part of the program also included compositions of Sibelius, Robert Besly, Marshall Kernochen, Giannini and Cimara.

Mrs. Fred M. Rankin pleased her audience with a group that included several Brahms gypsy songs, "A Toi," by Bember, and "Carnaval," by Foudrain; Rachmaninoff's "Silent Night" and "Floods of Spring," and Tschaikowsky's "Was I Not a Blade of Grass?" Mrs. Loraine Flanick was the accompanist for both singers.

Nellie Whittaker, well-known Akron pianist, received the praise of club members and visitors for her playing of the difficult "Etudes Symphoniques," by Schumann.

Director Has Choir Recipe

NOBODY can say that the celebrated Westminster choir, to sing at Akron armory on Feb. 28, ever put a congregation to sleep, or irritated it into staying away from church.

For Dr. John Finley Williamson, the choir's noted director, believes that worship is something that you do; not something that is done for you. It is something in which you must participate, in which you must bear a full part, if it is to mean much of anything to you.

"There you have the secret," says Dr. Williamson, "why hundreds of churches have dead or somnolent services." His career began about 17 years ago when he was director of the Westminster Presbyterian church choir in Dayton. Like the great Maestro Toscanini, he had a passion for perfection.

In those early days, Dr. Williamson used to say that the trouble with church music was its lack of honesty.

"The minister will spend hours, days, almost a week in preparing for his part in the Sunday service," he would say. "What do the choirs do? They turn up 15 minutes early on Sunday morning, or half of them turn out on Thursday evening, to hum over a lot of musical junk that has been sung to death.

"Then they put on their gowns, give a last look in the mirror, and think they are all ready to take their part in the worship of God. It's downright dishonesty; that's what it is!"

But the choir in the Westminster church in Dayton wasn't like that. It worked long and hard; every member received individual training from the choirmaster, in addition to hours of ensemble practice. Now the choir is internationally famous.

Dr. Williamson will direct the Westminster choir in the Akron concert, to be given under auspices of the Cuyahoga Falls Methodist church for the benefit of its remodeling program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
TIMES

JAN 7 - 1940

Isabel Morse Jones

THE WEEK'S HIGH NOTE IN MUSIC

By the Music Critic—

LAST week's high note in music circles was struck by Mrs. Leiland Atherton Irish. Southern California's symphony orchestra manager left her home by the sea for the annual orchestra managers' conference during the holidays. After a warm reception in icy Detroit by Henry Ford at Dearborn Inn, she spent days at a round-table discussion of problems of music and finance; problems which proved to be common to all the 16 major orchestras with a budget over $100,000.

The portfolio of reports and comparisons brought home by Mrs. Irish revealed a similarity that was both comforting and discomforting. For instance: Boston's nonunion, well-subscribed orchestra is at the top, financially and artistically. They have the longest season, pay their orchestra by the year with a minimum of $3000 and yet have the lowest operating deficit in the country. Furthermore, 90 per cent of the Boston trustees and financial contributors go to the concerts and they have built a music shed for summer concerts which is acoustically the best and will house an Academy of Music sponsored by them and directed by Koussevitzky.

The Philharmonic of Los Angeles is eighth on the list in the total of its earned income and sixth in the amount of expenditure. In the number of concerts given, Los Angeles' orchestra is far down. Both Detroit and Rochester, N.Y., have larger operating deficits—and this is surprising, because Henry Ford pays Detroit well for his Sunday night broadcasts. Rochester spends much money on American composers.

The conference went on record as opposed to any orchestra campaigns based on "pay up or give up the orchestra" slogans. The managers agree that education is a better way to interest Americans in privately subsidized orchestras and that government participation would not be beneficial at this time. They believe symphony orchestras should be classed with universities in the public mind and budget and supported accordingly. Therefore, their efforts will be directed to that aim.

I. M. J.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ROCKY MOUNT, N. C.
TELEGRAM

JAN 8 - 1940

ARTS: Plain People Rescue Culture Of America

By JOHN SELBY
Associated Press Arts Editor

Because even millionaires must eat, the entire cultural picture of the United States has changed in 10 years. Now the village doctor helps support the New York Philharmonic and Uncle Joe helps guarantee the Metropolitan Opera.

There was a day when one family, the Esterhazys, supported an opera, an orchestra and even a great composer for their own exclusive enjoyment. Later a Colonel Higginson could shoulder the deficit of the Boston Symphony, and Harry Harkness Flagler could assume the burden of the New York Symphony.

There was also October, 1929.

The virus of October, 1929, worked slowly but effectively. The first break came in March, 1932, when bearded and remote Giulio Gatti-Casazza announced that the Metropolitan's financial backlog was exhausted.

There were many similar breaks over the country.

Yet there were no important casualties among great American orchestras, opera companies, or art museums. Even book publishing, which took a severe beating, lost few important practitioners. Public libraries were hardest hit. Art dealers drew in their horns, and a few important ones closed out. Museum endowments lost income steadily—no final answer has yet been found to that, either.

But generally an answer was found. It was forced on the world. The answer was to broaden the base of support.

One instance was governmental: the federal art projects. By and large these proved there was a popular market for "art," and that "art" could be produced to fit it.

Privately the situation is similar. Once you could count the men who supported the New York Philharmonic on your fingers and toes; now there are more than 10,000 guarantors.

Where once the Metropolitan opera was almost wholly controlled by the owners of the lower tier boxes, now the owners thereof are trying to sell their holdings to the operating company, and the Metropolitan Opera Guild is lining up other thousands to help. Etchings are being sold for $5 or less; sculpture can be had at bargain rates; popular-priced books are on the make.

The decade closes with the country at large advancing to pay the deficits left behind by art's patrons in their dash for the automat.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAULT STE. MARIE, MICH.
NEWS

JAN 8 - 1940

Concert Pianist, Ruth Culbertson, to Be at Newberry

NEWBERRY, Jan. 8. — Newberry music lovers will be treated to a rare experience Thursday evening, January 11, when Miss Ruth Culbertson, pianist, will appear in concert at the high school auditorium at 8:15 o'clock.

Miss Culbertson, who is making a concert tour of the middle west, will appear in Newberry under the auspices of the Business and Professional Women's Club. Her itinerary will also take her to Northern State Teachers' College, Marquette on January 15.

Born and educated in Michigan, Miss Culbertson has studied the piano at the New England Conservatory in Boston, under Mme. Szumowska, friend and pupil of the famous Ignace Paderewski. Her unusual talent came to the attention of influential Bostonians, who sent her abroad to study with Arthur Schnabel. Since her return she has been teaching at the Junior College at Fine Arts in Boston and giving concerts in Boston and New York. She has played several times as solist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and her own compositions have been featured.

Tickets are being sold by members of the Club, as well as the Girl Scouts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUN

JAN 8 - 1940

Lowell Girl Scores in Sunday Concert

Miss Carolyn Urbanek Sings Before 3500 at Memorial Auditorium

Warmly greeted by more than 3500 persons, Miss Carolyn Urbanek, a native of this city, who began her musical career here, returned to the Memorial Auditorium yesterday under the auspices of the Moses Greeley Parker lecture series and held her audience in rapt attention throughout the presentation of a varied program.

Miss Urbanek shared the program with Orlando Barera, widely-known young Italian violinist and they were assisted by Helmutt Baerwold, pianist and David Robinson, flutist. Mr. Barera appeared here last season under the same auspices and was also soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

As she came to the platform to present her first group of songs, Miss Urbanek received an enthusiastic tribute from the audience. Her first group of songs included the Invocazione di Orfeo of the old Italian, Peri; the Alleluia of Mozart and "Sweet Bird" from Handel's "Ill Penseroso." Mr. Robinson supplied the obligato and the rendering of this group of songs brought out the best qualities in Miss Urbanek's voice.

She began her second group with a rendition of two songs by Stanislaus Moniuszko, whose music has long been idealized in Poland. She sang the Cavatina from the opera "Halka" and the Bird Song by the same composer.

Other numbers of this group included Weckerlin's "Petite Oiseaux and Rossini's La Danza. Mr. Baerwald accompanied her at the piano during the singing of this group and the final number had to be repeated several times, so warmly was it greeted by the audience.

In her final group, Miss Urbanek sang the Schubert Ave Maria, Bishop's "Lo, Hear the Gentle Lark" and the Bach-Gounod Ave Maria. She added the songs "Carry Me Back to Old Virginny" and "The Land of The Sky Blue Water" as encores.

Among the numbers presented by Mr. Barera were: The Vavaldi Sonata, three movements of Lalo's Symphonic Espagnole, Hubay's "Zephyr", Kreisler's Gypsy song and the Capriccio Sonatina of Paganini. His encores were Kreisler's "La Gitana" and a seranade by Chaminade.

His presentations were well received and he showed an excellent grasp of the tones of his instrument, playing some of the passages brilliantly and colorfully.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

JAN 8 - 1940

Boston Symphony Concert Friday; Boxholders Are Announced For Second Program Here

Boxholders for the season's second concert by the Boston Symphoy Orchestra, to be presented on Friday evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, are Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, the Brooklyn Woman's Club, Adelphi Academy Alumnae, Mrs. Helen Jones Quinn and the officers and guests of the Fort Hamilton Army post.

Under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, the orchestra will present a program of Mozart, Schumann, Prokofiieff, Faure and Sibelius.

The concerts are in their fifty-fourth season in Brooklyn. They are given under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which James G. McDonald is president; the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman and the Brooklyn Committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 9 - 1940

Koussevitzky's Program Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will play the following compositions for their concert at the Bushnell Memorial at 8:15 tonight:

Concerto Grosso in B. Minor	Handel
"Peter and the Wolf"	Prokofieff
Symphony No. 2	Sibelius

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 9 - 1940

Boston Symphony Offers Prokofieff's Gay Composition

Koussevitzky to Conduct Amusing Fantasy, 'Peter and the Wolf'

Bushnell Concert Series subscribers are looking forward to the amusing Prokofieff composition "Peter and the Wolf" which will be played as part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Bushnell Memorial tonight, starting at 8:15 o'clock. In addition to this orchestral fairy tale for children, the program includes the Handel Concerto Grosso in B minor and the Second Symphony of Sibelius. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the concert.

The score of "Peter and the Wolf" was completed in Moscow on April 24, 1936, and was first performed at a Children's Concert of the Moscow Philharmonic, in the large hall of the Moscow Conservatory, on May 2 The first performance in America was by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, March 25, 1938, Prokofieff conducting, Richard Hale narrator.

The orchestration calls for one flute, one oboe, one clarinet, one bassoon, three horns, trumpet, trombone, timpani, bass drum, triangle, snare drum, cymbals, castanets, tambourine and strings.

The following explanation is printed in the score: "Each character of this Tale is represented by a corresponding instrument in the orchestra; the bird by a flute, the duck by an oboe, the cat by a clarinet in a low register, the grandfather by a bassoon, the wolf by three horns, Peter by the string quartet, the shooting of the hunters by the kettledrums and the bass drum. Before an orchestral performance it is desirable to show these instruments to the children and to play on them the corresponding leitmotifs. Thereby the children learn to distinguish the sonorities of the instruments during the performance of this Tale."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

JAN 10 1940

Boston Symphony At Hartford

Richard Hale performed as narrator with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Bushnell Memorial Hall in Hartford, Conn., last night when Prokofieff's musical fairy tale, "Peter and the Wolf" was presented. The hall was filled, many people standing.

"Peter and the Wolf" was given by the orchestra at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival last summer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 10 1940

Music Notes

Serge Koussevitzky will begin the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program tomorrow night in Carnegie Hall with Prokofieff's Classical Symphony instead of the originally announced first symphony of Beethoven. The oher numbers are Ernest Bloch's violin concerto, to be played for the first time here with Joseph Szigeti as the soloist, and Sibelius's second symphony. The program for Saturday afternoon has not been changed. It includes Mozart's symphony in C, No. 34; Stravinsky's capriccie for piano and orchestra, with J. M. Sanroma as soloist, and Brahms's second symphony.

CARTHAGE, MO
EVE. PRESS
1/10/40

A Boston symphony orchestra composed entirely of women has been formed, but strangely enough the director is a mere man. Maybe there was danger of hair pulling or something more violent if an effort to choose one of their own sex to wield the baton had been undertaken.

C.S.M. Jan 10

Symphony Men All Back Now From War Zone

All members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who were detained in Europe by the war have now returned, and the orchestra is again at full strength.

The orchestra was not badly hit by the war. Several members were delayed in returning, but by the time the first personnel list of the season was printed in the program book (Oct. 27-28) only two men were missing. A star beside the names of Messrs. Tortelier and Chardon, both of the cello section, referred to a footnote which read, "On leave."

This situation continued until mid-November, when Mr. Tortelier returned. Late in December Mr. Chardon followed. Since then no footnotes have been necessary.

If the war continues long, the problem may be revived. Under French law, a man liable for military service who fails to report for duty becomes a deserter.

But sometimes a man may be excused from service under exceptional circumstances; if it can reasonably be argued, for example, that he is performing more important service for his fatherland in his regular occupation than he could render at the front. This service might be artistic as well as diplomatic or financial or industrial.

If, later, members of the orchestra should be called by their countries of origin, it is believed likely that an appeal might be made by Dr. Koussevitzky to be permitted to retain them in the orchestra on some such ground.

L. A. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 10 1940

Memorable Concert At Bushnell by Boston Symphony

Koussevitzky Builds Splendidly with Sibelius Second

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

A year hence, if you think of it, ask a friend what the Boston Symphony Orchestra played at its two concerts in the 1939-40 Bushnell Series, and the answer will probably be: "Let me see, at the first concert it was something very noisy, by an American composer, and something else very hackneyed; but the second time—Peter and the Wolf, Sibelius' Second Symphony, and Handel's B minor Concerto Grosso."

Last night's was a program to be remembered. Prokofieff's whimsy always makes a place for itself, and the other two compositions received an inspired treatment that quite lifted them out of terrestrial routine.

This was Koussevitzky at his best, and that goes for the orchestra, too, because when Koussevitzky is ignited by the divine spark, flames spread through the whole instrumental company.

Concerto a Masterpiece

The Handel Concerto, in spite of the leader's insistence that Burgin, Theodorowicz and Bedetti take all the applause as soloists, was a masterpiece of conducting. His baton technique was a model, if so personal and so exquisitely just an expression can be prescribed for anyone other than its creator. It was certainly a pattern for restraint and economy. There was much more than met the eye, for besides the concerto's deftly proportioned outlines, there was the songfulness of the larghetto which reached an impassioned expressiveness without disturbing its classical chasteness. There is reason to be grateful when the Boston string choir is heard alone in at least one number.

Enchantment of Sibelius

The end of the Sibelius Symphony came as a release. Emotions were spent in scattered shouts, that immediately subsided to more decorous and prolonged hand-clapping. It is a clamorous work, and Koussevitzky knows how to deliver the full impact. His secret is a sense of design, for Sibelius is a master of architectonics.

To listen to the Second Symphony for melody alone, of which it has a rich, ripe store, or only for its brilliant or sombre sonorities, is merely to be tossed about on a sea of aural rhetoric.

The enchantment of Sibelius lies in his refraction of thematic stuff not for the mere multiplication of ideas but for dramatic emphasis. Strangely that is a definition of the greater Beethoven. Even this early work of Sibelius warrants the comparison.

The seismic proclamations of the andante, the portentous meanderings of the string bass figures, the ineluctable chant of the oboe taken up later by the solo cello and the apparent discursiveness which eventually is bound up in divine cogency are experiences to leave the listener bored or excited, but none can stand between.

It was possible to listen to this as Finnish music, the more because of the admittedly nationalistic implications that parts of it contain, but it was not necessary to do so. It was a soul-stirring symphony, and Koussevitzky unlocked its epical secrets. Only Russia has done more for Sibelius than Koussevitzky has.

"Peter and the Wolf" continues to amuse. Audience reaction is the same in Bushnell as in Symphony Hall and Tanglewood. It is infectious, and you miss it in the recording.

Richard Hale broadened his style somewhat in delivering the narrative. The orchestra was not always en rapport, but it is probably difficult to arrive at a synchronous interpretation where the audience factor is likely to be variable.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

JAN 11 1940

Boston Symphony

Orchestra Under Koussevitzky Wins Ovation in Montclair Concert

Ovations at symphony concerts are not uncommon manifestations, but it is doubtful if one more spontaneous and heartfelt has been heard hereabouts than that rising at the close of the Boston Symphony's program last night at Montclair High School. Homage to Sibelius's "Finlandia" and admiration for its performance under Serge Koussevitzky brought a thrilled audience to its feet. The conductor and his men were applauded at great length before listeners left the auditorium.

It was a moment to remember for patrons of the Unity Institute, in the course of which there have been many notable incidents. Perhaps the intensely patriotic composition and the heroic people it represents have never been more popular than at present. Perhaps Mr. Koussevitzky and his men were especially inspired. But the noble surge of the work has never seemed more overwhelming nor the spirit it discharges more uplifting.

The exciting termination of the concert, a special event in the Unity Course, came after an evening ample in musical delights, one that must have been found fully rewarding by a capacity audience. It mattered little that the auditorium was minute for such a performance; that the instrumentalists were jammed on the stage, extended for the occasion, nor that many listeners practically were under the feet of the players. The quality of the music was superlative.

The program opened with Brahms's Second Symphony, a composition flooded with sunshine if ever one was. The affable Mr. Koussevitzky appeared right in his element and the warmth and lyricism of the writing was brought to listeners with rare effect. The undulating, intertwining melodies of the first movement, the wistful reediness of the third, the exultant note of the finale, every measure and mood was ingratiaing, so masterful was the presentation.

Artistry

It is a rather late date and also superfluous to extol the artistry of the Boston Symphony and its distinguished conductor. But it is hard to restrain praise after such a performance. One marvels again and again at the technical felicity of the orchestra, its almost uncanny faculty of capturing the inner essence of the music it plays, its boundless expressiveness, the luster of its tones.

The second number was Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, an unfamiliar offering in concert halls in this section found more than ordinarily intriguing by last night's audience. Written in Mozartean style by the Russian modernist, the work nevertheless has a strident spirit and a pace suggestive of the current era. Its melodies follow the classic line but the texture of the orchestration tends to the contemporary. Its Gavotte is particularly charming.

The remaining offering was a suite from the incidental music fashioned by Faure for the stage presentation of Maeterlinck's tragedy, "Pelleas and Melisande," antedating Debussy's operatic version. It comprised the prelude to the play, an entr'acte and an adagio for the closing scene, all reflecting the somber, mystic emanations of the drama. Given a sensitive performance, it proved interesting and appealing, although perhaps it is more effective in its original medium than as a concert number.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS

JAN 10 1940

Rodzinski, Orchestra Offer Work of U. S. Composer

DR. ARTUR RODZINSKI has returned to town and will feature in the Severance Hall concerts tomorrow and Saturday the "Third Symphony" by Howard Hanson, American composer.

Presenting the old along with the new, Dr. Rodzinski also will direct the Cleveland Orchestra in the Mozart "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" serenade and the Beethoven "Seventh Symphony, in A Major."

HOWARD HANSON

The Mozart serenade has not been heard in its entirety in these concerts since 1925.

It was composed in 1787, a very eventful year in Mozart's life—the year he met Beethoven and the year in which his most important opera, "Don Giovanni," was completed and produced with great success.

The Beethoven "Seventh" was programmed by Dr. Rodzinski in response to numerous requests. It is only slightly less popular than the famous "Fifth" and has had almost as many performances at these concerts.

Dr. Rodzinski's conducting of Hanson's symphony demonstrates further his great interest in works of living Americans. It is the third large orchestral work by present-day United States composers to appear on his Cleveland programs this season.

Dr. Hanson, composer, conductor and educator, is a native of Nebraska. He is now 43. He studied at Northwestern University, became teacher of theory and composition at the College of the Pacific in California and subsequently the dean of its Conservatory of Fine Arts. In 1921 he received a fellowship to the American Academy in Rome, where he spent three years, returning to the United States in 1924 to become director of the Eastman School of Music in Rochester, which position he now holds.

Dr. Hanson has written for piano and chamber groups as well as for symphony orchestra. His opera, "Merry Mount," was produced at the Metropolitan in 1934.

The Hanson symphony was first performed in 1937, over the radio. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted it last November at the second of a pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, devoted to American composition. It was well received. Commentators mentioned its distinctive melodic subjects, its great vitality and masterly orchestration. The last movement was considered especially expressive and appealing, the scherzo charming.

BROOKLINE, MASS
CHRONICLE
1/11/40

Another in the series of youth concerts by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Symphony Hall next Wednesday afternoon at three-thirty o'clock. Director Wheeler Beckett has arranged an attractive program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

JAN 11 1940

* * *

A small dinner was given last night by Mr. and Mrs. Wilfred J. Funk of Erwin Park road before the Boston Symphony concert at Montclair High School. The Funks will sail February 10 for a three weeks' trip to Guatemala.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 11 1940

Music Notes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, will begin its program tonight at Carnegie Hall with Prokofieff's classical symphony instead of Beethoven's first symphony, which was originally announced. Ernest Bloch's violin concerto, with Joseph Szigeti as soloist, and Sibelius's second symphony will follow.

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M
TRIBUNE
1/11/40

Q. Which is the oldest, the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra, or the New York Philharmonic?

A. New York Philahmonic, 1842; Boston Symphony second, 1881; and Philadelphia Orchestra third, 1900.

More Chiding of Symphony Audiences

Herald
Jan 12

To the Editor of The Herald:

I would like to add my words as to the decided lack of manners displayed these days at most concerts one attends. At Symphony Hall, late arrivals continually disturb the musical thought of those who really come to hear the music. The disturbance at the concert of "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien" on Friday afternoon was certainly one of the rudest demonstrations of the lack of thought and consideration I have ever seen.

Then, too, why must ladies keep their hats on during a symphony concert? They certainly are most annoying, and it seems to me good taste would require their removal.

With the brilliance of an orchestra such as the Boston, it seems to me, when its joys can impart such beauty, why can't real respect for the privilege one is so fortunate to enjoy be in evidence? Surely, to share in the beauty of such an occasion as the playing of Brahms' second symphony on last Friday afternoon will be a worthy example. M. M. A.

Boston.

C.S.M. Jan 12

Hannikainen Late; Burgin to Conduct

Tauno Hannikainen, the distinguished Finnish conductor, will be unable, because of war conditions, to reach America in time for the Boston Symphony Concerts of Jan. 26-27, which he was scheduled to direct as guest. His appearance, therefore, has been put over to the following week (Fed. 2-3).

Meanwhile, Richard Burgin, assistant conductor, will direct the concerts of Jan. 26-27, with Josef Hofmann as soloist, and that of Jan. 23 in Providence. These concerts fall in the second week of Dr. Koussevitzky's midwinter vacation. Nicolai Malko will be guest conductor at next week's concerts.

155

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 10 1940

[illegible] Concert [illegible] Bushnell by Boston Symphony

Koussevitzky Builds Splendidly with Sibelius Second

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

A year hence, if you think of it, ask a friend what the Boston Symphony Orchestra played at its two concepts in the 1939-40 Bushnell Series, and the answer will probably be: "Let me see, at the first concert it was something very noisy, by an American composer, and something else very hackneyed; but the second time—Peter and the Wolf, Sibelius' Second Symphony, and Handel's B minor Concerto Grosso."

Last night's was a program to be remembered. Prokofieff's whimsy always makes a place for itself, and the other two compositions received an inspired treatment that quite lifted them out of terrestrial routine.

This was Koussevitzky at his best, and that goes for the orchestra, too, because when Koussevitzky is ignited by the divine spark, flames spread through the whole instrumental company.

Concerto a Masterpiece

The Handel Concerto, in spite of the leader's insistence that Burgin, Theodorowicz and Bedetti take all the applause as soloists, was a masterpiece of conducting. His baton technique was a model, if so personal and so exquisitely just an expression can be prescribed for anyone other than its creator. It was certainly a pattern for restraint and economy. There was much more than met the eye, for besides the concerto's deftly proportioned outlines, there was the songfulness of the larghetto which reached an impassioned expressiveness without disturbing its classical chasteness. There is reason to be grateful when the Boston string choir is heard alone in at least one number.

Enchantment of Sibelius

The end of the Sibelius Symphony came as a release. Emotions were spent in scattered shouts, that immediately subsided to more decorous and prolonged hand-clapping. It is a clamorous work, and Koussevitzky knows how to deliver the full impact. His secret is a sense of design, for Sibelius is a master of architectonics.

To listen to the Second Symphony for melody alone, of which it has a rich, ripe store, or only for its brilliant or sombre sonorities, is merely to be tossed about on a sea of [illegible] rhetoric. [illegible] of Sibelius [illegible] in his refraction of thematic [illegible] not for the mere multiplication of ideas but for dramatic emphasis. Strangely that is a definition of the greater Beethoven. Even this early work of Sibelius warrants the comparison.

The seismic proclamations of the andante, the portentous meanderings of the string bass figures, the ineluctable chant of the oboe taken up later by the solo cello and the apparent discursiveness which eventually is bound up in divine cogency are experiences to leave the listener bored or excited, but none can stand between.

It was possible to listen to this as Finnish music, the more because of the admittedly nationalistic implications that parts of it contain, but it was not necessary to do so. It was a soul-stirring symphony, and Koussevitzky unlocked its epical secrets. Only Russia has done more for Sibelius than Koussevitzky has.

"Peter and the Wolf" continues to amuse. Audience reaction is the same in Bushnell as in Symphony Hall and Tanglewood. It is infectious, and you miss it in the recording.

Richard Hale broadened his style somewhat in delivering the narrative. The orchestra was not always en rapport, but it is probably difficult to arrive at a synchronous interpretation where the audience factor is likely to be variable.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
JAN 11 1940

Boston Symphony

Orchestra Under Koussevitzky Wins Ovation in Montclair Concert

Ovations at symphony concerts are not uncommon manifestations, but it is doubtful if one more spontaneous and heartfelt has been heard hereabouts than that rising at the close of the Boston Symphony's program last night at Montclair High School. Homage to Sibelius's "Finlandia" and admiration for its performance under Serge Koussevitzky brought a thrilled audience to its feet. The conductor and his men were applauded at great length before listeners left the auditorium.

It was a moment to remember for patrons of the Unity Institute, in the course of which there have been many notable incidents. Perhaps the intensely patriotic composition and the heroic people it represents have never been more popular than at present. Perhaps Mr. Koussevitzky and his men were especially inspired. But the noble surge of the work has never seemed more overwhelming nor the spirit it discharges more uplifting.

The exciting termination of the concert, a special event in the Unity Course, came after an evening ample in musical delights, one that must have been found fully rewarding by a capacity audience. It mattered little that the auditorium was minute for such a performance; that the instrumentalists were jammed on the stage, extended for the occasion, nor that many listeners practically were under the feet of the players. The quality of the music was superlative.

The program opened with Brahms's Second Symphony, a composition flooded with sunshine if ever one was. The affable Mr. Koussevitzky appeared right in his element and the warmth and lyricism of the writing was brought to listeners with rare effect. The undulating, intertwining melodies of the first movement, the wistful reediness of the third, the exultant note of the finale, every measure and mood was ingratiaing, so masterful was the presentation.

Artistry

It is a rather late date and also superfluous to extol the artistry of the Boston Symphony and its distinguished conductor. But it is hard to restrain praise after such a performance. One marvels again and again at the technical felicity of the orchestra, its almost uncanny faculty of capturing the inner essence of the music it plays, its boundless expressiveness, the luster of its tones.

The second number was Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, an unfamiliar offering in concert halls in this section found more than ordinarily intriguing by last night's audience. Written in Mozartean style by the Russian modernist, the work nevertheless has a strident spirit and a pace suggestive of the current era. Its melodies follow the classic line but the texture of the orchestration tends to the contemporary. Its Gavotte is particularly charming.

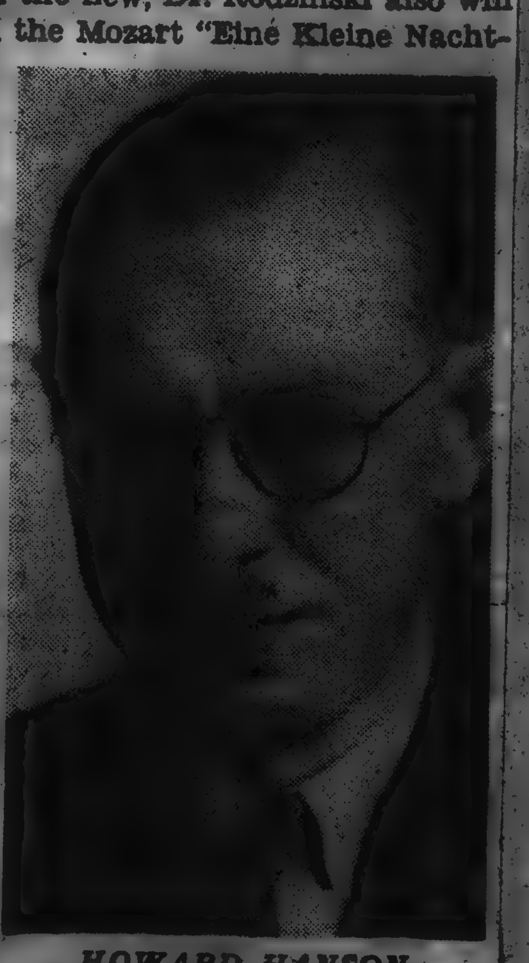
The remaining offering was a suite from the incidental music fashioned by Faure for the stage presentation of Maeterlinck's tragedy, "Pelleas and Melisande," antedating Debussy's operatic version. It comprised the prelude to the play, an entr'acte and an adagio for the closing scene, all reflecting the somber, mystic emanations of the drama. Given a sensitive performance, it proved interesting and appealing, although perhaps it is more effective in its original medium than as a concert number.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
JAN 10 1940

Rodzinski, Orchestra Offer Work of U. S. Composer

DR. ARTUR RODZINSKI has returned to town and will feature in the Severance Hall concerts tomorrow and Saturday the "Third Symphony" by Howard Hanson, American composer.

Presenting the old along with the new, Dr. Rodzinski also will direct the Cleveland Orchestra in the Mozart "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" serenade and the Beethoven "Seventh Symphony, in A Major."



HOWARD HANSON

The Mozart serenade has not been heard in its entirety in these concerts since 1925.

It was composed in 1787, a very eventful year in Mozart's life—the year he met Beethoven and the year in which his most important opera, "Don Giovanni," was completed and produced with great success.

The Beethoven "Seventh" was programmed by Dr. Rodzinski in response to numerous requests. It is only slightly less popular than the famous "Fifth" and has had almost as many performances at these concerts.

Dr. Rodzinski's conducting of Hanson's symphony demonstrates further his great interest in works of living Americans. It is the third large orchestral work by present-day United States composers to appear on his Cleveland programs this season.

Dr. Hanson, composer, conductor and educator, is a native of Nebraska. He is now 43. He studied at Northwestern University, became teacher of theory and composition at the College of the Pacific in California and subsequently the dean of its Conservatory of Fine Arts. In 1921 he received a fellowship to the American Academy in Rome, where he spent three years, returning to the United States in 1924 to become director of the Eastman School of Music in Rochester, which position he now holds.

Dr. Hanson has written for piano and chamber groups as well as for symphony orchestra. His opera, "Merry Mount," was produced at the Metropolitan in 1934.

The Hanson symphony was first performed in 1937, over the radio. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted it last November at the second of a pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, devoted to American composition. It was well received. Commentators mentioned its distinctive melodic subjects, its great vitality and masterly orchestration. The last movement was considered especially expressive and appealing, the scherzo charming.

BROOKLINE, MASS
CHRONICLE
1/11/40

Another in the series of youth concerts by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Symphony Hall next Wednesday afternoon at three-thirty o'clock. Director Wheeler Beckett has arranged an attractive program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
JAN 11 1940

* * *

A small dinner was given last night by Mr. and Mrs. Wilfred J. [illegible] of Erwin Park road before [illegible] Boston Symphony concert at [illegible] High School. The Funks [illegible] February 10 for a three [illegible] trip to Guatemala.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
JAN 11 1940

Music Notes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, will begin its program tonight at Carnegie Hall with Prokofieff's classical symphony instead of Beethoven's first symphony, which was originally announced. Ernest Bloch's violin concerto, with Joseph Szigeti as soloist, and Sibelius's second symphony will follow.

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M
TRIBUNE
1/11/40

Q. Which is the oldest, the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra, or the New York Philharmonic?

A. New York Philharmonic, 1842; Boston Symphony, [illegible] 1881; [illegible]

More Chiding of Symphony Audiences

Herald Jan 12

To the Editor of The Herald:

I would like to add my words as to the decided lack of manners displayed these days at most concerts one attends. At Symphony Hall, late arrivals continually disturb the musical thought of those who really come to hear the music. The disturbance at the concert of "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien" on Friday afternoon was certainly one of the rudest demonstrations of the lack of thought and consideration I have ever seen.

Then, too, why must ladies keep their hats on during a symphony concert? They certainly are most annoying, and it seems to me good taste would require their removal.

With the brilliance of an orchestra such as the Boston, it seems to me, when its joys can impart such beauty, why can't real respect for the privilege one is so fortunate to enjoy be in evidence? Surely, to share in the beauty of such an occasion as the playing of Brahms' second symphony on last Friday afternoon will be a worthy example. M. M. A.

Boston.

C.S.M. Jan [illegible]

Hannikainen Late; Burgin to Conduct

Tauno Hannikainen, the distinguished Finnish conductor, will be unable, because of war conditions, to reach America in time for the Boston Symphony Concerts of Jan. 26-27, which he was scheduled to direct as guest. His appearance, therefore, has been put over to the following week (Fed. 2-3).

Meanwhile, Richard Burgin, assistant conductor, will direct the concerts of Jan. 26-27, with Josef Hofmann as soloist, and that of Jan. 23 in Providence. These concerts fall in the second week of Dr. Koussevitzky's midwinter vacation. Nicolai Malko will be guest conductor at next week's concerts.

155

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 10 1940

orable Concert ushnell by oston Symphony

Koussevitzky Builds Splendidly with Sibelius Second

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

A year hence, if you think of it, ask a friend what the Boston Symphony Orchestra played at its two concerts in the 1939-40 Bushnell Series, and the answer will probably be: "Let me see, at the first concert it was something very noisy, by an American composer, and something else very honeyed; but the second time—Peter and the Wolf, Sibelius' Second Symphony, and Handel's B minor Concerto Grosso."

Last night's was a program to be remembered. Prokofieff's whimsy always makes a place for itself, and the other two compositions received an inspired treatment that quite lifted them out of terrestrial routine.

This was Koussevitzky at his best, and that goes for the orchestra, too, because when Koussevitzky is ignited by the divine spark, flames spread through the whole instrumental company.

Concerto a Masterpiece

The Handel Concerto, in spite of the leader's insistence that Burgin, Theodorowicz and Bedetti take all the applause as soloists, was a masterpiece of conducting. His baton technique was a model, if so personal and so exquisitely just an expression can be prescribed for anyone other than its creator. It was certainly a pattern for restraint and economy. There was much more than met the eye, for besides the concerto's deftly proportioned outlines, there was the songfulness of the larghetto which reached an impassioned expressiveness without disturbing its classical chasteness. There is reason to be grateful when the Boston string choir is heard alone in at least one number.

Enchantment of Sibelius

The end of the Sibelius Symphony came as a release. Emotions were spent in scattered shouts, that immediately subsided to more decorous and prolonged hand-clapping. It is a clamorous work, and Koussevitzky knows how to deliver the full impact. His secret is a sense of design, for Sibelius is a master of architectonics.

To listen to the Second Symphony for melody alone, of which it has a rich, ripe store, or only for its brilliant or sombre sonorities, is merely to be tossed about on a sea of aural rhetoric.

The enchantment of Sibelius lies in his refraction of thematic stuff not for the mere multiplication of ideas but for dramatic emphasis. Strangely that is a definition of the greater Beethoven. Even this early work of Sibelius warrants the comparison.

The seismic proclamations of the andante, the portentous meanderings of the string bass figures, the ineluctable chant of the oboe taken up later by the solo cello and the apparent discursiveness which eventually is bound up in divine cogency are experiences to leave the listener bored or excited, but none can stand between.

It was possible to listen to this as Finnish music, the more because of the admittedly nationalistic implications that parts of it contain, but it was not necessary to do so. It was a soul-stirring symphony, and Koussevitzky unlocked its epical secrets. Only Russia has done more for Sibelius than Koussevitzky has.

"Peter and the Wolf" continues to amuse. Audience reaction is the same in Bushnell as in Symphony Hall and Tanglewood. It is infectious, and you miss it in the recording.

Richard Hale broadened his style somewhat in delivering the narrative. The orchestra was not always en rapport, but it is probably difficult to arrive at a synchronous interpretation where the audience factor is likely to be variable.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
JAN 11 1940

Boston Symphony

Orchestra Under Koussevitzky Wins Ovation in Montclair Concert

Ovations at symphony concerts are not uncommon manifestations, but it is doubtful if one more spontaneous and heartfelt has been heard hereabouts than that rising at the close of the Boston Symphony's program last night at Montclair High School. Homage to Sibelius's "Finlandia" and admiration for its performance under Serge Koussevitzky brought a thrilled audience to its feet. The conductor and his men were applauded at great length before listeners left the auditorium.

It was a moment to remember for patrons of the Unity Institute, in the course of which there have been many notable incidents. Perhaps the intensely patriotic composition and the heroic people it represents have never been more popular than at present. Perhaps Mr. Koussevitzky and his men were especially inspired. But the noble surge of the work has never seemed more overwhelming nor the spirit it discharges more uplifting.

The exciting termination of the concert, a special event in the Unity Course, came after an evening ample in musical delights, one that must have been found fully rewarding by a capacity audience. It mattered little that the auditorium was minute for such a performance; that the instrumentalists were jammed on the stage, extended for the occasion, nor that many listeners practically were under the feet of the players. The quality of the music was superlative.

The program opened with Brahms's Second Symphony, a composition flooded with sunshine if ever one was. The affable Mr. Koussevitzky appeared right in his element and the warmth and lyricism of the writing was brought to listeners with rare effect. The undulating, intertwining melodies of the first movement, the wistful reediness of the third, the exultant note of the finale, every measure and mood was ingratiaing, so masterful was the presentation.

Artistry

It is a rather late date and also superfluous to extol the artistry of the Boston Symphony and its distinguished conductor. But it is hard to restrain praise after such a performance. One marvels again and again at the technical felicity of the orchestra, its almost uncanny faculty of capturing the inner essence of the music it plays, its boundless expressiveness, the luster of its tones.

The second number was Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, an unfamiliar offering in concert halls in this section found more than ordinarily intriguing by last night's audience. Written in Mozartean style by the Russian modernist, the work nevertheless has a strident spirit and a pace suggestive of the current era. Its melodies follow the classic line but the texture of the orchestration tends to the contemporary. Its Gavotte is particularly charming.

The remaining offering was a suite from the incidental music fashioned by Faure for the stage presentation of Maeterlinck's tragedy, "Pelleas and Melisande," antedating Debussy's operatic version. It comprised the prelude to the play, an entr'acte and an adagio for the closing scene, all reflecting the somber, mystic emanations of the drama. Given a sensitive performance, it proved interesting and appealing, although perhaps it is more effective in its original medium than as a concert number.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
JAN 10 1940

Rodzinski, Orchestra Offer Work of U. S. Composer

DR. ARTUR RODZINSKI has returned to town and will feature in the Severance Hall concerts tomorrow and Saturday the "Third Symphony" by Howard Hanson, American composer.

Presenting the old along with the new, Dr. Rodzinski also will direct the Cleveland Orchestra in the Mozart "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" serenade and the Beethoven "Seventh Symphony, in A Major."

The Mozart serenade has not been heard in its entirety in these concerts since 1925.

It was composed in 1787, a very eventful year in Mozart's life—the year he met Beethoven and the year in which his most important opera, "Don Giovanni," was completed and produced with great success.

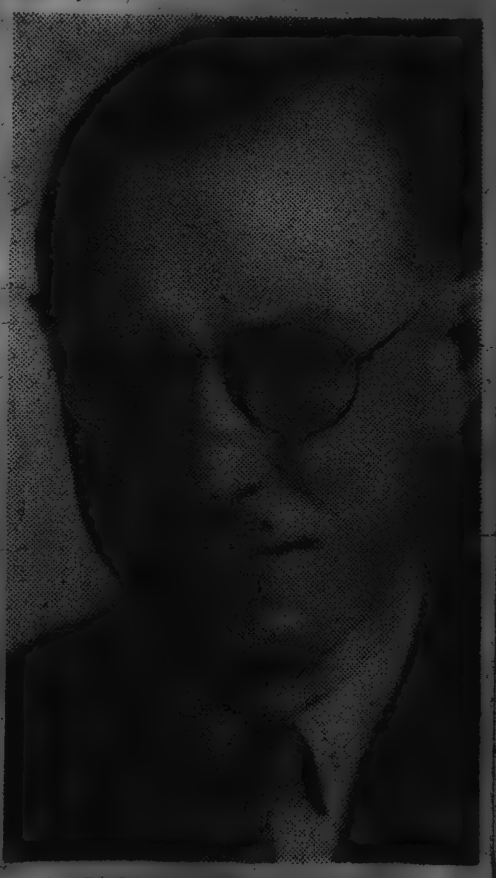
The Beethoven "Seventh" was programmed by Dr. Rodzinski in response to numerous requests. It is only slightly less popular than the famous "Fifth" and has had almost as many performances at these concerts.

Dr. Rodzinski's conducting of Hanson's symphony demonstrates further his great interest in works of living Americans. It is the third large orchestral work by present-day United States composers to appear on his Cleveland programs this season.

Dr. Hanson, composer, conductor and educator, is a native of Nebraska. He is now 43. He studied at Northwestern University, became teacher of theory and composition at the College of the Pacific in California and subsequently the dean of its Conservatory of Fine Arts. In 1921 he received a fellowship to the American Academy in Rome, where he spent three years, returning to the United States in 1924 to become director of the Eastman School of Music in Rochester, which position he now holds.

Dr. Hanson has written for piano and chamber groups as well as for symphony orchestra. His opera, "Merry Mount," was produced at the Metropolitan in 1934.

The Hanson symphony was first performed in 1937, over the radio. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted it last November at the second of a pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, devoted to American composition. It was well received. Commentators mentioned its distinctive melodic subjects, its great vitality and masterly orchestration. The last movement was considered especially expressive and appealing, the scherzo charming.



HOWARD HANSON

BROOKLINE, MASS
CHRONICLE
1/11/40

Another in the series of youth concerts by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Symphony Hall next Wednesday afternoon at three-thirty o'clock. Director Wheeler Beckett has arranged an attractive program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
JAN 11 1940

* * *

A small dinner was given last night by Mr. and Mrs. Wilfred J. Funk of Erwin Park road before the Boston Symphony concert at Montclair High School. The Funks will sail February 10 for a three weeks' trip to Guatemala.

* * *

More Chiding of Symphony Audiences

Herald Jan 12

To the Editor of The Herald:

I would like to add my words as to the decided lack of manners displayed these days at most concerts one attends. At Symphony Hall, late arrivals continually disturb the musical thought of those who really come to hear the music. The disturbance at the concert of "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien" on Friday afternoon was certainly one of the rudest demonstrations of the lack of thought and consideration I have ever seen.

Then, too, why must ladies keep their hats on during a symphony concert? They certainly are most annoying, and it seems to me good taste would require their removal.

With the brilliance of an orchestra such as the Boston, it seems to me, when its joys can impart such beauty, why can't real respect for the privilege one is so fortunate to enjoy be in evidence? Surely, to share in the beauty of such an occasion as the playing of Brahms' second symphony on last Friday afternoon will be a worthy example. M. M. A.

Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
JAN 11 1940

Music Notes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, will begin its program tonight at Carnegie Hall with Prokofieff's classical symphony instead of Beethoven's first symphony, which was originally announced. Ernest Bloch's violin concerto, with Joseph Szigeti as soloist, and Sibelius's second symphony will follow.

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M
TRIBUNE
1/11/40

Q. Which is the oldest, the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra, or the New York Philharmonic?

A. New York Philahmonic, 1842; Boston Symphony second, 1881; and Philadelphia Orchestra third, 1900.

C.S.M. Jan 12

Hannikainen Late; Burgin to Conduct

Tauno Hannikainen, the distinguished Finnish conductor, will be unable, because of war conditions, to reach America in time for the Boston Symphony Concerts of Jan. 26-27, which he was scheduled to direct as guest. His appearance, therefore, has been put over to the following week (Fed. 2-3).

Meanwhile, Richard Burgin, assistant conductor, will direct the concerts of Jan. 26-27, with Josef Hofmann as soloist, and that of Jan. 23 in Providence. These concerts fall in the second week of Dr. Koussevitzky's midwinter vacation. Nicolai Malko will be guest conductor at next week's concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 10 1940

Memorable Concert At Bushnell by Boston Symphony

Koussevitzky Builds Splendidly with Sibelius Second

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

A year hence, if you think of it, ask a friend what the Boston Symphony Orchestra played at its two concerts in the 1939-40 Bushnell Series, and the answer will probably be: "Let me see, at the first concert it was something very noisy, by an American composer, and something else very hackneyed; but the second time—Peter and the Wolf, Sibelius' Second Symphony, and Handel's B minor Concerto Grosso."

Last night's was a program to be remembered. Prokofieff's whimsy always makes a place for itself, and the other two compositions received an inspired treatment that quite lifted them out of terrestrial routine.

This was Koussevitzky at his best, and that goes for the orchestra, too, because when Koussevitzky is ignited by the divine spark, flames spread through the whole instrumental company.

Concerto a Masterpiece

The Handel Concerto, in spite of the leader's insistence that Burgin, Theodorowicz and Bedetti take all the applause as soloists, was a masterpiece of conducting. His baton technique was a model, if so personal and so exquisitely just an expression can be prescribed for anyone other than its creator. It was certainly a pattern for restraint and economy. There was much more than met the eye, for besides the concerto's deftly proportioned outlines, there was the songfulness of the larghetto which reached an impassioned expressiveness without disturbing its classical chasteness. There is reason to be grateful when the Boston string choir is heard alone in at least one number.

Enchantment of Sibelius

The end of the Sibelius Symphony came as a release. Emotions were spent in scattered shouts, that immediately subsided to more decorous and prolonged hand-clapping. It is a clamorous work, and Koussevitzky knows how to deliver the full impact. His secret is a sense of design, for Sibelius is a master of architectonics.

To listen to the Second Symphony for melody alone, of which it has a rich, ripe store, or only for its brilliant or sombre sonorities, is merely to be tossed about on a sea of aural rhetoric.

The enchantment of Sibelius lies in his refraction of thematic stuff not for the mere multiplication of ideas but for dramatic emphasis. Strangely that is a definition of the greater Beethoven. Even this early work of Sibelius warrants the comparison.

The seismic proclamations of the andante, the portentous meanderings of the string bass figures, the ineluctable chant of the oboe taken up later by the solo cello and the apparent discursiveness which eventually is bound up in divine cogency are experiences to leave the listener bored or excited, but none can stand between.

It was possible to listen to this as Finnish music, the more because of the admittedly nationalistic implications that parts of it contain, but it was not necessary to do so. It was a soul-stirring symphony, and Koussevitzky unlocked its epical secrets. Only Russia has done more for Sibelius than Koussevitzky has.

"Peter and the Wolf" continues to amuse. Audience reaction is the same in Bushnell as in Symphony Hall and Tanglewood. It is infectious, and you miss it in the recording.

Richard Hale broadened his style somewhat in delivering the narrative. The orchestra was not always en rapport, but it is probably difficult to arrive at a synchronous interpretation where the audience factor is likely to be variable.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
JAN 11 1940

Boston Symphony

Orchestra Under Koussevitzky Wins Ovation in Montclair Concert

Ovations at symphony concerts are not uncommon manifestations, but it is doubtful if one more spontaneous and heartfelt has been heard hereabouts than that rising at the close of the Boston Symphony's program last night at Montclair High School. Homage to Sibelius's "Finlandia" and admiration for its performance under Serge Koussevitzky brought a thrilled audience to its feet. The conductor and his men were applauded at great length before listeners left the auditorium.

It was a moment to remember for patrons of the Unity Institute, in the course of which there have been many notable incidents. Perhaps the intensely patriotic composition and the heroic people it represents have never been more popular than at present. Perhaps Mr. Koussevitzky and his men were especially inspired. But the noble surge of the work has never seemed more overwhelming nor the spirit it discharges more uplifting.

The exciting termination of the concert, a special event in the Unity Course, came after an evening ample in musical delights, one that must have been found fully rewarding by a capacity audience. It mattered little that the auditorium was minute for such a performance; that the instrumentalists were jammed on the stage, extended for the occasion, nor that many listeners practically were under the feet of the players. The quality of the music was superlative.

The program opened with Brahms's Second Symphony, a composition flooded with sunshine if ever one was. The affable Mr. Koussevitzky appeared right in his element and the warmth and lyricism of the writing was brought to listeners with rare effect. The undulating, intertwining melodies of the first movement, the wistful reediness of the third, the exultant note of the finale, every measure and mood was ingratiaing, so masterful was the presentation.

Artistry

It is a rather late date and also superfluous to extol the artistry of the Boston Symphony and its distinguished conductor. But it is hard to restrain praise after such a performance. One marvels again and again at the technical felicity of the orchestra, its almost uncanny faculty of capturing the inner essence of the music it plays, its boundless expressiveness, the luster of its tones.

The second number was Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, an unfamiliar offering in concert halls in this section found more than ordinarily intriguing by last night's audience. Written in Mozartean style by the Russian modernist, the work nevertheless has a strident spirit and a pace suggestive of the current era. Its melodies follow the classic line but the texture of the orchestration tends to the contemporary. Its Gavotte is particularly charming.

The remaining offering was a suite from the incidental music fashioned by Faure for the stage presentation of Maeterlinck's tragedy, "Pelleas and Melisande," antedating Debussy's operatic version. It comprised the prelude to the play, an entr'acte and an adagio for the closing scene, all reflecting the somber, mystic emanations of the drama. Given a sensitive performance, it proved interesting and appealing, although perhaps it is more effective in its original medium than as a concert number.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
JAN 10 1940

Rodzinski, Orchestra Offer Work of U. S. Composer

DR. ARTUR RODZINSKI has returned to town and will feature in the Severance Hall concerts tomorrow and Saturday the "Third Symphony" by Howard Hanson, American composer.

Presenting the old along with the new, Dr. Rodzinski also will direct the Cleveland Orchestra in the Mozart "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" serenade and the Beethoven "Seventh Symphony, in A Major."

HOWARD HANSON

The Mozart serenade has not been heard in its entirety in these concerts since 1925.

It was composed in 1787, a very eventful year in Mozart's life—the year he met Beethoven and the year in which his most important opera, "Don Giovanni," was completed and produced with great success.

The Beethoven "Seventh" was programmed by Dr. Rodzinski in response to numerous requests. It is only slightly less popular than the famous "Fifth" and has had almost as many performances at these concerts.

Dr. Rodzinski's conducting of Hanson's symphony demonstrates further his great interest in works of living Americans. It is the third large orchestral work by present-day United States composers to appear on his Cleveland programs this season.

Dr. Hanson, composer, conductor and educator, is a native of Nebraska. He is now 43. He studied at Northwestern University, became teacher of theory and composition at the College of the Pacific in California and subsequently the dean of its Conservatory of Fine Arts. In 1921 he received a fellowship to the American Academy in Rome, where he spent three years, returning to the United States in 1924 to become director of the Eastman School of Music in Rochester, which position he now holds.

Dr. Hanson has written for piano and chamber groups as well as for symphony orchestra. His opera, "Merry Mount," was produced at the Metropolitan in 1934.

The Hanson symphony was first performed in 1937, over the radio. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted it last November at the second of a pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, devoted to American composition. It was well received. Commentators mentioned its distinctive melodic subjects, its great vitality and masterly orchestration. The last movement was considered especially expressive and appealing, the scherzo charming.

BROOKLINE, MASS
CHRONICLE
1/11/40

Another in the series of youth concerts by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Symphony Hall next Wednesday afternoon at three-thirty o'clock. Director Wheeler Beckett has arranged an attractive program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
JAN 11 1940

* * *

A small dinner was given last night by Mr. and Mrs. Wilfred J. Funk of Erwin Park road before the Boston Symphony concert at Montclair High School. The Funks will sail February 10 for a three weeks' trip to Guatemala.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
JAN 11 1940

Music Notes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, will begin its program tonight at Carnegie Hall with Prokofieff's classical symphony instead of Beethoven's first symphony, which was originally announced. Ernest Bloch's violin concerto, with Joseph Szigeti as soloist, and Sibelius's second symphony will follow.

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M
TRIBUNE
1/11/40

Q. Which is the oldest, the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra, or the New York Philharmonic?

A. New York Philahmonic, 1842; Boston Symphony second, 1881; and Philadelphia Orchestra third, 1900.

More Chiding of Symphony Audiences

Herald Jan 12

To the Editor of The Herald:

I would like to add my words as to the decided lack of manners displayed these days at most concerts one attends. At Symphony Hall, late arrivals continually disturb the musical thought of those who really come to hear the music. The disturbance at the concert of "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien" on Friday afternoon was certainly one of the rudest demonstrations of the lack of thought and consideration I have ever seen.

Then, too, why must ladies keep their hats on during a symphony concert? They certainly are most annoying, and it seems to me good taste would require their removal.

With the brilliance of an orchestra such as the Boston, it seems to me, when its joys can impart such beauty, why can't real respect for the privilege one is so fortunate to enjoy be in evidence? Surely, to share in the beauty of such an occasion as the playing of Brahms' second symphony on last Friday afternoon will be a worthy example. M. M. A.
Boston.

C.S.M. Jan 12

Hannikainen Late; Burgin to Conduct

Tauno Hannikainen, the distinguished Finnish conductor, will be unable, because of war conditions, to reach America in time for the Boston Symphony Concerts of Jan. 26-27, which he was scheduled to direct as guest. His appearance, therefore, has been put over to the following week (Fed. 2-3).

Meanwhile, Richard Burgin, assistant conductor, will direct the concerts of Jan. 26-27, with Josef Hofmann as soloist, and that of Jan. 23 in Providence. These concerts fall in the second week of Dr. Koussevitzky's midwinter vacation. Nicolai Malko will be guest conductor at next week's concerts.

156

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 12 1940

——MUSIC OF THE DAY——

Ballet Theater Opens Limited Engagement

Koussevitzky Gives First Performance Here of Bloch Concerto With Szigeti

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Ambition made a night of it in a ballet way as The Ballet Theater inaugurated the most pretentious undertaking in the world of the dance at the Center Theater last night. Just as ambition should be made of sterner stuff so the opening performance might have been more polished in the dancing and more pointed in the orchestral playing. All the many choreographers and all the many dancers did not breathe as much life into the evening's entertainment as they might have. Yet for all that, it was an auspicious opening with a full house and a diverting program.

Foremost among the three ballets presented was the premiere of William Saroyan's "The Great American Goof," a balletplay, wit hmusic by Henry Brant and choreography by Eugene Loring. That it was goofy is true, and the audience found it so, but in its conservative surrealism—if such a thing exists (and if the ballet exists, such an appraisal may)—it had not only something worth while to put forth but also a naive way of presenting effectively. But it is ironic that the chief element of its effectiveness should be the scenery and lighting.

Mr. Saroyan has supplied sufficient enlightening material to explain his work. It should be quoted verbatim:

"As I see it, the living probably deserve nothing better than what they get, one at a time, although this irritates me personally. It irritates me because nobody other than myself seems to understand that the world is not real. That in reality there is no such thing. There is, of course, but I mean for all practical purposes. When I say practical I mean poetic and wonderful. The world which every one other than myself seems to have identified and accepted as the world is in reality a figment in a nightmare of an idiot. No one could possibly create anything more surrealistic and unbelievable than the world which every one believes is real and is trying very hard to inhabit.

"Willy-nilly, the story of this ballet is on this theme. It's not a difficult theme to develop pleasantly in terms of music and movement, but even so, what you finally see may be no more than what you saw in some ballet or other the last time you went to the ballet. Which will make me very sad for 35 minutes."

Now the natural conclusion to the matter is to see the ballet, recognize that there is something to it, and call it a day. What has happened is simply that Mr. Loring and Mr. Saroyan have overstated their case choreographically and intrinsically. The musical score did not help. It had too much monotony (though, of course, that was part of what every one was driving at) and little distinction, and it lacked a definitive accent. Experimentally, this was philosophy danced with dialogue added. Ballet had broken out into speech before last night but not so extensively; it made for more theater but at the same time called for more technique. That's about the gist of it. Eugene Loring danced the leading role, proved himself the fine dancer that he is. He was ably assisted by Miriam Golden and Antony Tudor and a large cast. They all needed what is best described as more snap.

The best performance of the evening was reported to be "Les Sylphides," which this reviewer did not see. The closing ballet was "Voices of Spring," a favorite last year and almost guaranteed to be perennial in its fresh appeal. Familiar dancers were in it for the most part, headed by Patricia Bowman, at her best in this comic role, and Yurek Shabelevski with special bows for Karen Conrad and Nina Stroganova. Alexander Smallens conducted the first two ballets, Harold Byrns the last. Would that he had caught the accent of the Strauss music!

* * *

BLOCH CONCERTO

All the music of the second program for the Boston Symphony Concert in Carnegie Hall last night was of the 20th century. That delightful Classical Symphony of Prokofieff prefaced the first New York performance of Bloch's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra; Sibelius' Second Symphony completed the program. Koussevitzky conducted, Joseph Szigeti played, and the Bostonians made music according to their fashion.

The new concerto is atmospheric music of a persuasive nature. While it lingers on the somber side, it has a pastorale expressiveness that commands attentive listening. As a musical work, the concerto is a definitely important new score. It has form, originality within that form, and most attractive orchestration. The soloist's part is difficult, very much a part of the work as a whole, and rewarding to hear and to play. In general the musical ideas were more motives than themes, while their settings were sometimes reminiscent of Strauss and Debussy. The work erred on the lengthy, yet it held interest because of the performance of both the soloist and the orchestra. It was undeniably Bloch, who has his own style of writing. Mr. Szigeti's penchant for stylistic playing helped to set forth the music in its best light.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

JAN 12 1940

The usual large and fashionable audience that greets the Boston Symphony attended the [redacted] concert in Carnegie Hall last evening. Joseph Szigeti, Hungarian violinist, made his initial appearance this season as the soloist, and with the artistry and skill that are familiar qualities of his interpretations performed the featured part in a new concerto by Bloch.

The work was influenced by the elemental music of the American Indian, deftly incorporated into the fabric of each movement.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

JAN 12 1940

SZIGETI PERFORMS BLOCH'S CONCERTO

Violin Work Introduced by Boston Symphony.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

Accorded a model performance by Joseph Szigeti and Serge Koussevitzky's highly cultivated musical centumvirate, the widely discussed but little-played violin concerto of Ernest Bloch was introduced to New York at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall. To the same soloist is credited the work's first performance anywhere, that given in Cleveland on December 15, 1938; also that which caused the spilling of much printers' ink in London last April. That the work has not figured in the recital halls is owing to a restriction placed upon its use, except with orchestra, for a specified period.

A product of the composer's recent Swiss sojourn, the concerto undoubtedly represents the Bloch of today. But whether it can be said to be the work of an "American" composer is a nice question that can scarcely be settled on the basis of its author's periods of residence in this country. If its parturition was Swiss, its basic theme—that which launches the first movement and figures recurrently thereafter—was conceived in San Francisco and is American Indian in character.

This is a distinctive and perhaps significant concerto. In all that pertains to mastery of materials it takes high rank among the more ambitious compositions of the last two or three decades. Free in form, its three movements have yet the inner compulsion and cohesion of organic growth. There is the seal of expertness and of decision on every page. But whether this is, indeed, a work of continuing significance may depend on attributes other than constructive skill. At the moment, its appeal would appear to be chiefly to the hierarchy of musicians. The indications last night were that for a time the commonalty of audiences may not be able to make up their minds. Until they do, it is altogether conceivable that Mr. Szigeti's rivals will prefer to do their rivaling in works of surer fire.

Harmonic Structure of Fourths.

For the musician the concerto is most absorbing on its harmonic side. It favors fourths, as most violin concertos favor thirds and sixths. Indeed, among those modern theorists who advocate a restoration of the "quartel" system of ancient times, and an end of the "tyranny" of the "tertian" practice of the last several centuries, the concerto will be saluted as heralding liberation. But therein may be the shackle of a species of academism that the composer did not contemplate. Here and there the concerto does have stretches of "paper music."

But there is richness as there is strangeness and, sometimes, harshness in this harmonic structure of fourths. It is not archaic; it is of today. There is a sybaritic sort of beauty, too, in the melodic contours, which appear to be an outgrowth of the harmony. The violin is not obscured by the orchestra. Its line is clearly defined, even though the themes are scarcely to be dissociated from their background. The first movement presents a cadenza that would appear to be an elaboration of a certain rhythmical figure that tends to unify the entire work and which at times takes on almost the character of an ostinato. Much can be said to depend on the soloist's ability to color his phrases. In this, it is to be suspected that those who can match Mr. Szigeti will not be plentiful. We have the composer's word for it that the music has no "program" and that it is not "Jewish" in inspiration or intention. But it must project an aura if it is not to seem cerebral.

Mr. Koussevitzky's other offerings were the "Classical" Symphony of Prokofieff and the Second Symphony of Sibelius, both of which Mr. Koussevitzky plays supremely well.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

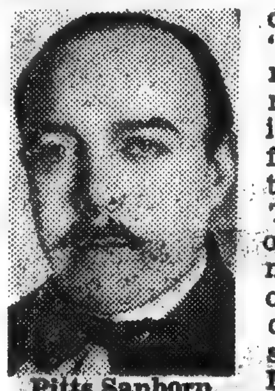
JAN 12 1940

Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall

By PITTS SANBORN.

A program of unusual interest was selected by Serge Koussevitzky for last evening's Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Prokofieff's Classical Symphony for Violin and Orchestra, previously un Joseph Szigeti as soloist. In conclusion Sibelius.

The concerto is in three movements, the first marked "Allegromoderato assai," the second "Andante," the third "Allegro deciso-moderato." Thematic material is carried over from movement to movement. The chief theme of the first movement, avowedly of "American Indian character," suggests that the Redskin dwelt in a Moussorgskyan forest.



Pitts Sanborn.

Familiarity with the concerto would doubtless answer questions that propound themselves at a first hearing, in particular whether all the prelude and preparation really lead anywhere except to silence. Yet, even at a single hearing, the beauty of the Andante is manifest. Technically the performance by Mr. Szigeti and the orchestra was of the first order.

In the familiar fields of Prokofieff and Sibelius one felt that the first order itself was transcended. The Classical Symphony has become a specialty with the Bostonians and last evening it had an irresistible precision and bravura.

The Sibelius No. 2 Mr. Koussevitzy suffused with a maximum of drama. Nothing that he demanded of the orchestra—and he demanded everything!—was too much for it to give. In the end the performance seemed to rise above the human category. One thought of Milton and his bright seraphim in burning row.

The great audience cheered the performance to the echo.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

JAN 12 1940

Szigeti Heard in Bloch Concerto With Bostonians

The feature, but not the highlight, of last night's concert by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra was ~~New York's~~ first performance of Ernest Bloch's Violin Concerto with Joseph Szigeti as soloist. The highlight of the program was the Second Symphony, in D major, of Jan Sibelius, played with unparalleled brilliance and strength by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. Originally, the program was to have begun with Beethoven's First Symphony, but a last-minute change brought forth Sergei Prokofieff's twelve-minute "Classical" Symphony.

This generation of concertgoers, like the rest of the world, is probably cognizant for the first time of the heroic character of the Finnish people, and it seemed last night that this symphony of Sibelius, particularly in the final movement, is the ultimate expression of that powerful and invincible spirit.

Dr. Koussevitzky's grasp of the Sibelius symphony is comprehensive, and is as solicitous of its weaknesses as it is appreciative of its might. It was probably this solicitude for the unhappy mood of the slow movement which prompted him to hasten the tempo a bit. It was in the last movement, the final measures of the concert, that conductor and orchestra reached their full height as interpreters and virtuosi, and the tonal magnificence and vitality of the playing brought a huge audience to its feet in a thrilling ovation.

The Bloch concerto and Szigeti are good friends, for it was Szigeti who gave the work its world premiere in 1938, and it is he who plays it in the recording which made its appearance a few months ago.

The concerto is excessively gloomy, and when a cheerful moment finally arrives in the concluding movement it is much needed. Except for its pessimistic tone, and thematic repetitiousness, the work is worthy of Mr. Szigeti's talents, and both were advantageously displayed. O'G.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 12 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Bloch's Violin Concerto Has Premiere Here With Joseph Szigeti as the Soloist

PROKOFIEFF'S WORK HEARD

Jean Sibelius's Symphony No. 2 Is Played as Climax of Koussevitzky Program

By OLIN DOWNES

The New York première of Ernst Bloch's violin concerto, with Joseph Szigeti as the soloist, made the novelty of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conductor, last night in Carnegie Hall. The other works were Prokofieff's "Classic" symphony and Jean Sibelius's Symphony No. 2.

Bloch's concerto is freely rhapsodic in detail and symphonic in line. On the whole, it is economical in its technical demands, although few but leading virtuosi would have resources corresponding to all the requirements of the music. Mr. Szigeti lavished upon this score his utmost musicianship, technic and interpretive power. He did not have an easy task, for this is not a work that courts the gallery or particularly repays the performer, in terms of effect, for his pains.

Szigeti Gets Ovation

When we come to the quality of the music itself it is necessary to confess disappointment. There is little that is new in point of invention; the development is more repetition than growth of ideas; the work, which is too long, harks back to the Bloch of the "Schelomo" and the "Psalms" for its best pages, without paralleling those scores in significance and vitality. The slow movement is perhaps the most distinguished of the three divisions. Its proportions are admirably conceived, it has mood but not sufficient to give rise to music of significance. After the performance Mr. Szigeti was recalled several times with every token of affability and approval by the audience.

The concert began with an appropriately neat performance of a work which still amuses and never does more—the Prokofieff "Classic" symphony. This slick piece remains entertaining by virtue of its smooth and dexterous take-off of the Italian manner of composers of an earlier day. It is one more evidence of Prokofieff's astonishing versatility, restlessness and ability to wear many masks. Where, under all these masks, is the essential Prokofieff? That is the question which, despite his exceptional fertility, experience and skill, has not yet been definitely answered. It goes without saying that the performance was finished and witty in a way that corresponded to the music, which, however, ceases to astonish.

Sibelius Symphony Played

The impressive climax of this concert came, of course, with the Sibelius symphony, and this in spite of the fact that the performance was on the whole the most perfunctory, undistinguished and pedestrian reading of the score that we have heard from Dr. Koussevitzky and his players. But, as ever, the excitement of the scherzo and the finale were irresistable. Those who listened to the magnificent piece could not but think of the saga that is being enacted now in the wilds of Sibelius's native land—for it is of that ancestral spirit and northern grandeur that the music speaks. Of course, there was an ovation.

And it was remarkable how prophetic this score and others of Sibelius's early and romantic period are now shown to be. In a time when the world was enjoying an uncommonly long peace, this muttering and reverberating music was being created. No other composer of that time or this one had any similar message to deliver. Other music which seemed more novel and piquant claimed the attention of the musical world of the turn of the century. Most of its artistic preoccupations have gone the way of temporary things, while Sibelius emerges greater, more important, more contemporaneous, than ever.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 12 1940

——MUSIC OF THE DAY——

Ballet Theater Opens Limited Engagement

Koussevitzky Gives First Performance Here of Bloch Concerto With Szigeti

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Ambition made a night of it in a ballet way as The Ballet Theater inaugurated the most pretentious undertaking in the world of the dance at the Center Theater last night. Just as ambition should be made of sterner stuff so the opening performance might have been more polished in the dancing and more pointed in the orchestral playing. All the many choreographers and all the many dancers did not breathe as much life into the evening's entertainment as they might have. Yet for all that, it was an auspicious opening with a full house and a diverting program.

Foremost among the three ballets presented was the premiere of William Saroyan's "The Great American Goof," a balletplay, wit hmusic by Henry Brant and choreography by Eugene Loring. That it was goofy is true, and the audience found it so, but in its conservative surrealism—if such a thing exists (and if the ballet exists, such an appraisal may)—it had not only something worth while to put forth but also a naive way of presenting effectively. But it is ironic that the chief element of its effectiveness should be the scenery and lighting.

Mr. Saroyan has supplied sufficient enlightening material to explain his work. It should be quoted verbatim:

"As I see it, the living probably deserve nothing better than what they get, one at a time, although this irritates me personally. It irritates me because nobody other than myself seems to understand that the world is not real. That in reality there is no such thing. There is, of course, but I mean for all practical purposes. When I say practical I mean poetic and wonderful. The world which every one other than myself seems to have identified and accepted as the world is in reality a figment in a nightmare of an idiot. No one could possibly create anything more surrealistic and unbelievable than the world which every one believes is real and is trying very hard to inhabit.

"Willy-nilly, the story of this ballet is on this theme. It's not a difficult theme to develop pleasantly in terms of music and movement, but even so, what you finally see may be no more than what you saw in some ballet or other the last time you went to the ballet. Which will make me very sad for 35 minutes."

Now the natural conclusion to the matter is to see the ballet, recognize that there is something to it, and call it a day. What has happened is simply that Mr. Loring and Mr. Saroyan have overstated their case choreographically and intrinsically. The musical score did not help. It had too much monotony (though, of course, that was part of what every one was driving at) and little distinction, and it lacked a definitive accent. Experimentally, this was philosophy danced with dialogue added. Ballet had broken out into speech before last night but not so extensively; it made for more theater but at the same time called for more technique. That's about the gist of it. Eugene Loring danced the leading role, proved himself the fine dancer that he is. He was ably assisted by Miriam Golden and Antony Tudor and a large cast. They all needed what is best described as more snap.

The best performance of the evening was reported to be "Les Sylphides," which this reviewer did not see. The closing ballet was "Voices of Spring," a favorite last year and almost guaranteed to be perennial in its fresh appeal. Familiar dancers were in it for the most part, headed by Patricia Bowman, at her best in this comic role, and Yurek Shabelevski with special bows for Karen Conrad and Nina Stroganova. Alexander Smallens conducted the first two ballets, Harold Byrns the last. Would that he had caught the accent of the Strauss music!

* * *

BLOCH CONCERTO

All the music of the second program for the Boston Symphony Concert in Carnegie Hall last night was of the 20th century. That delightful Classical Symphony of Prokofieff prefaced the first New York performance of Bloch's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra; Sibelius' Second Symphony completed the program. Koussevitzky conducted, Joseph Szigeti played, and the Bostonians made music according to their fashion.

The new concerto is atmospheric music of a persuasive nature. While it lingers on the somber side, it has a pastorale expressiveness that commands attentive listening. As a musical work, the concerto is a definitely important new score. It has form, originality within that form, and most attractive orchestration. The soloist's part is difficult, very much a part of the work as a whole, and rewarding to hear and to play. In general the musical ideas were more motives than themes, while their settings were sometimes reminiscent of Strauss and Debussy. The work erred on the lengthy, yet it held interest because of the performance of both the soloist and the orchestra. It was undeniably Bloch, who has his own style of writing. Mr. Szigeti's penchant for stylistic playing helped to set forth the music in its best light.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

JAN 12 1940

The usual large and fashionable audience that greets the Boston Symphony attended the [redacted] concert in Carnegie Hall last evening. Joseph Szigeti, Hungarian violinist, made his initial appearance this season as the soloist, and with the artistry and skill that are familiar qualities of his interpretations performed the featured part in a new concerto by Bloch.

The work was influenced by the elemental music of the American Indian, deftly incorporated into the fabric of each movement.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

JAN 12 1940

SZIGETI PERFORMS BLOCH'S CONCERTO

Violin Work Introduced by Boston Symphony.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

Accorded a model performance by Joseph Szigeti and Serge Koussevitzky's highly cultivated musical centumvirate, the widely discussed but little-played violin concerto of Ernest Bloch was introduced to New York at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall. To the same soloist is credited the work's first performance anywhere, that given in Cleveland on December 15, 1938; also that which caused the spilling of much printers' ink in London last April. That the work has not figured in the recital halls is owing to a restriction placed upon its use, except with orchestra, for a specified period.

A product of the composer's recent Swiss sojourn, the concerto undoubtedly represents the Bloch of today. But whether it can be said to be the work of an "American" composer is a nice question that can scarcely be settled on the basis of its author's periods of residence in this country. If its parturition was Swiss, its basic theme—that which launches the first movement and figures recurrently thereafter—was conceived in San Francisco and is American Indian in character.

This is a distinctive and perhaps significant concerto. In all that pertains to mastery of materials it takes high rank among the more ambitious compositions of the last two or three decades. Free in form, its three movements have yet the inner compulsion and cohesion of organic growth. There is the seal of expertness and of decision on every page. But whether this is, indeed, a work of continuing significance may depend on attributes other than constructive skill. At the moment, its appeal would appear to be chiefly to the hierarchy of musicians. The indications last night were that for a time the commonalty of audiences may not be able to make up their minds. Until they do, it is altogether conceivable that Mr. Szigeti's rivals will prefer to do their rivaling in works of surer fire.

Harmonic Structure of Fourths.

For the musician the concerto is most absorbing on its harmonic side. It favors fourths, as most violin concertos favor thirds and sixths. Indeed, among those modern theorists who advocate a restoration of the "quartel" system of ancient times, and an end of the "tyranny" of the "tertian" practice of the last several centuries, the concerto will be saluted as heralding liberation. But therein may be the shackle of a species of academism that the composer did not contemplate. Here and there the concerto does have stretches of "paper music."

But there is richness as there is strangeness and, sometimes, harshness in this harmonic structure of fourths. It is not archaic; it is of today. There is a sybaritic sort of beauty, too, in the melodic contours, which appear to be an outgrowth of the harmony. The violin is not obscured by the orchestra. Its line is clearly defined, even though the themes are scarcely to be dissociated from their background. The first movement presents a cadenza that would appear to be an elaboration of a certain rhythmical figure that tends to unify the entire work and which at times takes on almost the character of an ostinato. Much can be said to depend on the soloist's ability to color his phrases. In this, it is to be suspected that those who can match Mr. Szigeti will not be plentiful. We have the composer's word for it that the music has no "program" and that it is not "Jewish" in inspiration or intention. But it must project an aura if it is not to seem cerebral.

Mr. Koussevitzky's other offerings were the "Classical" Symphony of Prokofieff and the Second Symphony of Sibelius, both of which Mr. Koussevitzky plays supremely well.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JAN 12 1940

Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall

By PITTS SANBORN.

A program of unusual interest was selected by Serge Koussevitzky for last evening's Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Prokofieff's Classical Symphony b for Violin and Orchestra, previously un
Joseph Szigeti as soloist. In conclusion
Sibelius.

Pitts Sanborn.

The concerto is in three movements, the first marked "Allegro-moderato assai," the second "Andante," the third "Allegro deciso-moderato." Thematic material is carried over from movement to movement. The chief theme of the first movement, avowedly of "American Indian character," suggests that the Redskin dwelt in a Moussorgskyan forest.

Familiarity with the concerto would doubtless answer questions that propound themselves at a first hearing, in particular whether all the prelude and preparation really lead anywhere except to silence. Yet, even at a single hearing, the beauty of the Andante is manifest. Technically the performance by Mr. Szigeti and the orchestra was of the first order.

In the familiar fields of Prokofieff and Sibelius one felt that the first order itself was transcended. The Classical Symphony has become a specialty with the Bostonians and last evening it had an irresistible precision and bravura.

The Sibelius No. 2 Mr. Koussevitzy suffused with a maximum of drama. Nothing that he demanded of the orchestra—and he demanded everything!—was too much for it to give. In the end the performance seemed to rise above the human category. One thought of Milton and his bright seraphim in burning row.

The great audience cheered the performance to the echo.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

JAN 12 1940

Szigeti Heard in Bloch Concerto With Bostonians

The feature, but not the highlight, of last night's concert by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra was ~~New York's~~ first performance of Ernest Bloch's Violin Concerto with Joseph Szigeti as soloist. The highlight of the program was the Second Symphony, in D major, of Jan Sibelius, played with unparalleled brilliance and strength by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. Originally, the program was to have begun with Beethoven's First Symphony, but a last-minute change brought forth Sergei Prokofieff's twelve-minute "Classical" Symphony.

This generation of concertgoers, like the rest of the world, is probably cognizant for the first time of the heroic character of the Finnish people, and it seemed last night that this symphony of Sibelius, particularly in the final movement, is the ultimate expression of that powerful and invincible spirit.

Dr. Koussevitzky's grasp of the Sibelius symphony is comprehensive, and is as solicitous of its weaknesses as it is appreciative of its might. It was probably this solicitude for the unhappy mood of the slow movement which prompted him to hasten the tempo a bit. It was in the last movement, the final measures of the concert, that conductor and orchestra reached their full height as interpreters and virtuosi, and the tonal magnificence and vitality of the playing brought a huge audience to its feet in a thrilling ovation.

The Bloch concerto and Szigeti are good friends, for it was Szigeti who gave the work its world premiere in 1938, and it is he who plays it in the recording which made its appearance a few months ago.

The concerto is excessively gloomy, and when a cheerful moment finally arrives in the concluding movement it is much needed. Except for its pessimistic tone, and thematic repetitiousness, the work is worthy of Mr. Szigeti's talents, and both were advantageously displayed.

O'G.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 12 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Bloch's Violin Concerto Has Premiere Here With Joseph Szigeti as the Soloist

PROKOFIEFF'S WORK HEARD

Jean Sibelius's Symphony No. 2 Is Played as Climax of Koussevitzky Program

By OLIN DOWNES

The New York première of Ernst Bloch's violin concerto, with Joseph Szigeti as the soloist, made the novelty of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conductor, last night in Carnegie Hall. The other works were Prokofieff's "Classic" symphony and Jean Sibelius's Symphony No. 2.

Bloch's concerto is freely rhapsodic in detail and symphonic in line. On the whole, it is economical in its technical demands, although few but leading virtuosi would have resources corresponding to all the requirements of the music. Mr. Szigeti lavished upon this score his utmost musicianship, technic and interpretive power. He did not have an easy task, for this is not a work that courts the gallery or particularly repays the performer, in terms of effect, for his pains.

Szigeti Gets Ovation

When we come to the quality of the music itself it is necessary to confess disappointment. There is little that is new in point of invention; the development is more repetition than growth of ideas; the work, which is too long, harks back to the Bloch of the "Schelomo" and the "Psalms" for its best pages, without paralleling those scores in significance and vitality. The slow movement is perhaps the most distinguished of the three divisions. Its proportions are admirably conceived, it has mood but not sufficient to give rise to music of significance. After the performance Mr. Szigeti was recalled several times with every token of affability and approval by the audience.

The concert began with an appropriately neat performance of a work which still amuses and never does more—the Prokofieff "Classic" symphony. This slick piece remains entertaining by virtue of its smooth and dexterous take-off of the Italian manner of composers of an earlier day. It is one more evidence of Prokofieff's astonishing versatility, restlessness and ability to wear many masks. Where, under all these masks, is the essential Prokofieff? That is the question which, despite his exceptional fertility, experience and skill, has not yet been definitely answered. It goes without saying that the performance was finished and witty in a way that corresponded to the music, which, however, ceases to astonish.

Sibelius Symphony Played

The impressive climax of this concert came, of course, with the Sibelius symphony, and this in spite of the fact that the performance was on the whole the most perfunctory, undistinguished and pedestrian reading of the score that we have heard from Dr. Koussevitzky and his players. But, as ever, the excitement of the scherzo and the finale were irresistable. Those who listened to the magnificent piece could not but think of the saga that is being enacted now in the wilds of Sibelius's native land—for it is of that ancestral spirit and northern grandeur that the music speaks. Of course, there was an ovation.

And it was remarkable how prophetic this score and others of Sibelius's early and romantic period are now shown to be. In a time when the world was enjoying an uncommonly long peace, this muttering and reverberating music was being created. No other composer of that time or this one had any similar message to deliver. Other music which seemed more novel and piquant claimed the attention of the musical world of the turn of the century. Most of its artistic preoccupations have gone the way of temporary things, while Sibelius emerges greater, more important, more contemporaneous, than ever.

156

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 12 1940

——MUSIC OF THE DAY——

Ballet Theater Opens Limited Engagement

Koussevitzky Gives First Performance Here of Bloch Concerto With Szigeti

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Ambition made a night of it in a ballet way as The Ballet Theater inaugurated the most pretentious undertaking in the world of the dance at the Center Theater last night. Just as ambition should be made of sterner stuff so the opening performance might have been more polished in the dancing and more pointed in the orchestral playing. All the many choreographers and all the many dancers did not breathe as much life into the evening's entertainment as they might have. Yet for all that, it was an auspicious opening with a full house and a diverting program.

Foremost among the three ballets presented was the premiere of William Saroyan's "The Great American Goof," a balletplay, wit hmusic by Henry Brant and choreography by Eugene Loring. That it was goofy is true, and the audience found it so, but in its conservative surrealism—if such a thing exists (and if the ballet exists, such an appraisal may)—it had not only something worth while to put forth but also a naive way of presenting effectively. But it is ironic that the chief element of its effectiveness should be the scenery and lighting.

Mr. Saroyan has supplied sufficient enlightening material to explain his work. It should be quoted verbatim:

"As I see it, the living probably deserve nothing better than what they get, one at a time, although this irritates me personally. It irritates me because nobody other than myself seems to understand that the world is not real. That in reality there is no such thing. There is, of course, but I mean for all practical purposes. When I say practical I mean poetic and wonderful. The world which every one other than myself seems to have identified and accepted as the world is in reality a figment in a nightmare of an idiot. No one could possibly create anything more surrealistic and unbelievable than the world which every one believes is real and is trying very hard to inhabit.

"Willy-nilly, the story of this ballet is on this theme. It's not a difficult theme to develop pleasantly in terms of music and movement, but even so, what you finally see may be no more than what you saw in some ballet or other the last time you went to the ballet. Which will make me very sad for 35 minutes."

Now the natural conclusion to the matter is to see the ballet, recognize that there is something to it, and call it a day. What has happened is simply that Mr. Loring and Mr. Saroyan have overstated their case choreographically and intrinsically. The musical score did not help. It had too much monotony (though, of course, that was part of what every one was driving at) and little distinction, and it lacked a definitive accent. Experimentally, this was philosophy danced with dialogue added. Ballet had broken out into speech before last night but not so extensively; it made for more theater but at the same time called for more technique. That's about the gist of it. Eugene Loring danced the leading role, proved himself the fine dancer that he is. He was ably assisted by Miriam Golden and Antony Tudor and a large cast. They all needed what is best described as more snap.

The best performance of the evening was reported to be "Les Sylphides," which this reviewer did not see. The closing ballet was "Voices of Spring," a favorite last year and almost guaranteed to be perennial in its fresh appeal. Familiar dancers were in it for the most part, headed by Patricia Bowman, at her best in this comic role, and Yurek Shabelevski with special bows for Karen Conrad and Nina Stroganova. Alexander Smallens conducted the first two ballets, Harold Byrns the last. Would that he had caught the accent of the Strauss music!

* * *

BLOCH CONCERTO

All the music of the second program for the Boston Symphony Concert in Carnegie Hall last night was of the 20th century. That delightful Classical Symphony of Prokofieff prefaced the first New York performance of Bloch's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra; Sibelius' Second Symphony completed the program. Koussevitzky conducted, Joseph Szigeti played, and the Bostonians made music according to their fashion.

The new concerto is atmospheric music of a persuasive nature. While it lingers on the somber side, it has a pastorale expressiveness that commands attentive listening. As a musical work, the concerto is a definitely important new score. It has form, originality within that form, and most attractive orchestration. The soloist's part is difficult, very much a part of the work as a whole, and rewarding to hear and to play. In general the musical ideas were more motives than themes, while their settings were sometimes reminiscent of Strauss and Debussy. The work erred on the lengthy, yet it held interest because of the performance of both the soloist and the orchestra. It was undeniably Bloch, who has his own style of writing. Mr. Szigeti's penchant for stylistic playing helped to set forth the music in its best light.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

JAN 12 1940

The usual large and fashionable audience that greets the Boston Symphony attended the [illegible] concert in Carnegie Hall last evening. Joseph Szigeti, Hungarian violinist, made his initial appearance this season as the soloist, and with the artistry and skill that are familiar qualities of his interpretations performed the featured part in a new concerto by Bloch.

The work was influenced by the elemental music of the American Indian, deftly incorporated into the fabric of each movement.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

JAN 12 1940

SZIGETI PERFORMS BLOCH'S CONCERTO

Violin Work Introduced by Boston Symphony.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

Accorded a model performance by Joseph Szigeti and Serge Koussevitzky's highly cultivated ~~musical~~ centumvirate, the widely discussed but little-played violin concerto of Ernest Bloch was introduced to New York at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall. To the same soloist is credited the work's first performance anywhere, that given in Cleveland on December 15, 1938; also that which caused the spilling of much printers' ink in London last April. That the work has not figured in the recital halls is owing to a restriction placed upon its use, except with orchestra, for a specified period.

A product of the composer's recent Swiss sojourn, the concerto undoubtedly represents the Bloch of today. But whether it can be said to be the work of an "American" composer is a nice question that can scarcely be settled on the basis of its author's periods of residence in this country. If its parturition was Swiss, its basic theme—that which launches the first movement and figures recurrently thereafter—was conceived in San Francisco and is American Indian in character.

This is a distinctive and perhaps significant concerto. In all that pertains to mastery of materials it takes high rank among the more ambitious compositions of the last two or three decades. Free in form, its three movements have yet the inner compulsion and cohesion of organic growth. There is the seal of expertness and of decision on every page. But whether this is, indeed, a work of continuing significance may depend on attributes other than constructive skill. At the moment, its appeal would appear to be chiefly to the hierarchy of musicians. The indications last night were that for a time the commonalty of audiences may not be able to make up their minds. Until they do, it is altogether conceivable that Mr. Szigeti's rivals will prefer to do their rivaling in works of surer fire.

Harmonic Structure of Fourths.

For the musician the concerto is most absorbing on its harmonic side. It favors fourths, as most violin concertos favor thirds and sixths. Indeed, among those modern theorists who advocate a restoration of the "quartel" system of ancient times, and an end of the "tyranny" of the "tertian" practice of the last several centuries, the concerto will be saluted as heralding liberation. But therein may be the shackle of a species of academism that the composer did not contemplate. Here and there the concerto does have stretches of "paper music."

But there is richness as there is strangeness and, sometimes, harshness in this harmonic structure of fourths. It is not archaic; it is of today. There is a sybaritic sort of beauty, too, in the melodic contours, which appear to be an outgrowth of the harmony. The violin is not obscured by the orchestra. Its line is clearly defined, even though the themes are scarcely to be dissociated from their background. The first movement presents a cadenza that would appear to be an elaboration of a certain rhythmical figure that tends to unify the entire work and which at times takes on almost the character of an ostinato. Much can be said to depend on the soloist's ability to color his phrases. In this, it is to be suspected that those who can match Mr. Szigeti will not be plentiful. We have the composer's word for it that the music has no "program" and that it is not "Jewish" in inspiration or intention. But it must project an aura if it is not to seem cerebral.

Mr. Koussevitzky's other offerings were the "Classical" Symphony of Prokofieff and the Second Symphony of Sibelius, both of which Mr. Koussevitzky plays supremely well.

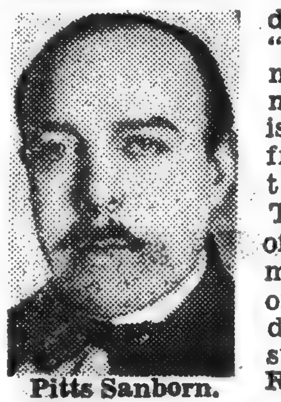
THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JAN 12 1940

Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall

By PITTS SANBORN.

A program of unusual interest was selected by Serge Koussevitzky for last evening's Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Prokofieff's Classical Symphony began it. Ernest Bloch's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, previously unheard in New York, followed, with Joseph Szigeti as soloist. In conclusion came the Second Symphony of Sibelius.



Pitts Sanborn.

The concerto is in three movements, the first marked "Allegro-moderato assai," the second "Andante," the third "Allegro deciso-moderato." Thematic material is carried over from movement to movement. The chief theme of the first movement, avowedly of "American Indian character," suggests that the Redskin dwelt in a Moussorgskyan forest.

Familiarity with the concerto would doubtless answer questions that propound themselves at a first hearing, in particular whether all the prelude and preparation really lead anywhere except to silence. Yet, even at a single hearing, the beauty of the Andante is manifest. Technically the performance by Mr. Szigeti and the orchestra was of the first order.

In the familiar fields of Prokofieff and Sibelius one felt that the first order itself was transcended. The Classical Symphony has become a specialty with the Bostonians and last evening it had an irresistible precision and bravura.

The Sibelius No. 2 Mr. Koussevitzy suffused with a maximum of drama. Nothing that he demanded of the orchestra—and he demanded everything!—was too much for it to give. In the end the performance seemed to rise above the human category. One thought of Milton and his bright seraphim in burning row.

The great audience cheered the performance to the echo.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

JAN 12 1940

Szigeti Heard in Bloch Concerto With Bostonians

The feature, but not the highlight, of last night's concert by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra was ~~New York's~~ first performance of Ernest Bloch's Violin Concerto with Joseph Szigeti as soloist. The highlight of the program was the Second Symphony, in D major, of Jan Sibelius, played with unparalleled brilliance and strength by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. Originally, the program was to have begun with Beethoven's First Symphony, but a last-minute change brought forth Sergei Prokofieff's twelve-minute "Classical" Symphony.

This generation of concertgoers, like the rest of the world, is probably cognizant for the first time of the heroic character of the Finnish people, and it seemed last night that this symphony of Sibelius, particularly in the final movement, is the ultimate expression of that powerful and invincible spirit.

Dr. Koussevitzky's grasp of the Sibelius symphony is comprehensive, and is as solicitous of its weaknesses as it is appreciative of its might. It was probably this solicitude for the unhappy mood of the slow movement which prompted him to hasten the tempo a bit. It was in the last movement, the final measures of the concert, that conductor and orchestra reached their full height as interpreters and virtuosi, and the tonal magnificence and vitality of the playing brought a huge audience to its feet in a thrilling ovation.

The Bloch concerto and Szigeti are good friends, for it was Szigeti who gave the work its world premiere in 1938, and it is he who plays it in the recording which made its appearance a few months ago.

The concerto is excessively gloomy, and when a cheerful moment finally arrives in the concluding movement it is much needed. Except for its pessimistic tone, and thematic repetitiousness, the work is worthy of Mr. Szigeti's talents, and both were advantageously displayed. O'G.

Bloch's Violin Concerto Has Premiere Here With Joseph Szigeti as the Soloist

PROKOFIEFF'S WORK HEARD

Jean Sibelius's Symphony No. 2 Is Played as Climax of Koussevitzky Program

By OLIN DOWNES

The New York première of Ernst Bloch's violin concerto, with Joseph Szigeti as the soloist, made the novelty of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conductor, last night in Carnegie Hall. The other works were Prokofieff's "Classic" symphony and Jean Sibelius's Symphony No. 2.

Bloch's concerto is freely rhapsodic in detail and symphonic in line. On the whole, it is economical in its technical demands, although few but leading virtuosi would have resources corresponding to all the requirements of the music. Mr. Szigeti lavished upon this score his utmost musicianship, technic and interpretive power. He did not have an easy task, for this is not a work that courts the gallery or particularly repays the performer, in terms of effect, for his pains.

Szigeti Gets Ovation

When we come to the quality of the music itself it is necessary to confess disappointment. There is little that is new in point of invention; the development is more repetition than growth of ideas; the work, which is too long, harks back to the Bloch of the "Schelomo" and the "Psalms" for its best pages, without paralleling those scores in significance and vitality. The slow movement is perhaps the most distinguished of the three divisions. Its proportions are admirably conceived, it has mood but not sufficient to give rise to music of significance. After the performance Mr. Szigeti was recalled several times with every token of affability and approval by the audience.

The concert began with an appropriately neat performance of a work which still amuses and never does more—the Prokofieff "Classic" symphony. This slick piece remains entertaining by virtue of its smooth and dexterous take-off of the Italian manner of composers of an earlier day. It is one more evidence of Prokofieff's astonishing versatility, restlessness and ability to wear many masks. Where, under all these masks, is the essential Prokofieff? That is the question which, despite his exceptional fertility, experience and skill, has not yet been definitely answered. It goes without saying that the performance was finished and witty in a way that corresponded to the music, which, however, ceases to astonish.

Sibelius Symphony Played

The impressive climax of this concert came, of course, with the Sibelius symphony, and this in spite of the fact that the performance was on the whole the most perfunctory, undistinguished and pedestrian reading of the score that we have heard from Dr. Koussevitzky and his players. But, as ever, the excitement of the scherzo and the finale were irresistable. Those who listened to the magnificent piece could not but think of the saga that is being enacted now in the wilds of Sibelius's native land—for it is of that ancestral spirit and northern grandeur that the music speaks. Of course, there was an ovation.

And it was remarkable how prophetic this score and others of Sibelius's early and romantic period are now shown to be. In a time when the world was enjoying an uncommonly long peace, this muttering and reverberating music was being created. No other composer of that time or this one had any similar message to deliver. Other music which seemed more novel and piquant claimed the attention of the musical world of the turn of the century. Most of its artistic preoccupations have gone the way of temporary things, while Sibelius emerges greater, more important, more contemporaneous, than ever.

N. Y. STAATS-ZEITUNG UND [illegible] FREITAG, den 12. JANUAR 1940

Aus der Musikwelt

Boston Orchestra

Boſton Symphony Orcheſtra, 2. Abendkonzert der New Yorker Spielzeit 1939–40, Carnegie Hall; Dirigent: Serge Kouſſevitzky; Soliſt: Joſeph Szigeti (Geige). Das Programm:

„Klaſſiſche" Symphonie ....Prokofieff
Violinkonzert ....Bloch
Soliſt: Joſeph Szigeti
Symphonie No. 2, D-Dur ....Sibelius

Von HANS STABENAU

Unter den Dirigenten, die gegenwärtig in Amerika tätig ſind, verſteht es Serge Kouſſevitzky entſchieden am beſten, Programme zuſammenzuſtellen, die originell, trotzdem aber nicht ſenſationell ſind. Er hat auch wie kein anderer den Sinn für den Wert oder Unwert neuer Tonſchöpfungen, von denen ſein Boſton Symphony Orcheſtra allwinterlich mehr aufführt als irgendein anderes Enſemble im Lande.

Mit dem Violinkonzert von Erneſt Bloch, das Kouſſevitzky hier unter Mitwirkung des ungariſchen Geigers Joſeph Szigeti zur Erſtaufführung brachte, hat er ebenfalls wieder einen ſchönen Fund gemacht, obſchon zugegeben werden muß, daß es nicht ſein Orcheſter war, das dieſes Werk 1938 zur Uraufführung brachte, ſondern das Cleveland Orcheſtra. Aber ohne Kouſſevitzky hätte es New York wahrſcheinlich noch lange nicht zu hören bekommen.

Wie viele andere Werke des in der Schweiz beheimateten Tonſchöpfers ſo hat auch dieſes Violinkonzert entſchieden etwas Programmatiſches. Bloch ſelbſt erklärt jedoch, daß er kein beſtimmtes Programm im Sinne gehabt habe wie etwa in ſeinem „Schelomo" und ſeinem „Die Stimme in der Wildnis", beide für Cello und Orcheſter geſchrieben. Trotzdem drängen ſich beim Anhören des Konzertes Gedanken auf, die mit Form und Weſen des Werkes an ſich nichts zu tun haben. Der Hörer wird verleitet dazu durch die außerordentlich gelockerte Form des Werkes wie durch die Tatſache, daß die Violine, ſo individuell und charaktervoll ſie auch ihre Stimme erheben darf, doch nicht im herkömmlichen Sinne konzertmäßig verwandt wird, zumindeſt im weitaus größeren Teil des Konzertes nicht.

Auffällig iſt das orientaliſche Kolorit des Ganzen, bei Bloch nicht überraſchend, hat er ſich doch eingehend mit der jüdiſchen Muſiküberlieferung beſchäftigt und wiederholt verſucht, das verſchüttete Gut in ſeinen Tonſchöpfungen neu zu beleben. Der erſte Satz beſchwört eine orientaliſche Landſchaft herauf; zitternd liegt die Hitze über dem Sande und von fern ruft eine mahnende Stimme. Hauchzart ſetzt die Geige an, aber ihr Ruf durchdringt klar und deutlich die flimmernde Atmoſphäre. Es iſt, als mahne ſie zum Gebet, zur Andacht. In rhythmiſchen Akzenten, die fremdartig klingen und ſich dauernd verändern, ſingt ſie und erhebt ihre Stimme ſchließlich zu leidenſchaftlichen Ausbruch, bis ſie die anderen Stimmen mitreißt. Der Aufruhr verebbt, Geige und Orcheſter werfen ſich ſpielend kurze Echos zu. Unvermutet und unbegreiflich fällt nach einer Weile eine ganz konventionell wirkende Solokadenz ein, die mit ihrem techniſchen Feuerwerk nicht recht zu dem Vorangegangenen paſſen will und geradezu ſtört. Es iſt eine lange Kadenz, und wenn danach dann der Anfang des Satzes wieder aufklingt, findet man nicht mehr zu der damit heraufbeſchworenen Stimmung zurück.

Der zweite Satz, ein Andante, wird wie der erſte vom Orcheſter eingeleitet, und wieder ſetzt die Geige, diesmal ſogar gedämpft, wie von fernher ein. Ihr Geſang wird allmählich feſter, ſchärfer, akzentuierter, behält aber immer etwas Edles, faſt Hoheitsvolles im Ausdruck. Der kurze Satz iſt von anſprechender, weit ausſchwingender Melodik und ſteht in ſcharfem Kontraſt zum Finale, das mit einem brutalen Aufſchrei beginnt. Es zuckt wie von Blitzen, und die beſchwichtigend ſingende Geige braucht eine Weile, ehe ſich ihre Ruhe den anderen Inſtrumenten mitteilt. Die Stimmung hellt ſich auf; es iſt wie Sonnenſchein nach ſchwerem Regen; auch die Vögel ſind dankbar für die Wärme und erheben ihre Stimmen. Die paſtorale Atmoſphäre wird jedoch von der immer energiſcher werdenden Violine zerſtreut, und nun vollzieht ſich ähnlich wie im erſten Satz ein völliger Stimmungsbruch. Der Schluß nähert ſich in Form und Gehalt wieder dem konventionellen Konzert; das Programmatiſche tritt dem Formalen gegenüber zurück. Auch das Soloinſtrument darf noch einmal ſeine Künſte zeigen, und der Satz iſt zuende.

Der Soliſt wurde für ſeine hervorragende, ungemein eindringliche Wiedergabe des Violinparts durch lang anhaltenden Beifall ausgezeichnet. Das Orcheſter allein erntete neue Lorbeeren mit der „Klaſſiſchen" Symphonie Prokofieffs und der 2. Symphonie von Sibelius, die das Konzert umrahmten.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
JAN 13 1940

Boston Symphony Returns to Borough, Audience Is Large

Concert, Under Direction of Serge Koussevitvky, Most Commendable

By PAUL J. BROWN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to Brooklyn last night for the second of the series of five concerts will will have given here this season, and under its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, gave a concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music that was most commendable for its musicianship. The concert, sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Brooklyn committee for the Boston Symphony Orcehstra concerts, must also have been an economic and social success as well, as there was a large evening-dressed audience that occupied all the available seats and much standing space.

The chief work of the evening was Robert Schumann's Symphony in B flat major, No. 1, which Mr. Kousevitzky conducted with great skill and full abundance of the singing tones that Schumann created. Particularly in the Larghetto and the Scherzo was the orchestra outstanding. The ochestra also player Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, a work far less familiary, but one which is strikingly and simply melodious for a modern Russian composition.

The program opened with the Overture to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro" and contained two other short works, Faure's Suite from the stage music to "Pelleas and Melisande" and Sibelius' tone poem, "Finlandia." The latter concluded the concert. Although "Finlanda" has been played so frequently taht it well may have surfeited the desire of many concertgoers, it was applauded with wild approval by last night's audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JAN 13 1940

—MUSIC OF THE DAY—

Boston Symphony Plays at Academy

Schumann and Prokofieff Symphonies Are Conducted by Koussevitzky

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Old and new, but not the very new, were harmoniously balanced in the program of the second concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented at the Academy of Music last night. Since it played as the first orchestra of the land would be expected to play, the evening was one of undiluted pleasure.

There were two symphonies on the program, but the second was only an echo of the first, even in time since it was only half as long. Three quarters of a century separated them, a period sufficient to change the entire aspect of music. To a certain extent such was the case. Schumann's Symphony No. 1 in B Flat, Opus 38, familiarly known as the "Spring" symphony, is as good an epitome of Romanticism in music as any, while Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, Opus 25, is as true an estimate of Classicism in music according to a modern composer's point of view as one could find. So concise is his writing, so formal his procedure that his miniature symphony is a far better example of symphonic writing than Schumann's first essay into the traditional form. Both composers paid their homage to the first element of music: Rhythm. Again Prokofieff is the more expert composer because he controlled his interest in rhythm whereas Schumann let it control him. But the majority of the audience would have undoubtedly considered the Schumann before the Prokofieff, no matter how delightful the music of the latter, simply because of the human appeal expressed in Schumann's music.

Koussevitzky conducted a superb performance of the Schumann, but then he did just as much for the Prokofieff. Thus the concert attained an artistic balance worth noting. It is to the conductor's credit that, while he was able to place Schumann's defects in the background, nevertheless the monotony which exists in the Scherzo and even in the Finale could be readily detected because Schumann's orchestration and instrumentation were not expert.

The concert opened with Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro." After the symphonies came Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande" Suite from the stage music to Maeterlinck's tragedy and Sibelius' "Finlandia." The Faure was interesting, atmospheric music suggestive of Debussy's finer conception of the same material. Quite moving was the Molto Adagio, which, in its funereal aspect, is fittingly associated with the closing scene of the play. To include it in this concert was a nice bit of program-making. The concert ended with a stirring performance of the Sibelius.

MONTCLAIR, N. J.
TIMES
1/12/40

Boston Symphony Proves Outstanding in Its Concert

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra thrilled a Unity Concert Course audience at Montclair High School Auditorium Wednesday night with a concert that could easily be characterized as the most distinguished musical event of this season and probably of all preceding seasons.

Qualities that made this concert outstanding were a great conductor leading a great orchestra in the interpretation of the great music of Brahms' Symphony no. 2, in D major, opus 73, and Sibelius' "Finlandia," symphonic poem, opus 26. Lesser compositions of Faure and Prokofieff completed a beautifully proportioned program.

A distinguished audience, from which many were turned away for lack of room, was keyed to a high pitch of emotional enthusiasm by the vivid re-creation of the major works mentioned. It expressed its approval after the Brahms work with thunderous and prolonged applause, and gave a demonstration after "Finlandia" by rising spontaneously and applauding to give vent to its deep feeling for the music and its special appropriateness at this time.

Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretations have long been noted for their technical perfection and the inspired spirit he infuses into them. It was quite evident that he lived again the beautiful music of this symphony and that his own enthusiasm aroused in his players a responsiveness that still further vivified a performance that rose to exalted heights of musical interpretation. Breathless silence followed the close of each movement until the last, when the applause broke loose with tremendous force.

The eminent conductor could be imagined as having his tongue in his cheek when he programmed Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, for the mere name of the composer summoned memories of his dissonant excursions into the field of modern composition. But the little work fully lives up to its title in its innocuous innocence and glib transparency. The orchestra played it with sparkling spontaneity and a daintiness of touch that made it wholly delightful especially the gavotte which replaced the conventional minuet.

Gabriel Faure's Suite from the incidental music composed for Maeterlinck's "Pelleas et Malisande" provided contrast between this and the closing number. It should not be confused with Debussy's opera of the same name, for it was first performed four years before the premiere of that work. In three movements, the music is appropriately colored and is strongly suggestive of the sombre mysticism of the play. It was given a beautifully finished performance.

"Finlandia" is a moving, pulsing portrayal of the struggles and oppressions through which the little nation on Baltic has lived in the past, and against which it is now putting up a fight that will ring down the ages as one of the most heroic in all history.

The rugged strength and originality of the music, relieved toward the close by the quiet entrance in the woodwinds of the beloved theme that seems like a folk-song, then communicated by the strings and finally by the full orchestra, accounts not only for its national, but for its world-wide popularity.

American audiences long since took it to their hearts, but now its appeal is magnified by a situation with which all who read the newspapers and listen to their radios are familiar. Dr. Koussevitzky and his players gave it an interpretation of moving intensity that closed the concert on a musical and emotional climax.

The orchestra, with its carefully selected, extremely competent players and their incessant rehearsal under the same conductor over a long period, is as close to perfection in its performance as any body of human beings can expect to be. Every one present at this concert will look forward to its return with the wish that the interval may not be too long.

In providing this remarkable attraction for its patrons the Unity Concert Course management has again performed a notable service for all lovers of the best in music. The only drawback at this concert was the limited size of the auditorium, which, it is to be hoped, may some day be replaced by a concert hall worthy of the town and its unfailing appreciation of the great artists and organizations, who are only too happy to appear before the kind of audiences that Montclair always furnishes.

WALTER S. YOUNG.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JAN 13 1940

Symphony Concert Is Given

Society Attends Performance at Academy of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played to a large and representative audience last evening at its second of the current series of five concerts in the Opera House of the Academy of Music. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the program an account of which appears elsewhere in today's paper.

Many entertained guests at the performance. Mrs. Benjamin Prince was hostess in her box to Mr. and Mrs. Eric Hall Haight, Mr. and Mrs. James G. McDonald, Mr. and Mrs. K. P. Mikhalenkoff, W. R. Fluftiness and Leslie Hodson. Mrs. Dean C. Osborne had as her box guests Mrs. Theodore Frohne, Donald G. C. Sinclair, Judge Lewis L. Fawcett, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred L. Fawcett, Mrs. James M. Fawcett and Miss Lucille Fawcett.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum's guests were Miss Anna Remsen Alexandre, Dr. and Mrs. Dudley Roberts, Harry K. Knapp, Mr. and Mrs. Eugene S. Taliaferro, Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Blum, Mrs. John J. Whitehead and George Gardiner.

The Berkeley Alumnae Association was represented in Box 8 by Miss Mary Anderson, Miss Gladys Linton, Miss Mary Noaks, Miss Charlotte Glass, Mrs. Walter E. Warner Jr., Mrs. Gilbert Thirkield, Miss Dorothy Taylor and Miss Claire Beebe.

Miss Emma Jessie Ogg was hostess in the Adelphi Alumnae box, where Mr. and Mrs. Laurence E. Frost, Mrs. Elmer T. Sullebarger, Mrs. E. A. Callaghan, Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd W. Johnson and Miss Adeline Pettit were the guests.

The Army and Navy box was occupied by Lt. Col. and Mrs. Peter K. Kelly, Lt. Col. and Mrs. Leslie D. Baskin, Maj. and Mrs. E. R. Barrows and Capt. and Mrs. Harold E. Smyser.

Mrs. Helen Jones Quinn was hostess in her box to Mr. and Mrs. William W. Brush, Mr. and Mrs. William R. Taylor and Mr. and Mrs. Henry C. Badgley.

In the Brooklyn Woman's Club box were Mrs. Oliver G. Carter, Mrs. Jason Davis, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. De Hart Bergen and Mrs. Wilson Briggs Zimmer.

Brooklyn Girl Scouts occupied Box 9.

Box 12 was used by high school students who are leaders and players in high school orchestras in this borough and Queens.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, now in their 54th season in Brooklyn, are given under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which James G. McDonald is president; the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport executive chairman.

N. Y. STAATS-ZEITUNG UND HEROLD, FREITAG, den 12. JANUAR 1940

Aus der Musikwelt

Boston Orchestra

Boſton Symphony Orcheſtra, 2. Abendkonzert der New Yorker Spielzeit 1939–40, Carnegie Hall: Dirigent: Serge Kouſſevitzky; Soliſt: Joſeph Szigeti (Geige). Das Programm:

„Klaſſiſche" Symphonie ....Prokofieff
Violinkonzert ....Bloch
Soliſt: Joſeph Szigeti
Symphonie No. 2, D-Dur ....Sibelius

Von HANS STABENAU

Unter den Dirigenten, die gegenwärtig in Amerika tätig ſind, verſteht es Serge Kouſſevitzky entſchieden am beſten, Programme zuſammenzuſtellen, die originell, trotzdem aber nicht ſenſationell ſind. Er hat auch wie kein anderer den Sinn für den Wert oder Unwert neuer Tonſchöpfungen, von denen ſein Boſton Symphony Orcheſtra allwinterlich mehr aufführt als irgendein anderes Enſemble im Lande.

Mit dem Violinkonzert von Erneſt Bloch, das Kouſſevitzky hier unter Mitwirkung des ungariſchen Geigers Joſeph Szigeti zur Erſtaufführung brachte, hat er ebenfalls wieder einen ſchönen Fund gemacht, obſchon zugegeben werden muß, daß es nicht ſein Orcheſter war, das dieſes Werk 1938 zur Uraufführung brachte, ſondern das Cleveland Orcheſtra. Aber ohne Kouſſevitzky hätte es New York wahrſcheinlich noch lange nicht zu hören bekommen.

Wie viele andere Werke des in der Schweiz beheimateten Tonſchöpfers ſo hat auch dieſes Violinkonzert entſchieden etwas Programmatiſches. Bloch ſelbſt erklärt jedoch, daß er kein beſtimmtes Programm im Sinne gehabt habe wie etwa in ſeinem „Schelomo" und ſeinem „Die Stimme in der Wildnis", beide für Cello und Orcheſter geſchrieben. Trotzdem drängen ſich beim Anhören des Konzertes Gedanken auf, die mit Form und Weſen des Werkes an ſich nichts zu tun haben. Der Hörer wird verleitet dazu durch die außerordentlich gelockerte Form des Werkes wie durch die Tatſache, daß die Violine, ſo individuell und charaktervoll ſie auch ihre Stimme erheben darf, doch nicht im herkömmlichen Sinne konzertmäßig verwandt wird, zumindeſt im weitaus größeren Teil des Konzertes nicht.

Auffällig iſt das orientaliſche Kolorit des Ganzen, bei Bloch nicht überraſchend, hat er ſich doch eingehend mit der jüdiſchen Muſiküberlieferung beſchäftigt und wiederholt verſucht, das verſchüttete Gut in ſeinen Tonſchöpfungen neu zu beleben. Der erſte Satz beſchwört eine orientaliſche Landſchaft herauf; zitternd liegt die Hitze über dem Sande und von fern ruft eine mahnende Stimme. Hauchzart ſetzt die Geige an, aber ihr Ruf durchdringt klar und deutlich die flimmernde Atmoſphäre. Es iſt, als mahne ſie zum Gebet, zur Andacht. In rhythmiſchen Akzenten, die fremdartig klingen und ſich dauernd verändern, ſingt ſie und erhebt ihre Stimme ſchließlich zu leidenſchaftlichen Ausbruch, bis ſie die anderen Stimmen mitreißt. Der Aufruhr verebbt, Geige und Orcheſter werfen ſich ſpielend kurze Echos zu. Unvermutet und unbegreiflich fällt nach einer Weile eine ganz konventionell wirkende Solokadenz ein, die mit ihrem techniſchen Feuerwerk nicht recht zu dem Vorangegangenen paſſen will und geradezu ſtört. Es iſt eine lange Kadenz, und wenn danach dann der Anfang des Satzes wieder aufklingt, findet man nicht mehr zu der damit heraufbeſchworenen Stimmung zurück.

Der zweite Satz, ein Andante, wird wie der erſte vom Orcheſter eingeleitet, und wieder ſetzt die Geige, diesmal ſogar gedämpft, wie von fernher ein. Ihr Geſang wird allmählich feſter, ſchärfer, akzentuierter, behält aber immer etwas Edles, faſt Hoheitsvolles im Ausdruck. Der kurze Satz iſt von anſprechender, weit ausſchwingender Melodik und ſteht in ſcharfem Kontraſt zum Finale, das mit einem brutalen Aufſchrei beginnt. Es zuckt wie von Blitzen, und die beſchwichtigend ſingende Geige braucht eine Weile, ehe ſich ihre Ruhe den anderen Inſtrumenten mitteilt. Die Stimmung hellt ſich auf; es iſt wie Sonnenſchein nach ſchwerem Regen; auch die Vögel ſind dankbar für die Wärme und erheben ihre Stimmen. Die paſtorale Atmoſphäre wird jedoch von der immer energiſcher werdenden Violine zerſtreut, und nun vollzieht ſich ähnlich wie im erſten Satz ein völliger Stimmungsbruch. Der Schluß nähert ſich in Form und Gehalt wieder dem konventionellen Konzert; das Programmatiſche tritt dem Formalen gegenüber zurück. Auch das Soloinſtrument darf noch einmal ſeine Künſte zeigen, und der Satz iſt zuende.

Der Soliſt wurde für ſeine hervorragende, ungemein eindringliche Wiedergabe des Violinparts durch lang anhaltenden Beifall ausgezeichnet. Das Orcheſter allein erntete neue Lorbeeren mit der „Klaſſiſchen" Symphonie Prokofieffs und der 2. Symphonie von Sibelius, die das Konzert umrahmten.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
JAN 13 1940

Boston Symphony Returns to Borough, Audience Is Large

Concert, Under Direction of Serge Koussevitvky, Most Commendable

By PAUL J. BROWN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to Brooklyn last night for the second of the series of five concerts will will have given here this season, and under its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, gave a concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music that was most commendable for its musicianship. The concert, sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Brooklyn committee for the Boston Symphony Orcehstra concerts, must also have been an economic and social success as well, as there was a large evening-dressed audience that occupied all the available seats and much standing space.

The chief work of the evening was Robert Schumann's Symphony in B flat major, No. 1, which Mr. Koussevitzky conducted with great skill and full abundance of the singing tones that Schumann created. Particularly in the Larghetto and the Scherzo was the orchestra outstanding. The ochestra also player Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, a work far less familiary, but one which is strikingly and simply melodious for a modern Russian composition.

The program opened with the Overture to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro" and contained two other short works, Faure's Suite from the stage music to "Pelleas and Melisande" and Sibelius' tone poem, "Finlandia." The latter concluded the concert. Although "Finlanda" has been played so frequently taht it well may have surfeited the desire of many concertgoers, it was applauded with wild approval by last night's audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JAN 13 1940

—MUSIC OF THE DAY—

Boston Symphony Plays at Academy

Schumann and Prokofieff Symphonies Are Conducted by Koussevitzky

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Old and new, but not the very new, were harmoniously balanced in the program of the second concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented at the Academy of Music last night. Since it played as the first orchestra of the land would be expected to play, the evening was one of undiluted pleasure.

There were two symphonies on the program, but the second was only an echo of the first, even in time since it was only half as long. Three quarters of a century separated them, a period sufficient to change the entire aspect of music. To a certain extent such was the case. Schumann's Symphony No. 1 in B Flat, Opus 38, familiarly known as the "Spring" symphony, is as good an epitome of Romanticism in music as any, while Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, Opus 25, is as true an estimate of Classicism in music according to a modern composer's point of view as one could find. So concise is his writing, so formal his procedure that his miniature symphony is a far better example of symphonic writing than Schumann's first essay into the traditional form. Both composers paid their homage to the first element of music: Rhythm. Again Prokofieff is the more expert composer because he controlled his interest in rhythm whereas Schumann let it control him. But the majority of the audience would have undoubtedly considered the Schumann before the Prokofieff, no matter how delightful the music of the latter, simply because of the human appeal expressed in Schumann's music.

Koussevitzky conducted a superb performance of the Schumann, but then he did just as much for the Prokofieff. Thus the concert attained an artistic balance worth noting. It is to the conductor's credit that, while he was able to place Schumann's defects in the background, nevertheless the monotony which exists in the Scherzo and even in the Finale could be readily detected because Schumann's orchestration and instrumentation were not expert.

The concert opened with Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro." After the symphonies came Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande" Suite from the stage music to Maeterlinck's tragedy and Sibelius' "Finlandia." The Faure was interesting, atmospheric music suggestive of Debussy's finer conception of the same material. Quite moving was the Molto Adagio, which, in its funereal aspect, is fittingly associated with the closing scene of the play. To include it in this concert was a nice bit of program-making. The concert ended with a stirring performance of the Sibelius.

MONTCLAIR, N.J.
TIMES
1/12/40

Boston Symphony Proves Outstanding in Its Concert

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra thrilled a Unity Concert Course audience at Montclair High School Auditorium Wednesday night with a concert that could easily be characterized as the most distinguished musical event of this season and probably of all preceding seasons.

Qualities that made this concert outstanding were a great conductor leading a great orchestra in the interpretation of the great music of Brahms' Symphony no. 2, in D major, opus 73, and Sibelius' "Finlandia," symphonic poem, opus 26. Lesser compositions of Faure and Prokofieff completed a beautifully proportioned program.

A distinguished audience, from which many were turned away for lack of room, was keyed to a high pitch of emotional enthusiasm by the vivid re-creation of the major works mentioned. It expressed its approval after the Brahms work with thunderous and prolonged applause, and gave a demonstration after "Finlandia" by rising spontaneously and applauding to give vent to its deep feeling for the music and its special appropriateness at this time.

Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretations have long been noted for their technical perfection and the inspired spirit he infuses into them. It was quite evident that he lived again the beautiful music of this symphony and that his own enthusiasm aroused in his players a responsiveness that still further vivified a performance that rose to exalted heights of musical interpretation. Breathless silence followed the close of each movement until the last, when the applause broke loose with tremendous force.

The eminent conductor could be imagined as having his tongue in his cheek when he programmed Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, for the mere name of the composer summoned memories of his dissonant excursions into the field of modern composition. But the little work fully lives up to its title in its innocuous innocence and glib transparency. The orchestra played it with sparkling spontaneity and a daintiness of touch that made it wholly delightful especially the gavotte which replaced the conventional minuet.

Gabriel Faure's Suite from the incidental music composed for Maeterlinck's "Pelleas et Malisande" provided contrast between this and the closing number. It should not be confused with Debussy's opera of the same name, for it was first performed four years before the premiere of that work. In three movements, the music is appropriately colored and is strongly suggestive of the sombre mysticism of the play. It was given a beautifully finished performance.

"Finlandia" is a moving, pulsing portrayal of the struggles and oppressions through which the little nation on Baltic has lived in the past, and against which it is now putting up a fight that will ring down the ages as one of the most heroic in all history.

The rugged strength and originality of the music, relieved toward the close by the quiet entrance in the woodwinds of the beloved theme that seems like a folk-song, then communicated by the strings and finally by the full orchestra. accounts not only for its national, but for its world-wide popularity.

American audiences long since took it to their hearts, but now its appeal is magnified by a situation with which all who read the newspapers and listen to their radios are familiar. Dr. Koussevitzky and his players gave it an interpretation of moving intensity that closed the concert on a musical and emotional climax.

The orchestra, with its carefully selected, extremely competent players and their incessant rehearsal under the same conductor over a long period, is as close to perfection in its performance as any body of human beings can expect to be. Every one present at this concert will look forward to its return with the wish that the interval may not be too long.

In providing this remarkable attraction for its patrons the Unity Concert Course management has again performed a notable service for all lovers of the best in music. The only drawback at this concert was the limited size of the auditorium, which, it is to be hoped, may some day be replaced by a concert hall worthy of the town and its unfailing appreciation of the great artists and organizations, who are only too happy to appear before the kind of audiences that Montclair always furnishes.

WALTER S. YOUNG.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JAN 13 1940

Symphony Concert Is Given

Society Attends Performance at Academy of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played ~~to a large~~ and representative audience last evening at its second of the current series of five concerts in the Opera House of the Academy of Music. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the program an account of which appears elsewhere in today's paper.

Many entertained guests at the performance. Mrs. Benjamin Prince was hostess in her box to Mr. and Mrs. Eric Hall Haight, Mr. and Mrs. James G. McDonald, Mr. and Mrs. K. P. Mikhalenkoff, W. R. Fluftikoss and Leslie Hodson. Mrs. Dean C. Osborne had as her box guests Mrs. Theodore Frohne, Donald G. C. Sinclair, Judge Lewis L. Fawcett, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred L. Fawcett, Mrs. James M. Fawcett and Miss Lucille Fawcett.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum's guests were Miss Anna Remsen Alexandre, Dr. and Mrs. Dudley Roberts, Harry K. Knapp, Mr. and Mrs. Eugene S. Taliaferro, Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Blum, Mrs. John J. Whitehead and George Gardiner.

The Berkeley Alumnae Association was represented in Box 8 by Miss Mary Anderson, Miss Gladys Linton, Miss Mary Noaks, Miss Charlotte Glass, Mrs. Walter E. Warner Jr., Mrs. Gilbert Thirkield, Miss Dorothy Taylor and Miss Claire Beebe.

Miss Emma Jessie Ogg was hostess in the Adelphi Alumnae box, where Mr. and Mrs. Laurence E. Frost, Mrs. Elmer T. Sullebarger, Mrs. E. A. Callaghan, Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd W. Johnson and Miss Adeline Pettit were the guests.

The Army and Navy box was occupied by Lt. Col. and Mrs. Peter K. Kelly, Lt. Col. and Mrs. Leslie D. Baskin, Maj. and Mrs. E. R. Barrows and Capt. and Mrs. Harold E. Smyser.

Mrs. Helen Jones Quinn was hostess in her box to Mr. and Mrs. William W. Brush, Mr. and Mrs. William R. Taylor and Mr. and Mrs. Henry C. Badgley.

In the Brooklyn Woman's Club box were Mrs. Oliver G. Carter, Mrs. Jason Davis, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. De Hart Bergen and Mrs. Wilson Briggs Zimmer.

Brooklyn Girl Scouts occupied Box 9.

Box 12 was used by high school students who are leaders and players in high school orchestras in this borough and Queens.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, now in their 54th season in Brooklyn, are given under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which James G. McDonald is president; the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport executive chairman.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 13 1940

MUSIC

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge [illegible]vitzky, conductor, second evening concert of the season at Carnegie Hall Thursday with Joseph Szigeti, violinist, as soloist in the following program:
Prokofieff ....Classical Symphony
Bloch....Concerto for violin and orchestra
First Time in New York.
Sibelius,
Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 43

Bloch and Sibelius

Despite the decorum which generally characterizes the demeanor of the subscribers to the Carnegie Hall series of our resident and visiting orchestras, cheers are occasionally added to the customary manual applause, but the fervently voiced enthusiasm which broke forth immediately after the closing triumphant D-major chord of Jean Sibelius's second symphony opened an ovation of memorable and exceptional intensity, while Dr. Koussevitzky twice returned to the podium and called upon his admirable orchestra to rise and share in the demonstration.

In this ardent manifestation of approval, the capacity audience were undoubtedly conscious not only of Sibelius and his music and the notable merits of its interpreters but also of the composer's country. Whether or not Dr. Koussevitzky had present history in mind in placing this work on the program, he could hardly have chosen any Finnish music, except for "Finlandia," more likely to be evocative of enthusiasm just now than the finale of the symphony in D, with its long-wrought, cumulative and emotionally stirring closing climax.

* * *

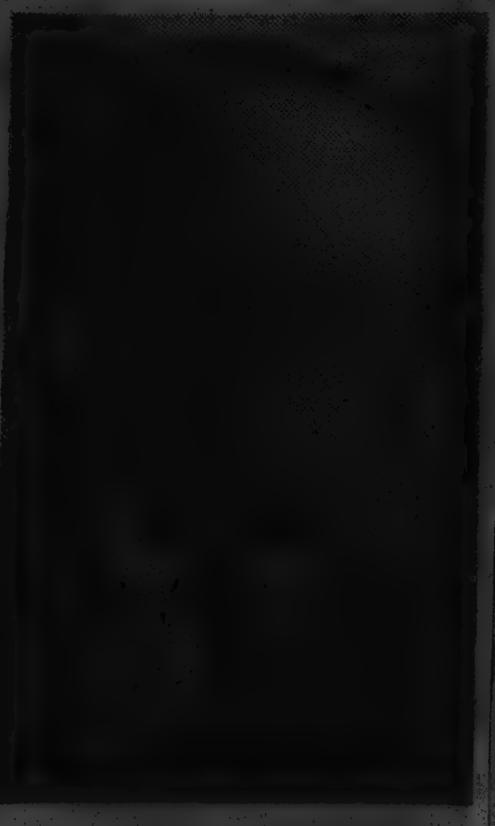
But this work, which we will have opportunity to hear again from the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra next Saturday and Sunday, has for several years been one of the best known of Sibelius's seven symphonies, and from a strictly musical point of view the principal interest of a rewarding evening lay in the latest major work of a composer who is also ranked among the principal creative musical figures of our day, set forth by the talented Hungarian violinist who has been its interpreter in its performances thus far both in America and Europe.

Most important new music generally comes to New York in a short or a longer course of time, but not infrequently after hearings in other musical centers. Such was the case with Ernest Bloch's concerto, which was first played by the Cleveland Orchestra under the guest conductorship of Dimitri Mitropoulos, with Mr. Szigeti as the soloist, on Dec. 15, 1938. It was played late last winter in London, under Sir Thomas Beecham, and in Paris, and was first performed by the Boston Symphony in its Boston concerts last week. Mr. Bloch, according to his own program note, made innumerable sketches for the concerto, his first work for violin with orchestra, between 1930 and 1937, and completed it in the French Alps two winters ago.

* * *

The concerto takes about thirty-five minutes to play; more than half of this span of time is occupied by the first of the three movements. Consciousness of time is not, however, the primary first impression made by a work of exceptional eloquence expressed in individual accents. Mr. Bloch, in his notes, disclaims for the concerto any "Jewish" inspiration or intention, such as that which characterizes his "Israel" symphony, his "Schelomo," or his Three Jewish Poems. And yet, while the opening subject, in accord with the composer's own comment, has a certain American Indian flavor there was much in the new concerto as heard Thursday night, which recalled "Schelomo." A certain parallelism could be noticed between the solo violin and the solo cello of the earlier work, both suggesting a single character and a many-voiced group meditating, together or in alternation, on the same subject, although the concerto has not the prevalently dark-hued mood and atmosphere which marks the notable musical recreation of King Solomon.

Ernest Bloch



Lucienne Bloch

Whose violin concerto was played for the first time here in Thursday night's Boston Symphony concert

In its instrumentation and in the contour and rhythms of its thematic ideas the concerto also has its frequent reminders of the well known works of Bloch's early maturity; it also has its plangent moments, and the melody of the solo violin sometimes has an ornamentation and elaboration of an Oriental character in its long lyric line. Two or three frequently stated themes pervade the work as a whole, but it employs a considerable variety of thematic ideas, and its structure suggests a rhapsody rather than that of the standard classic or romantic concerto. Yet there is a sense of form and purpose.

Mr. Szigeti gave a laudable interpretation of the violin solo, in his thorough command of its technical requirements, his understanding of the relation of his role to that of the orchestra, and especially in his understanding of the expressive purport of the music. The solo, while technically exacting, sometimes treats its interpretative instrument as a member of the general ensemble and is not always particularly grateful as a medium for the exhibition of an artist's virtuosity. Its occasionally involved nature and, at times, an impression of lack of variety between the three movements in regard to dominant color and atmosphere, are among the points which may detract somewhat from the appeal of his work as a whole; its course sometimes gives a sense of deviousness. But in general it merits high regard as music of exceptional individuality and poetic imaginativeness.

The orchestra deserved equal praise with the soloist for its performance and its understanding of this score, which won applause of considerable warmth. The excellence of Dr. Koussevitzky's ensemble was also convincingly revealed in its ingratiating interpretation of Prokofieff's short and high-spirited symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 13 1940

Boston Orchestra Friends Society Explained at Tea

"Although the Boston Symphony Orchestra faces a yearly deficit of about $100,000, it must be remembered that its budget runs from $750,000 to a million and it is therefore a big business," said Reginald C. Foster of Boston to a small group of guests invited to a tea at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Charles F. T. Seaverns yesterday afternoon to hear about the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Mr. Foster is chairman.

This society has for years, by donations of its members, met the orchestra's deficit and while in the beginning it comprised chiefly Boston people, it has grown geographically until it now has members in Chicago, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, London and Paris. There have been a few members in Hartford for some time and during the past year, the local roster has grown to about 30.

Wants Support Base Strengthened

The contributions range from $5 to $1,000 from a total membership of about 2,000. It is the object of Mr. Foster, as he explained it, to constantly increase the base of this support, so that rather than being dependent upon a relatively few large gifts, a vastly greater number of persons contribute smaller amounts.

He told of the origin of the orchestra in 1881, when Col. Henry Lee Higginson conceived the idea of building a musical organization in America in every way comparable to the orchestras of Europe; how from the beginning it was his resolve to cultivate American composers and to bring the best of music to the greatest number of people.

Mr. Foster paid tribute to the manner in which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was carrying out the ideals of Colonel Higginson by encouraging American composers. He told how Howard Hanson, in Boston recently for the performance of his Third Symphony, referred to Koussevitzky as the father of American composers. "I say this not because he played my third symphony today but because it was he who played my first symphony, thus making it possible for me to write a second and a third," the composer had said.

Reaches Masses of People

The speaker cited as an example of the way in which the orchestra was reaching great masses of people the Esplanade concerts in Boston, which are sometimes heard by 20,000 people, and the Stockbridge concerts at Tanglewood, where the audiences run up to 7,000 for a single concert.

Mr. Foster pointed out that the Boston Orchestra was unique in that it provided the musicians with employment during 46 weeks of the year. The regular season is 24 weeks long, followed by the pop concerts, then by Tanglewood, which this coming season will comprise three weeks of concerts following weeks of academy activity that will enlist the aid of many of the players as faculty members.

The orchestra plays 108 concerts during the year, and each of these is preceded by three rehearsals. "You have no idea of the vitality of the men of this orchestra, and of Koussevitzky. It was a revelation to me."

He referred to Mr. Seaverns as the "oldest friend of the Boston Symphony Orchestra" and as one who had heard every conductor the orchestra ever had had.

Mr. Seaverns, in introducing Mr. Foster, told of the special regard that Hartford had for the orchestra, built up during the 50 years it has been visiting this city with almost uninterrupted regularity. He spoke of the first concert here in 1885, four years after the orchestra's founding, with Gericke conducting a symphony by Raff.

TH
HARTFORD,
COURA

JAN 13 1940

Symphony Financing Explained

Hartford's Share of Boston Orchestra Deficit About $2000, Says R. C. Foster

Upon invitation of Mr. and Mrs. Charles F. T. Seaverns, a small group of Hartford music lovers met at the Seaverns home on Asylum Avenue Friday afternoon, to hear Reginald C. Foster speak about The Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Foster, who is chairman of the society, stated that the incorporated Boston Symphony Orchestra operates with a $100,000 annual deficit, against a budget of between $750,000 and $1,000,000. Inasmuch as the Esplanade, "Pops" and Berkshire concerts are self-supporting, the deficit accrues against the 100 regular symphonic concerts played from October 1 to May 1, Mr. Foster said. Pro-rated against the whole deficit, the individual concert deficit can be roughly determined as $1000, he indicated.

"Since the orchestra plays two concerts here a season, the deficit accrued in these visits can be set about $2000," Mr. Foster declared.

Suggests Joining Society.

Then, explaining that the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has an annual membership of people who contribute anything from $1 a year up, to help support the orchestra, Mr. Foster suggested that there might be local music lovers who would like to join the society and contribute toward clearing up the "Hartford deficit."

Mr. Foster stressed the fact that no "drive" or "campaign" in Hartford, is in the society's mind at all; that there will be no Hartford "organization"; and that the whole arrangement of local contribution will be entirely informal. Persons contributing here will be members of the Boston society, which now has more than 2000 names on its roster, including contributors from many parts of the world.

Each year the members have a private concert at the annual meeting, and during the symphonic season, their programs are forwarded to them a day in advance of the concerts.

Mr. Foster also emphasized the fact that this appeal for members in the Boston society would in no way be allowed to conflict with any projects of the Hartford Symphony Orchestra, or its supporting organization, the Symphony Society of Connecticut. He lauded the Hartford orchestra and signified the willingness of the Boston orchestral organization to do anything it could toward helping local musical endeavour.

The speaker said that Mr. Seaverns's name "should appear on the honor list of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," as he has attended concerts by every one of the conductors the orchestra has had during its more than half century existence.

Tea was served following the talk by Mr. Foster.

Contributions Sought

It was made clear by Mr. Foster and Mr. Seaverns that there would be no formal organization here as exists in Providence and other cities that the orchestra visits. A procedure would be effected by which interested persons could contribute and this would be explained by letter later on.

There were a number of questions asked, indicating a lively interest in the orchestra and its affairs. In response to a query as to whether the contributing Friends received any special consideration, it was pointed out that there was a concert in Symphony Hall each year, followed by a reception. It was said that such a reception might be a possibility in Hartford.

While no definite objective was set, Mr. Foster pointed out that the deficit applied against each concert amounted to about $1,000 and that it was hoped that that sum could be raised for each concert played in all the cities visited.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORKER
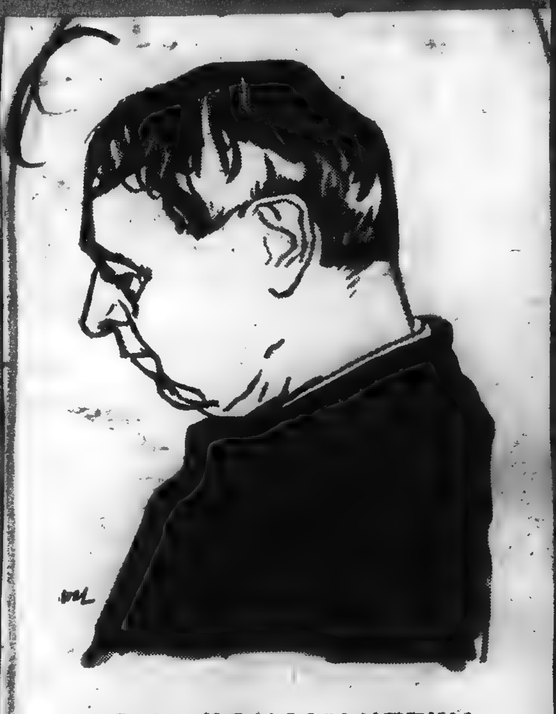
NEW YORK, N. Y.

JAN 13 1940



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY,

who will conduct the Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall on January 11th and 13th. He has a large and devoted following which considers him the greatest conductor in the world, Toscanini or no Toscanini. Nobody denies that he is the world's best double-bass soloist, but he doesn't play much in public these days. He is more or less a dandy, and will spend an hour shopping for a necktie. He practices with his baton before a mirror, and likes to walk his cocker spaniel, Bémol, at dawn.

ORCHESTRAS AND CHORUSES

Boston Symphony—Koussevitzky conducting: Carnegie Hall, Thurs. Eve., Jan. 11, at 8:45, and Sat. Aft., Jan. 13, at 2:30. At the Brooklyn Academy of Music (ST 3-6700), Fri. Eve., Jan. 12, at 8:30. (Soloists: Szigeti, Jan. 11; Sanromá,

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

JAN 13 1940

Boston Orchestra Second Concert Attracts Capacity Audience Here

The season's second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music last evening attracted a capacity audience. A party of officers from Fort Hamilton occupied the Army and Navy box. Other boxholders were: Mrs. Helen Jones Quinn, the Brooklyn Woman's Club, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, the Berkeley Alumnae Association, the Adelphi Academy Alumnae and Mrs. Dean C. Osborne. Also occupying boxes were a party of Brooklyn Girl Scouts and members of high school student orchestras.

A complete review of the concert will be found in another section of this edition of "The Brooklyn Citizen."

158

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
JAN 13 1940

MUSIC

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge [redacted], conductor, second evening concert of the season at Carnegie Hall Thursday with Joseph Szigeti, violinist, as soloist in the following program:
Prokofieff ....Classical Symphony
Bloch....Concerto for violin and orchestra
First Time in New York
Sibelius,
Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 43

Bloch and Sibelius

Despite the decorum which generally characterizes the demeanor of the subscribers to the Carnegie Hall series of our resident and visiting orchestras, cheers are occasionally added to the customary manual applause, but the fervently voiced enthusiasm which broke forth immediately after the closing triumphant D-major chord of Jean Sibelius's second symphony opened an ovation of memorable and exceptional intensity, while Dr. Koussevitzky twice returned to the podium and called upon his admirable orchestra to rise and share in the demonstration.

In this ardent manifestation of approval, the capacity audience were undoubtedly conscious not only of Sibelius and his music and the notable merits of its interpreters but also of the composer's country. Whether or not Dr. Koussevitzky had present history in mind in placing this work on the program, he could hardly have chosen any Finnish music, except for "Finlandia," more likely to be evocative of enthusiasm just now than the finale of the symphony in D, with its long-wrought, cumulative and emotionally stirring closing climax.

* * *

But this work, which we will have opportunity to hear again from the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra next Saturday and Sunday, has for several years been one of the best known of Sibelius's seven symphonies, and from a strictly musical point of view the principal interest of a rewarding evening lay in the latest major work of a composer who is also ranked among the principal creative musical figures of our day, set forth by the talented Hungarian violinist who has been its interpreter in its performances thus far both in America and Europe.

Most important new music generally comes to New York in a short or a longer course of time, but not infrequently after hearings in other musical centers. Such was the case with Ernest Bloch's concerto, which was first played by the Cleveland Orchestra under the guest conductorship of Dimitri Mitropoulos, with Mr. Szigeti as the soloist, on Dec. 15, 1938. It was played late last winter in London, under Sir Thomas Beecham, and in Paris, and was first performed by the Boston Symphony in its Boston concerts last week. Mr. Bloch, according to his own program note, made innumerable sketches for the concerto, his first work for violin with orchestra, between 1930 and 1937, and completed it in the French Alps two winters ago.

* * *

The concerto takes about thirty-five minutes to play; more than half of this span of time is occupied by the first of the three movements. Consciousness of time is not, however, the primary first impression made by a work of exceptional eloquence expressed in individual accents. Mr. Bloch, in his notes, disclaims for the concerto any "Jewish" inspiration or intention, such as that which characterizes his "Israel" symphony, his "Schelomo," or his Three Jewish Poems. And yet, while the opening subject, in accord with the composer's own comment, has a certain American Indian flavor there was much in the new concerto as heard Thursday night, which recalled "Schelomo." A certain parallelism could be noticed between the solo violin and the solo cello of the earlier work, both suggesting a single character and a many-voiced group meditating, together or in alternation, on the same subject, although the concerto has not the prevalently dark-hued mood and atmosphere which marks the notable musical recreation of King Solomon.

In its instrumentation and in the contour and rhythms of its thematic ideas the concerto also has its frequent reminders of the well known works of Bloch's early maturity; it also has its plangent moments, and the melody of the solo violin sometimes has an ornamentation and elaboration of an Oriental character in its long lyric line. Two or three frequently stated themes pervade the work as a whole, but it employs a considerable variety of thematic ideas, and its structure suggests a rhapsody rather than that of the standard classic or romantic concerto. Yet there is a sense of form and purpose.

Mr. Szigeti gave a laudable interpretation of the violin solo, in his thorough command of its technical requirements, his understanding of the relation of his role to that of the orchestra, and especially in his understanding of the expressive purport of the music. The solo, while technically exacting, sometimes treats its interpretative instrument as a member of the general ensemble and is not always particularly grateful as a medium for the exhibition of an artist's virtuosity. Its occasionally involved nature and, at times, an impression of lack of variety between the three movements in regard to dominant color and atmosphere, are among the points which may detract somewhat from the appeal of his work as a whole; its course sometimes gives a sense of deviousness. But in general it merits high regard as music of exceptional individuality and poetic imaginativeness.

The orchestra deserved equal praise with the soloist for its performance and its understanding of this score, which won applause of considerable warmth. The excellence of Dr. Koussevitzky's ensemble was also convincingly revealed in its ingratiating interpretation of Prokofieff's short and high-spirited symphony.

Ernest Bloch

Lucienne Bloch

Whose violin concerto was played for the first time here in Thursday night's Boston Symphony concert

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 13 1940

Boston Orchestra Friends Society Explained at Tea

"Although the Boston Symphony Orchestra faces a yearly deficit of about $100,000, it must be remembered that its budget runs from $750,000 to a million and it is therefore a big business," said Reginald C. Foster of Boston to a small group of guests invited to a tea at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Charles F. T. Seaverns yesterday afternoon to hear about the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Mr. Foster is chairman.

This society has for years, by donations of its members, met the orchestra's deficit and while in the beginning it comprised chiefly Boston people, it has grown geographically until it now has members in Chicago, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, London and Paris. There have been a few members in Hartford for some time and during the past year, the local roster has grown to about 30.

Wants Support Base Strengthened

The contributions range from $5 to $1,000 from a total membership of about 2,000. It is the object of Mr. Foster, as he explained it, to constantly increase the base of this support, so that rather than being dependent upon a relatively few large gifts, a vastly greater number of persons contribute smaller amounts.

He told of the origin of the orchestra in 1881, when Col. Henry Lee Higginson conceived the idea of building a musical organization in America in every way comparable to the orchestras of Europe; how from the beginning it was his resolve to cultivate American composers and to bring the best of music to the greatest number of people.

Mr. Foster paid tribute to the manner in which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was carrying out the ideals of Colonel Higginson by encouraging American composers. He told how Howard Hanson, in Boston recently for the performance of his Third Symphony, referred to Koussevitzky as the father of American composers. "I say this not because he played my third symphony today but because it was he who played my first symphony, thus making it possible for me to write a second and a third," the composer had said.

Reaches Masses of People

The speaker cited as an example of the way in which the orchestra was reaching great masses of people the Esplanade concerts in Boston, which are sometimes heard by 20,000 people, and the Stockbridge concerts at Tanglewood, where the audiences run up to 7,000 for a single concert.

Mr. Foster pointed out that the Boston Orchestra was unique in that it provided the musicians with employment during 46 weeks of the year. The regular season is 24 weeks long, followed by the pop concerts, then by Tanglewood, which this coming season will comprise three weeks of concerts following weeks of academy activity that will enlist the aid of many of the players as faculty members.

The orchestra plays 108 concerts during the year, and each of these is preceded by three rehearsals. "You have no idea of the vitality of the men of this orchestra, and of Koussevitzky. It was a revelation to me."

He referred to Mr. Seaverns as the "oldest friend of the Boston Symphony Orchestra" and as one who had heard every conductor the orchestra ever had had.

Mr. Seaverns, in introducing Mr. Foster, told of the special regard that Hartford had for the orchestra, built up during the 50 years it has been visiting this city with almost uninterrupted regularity. He spoke of the first concert here in 1885, four years after the orchestra's founding, with Gericke conducting a symphony by Raff.

Contributions Sought

It was made clear by Mr. Foster and Mr. Seaverns that there would be no formal organization here as exists in Providence and other cities that the orchestra visits. A procedure would be effected by which interested persons could contribute and this would be explained by letter later on.

There were a number of questions asked, indicating a lively interest in the orchestra and its affairs. In response to a query as to whether the contributing Friends received any special consideration, it was pointed out that there was a concert in Symphony Hall each year, followed by a reception. It was said that such a reception might be a possibility in Hartford.

While no definite objective was set, Mr. Foster pointed out that the deficit applied against each concert amounted to about $1,000 and that it was hoped that that sum could be raised for each concert played in all the cities visited.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 13 1940

Symphony Financing Explained

Hartford's Share of Boston Orchestra Deficit About $2000, Says R. C. Foster

Upon invitation of Mr. and Mrs. Charles F. T. Seaverns, a small group of Hartford music lovers met at the Seaverns home on Asylum Avenue Friday afternoon, to hear Reginald C. Foster speak about The Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Foster who is chairman of the society, stated that the incorporated Boston Symphony Orchestra operates with a $100,000 annual deficit, against a budget of between $750,000 and $1,000,000. Inasmuch as the Esplanade, "Pops" and Berkshire concerts are self-supporting, the deficit accrues against the 100 regular symphonic concerts played from October 1 to May 1, Mr. Foster said. Pro-rated against the whole deficit, the individual concert deficit can be roughly determined as $1000, he indicated.

"Since the orchestra plays two concerts here a season, the deficit accrued in these visits can be set about $2000," Mr. Foster declared.

Suggests Joining Society.

Then, explaining that the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has an annual membership of people who contribute anything from $1 a year up, to help support the orchestra, Mr. Foster suggested that there might be local music lovers who would like to join the society and contribute toward clearing up the "Hartford deficit."

Mr. Foster stressed the fact that no "drive" or "campaign" in Hartford, is in the society's mind at all; that there will be no Hartford "organization"; and that the whole arrangement of local contribution will be entirely informal. Persons contributing here will be members of the Boston society, which now has more than 2000 names on its roster, including contributors from many parts of the world.

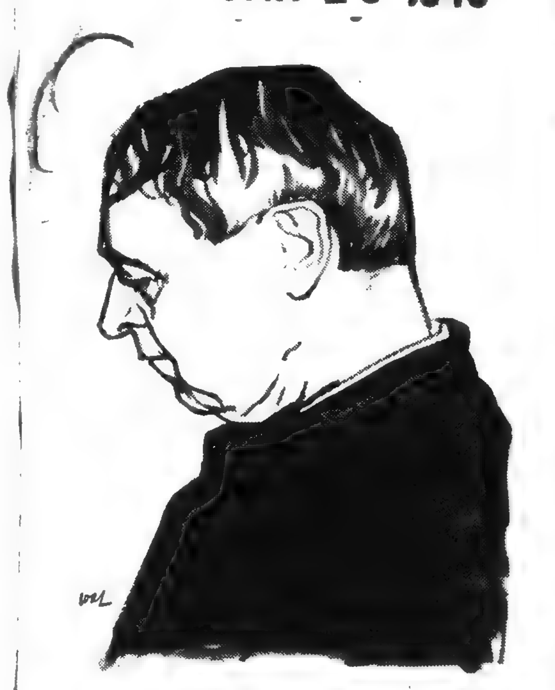
Each year the members have a private concert at the annual meeting, and during the symphonic season, their programs are forwarded to them a day in advance of the concerts.

Mr. Foster also emphasized the fact that this appeal for members in the Boston society would in no way be allowed to conflict with any projects of the Hartford Symphony Orchestra, or its supporting organization, the Symphony Society of Connecticut. He lauded the Hartford orchestra and signified the willingness of the Boston orchestral organization to do anything it could toward helping local musical endeavour.

The speaker said that Mr. Seaverns's name "should appear on the honor list of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," as he has attended concerts by every one of the conductors the orchestra has had during its more than half century existence.

Tea was served following the talk by Mr. Foster.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JAN 13 1940



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY,

who will conduct the Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall on January 11th and 13th. He has a large and devoted following which considers him the greatest conductor in the world, Toscanini or no Toscanini. Nobody denies that he is the world's best double-bass soloist, but he doesn't play much in public these days. He is more or less a dandy, and will spend an hour shopping for a necktie. He practices with his baton before a mirror, and likes to walk his cocker spaniel, Bémol, at dawn.

ORCHESTRAS AND CHORUSES

BOSTON SYMPHONY—Koussevitzky conducting: Carnegie Hall, Thurs. Eve., Jan. 11, at 8:45, and Sat. Aft., Jan. 13, at 2:30. At the Brooklyn Academy of Music (ST 3-6700), Fri. Eve., Jan. 12, at 8:30. (Soloists: Szigeti, Jan. 11; Sanromá,

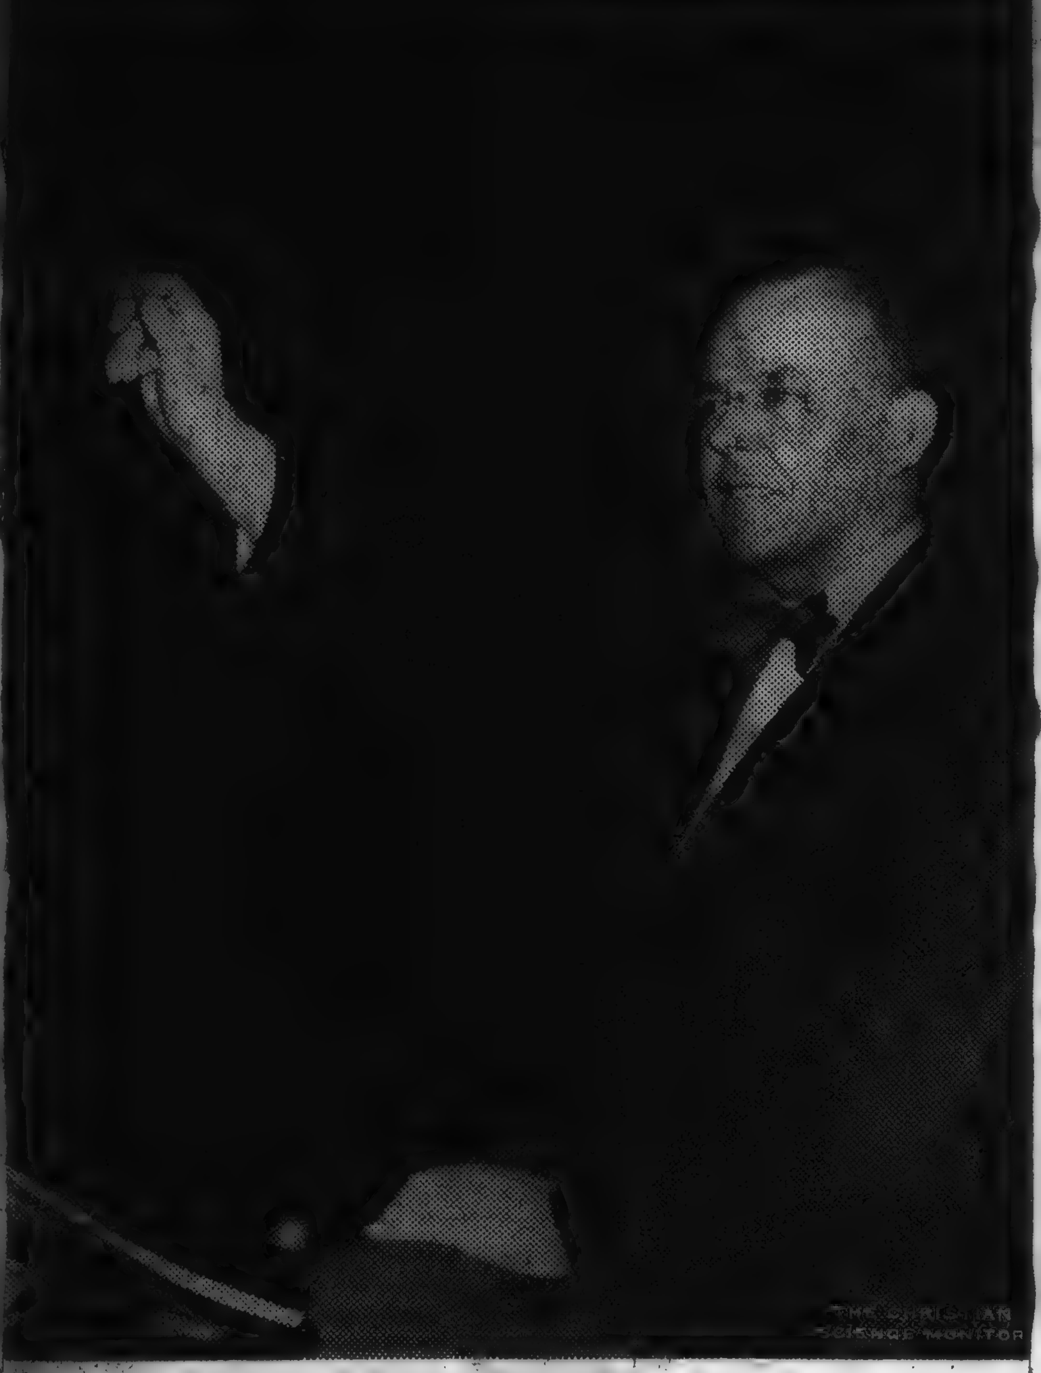
---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
JAN 13 1940

Boston Orchestra Second Concert Attracts Capacity Audience Here

The season's second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music last evening attracted a capacity audience. A party of officers from Fort Hamilton occupied the Army and Navy box. Other boxholders were: Mrs. Helen Jones Quinn, the Brooklyn Woman's Club, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, the Berkeley Alumnae Association, the Adelphi Academy Alumnae and Mrs. Dean C. Osborne. Also occupying boxes were a party of Brooklyn Girl Scouts and members of high school student orchestras.

A complete review of the concert will be found in another section of this edition of "The Brooklyn Citizen."



Nicolai Malko

Guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the concerts of Jan. 19-20, in Symphony Hall, Boston.

Boston Symphony's Progress

CSM Jan 13

By L. A. Sloper

The Boston Symphony Orchestra approaches the close of the first half of its fifty-ninth season with a record which sustains its standards of achievement. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has produced about the usual proportion of novelties and revivals, and has lent his interpretative vision to performances of the customary number of repertory items.

The most unusual event of the season took place before the season's opening. This was a pair of programs of works by American composers. These special concerts were undertaken after the Boston orchestra had been barred by the American Federation of Musicians from participation in the New York celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers. Several of the compositions offered were repeated at subscription concerts of the orchestra in New York and Boston.

The most impressive of the novelties of the first half of the season was written by an adoptive American, Ernest Bloch. It was his Violin Concerto, which (brilliantly played by Joseph Szigeti) served to strengthen one's conviction of the authenticity and individuality of his creative gift.

* * *

An odd thing about this work is that Mr. Bloch insists that it has no "Jewish" inspiration or intention, and that its main theme is "undoubtedly of an American-Indian character;" whereas to the listener it seems equally clear that both the theme referred to and the entire work are as racial in spirit as "Schélomo" or the "Three Jewish Poems." Which, of course, is quite as it should be. Plenty of people can write in imitation of Indian songs, but there is only one Bloch.

American composers also had a prominent place among the authors of other novelties of special interest. Walter Piston, for example, contributed a Concertino for piano and orchestra, written for the radio and played over the air in 1937. The work is characterized by the composer's usual scholarly and workmanlike design and execution. The solo part was played with élan by Jesús María Sanromá Another important American piece was the Third Symphony of Roy Harris, justly repeated from last season.

First performance was accorded also to the Second Symphony of Nicolai Lopatnikoff, young Russian now resident in the United States. The work is symphonic neither in form nor in proportions. Its chief virtue is a rhythmic vitality so marked as to persuade one that it must have been conceived as a dance piece.

Howard Hanson's Third Symphony surprisingly showed a Sibelius influence. Randall Thompson's Second is an unpretentious work. A Suite, "In Praise of Winter," by George Foote, a Bostonian, was of local interest. Ernst Toch's "Pinocchio, a Merry Overture," is a witty and charming piece. The Hanson symphony was directed by its composer, and the Toch overture by Richard Burgin, assistant conductor of the orchestra.

* * *

An event of surpassing popular interest was the appearance of the legendary Igor Stravinsky as guest conductor of a pair of concerts. He elected to present the "Jeu de Cartes" Suite, the Capriccio for piano and orchestra (Mr. Sanromá, soloist), the "Pétrouchka" Suite, and the "Symphonie de Psaumes."

Three of Dr. Koussevitzky's programs might be regarded as having a political slant: a Mozart-Mahler-Schubert list, "in honor of old Vienna;" a spirited revival of Sibelius' "Finlandia" to close the concerts of Dec. 22-23, and a French program.

Several of the members of the orchestra were delayed in returning last fall by the war in Europe. All are now back at their desks.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
JAN 13 1940

159

Wagner's Dramaturgy Regarded as Inferior

"The power of Wagner's music is a dangerous poison," declared Nicolai Malko at a recent interview. He is the Russian conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in several concerts from Jan. 15 to 22 at its home base in Boston.

An opening statement of that sort, naturally enough, called for explanations. They were forthcoming. "Wagner was very bad as a dramaturgist. He had little sense of the theater," he said. "His music blinds you to that.

"My candidates for the title would be Verdi and Mozart, particularly the former. Verdi has written ideal theater music. Besides, he knew what he wanted from his librettists. His method of fighting Boito was perfection itself, so much so that I think the libretto of Verdi's Otello is a marvelous work, every bit as marvelous as Shakespeare's. But it is a different Othello, of course. However, each stands apart and on its own merits as a magnificent creation."

* * *

Verdi Had Confidence.

Mr. Malko, a middle-aged man of good height, adjusted his glasses, uttered a "bah" and a snort or two and continued:

"Verdi was not afraid to do the finale of an opera without an eye-filling spectacle. Aida, for instance, carries all the dramatic impact in the world at its conclusion and, don't forget, there are only two persons who count on the stage. Otello, the same way. Verdi didn't have to people his stage with a million characters or call forth a volcanic eruption every five minutes in order to convey his powerful ideas."

Mozart, Mr. Malko explained, obtained equally splendid dramatic effects, but in general he thinks of him as not nearly approaching the Italian composer in humanity and understanding.

"I like to conduct Wagner in concert. There is no denying the potent quality of his music. It moves you beyond yourself. As one lady of my acquaintance told me after a first Wagnerian operatic experience: 'This music is extraordinary; it is nearly physical in appeal,' and I think she was right."

* * *

"Music Is a Pure Art."

"Please don't misunderstand," he went on, "I am fully aware of one of the important and necessary aspects of great music; namely, its emotional side. Yet that should exist to a certain extent and not as the principal feature. Music is a pure art, and in that respect it should aim at every possible concept of the human heart and spirit like any true art.

"I don't fell, though, that Wagner has always achieved these aims. The Ring I should certainly classify among his bad accomplishments from the standpoint of dramaturgy. There are better things, of course—Tannhaeuser, for instance, and The Flying Dutchman."

Mr. Malko was asked if he didn't believe that the second act of Tristan und Isolde expressed the Wagnerian philosophy musically.

"Philosophy—what philosophy?" he barked. "And pray just how natural is this alleged philosophy? Are Tristan and Isolde really people? I shouldn't think so from their synthetic, artificial discussion."

* * *

A Falstaff Enthusiast.

Mr. Malko is such a confirmed Falstaff enthusiast that he has heard it many times under Arturo Toscanini's direction. "That is an experience," he pointed out.

But he has an advanced case of non-drama-Wagnerism which simply won't be downed. Nevertheless he is most willing to give Wagner credit for his greatness as a musician.

"Wagner is probably responsible for the high level of symphonic performance today. It is quite possible that he was the first to obtain the kind of playing we know in our time.

"He was a tireless worker. He drove himself and the others about him with an endless energy. Perfection in performance was one of his most exalted objectives. In that respect I should say that Wagner brought the function of the conductor to its all-important place."

There Must Be Form.

Mr. Malko, in answer to another question, said that form always will exist in music. "No matter what changes come about in music, I am of the opinion that the sonata form, for example, will remain as one of the best means for the development of musical ideas. Naturally experiments may unearth other forms, possibly excellent ones, pertinent to the times, but there must be some form, some logical basis."

Mr. Malko has had an extensive career as a conductor in Russia, the country of his birth; England, Germany, Denmark, Italy, South America and elsewhere. He began as a ballet and opera conductor at the state Marinsky Theater in St. Petersburg. Nijinsky, Pavlowa and Fokine at one time or another danced under his direction.

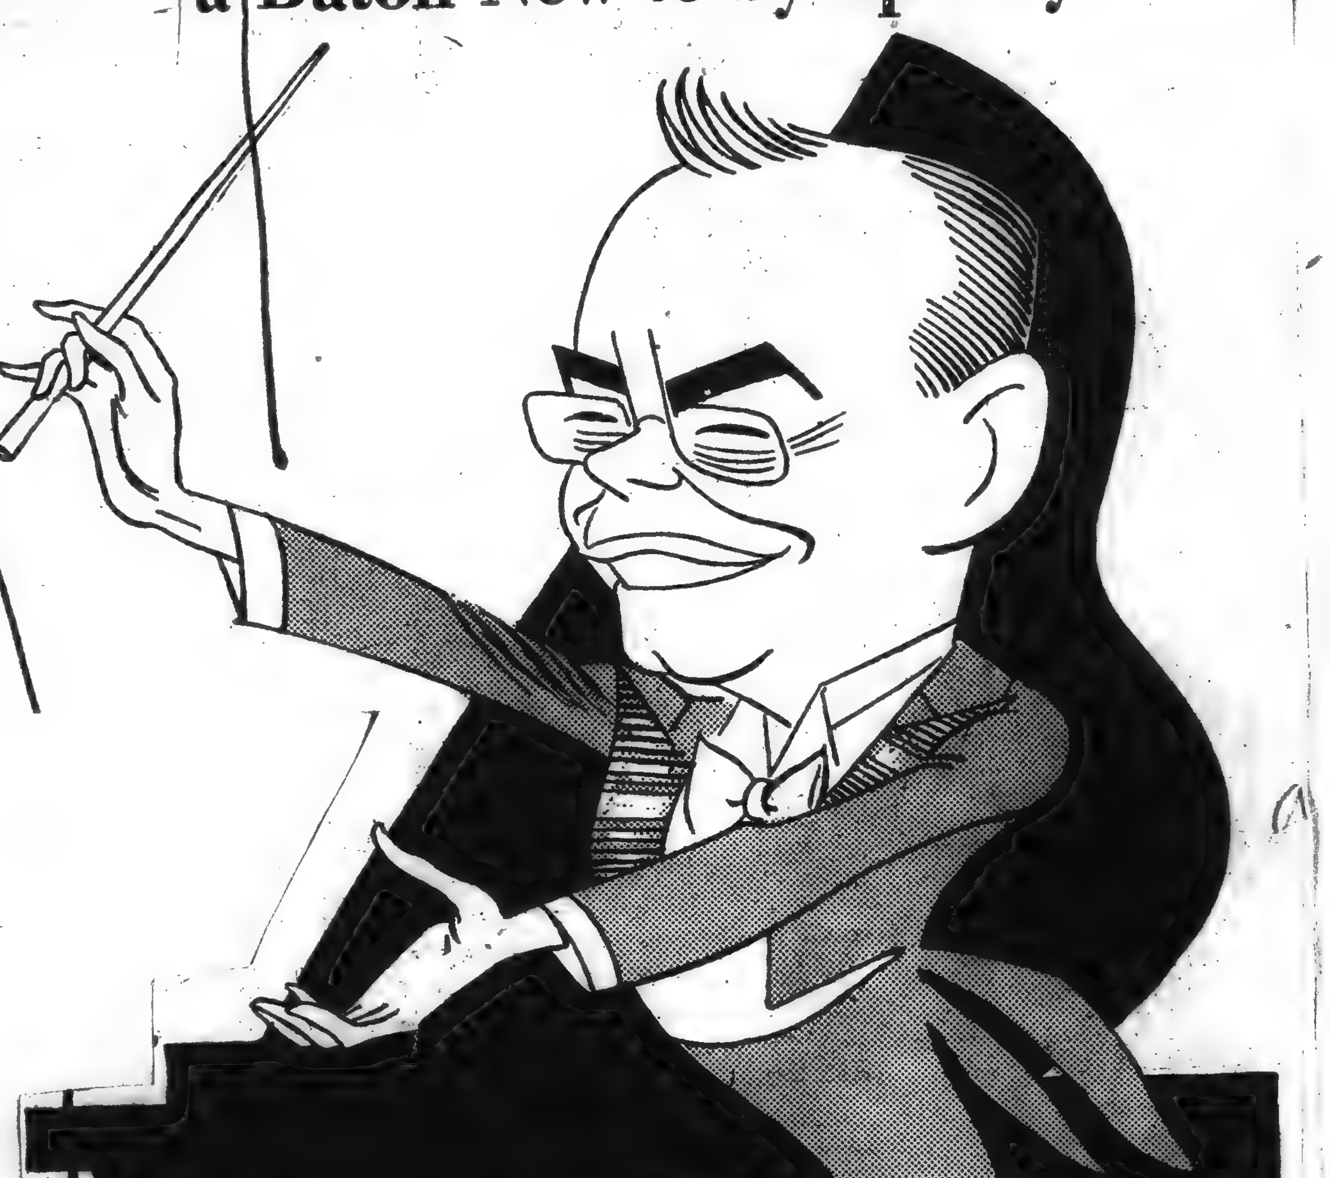
He studied with Rimsky-Korsakoff, Glazounoff, Tcherepnine, Felix Mottl and Liadoff. He related an amusing anecdote concerning the last named. "One day a pupil of Liadoff's brought in a short composition for examination. 'What's that?' asked Liadoff. 'Oh, I thought I would do it the other way,' was the reply. 'I see,' answered the teacher, 'the other way. You wanted to put the shoe on your hand and the glove on your foot. Instead of coming in through the door you want to come in through the window. Very good, very good.'

"I can tell you," continued Mr. Malko, "that that pupil learned his lesson. He never experimented in that manner again."

For his first concert in Boston Mr. Malko will conduct what he terms a program of styles, consisting of Rossini's Gazza Ladra Overture, the Shostakovich First Symphony, the Mozart-Reger Variations and the Tschaikowsky Caprice Italien. ROBERT C. BAGAR.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, JANUARY 13, 1940

a Baton New to Symphony Hall



NICOLAI MALKO

Ukrainian conductor who leads the Boston Symphony during this first week of Dr. Koussevitzky's mid-winter vacation.

interpreter of the next Sunday.

Nicolai Malko

Guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the concerts of Jan. 19-20, in Symphony Hall, Boston.

Boston Symphony's Progress

CSM, Jan 13

By L. A. Sloper

The Boston Symphony Orchestra approaches the close of the first half of its fifty-ninth season with a record which sustains its standards of achievement. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has produced about the usual proportion of novelties and revivals, and has lent his interpretative vision to performances of the customary number of repertory items.

The most unusual event of the season took place before the season's opening. This was a pair of programs of works by American composers. These special concerts were undertaken after the Boston orchestra had been barred by the American Federation of Musicians from participation in the New York celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers. Several of the compositions offered were repeated at subscription concerts of the orchestra in New York and Boston.

The most impressive of the novelties of the first half of the season was written by an adoptive American, Ernest Bloch. It was his Violin Concerto, which (brilliantly played by Joseph Szigeti) served to strengthen one's conviction of the authenticity and individuality of his creative gift.

* * *

An odd thing about this work is that Mr. Bloch insists that it has no "Jewish" inspiration or intention, and that its main theme is "undoubtedly of an American-Indian character;" whereas to the listener it seems equally clear that both the theme referred to and the entire work are as racial in spirit as "Schélomo" or the "Three Jewish Poems." Which, of course, is quite as it should be. Plenty of people can write in imitation of Indian songs, but there is only one Bloch.

American composers also had a prominent place among the authors of other novelties of special interest. Walter Piston, for example, contributed a Concertino for piano and orchestra, written for the radio and played over the air in 1937. The work is characterized by the composer's usual scholarly and workmanlike design and execution. The solo part was played with élan by Jesús María Sanromá Another important American piece was the Third Symphony of Roy Harris, justly repeated from last season.

First performance was accorded also to the Second Symphony of Nicolai Lopatnikoff, young Russian now resident in the United States. The work is symphonic neither in form nor in proportions. Its chief virtue is a rhythmic vitality so marked as to persuade one that it must have been conceived as a dance piece.

Howard Hanson's Third Symphony surprisingly showed a Sibelius influence. Randall Thompson's Second is an unpretentious work. A Suite, "In Praise of Winter," by George Foote, a Bostonian, was of local interest. Ernst Toch's "Pinocchio, a Merry Overture," is a witty and charming piece. The Hanson symphony was directed by its composer, and the Toch overture by Richard Burgin, assistant conductor of the orchestra.

* * *

An event of surpassing popular interest was the appearance of the legendary Igor Stravinsky as guest conductor of a pair of concerts. He elected to present the "Jeu de Cartes" Suite, the Capriccio for piano and orchestra (Mr. Sanromá, soloist), the "Pétrouchka" Suite, and the "Symphonie de Psaumes."

Three of Dr. Koussevitzky's programs might be regarded as having a political slant: a Mozart-Mahler-Schubert list, "in honor of old Vienna;" a spirited revival of Sibelius' "Finlandia" to close the concerts of Dec. 22-23, and a French program.

Several of the members of the orchestra were delayed in returning last fall by the war in Europe. All are now back at their desks.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
JAN 13 1940

Wagner's Dramaturgy Regarded as Inferior

"The power of Wagner's music is a dangerous poison," declared Nicolai Malko at a recent interview. He is the Russian conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in several concerts from Jan. 15 to 22 at its home base in Boston.

An opening statement of that sort, naturally enough, called for explanations. They were forthcoming. "Wagner was very bad as a dramaturgist. He had little sense of the theater," he said. "His music blinds you to that.

"My candidates for the title would be Verdi and Mozart, particularly the former. Verdi has written ideal theater music. Besides, he knew what he wanted from his librettists. His method of fighting Boito was perfection itself, so much so that I think the libretto of Verdi's Otello is a marvelous work, every bit as marvelous as Shakespeare's. But it is a different Othello, of course. However, each stands apart and on its own merits as a magnificent creation."

* * *

Verdi Had Confidence.

Mr. Malko, a middle-aged man of good height, adjusted his glasses, uttered a "bah" and a snort or two and continued:

"Verdi was not afraid to do the finale of an opera without an eye-filling spectacle. Aida, for instance, carries all the dramatic impact in the world at its conclusion and, don't forget, there are only two persons who count on the stage. Otello, the same way. Verdi didn't have to people his stage with a million characters or call forth a volcanic eruption every five minutes in order to convey his powerful ideas."

Mozart, Mr. Malko explained, obtained equally splendid dramatic effects, but in general he thinks of him as not nearly approaching the Italian composer in humanity and understanding.

"I like to conduct Wagner in concert. There is no denying the potent quality of his music. It moves you beyond yourself. As one lady of my acquaintance told me after a first Wagnerian operatic experience: 'This music is extraordinary; it is nearly physical in appeal,' and I think she was right."

* * *

"Music Is a Pure Art."

"Please don't misunderstand," he went on, "I am fully aware of one of the important and necessary aspects of great music; namely, its emotional side. Yet that should exist to a certain extent and not as the principal feature. Music is a pure art, and in that respect it should aim at every possible concept of the human heart and spirit like any true art.

"I don't fell, though, that Wagner has always achieved these aims. The Ring I should certainly classify among his bad accomplishments from the standpoint of dramaturgy. There are better things, of course—Tannhaeuser, for instance, and The Flying Dutchman."

Mr. Malko was asked if he didn't believe that the second act of Tristan und Isolde expressed the Wagnerian philosophy musically.

"Philosophy—what philosophy?" he barked. "And pray just how natural is this alleged philosophy? Are Tristan and Isolde really people? I shouldn't think so from their synthetic, artificial discussion."

* * *

A Falstaff Enthusiast.

Mr. Malko is such a confirmed Falstaff enthusiast that he has heard it many times under Arturo Toscanini's direction. "That is an experience," he pointed out.

But he has an advanced case of non-drama-Wagnerism which simply won't be downed. Nevertheless he is most willing to give Wagner credit for his greatness as a musician.

"Wagner is probably responsible for the high level of symphonic performance today. It is quite possible that he was the first to obtain the kind of playing we know in our time.

"He was a tireless worker. He drove himself and the others about him with an endless energy. Perfection in performance was one of his most exalted objectives. In that respect I should say that Wagner brought the function of the conductor to its all-important place."

* * *

There Must Be Form.

Mr. Malko, in answer to another question, said that form always will exist in music. "No matter what changes come about in music, I am of the opinion that the sonata form, for example, will remain as one of the best means for the development of musical ideas. Naturally experiments may unearth other forms, possibly excellent ones, pertinent to the times, but there must be some form, some logical basis."

Mr. Malko has had an extensive career as a conductor in Russia, the country of his birth; England, Germany, Denmark, Italy, South America and elsewhere. He began as a ballet and opera conductor at the state Marinsky Theater in St. Petersburg. Nijinsky, Pavlowa and Fokine at one time or another danced under his direction.

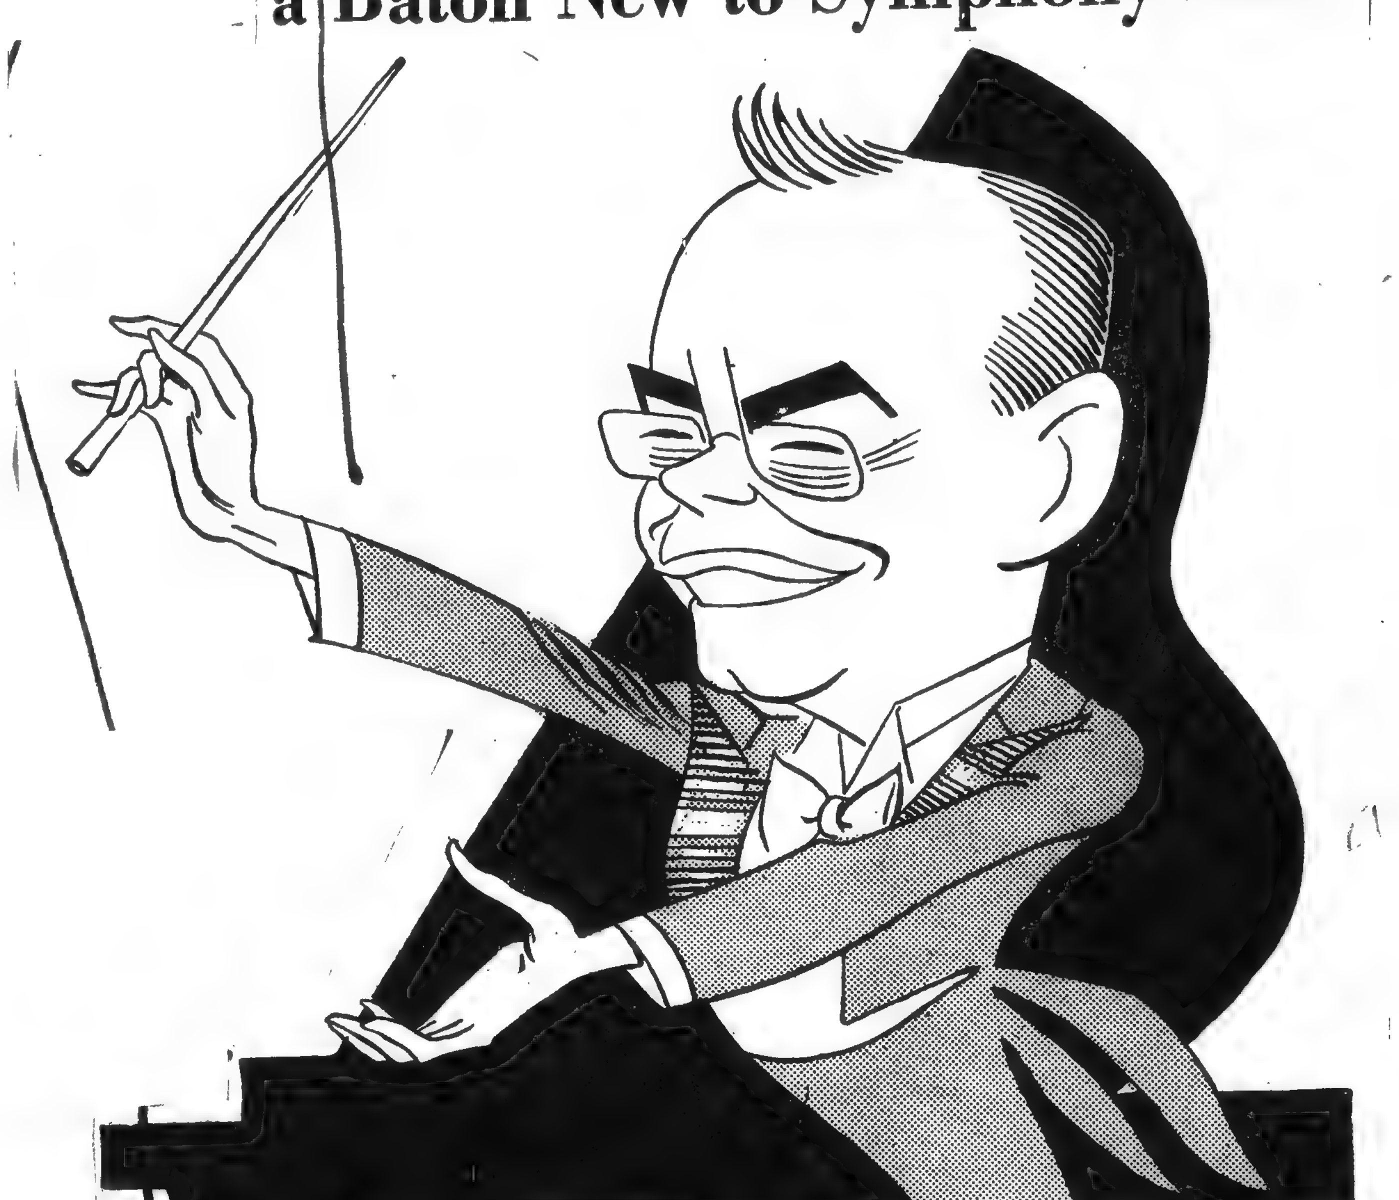
He studied with Rimsky-Korsakoff, Glazounoff, Tcherepnine, Felix Mottl and Liadoff. He related an amusing anecdote concerning the last named. "One day a pupil of Liadoff's brought in a short composition for examination. 'What's that?' asked Liadoff. 'Oh, I thought I would do it the other way,' was the reply. 'I see,' answered the teacher, 'the other way. You wanted to put the shoe on your hand and the glove on your foot. Instead of coming in through the door you want to come in through the window. Very good, very good.'

"I can tell you," continued Mr. Malko, "that that pupil learned his lesson. He never experimented in that manner again."

For his first concert in Boston Mr. Malko will conduct what he terms a program of styles, consisting of Rossini's Gazza Ladra Overture, the Shostakovich First Symphony, the Mozart-Reger Variations and the Tschaikowsky Caprice Italien. ROBERT C. BAGAR.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, JANUARY 13, 1940

a Baton New to Symphony Hall



NICOLAI MALKO

Ukrainian conductor who leads the Boston Symphony during this first week of Dr. Koussevitzky's mid-winter vacation.

l interpreter of the ll next Sunday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JAN 13 1940

BOOKS

The Audacities of Oscar

PERHAPS it's no secret that Mr. Oscar Levant and your correspondent joust in a mild and amiable mental tourney every fortnight, through the courtesy of Hertz and Marconi. Now Mr. Levant, having up and written himself a book, places me in the traditionally embarrassing reviewer's position of liking both book and author. Those readers who believe that under such circumstances no reviewer can be honest are respectfully invited to skip the next few columns.

As "A Smattering of Ignorance" is only incidentally about music, even a musical analphabetic like myself may dare to comment on it without too much fear of self-exposure. When it does touch upon music per se, the result is perfectly understandable and hugely delightful to the layman—which means, I suppose, that it's deficient in critical significance. But, for the most part, this is a book of comic myths in which many of the leading characters happen to be musicians.

Mr. Levant, of course, is himself a legendary character. S. N. Behrman, combining grace, humor, and frank affection in his introduction to the book, draws a lightning silhouette of its author, pointing up his (fake) truculence, his moodiness, his scarifying (one might almost say oscarifying) wit, his curious appeal to one's maternal impulse, "the spiked embrace of his friendship," his essential integrity, and his infinite discussability. What Mr. Behrman says is true: Mr. Levant is "a character who, if he did not exist, could not be imagined."

A Broadway version of James McNeill Whistler, he is hardly inferior to his prototype in the gentle art of making enemies. As reticence is not a virtue for which he has any special capacity, his book will probably create for him a hundred fresh ones. But this will be a good thing all around, for to be an enemy of Oscar, one conjectures, is a more vividly satisfactory experience than to be a friend of most men. For example, his book, which does not hesitate to cock a snoot or two at Signor Toscanini, will make purists froth at the mouth, but the frothers will remain readers. The offhand audacity of Oscar's judgments is merely an exhibitionistic cloak to cover up his genuine moral courage, and his most impertinent anecdotes, when you think them over, suddenly disclose their pertinence.

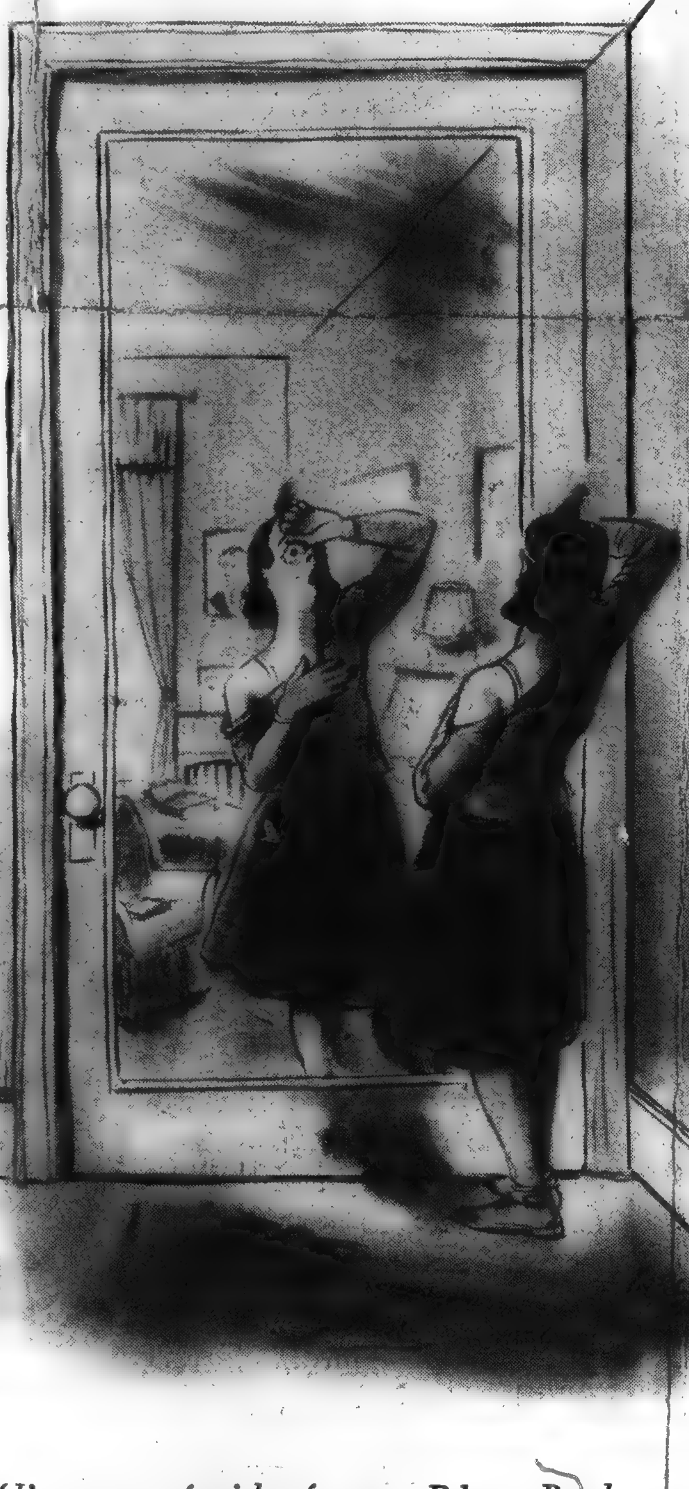
"A Smattering of Ignorance" consists of six brash monologues, laughably disguised as essays. They deal with the qualities and vanities of some great contemporary conductors; the life, opinions, and silences of Harpo Marx; the peculiar methods and even more peculiar people which and who produce moving-picture music; the career and character of George Gershwin; the dilemmas, nonsensicalities, and prospects of the younger American composers; and how "A Smattering of Ignorance" came to be written. But really the whole book, without trying, turns out to be a collection of Oscariana.

After a short period of nursing, Mr. Levant started to dine out. He has enjoyed meals with some of the best company in America, and is still at it. His book is a record of what he's heard during his long career as a "penthouse beachcomber." It's also a record of what he said; some of his own best lines, particularly the most self-deprecatory ones, are included.

Of the pieces, the one called, characteristically, "My Life: or The Story of George Gershwin" is the most remarkable. Probably the oddest elegy ever written, it is funny, outrageous, and sad. It gives you Gershwin as he must have been. It is written—as any honest post-mortem should be written—almost as if he hadn't died. Here you will find all the Papa Gershwin stories; here you will find Oscar's famous "Pardon me for eating and running" line in its proper setting; here you will find an unconscious (because Mr. Levant is no cunning craftsman at this sort of thing) re-creation of a bright, brilliant, feverish era in our cultural life, whose ending was symbolized in a way in the death of Gershwin himself.

While the book is brilliant, it is not as brilliant as Mr. Levant's conversation: he is a dinner-table, not a library-table, wit. Still, there's this on Koussevitzky: "He is unparalleled in the performance of Russian music, whether it is by Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Strauss, Wagner, or Aaron Copland." On Stokowski: "It is quite possible that if he had not become sated with music (and success) he eventually would have conducted the orchestra blindfolded, with his left arm tied behind his back."

All the stories about Toscanini, Koussevitzky, Stokowski, Barbirolli, Reiner, and Elman are both enlightening and amusing; though in a



"I'm not afraid of you, Rhett Butler, or of any man in shoe leather!"

4445X

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 12 1940

TIMES

rely a cohesive group but the sinansion of one personality, is a ong musicians—possessed, among y active in America, primarily by Stokowski and Toscanini."
power of orchestra players is such do more to ruin a conductor" than ." Over the years the symphony lops a collective personality col-st marked individuals. There are " among players as well as among nd both sometimes are capricious
y. The respect commanded by a ies directly with his power "to con-usicianship" and with "his unaf-thy for the music he chooses to te his opinions, Mr. Levant cites ctors and orchestras, pointing out s well as virtues. Out of this in-ent the Boston Symphony Orchestra n the citation, "unquestionably the world."

* * *

Mr. Levant's close association with rge Gershwin, the chapter devoted s composer's personality and music many. Training as a song writer, the author, so conditioned the treat-Gershwin's ideas that although he a-dozen extended works, he never e in a strict musical form."
t does not recall hearing Mr. Gershation a desire to write "a symphony r work in such a clearly defined ould not adapt himself to such limi-he sonata form but found himself
s in "the thematic fluency, the easy-nic freedom of the rhapsody or un-tasy." With him even the concerto ztian mantle draped loosely on the he sonata form."

* * *

chapter devoted to music in motion not suggest that Hollywood will major composition in the immediate from the technical difficulties of ilms, a basic handicap is the fact vel of musical perception among roducers is, if anything, slightly eir perception of values associated r arts."
ant sees the situation, men without ality have already established pat-wood music, to which all newcomers
n. This situation would be more if the history of the arts did not nificant originality often has had gainst comfortably entrenched meas won out in the long run. Never-ks as if some years would elapse ood rivals Bayreuth.

NORFOLK, VA.
VIRGINIAN PILOT
JAN 14 1940

Noted Singer Coming Here

Dorothy Maynor to Appear in Recital in City Auditorium January 26

Dorothy Maynor, colored singer who in recent months has gained ranking as one of the great soloists, will be presented in a recital on Friday night, January 26, in the City Auditorium, where a section of seats will be reserved for white patrons.

Discovered by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, she made her professional debut before an overflow audience at New York's Town Hall on November 19, and drew the highest type of praise from critics, one of whom described her as "the singing discovery of the decade."

Before her appearance here, she will be the guest star with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra on January 16, and later will fill separate engagements with the Philadelphia Sympony Orchestra and the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra.

She is not unknown to music-lovers in this locality, for many have heard her sing before, mainly with the Hampton Institute Choir. A native of Norfolk, for several years she has devoted her entire time in preparation for the concert stage.

The recital is being sponsored for the benefit of the Norfolk Community Hospital, and those who attend will enjoy a rare musical treat and at the same time aid a worthy institution.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat-Chronicle
JAN 14 1940

Russian Conductor To Make Debut

Nicolai Malkoff Russian conductor, will make his American debut as guest leader of the Bos~~ton Sym~~phony Orchestra for the series from Jan. 15 to 22. Malko is well known in Europe, where he is permanent conductor of the Copenhagen Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 14 1940

Nikolai Malko, the Russian conductor who lives in Copenhagen, arrives in Boston this week to guest conduct ~~the city's~~ Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon ~~and Satur-~~day night. The program for both occasions headlines the Shostakovitch first symphony. Other items include Rossinis' little known overture to "La Gazza Ladra," which is getting quite a play around the circuit these days; Max Reger's variations on a Mozart theme, and Tschaikowsky's Italian caprice.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER
JAN 14 1940

Dorothy Maynor, negro soprano, protege of Serge Koussevitsky, director of the Boston ~~Symphony~~ orchestra, will record Mozart and Handel arias in the near future. Koussevitzky calls her a "native Flagstad." Critics who have heard her have run out of superlatives.

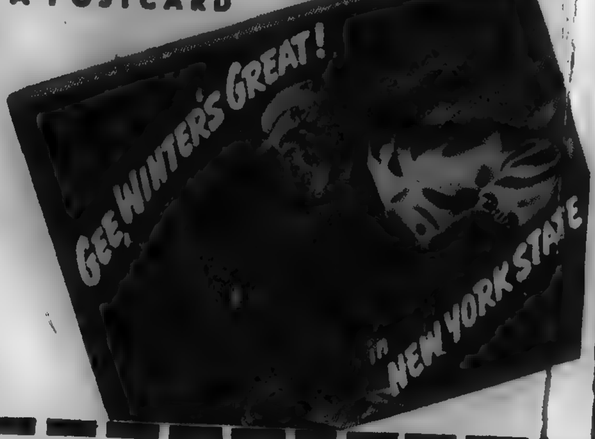
THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JAN 13 1940

"Gee, Winter's great in NEW YORK STATE!"

Every season winter sports fans by the thousands agree on that cheery slogan, so we've made it the title of our new free book describing the State's more than 100 winter sports centers and their exciting activities . . . Packed with pictures and helpful information on what to do, where to go and how to get there, this book is a thrilling guide to all kinds of fun on the snow and ice . . . It's yours on request . . . And so is our special skiing booklet, "Ski Trails of New York State", containing maps and descriptions of popular trails and runs all over the State.

NEW YORK STATE
THE STATE THAT HAS EVERYTHING

JUST SEND
THE COUPON OR
A POSTCARD



GEE, WINTER'S GREAT! in NEW YORK STATE

BUREAU OF STATE PUBLICITY,
ALBANY, N. Y.
Conservation Dept. NY-2
Lithgow Osborne, Commissioner

Kindly send my free copies of "Gee, Winter's Great! in New York State" and "Ski Trails of New York State."

Name ....
Street ....
City .... State ....

different genre, so are those about the odd people who sit at Harpo Marx's dinner table or turn out canned music for the films. Mr. Levant, by the way, for four months ate lunch, dinner, and supper at Harpo's without exchanging a single word with him.

I do not want to give the impression that "A Smattering of Ignorance" is frivolous. It isn't; it's impudent. But behind the impudence one feels Mr. Levant's real concern for music and a serious interest in his own development, not as a buffoon and chartered wit but as a composer. While he is not the kind to burn joss sticks, he reveres excellence wherever he finds it, and some of his most interesting pages are those that are full of praise—praise of such varied personalities as Gershwin, Monteux, Reiner, Beecham, Copland, and his own teacher, Schönberg. You wouldn't think it, but he has an almost overdeveloped faculty for admiration. Actually he is one of the most modest and sensitive men I know, but he has worked out an amazing technique for demonstrating the opposite. He is really proud not of himself but of the technique, and never tires of inviting you to watch it work. He has developed (read his book and see how he does it) the most complicated camouflaging apparatus to fool you into disregarding the essential truth—which is that, back of all the flip-flops, the insouciance, the wisecracks, the attitudes, is a core of ascetic integrity.

To Mr. Levant or his proofreader I might point out that it's Barrère, not Barrere; Bartók, not Bartok; bourrée, not bourée; Schwarzwald, not Schwartzwald; Andrés Segovia, not Andreas Segovia; la table, not le table; Arbós, not Arbos; Nova Pilbeam, not Nova Pillbeam; Gebrauchsmusik, not Gebrauschsmusik; Saint-Saëns, not Saint-Saens; Modigliani, not Modligiani; Rouault, not Roualt; Fahrenheit, not Farenheit; sycophantic, not sychophantic; entente cordiale, not entente cordial; Katharine Hepburn, not Katherine Hepburn; acoustics, not accoustics; concatenation, not concantenation (the word, morever, seems incorrectly used); Françaix, not Francaix; etc., etc. Mr. Levant is also invited to look up the meaning of "meticulous;" to ponder the legitimacy of "extrovertial;" to reflect on whether one can "conciliate the situation" or "cavil with his sincerity." Speaking of Harpo, Mr. Levant remarks, "From some unrevealed source he had picked up the name of Cgolsz, the madman who assassinated President McKinley." Mr. Levant fails to mention that, in picking up the name, Harpo apparently dropped two letters and a syllable. I would not mention these nugae were I not constantly informed that among Mr. Levant's many brilliant talents is that of dispensing exact information, whether of a musical or non-musical character. —CLIFTON FADIMAN

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 12 1940

BOOKS OF THE TIMES

By THOMAS C. LINN

SINCE the discords of temperament in Carnegie Hall are not broadcast with the symphonies, listeners may be surprised to learn that orchestral harmony sometimes is only aural.

Many human and amusing difficulties that are not likely to be stressed by program notes or intermission commentators are related in Oscar Levant's verbal divertissement, "A Smattering of Ignorance."*

Listeners will recall that heretofore Mr. Levant, pianist and composer, has relied on the radio to disclose his musical information. That medium, however, has not revealed adequately his bright, humorous, sometimes satirical, and always highly personal literary style. Any one interested in contemporary music and musicians who relishes anecdotes and revealing comment will enjoy this book. If Mr. Levant is sometimes caustic with his subjects, he is disarmingly unflattering about himself.

S. N. Behrman supplies an introduction to Mr. Levant's half-dozen chapters dealing, among other things, with orchestral conductors and musicians, music in motion pictures, Harpo Marx, George Gershwin and other contemporary composers, and finally, as the material grows thin, with the author's own difficulties in writing the book.

* * *

Interest was aroused in musical circles last Fall when the chapter called "Music in Aspic" was published in a magazine. Its frank statements about conditions within orchestras and its personal appraisals of famous conductors make this chapter some of the liveliest musical entertainment that has been supplied the reading public in a long time.

Schoolmasters, it appears, have no more difficulty in controlling unruly pupils than do conductors in awing some of their accomplished musicians. In fact, the relationship between leader and orchestra seems much like that between teacher and pupils, with the conductor's power to discharge a player taking the place of the schoolmaster's old-fashioned birch.

"When an orchestra is aware that the conductor has in his inside pocket a contract for next season and the one after that, carrying with it the power to rearrange the personnel 'for the good of the orchestra'—in other words, to hire and to fire—its attitude is apt to be somewhat more respectful than if he is merely an interloper to be tolerated for a brief engagement."

Fundamentally the problem between conductor and orchestra is a matter of authority—whether the conductor dominates his men or whether they dominate him. Orchestral performers definitely are not the clinging-vine type. Contrary to popular opinion, "utter control of a performance, to the point at which ninety or a hundred players become not merely a cohesive group but the single-minded extension of one personality, is a rare talent among musicians—possessed, among conductors now active in America, primarily by Koussevitsky, Stokowski and Toscanini."

The possible power of orchestra players is such that they "can do more to ruin a conductor" than "to make him." Over the years the symphony orchestra develops a collective personality colored by its most marked individuals. There are "prima donnas" among players as well as among conductors and both sometimes are capricious and arbitrary. The respect commanded by a conductor varies directly with his power "to convey sound musicianship" and with "his unaffected sympathy for the music he chooses to conduct."

* * *

To illustrate his opinions, Mr. Levant cites cases, conductors and orchestras, pointing out limitations as well as virtues. Out of this informal comment the Boston Symphony Orchestra emerges with the citation, "unquestionably the finest in the world."

Because of Mr. Levant's close association with the late George Gershwin, the chapter devoted largely to this composer's personality and music will interest many. Training as a song writer, according to the author, so conditioned the treatment of Mr. Gershwin's ideas that although he wrote "half-a-dozen extended works, he never wrote a score in a strict musical form."

Mr. Levant does not recall hearing Mr. Gershwin even mention a desire to write "a symphony or any other work in such a clearly defined form." He could not adapt himself to such limitations as the sonata form but found himself most at home in "the thematic fluency, the easy-going rhythmic freedom of the rhapsody or unrestricted fantasy." With him even the concerto was the "Lisztian mantle draped loosely on the skeleton of the sonata form."

* * *

The lively chapter devoted to music in motion pictures does not suggest that Hollywood will produce any major composition in the immediate future. Aside from the technical difficulties of writing for films, a basic handicap is the fact that "the level of musical perception among Hollywood producers is, if anything, slightly lower than their perception of values associated with the other arts."

As Mr. Levant sees the situation, men without marked originality have already established patterns in Hollywood music, to which all newcomers must conform. This situation would be more discouraging if the history of the arts did not show that significant originality often has had to struggle against comfortably entrenched mediocrity and has won out in the long run. Nevertheless, it looks as if some years would elapse before Hollywood rivals Bayreuth.

---

*A SMATTERING OF IGNORANCE. By Oscar Levant. 267 pages. Doubleday, Doran & Co., Inc. $2.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LANSDALE, PA.
North Penn Reporter
JAN 15 1940

Boston may well swell up a bit over the tribute paid the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Oscar Levant in his "A Smattering of Ignorance," when he pronounces the organization "unquestionably the finest in the world." Philadelphia and New York will doubtless approve Mr. Levant's choice of a title.

NORFOLK, VA.
VIRGINIAN PILOT
JAN 14 1940

Noted Singer Coming Here

Dorothy Maynor to Appear in Recital in City Auditorium January 26

Dorothy Maynor, colored singer who in recent months has gained ranking as one of the great soloists, will be presented in a recital on Friday night, January 26, in the City Auditorium, where a section of seats will be reserved for white patrons.

Discovered by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, she made her professional debut before an overflow audience at New York's Town Hall on November 19, and drew the highest type of praise from critics, one of whom described her as "the singing discovery of the decade."

Before her appearance here, she will be the guest star with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra on January 16, and later will fill separate engagements with the Philadelphia Sympony Orchestra and the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra.

She is not unknown to music-lovers in this locality, for many have heard her sing before, mainly with the Hampton Institute Choir. A native of Norfolk, for several years she has devoted her entire time in preparation for the concert stage.

The recital is being sponsored for the benefit of the Norfolk Community Hospital, and those who attend will enjoy a rare musical treat and at the same time aid a worthy institution.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER
JAN 14 1940

Dorothy Maynor, negro soprano, protege of Serge Koussevitsky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will record Mozart and Handel arias in the near future. Koussevitzky calls her a "native Flagstad." Critics who have heard her have run out of superlatives.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat-Chronicle
JAN 14 1940

Russian Conductor To Make Debut

Nicolai Malko, Russian conductor, will make his American debut as guest leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the series from Jan. 15 to 22. Malko is well known in Europe, where he is permanent conductor of the Copenhagen Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 14 1940

Nikolai Malko, the Russian conductor who lives in Copenhagen, arrives in Boston this week to guest conduct the city's Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday night. The program for both occasions headlines the Shostakovitch first symphony. Other items include Rossinis' little known overture to "La Gazza Ladra," which is getting quite a play around the circuit these days; Max Reger's variations on a Mozart theme, and Tschaikowsky's Italian caprice.

160

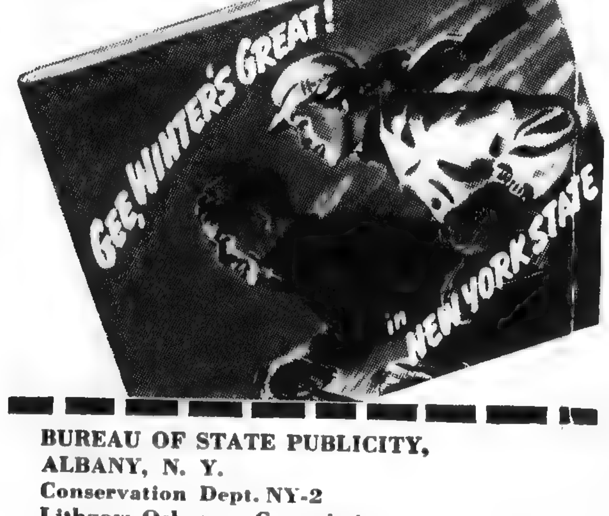
THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JAN 13 1940

"Gee, Winter's great in NEW YORK STATE!"

Every season winter sports fans by the thousands agree on that cheery slogan, so we've made it the title of our new free book describing the State's more than 100 winter sports centers and their exciting activities . . . Packed with pictures and helpful information on what to do, where to go and how to get there, this book is a thrilling guide to all kinds of fun on the snow and ice . . . It's yours on request . . . And so is our special skiing booklet, "Ski Trails of New York State", containing maps and descriptions of popular trails and runs all over the State.

NEW YORK STATE
THE STATE THAT HAS EVERYTHING

JUST SEND
THE COUPON OR
A POSTCARD



GEE, WINTER'S GREAT! in NEW YORK STATE

BUREAU OF STATE PUBLICITY,
ALBANY, N. Y.
Conservation Dept. NY-2
Lithgow Osborne, Commissioner

Kindly send my free copies of "Gee, Winter's Great! in New York State" and "Ski Trails of New York State."

Name ....
Street ....
City .... State ....

different genre, so are those about the odd people who sit at Harpo Marx's dinner table or turn out canned music for the films. Mr. Levant, by the way, for four months ate lunch, dinner, and supper at Harpo's without exchanging a single word with him.

I do not want to give the impression that "A Smattering of Ignorance" is frivolous. It isn't; it's impudent. But behind the impudence one feels Mr. Levant's real concern for music and a serious interest in his own development, not as a buffoon and chartered wit but as a composer. While he is not the kind to burn joss sticks, he reveres excellence wherever he finds it, and some of his most interesting pages are those that are full of praise—praise of such varied personalities as Gershwin, Monteux, Reiner, Beecham, Copland, and his own teacher, Schönberg. You wouldn't think it, but he has an almost overdeveloped faculty for admiration. Actually he is one of the most modest and sensitive men I know, but he has worked out an amazing technique for demonstrating the opposite. He is really proud not of himself but of the technique, and never tires of inviting you to watch it work. He has developed (read his book and see how he does it) the most complicated camouflaging apparatus to fool you into disregarding the essential truth—which is that, back of all the flip-flops, the insouciance, the wisecracks, the attitudes, is a core of ascetic integrity.

To Mr. Levant or his proofreader I might point out that it's Barrère, not Barrere; Bartók, not Bartok; bourrée, not bourée; Schwarzwald, not Schwartzwald; Andrés Segovia, not Andreas Segovia; la table, not le table; Arbós, not Arbos; Nova Pilbeam, not Nova Pillbeam; Gebrauchsmusik, not Gebrauschsmusik; Saint-Saëns, not Saint-Saens; Modigliani, not Modligiani; Rouault, not Roualt; Fahrenheit, not Farenheit; sycophantic, not sychophantic; entente cordiale, not entente cordial; Katharine Hepburn, not Katherine Hepburn; acoustics, not accoustics; concatenation, not concantenation (the word, morever, seems incorrectly used); Françaix, not Francaix; etc., etc. Mr. Levant is also invited to look up the meaning of "meticulous;" to ponder the legitimacy of "extrovertial;" to reflect on whether one can "conciliate the situation" or "cavil with his sincerity." Speaking of Harpo, Mr. Levant remarks, "From some unrevealed source he had picked up the name of Cgolsz, the madman who assassinated President McKinley." Mr. Levant fails to mention that, in picking up the name, Harpo apparently dropped two letters and a syllable. I would not mention these nugae were I not constantly informed that among Mr. Levant's many brilliant talents is that of dispensing exact information, whether of a musical or non-musical character. —CLIFTON FADIMAN

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 12 1940

BOOKS OF THE TIMES

By THOMAS C. LINN

SINCE the discords of temperament in Carnegie Hall are not broadcast with the symphonies, listeners may be surprised to learn that orchestral harmony sometimes is only aural.

Many human and amusing difficulties that are not likely to be stressed by program notes or intermission commentators are related in Oscar Levant's verbal divertissement, "A Smattering of Ignorance."*

Listeners will recall that heretofore Mr. Levant, pianist and composer, has relied on the radio to disclose his musical information. That medium, however, has not revealed adequately his bright, humorous, sometimes satirical, and always highly personal literary style. Any one interested in contemporary music and musicians who relishes anecdotes and revealing comment will enjoy this book. If Mr. Levant is sometimes caustic with his subjects, he is disarmingly unflattering about himself.

S. N. Behrman supplies an introduction to Mr. Levant's half-dozen chapters dealing, among other things, with orchestral conductors and musicians, music in motion pictures, Harpo Marx, George Gershwin and other contemporary composers, and finally, as the material grows thin, with the author's own difficulties in writing the book.

* * *

Interest was aroused in musical circles last Fall when the chapter called "Music in Aspic" was published in a magazine. Its frank statements about conditions within orchestras and its personal appraisals of famous conductors make this chapter some of the liveliest musical entertainment that has been supplied the reading public in a long time.

Schoolmasters, it appears, have no more difficulty in controlling unruly pupils than do conductors in awing some of their accomplished musicians. In fact, the relationship between leader and orchestra seems much like that between teacher and pupils, with the conductor's power to discharge a player taking the place of the schoolmaster's old-fashioned birch.

"When an orchestra is aware that the conductor has in his inside pocket a contract for next season and the one after that, carrying with it the power to rearrange the personnel 'for the good of the orchestra'—in other words, to hire and to fire—its attitude is apt to be somewhat more respectful than if he is merely an interloper to be tolerated for a brief engagement."

Fundamentally the problem between conductor and orchestra is a matter of authority—whether the conductor dominates his men or whether they dominate him. Orchestral performers definitely are not the clinging-vine type. Contrary to popular opinion, "utter control of a performance, to the point at which ninety or a hundred players become not merely a cohesive group but the single-minded extension of one personality, is a rare talent among musicians—possessed, among conductors now active in America, primarily by Koussevitzky, Stokowski and Toscanini."

The possible power of orchestra players is such that they "can do more to ruin a conductor" than "to make him." Over the years the symphony orchestra develops a collective personality colored by its most marked individuals. There are "prima donnas" among players as well as among conductors and both sometimes are capricious and arbitrary. The respect commanded by a conductor varies directly with his power "to convey sound musicianship" and with "his unaffected sympathy for the music he chooses to conduct."

* * *

To illustrate his opinions, Mr. Levant cites cases, conductors and orchestras, pointing out limitations as well as virtues. Out of this informal comment the Boston Symphony Orchestra emerges with the citation, "unquestionably the finest in the world."

Because of Mr. Levant's close association with the late George Gershwin, the chapter devoted largely to this composer's personality and music will interest many. Training as a song writer, according to the author, so conditioned the treatment of Mr. Gershwin's ideas that although he wrote "half-a-dozen extended works, he never wrote a score in a strict musical form."

Mr. Levant does not recall hearing Mr. Gershwin even mention a desire to write "a symphony or any other work in such a clearly defined form." He could not adapt himself to such limitations as the sonata form but found himself most at home in "the thematic fluency, the easy-going rhythmic freedom of the rhapsody or unrestricted fantasy." With him even the concerto was the "Lisztian mantle draped loosely on the skeleton of the sonata form."

* * *

The lively chapter devoted to music in motion pictures does not suggest that Hollywood will produce any major composition in the immediate future. Aside from the technical difficulties of writing for films, a basic handicap is the fact that "the level of musical perception among Hollywood producers is, if anything, slightly lower than their perception of values associated with the other arts."

As Mr. Levant sees the situation, men without marked originality have already established patterns in Hollywood music, to which all newcomers must conform. This situation would be more discouraging if the history of the arts did not show that significant originality often has had to struggle against comfortably entrenched mediocrity and has won out in the long run. Nevertheless, it looks as if some years would elapse before Hollywood rivals Bayreuth.

A SMATTERING OF IGNORANCE. By Oscar Levant. 267 pages. Doubleday, Doran & Co., Inc. $2.*

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LANSDALE, PA.
North Penn Reporter
JAN 15 1940

Boston may well swell up a bit over the tribute paid the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Oscar Levant in his "A Smattering of Ignorance," when he pronounces the organization "unquestionably the finest in the world." Philadelphia and New York will doubtless approve Mr. Levant's choice of a title.

NORFOLK, VA.
VIRGINIAN PILOT
JAN 14 1940

Noted Singer Coming Here

Dorothy Maynor to Appear in Recital in City Auditorium January 26

Dorothy Maynor, colored singer who in recent months has gained ranking as one of the great soloists, will be presented in a recital on Friday night, January 26, in the City Auditorium, where a section of seats will be reserved for white patrons.

Discovered by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, she made her professional debut before an overflow audience at New York's Town Hall on November 19, and drew the highest type of praise from critics, one of whom described her as "the singing discovery of the decade."

Before her appearance here, she will be the guest star with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra on January 16, and later will fill separate engagements with the Philadelphia Sympony Orchestra and the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra.

She is not unknown to music-lovers in this locality, for many have heard her sing before, mainly with the Hampton Institute Choir. A native of Norfolk, for several years she has devoted her entire time in preparation for the concert stage.

The recital is being sponsored for the benefit of the Norfolk Community Hospital, and those who attend will enjoy a rare musical treat and at the same time aid a worthy institution.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat-Chronicle
JAN 14 1940

Russian Conductor To Make Debut

Nicolai Malko, Russian conductor, will make his American debut as guest leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the series from Jan. 15 to 22. Malko is well known in Europe, where he is permanent conductor of the Copenhagen Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 14 1940

Nikolai Malko, the Russian conductor who lives in Copenhagen, arrives in Boston this week to guest conduct the ~~city~~'s Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon ~~and Saturday~~ night. The program for both occasions headlines the Shostakovitch first symphony. Other items include Rossinis' little known overture to "La Gazza Ladra," which is getting quite a play around the circuit these days; Max Reger's variations on a Mozart theme, and Tschaikowsky's Italian caprice.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER
JAN 14 1940

Dorothy Maynor, negro soprano, protege of Serge Koussevitsky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will record Mozart and Handel arias in the near future. Koussevitzky calls her a "native Flagstad." Critics who have heard her have run out of superlatives.

(6)

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 14 1940

SANROMA SOLOIST IN CARNEGIE HALL

Plays Stravinsky's 'Capriccio' for Piano and Orchestra With Boston Symphony

COMPOSER AT CONCERT

Audience Cheers Him, Pianist and Koussevitzky, Who Also Offers Brahms and Mozart

By OLIN DOWNES

The sensation of the concert given by Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Cargenie Hall was the performance, with Jesus Sanroma as soloist, of Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra. This took place in the presence of the composer, who, immensely acclaimed, first bowed from a box and then came on the stage with the conductor and the pianist. Mr. Stravinsky had reason for self-congratulation as the audience had occasion to rejoice an electrical accomplishment.

In fact, and in friendship, one is moved to urge Mr. Stravinsky always to allow Dr. Koussevitzky to conduct his music. It can make an immense difference! What the orchestra, the conductor, the pianist did with the composition yesterday was hardly short of the uncanny, in both technical and interpretive aspects. In fact the performance had such sentitiveness and zest, such humor and nuance and thrust, that it took on a completely creative character. In no small measure the performance was the music, and this is said without desire to be invidious, since the "Capriccio" is certainly one of the most spontaneous and witty compositions of Stravinsky's later period.

First Performed Here in 1931

It was first performed here by the same artists as yesterday, on Feb. 7, 1931. To the loss of this writer the date conflicted with that of the première of an American opera, Deems Taylor's "Peter Ibbetson," which took place that afternoon, and so the music went for the time unknown to him.

It makes a very amusing piece. In explaining the composition Mr. Stravinsky raised his eyeballs to the skies, literarily speaking, and murmured that in writing the piece he found his thoughts dominated by "that prince of music, Carl Maria von Weber, whose genius admirably lent itself to this manner. Alas! no one thought of calling him a prince in his lifetime." One is tempted to exclaim "Prince of Fiddlesticks!" and to remark that we only know Weber by such a petty title as composer of "Freischutz." Mr. Stravinsky might just as well, and quite possibly would, just as seriously, with tongue in cheek, have said that he was going in for Gounod, Bizet or Verdi. He would have written just the same music in these cases. An influence far more obvious in the score is that of Maurice Ravel, especially in the slow movement. And as certain peppery, sardonic dissonances crackle from the orchestra one thinks of a word picture by a colleague of Stravinsky and Ravel seated side by side before a piano, Ravel playing some queer chords, Stravinsky pushing him aside, to play still queerer ones. This concerto is like that—waggish, impudent, sophisticated and extremely diverting.

You asked yourself, as this playful chicanery flew back and forth from conductor to orchestra and soloist, and from instrument to instrument, how they could do it. By what consummate skill or inspired tomfoolery can modern musicians so amazingly disport and complement each other? The rabbit leaps into the hat, and—the hat is empty. A sudden and terrifying hubbub—the bewildered listener turns around—there's nothing there except some insouciant little double notes, very sweet, very shy, being tossed off as innocently as nobody's business by Mr. Sanroma. He isn't even looking your way, but flourishing his paws, and blandly regarding the conductor, with whom he is playing catch!

It was a sort of lively conversation between a group of very clever people with pass-words of their own, only half intelligible to fascinated on-lookers, all of it so quick so mecurial, that every one else was fat-witted by comparison.

It may be said that in music of this sort Koussevitzky, the orchestra, Sanroma, are really unique. Very much of the secret of this species of composition will be lost when they have scattered or ceased to cooperate.

Was Student Few Years Ago

As for Mr. Sanroma, he has grown, by an industry and talent as remarkable as his modesty, from a student of a few years ago to a modern pianist whose performance yesterday could be equaled by a very few and outrivaled by no one. It is also to be said that as he has matured so also has his tone become more many-colored and more mellow. His strength yesterday was equal to everything that the score and the orchestra required, yet not a tone was forced. He played the music joyously and with the confidence of complete mastery. Every rhythmical problem—and there are some rhythms which in themselves would justify the word "capriccio"—found him on the spot, on the split second, sure as a cat that lands on his feet, however you throw him into the air. And what a good time he had of it!

It was all sportive and diverting past compare. It is no wonder that after this jeu d'esprit the audience went wild; that the three fellow creators, the composer, the conductor, the pianist, had to come back again and again in response to the applause.

It was a rare concert, the more refreshing after the curiously dull one of the preceding Thursday. The symphony was Mozart's, the one in C major which Koechel numbers 338. Less celebrated, far less pretentious than such a work as the "Jupiter" in the same key, it is a glowing, singing, pulsing little masterpiece, and was played in the tradition, with abounding vitality and luminousness of tone.

The concert ended with Brahm's Second symphony, a work in which Koussevitzky has always been fortunate, but in which he outdid himself for breadth, poetry, virility of spirit. In fact a lesser performance, great though the music is, would have paled before the snap and glitter of the Koussevitzky reading. This was a noble climax.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Sunday Jour. & American
JAN 14 1940

PHILHARMONIC ORCHESTRA'S 2D VISIT ENDS

Koussevitsky Leads in Superb Delineation of Mozart's G Major; Sanronia Is Adept

By Grena Bennett

The Boston Symphony ended its second New York visit with yesterday afternoon's concert in Carnegie Hall.

Jesus Maria Sanronia was the piano soloist in Stravinsky's Capriccio for orchestra and proved himself adept in interpreting its pages, infusing into his performance agreeable rhythmic vitality and unfolding the characteristic language of the composer with scholarly understanding.

OPEN WITH MOZART.

The orchestra, under the excellent and eloquent direction of Serge Koussevitsky, opened the program with Mozart's G major symphony. The leader's incomparable instrument gave a superb delineation of the work in which lucidity, clarity of style and artful moulding of each phrase were notable attributes.

Of more sturdy matter was the performance of Brahms' D major symphony, the closing number, played with vigor and color and a deft application of accent and emphasis.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
JAN 15 1940

KAMINSKY PLAYS GLAZUNOFF WORK

Sanroma Is Soloist With Koussevitzky.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

The Philharmonic's unofficial survey of Russian violin concerti continued yesterday afternoon with a performance of the Glazunoff by Anatol Kaminsky. Last week Igor Stravinsky directed another soloist's performance of the Tchaikovsky, so that one may say that repertory has been thoroughly covered. John Barbirolli, however, diversified this program with scores by Rossini and Sibelius.

Mr. Kaminsky's debut was as auspicious an event of its kind as one has heard this season, for he plays the instrument in a manner to interest both violinists and music lovers. As yet he lacks slightly the ability to project his playing as well as one might desire, but his technic is both fleet and accurate, his bow arm a versatile asset and his sense of style more than ordinarily refined. He might profitably work toward broadening his tone, though its present quality is too solid and warm to invite much tampering.

Mr. Barbirolli's well-adjusted treatment of the orchestral score was an item to be considered, for there are many passages where a soloist can be submerged if the conductor is not alert. Mr. Barbirolli was. He also directed a surehanded, straightforward playing of the Sibelius second symphony, in which the tonal excellence of this orchestra was prominently revealed, and the "La Gazza Ladra" overture of Rossini. All these works were heard at the Saturday night concert, plus Delius's "Brigg Fair."

Sanroma Plays Stravinsky.

That opportunity for a reappraisal of a recent contemporary score which is offered all too seldom by present-day orchestras was a valuable feature of the Boston Symphony's matinee concert in Carnegie Hall on Saturday. Stravinsky's "Capriccio" (introduced in 1931) was the work, and Jesus Maria Sanroma, who played it then, was again the pianist, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting. It emerged from this latest scrutiny a work somewhat thoughtful for its suggestive title, but also as a score of wizardly craftsmanship, in which the conception and its execution in the orchestra and soloist instruments is hardly separable. Though the work has a remarkably consistent flow from beginning to end, each of the three movements has an individuality of its own. The slow section is the least successful of the work, for its content seems hardly to fulfill the composer's expectations. He was present to bow his acknowledgment of an exceptional performance, and then to congratulate the soloist and conductor for their efforts.

The program was otherwise devoted to standard symphonies—the C major (No. 34) of Mozart and the D major of Brahms. Both were enriched measurably by the splendid tonal properties of the orchestra, as well as by the single-minded response of the men to the demands of the conductor.

Despite a rain-drenched evening, the Center Theater was again filled to the limit of its capacity last night for the second in the series of Tchaikovsky programs by the Music Project. Albert Spalding was the much-applauded soloist in the violin concerto. The other works heard under the direction of Eugene Plotnikoff were the "Pathetic" symphony, the "Capriccio Italien" and the andante cantabile.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JAN 15 1940

—MUSIC OF TH

Concerts of Offer Much

Bostonians Excell; Kar Chamber Music at the

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Covering the musical front during the in contact with almost all the varieties coverage summarizes itself more into the appraise. The weekend had its memorab of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Ca noon; its exciting moment in the debu Anatol Kaminisky, at the concerts of the Philharmonic-Symphony; a fascinating interval in the playing of Yoichi Hiraoka, xylophonist, at Town Hall last night; a disappointment in the world premiere of the new ballet "Peter and the Wolf" by the Ballet Theatre on Saturday; its most interesting experience in the appearance of the Chamber Music Guild of New York at the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon. There were other events not to be overlooked; such as the playing of the Griller Quartet, the Trio of New York at the New Friends of Music, "Manon" and "Lohengrin" at the Metropolitan and the regular NBC broadcast conducted by Molinari. Such was the itinerary with a few others for good measure.

* * *

BOSTONIANS PLAY

The visits of the Boston Symphony grow more and more compelling on each occasion. The visitors reached their culmination in their third concert. Hardly had they progressed into the first movement of the Mazort Symphony in C (K 338) when it became obvious that the afternoon was to be one of wonder at the perfection of their playing. On this Mozart symphony Koussevitsky lavished all his necromantic powers. It will be a long time before those who heard it will forget the performance, especially that of the Finale. As for Stravinsky's Capriccio for Orchestra with a piano part played by Jesus Maria Sanroma, it added a cubit to the reputation of the performances and perhaps subtracted one from that of the composer. One wonders if Stravinsky, who was present, ever expects to hear a more magnificent performance of this work. Try as they did to make the most of the music, the musicians could not give more than rhythmic life to that which sounded sterile otherwise. Treated as a percussive instrument, the piano was given little opportunity to prove itself an instrument of the immortals. Sanroma played as to the manner born. Duties elsewhere made it impossible to hear the Brahms Second.

TUCSON, ARIZ
STAR
1/14/40

The Boston Symphony orchestra visited New York during the past week, playing Thursday and Friday nights and Saturday afternoon, with Serge Koussevistzky conducting and Violinist Joseph Szigeti and Pianist Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
JAN 15 1940

Sanroma Soloist With Bostonians

Jesus Sanroma, soloist in Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony at Carenegie Hall Saturday afternoon, received an ovation from the audience (an ovation shared equally by the composer himself) and the gratitude, it must be supposed, of the composer. The work itself is fascinating, but half of the fascination of Saturday's performance was in the expert and audacious playing of soloist and orchestra.

The concert, in all ways equal to the superb standard of last Thursday's performance, offered a vigorous, tonally persuasive playing of Mozart's C major Symphony, K. 338, and a comprehensive reading, marked by poetry and noble sentiments, of Brahms' Second Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 14 1940

SANROMA SOLOIST IN CARNEGIE HALL

Plays Stravinsky's 'Capriccio' for Piano and Orchestra With Boston Symphony

COMPOSER AT CONCERT

Audience Cheers Him, Pianist and Koussevitzky, Who Also Offers Brahms and Mozart

By OLIN DOWNES

The sensation of the concert given by Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Cargenie Hall was the performance, with Jesus Sanroma as soloist, of Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra. This took place in the presence of the composer, who, immensely acclaimed, first bowed from a box and then came on the stage with the conductor and the pianist. Mr. Stravinsky had reason for self-congratulation as the audience had occasion to rejoice an electrical accomplishment.

In fact, and in friendship, one is moved to urge Mr. Stravinsky always to allow Dr. Koussevitzky to conduct his music. It can make an immense difference! What the orchestra, the conductor, the pianist did with the composition yesterday was hardly short of the uncanny, in both technical and interpretive aspects. In fact the performance had such sentitiveness and zest, such humor and nuance and thrust, that it took on a completely creative character. In no small measure the performance was the music, and this is said without desire to be invidious, since the "Capriccio" is certainly one of the most spontaneous and witty compositions of Stravinsky's later period.

First Performed Here in 1931

It was first performed here by the same artists as yesterday, on Feb. 7, 1931. To the loss of this writer the date conflicted with that of the première of an American opera, Deems Taylor's "Peter Ibbetson," which took place that afternoon, and so the music went for the time unknown to him.

It makes a very amusing piece. In explaining the composition Mr. Stravinsky raised his eyeballs to the skies, literarily speaking, and murmured that in writing the piece he found his thoughts dominated by "that prince of music, Carl Maria von Weber, whose genius admirably lent itself to this manner. Alas! no one thought of calling him a prince in his lifetime." One is tempted to exclaim "Prince of Fiddlesticks!" and to remark that we only know Weber by such a petty title as composer of "Freischutz." Mr. Stravinsky might just as well, and quite possibly would, just as seriously, with tongue in cheek, have said that he was going in for Gounod, Bizet or Verdi. He would have written just the same music in these cases. An influence far more obvious in the score is that of Maurice Ravel, especially in the slow movement. And as certain peppery, sardonic dissonances crackle from the orchestra one thinks of a word picture by a colleague of Stravinsky and Ravel seated side by side before a piano, Ravel playing some queer chords, Stravinsky pushing him aside, to play still queerer ones. This concerto is like that—waggish, impudent, sophisticated and extremely diverting.

You asked yourself, as this playful chicanery flew back and forth from conductor to orchestra and soloist, and from instrument to instrument, how they could do it. By what consummate skill or inspired tomfoolery can modern musicians so amazingly disport and complement each other? The rabbit leaps into the hat, and—the hat is empty. A sudden and terrifying hubbub—the bewildered listener turns around—there's nothing there except some insouciant little double notes, very sweet, very shy, being tossed off as innocently as nobody's business by Mr. Sanroma. He isn't even looking your way, but flourishing his paws, and blandly regarding the conductor, with whom he is playing catch!

It was a sort of lively conversation between a group of very clever people with pass-words of their own, only half intelligible to fascinated on-lookers, all of it so quick so mecurial, that every one else was fat-witted by comparison.

It may be said that in music of this sort Koussevitzky, the orchestra, Sanroma, are really unique. Very much of the secret of this species of composition will be lost when they have scattered or ceased to cooperate.

Was Student Few Years Ago

As for Mr. Sanroma, he has grown, by an industry and talent as remarkable as his modesty, from a student of a few years ago to a modern pianist whose performance yesterday could be equaled by a very few and outrivaled by no one. It is also to be said that as he has matured so also has his tone become more many-colored and more mellow. His strength yesterday was equal to everything that the score and the orchestra required, yet not a tone was forced. He played the music joyously and with the confidence of complete mastery. Every rhythmical problem — and there are some rhythms which in themselves would justify the word "capriccio"—found him on the spot, on the split second, sure as a cat that lands on his feet, however you throw him into the air. And what a good time he had of it!

It was all sportive and diverting past compare. It is no wonder that after this jeu d'esprit the audience went wild; that the three fellow creators, the composer, the conductor, the pianist, had to come back again and again in response to the applause.

It was a rare concert, the more refreshing after the curiously dull one of the preceding Thursday. The symphony was Mozart's, the one in C major which Koechel numbers 338. Less celebrated, far less pretentious than such a work as the "Jupiter" in the same key, it is a glowing, singing, pulsing little masterpiece, and was played in the tradition, with abounding vitality and luminousness of tone.

The concert ended with Brahm's Second symphony, a work in which Koussevitzky has always been fortunate, but in which he outdid himself for breadth, poetry, virility of spirit. In fact a lesser performance, great though the music is, would have paled before the snap and glitter of the Koussevitzky reading. This was a noble climax.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
JAN 15 1940

KAMINSKY PLAYS GLAZUNOFF WORK

Sanroma Is Soloist With Koussevitzky.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

The Philharmonic's unofficial survey of Russian violin concerti continued yesterday afternoon with a performance of the Glazunoff by Anatol Kaminsky. Last week Igor Stravinsky directed another soloist's performance of the Tchaikovsky, so that one may say that repertory has been thoroughly covered. John Barbirolli, however, diversified this program with scores by Rossini and Sibelius.

Mr. Kaminsky's debut was as auspicious an event of its kind as one has heard this season, for he plays the instrument in a manner to interest both violinists and music lovers. As yet he lacks slightly the ability to project his playing as well as one might desire, but his technic is both fleet and accurate, his bow arm a versatile asset and his sense of style more than ordinarily refined. He might profitably work toward broadening his tone, though its present quality is too solid and warm to invite much tampering.

Mr. Barbirolli's well-adjusted treatment of the orchestral score was an item to be considered, for there are many passages where a soloist can be submerged if the conductor is not alert. Mr. Barbirolli was. He also directed a surehanded, straightforward playing of the Sibelius second symphony, in which the tonal excellence of this orchestra was prominently revealed, and the "La Gazza Ladra" overture of Rossini. All these works were heard at the Saturday night concert, plus Delius's "Brigg Fair."

Sanroma Plays Stravinsky.

That opportunity for a reappraisal of a recent contemporary score which is offered all too seldom by present-day orchestras was a valuable feature of the Boston Symphony's matinee concert in Carnegie Hall on Saturday. Stravinsky's "Capriccio" (introduced in 1931) was the work, and Jesus Maria Sanroma, who played it then, was again the pianist, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting. It emerged from this latest scrutiny a work somewhat thoughtful for its suggestive title, but also as a score of wizardly craftsmanship, in which the conception and its execution in the orchestra and soloist instruments is hardly separable. Though the work has a remarkably consistent flow from beginning to end, each of the three movements has an individuality of its own. The slow section is the least successful of the work, for its content seems hardly to fulfill the composer's expectations. He was present to bow his acknowledgment of an exceptional performance, and then to congratulate the soloist and conductor for their efforts.

The program was otherwise devoted to standard symphonies—the C major (No. 34) of Mozart and the D major of Brahms. Both were enriched measurably by the splendid tonal properties of the orchestra, as well as by the single-minded response of the men to the demands of the conductor.

Despite a rain-drenched evening, the Center Theater was again filled to the limit of its capacity last night for the second in the series of Tchaikovsky programs by the Music Project. Albert Spalding was the much-applauded soloist in the violin concerto. The other works heard under the direction of Eugene Plotnikoff were the "Pathetic" symphony, the "Capriccio Italien" and the andante cantabile.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Sunday Jour. & American
JAN 14 1940

PHILHARMONIC ORCHESTRA'S 2D VISIT ENDS

Koussevitsky Leads in Superb Delineation of Mozart's G Major; Sanronia Is Adept

By Grena Bennett

The Boston Symphony ended its second New York visit with yesterday afternoon's concert in Carnegie Hall.

Jesus Maria Sanronia was the piano soloist in Stravinsky's Capriccio for orchestra and proved himself adept in interpreting its pages, infusing into his performance agreeable rhythmic vitality and unfolding the characteristic language of the composer with scholarly understanding.

OPEN WITH MOZART.

The orchestra, under the excellent and eloquent direction of Serge Koussevitsky, opened the program with Mozart's G major symphony. The leader's incomparable instrument gave a superb delineation of the work in which lucidity, clarity of style and artful moulding of each phrase were notable attributes.

Of more sturdy matter was the performance of Brahms' D major symphony, the closing number, played with vigor and color and a deft application of accent and emphasis.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JAN 15 1940

—MUSIC OF TH

Concerts of Offer Much

Bostonians Excell; Kar
Chamber Music at the

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Covering the musical front during the in contact with almost all the varieties coverage summarizes itself more into the appraise. The weekend had its memorab of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Ca
ncon; its exciting moment in the debu
Anatol Kaminisky, at the concerts of the Philharmonic-Symphony; a fascinating interval in the playing of Yoichi Hiraoka, xylophonist, at Town Hall last night; a disappointment in the world premiere of the new ballet "Peter and the Wolf" by the Ballet Theatre on Saturday; its most interesting experience in the appearance of the Chamber Music Guild of New York at the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon. There were other events not to be overlooked; such as the playing of the Griller Quartet, the Trio of New York at the New Friends of Music, "Manon" and "Lohengrin" at the Metropolitan and the regular NBC broadcast conducted by Molinari. Such was the itinerary with a few others for good measure.

* * *

BOSTONIANS PLAY

The visits of the Boston Symphony grow more and more compelling on each occasion. The visitors reached their culmination in their third concert. Hardly had they progressed into the first movement of the Mazort Symphony in C (K 338) when it became obvious that the afternoon was to be one of wonder at the perfection of their playing. On this Mozart symphony Koussevitzky lavished all his necromantic powers. It will be a long time before those who heard it will forget the performance, especially that of the Finale. As for Stravinsky's Capriccio for Orchestra with a piano part played by Jesus Maria Sanroma, it added a cubit to the reputation of the performances and perhaps subtracted one from that of the composer. One wonders if Stravinsky, who was present, ever expects to hear a more magnificent performance of this work. Try as they did to make the most of the music, the musicians could not give more than rhythmic life to that which sounded sterile otherwise. Treated as a percussive instrument, the piano was given little opportunity to prove itself an instrument of the immortals. Sanroma played as to the manner born. Duties elsewhere made it impossible to hear the Brahms Second.

TUCSON, ARIZ
STAR
1/14/40

The Boston Symphony orchestra visited New York during the past week, playing Thursday and Friday nights and Saturday afternoon, with Serge Koussevistzky conducting and Violinist Joseph Szigeti and Pianist Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
JAN 15 1940

Sanroma Soloist With Bostonians

Jesus Sanroma, soloist in Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony at Carenegie Hall Saturday afternoon, received an ovation from the audience (an ovation shared equally by the composer himself) and the gratitude, it must be supposed, of the composer. The work itself is fascinating, but half of the fascination of Saturday's performance was in the expert and audacious playing of soloist and orchestra.

The concert, in all ways equal to the superb standard of last Thursday's performance, offered a vigorous, tonally persuasive playing of Mozart's C major Symphony, K. 338, and a comprehensive reading, marked by poetry and noble sentiments, of Brahms' Second Symphony.

THE BOSTON HERALD, SUNDAY, JANUARY 14, 1940

Malko Guest Conductor for Symphony

BATON ROUGE, LA
MORN. ADVOCATE
1/14/40

Chords and Discords

Heard by
Harris Jackson

New York, Jan. 13.—New Yorkers during the past fortnight applauded Sergei Rachmaninoff's playing of the first Beethoven concerto with the Philharmonic symphony, packed Carnegie hall to hear Dr. Serge Koussevitzky lead the Boston Symphony through the Sibelius Second symphony, and heard two debutants at the Metropolitan Opera house. For Alexander Kipnis, distinguished Russian basso, listeners and critics were high in their praise; to Jarmila Novotna, new Czech soprano, they gave a reception which was pleasant if not overly enthusiastic.

Dr. Koussevitzky continues to share with Arturo Toscanini the distinction of being one of America's two favorite conductors and rarely does one hear anything but praise for the Boston Symphony and its leader.

The playing of the Sibelius Second by this ensemble is accepted as the authoritative performance; the performance this week was typically magnificent and climactic.

Barbirolli and Rachmaninoff.

Rachmaninoff's playing likewise is one of the brighter musical notes on the horizon, as it has been for so many years. The Beethoven concerto which he and John Barbirolli chose for the Philharmonic audience was well-suited to the Russian's ideas of interpretation. As a result an austere and distinguished reading was given.

The Kipnis debut, as Gurnemanz in "Parsifal," brings to the Met a basso who is greatly needed in the German wing. These roles have been taken almost exclusively in the past few years by Emanuel List, and that great artist's voice is no longer the thing of beauty which once thrilled New Yorkers. Known to concert audiences and to record buyers as a superb artist with more than adequate voice, Kipnis last week gave a telling performance as Gurnemanz. He developed his character thoroughly, proved more than a match for the heavy orchestration, and indicated that he will be a happy choice in the future for the roles of King Henry in "Lohengrin," King Mark in "Tristan," and the Landgraf in "Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

JAN 14 1940

Man Needed at Helm

Thiede says it's because they lacked a man at the helm.

"Women are every bit as good players as men," he said, "but they simply won't take orders from another woman. You know how it is—personal jealousies and outbursts of temperament — one woman thinks the conductor is wearing a better dress than the one she has on, and they simply don't coordinate.

"But this group, I am glad to say, is working very harmoniously, and because of that I believe we are attaining a degree of proficiency comparable to some men's orchestras of standing."

Thiede, who at the age of 29 was concertmaster of the St. Louis Symphony, says his bassoon player, Miss Anne De Guichard, is one of the world's finest players, male or female.

"A top-ranking conductor told me recently that 'if she only wore pants I would take her into my orchestra in a minute.' "

Even Has Junior Leaguers

In addition, there are two Junior Leaguers, Mary Driver, who plays the violin, and Peggy Stuart, pianist, as well as numerous music teachers and wives of symphony musicians.

The symphony of 75 players has drawn commendation from famed Conductor Serge Koussevitzky for the calibre of programs it will play.

Anton Rubinstein's "Ocean Symphony," which hasn't been played in Boston since 1903, is on the first program, and Alexander Borodin's Second Symphony, also infrequently heard, is on the fourth and last concert.

Thiede, who also was first violinist for ten years under Leopold Stowski in Philadelphia, lists two major objectives.

Has Two Objectives

The first is educational — to encourage women to express themselves in a field in which they, by natural equipment and conscientious study and support, have a rightful place — and the second is to provide a hearing for the less frequently played works of both American and foreign-born composers — especially women.

In accordance with that plan, the world premiere of a Concertino for Piano and Orchestra by Margaret Starr McLain, a member of the faculty of Boston University's School of Music, will be played on February 13, with the composer at the piano.

Standard works such as Schumann's Piano Concerto, Mozart's Violin Concerto, Haydn's 'Cello Concerto and Beethoven's Fourth Symphony will provide the classicism.

BOSTON SUNDAY ADVERTISER—Page 15

Malko Directs Next Symphony

Jan 14

By Anthony Merrill

THE First Symphony of Shostakovitch will be presented at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall by the conductor who led the first performance of this work at Leningrad in 1926—Nicolai Malko, the guest conductor of the week, who is to make his first appearances in Boston.

Mr. Malko's program will be identical for the symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony Hall, and for the concert in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on the Thursday evening previous.

The symphony of Shostakovitch, written in the composer's 19th year, has been played in many cities of the western world, as well as Russia. It was performed at these concerts in 1935. The program will open with Rossini's overture to "La Gazza Ladra." The second portion will include Max Reger's orchestral variations on a theme of Mozart, and Tchaikowsky's "Italian" Capriccio.

Nicolai Malko, attending the conservatory as a boy in St. Petersburg, was a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakov, Liadov and Glazounov. He conducted the opera at St. Petersburg before the Revolution, and has subsequently conducted the Philharmonic Orchestra of that city. He has been on the faculty of the conservatories at both Moscow and Leningrad. For the last 10 years, he has been one of the regular conductors of the State Radio Orchestra in Copenhagen, Denmark, and has appeared during recent seasons as guest conductor in England, Italy, Central Europe and South America. He has recently come to this country from Scandinavia where he has been conducting in the present season.

* * *

Anticipation of the recital by Alec Templeton in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, January 21, has turned up a story which sheds much light on the extraordinary impression he made by his first appearance in Boston last year.

In the audience was Serge Koussevitzky. He listened to Templeton with absorption during the first and serious part of the program. During the blind young artist's witty keyboard caricature performances, Koussevitzky laughed until the tears rolled down his cheeks.

At the end of the recital, Koussevitzky complimented Templeton for both his amusing and serious art. Not only that, but Koussevitzky sought to engage him as soloist in a concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a project which came to grief on a conflict of available dates.

Roland Hayes, the eminent Negro tenor, who now is on a western tour, returns to Boston for a recital in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, Feb. 11, at the new concert time of 8 o'clock.

During the second week of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's mid-winter vacation, Richard Burgin will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Jan. 26-27). Josef Hofmann will be soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 14 1940

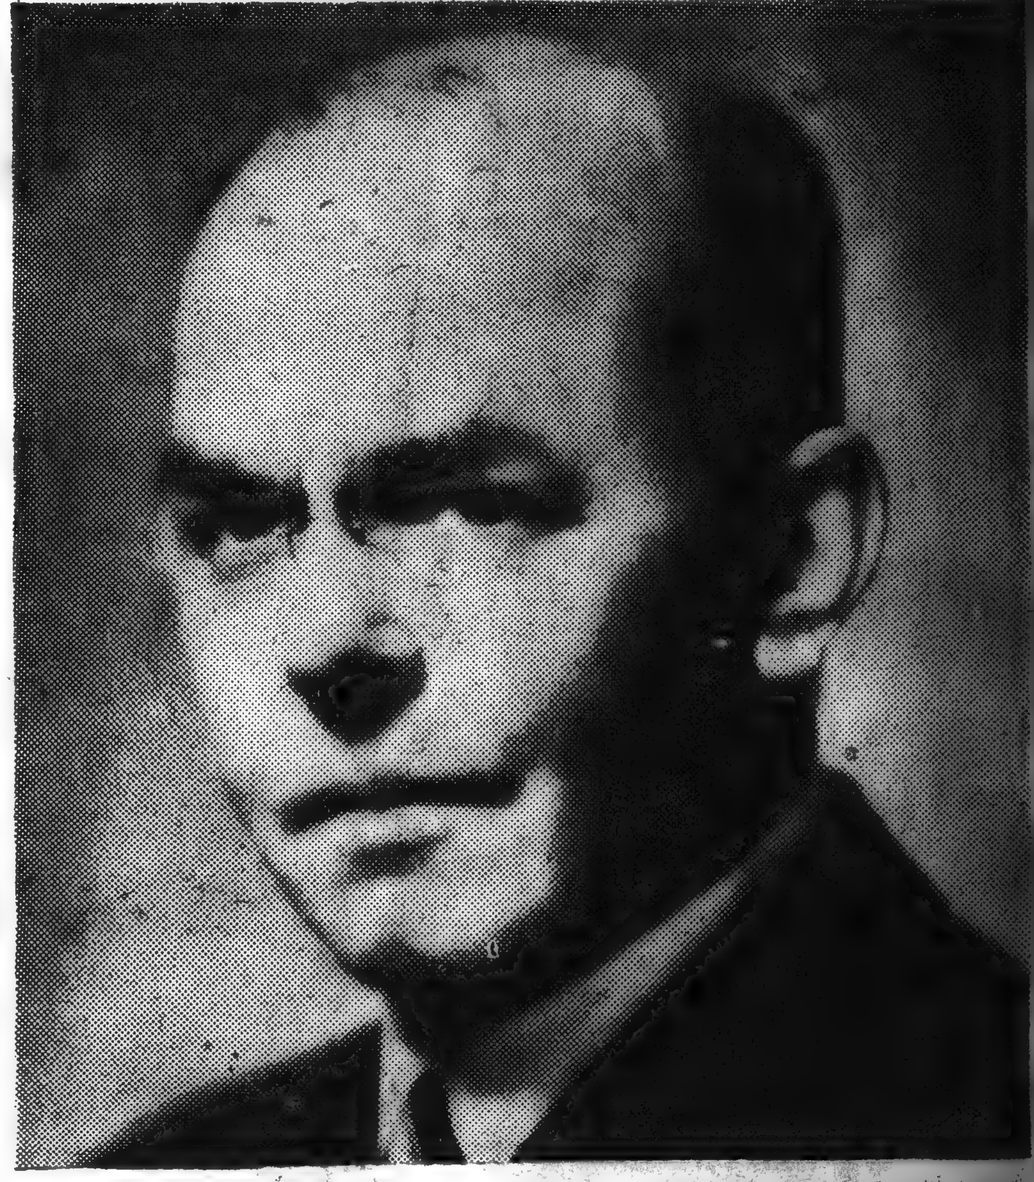
Malko Guest Leader Of Boston Symphony

Will Conduct Home Concerts Next Friday and Saturday

Nicolai Malko, a Russian conductor who has been active in many countries of western and central Europe during the last twelve years, will make his American debut next Friday afternoon and Saturday night in Symphony Hall, Boston, as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His [redacted] includes Rossini's overture to "La Gazza Ladra," which has not been heard before in this orchestra's concerts, Shostakovitch's first symphony; Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart, new to the Boston Symphony repertoire, and Tchaikovsky's Italian Caprice.

He was born in the Ukraine and began his musical and general studies in Odessa, going thence to St. Petersburg (Leningrad) to study history and psychology at the university and to study at the Conservatory with Rimsky-Korsakoff, Glazounoff and Nicolai Tcherepnin. While still a student he was invited to conduct ballet at the Marinsky Theater, where he worked with Michel Fokine and his group. Later he went to Munich to study under Felix Motti, returning to St. Petersburg after a year to conduct ballet and opera there and concerts in other Russian cities.

After the revolution he continued his career in Russia for several years and made his first foreign appearance in Vienna in 1928. During the last ten or twelve years he has made frequent appearances with orchestras in London, as well as in continental Europe, and has been particularly active in the Scandinavian countries, especially in Denmark, where he is the regular conductor of the Copenhagen Radio and Symphony Orchestra. He came here for the first time last summer, to teach at Mills College, Oakland, Calif., and, after returning to Copenhagen this winter, expects to return to the United States for summer engagements.



Nicolai Malko, who will be the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concrt at Symphony Hall this week.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JAN 15 1940

Reviews of Concerts

By PITTS SANBORN.

Music of the week end brought to Carnegie Hall a Saturday matinee by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and concerts by the Philharmonic-Symphony Saturday night and yesterday afternoon. The NBC Symphony Orchestra, Bernardino Molinari conducting, gave its usual Saturday night broadcast. The Saturday operas at the Metropolitan were Manon in the afternoon and Lohengrin at night.

At the Town Hall the Saturday attractions comprised the Griller String Quartet and Adele Marcus, pianist, afternoon and evening respectively. Yesterday Wilbur Evans, baritone, began proceedings with an afternoon recital. He was followed by the New Friends of Music resuming their series with the Trio of New York. At night Yoichi Hiraoka, xylophonist, held forth.

The League of Composers gave a first concert for the present season at the Museum of Modern Art last evening. Meantime the New York Symphony Orchestra, Eugene Plotnikoff conducting, continued the Tschaikowsky series sponsored by the Mayor at the Center Theater.

The Ballet Theater on Saturday gave matinee and evening performances. Last night, the Windsor Theater, Zina Ouzarova, dancer made her Aemrican debut. Yesterday afternoon, in the Carnegie Chamber Music Hall, Leslie Coles, Negro tenor, appeared in recital.

* * *

Again the Boston Symphony played with a maximum of virtuosity and brilliance. Mozart's C major symphony without a minuet, which the Koechel catalogue numbers 338, opened the concert and rarely can it have been set forth with such dazzling freshness and grace. Then came the Stravinsky Capriccio for Orchestra with Piano Solo, the pianist being Jesus Maria Sanroma, who had officiated as soloist when the same orchestra introduced the work to America in Boston on Dec. 19, 1930, and brought it to New York on the Feb. 7 following.

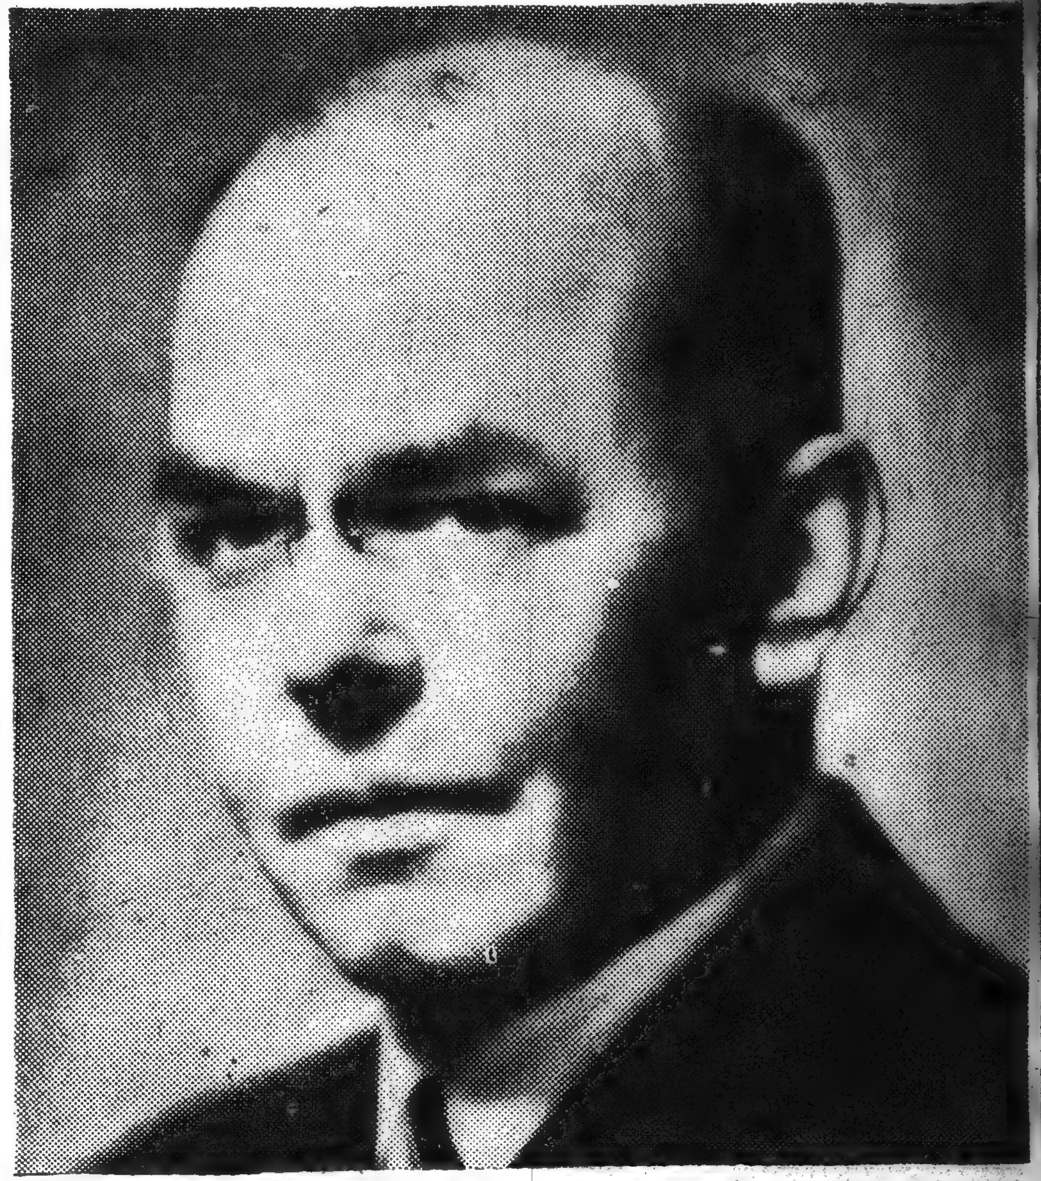
Mr. Stravinsky, speaking of this piece in his autobiography, remarks, "There is little wonder that while working at my Capriccio I should find my thoughts dominated by that prince of music, Carl Maria von Weber, whose genius admirably lent itself to that manner." The listener's thoughts would surely turn rather to jazz than to the composer of Der Freischuetz, Oberon, and the Invitation to the Dance. Yet, wherever they happen to turn, the Capriccio remains a delightfully spirited, witty, scintillating work and it was set forth superlatively.

Mr. Stravinsky, who heard the concert from a box, went to the stage to bow along with Serge Koussevitzky and Mr. Sanroma in response to the ensuing ovation.

One more number completed the program—the Second Symphony of Brahms. Mr. Koussevitzky exhibited some personal ideas concerning pace and dynamics, but even if his reading would hardly do as a model for aspiring youth, it was in itself thrilling. And the orchestra gave such an account of the notes of Brahms and the notions of the batonist that a house thronged to capacity could burst into cheer after cheer.

* * *

Malko Guest Conductor for Symphony



Nicolai Malko, who will be the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concrt at Symphony Hall this week.

BATON ROUGE, LA
MORN. ADVOCATE
1/14/40

Chords and Discords

Heard by

Harris Jackson

New York, Jan. 13.—New Yorkers during the past fortnight applauded Sergei Rachmaninoff's playing of the first Beethoven concerto with the Philharmonic symphony, packed Carnegie hall to hear Dr. Serge Koussevitzky lead the Boston Symphony through the Sibelius Second symphony, and heard two debutants at the Metropolitan Opera house. For Alexander Kipnis, distinguished Russian basso, listeners and critics were high in their praise; to Jarmila Novotna, new Czech soprano, they gave a reception which was pleasant if not overly enthusiastic.

Dr. Koussevitzky continues to share with Arturo Toscanini the distinction of being one of America's two favorite conductors and rarely does one hear anything but praise for the Boston Symphony and its leader.

The playing of the Sibelius Second by this ensemble is accepted as the authoritative performance; the performance this week was typically magnificent and climactic.

Barbirolli and Rachmaninoff.

Rachmaninoff's playing likewise is one of the brighter musical notes on the horizon, as it has been for so many years. The Beethoven concerto which he and John Barbirolli chose for the Philharmonic audience was well-suited to the Russian's ideas of interpretation. As a result an austere and distinguished reading was given.

The Kipnis debut, as Gurnemanz in "Parsifal," brings to the Met a basso who is greatly needed in the German wing. These roles have been taken almost exclusively in the past few years by Emanuel List, and that great artist's voice is no longer the thing of beauty which once thrilled New Yorkers. Known to concert audiences and to record buyers as a superb artist with more than adequate voice, Kipnis last week gave a telling performance as Gurnemanz. He developed his character thoroughly, proved more than a match for the heavy orchestration, and indicated that he will be a happy choice in the future for the roles of King Henry in "Lohengrin," King Mark in "Tristan," and the Landgraf in "Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

JAN 14 1940

Man Needed at Helm

Thiede says it's because they lacked a man at the helm.

"Women are every bit as good players as men," he said, "but they simply won't take orders from another woman. You know how it is—personal jealousies and outbursts of temperament — one woman thinks the conductor is wearing a better dress than the one she has on, and they simply don't coordinate.

"But this group, I am glad to say, is working very harmoniously, and because of that I believe we are attaining a degre of proficiency comparable to some men's orchestras of standing."

Thiede, who at the age of 29 was concertmaster of the St. Louis Symphony, says his bassoon player, Miss Anne De Guichard, is one of the world's finest players, male or female.

"A top-ranking conductor told me recently that 'if she only wore pants I would take her into my orchestra in a minute.' "

Even Has Junior Leaguers

In addition, there are two Junior Leaguers, Mary Driver, who plays the violin, and Peggy Stuart, pianist, as well as numerous music teachers and wives of symphony musicians.

The symphony of 75 players has drawn commendation from famed Conductor Serge Koussevitzky for the calibre of programs it will play.

Anton Rubinstein's "Ocean Symphony," which hasn't been played in Boston since 1903, is on the first program, and Alexander Borodin's Second Symphony, also infrequently heard, is on the fourth and last concert.

Thiede, who also was first violinist for ten years under Leopold Stowski in Philadelphia, lists two major objectives.

Has Two Objectives

The first is educational — to encourage women to express themselves in a field in which they, by natural equipment and conscientious study and support, have a rightful place — and the second is to provide a hearing for the less frequently played works of both American and foreign-born composers — especially women.

In accordance with that plan, the world premiere of a Concertino for Piano and Orchestra by Margaret Starr McLain, a member of the faculty of Boston University's School of Music, will be played on February 13, with the composer at the piano.

Standard works such as Schumann's Piano Concerto, Mozart's Violin Concerto, Haydn's 'Cello Concerto and Beethoven's Fourth Symphony will provide the classicism.

BOSTON SUNDAY ADVERTISER—Page 15

Malko Directs Next Symphony

Jan 14

By Anthony Merrill

THE First Symphony of Shostakovitch will be presented at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall by the conductor who led the first performance of this work at Leningrad in 1926—Nicolai Malko, the guest conductor of the week, who is to make his first appearances in Boston.

Mr. Malko's program will be identical for the symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony Hall, and for the concert in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on the Thursday evening previous.

The symphony of Shostakovitch, written in the composer's 19th year, has been played in many cities of the western world, as well as Russia. It was performed at these concerts in 1935. The program will open with Rossini's overture to "La Gazza Ladra." The second portion will include Max Reger's orchestral variations on a theme of Mozart, and Tchaikowsky's "Italian" Capriccio.

Nicolai Malko, attending the conservatory as a boy in St. Petersburg, was a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakov, Liadov and Glazounov. He conducted the opera at St. Petersburg before the Revolution, and has subsequently conducted the Philharmonic Orchestra of that city. He has been on the faculty of the conservatories at both Moscow and Leningrad. For the last 10 years, he has been one of the regular conductors of the State Radio Orchestra in Copenhagen, Denmark, and has appeared during recent seasons as guest conductor in England, Italy, Central Europe and South America. He has recently come to this country from Scandinavia where he has been conducting in the present season.

* * *

Anticipation of the recital by Alec Templeton in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, January 21, has turned up a story which sheds much light on the extraordinary impression he made by his first appearance in Boston last year.

In the audience was Serge Koussevitzky. He listened to Templeton with absorption during the first and serious part of the program. During the blind young artist's witty keyboard caricature performances, Koussevitzky laughed until the tears rolled down his cheeks.

At the end of the recital, Koussevitzky complimented Templeton for both his amusing and serious art. Not only that, but Koussevitzky sought to engage him as soloist in a concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a project which came to grief on a conflict of available dates.

Roland Hayes, the eminent Negro tenor, who now is on a western tour, returns to Boston for a recital in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, Feb. 11, at the new concert time of 8 o'clock.

During the second week of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's mid-winter vacation, Richard Burgin will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Jan. 26-27). Josef Hofmann will be soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 14 1940

Malko Guest Leader Of Boston Symphony

Will Conduct Home Concerts Next Friday and Saturday

Nicolai Malko, a Russian conductor who has been active in many countries of western and central Europe during the last twelve years, will make his American debut next Friday afternoon and Saturday night in Symphony Hall, Boston, as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His [redacted] includes Rossini's overture to "La Gazza Ladra," which has not been heard before in this orchestra's concerts, Shostakovitch's first symphony; Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart, new to the Boston Symphony repertoire, and Tchaikovsky's Italian Caprice.

He was born in the Ukraine and began his musical and general studies in Odessa, going thence to St. Petersburg (Leningrad) to study history and psychology at the university and to study at the Conservatory with Rimsky-Korsakoff, Glazounoff and Nicolai Tcherepnin. While still a student he was invited to conduct ballet at the Marinsky Theater, where he worked with Michel Fokine and his group. Later he went to Munich to study under Felix Mottl, returning to St. Petersburg after a year to conduct ballet and opera there and concerts in other Russian cities.

After the revolution he continued his career in Russia for several years and made his first foreign appearance in Vienna in 1928. During the last ten or twelve years he has made frequent appearances with orchestras in London, as well as in continental Europe, and has been particularly active in the Scandinavian countries, especially in Denmark, where he is the regular conductor of the Copenhagen Radio and Symphony Orchestra. He came here for the first time last summer, to teach at Mills College, Oakland, Calif., and, after returning to Copenhagen this winter, expects to return to the United States for summer engagements.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JAN 15 1940

Reviews of Concerts

By PITTS SANBORN.

Music of the week end brought to Carnegie Hall a Saturday matinee by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and concerts by the Philharmonic-Symphony Saturday night and yesterday afternoon. The NBC Symphony Orchestra, Bernardinc Molinari conducting, gave its usual Saturday night broadcast. The Saturday operas at the Metropolitan were Manon in the afternoon and Lohengrin at night.

At the Town Hall the Saturday attractions comprised the Griller String Quartet and Adele Marcus, pianist, afternoon and evening respectively. Yesterday Wilbur Evans, baritone, began proceedings with an afternoon recital. He was followed by the New Friends of Music resuming their series with the Trio of New York. At night Yoichi Hiraoka, xylophonist, held forth.

The League of Composers gave a first concert for the present season at the Museum of Modern Art last evening. Meantime the New York Symphony Orchestra, Eugene Plotnikoff conducting, continued the Tschaikowsky series sponsored by the Mayor at the Center Theater.

The Ballet Theater on Saturday gave matinee and evening performances. Last night, the Windsor Theater, Zina Ouzarova, dancer made her Aemrican debut. Yesterday afternoon, in the Carnegie Ghamber Music Hall, Leslie Coles, Negro tenor, appeared in recital.

* * *

Again the Boston Symphony played with a maximum of virtuosity and brilliance. Mozart's C major symphony without a minuet, which the Koechel catalogue numbers 338, opened the concert and rarely can it have been set forth with such dazzling freshness and grace. Then came the Stravinsky Capriccio for Orchestra with Piano Solo, the pianist being Jesus Maria Sanroma, who had officiated as soloist when the same orchestra introduced the work to America in Boston on Dec. 19, 1930, and brought it to New York on the Feb. 7 following.

Mr. Stravinsky, speaking of this piece in his autobiography, remarks, "There is little wonder that while working at my Capriccio I should find my thoughts dominated by that prince of music, Carl Maria von Weber, whose genius admirably lent itself to that manner." The listener's thoughts would surely turn rather to jazz than to the composer of Der Freischuetz, Oberon, and the Invitation to the Dance. Yet, wherever they happen to turn, the Capriccio remains a delightfully spirited, witty, scintillating work and it was set forth superlatively.

Mr. Stravinsky, who heard the concert from a box, went to the stage to bow along with Serge Koussevitzky and Mr. Sanroma in response to the ensuing ovation.

One more number completed the program—the Second Symphony of Brahms. Mr. Koussevitzky exhibited some personal ideas concerning pace and dynamics, but even if his reading would hardly do as a model for aspiring youth, it was in itself thrilling. And the orchestra gave such an account of the notes of Brahms and the notions of the batonist that a house thronged to capacity could burst into cheer after cheer.

* * *

N.Y. Times Jan 14

163

THE DEBATE ON AMERICAN MUSIC

Correspondents Continue To Submit Their Points Of View

The American Composer Again

To the Music Editor:

Olin Downes's article on "The Native Essence" interested me, as did also his articles on the American Composer and Sibelius, together with the answers which they evoked. I find myself agreeing with Sir Roger de Coverley that "much may be said on both sides."

At least there are two sides to this question, and it is unfortunate that composer and critic never seem to see "eye to eye"—or shall we say hear ear to ear? If the critic is too impersonal, perhaps the composer is too personal concerning the issue of American music. The critic is busy comparing American compositions with the greatest masterpieces of the past, while the composer is trying to do exactly what Mr. Downes quotes Thomas Craven as having stated. Whether successful or not in producing characteristically American music (and Mr. Downes has said definitely that he is not), the American composer tries to create a new style through putting technical habits or methods "to work in new surroundings, when his inherited processes are transformed in the crucible of experience, when environmental pressure and interests residing in life, not in art, rouse him to a personal utterance capable of imparting the force and flavor of direct experiences."

* * *

It would be difficult to express the creed of any sincere composer more definitely. Some such statement might have been made by Charles Ives when he wrote his "Concord Sonata," or by Arthur Shepherd for "Horizons," or by John Powell for his "Negro Rhapsody," or by Louis Gruenberg for "The Emperor Jones" and "Daniel Jazz," or by Douglas Moore in "The Devil and Daniel Webster," or by Elie Siegmeister for "A Strange Funeral in Braddock," or by William Schuman for his "Overture," or by Aaron Copland for his "Outdoor Overture" and his "Billy the Kid," or by Roy Harris for his "Song for Occupations," or for Nathaniel Dett's "The Ordering of Moses," or for Marc Blitzstein's "The Cradle will Rock," or William Grant Still's "Afro-American Symphony" and "Lenox Avenue," or George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" and "Porgy and Bess," or John Alden Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," or Henry F. Gilbert's "Dance in Place Congo," or Philip James's "Station WGBX," etc.

These may not equal in value the works of Chopin, Brahms, Stravinsky, Hindemith or Sibelius, as Mr. Downes stated sweepingly Dec. 17, but perhaps they are just as native in essence as the collection of "A Treasury of American Prints" which our music critic praises so highly. Perhaps Mr. Edward Alden Jewell, whose comments on art appear weekly on the next page to Mr. Downes's writings, might find the "native essence" in some of these compositions by Americans. He might even use Mr. Downes's words concerning the prints: "Here is America made more significant to us than otherwise we might have realized it to be; and this with astonishing variety of technic and treatment. Methods, sometimes styles, are derivative .But the expression is magnificently native."

Mr. Downes is willing to accept these prints as an American expression without seeking to find in them the "equivalent and value" of a Rembrandt, a Michelangelo, a Raphael, a Corot, a Degas, or a Braque. He agrees with Roy Harris that "American music is fast on its way" and states: "It is freeing itself from the bondage of technical ineptitude of an earlier time, and it is gaining a degree of national consciousness which is indispensable to genuine and original expression. When?"

When, indeed! May we suggest that first the vicious circle must be broken. The public and press will not accept American music until the great genius appears; the great genius will not appear until the talented composers are encouraged by recognition from public and press.

We may not boast a Bach, Beethoven, or Brahms, but how many Bachs, Beethovens and Brahmses have there been? If we have few geniuses, we at least have many talents, and talent is the soil in which genius is nurtured. When Mr. Downes states that neither this nor any preceding generation has produced an American score "certain to outlive its period," he is making an unpredictable assertion, because history has proved that future generations go back into the past and choose works which suit their special needs and often turn away from compositions which received highest commendation by contemporaries.

* * *

When the history of this era is written, the fact that America's greatest contribution to music thus far has been in the popular field may assume more important proportions than we are willing to grant today.

The compositions mentioned above as showing the "native essence" are programmatic, and we are not in a period where program music is considered as important as absolute music, in which field one must have a subtle ear to detect the frequently present "native essence," This quality is much easier to present by means of picture and word than by absolute music. The fact that it is present in American music is, I think, indisputable. How otherwise could Mr. Downes explain the fact that a committee of musicians selected, from a number of compositions played anonymously, William Grant Still's music for the "World of Tomorrow" (heard daily in the Perisphere at the World's Fair) as the the most characteristic American work?

At the present stage, it is important for our composers to write sincerely, with technical mastery, expressing an unconscious reflection of their environment, which is the basis for a great national art. Perhaps if the "frozen music" of our contemporary and individual architecture could be thawed out, it would turn into music by Roger Sessions, Walter Piston, Randall Thompson, Quincy Porter, Harold Morris, Frederick Jacobi and others.

If Mr. Downes can state definitely what makes German music German; French music French; Russian music Russian, etc., then perhaps he will succeed in the orientation "regarding the place of the present-day American creative musician in relation to his country and his epoch, and truth of artistic expression." MARION BAUER.

New York, Jan. 6, 1940.

Development of Enduring Music

To the Music Editor:

May I submit this open letter to Roy Harris:

I know nothing about the "mystical" art of music making, but as one who got his first and only lesson in composition (count pulse, sing five-note scale, make random combination at pulse rate; anybody can do it) at your festive board, please accept my hearty congratulations on your Dec. 20 letter to THE NEW YORK TIMES re a critique of music critics.

As I understand your thesis, enduring music does not rise out of a flat plane like towering unbuttressed shafts ready to be toppled by some myopic critic's chilly blast, but rather as the pinnacle of a pyramid undergirded by a vast substratum of innumerable individual efforts that resulted in variable lesser achievements.

One doesn't need to be a musician to appreciate the principle you expound, for it is universal. It is as true of medicine as it is of music. I feel sure it is basic in the evolution of all human achievement. Your concept de-emphasizes the individual achievement and makes it greater debtor to its setting.

Surely this is a sound concept for the total picture, and yet withal, is it not probable that some "unsung Miltons" lie buried within the pyramid, their horns locked with critics who, too, have died?

DR. ROBERT D. WRIGHT.

Baltimore, Md., Jan. 8, 1940.

On Getting a Work Played

To the Music Editor:

I read with much interest Mr. Downes's article in THE TIMES of Dec. 17, discussing the predicament of the American composer. He has fairly presented the case, although I differ with him in one aspect of it to wit: that if and when an American Beethoven, Brahms or Wagner appears he will have no difficulty in getting his music performed. It is readily conceded that there is no American Beethoven, Brahms or Wagner and there never will be unless and until American composers receive the encouragement derived from the production of their works.

And how will the budding American Beethoven be discovered if American conductors decline to examine scores, as they quite consistently do? While there are no Beethovens in America, there are a large number of composers who are writing sincere worth-while music which is fully entitled to recognition and public performance. One could with equal justice insist that no play should be produced in this country unless it were the equal of Shakespeare, or that no novel be published unless it could compare favorably with Dickens, Thackeray, Victor Hugo or Balzac.

A real problem, not discussed, is the matter of getting a composition brought to the attention of orchestra conductors. He does one go about it? Citing personal experience, I take a score to a conductor —or, rather, to the conductor's secretary, for one never contacts His Highness—in the Fall, only to be told that the programs for the entire season have been made up and it will be impossible to consider additional works. I then defer my attack until the following Spring after the season is over, and then I am told that the conductor is on the eve of leaving for Europe and cannot be bothered with the consideration of new works.

EDWARD C. POTTER.

Washington, Dec. 26, 1939.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
JAN 14 1940

MUSIC

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, John Barbirolli, conductor, 3,583d concert last night at Carnegie Hall with Anatol Kaminsky, violinist, making his New York debut in the following program:

Rossini ....Overture to "La Gazza Ladra"
Delius ....Brigg Fair
Glazounoff ....Violin Concerto in A minor
Sibelius.... Symphony No 2, in D major

A New Violinist

Anatol Kaminsky, a young violinist who has passed the first decade of his life in Asia and Europe and the second in America, had the notable co-eperation of John Barbirolli and the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra for his first public appearance as a mature artist last night in Carnegie Hall, where he played the Glazounoff concerto in a cosmopolitan program of Italian, English, Russian and Finnish music.

The twenty-year-old musician, it was noted, was born in Siberia, and gave his first performance on a concert stage at the age of eight with the mainly Russian orchestra of Harbin, Manchuria. A year later, his family went to Paris, whence a group of musical patrons, recognizing his talent, brought him to New York, where he continued his musical studies and obtained his general education at the Dalton School.

In regard to technique and musicianship, he made a very promising first impression. A poised and dignified while unassuming stage presence had its counterpart in his command of the music, from an executive point of view, in a thorough mastery of the score which dealt with its more exacting measures without any overt hints of effort in his well styled phrasing and dynamic shading. The tone, after dispensing with a slight edge early in the first movement, was of praiseworthy quality apart from a few slightly tenuous high notes; it had a remarkably consistent clarity and evenness of texture, which were maintained in bravura passages where tonal merits often are threatened.

What was lacking in an interpretation marked by patrician taste was a certain intensity; there was at times an impression of reserve, of yielding insufficiently to sentiment in the andante, where the style of the music calls for considerable opulence and warmth, or of withholding the elan and bravura required to give the high-spirited finale its full potential effectiveness. Still, although it suggested that full interpretative maturity may be still in the future, the performance implied that Mr. Kaminsky has an excellent foundation for a notable career, and won the young artist warm applause. The musicians under Mr. Barbirolli provided laudable and well proportioned co-operation.

* * *

Among the other works on the program, Sibelius's second symphony had its last previous Carnegie Hall performance in Thursday's Boston Symphony concert, but Delius's poetic, if somewhat extensive, musing in many moods upon an English folktune has not been heard here since it was played by this orchestra under Hans Lange in the fall of 1934. This received an imaginative interpretation telling of the conductor's devotion to this music, and the zestful pomp of the opening measures of the Rossini overture gave the concert an auspicious introduction. The program, minus the Delius work, will be repeated this afternoon.

Anatol Kaminsky

Young violinist who made his debut in last night's Philharmonic Symphony concert

* * *

NBC Symphony

While Mr. Barbirolli was conducting the earlier measures of the Sibelius symphony, Bernardino Molinari made his second appearance of the season in the National Broadcasting Company's Studio 8H to direct the NBC Symphony Orchestra in Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Saint-Saëns's zoological fantasy, "The Carnival of Animals", Vivaldi's concerto in A major, arranged by the conductor for string orchestra, and excerpts from Stravinsky's ballet "Petrouchka."

The least familiar of these works is the Vivaldi "Echo" concerto, so called from the echoing of strains played by the principal ensemble by a small group of instrumentalists offstage. This was discovered by Mr. Molinari in Dresden and, as edited by him, first played here in three Philharmonic-symphony concerts under Mr. Toscanini in March, 1934. It has not had a concert performance here since, although it is music of much charm, and was ingratiatingly played under the Roman conductor for the NBC studio and radio audiences. The Saint-Saens fantasy is often highly diverting, although the diverting measures have pedestrian interludes, and was well set forth with Joseph Kahn and Earl Wild, pianists, and Frank Miller, first cellist of the orchestra, among the soloists.

The zest and color of the Stravinsky music was often, but not invariably, realized, while a notable feature in the Mendelssohn symphony was the swift-paced elan of the closing saltarello. Mr. Molinari and his musicians were fervently applauded by the 1,200 invited guests.

Koussevitzky Leads Orchestra In 2d Symphony by Brahms

By Jerome D. Bohm

For the greater number of those who filled Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, the most memorable achievement must have been the magnificent interpretation accorded Brahms's Second Symphony in D major. It is difficult to recall an unfolding of this endearing work which realized so veraciously and so movingly the composer's unending flow of solacing melodies. As one listened to the incomparable orchestra invest this music with ravishing, incandescently gleaming tones, one recalled that not so many years ago it was customary to speak disparagingly of Brahms's instrumentation and discuss it as "opaque" and a poor medium for great utterances. This transparency of texture and Mr. Koussevitzky's firmly integrated, yet plastic and intense, conveyance of the score were the irresistibly compelling facets of an unforgettable publication of one of Brahms's undying creations.

The program opened with Mozart's Symphony in C major (K. 338), a product of the composer's twenty-fourth year, which, while it does not reveal the full flowering of his genius, contains much that is characteristic of his style, juxtaposing sparkling gayety with that serenity which one associates exclusively with Mozart. It was set forth in flawless fashion.

The central offering was Stravinsky's Capriccio, in which the piano solo part was played by Jesus Maria Sanroma. The composer, who was present to acknowledge the enthusiastic demonstration which ensued at the conclusion of the brilliant discourse of his product by both pianist and orchestra, has written of it that while in the process of writing it he found his thoughts "dominated by that prince of music, Carl Maria von Weber." To tell the truth, there is precious little influence of Weber to be found in its pages. In the first movements a few measures, which might have been culled either from the latter's A flat Piano Sonata or a chorus in the first act of "Euryanthe," flit by. But, for the most part its percussive syncopations and melodic contours are closer to American jazz than to the Germanic romanticism of Weber.

164

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DAVENPORT, IA.
DEMOCRAT-LEADER

JAN 14 1940

Catching the Beat in Music World Today

By INA WICKHAM.

MANY interesting facts and figures have come from the annual orchestra managers conference held in Detroit last month, when round table discussions of problems of music and finance occupied the attention of representatives of 16 major orchestras whose budgets average more than $100.000. The Boston Symphony, nonunion, and very well subscribed is at the top, financially as well as artistically. They have the longest season, and they pay their orchestra by the year with a minimum of $3,000 and still retain the lowest operating deficit in the country. In addition almost the entire list of trustees and financial contributors go to the concerts, they have built a fine music shed at Tanglewood, the summer home of the orchestra and will sponsor an Academy of Music this summer.

THE CONFERENCE

. . . further disclosed the fact that the Detroit, Mich., and Rochester, N. Y., orchestras have very large operating deficits in spite of the fact that the Sunday evening hour pays the Detroit orchestra a good sum for the concerts. Rochester spends a great deal of money on American composers and compositions. The conference in Detroit was opposed to any orchestra campaigns based on the "Pay up or give up the orchestra" idea and urged that American orchestras should have private support and be classed with universities and be budgeted and supported accordingly.

A NEW ORCHESTRA

. . . has been established in Portland, Ore., with Leslie Hodge of California as director. The orchestra will be a joint venture of the musicians union and the WPA project. Eight concerts are scheduled for 1940 and the first one will be this week. The programs will be built to public taste and will avoid "heavy" music.

OUT OF TOWN

. . . orchestras are already making plans for concerts in New York next season. It is said that the Boston orchestra under Koussevitsky will play six pairs of concerts in Carnegie Hall instead of the customary five, and that the Philadelphia orchestra will give a dozen or more. Cleveland orchestra will present four or six concerts in its New York schedule for the 1940-41 season. It is also rumored that when Toscanini returns to the NBC symphony in March that the concerts will be moved to Carnegie Hall. It is known that the maestro was very much impressed with the sound of the orchestra in that hall when he gave the Beethoven "Ninth" a few weeks ago.

MUSIC STUDENTS

. . . who have longed to play sonatas, quartets, trio and quintets and who have been unable to find ensemble players will be interested in the new series of records called "Add-a-Part", put out by the Columbia Recording corporation. In these records all but one part is included and the instrumentalist plays this part along with the recording. In some of the records, the first or second violin part is missing, in some, the cello and in still others the piano part. Every record or set of records contains the complete musical score with the missing instrument part written out in full. The running line of the music on the record is written above it as a guide. The records are carefully recorded to insure musical accuracy and every movement begins with the sounding of the proper pitch and the tempo is established at the beginning of the record before the music commences. The recordings are made by members of the Rothschild ensemble.

SONNTAGSBLATT STAATS-ZEITUNG UND HEROLD, DEN 14. JANUAR 1940

Aus der Musikwelt

Boston Orcheſtra

Von den großen Orcheſtern, die in unſerer Carnegie Hall ſpielen, genießt kein anderes ſo ſtarken Zuſpruch wie das Boſton Symphony Orcheſtra. Wie am vergangenen Donnerſtag bei dem Abendkonzert ſo war der Saal auch geſtern nachmittag wieder gefüllt.

Serge Kouſſevitzky hatte diesmal aus der Gegenwart das „Capriccio" für Klavier und Orcheſter von Stravinſky gewählt und es mit der C-Dur-Symphonie (K. 338) von Mozart und der 2. Symphonie von Brahms umgeben. Es war alſo ein hellfarbiges, mehr zur unbekümmerten Freude als zur Beſinnlichkeit anregendes Programm. Die Symphonie Mozarts, die nicht zu den bedeutendſten und auch nicht zu den am häufigſten geſpielten des Meiſters gehört, iſt ein einfaches, freundliches Werk von anmutiger Melodik und in den beiden Eckſätzen von einem unbekümmerten, ſchalkhaften Humor erfüllt.

Der Uebergang von Mozart zu Stravinſky wirkte garnicht ſo kraß, wie man annehmen ſollte, obſchon die Harmonik des Ruſſen ſcharf von der des älteren Meiſters abſticht. Aber auch das Capriccio iſt ein witziges, an Ueberraſchungen reiches Werk, vielleicht nicht ganz ſo genial in einem Zug heruntergeſchrieben wie die Symphonie von Mozart und deshalb ſtellenweiſe ein wenig öde, um nicht zu ſagen brüchig. Beſonders der langſame Mittelſatz mit ſeinen abſchweifenden Gedankengängen wirkt gequält, doch wird der Hörer durch den kapriziöſen Schlußſatz voll und reichlich für ſeine Geduld entſchädigt. Jeſus Maria Sanroma ſpielte den Klavierpart mit beſtechender Klarheit und konnte mit dem glänzend muſizierenden Orcheſter einen großen Erfolg erringen. Der anweſende Komponiſt wurde ebenfalls auf das Podium geholt und vom Publikum gefeiert.

Aber den mächtigſten Eindruck hinterließ doch die Symphonie von Brahms, die ſich ja von den anderen drei ſymphoniſchen Werken des Meiſters durch ihre ſonnig-verklärte Grundſtimmung unterſcheidet und keine trüben, beſchwerenden Gedanken aufkommen läßt. Der Beifall am Schluß war ein regelrechter Begeiſterungstaumel.

H. M.

Transcript Jan 16

A Conductor Talks

Nicolai Malko, Guest Conductor with Our Symphony, Divulges Some Personal Notes

"Audiences must notice nothing of what goes on in the kitchen," said Nicolai Malko. "None of the messy work of rehearsals should be apparent in the finished production. And conversely, the rehearsal should never be like a performance. For if it is, there is danger that the real performance will seem a repetition, a mere reproduction, no matter how good, of something even better that has gone before. This is particularly true when rehearsal and performance take place on the same day."

Mr. Malko, the Ukrainian conductor who has arrived to direct three week-end concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, grinned amiably through his glasses, as we sat in his hotel yesterday afternoon hearing his enthusiastic explanations of why he enjoys his job, what he believes a conductor must do and stories of his great idols among the conductors of the past. Since he left Russia, some 10 years ago, he has had a wide experience of European orchestras and conductors. He has learned to tame the temperament of Italian players as well as how to manage the imperturbable British calm.

"You must have to speak a great many languages, since you conduct in so many countries," we asked.

"Not at all," he replied in his fluent Russian-English. "Languages are just a hindrance. Too much talk gets you nowhere with an orchestra. It is much better to sing, no matter how badly you croak. Of course, now and then there is something which has to be explained with words. For that, I speak four languages—all badly." He laughed.

Born in the Ukraine, Mr. Malko studied first in Odessa, then history and philology at the University in Petersburg, while continuing his music studies at the Petersburg Conservatory under Rimsky-Korsakoff, Glasounoff, Ljadoff and Tcherepnine. As a pupil of the conservatory he was invited to conduct ballet at the Maryinsky Theater, where he worked with Michael Fokine, Pavlowa and Nijinski. After his first season there he went to Munich to study conducting under Felix Mottl, then the chief of the Munich Opera and of the Wagner-Mozart festivals.

Returning to Petersburg he conducted ballet and opera for 10 seasons, at the same time giving symphony concerts in the principal Russian cities. In 1928 he conducted for the first time in Vienna, then in all the other important music centers of western Europe, including London, Berlin, etc., and for the last 11 years every season in Copenhagen and Scandinavian centers.

Mr. Malko's work as a pedagogue, which had started in Russia where he founded conducting classes in Moscow, Leningrad, Kharkow and Kieff, was continued until recent seasons at the Mozarteum at Salzburg and last summer at Mills College, Oakland, Calif.

THIS CLIPPING FROM XENIA, O.
GAZETTE

JAN 18 1940

ABRAM CHASINS ON ANTIOCH SERIES OF CONCERTS JAN. 22

Pianist And Composer Will Be Presented At Opera House

Abram Chasins, internationally known young American pianist and composer, will give the third concert in the Antioch College Concert Series January 22 at 8:30, in the Yellow Springs Opera House.

Popularly known for his weekly lecture-recitals over the radio in past years, Chasins was also for a time the youngest member of the faculty at the Curtis Institute of Music, and has been piano soloist with such organizations as the Philadelphia, New York Philharmonic, and Boston Symphony Orchestras.

The program for the Antioch College concert ranges from Bach's "Fantasy and Fugue in G Minor" to "The Swan" of Saint-Saens. Three Brahms rhapsodies, a Chopin group, and compositions by Rachmaninoff and Stravinsky are also included in the program.

Chasins will also play his own "Fantasy on Two Themes from 'Schwanda'," and his arrangement of a Gluck melody. His compositions have been performed by such eminent conductors as Toscanini, Stokowski, and Barbirolli.

Admission to the concert is $1.00 or by season ticket.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 17 1940

WORDS About Music And Musicians

Nikolai Malko will conduct the 12th program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week in Symphony Hall, Boston.

Two compositions will be performed for the first time at these concerts, Rossini's Overture to "La Gazza Ladra" and Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart, Op. 132. Also to be played are Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 1, Op. 10, and Tschaikowsky's Italian Capriccio, Op. 45.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JAN 17 1940

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Josef Hofmann will play the Schumann piano concerto in A minor, Op. 54, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Metropolitan Theatre on Tuesday night. Richard Burgin will conduct.

The program:

Moussorgsky . . . .
"Une Nuit sur le Mont Chauve" ("A Night on Bald Mountain"), Orchestral Fantasy
Schumann . . . .
Concerto for Pianoforte in A minor, Op. 54
Prokofieff . . . .
. . "Classical" Symphony, Op. 10
I. Allegro
II. Larghetto
III. Gavotte
IV. Finale.
Strauss . . . .
"Don Juan," Symphonic Poem (after Lenau)
Poot . . . . Ouverture Joyeuse

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN

JAN 17 1940

ORCHESTRA OF WOMEN MAKES ITS DEBUT

Conducted by Scranton Man Once With Stokowski

Boston, Jan. 17—(AP)—With a white-haired grandmother and a 16-year-old high school girl among its 76 players, a new symphony orchestra composed entirely of women made its debut in Jordan Hall last night, and won warm applause from a capacity audience.

With Alexander Thiede, the only male connected with the venture, on the conductor's stand, the orchestra essayed a program wide in scope and ambition.

The audience was quickly won by the rich tone extracted from the players by Thiede, a former child violin prodigy from Scranton, Pa., who for ten years was first violinist under Leopold Stokowski in the Philadelphia Orchestra.

The orchestra was founded, Thiede said, to give women "an equal opportunity to be heard in a field in which they are naturally gifted."

Most of the women are professional musicians, teachers, students, or wives of Boston Symphony players.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTSMOUTH, VA.
STAR

JAN 16 1940

Dorothy Maynor Returns to Home Town Jan. 26th

Not even the great Marian Anderson has been in such demand as guest soloist with the nation's finest symphony orchestras as is Dorothy Maynor, who returns to Norfolk, her home town, for a recital on Friday night, January 26. Reserved and unreserved seats are available for white patrons.

Already she has sung with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which she made recordings, and it has just been announced that she will be guest star with the New Year Philharmonic Orchestra on January 16 and with the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra on March 23 and 25.

It was the Boston Symphony's great conductor, Dr. Serge Kousevitzky, who gave the nation its first autoritative prediction that Miss Maynor would promptly gain ranking as one of the great soloists, when he said last August, after hearing her in a private appearance at the Berkshire Music Festival in New England, that she is a "native Kirsten Flagstead."

When she made her professional debut before an overflow audience at New York's Town Hall on November 19, critics backed up Dr. Koussevitzky's appraisal with comments that she was "phenomenal," "great," "amazing," and possessor of 'as fine a voice as can be heard today.'

Tickets may be purchased in advance at the Journal and Guide, Hall Optical Company, Levy Page Music Company and Northrop Sports Shop.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NORFOLK, VA.
LEDGER DISPATCH

JAN 17 1940

Advance Seat Sale Is Brisk

Dorothy Maynor to Sing Here January 26th

Nowadays singers are usually classified as to vocal type. It is not often that one hears of the musical versatility and vocal range which distinguished singers of the so-called "golden age of song," some 30 years ago.

But in Dorothy Maynor, sensational young Negro soprano, who will sing at the Auditorium here for the benefit of the Norfolk Community Hospital on January 26, the public will hear once again a singer of great vocal range, who is equally at home in the deep tonal beauties of Negro spirituals, in German lieder, and coloratura and dramatic arias.

The demand for reserved seats has been so great that the sponsoring committee for the recital put in a rush order for reserved tickets Saturday and delivered them Monday to the several stores which are handling advance sales, and within a few hours hundreds had been purchased, along with general admission tickets. Advance sales are continuing briskly.

Provisions have also been made for handling mail orders. Such orders should be addressed to Dept. D-M, Box 208, Norfolk, with money orders or checks made payable to the Maynor Recital Committee.

Tickets are also available at the Levy-Page Music Company, Hall Optical Company, Northrop Sports Shop and the Journal and Guide.

Ever since Dorothy Maynor's rich and lovely voice delighted an audience including Serge Koussevitsky, famous Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, at a surprise audition last summer, it has been realized that this is a singer who follows the tradition of some of the famous singers of the past.

And Dorothy Maynor, a native of Norfolk and daughter of a well-known Methodist misister now deceased, also modestly feels that there is nothing unusual in a voice like hers, which ranges from top tones of true soprano brilliance to a deep vocal stream characteristic of her race.

As with all reverent and serious musicians, it is the music which counts with Dorothy Maynor, not the performer.

164

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DAVENPORT, IA.
DEMOCRAT-LEADER

JAN 14 1940

Catching the Beat in Music World Today

By INA WICKHAM.

MANY interesting facts and figures have come from the annual orchestra managers conference held in Detroit last month, when round table discussions of problems of music and finance occupied the attention of representatives of 16 major orchestras whose budgets average more than $100,000. The Boston Symphony, non-union, and very well subscribed is at the top, financially as well as artistically. They have the longest season, and they pay their orchestra by the year with a minimum of $3,000 and still retain the lowest operating deficit in the country. In addition almost the entire list of trustees and financial contributors go to the concerts, they have built a fine music shed at Tanglewood, the summer home of the orchestra and will sponsor an Academy of Music this summer.

THE CONFERENCE

. . . further disclosed the fact that the Detroit, Mich., and Rochester, N. Y., orchestras have very large operating deficits in spite of the fact that the Sunday evening hour pays the Detroit orchestra a good sum for the concerts. Rochester spends a great deal of money on American composers and compositions. The conference in Detroit was opposed to any orchestra campaigns based on the "Pay up or give up the orchestra" idea and urged that American orchestras should have private support and be classed with universities and be budgeted and supported accordingly.

A NEW ORCHESTRA

. . . has been established in Portland, Ore., with Leslie Hodge of California as director. The orchestra will be a joint venture of the musicians union and the WPA project. Eight concerts are scheduled for 1940 and the first one will be this week. The programs will be built to public taste and will avoid "heavy" music.

OUT OF TOWN

. . . orchestras are already making plans for concerts in New York next season. It is said that the Boston orchestra under Koussevitsky will play six pairs of concerts in Carnegie Hall instead of the customary five, and that the Philadelphia orchestra will give a dozen or more. Cleveland orchestra will present four or six concerts in its New York schedule for the 1940-41 season. It is also rumored that when Toscanini returns to the NBC symphony in March that the concerts will be moved to Carnegie Hall. It is known that the maestro was very much impressed with the sound of the orchestra in that hall when he gave the Beethoven "Ninth" a few weeks ago.

MUSIC STUDENTS

. . . who have longed to play sonatas, quartets, trio and quintets and who have been unable to find ensemble players will be interested in the new series of records called "Add-a-Part", put out by the Columbia Recording corporation. In these records all but one part is included and the instrumentalist plays this part along with the recording. In some of the records, the first or second violin part is missing, in some, the cello and in still others the piano part. Every record or set of records contains the complete musical score with the missing instrument part written out in full. The running line of the music on the record is written above it as a guide. The records are carefully recorded to insure musical accuracy and every movement begins with the sounding of the proper pitch and the tempo is established at the beginning of the record before the music commences. The recordings are made by members of the Rothschild ensemble.

SONNTAGSBLATT STAATS-ZEITUNG UND HEROLD, DEN 14. JANUAR 1940

Aus der Musikwelt

Boston Orchestra

Von den großen Orcheſtern, die in unſerer Carnegie Hall ſpielen, genießt kein anderes ſo ſtarken Zuſpruch wie das Boſton Symphony Orcheſtra. Wie am vergangenen Donnerstag bei dem Abendkonzert ſo war der Saal auch geſtern nachmittag wieder gefüllt.

Serge Kouſſevitzky hatte diesmal aus der Gegenwart das „Capriccio" für Klavier und Orcheſter von Stravinſky gewählt und es mit der C-Dur-Symphonie (K. 338) von Mozart und der 2. Symphonie von Brahms umgeben. Es war alſo ein hellfarbiges, mehr zur unbekümmerten Freude als zur Beſinnlichkeit anregendes Programm. Die Symphonie Mozarts, die nicht zu den bedeutendſten und auch nicht zu den am häufigſten geſpielten des Meiſters gehört, iſt ein einfaches, freundliches Werk von anmutiger Melodik und in den beiden Eckſätzen von einem unbekümmerten, ſchalkhaften Humor erfüllt.

Der Uebergang von Mozart zu Stravinſky wirkte garnicht ſo kraß, wie man annehmen ſollte, obſchon die Harmonik des Ruſſen ſcharf von der des älteren Meiſters abſticht. Aber auch das Capriccio iſt ein witziges, an Ueberraſchungen reiches Werk, vielleicht nicht ganz ſo genial in einem Zug heruntergeſchrieben wie die Symphonie von Mozart und deshalb ſtellenweiſe ein wenig öde, um nicht zu ſagen brüchig. Beſonders der langſame Mittelſatz mit ſeinen abſchweifenden Gedankengängen wirkt gequält, doch wird der Hörer durch den kapriziöſen Schlußſatz voll und reichlich für ſeine Geduld entſchädigt. Jeſus Maria Sanroma ſpielte den Klavierpart mit beſtechender Klarheit und konnte mit dem glänzend muſizierenden Orcheſter einen großen Erfolg erringen. Der anweſende Komponiſt wurde ebenfalls auf das Podium geholt und vom Publikum gefeiert.

Aber den mächtigſten Eindruck hinterließ doch die Symphonie von Brahms, die ſich ja von den anderen drei ſymphoniſchen Werken des Meiſters durch ihre ſonnig-verklärte Grundſtimmung unterſcheidet und keine trüben, beſchwerenden Gedanken aufkommen läßt. Der Beifall am Schluß war ein regelrechter Begeiſterungstaumel.

H. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN

JAN 17 1940

ORCHESTRA OF WOMEN MAKES ITS DEBUT

Conducted by Scranton Man Once With Stokowski

Boston, Jan. 17—(AP)—With a white-haired grandmother and a 16-year-old high school girl among its 76 players, a new symphony orchestra composed entirely of women made its debut in Jordan Hall last night, and won warm applause from a capacity audience.

With Alexander Thiede, the only male connected with the venture, on the conductor's stand, the orchestra essayed a program wide in scope and ambition.

The audience was quickly won by the rich tone extracted from the players by Thiede, a former child violin prodigy from Scranton, Pa., who for ten years was first violinist under Leopold Stokowski in the Philadelphia Orchestra.

The orchestra was founded, Thiede said, to give women "an equal opportunity to be heard in a field in which they are naturally gifted."

Most of the women are professional musicians, teachers, students, or wives of Boston Symphony players.

Transcript Jan 16

A Conductor Talks

Nicolai Malko, Guest Conductor with Our Symphony, Divulges Some Personal Notes

"Audiences must notice nothing of what goes on in the kitchen," said Nicolai Malko. "None of the messy work of rehearsals should be apparent in the finished production. And conversely, the rehearsal should never be like a performance. For if it is, there is danger that the real performance will seem a repetition, a mere reproduction, no matter how good, of something even better that has gone before. This is particularly true when rehearsal and performance take place on the same day."

Mr. Malko, the Ukrainian conductor who has arrived to direct three week-end concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, grinned amiably through his glasses, as we sat in his hotel yesterday afternoon hearing his enthusiastic explanations of why he enjoys his job, what he believes a conductor must do and stories of his great idols among the conductors of the past. Since he left Russia, some 10 years ago, he has had a wide experience of European orchestras and conductors. He has learned to tame the temperament of Italian players as well as how to manage the imperturbable British calm.

"You must have to speak a great many languages, since you conduct in so many countries," we asked.

"Not at all," he replied in his fluent Russian-English. "Languages are just a hindrance. Too much talk gets you nowhere with an orchestra. It is much better to sing, no matter how badly you croak. Of course, now and then there is something which has to be explained with words. For that, I speak four languages—all badly." He laughed

Born in the Ukraine, Mr. Malko studied first in Odessa, then history and philology at the University in Petersburg, while continuing his music studies at the Petersburg Conservatory under Rimsky-Korsakoff, Glasounoff, Ljadoff and Tcherepnine. As a pupil of the conservatory he was invited to conduct ballet at the Maryinsky Theater, where he worked with Michael Fokine, Pavlowa and Nijinski. After his first season there he went to Munich to study conducting under Felix Mottl, then the chief of the Munich Opera and of the Wagner-Mozart festivals.

Returning to Petersburg he conducted ballet and opera for 10 seasons, at the same time giving symphony concerts in the principal Russian cities. In 1928 he conducted for the first time in Vienna, then in all the other important music centers of western Europe, including London, Berlin, etc., and for the last 11 years every season in Copenhagen and Scandinavian centers.

Mr. Malko's work as a pedagogue, which had started in Russia where he founded conducting classes in Moscow, Leningrad, Kharkow and Kieff, was continued until recent seasons at the Mozarteum at Salzburg and last summer at Mills College, Oakland, Calif.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 17 1940

WORDS About Music And Musicians

Nikolai Malko will conduct the 12th program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week in Symphony Hall, Boston.

Two compositions will be performed for the first time at these concerts, Rossini's Overture to "La Gazza Ladra" and Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart, Op. 132. Also to be played are Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 1, Op. 10, and Tschaikowsky's Italian Capriccio, Op. 45.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTSMOUTH, VA.
STAR

JAN 16 1940

Dorothy Maynor Returns to Home Town Jan. 26th

Not even the great Marian Anderson has been in such demand as guest soloist with the nation's finest symphony orchestras as is Dorothy Maynor, who returns to Norfolk, her home town, for a recital on Friday night, January 26. Reserved and unreserved seats are available for white patrons.

Already she has sung with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which she made recordings, and it has just been announced that she will be guest star with the New Year Philharmonic Orchestra on January 16 and with the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra on March 23 and 25.

It was the Boston Symphony's great conductor, Dr. Serge Kousevitzky, who gave the nation its first autoritative prediction that Miss Maynor would promptly gain ranking as one of the great soloists, when he said last August, after hearing her in a private appearance at the Berkshire Music Festival in New England, that she is a "native Kirsten Flagstead."

When she made her professional debut before an overflow audience at New York's Town Hall on November 19, critics backed up Dr. Koussevitzky's appraisal with comments that she was "phenomenal," "great," "amazing," and possessor of 'as fine a voice as can be heard today.'

Tickets may be purchased in advance at the Journal and Guide, Hall Optical Company, Levy Page Music Company and Northrop Sports Shop.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NORFOLK, VA.
LEDGER DISPATCH

JAN 17 1940

Advance Seat Sale Is Brisk

Dorothy Maynor to Sing Here January 26th

Nowadays singers are usually classified as to vocal type. It is not often that one hears of the musical versatility and vocal range which distinguished singers of the so-called "golden age of song," some 30 years ago.

But in Dorothy Maynor, sensational young Negro soprano, who will sing at the Auditorium here for the benefit of the Norfolk Community Hospital on January 26, the public will hear once again a singer of great vocal range, who is equally at home in the deep tonal beauties of Negro spirituals, in German lieder, and coloratura and dramatic arias.

The demand for reserved seats has been so great that the sponsoring committee for the recital put in a rush order for reserved tickets Saturday and delivered them Monday to the several stores which are handling advance sales, and within a few hours hundreds had been purchased, along with general admission tickets. Advance sales are continuing briskly.

Provisions have also been made for handling mail orders. Such orders should be addressed to Dept D-M, Box 208, Norfolk, with money orders or checks made payable to the Maynor Recital Committee.

Tickets are also available at the Levy-Page Music Company, Hall Optical Company, Northrop Sports Shop and the Journal and Guide.

Ever since Dorothy Maynor's rich and lovely voice delighted an audience including Serge Koussevitsky, famous Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, at a surprise audition last summer, it has been realized that this is a singer who follows the tradition of some of the famous singers of the past.

And Dorothy Maynor, a native of Norfolk and daughter of a well-known Methodist misister now deceased, also modestly feels that there is nothing unusual in a voice like hers, which ranges from top tones of true soprano brilliance to a deep vocal stream characteristic of her race.

As with all reverent and serious musicians, it is the music which counts with Dorothy Maynor, not the performer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM XENIA, O.
GAZETTE

JAN 16 1940

ABRAM CHASINS ON ANTIOCH SERIES OF CONCERTS JAN. 22

Pianist And Composer Will Be Presented At Opera House

Abram Chasins, internationally known young American pianist and composer, will give the third concert in the Antioch College Concert Series January 22 at 8:30, in the Yellow Springs Opera House.

Popularly known for his weekly lecture-recitals over the radio in past years, Chasins was also for a time the youngest member of the faculty at the Curtis Institute of Music, and has been piano soloist with such organizations as the Philadelphia, New York Philharmonic, and Boston Symphony Orchestras.

The program for the Antioch College concert ranges from Bach's "Fantasy and Fugue in G Minor" to "The Swan" of Saint-Saens. Three Brahms rhapsodies, a Chopin group, and compositions by Rachmaninoff and Stravinsky are also included in the program.

Chasins will also play his own "Fantasy on Two Themes from 'Schwanda'," and his arrangement of a Gluck melody. His compositions have been performed by such eminent conductors as Toscanini, Stokowski, and Barbirolli.

Admission to the concert is $1.00 or by season ticket.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JAN 17 1940

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Josef Hofmann will play the Schumann piano concerto in A minor, Op. 54, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Metropolitan Theatre on Tuesday night. Richard Burgin will conduct.

The program:

Moussorgsky ....
"Une Nuit sur le Mont Chauve" ("A Night on Bald Mountain"), Orchestral Fantasy

Schumann ....
Concerto for Pianoforte in A minor, Op. 54

Prokofieff ....
.."Classical" Symphony, Op. 10
I. Allegro
II. Larghetto
III. Gavotte
IV. Finale.

Strauss ....
"Don Juan," Symphonic Poem (after Lenau)

Poot .... Ouverture Joyeuse

165

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
JOURNAL

JAN 17 1940

Chamber Music Concerts Bowdoin; Other Music News

Changes in Bowdoin Concert Dates

Two changes have been made in dates in the Bowdoin College concert course, Brunswick. The Curtis String Quartet, with Prof. Frederic Tillotson of the Bowdoin College Music Department, will give their concert in Memorial Hall, Jan. 18, 8.15 p.m. instead of Jan. 19, as previously announced. The concert by Norbert Lauga, violinist, and Prof Frederic Tillotson, will be Feb. 6, also in Memorial hall. Both will be programs of chamber music, and both will be open to the public with no admission charge.

Curtis String Quartet

Those who listened to the inspiring concert given by the Curtis String Quartet of Philadelphia, at Bowdoin College last spring, will rejoice at the opportunity to hear them again. Their programs are the best in chamber music. The program for the Bowdoin concert will consist of the following numbers:

Quartet in E minor (From my Life) by Smetana, movements Allegro vivo appasionata, Allegro moderato a la Polka, Largo sostenuto and Vivace; Concert Etude by Sinigaglia; Quintet for Pianoforte and Strings by Schumann, Allegro Brillante, In modo d'una Marcia un poco largamente, Scherzo: Molto vivace and Allegro ma non troppo movements.

The personnel of the quartet is: Jascha Brodsky, violin; Max Aronoff, Viola; Charles Jaffe, violin; Orlando Cole, cello.

Frederic Tillotson, pianist, will be the assisting artist.

All concert-goers know the nature of chamber music, but not so many know where it got its name.

In the era which originated chamber music, the days of the Frankish kings, the word "chamber" was used to designate the room in the royal palace where the monarch kept his private possessions. Only members of the royal family were permitted to foregather in this room, and here occurred the musical entertainment of the king and his family. At first, only noblemen were allowed the privilege of playing at these concerts, but even after the prerogative of performance was given to those of lesser rank, the recitals could take place nowhere but in the innermost apartments of the palace.

The musicians were regarded as servants in the royal household, occupying a position similar to court officer or chapelmaster. Even Papa Haydn, who in the service of Prince Esterhazy of Hungary, developed the string quartet to its modern perfection, was required to appear every morning in the Prince's ante-rooms to receive his instructions and explain his plans for the evening's concert.

Mrs. Bok, Patroness

The generosity of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, who has established the Temple of Chamber Music at Pittsfield, Mass., has benefited such noted ensembles as the Kolisch and Kneisel Quartets while Mrs. Edward Bok, daughter of the late publisher of the Saturday Evening Post and Ladies Home Journal who has her summer home in Camden is the patroness of the Curtis Ensemble, named for the Curtis Institute, of which she is founder and president and where the four virtuosi were first organized as a Quartet eleven years ago. In addition to providing the Quartet with a set of priceless instruments (including two Stradivarius violins, a rare Amati viola that is one of only two of its kind in existence, and a Domenico Montagnana cello) Mrs. Bok has placed at the artists' disposal a beautiful colonial mansion at Rockport, where they summer with their families and have their own Curtis String Quartet hall, a transformed boat barn in which they give an annual summer chamber music festivl attracting visitors from 48 States.

* * *

Lauga-Tillotson Concert

Norbert Lauga, who is giving the joint chamber music program with Prof. Tillotson, was a prize member of the Music Conservatory in Paris, one of the first violinists of the ~~Boston Symphony~~ orchestra, and a first violinist with the Chardon String Quintet. This will be his first appearance in Brunswick. They will play, at this concert, three sonatas for piano and violin. The rarely-played E flat major sonata of Bach which contains the interesting cembalo solo as a third movement, will be the first. The second will be by Emesco and the third a sonata by Cesar Franck.

* * *

Maine Trustees of N. E. Conservatory

Maine has two members on the board of trustees of the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston. They are Charles T. Burnett of Brunswick, elected at the last annual meeting, and Mrs. Guy P. Gannett of Portland.

* * *

First Concert of Women's Symphony Concert of Boston

The Women's Symphony orchestra of Boston, which constitutes the active membership of the Women's Symphony Society of Boston and includes six Maine women in its personnel, gave its first concert Jan. 16.

* * *

The orchestra proposes to present symphony numbers not often heard in Boston and to give especial attention to the compositions of American women. At this first concert, Miss Mabel Daniels, well-known Boston composer, was honored by the playing of her "Deep Forest." Other compositions were "The Ocean" Symphony No. 1 in C Major, by Rubenstein, and Haydn's "Concerto in D Major for Violoncello and Orchestra." Karl Zeise of the Boston Symphony, whose wife, Marybelle Fulton Zeise plays bass in the Women's Symphony, was the featured soloist.

Scloists to be presented at the next concert are Margaret Starr McLain, member of the faculty of Boston University; Mariam Burroughs, three times winner of the State Federation of Music Clubs prize; and Howard Coding, head of the piano department at the New England Conservatory of Music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

JAN 17 1940

Drops Incognito

IGOR STRAVINSKY

Arriving here two weeks before his scheduled guest appearances as conductor with the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Stravinsky originally meant to remain incognito, found he couldn't—and finally held a press conference.

Cadman, Stravinsky Added To Composers Here Recently

Russian Says He Is Here for Rest and Work While Former Pittsburgher Tells of New Symphony

Pittsburgh had two composers as guests yesterday—and each reciprocated for the hospitality by holding a press conference.

They were Dr. Charles Wakefield Cadman, who has written a realistic symphony about Pittsburgh steel mills that has everything but the smoke, and Igor Fedorovitch Stravinsky, who had meant to come incognito but couldn't. Born in Johnstown, Pa., Dr. Cadman was long a resident of Pittsburgh and composed much of his early work here.

Dr. Cadman and Mr. Stravinsky are the latest of a long list of composers who have made Pittsburgh a musical mecca this season. The others were Roy Harris, Rachmaninoff, Oscar Levant, Howard Hanson, Randall Thompson and Morton Gould.

Mr. Stravinsky grudgingly held his soiree for newsmen after protesting he had come here to rest and work on his latest symphony.

He will remain here until he has finished conducting the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra in two all-Stravinsky programs January 26 and 28.

Mr. Stravinsky, a native Russian, tries to speak English, prefers French and seldom uses his own language except when conversing with Serge ~~Koussevitzky~~. He even swears in French.

"It's politer," explained Mr. Stravinsky's interpreter.

The composer was asked the usual question about what he thought of jazz. That is tantamount to asking a politician his opinion of the state of the nation or a movie star her opinion of Hollywood.

Mr. Stravinsky acted as if he had heard that one before and had the answer all ready.

"I, too, have been a jazz composer," he expounded. "When I was in Switzerland, I wrote a piece called 'Ragtime'—mainly because I liked that type of American jazz."

He had opinions on such divergent subjects as Nijinsky's madness (Mr. Stravinsky wrote his "Firebird" for Diaghileff's Russian ballet), Hollywood's skies, American drug stores and Zorina.

Mr. Cadman, who held a press conference earlier in the day at Mayor Scully's office, told reporters his three-movement symphony, "Pennsylvania," will have its premiere in Hollywood March 6.

To get the sound of Pittsburgh's mills into the music, he revealed, he has added a new instrument to the percussion section. It is a large steel plate.

"It's needed because the sound of steel can't be imitated," he said.

He didn't say whether he'd get a mill hand to play it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM GLOVERSVILLE, N. Y.
HERALD

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, OHIO
POST

JAN 18 1940

QUESTION BOX

You can get an answer to any answerable question of fact or information by writing to The Cincinnati Post's Washington Bureau, 1013 Thirteenth street, Washington, D. C., inclosing 3 cents in stamps or coins. Please do not use postal cards.

Q: Which is the oldest, the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra or the New York Philharmonic? A: New York Philharmonic, 1842; Boston Symphony second, 1881, and Philadelphia Orchestra third, 1900.

NEWS OF MUSIC

Transcript Jan 17

Applications for admission to the Berkshire Music Center, the summer music school at "Tanglewood," directed by Serge Koussevitzky and sponsored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are already coming in at such a rate that the quota of students the Music Center can accommodate may be filled before May. May and June are usually the principal months for registering in summer schools.

Though the exact figure has not yet been determined, Symphony Hall officials estimate that the Academy (the division for less-advanced students) cannot accommodate more than 250 and the Institute for Advanced Study will be restricted to approximately 60.

Two weeks ago there were 61 applications. Today there are 111, and the detailed application blanks indicate that students of the highest class and finest preliminary training have been attracted.

Trout in Song and Quintet

The complete program for the second concert of the Youth Chamber Music Series which takes place on Wednesday afternoon, Feb. 14, at 4, includes Schubert's "Trout" Quintet, in which Frank Glazer will take the piano part. Before the performance of the Quintet, Cleora Wold, soprano, will sing Schubert's song, "The Trout," from which the Quintet has its name and several of its themes. Bach's Fifth Brandenburg Concerto will be played by a selected group from the New England Intercollegiate Orchestra and Frank Glazer, under the direction of Wheeler Beckett. A Bouree and Minuet by Johann Adolph Hasse and a Mozart Divertimento, played by a wind quartet from the same orchestra, complete the list.

Symphony Programs

For the first time in a number of years, Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will appear Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 26 and 27, in Symphony Hall, when Richard Burgin will conduct. The program will open with the Ouverture Joyeuse by Marcel Poot, the Belgian composer. Mr Hofmann will be heard in the Piano Concerto of Schumann, in A minor. The second part of the program will consist of the first performance here of the orchestration which Arnold Schoenberg has made of the Quartet by Brahms, in G minor, Op. 25. The Quartet, written for piano and strings, has been arranged by Schoenberg for full orchestra.

At the third pair of concerts of the Monday-Tuesday series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Symphony Hall on Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 29 and 30, Albert Spalding will appear as soloist in the Violin Concerto of Brahms in D major. Richard Burgin, who will conduct the concert, will present Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"; Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony; Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan"; and "Batuque" by Fernandez, the South American composer.

The Boston Civic Symphony Orchestra, Joseph Wagner, conductor, will give a concert in Jordan Hall Thursday evening, Jan. 25, presenting Harold Morris in Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto, works of Weber, Paul Allen, Bainbridge Crist, Rubinstein, Borodin and Tchaikovsky.

Deems Taylor's new book, "The Well-Tempered Listener" will be published on Jan. 25 by Simon and Schuster. . . . Amateur playing of the recorder has become so popular that Schirmer has just issued a nine-page catalogue of "New Music for Recorders" for solo and all imaginable combinations of the instrument. . . . Mobley Lushanya, American Indian soprano who has sung extensively in opera and concert in Europe, will give her first New York recital at Town Hall next Sunday. . . . Box-office sales for Percy Grainger's Jordan Hall recital this Saturday are the largest for a single recital in that hall so far this season, but there are still one or two seats left.

Tonight: Adolf Busch, violinist; Rudolf Serkin, pianist; Jordan Hall, 8.30.

Tomorrow: Boston Symphony Orchestra, Nicolai Malko conducting, Sanders Theater, Cambridge, 8.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
STAR-ENTERPRISE

JAN 17 1940

EXPANSION OF AN IDEA

Doubtless in the hope of winning that mythical title of the American Salzburg, the Berkshire Music center at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is amplifying its program ~~to include~~ a summer school of music. For several years since the estate Tanglewood was presented to the symphony, Tanglewood has been famous as the home of the Berkshire Symphonic festival. Now the program is being extended to provide a full summer school of music under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

The growth and development of Tanglewood is a living illustration of what can be done with an unusual idea. It might form a pattern for the development of other musical centers in America, perhaps not as ambitious as Tanglewood, but still possessed of infinite possibilities of bringing more and better music to the people, and of expanding the musical life of communities and providing more facilities for study and performance.

What has been done at Tanglewood probably could be done to some extent at least in Dutchess county. State officials who have the keeping of the Mills Memorial park at Staatsburg in their care, have the germ of an idea for the creation of a musical center for Dutchess county at Staatsburg. Probably with the passage of time, proper sponsorship, and intelligent development, a musical center could be created at Staatsburg patterned after the Tanglewood ideal. Dutchess county is rich in vast estates which would lend themselves to similar development.

Creation of a summer musical center for Dutchess county well might be the focal point for a union of the efforts of such bodies as the Dutchess County Musical association, the Dutchess County Philharmonic society, Vassar college and the public schools, together with such patrons as music usually attracts in this area.

Since it has been done with such conspicuous success at Tanglewood, why wouldn't a similar venture succeed in Dutchess?

165

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
JOURNAL

JAN 17 1940

Chamber Music Concerts Bowdoin; Other Music News

Changes in Bowdoin Concert Dates

Two changes have been made in dates in the Bowdoin College concert course, Brunswick. The Curtis String Quartet, with Prof. Frederic Tillotson of the Bowdoin College Music Department, will give their concert in Memorial Hall, Jan. 18, 8.15 p.m. instead of Jan. 19, as previously announced. The concert by Norbert Lauga, violinist, and Prof Frederic Tillotson, will be Feb. 6, also in Memorial hall. Both will be programs of chamber music, and both will be open to the public with no admission charge.

Curtis String Quartet

Those who listened to the inspiring concert given by the Curtis String Quartet of Philadelphia, at Bowdoin College last spring, will rejoice at the opportunity to hear them again. Their programs are the best in chamber music. The program for the Bowdoin concert will consist of the following numbers:

Quartet in E minor (From my Life) by Smetana, movements Allegro vivo appasionata, Allegro moderato a la Polka, Largo sostenuto and Vivace; Concert Etude by Sinigaglia; Quintet for Pianoforte and Strings by Schumann, Allegro Brillante, In modo d'una Marcia un poco largamente, Scherzo; Molto vivace and Allegro ma non troppo movements.

The personnel of the quartet is: Jascha Brodsky, violin; Max Aronoff, Viola; Charles Jaffe, violin; Orlando Cole, cello.

Frederic Tillotson, pianist, will be the assisting artist.

All concert-goers know the nature of chamber music, but not so many know where it got its name.

In the era which originated chamber music, the days of the Frankish kings, the word "chamber" was used to designate the room in the royal palace where the monarch kept his private possessions. Only members of the royal family were permitted to foregather in this room, and here occurred the musical entertainment of the king and his family. At first, only noblemen were allowed the privilege of playing at these concerts, but even after the prerogative of performance was given to those of lesser rank, the recitals could take place nowhere but in the innermost apartments of the palace.

The musicians were regarded as servants in the royal household, occupying a position similar to court officer or chapelmaster. Even Papa Haydn, who in the service of Prince Esterhazy of Hungary, developed the string quartet to its modern perfection, was required to appear every morning in the Prince's ante-rooms to receive his instructions and explain his plans for the evening's concert.

Mrs. Bok, Patroness

The generosity of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, who has established the Temple of Chamber Music at Pittsfield, Mass., has benefited such noted ensembles as the Kolisch and Kneisel Quartets while Mrs. Edward Bok, daughter of the late publisher of the Saturday Evening Post and Ladies Home Journal who has her summer home in Camden is the patroness of the Curtis Ensemble, named for the Curtis Institute, of which she is founder and president and where the four virtuosi were first organized as a Quartet eleven years ago. In addition to providing the Quartet with a set of priceless instruments (including two Stradivarius violins, a rare Amati viola that is one of only two of its kind in existence, and a Domenico Montagnana cello) Mrs. Bok has placed at the artists' disposal a beautiful colonial mansion at Rockport, where they summer with their families and have their own Curtis String Quartet hall, a transformed boat barn in which they give an annual summer chamber music festivl attracting visitors from 48 States.

* * *

Lauga-Tillotson Concert

Norbert Lauga, who is giving the joint chamber music program with Prof. Tillotson, was a prize member of the Music Conservatory in Paris, one of the first violinists of the ~~Boston Symphony~~ orchestra, and a first violinist with the Chardon String Quintet. This will be his first appearance in Brunswick. They will play, at this concert, three sonatas for piano and violin. The rarely-played E flat major sonata of Bach which contains the interesting cembalo solo as a third movement, will be the first. The second will be by Emesco and the third a sonata by Cesar Franck.

* * *

Maine Trustees of N. E. Conservatory

Maine has two members on the board of trustees of the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston. They are Charles T. Burnett of Brunswick, elected at the last annual meeting, and Mrs. Guy P. Gannett of Portland.

* * *

First Concert of Women's Symphony Concert of Boston

The Women's Symphony orchestra of Boston, which constitutes the active membership of the Women's Symphony Society of Boston and includes six Maine women in its personnel, gave its first concert Jan. 16.

* * *

The orchestra proposes to present symphony numbers not often heard in Boston and to give especial attention to the compositions of American women. At this first concert, Miss Mabel Daniels, well-known Boston composer, was honored by the playing of her "Deep Forest." Other compositions were "The Ocean" Symphony No. 1 in C Major, by Rubenstein, and Haydn's "Concerto in D Major for Violoncello and Orchestra." Karl Zeise of the Boston Symphony, whose wife, Marybelle Fulton Zeise plays bass in the Women's Symphony, was the featured soloist.

Scloists to be presented at the next concert are Margaret Starr McLain, member of the faculty of Boston University; Mariam Burroughs, three times winner of the State Federation of Music Clubs prize; and Howard Coding, head of the piano department at the New England Conservatory of Music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

JAN 17 1940

Drops Incognito

IGOR STRAVINSKY

Arriving here two weeks before his scheduled guest appearances as conductor with the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Stravinsky originally meant to remain incognito, found he couldn't—and finally held a press conference.

Cadman, Stravinsky Added To Composers Here Recently

Russian Says He Is Here for Rest and Work While Former Pittsburgher Tells of New Symphony

Pittsburgh had two composers as guests yesterday—and each reciprocated for the hospitality by holding a press conference.

They were Dr. Charles Wakefield Cadman, who has written a realistic symphony about Pittsburgh steel mills that has everything but the smoke, and Igor Fedorovitch Stravinsky, who had meant to come incognito but couldn't. Born in Johnstown, Pa., Dr. Cadman was long a resident of Pittsburgh and composed much of his early work here.

Dr. Cadman and Mr. Stravinsky are the latest of a long list of composers who have made Pittsburgh a musical mecca this season. The others were Roy Harris, Rachmaninoff, Oscar Levant, Howard Hanson, Randall Thompson and Morton Gould.

Mr. Stravinsky grudgingly held his soiree for newsmen after protesting he had come here to rest and work on his latest symphony.

He will remain here until he has finished conducting the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra in two all-Stravinsky programs January 26 and 28.

Mr. Stravinsky, a native Russian, tries to speak English, prefers French and seldom uses his own language except when conversing with Serge ~~Koussevitzky~~. He even swears in French.

"It's politer," explained Mr. Stravinsky's interpreter.

The composer was asked the usual question about what he thought of jazz. That is tantamount to asking a politician his opinion of the state of the nation or a movie star her opinion of Hollywood.

Mr. Stravinsky acted as if he had heard that one before and had the answer all ready.

"I, too, have been a jazz composer," he expounded. "When I was in Switzerland, I wrote a piece called 'Ragtime'—mainly because I liked that type of American jazz."

He had opinions on such divergent subjects as Nijinsky's madness (Mr. Stravinsky wrote his "Firebird" for Diaghileff's Russian ballet), Hollywood's skies, American drug stores and Zorina.

Mr. Cadman, who held a press conference earlier in the day at Mayor Scully's office, told reporters his three-movement symphony, "Pennsylvania," will have its premiere in Hollywood March 6.

To get the sound of Pittsburgh's mills into the music, he revealed, he has added a new instrument to the percussion section. It is a large steel plate.

"It's needed because the sound of steel can't be imitated," he said.

He didn't say whether he'd get a mill hand to play it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM GLOVERSVILLE, N. Y.
HERALD

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, OHIO
POST

JAN 18 1940

QUESTION BOX

You can get an answer to any answerable question of fact or information by writing to The Cincinnati Post's Washington Bureau, 1013 Thirteenth street, Washington, D. C., inclosing 3 cents in stamps or coins. Please do not use postal cards.

Q: Which is the oldest, the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra or the New York Philharmonic? A: New York Philharmonic, 1842; Boston Symphony second, 1881, and Philadelphia Orchestra third, 1900.

NEWS OF MUSIC

Transcript Jan 17

Applications for admission to the Berkshire Music Center, the summer music school at "Tanglewood," directed by Serge Koussevitzky and sponsored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are already coming in at such a rate that the quota of students the Music Center can accommodate may be filled before May. May and June are usually the principal months for registering in summer schools.

Though the exact figure has not yet been determined, Symphony Hall officials estimate that the Academy (the division for less-advanced students) cannot accommodate more than 250 and the Institute for Advanced Study will be restricted to approximately 60.

Two weeks ago there were 61 applications. Today there are 111, and the detailed application blanks indicate that students of the highest class and finest preliminary training have been attracted.

Trout in Song and Quintet

The complete program for the second concert of the Youth Chamber Music Series which takes place on Wednesday afternoon, Feb. 14, at 4, includes Schubert's "Trout" Quintet, in which Frank Glazer will take the piano part. Before the performance of the Quintet, Cleora Wold, soprano, will sing Schubert's song, "The Trout," from which the Quintet has its name and several of its themes. Bach's Fifth Brandenburg Concerto will be played by a selected group from the New England Intercollegiate Orchestra and Frank Glazer, under the direction of Wheeler Beckett. A Bouree and Minuet by Johann Adolph Hasse and a Mozart Divertimento, played by a wind quartet from the same orchestra, complete the list.

Symphony Programs

For the first time in a number of years, Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will appear Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 26 and 27, in Symphony Hall, when Richard Burgin will conduct. The program will open with the Ouverture Joyeuse by Marcel Poot, the Belgian composer. Mr Hofmann will be heard in the Piano Concerto of Schumann, in A minor. The second part of the program will consist of the first performance here of the orchestration which Arnold Schoenberg has made of the Quartet by Brahms, in G minor, Op. 25. The Quartet, written for piano and strings, has been arranged by Schoenberg for full orchestra.

At the third pair of concerts of the Monday-Tuesday series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Symphony Hall on Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 29 and 30, Albert Spalding will appear as soloist in the Violin Concerto of Brahms in D major. Richard Burgin, who will conduct the concert, will present Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"; Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony; Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan"; and "Batuque" by Fernandez, the South American composer.

The Boston Civic Symphony Orchestra, Joseph Wagner, conductor, will give a concert in Jordan Hall Thursday evening, Jan. 25, presenting Harold Morris in Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto, works of Weber, Paul Allen, Bainbridge Crist, Rubinstein, Borodin and Tchaikovsky.

Deems Taylor's new book, "The Well-Tempered Listener" will be published on Jan. 25 by Simon and Schuster. . . . Amateur playing of the recorder has become so popular that Schirmer has just issued a nine-page catalogue of "New Music for Recorders" for solo and all imaginable combinations of the instrument. . . . Mobley Lushanya, American Indian soprano who has sung extensively in opera and concert in Europe, will give her first New York recital at Town Hall next Sunday. . . . Box-office sales for Percy Grainger's Jordan Hall recital this Saturday are the largest for a single recital in that hall so far this season, but there are still one or two seats left.

Tonight: Adolf Busch, violinist; Rudolf Serkin, pianist; Jordan Hall, 8.30.

Tomorrow: Boston Symphony Orchestra, Nicolai Malko conducting, Sanders Theater, Cambridge, 8.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
STAR-ENTERPRISE

JAN 17 1940

EXPANSION OF AN IDEA

Doubtless in the hope of winning that mythical title of the American Salzburg, the Berkshire Music center at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is amplifying its program ~~to in~~clude a summer school of music. For several years since the estate Tanglewood was presented to the symphony, Tanglewood has been famous as the home of the Berkshire Symphonic festival. Now the program is being extended to provide a full summer school of music under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

The growth and development of Tanglewood is a living illustration of what can be done with an unusual idea. It might form a pattern for the development of other musical centers in America, perhaps not as ambitious as Tanglewood, but still possessed of infinite possibilities of bringing more and better music to the people, and of expanding the musical life of communities and providing more facilities for study and performance.

What has been done at Tanglewood probably could be done to some extent at least in Dutchess county. State officials who have the keeping of the Mills Memorial park at Staatsburg in their care, have the germ of an idea for the creation of a musical center for Dutchess county at Staatsburg. Probably with the passage of time, proper sponsorship, and intelligent development, a musical center could be created at Staatsburg patterned after the Tanglewood ideal. Dutchess county is rich in vast estates which would lend themselves to similar development.

Creation of a summer musical center for Dutchess county well might be the focal point for a union of the efforts of such bodies as the Dutchess County Musical association, the Dutchess County Philharmonic society, Vassar college and the public schools, together with such patrons as music usually attracts in this area.

Since it has been done with such conspicuous success at Tanglewood, why wouldn't a similar venture succeed in Dutchess?

FILMED AS BOUND

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, THURSDAY, JANUARY 18, 1940

Malko Guest Conductor for Symphony—A Play About Wilkes Booth

Novelties New and Old For Program

By Alfred H. Meyer

In all probability no crime of violence will be committed or projected at the Symphony concerts of Friday or Saturday. Yet the opening number on the program for these concerts, Rossini's overture to his opera, "La Gazza Ladra," by the unconventional device with which it begins once caused a young man with a stiletto to seek out the composer with fixed purpose. That device was nothing more nor less than antiphonal snare drum rolls. From one side of the orchestra a drum had a measure's roll, fortissimo; from the other side of the orchestra another drum answered, pianissimo; then both joined together for a third measure. And if there is any moral to all this, it is that a century and a quarter ago the now harmless Rossini was in some quarters held to be a dangerous radical!

For these concerts the guest conductor, Nikolai Malko, has arranged a program of new and old novelties. The above-named overture has not been heard at these concerts. Reger's Variations on a Theme by Mozart are also new to Boston. Tchaikovsky's "Italian Capriccio" has not been programmed for a generation. And Shostakovitch's First Symphony has not appeared often enough to be familiar.

Nikolai Malko, Russian conductor, for the last 10 years resident at Copenhagen, Denmark, is one of the conductors of the Danish State Radio Orchestra. He was a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakoff, Glazounoff, Liadoff, and Felix Mottl. Before the Revolution he was conductor of the State Opera at St. Petersburg. From the time of the Revolution until his appointment at Copenhagen, he served variously at teaching and conducting in Leningrad and Moscow. He has toured extensively in Europe and South America. He will conduct this week's concerts in Boston and Cambridge.

* * *

But to return to Rossini's "La Gazza Ladra." The opera appears to have been a great favorite for at least a half century after its premiere at La Scala in 1817. It was performed in both the composer's Italian form and in French as "La Pie Voleuse"—which was also the play on which its plot was founded.

"La Gazza Ladra" or "La Pie Voleuse" or "The Thieving Magpie" is the story of a servant girl who, by circumstantial evidence, has been convicted of stealing a silver spoon. She is sentenced to the scaffold. But, plausibly or not, as she is being led to the execution—someone observes a magpie on its nest—with the silver spoon protruding from the nest. And, of course, all ends happily.

Rossini liked the plot and took great pains with his score. Francis Toye, his biographer, considers the overture his best, except only the overture to "William Tell." The innovation of the drum rolls, which brought thoughts of violence to the mind of one young purist, was probably one cause of the overture's great success with a novelty-loving public.

The drum rolls lead at once into a broad, march-like introduction. More drum rolls usher in the transitional chords which lead to the main body of the overture. The principal theme is taken from a duet in the third act. It is marked by triplet figures in lilting rhythm. This duet must have enjoyed great popularity in its day, for lexicons and catalogues show not only that it was much sung but that it was also much transcribed.

After the appearance of this theme, a Rossinian crescendo leads to a more lyric, waltz-like second theme. Another crescendo brings recapitulation—and at least the externals of a sonata-allegro have been brought forth.

* * *

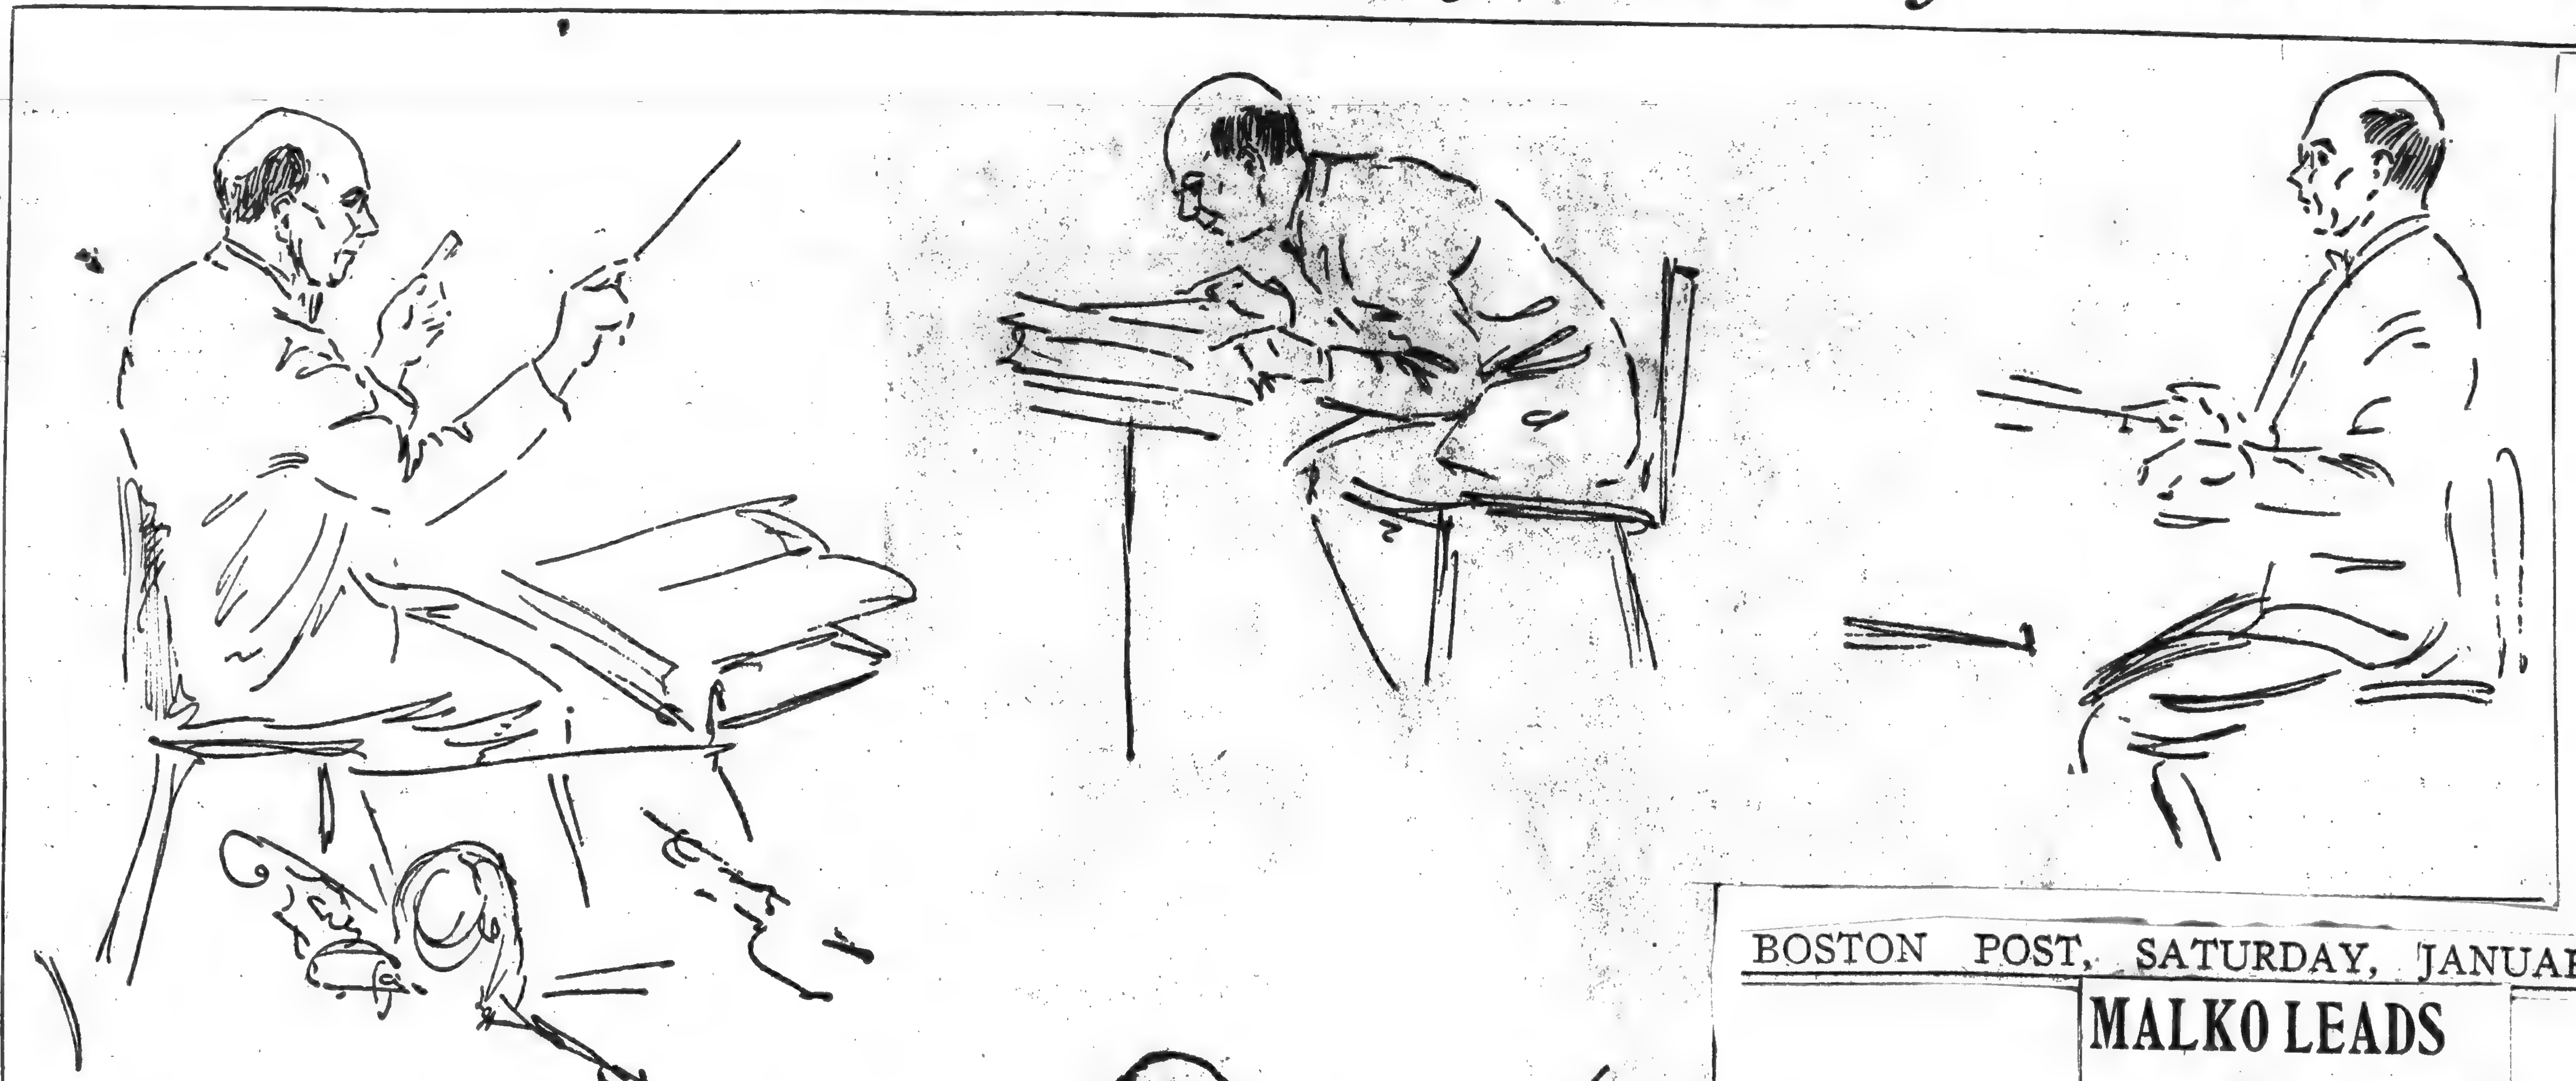
It is a far cry from Rossini's gay little overture to Max Reger's complex, monumental Variations, Opus 132, of 1914. The theme is from Mozart's Sonata in A major, of 1779, the theme on which Mozart himself wrote a set of six pleasant variations as first movement of his sonata. Reger states the theme, with varying orchestration, in its original form. He restates it in his first variation in woodwinds, with arpeggio embroideries in strings and trill figures in flutes.

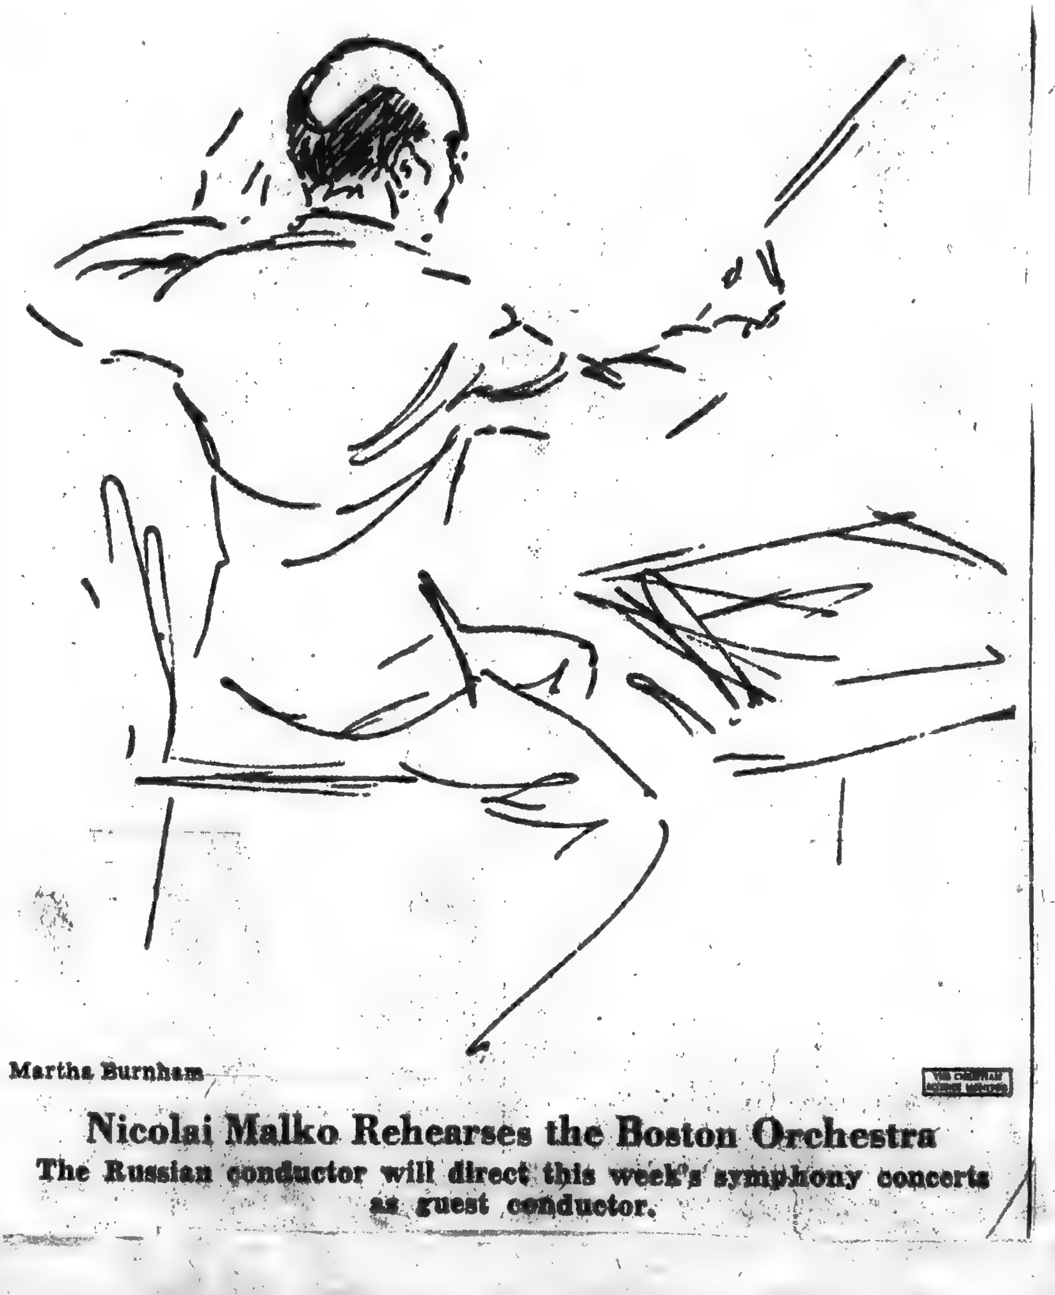
The second variation brings an inversion of the theme, in oboe and strings, in an agitated rhythm and with somewhat similar ornamentation. The third variation, pianissimo, introduces a much plainer rhythm (two-four, A minor) with the theme, in even notes, in strings. Reger here uses a favorite device in contrasting muted strings with unmuted strings.

The fourth variation is in sharp contrast to the third. It is highly vivacious, and appears to be primarily a harmonic variation in a rapid, galloping rhythm. The fifth variation, still in minor, sped up to Presto, is a scherzo-like development of the three-note motive with which the theme begins.

The sixth variation is similar to the third in its melodic line, being a contemplative Sostenuto or Adagietto. In the seventh variation, Andante grazioso, horns against strings treat the original theme in canonic form and with new, rich harmonies. The eighth variation, Molto sostenuto, continues the increase in expressiveness, by broadening the theme to expansive melodic lines.

A fugue serves as finale. The close relationship of its theme to that of the variations is readily discernible. Reger begins with rather plain treatment of his subject. Slowly he causes it to mount to a high climax with complex polyphony, but also complex Regerian harmony. Quiet simplicity follows, only to mount to a still greater climax at the peak of which the fugue theme is superimposed upon the variation theme, revealing the former as a counterpoint to the latter.





Martha Burnham

Nicolai Malko Rehearses the Boston Orchestra

The Russian conductor will direct this week's symphony concerts as guest conductor.

BOSTON POST, SATURDAY, JANUARY 20, 1940

MALKO LEADS SYMPHONY

Russian Gives Outstanding Readings of Scores

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A symphony concert—as Rhett Butler said of marriage—can be fun. This revolutionary disclosure was made at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon when the Russian conductor, Nicolai Malko, led the Symphony Orchestra, as guest, in a programme of compositions by Rossini, Shostakovitch, Reger and Tchaikovsky.

To be sure, not all of Shostakovitch's First Symphony comes under the head of amusement or even entertainment, but not a little of it does (it is primarily a symphony of "effect"); and Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Theme of Mozart, which for some unaccountable reason have never been played here before, have their serious, their emotional side. As for Rossini's Overture to "La Gazza Ladra" (played for the first time at these concerts) and Tchaikovsky's Italian Capriccio (unheard under these particular auspices since 1904) both come frankly under the head of musical diversion.

The most stimulating guest-conductor we have heard here since Dimitri Mitropoulos, Mr. Malko has much in common with his Greek colleagues. For one thing, he is bald. For another, he conducts without a score. For yet another, he knows exactly what he wants from an orchestra and has no difficulty in getting it.

Tonally, the orchestra, particularly the woodwind and brass, was at its best yesterday. Mr. Malko has a sensitive ear, alike for the sound of the individual instruments and for their proper blending. Moreover, the clarity of his readings was extraordinary, even in the mazes of Reger's polyphony; while euphony could scarcely go farther. And what a joy to hear brass that was satisfyingly full and sonorous, yet never blatant!

165

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
JOURNAL

JAN 17 1940

Chamber Music Concerts Bowdoin; Other Music News

Changes in Bowdoin Concert Dates

Two changes have been made in dates in the Bowdoin College concert course, Brunswick. The Curtis String Quartet, with Prof. Frederic Tillotson of the Bowdoin College Music Department, will give their concert in Memorial Hall, Jan. 18, 8.15 p.m. instead of Jan. 19, as previously announced. The concert by Norbert Lauga, violinist, and Prof Frederic Tillotson, will be Feb. 6, also in Memorial hall. Both will be programs of chamber music, and both will be open to the public with no admission charge.

Curtis String Quartet

Those who listened to the inspiring concert given by the Curtis String Quartet of Philadelphia, at Bowdoin College last spring, will rejoice at the opportunity to hear them again. Their programs are the best in chamber music. The program for the Bowdoin concert will consist of the following numbers:

Quartet in E minor (From my Life) by Smetana, movements Allegro vivo appasionata, Allegro moderato a la Polka, Largo sostenuto and Vivace; Concert Etude by Sinigaglia; Quintet for Pianoforte and Strings by Schumann, Allegro Brillante, In modo d'una Marcia un poco largamente, Scherzo: Molto vivace and Allegro ma non troppo movements.

The personnel of the quartet is: Jascha Brodsky, violin; Max Aronoff, Viola; Charles Jaffe, violin; Orlando Cole, cello.

Frederic Tillotson, pianist, will be the assisting artist.

All concert-goers know the nature of chamber music, but not so many know where it got its name.

In the era which originated chamber music, the days of the Frankish kings, the word "chamber" was used to designate the room in the royal palace where the monarch kept his private possessions. Only members of the royal family were permitted to foregather in this room, and here occurred the musical entertainment of the king and his family. At first, only noblemen were allowed the privilege of playing at these concerts, but even after the prerogative of performance was given to those of lesser rank, the recitals could take place nowhere but in the innermost apartments of the palace.

The musicians were regarded as servants in the royal household, occupying a position similar to court officer or chapelmaster. Even Papa Haydn, who in the service of Prince Esterhazy of Hungary, developed the string quartet to its modern perfection, was required to appear every morning in the Prince's ante-rooms to receive his instructions and explain his plans for the evening's concert.

Mrs. Bok, Patroness

The generosity of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, who has established the Temple of Chamber Music at Pittsfield, Mass., has benefited such noted ensembles as the Kolisch and Kneisel Quartets while Mrs. Edward Bok, daughter of the late publisher of the Saturday Evening Post and Ladies Home Journal who has her summer home in Camden is the patroness of the Curtis Ensemble, named for the Curtis Institute, of which she is founder and president and where the four virtuosi were first organized as a Quartet eleven years ago. In addition to providing the Quartet with a set of priceless instruments (including two Stradivarius violins, a rare Amati viola that is one of only two of its kind in existence, and a Domenico Montagnana cello) Mrs. Bok has placed at the artists' disposal a beautiful colonial mansion at Rockport, where they summer with their families and have their own Curtis String Quartet hall, a transformed boat barn in which they give an annual summer chamber music festivl attracting visitors from 48 States.

* * *

Lauga-Tillotson Concert

Norbert Lauga, who is giving the joint chamber music program with Prof. Tillotson, was a prize member of the Music Conservatory in Paris, one of the first violinists of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and a first violinist with the Chardon String Quintet. This will be his first appearance in Brunswick. They will play, at this concert, three sonatas for piano and violin. The rarely-played E flat major sonata of Bach which contains the interesting cembalo solo as a third movement, will be the first. The second will be by Emesco and the third a sonata by Cesar Franck.

* * *

Maine Trustees of N. E. Conservatory

Maine has two members on the board of trustees of the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston. They are Charles T. Burnett of Brunswick, elected at the last annual meeting, and Mrs. Guy P. Gannett of Portland.

* * *

First Concert of Women's Symphony Concert of Boston

The Women's Symphony orchestra of Boston, which constitutes the active membership of the Women's Symphony Society of Boston and includes six Maine women in its personnel, gave its first concert Jan. 16.

* * *

The orchestra proposes to present symphony numbers not often heard in Boston and to give especial attention to the compositions of American women. At this first concert, Miss Mabel Daniels, well-known Boston composer, was honored by the playing of her "Deep Forest." Other compositions were "The Ocean" Symphony No. 1 in C Major, by Rubenstein, and Haydn's "Concerto in D Major for Violoncello and Orchestra." Karl Zeise of the Boston Symphony, whose wife, Marybelle Fulton Zeise plays bass in the Women's Symphony, was the featured soloist.

Soloists to be presented at the next concert are Margaret Starr McLain, member of the faculty of Boston University; Mariam Burroughs, three times winner of the State Federation of Music Clubs prize; and Howard Goding, head of the piano department at the New England Conservatory of Music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

JAN 17 1940

Drops Incognito

IGOR STRAVINSKY

Arriving here two weeks before his scheduled guest appearances as conductor with the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Stravinsky originally meant to remain incognito, found he couldn't—and finally held a press conference.

Cadman, Stravinsky Added To Composers Here Recently

Russian Says He Is Here for Rest and Work While Former Pittsburgher Tells of New Symphony

Pittsburgh had two composers as guests yesterday—and each reciprocated for the hospitality by holding a press conference.

They were Dr. Charles Wakefield Cadman, who has written a realistic symphony about Pittsburgh steel mills that has everything but the smoke, and Igor Fedorovitch Stravinsky, who had meant to come incognito but couldn't. Born in Johnstown, Pa., Dr. Cadman was long a resident of Pittsburgh and composed much of his early work here.

Dr. Cadman and Mr. Stravinsky are the latest of a long list of composers who have made Pittsburgh a musical mecca this season. The others were Roy Harris, Rachmaninoff, Oscar Levant, Howard Hanson, Randall Thompson and Morton Gould.

Mr. Stravinsky grudgingly held his soiree for newsmen after protesting he had come here to rest and work on his latest symphony.

He will remain here until he has finished conducting the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra in two all-Stravinsky programs January 26 and 28.

Mr. Stravinsky, a native Russian, tries to speak English, prefers French and seldom uses his own language except when conversing with Serge Koussevitzky. He even swears in French.

"It's politer," explained Mr. Stravinsky's interpreter.

The composer was asked the usual question about what he thought of jazz. That is tantamount to asking a politician his opinion of the state of the nation or a movie star her opinion of Hollywood.

Mr. Stravinsky acted as if he had heard that one before and had the answer all ready.

"I, too, have been a jazz composer," he expounded. "When I was in Switzerland, I wrote a piece called 'Ragtime'—mainly because I liked that type of American jazz."

He had opinions on such divergent subjects as Nijinsky's madness (Mr. Stravinsky wrote his "Firebird" for Diaghileff's Russian ballet), Hollywood's skies, American drug stores and Zorina.

Mr. Cadman, who held a press conference earlier in the day at Mayor Scully's office, told reporters his three-movement symphony, "Pennsylvania," will have its premiere in Hollywood March 6.

To get the sound of Pittsburgh's mills into the music, he revealed, he has added a new instrument to the percussion section. It is a large steel plate.

"It's needed because the sound of steel can't be imitated," he said.

He didn't say whether he'd get a mill hand to play it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM GLOVERSVILLE, N. Y.
HERALD
THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, OHIO
POST

JAN 18 1940

QUESTION BOX

You can get an answer to any answerable question of fact or information by writing to The Cincinnati Post's Washington Bureau, 1013 Thirteenth street, Washington, D. C., inclosing 3 cents in stamps or coins. Please do not use postal cards.

Q: Which is the oldest, the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra or the New York Philharmonic? A: New York Philharmonic, 1842; Boston Symphony second, 1881, and Philadelphia Orchestra third, 1900.

NEWS OF MUSIC

Transcript
Jan 17

Applications for admission to the Berkshire Music Center, the summer music school at "Tanglewood," directed by Serge Koussevitzky and sponsored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are already coming in at such a rate that the quota of students the Music Center can accommodate may be filled before May. May and June are usually the principal months for registering in summer schools.

Though the exact figure has not yet been determined, Symphony Hall officials estimate that the Academy (the division for less-advanced students) cannot accommodate more than 250 and the Institute for Advanced Study will be restricted to approximately 60.

Two weeks ago there were 61 applications. Today there are 111, and the detailed application blanks indicate that students of the highest class and finest preliminary training have been attracted.

Trout in Song and Quintet

The complete program for the second concert of the Youth Chamber Music Series which takes place on Wednesday afternoon, Feb. 14, at 4, includes Schubert's "Trout" Quintet, in which Frank Glazer will take the piano part. Before the performance of the Quintet, Cleora Wold, soprano, will sing Schubert's song, "The Trout," from which the Quintet has its name and several of its themes. Bach's Fifth Brandenburg Concerto will be played by a selected group from the New England Intercollegiate Orchestra and Frank Glazer, under the direction of Wheeler Beckett. A Bouree and Minuet by Johann Adolph Hasse and a Mozart Divertimento, played by a wind quartet from the same orchestra, complete the list.

Symphony Programs

For the first time in a number of years, Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will appear Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 26 and 27, in Symphony Hall, when Richard Burgin will conduct. The program will open with the Ouverture Joyeuse by Marcel Poot, the Belgian composer. Mr Hofmann will be heard in the Piano Concerto of Schumann, in A minor. The second part of the program will consist of the first performance here of the orchestration which Arnold Schoenberg has made of the Quartet by Brahms, in G minor, Op. 25. The Quartet, written for piano and strings, has been arranged by Schoenberg for full orchestra.

At the third pair of concerts of the Monday-Tuesday series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Symphony Hall on Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 29 and 30, Albert Spalding will appear as soloist in the Violin Concerto of Brahms in D major. Richard Burgin, who will conduct the concert, will present Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"; Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony; Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan"; and "Batuque" by Fernandez, the South American composer.

The Boston Civic Symphony Orchestra, Joseph Wagner, conductor, will give a concert in Jordan Hall Thursday evening, Jan. 25, presenting Harold Morris in Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto, works of Weber, Paul Allen, Bainbridge Crist, Rubinstein, Borodin and Tchaikovsky.

Deems Taylor's new book. "The Well-Tempered Listener" will be published on Jan. 25 by Simon and Schuster. . . . Amateur playing of the recorder has become so popular that Schirmer has just issued a nine-page catalogue of "New Music for Recorders" for solo and all imaginable combinations of the instrument. . . . Mobley Lushanya, American Indian soprano who has sung extensively in opera and concert in Europe, will give her first New York recital at Town Hall next Sunday. . . . Box-office sales for Percy Grainger's Jordan Hall recital this Saturday are the largest for a single recital in that hall so far this season, but there are still one or two seats left.

Tonight: Adolf Busch, violinist; Rudolf Serkin, pianist; Jordan Hall, 8.30.

Tomorrow: Boston Symphony Orchestra, Nicolai Malko conducting. Sanders Theater, Cambridge, 8.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
STAR-ENTERPRISE

JAN 17 1940

EXPANSION OF AN IDEA

Doubtless in the hope of winning that mythical title of the American Salzburg, the Berkshire Music center at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is amplifying its program to include a summer school of music. For several years since the estate Tanglewood was presented to the symphony, Tanglewood has been famous as the home of the Berkshire Symphonic festival. Now the program is being extended to provide a full summer school of music under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

The growth and development of Tanglewood is a living illustration of what can be done with an unusual idea. It might form a pattern for the development of other musical centers in America, perhaps not as ambitious as Tanglewood, but still possessed of infinite possibilities of bringing more and better music to the people, and of expanding the musical life of communities and providing more facilities for study and performance.

What has been done at Tanglewood probably could be done to some extent at least in Dutchess county. State officials who have the keeping of the Mills Memorial park at Staatsburg in their care, have the germ of an idea for the creation of a musical center for Dutchess county at Staatsburg. Probably with the passage of time, proper sponsorship, and intelligent development, a musical center could be created at Staatsburg patterned after the Tanglewood ideal. Dutchess county is rich in vast estates which would lend themselves to similar development.

Creation of a summer musical center for Dutchess county well might be the focal point for a union of the efforts of such bodies as the Dutchess County Musical association, the Dutchess County Philharmonic society, Vassar college and the public schools, together with such patrons as music usually attracts in this area.

Since it has been done with such conspicuous success at Tanglewood, why wouldn't a similar venture succeed in Dutchess?

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, THURSDAY, JANUARY 18, 1940

Malko Guest Conductor for Symphony—A Play About Wilkes Booth

Novelties New and Old For Program

By Alfred H. Meyer

In all probability no crime of violence will be committed or projected at the Symphony concerts of Friday or Saturday. Yet the opening number on the program for these concerts, Rossini's overture to his opera, "La Gazza Ladra," by the unconventional device with which it begins once caused a young man with a stiletto to seek out the composer with fixed purpose. That device was nothing more nor less than antiphonal snare drum rolls. From one side of the orchestra a drum had a measure's roll, fortissimo; from the other side of the orchestra another drum answered, pianissimo; then both joined together for a third measure. And if there is any moral to all this, it is that a century and a quarter ago the now harmless Rossini was in some quarters held to be a dangerous radical!

For these concerts the guest conductor, Nikolai Malko, has arranged a program of new and old novelties. The above-named overture has not been heard at these concerts. Reger's Variations on a Theme by Mozart are also new to Boston; Tchaikovsky's "Italian Capriccio" has not been programmed for a generation. And Shostakovitch's First Symphony has not appeared often enough to be familiar.

Nikolai Malko, Russian conductor, for the last 10 years resident at Copenhagen, Denmark, is one of the conductors of the Danish State Radio Orchestra. He was a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakoff, Glazounoff, Liadoff, and Felix Mottl. Before the Revolution he was conductor of the State Opera at St. Petersburg. From the time of the Revolution until his appointment at Copenhagen, he served variously at teaching and conducting in Leningrad and Moscow. He has toured extensively in Europe and South America. He will conduct this week's concerts in Boston and Cambridge.

* * *

But to return to Rossini's "La Gazza Ladra." The opera appears to have been a great favorite for at least a half century after its premiere at La Scala in 1817. It was performed in both the composer's Italian form and in French as "La Pie Voleuse"—which was also the play on which its plot was founded:

"La Gazza Ladra" or "La Pie Voleuse" or "The Thieving Magpie" is the story of a servant girl who, by circumstantial evidence, has been convicted of stealing a silver spoon. She is sentenced to the scaffold. But, plausibly or not, as she is being led to the execution—someone observes a magpie on its nest—with the silver spoon protruding from the nest. And, of course, all ends happily.

Rossini liked the plot and took great pains with his score. Francis Toye, his biographer, considers the overture his best, except only the overture to "William Tell." The innovation of the drum rolls, which brought thoughts of violence to the mind of one young purist, was probably one cause of the overture's great success with a novelty-loving public.

The drum rolls lead at once into a broad, march-like introduction. More drum rolls usher in the transitional chords which lead to the main body of the overture. The principal theme is taken from a duet in the third act. It is marked by triplet figures in lilting rhythm. This duet must have enjoyed great popularity in its day, for lexicons and catalogues show not only that it was much sung but that it was also much transcribed.

After the appearance of this theme, a Rossinian crescendo leads to a more lyric, waltz-like second theme. Another crescendo brings recapitulation—and at least the externals of a sonata-allegro have been brought forth.

* * *

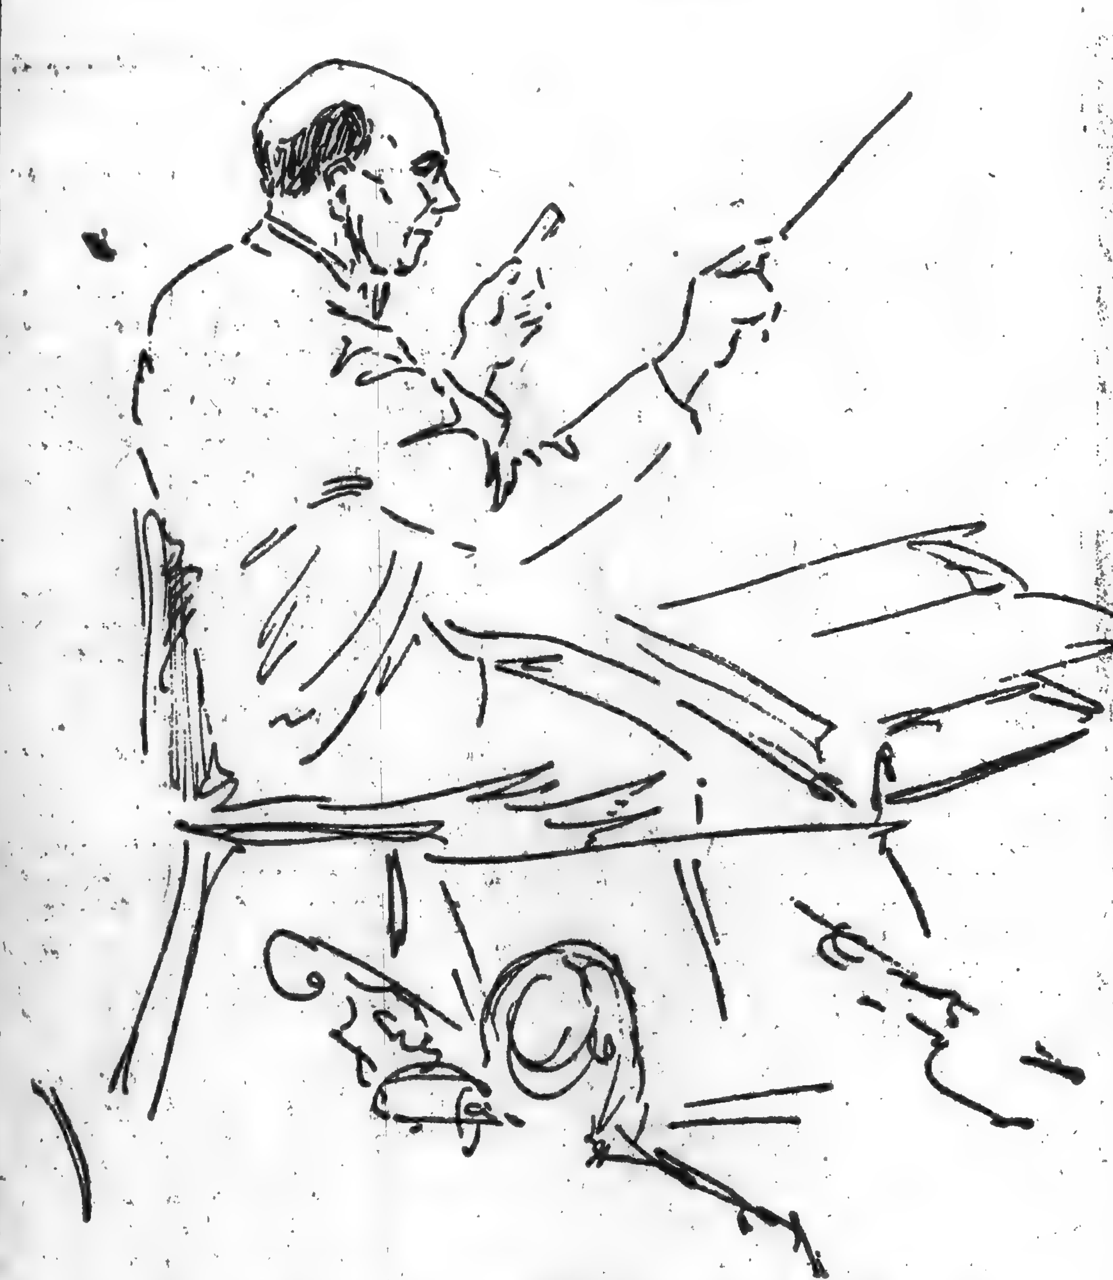
It is a far cry from Rossini's gay little overture to Max Reger's complex, monumental Variations, Opus 132, of 1914. The theme is from Mozart's Sonata in A major, of 1779, the theme on which Mozart himself wrote a set of six pleasant variations as first movement of his sonata. Reger states the theme, with varying orchestration, in its original form. He restates it in his first variation in woodwinds, with arpeggio embroideries in strings and trill figures in flutes.

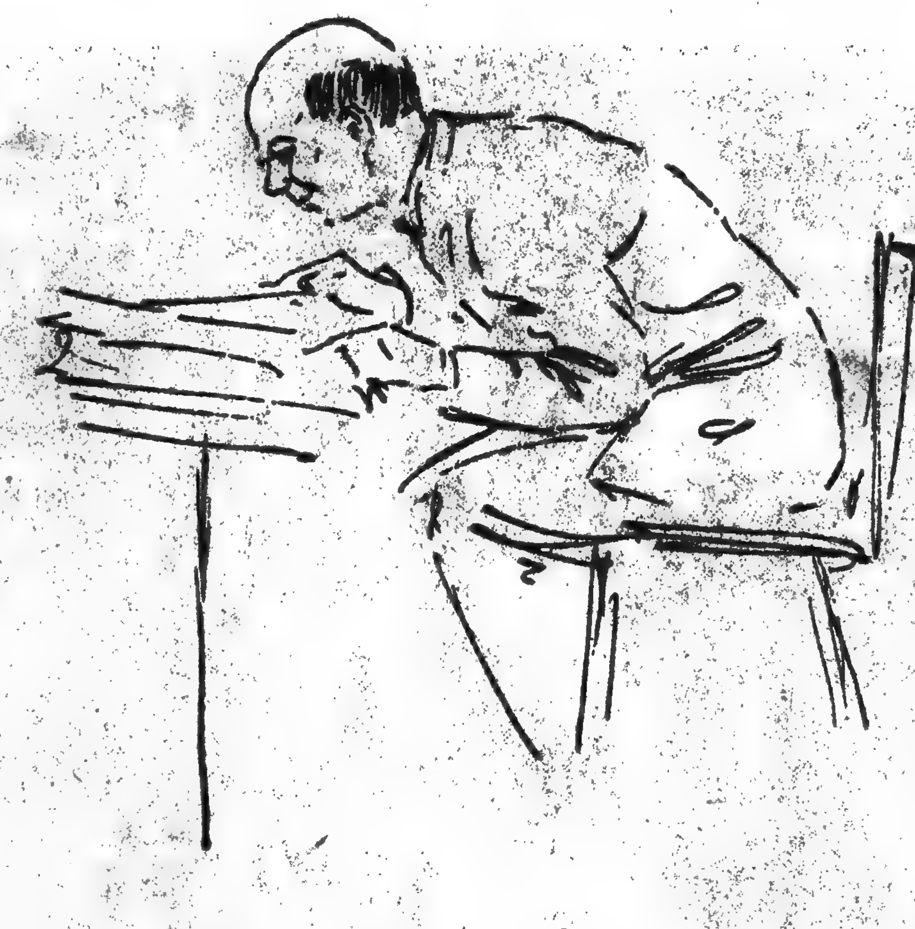
The second variation brings an inversion of the theme, in oboe and strings, in an agitated rhythm and with somewhat similar ornamentation. The third variation, pianissimo, introduces a much plainer rhythm (two-four, A minor) with the theme, in even notes, in strings. Reger here uses a favorite device in contrasting muted strings with unmuted strings.

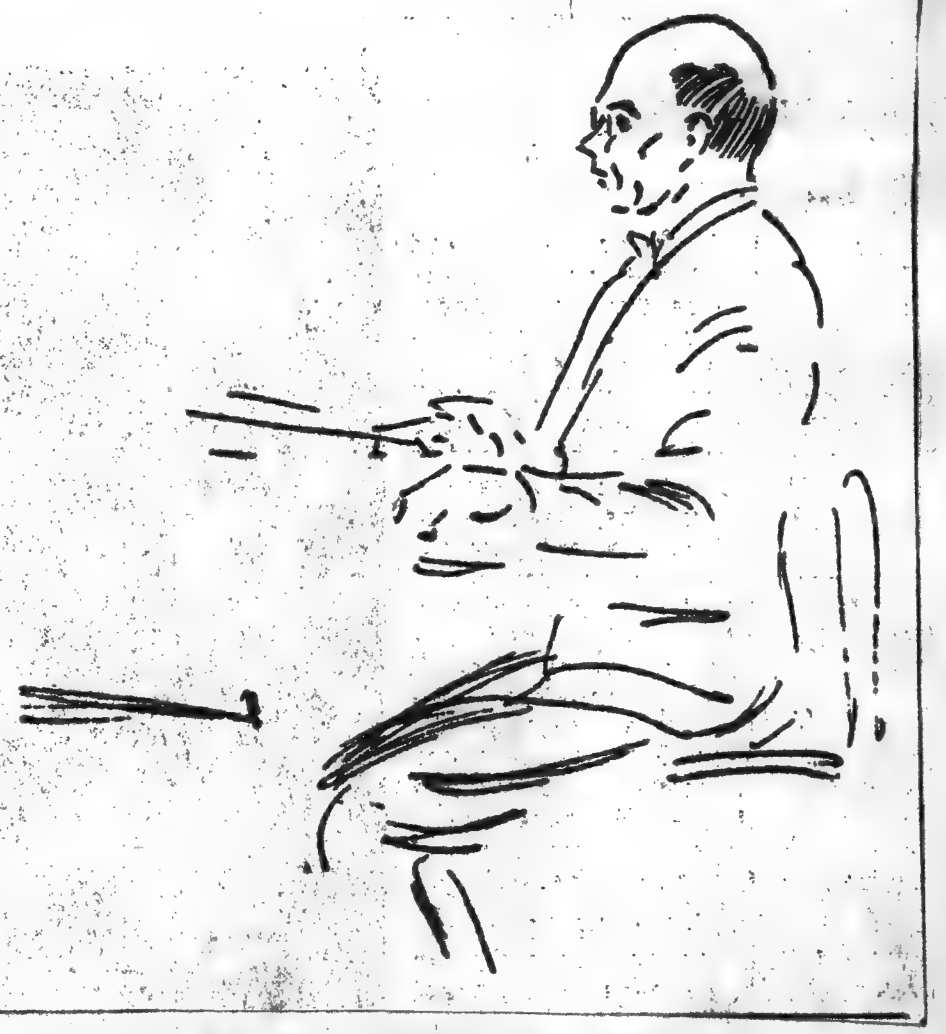
The fourth variation is in sharp contrast to the third. It is highly vivacious, and appears to be primarily a harmonic variation in a rapid, galloping rhythm. The fifth variation, still in minor, sped up to Presto, is a scherzo-like development of the three-note motive with which the theme begins.

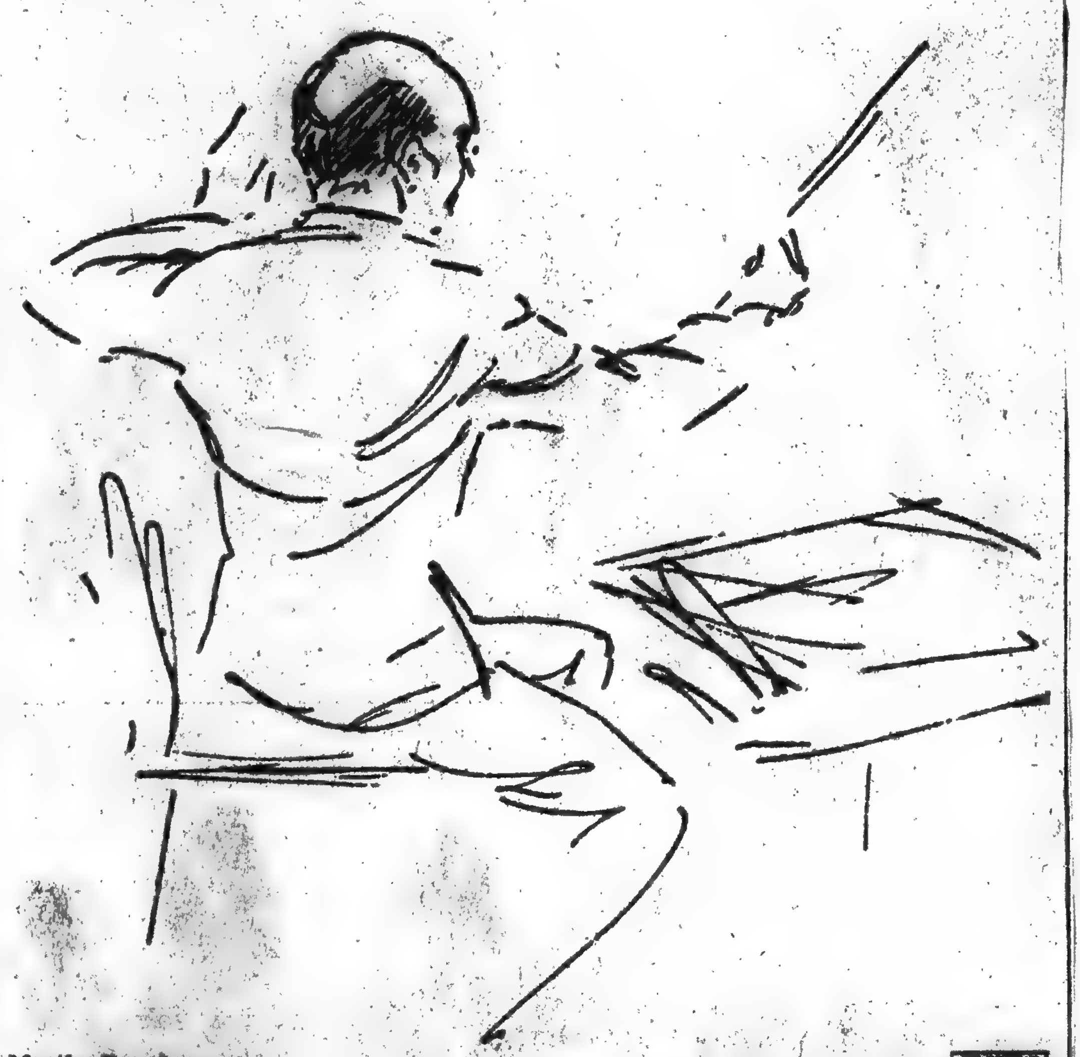
The sixth variation is similar to the third in its melodic line, being a contemplative Sostenuto or Adagietto. In the seventh variation, Andante grazioso, horns against strings treat the original theme in canonic form and with new, rich harmonies. The eighth variation, Molto sostenuto, continues the increase in expressiveness, by broadening the theme to expansive melodic lines.

A fugue serves as finale. The close relationship of its theme to that of the variations is readily discernible. Reger begins with rather plain treatment of his subject. Slowly he causes it to mount to a high climax with complex polyphony, but also complex Regerian harmony. Quiet simplicity follows, only to mount to a still greater climax at the peak of which the fugue theme is superimposed upon the variation theme, revealing the former as a counterpoint to the latter.









Martha Burnham

Nicolai Malko Rehearses the Boston Orchestra

The Russian conductor will direct this week's symphony concerts as guest conductor.

BOSTON POST, SATURDAY, JANUARY 20, 1940

MALKO LEADS SYMPHONY

Russian Gives Outstanding Readings of Scores

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A symphony concert—as Rhett Butler said of marriage—can be fun. This revolutionary disclosure was made at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon when the Russian conductor, Nicolai Malko, led the Symphony Orchestra, as guest, in a programme of compositions by Rossini, Shostakovitch, Reger and Tchaikovsky.

To be sure, not all of Shostakovitch's First Symphony comes under the head of amusement or even entertainment, but not a little of it does (it is primarily a symphony of "effect"); and Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Theme of Mozart, which for some unaccountable reason have never been played here before, have their serious, their emotional side. As for Rossini's Overture to "La Gazza Ladra" (played for the first time at these concerts) and Tchaikovsky's Italian Capriccio (unheard under these particular auspices since 1904) both come frankly under the head of musical diversion.

The most stimulating guest-conductor we have heard here since Dimitri Mitropoulos, Mr. Malko has much in common with his Greek colleagues. For one thing, he is bald. For another, he conducts without a score. For yet another, he knows exactly what he wants from an orchestra and has no difficulty in getting it.

Tonally, the orchestra, particularly the woodwind and brass, was at its best yesterday. Mr. Malko has a sensitive ear, alike for the sound of the individual instruments and for their proper blending. Moreover, the clarity of his readings was extraordinary, even in the mazes of Reger's polyphony; while euphony could scarcely go farther. And what a joy to hear brass that was satisfyingly full and sonorous, yet never blatant!

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 18 1940

Musicians at Winter Park

Special to the Herald Tribune

WINTER PARK, Fla., Jan. 17.—Miss Mabel Ritch, contralto, will sing here Friday evening at the second of the Rollins College faculty recitals.

Mr. Serge Koussevitzky, Boston orchestra [redacted]and wife; Mrs. William C. Dickerman, New York; Mrs. Maynard Holt and daughter, Rye, N. Y.; Mr. and Mrs. F. H. Bosworth, Ithaca, N. Y., and Mr. Philip M. Brown, Washington, are at Virginia Inn.

Mr. Poy Van Wie, Amsterdam, N. Y., and Miss Van Wie, Mr. George Kecher and Mr. and Mrs. Peter Kecher, Canajoharie, N. Y., are here visiting Mr. and Mrs. Howard J. Van Wie.

Other arrivals are Mr. and Mrs. George E. Fahys, Locust Valley, L. I.; Mr. and Mrs. Fielding Lewis Taylor, Dr. Richard M. Genius, Dr. Arthur Genius, New York; Mrs. Cliver Vincent, Torrington, Conn.; Mr. and Mrs. Fred S. Hall, Upper Montclair, N. J.; Mr. and Mrs. Reed Haviland, Norwalk, Conn., and Mr. Abran De Ronde, Englewood, N. J.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

JAN 19 1940

THE Lyons Den

By LEONARD LYONS

CALLING ALL STARS

A. M. A.: Sydenham Hospital, which was front-paged last week, is still having troubles. Dr. J. Jarcho, who was made head of the hospital by Gustavus Rogers, resigned after a long talk with Dr. Ralph Colp of the American College of Surgeons . . . Jim Farley: Mrs. Roark Bradford is going to Washington to work for the Women's Dem. Natl. Comm. until convention time . . . Marian Anderson: The Beethoven Assn.'s dinner for Koussevitzky, which was to be held at the swanky Cosmopolitan Club, has been shifted to the Brevoort. Dorothy Maynor will be the honored soloist . . . J. Edgar Hoover: Newspaper men who were in Barcelona in 1934 say they remember that one of the 17 men you've arrested for seditious conspiracy was held on a morals charge there.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHICAGO, ILL.
AMERICAN

JAN 19 1940

Music in Review

BY HERMAN DEVRIES.

Frederick Stock expected to bask in balmy breezes this week instead of having to brave subzero rigors to conduct last night's concert in Orchestra Hall, due to Association Conductor Hans Lange's abrupt departure for Indianapolis, where he is to direct the Indianapolis Symphony Orchestra tonight and tomorrow to replace Fabian Sevitsky, taken ill.

Debussy's "La Mer" was the most important symphonic item in last evening's offerings. It is to be expected that some of my readers would wish to know how Mr. Stock's reading compares to that of Koussevitsky, who led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this very composition upon its recent visit here at the Auditorium Theater. It is said that comparisons are odious, therefore, like Manon, in the opera of that name by Auber, I shall sing: "Non, non, non je ne le dirai pas," as I do not wish to slip on thin ice.

Beveridge Webster, the young American pianist, so much admired at the time of his debut with our orchestra two years ago, was the soloist. He introduced the Anis Fuleihan Concerto for Piano and Orchestra. The composer has little to say in this work of twenty minutes' duration, but what he does is pleasantly set down amid melodies just as agreeable and which offer the pianist-soloist the kind of material for which Mr. Webster is eminently fitted, i. e.: Technique galore. The novelty found favor, and composer, soloist and conductor were recalled several times.

Later Mr. Webster played the Liszt "Totentanz," another ingratiating study in pianistic gymnastics that suits the proclivities of the artist and brought his brilliant style into even greater evidence.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WEST PALM BEACH, FLA.
TIMES

JAN 19 1940

Palm Beach

"Palm Beach" is going to join the ranks of the tunes in the "Musical Geography." Vernon Duke, the brilliant young composer, is producing as part of his prodigious output, he announced Thursday on his arrival in Palm Beach. While here and in Winter Park, where he will spend a few days visiting his friend, Sergei Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he plans to compose a piece that will capture something of the gay holiday spirit of this resort.

Most of his compositions dealing with locales bear the names of streets, such as "Lake Shore Drive," Chicago; "Sutton Place," New York; "Millionaire's Row," New Orleans, but Mr. Duke feels that the name of Palm Beach is better known to the world at large than "Worth Avenue" or "County Road."

Mr. Duke, who has visited here previously, and who is sometimes called the "caviar composer," is at the Brazilian Court, has come to appear tomorrow night at Whitehall's opening big dinner dance when he will play his new song, "Apple Blossom Waltz" for Miss Mary McCord to sing. He is known both for his classic and popular music, probably best for his "April in Paris;" was a friend of the late George Gershwin, and is said to bear close kinship in his work to Gershwin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD JOURNAL

JAN 18 1940

The Concert

Morning Musicals, Inc., which has five morning recitals scheduled between now and the close of its morning season the middle of March, presented a concert yesterday in the Onondaga Hotel ballroom. There were selections of sufficient variety to interest the club membership, with first appearance before the club of the Victor Miller Trio, and of Mme. Trude Wolff, soprano. Morning program chairmen for the club found it necessary to rearrange concert plans several times, due to inability of some of the artists to appear.

Victor Miller, pianist, and his fellow musicians, Myron Levee, violinist, and Paul de Bourg, cellist, opened the concert with a trio by Gustav Strube in two movements, Andante Molto Tranquillo, and Allegro di Molto. The composer, for several years conductor of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, was born in Germany, studied violin with his father until he entered the Leipzig Conservatory. He came to the United States in 1891 and for nearly 20 years was among first violinists of the Boston Symphony.

Known as conductor of Boston popular concerts and orchestral portions of Worcester festival programs, he has written a symphony, an opera, and a book, "Theory and Use of Chords," among other works. The Miller trio also offered yesterday a group of short pieces, including a Polish minuet by Bass; Tschaikowsky's "Elegie Op. 48 No. 3," and a Russian dance by Friml. These musicians, widely known to Syracuse audiences, were well received. They play together with a sympathy, so vital in concert work.

Mme. Wolff, who has had considerable success in grand opera in Europe, sang songs by Brahms and Debussy, concluding her group with "Mi Chiamano Mimi" from Puccini's opera, "La Boheme." This simple and charming aria in the most attractive of the composer's appealing works, is one of fragile beauty. Mme. Wolff, who has a fine stage presence, and a lovely voice, made many friends among her listeners, who look forward with interest to hearing her again. Miss Geraldine Arnold, at the piano, as usual was adequate in accompaniment.

Three songs in English and one in Italian were chosen by Homer Ackles, lyric tenor, for his appearance. Scarlatti's "Sento nel core," "Have You Seen But a White Lily Grow?", old English; "Blue Are Her Eyes" by Wintter Watts, and Inglefritz's "Blow, Blow Thou Winter Wind," comprised the group, each number sung with sincerity. Mr. Ackles is a member of Park Central Presbyterian Quartet Choir. His accompanist was Gladys Eldrett Bush.

Elizabeth Graves, one of the younger pianists of the city, and graduate student in Fine Arts College, added to musical values of the day with a wide variety of solos: a Schumann intermezzo, Chopin's Etude in A Minor, and, to close the group, Debussy's "Toccata."

The ushers, with Miss Meda Louise Becker as chairman; Mrs. Stanley Vail, Mrs. Gilbert R. Wentworth, Miss Margaret Leonard, Mrs. William H. Malam, Mrs. Mark Butler, Mrs. J. O. Simmons, Mrs. C. M. Saltsman, Mrs. Walter R. Stillman, Mrs. Willis A. Becker, Mrs. Paul H. Conway, Miss Eloise Simmons and Mrs. Keith F. Driscoll.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SCRANTON, PA.
TRIBUNE

JAN 19 1940

Piatigorsky Made World Cello-Minded

Will Appear in Concert Here Tuesday, Under Community Concerts

Because of the great Piatigorsky, who appears here on Tuesday evening at 8:30 o'clock at the Masonic Temple, under the auspices of the Scranton Community Concert Association, the world is 'cello conscious, this country 'cello-minded.

In 10 successive American tours this amazing artist has proved to audiences from New York to San Francisco, from Canada to Cuba, that his instrument can be as brilliant and sensitive as the violin, as exciting and powerful as the piano, as rich and personally expressive as the human voice.

Gregor Piatigorsky was born April 17, 1903, in Jekaterinoslaw, Russia.. His talent was so remarkable that at 15 he was first 'cellist of the Imperial Opera at Moscow. He was on his way to a brilliant career when the revolution came. Escaping to Germany, Piatigorsky, poor and unknown, entered a competition for the position of solo 'cellist of the Berlin Philharmonic—and won. But his gifts were too great to be confined. Outside engagements were offered him and finally he resigned from the orchestra in order to have time to tour. His fame soon became international. Today his extraordinary career has more than justified his title—"the greatest living 'cellist."

Typical of his American success is his record of 13 appearances in six seasons with the Boston Symphony, 18 appearance in eight seasons with the Chicago Symphony. After his Boston appearance last year Warren Storey Smith wrote in the Post: "To say that Piatigorsky was at his best is merely to say that nothing in the way of 'cello playing could possibly have been better." After his Chicago engagement last Winter the Daily News reported that "it took eight leisurely recalls to silence an undiminished stream of applause." Piatigorsky is as devoted to the United States as this country is to him, and is on his way to becoming an American citizen.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 19 1940

Mrs. Harold J. Pearce, Mrs. Ernest E. Chase and Miss Ruth Tripp will be the ushers for the lecture on the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given by Mr. John B. Archer at the Providence Art Club Sunday afternoon at 4 o'clock.

The lectures are sponsored by the Monday Morning Musical Club.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

JAN 20 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, CARNEGIE—Opening movement of Mozart symphony in C (Koechel 338) somewhat unwieldy. Andante exquisite, with Boston's celebrated strings singing in peerless unison. Stravinsky Capriccio, for piano and orchestra, a sort of highly colored interlude, clever and concise, exhibits Mr. Sanroma in one of his best performances. Brahms symphony in D comfortable à la Koussevitzky. Audience cheers composer.

THE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, JANUARY 20, 1940

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 12th concert by the Boston Symphony Ochestra, Nicolai Malko, guest conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows:

Overture to "La Gazza Ladra" . . . Rossini
Symphony No. 1, Op. 10 . . . . . Shostakovitch
Variations and Fugue on a theme by Mozart, Op. 132 . . . . Reger
Italian Capriccio, Op. 45 . . . . . Tchaikovsky

This was a curious concert, in that it presented music that was conventional and unfamiliar. There were no real surprises, except those experienced by an audience hearing a strange work in a well recognized idiom. Then, too, the program was possibly out of the ordinary only to the faithful who listen to what the Boston Symphony offers and nothing else. Moreover, all of the music was second-rate or worse.

"Second-rate" has an unfortunate connotation brought about by our passion for superlatives. No one, for example, would call Rossini's Overture to "La Gazza Ladra" great music. Yet it is certainly attractive. Its very obviousness makes it an agreeable show-piece for the orchestra. They have their place, these overtures and similar pieces, on symphonic programs, a place which has been rather neglected in recent Boston Symphony history. Particularly when the orchestra is a virtuoso ensemble can music like the Rossini overtures be effective and brilliant.

The second movement of Shostakovitch's First Symphony is the only part to wear well with time. The first movement might do as background for a film, when it would be admired by intellectuals. Solemn articles would be written, with this as text, pointing out the importance of the films to the modern composer. But in the concert hall Shostakovitch's first movement is affected and thin. The lento and the finale are unbearably tedious. The second movement has been much better done by Prokofieff, but by contrast with the rest it has something to say.

Surely it is extraordinary that Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a theme by Mozart has never been played by the Boston Symphony! It is true that the 8th variation is boring and that the fugue is hardly the highest flight of the creative spirit. But all the first part of the work has both charm and ingenuity.

Mozart's own variations on this theme in the well known piano sonata are typical rococo ornamentations, stylized and not at all profound. Max Reger's are variations in the complicated manner of Brahms. They soon get away from the theme itself and carry us harmonically and rhythmically far afield. They become an original work. Reger was not the equal of Brahms in this practice, but his variations are not negligible on that account.

Perhaps it is well to hear Tchaikovsky at his worst merely to learn how bad that can be, and you can sink no lower than the Italian Capriccio. Actually much of it sounds like a clever parody of Tchaikovsky, so that only the name on the program prevents us from taking as much amusement from the piece as we should like. Just as there have been anthologies of the worst poetry by great poets, so some enterprising conductor might let us hear a concert where the great masters are tottering on their pedestals.

Under the circumstances it is not easy to offer any telling praise of Mr. Malko as conductor. He presented this program in an authoritative and efficient way. He seemed to get what he wanted from the orchestra. One gathered the impression of a good musician getting the most out of a singular assortment of scores. Mr. Malko was cordially applauded.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Richard Burgin will conduct the orchestra in Marcel Poot's Joyous Overture, Schumann's Piano Concerto in A minor (Josef Hofmann, soloist), and Dvorak's 2d Symphony in D minor (not the Brahms quartet as originally announced).

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, JANUARY 20, 1940

HOFMANN WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY CLIMAX OF BUSY WEEK'S MUSIC

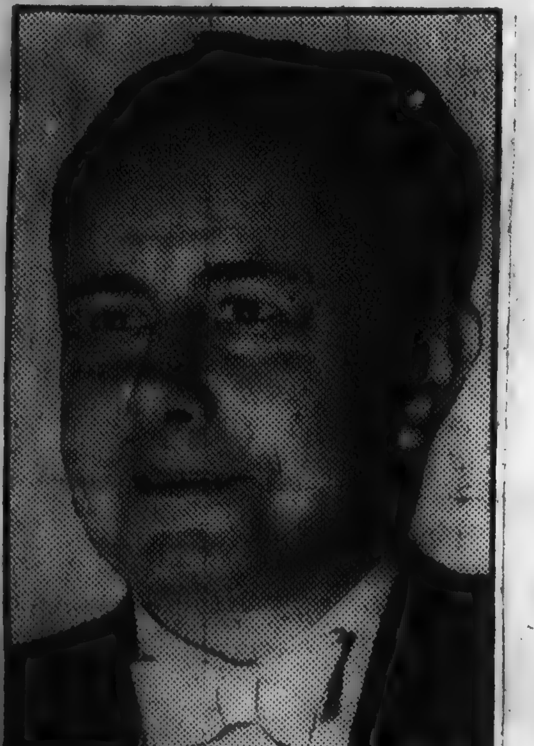
THE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—SATURDAY, JANUARY 20, 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JAN 20 1940

Josef Hofmann, renowned piano virtuoso, will be heard in the Schumann concerto in A minor, Op. 54, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Richard Burgin, in Metropolitan Theatre on Tuesday night.

Mr. Hofmann gave a Community Concert Association concert here last season.



JOSEF HOFMANN

The program Tuesday:

Moussorgsky ....
"Une Nuit sur le Mont Chauve" ("A Night on Bald Mountain"), Orchestral Fantasy

Schumann ....
Concerto for Pianoforte in A minor, Op. 54

Prokofieff ....
"Classical" Symphony, Op. 10
I. Allegro
II. Larghetto
III. Gavotte
IV. Finale.

Strauss ....
"Don Juan," Symphonic Poem (after Lenau)

Poot .... Ouverture Joyeuse

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Nicolai Malko, first of the guest conductors who will take over the Boston Symphony concerts here during the mid-season leave of Serge Koussevitzky, made his first appearance at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The concert was one of clear, musicianly and accurate performances, without extraneous excitements of any kind. Mr. Malko was well received by the Friday audience, who recalled him to the stage a number of times.

His program began with the Overture to Rossini's opera "La Gazza Ladra" ("The Thieving Magpie"); continued with the First Symphony by Dmitri Shostakovitch, the Variations and Fugue On a Theme of Mozart, by Max Reger, and ended with the "Italian Caprice" of Tchaikovsky. Mr. Malko termed it a "program of styles"; certainly it was of a sort unheard at the Symphony concerts for many years, and in the case of all but Tchaikovsky's curiously enduring triviality, quite refreshing. You may say there was not a masterpiece among them, but each, save the exception above noted, was interesting in its own way. After all, there is no reason why we should not hear second-rate music, old and new, once in a while.

A man of few gestures, Mr. Malko is completely free from the mannerisms of the prima-donna conductor. He beats time with a minimum of energy; he may stress an accent or an entrance with an extra jab of his left hand, and frequently he will bob up and down, bending at the knees, to emphasize a rhythm. Otherwise he is as business-like a figure as one could imagine.

The absolute clearness, precision and restraint of his conducting is proof of musicianship. His ear is keenly aware of what is going on in every section of the orchestra. He produces a beautifully round, mellow tone. He insists that the players keep scrupulously together. Broad outlines and fine details receive equal consideration, with the result that the orchestral tone is never cloudy or rough, and one hears the music as a whole. He has a very good sense of rhythm. If there was a crudely effected nuance all afternoon long, this reviewer did not hear it.

Mr. Malko's tempi were, on the other hand, too slow. Rossini would have sparkled more at a faster pace and so would have Tchaikovsky and most of the Reger Variations. The Shostakovitch Symphony was interpretively the most fascinating part of the concert, for Mr. Malko (who had conducted the very first performance of it at Leningrad in 1926) contrived a personal reading that seemed to intensify the Asian color and to put in the background the various European influences that hung over the 19-year-old Shostakovitch.

It may be that emotional fire is less a part of Mr. Malko's musical nature than the sobriety and the clarity that so distinguish him. Just one concert is obviously not enough on which to base an estimate of a conductor's interpretive resources.

Why Reger's pleasant and Brahmsian Variations had never been done at a Symphony concert before must remain a cosmic puzzle. They deserved to be brought out long since. The theme is that of the first movement in Mozart's A major piano Sonata. The eight Variations and the Fugue finale take nearly 30 minutes. Perhaps that is too long for any set of variations (unless they bear the sacred names of Bach, Beethoven or Brahms). But Reger mustered a good deal of variety and beauty, and so ingeniously did he write that seldom are you forced into the game of "tune, tune—find the tune!"—C. W. D.

---

rare appearances with the Boston Symphony next Friday and Saturday when Richard Burgin (inset) conducts the orchestra.

MALKO CONDUCTS

Boston Symphony Guest Leads Work Of Shostakovitch He Launched 1925

Much water has passed under musical and political bridges since the spring day in Leningrad, 1926, when Nicolai Malko directed the world premiere of Dmitri Shostakovitch's tunefully dissonant First Symphony, starting it on a triumphal round of the first orchestras of Europe and America. Today the symphony is as popular as ever, but it has lost such glamour of radicalism as it may once have had. One wonders whether the composer still harbors his conviction that our epoch is "spirited and joyous" and whether he still feels that music is "a vital weapon in the struggle" and if so, in what struggle.

Yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Mr. Malko again conducted the Shostakovitch First in a repetition of the program he presented the day before in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, and which was reported yesterday in these columns. Again the performance was spirited. Often one had the feeling that Malko would have been able to use subtler nuances of the symphonic palette in his interpretation, had his acquaintance with the Boston Symphony been of longer standing. Nevertheless the slow movement of the symphony was painted in the subdued tones appropriate to it and it seemed to have gained in intensity of feeling since the evening before.

"La Gazza Ladra"

Performed for the first time at the Friday concerts, the Overture to Rossini's comic opera, "The Thievish Magpie," opened the program with a flash of wit, a shining iridescent soap bubble which, after it exploded, left exactly nothing behind. The irresistible lilt of the two or three ideas that make up the whole overture reminded one of Rossini's laziness, his epicurean tastes, his almost legendary waggishness and his reputation as one of the best amateur cooks in Paris. In execution the overture might have profited from a little more snap and tension in its beat.

Also a first performance at these concerts were the Reger Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart, perhaps the best known orchestral work from Reger's pen. One could have wished here and there for a more fastidious execution of the various strands that went to make up the complicated polyphonic web of certain variations. Yesterday as at the concert of the preceding evening the fugue was an imposing climax to the performance as well as to the work itself.

Tchaikovsky's Italian Capriccio, which closed the program, began with a melody which, though professedly Italian, seemed to at least one listener the very essence of Slavic melancholy. Then, as the rest of the Italian melodies passed in review, the tempo got livelier and the tunes more and more banal. This Capriccio, which started out with a suggestive and rather beautiful theme, found us at the end again wondering what it was that had moved Mr. Malko to revive this shallow, noisy piece of work. E. D.

Symphonic Guest From Russia

C.S.M.

The Arts in Boston

Jan 20

Nicolai Malko, coming to us from Russia via Denmark, is the distinguished guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this week's concerts. He submitted the following program yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, and will repeat it this evening: Rossini, Overture to "La Gazza Ladra"; Shostakovich, Symphony No. 1; Reger, Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart, op. 132; Tchaikovsky, Italian Capriccio. The Rossini and the Reger items were played for the first time at these concerts.

Mr. Malko proved himself at once an authoritative and musicianly conductor, who had clear ideas of interpretation and was able to secure the co-operation of the orchestra. His style of directing is simple and unaffected. He was well received by the Friday audience.

The Rossini overture proved to be a delightful number, full of grace and fun and theatricalism. It was refreshing to listen to a score completely devoid of profundity yet musically engaging.

Mr. Malko is said to have been the first conductor of the Shostakovich symphony; his reading of it may be taken as authentic. Another hearing did not alter one's impression of the score. By the way, what is Shostakovich's political standing in Russia as of January, 1940? Was he concerned with the Finnish adventure? If so, was he for it or against it? Much may depend on the answer. This listener's personal opinion is that Shostakovich is in favor in Moscow at the moment; the final movement of this symphony certainly forecast the pact with Germany.

Reger is a formidable name in music, but this exercise of his scholarship is neither very interesting musically nor very appealing for its tonal beauties. There is nothing in the variations half so pleasing as the theme itself. The final fugue best deserves the attention.

Tchaikovsky's Italian Capriccio is strange fare for a symphony program in these days. It had not been heard at a subscription concert of the orchestra since 1904. It really belongs in the Pop concert repertory. Possibly Mr. Malko underestimated the musical experience of the people of Boston. If so, we shall forgive him, if only for the sake of the Rossini overture. L. A. S.

891

Jan 21

169

Russian Conductor Bows to Boston

By LEO GAFFNEY

IT IS guest-conductor time at the Boston Symphony, Koussevitzky being absent on his customary winter vacation. In his place at the formal week-end concerts stood Nicolai Malko, distinguished music-master from Russia—via Copenhagen.

It was a debut program, colorful and arresting as befits the visiting conductor making his introductory bow. Mr. Malko did it all without so much as a glance at the printed scores.

There were two compositions not previously heard in these concerts: The Overture to Rossini's dead-as-a-doornail opera, "La Gazza Ladra," and Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart, opus 132.

The Rossini was an adventure in nostalgia. Begun with a rousing double drum roll, the overture oozed lush soprano airs in fiddles and piccolos, roundly recalling "the luckless servant girl" as sung by Patti, Lind and other roly-poly divas beloved of the last century.

Did it not recall, too, the florid "band concert" of one's youth, when the soft Sunday afternoon air breathed of balm and bravura!

THE Reger Variations, though, were something else again. Here was music to delight the heart. Who in his youth at the piano has not struggled with the Mozart A major Sonata, proudly pounded out the unenvolved first two pages, then given up in despair when the lovely thing became too complicated?

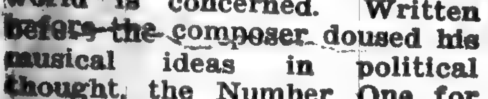
Reger's eight variations and fugue as rendered by Mr. Malko and the Boston Orchestra supplied therapeutic benefit for all those frustrated pianists. The beautiful undulating melody of the theme was worked out to the final decimal point. There was nothing left to be said.

Mr. Malko's choice of Symphony was Shostakovitch's Number One, tour de force for any conductor, tossed off in flashing brilliance by Mr. Malko and his men.

The young Sovietist's First Symphony bids fair to be his monument as far as the western world is concerned. Written before the composer doused his musical ideas in political thought, the Number One for all its strange songs stands up even on such a program.

NO doubt it is "music for the bourgeoise ear," not be heard now in the land of the U. S. S. R.—more's the pity for Shostakovitch and his regimented brethren.

To complete the dashing mood of the beginning, Mr. Malko concluded his debut program with Tchaikovsky's Italian Capriccio. And once again the frustrated pianists sat back and took it all in—hugely pleased at recognizing tunes they used to know and wonder-



ALBERT SPALDING, famous American violinist, appearing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 21 1940

CONCERTO SERIES

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

THE primary purpose of the National Orchestral Association, which completes the first decade of its career this spring, is to provide the young musicians who play in its training orchestra under Leon Barzin's direction with a valuable opportunity for the completion of their preparation for service in professional orchestras throughout the United States. Their basic training in the mastery of their instrumental technique has been completed in the music school or the teacher's studio, but the post-graduate work with the association enables them to gain acquaintance with the requirements and the routine of work in a large orchestra under virtually professional conditions, and to learn a repertoire which, in size and diversity, rivals that of our principal symphonic organizations, whose ranks include many who have taken advantage of this course.

The association's concerts for its subscribing members in Carnegie Hall, with the co-operation both of young soloists and of artists of international prominence, constitute an integral part of this training rather than a final objective of the association, but they have also proved to be a valuable feature of each music season since 1930 from the music lover's point of view, on account of the music performed and on account of the high standards which have usually characterized its performance. Concertos are frequently heard in the regular Monday evening series, but the special Saturday afternoon concerts, which enter their sixth season this week, present an unusual opportunity for acquaintance with the literature of music for solo instruments and orchestra.

* * *

Mr. Gabrilowitsch's Contribution

OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH, according to Franklin Robinson, administrative director of the association, was not only the first soloist to take part in this series, but the originator of the idea, so that the designation of these concerts as a memorial to this eminent musician is particularly appropriate. Mr. Robinson, learning of Mr. Gabrilowitsch's desire to present a series devoted to piano concertos, suggested the collaboration of Mr. Barzin's training orchestra, and the series was launched at Town Hall for a capacity audience on Oct. 27, 1934. Mr. Gabrilowitsch and the post-graduate students played sixteen concertos or works of allied form in five programs, closing on March 23, 1935, with an exacting list of four works: Franck's Symphonic Variations, Tchaikovsky's concerto in B flat minor, Strauss's Burleske and Rachmaninoff's concerto in C minor.

Those who attended this concert, including this reviewer, can well remember the typically high standard of Mr. Gabrilowitsch's interpretations, and the tireless spirit which characterized them throughout the two hours of music-making. Judging by the elan with which he played the finale of the Rachmaninoff concerto, there seemed no reason to believe that he could not have gone on to play another full-length work of this character with equally unflagging freshness, and the audience, judging by its fervent applause, would have been glad to have him do so. The demonstration continued until Mr. Gabrilowitsch made a short and graceful speech.

* * *

The Next Four Seasons

BUT the closing notes of the Rachmaninoff concerto were the last which Mr. Gabrilowitsch played here in public; the long illness which halted his active career soon afterward ended with his death in September, 1936. Meanwhile the success of this first series prompted the association to supplement it with five programs of violin concertos at Carnegie Hall in the winter of 1936, with Mischa Elman as the soloist in fifteen works. The third season of these concerts, in 1937, was devoted to overtures and piano concertos of Mozart and Beethoven, with Myra Hess, Rudolf Serkin and Mischa Levitzki as the solo interpreters. In 1938 Emanuel Feuermann was the soloist in four programs of music for cello and orchestra, including two works played for the first time in New York, Schönberg's concerto based on a clavicembalo concerto of the eighteenth-century Austrian, Georg Mathias Monn, and Toch's concerto for cello and eleven other instruments. Last winter's five programs of romantic music were somewhat modified in type, each consisting of an overture, a symphony and a piano concerto, with Mr. Serkin as the soloist. In all, fifty-two concertos or other works for solo instruments with orchestra have been played in the twenty-four concerts of these five seasons, twenty-four for piano, fifteen for violin and thirteen for cello.

* * *

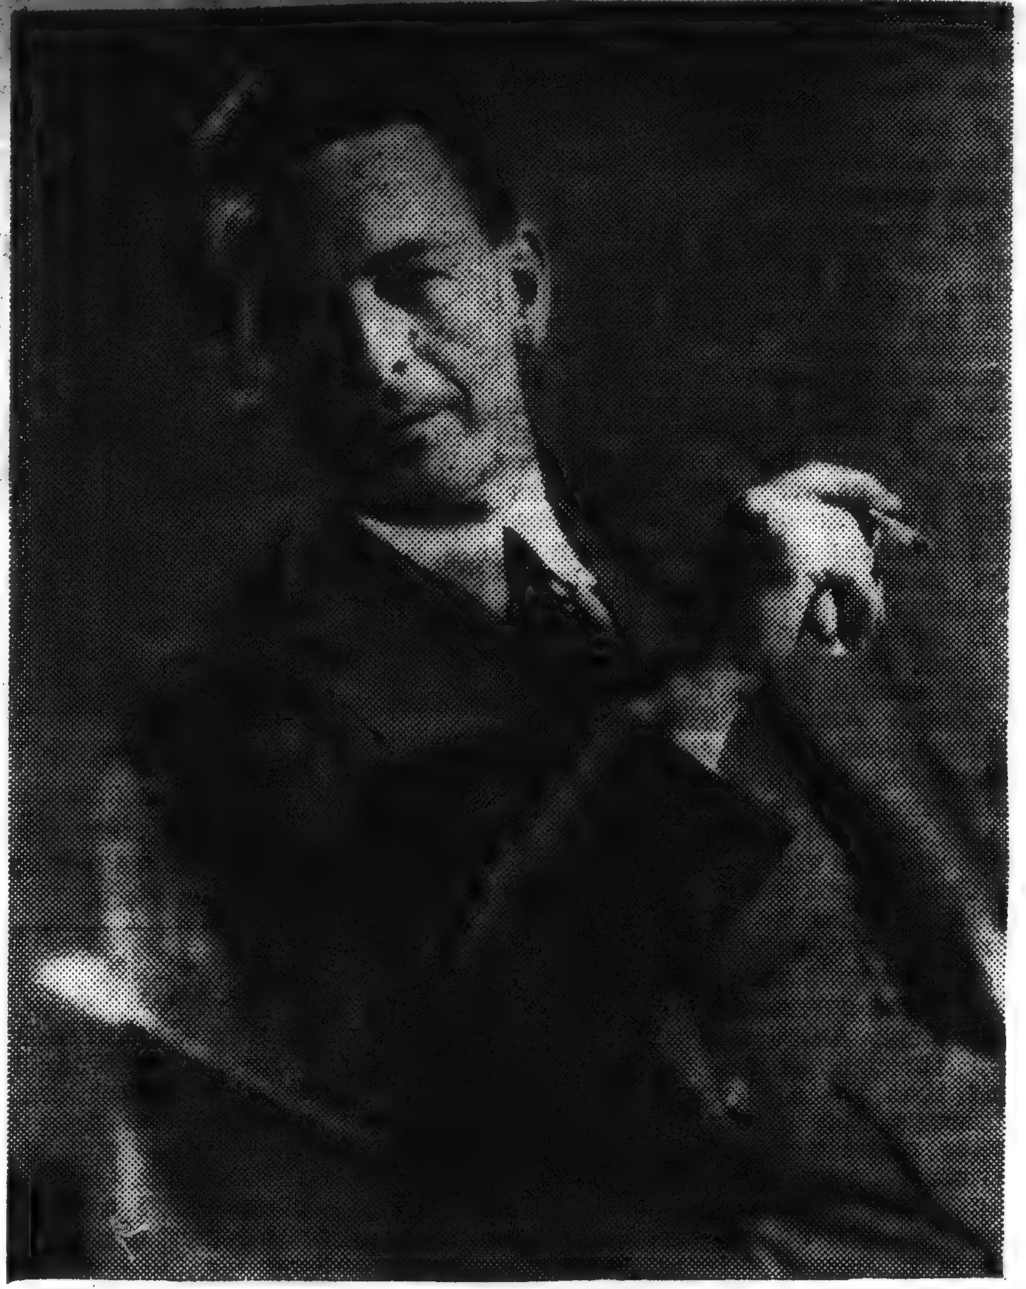
Plans for This Winter

THE original plan for this season's concerts was to present concertos in all three classes with the assistance of three artists, Miss Hess, Mr. Elman and Mr. Feuermann, who have already taken part in this series, and to open each program with an overture by a contemporary American composer. So far as the type of program is concerned, this will be carried out, and William Schuman's American Festival Overture, introduced here by the Boston Symphony last November, will preface Mr. Feuermann's appearance next Saturday afternoon in a long-forgotten concerto by Joseph Reicha (1746-1803), a German conductor, composer and cellist, and in Dvorak's cello concerto in B minor.

Mr. Serkin will be heard instead of Miss Hess, who has remained in England to enrich its war-time musical life with the noonday London concerts in the National Gallery, in the second and fourth concerts on Feb. 10 and March 9. Nathan Milstein will replace Mr. Elman, whose previously arranged plans have prevented his participation, in the third program on Feb. 24. For the last concert on March 30, Mr. Milstein and Mr. Feuermann, plus a pianist, will appear with Mr. Barzin who, for this occasion, will exchange the baton for the viola, which he played for several years as a member of the Philharmonic Orchestra.

Inquiries for memberships for this series, at rates ranging from $2.50 upward for the five concerts, should be addressed to the association's office at 113 West Fifty-seventh Street. Mr. Robinson, in a recent interview, has stated that a considerable number of memberships of various classes are still available. According to present plans this season is to be the last of this interesting set of concerto programs, but another special feature of an unusual character is under consideration for next year.

THE BOSTON HERALD, SUNDAY, JANUARY 21, 1940



Albert Spalding, celebrated American violinist, who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the next pair of Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts at Symphony Hall Jan. 29 and 30.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN

JAN 21 1940

Manhattan Musical Events

By JOHN ALAN HAUGHTON

NEW YORK.

WITH the Boston Symphony visiting us and the Philharmonic giving its regular concerts as well as its special one for the pension fund, there has been quite a lot of orchestral music heard during the week. Nothing new happened at the Metropolitan but packed houses were the order of things for the repetitions.

At his first concert, Mr. Koussevitzky offered as a novelty Ernest Bloch's violin concerto with Josef Szigeti as soloist. It was the work's first hearing in these parts. Those who enjoy Mr. Bloch's music probably enjoyed the work. Certainly Mr. Szigeti's playing of it left nothing to be desired. At the second concert, Jesus-Maria Sanroma played the Stravinsky "Capriccio," making a tremendous hit. The symphonies played included the first of Beethoven, Mozart's thirty-fourth, in C Major and the second of both Brahms and Sibelius.

Philharmonic Soloists

At his regular concerts with the Philharmonic-Symphony, Mr. Barbirolli had Rachmaninoff as soloist in the Beethoven C Major Concerto, and Anatol Kaminsky, a young and hitherto unknown (to us, that is) violinist in the tiresome Glazounoff Concerto. At the pension fund concert, Dorothy Maynor, soprano, was the soloist, singing Mozart's "L'Amero, Saro Costante" from "The Shepherd King," the big scena of Agathe from "Die Freischütz" and "Depuis le Jour" which is coming to be associated with her when and wherever she sings.

Mr. Rachmaninoff played the Beethoven magnificently, but for my part, I prefer to hear him in his own beautiful concertos. Young Mr. Kaminsky, who is a personable lad and a good fiddler, disclosed an agreeable, warm tone and excellent technique. It would be interesting to hear him in a more congenial work. Miss Maynor sang the Mozart in excellent classical style, though with less volume of tone and less variety of tone-color than one could have wished. In the "Freischütz" excerpt she was somewhat hampered by obvious shortcomings in the accompanying, which was pretty bad. The "Louise" aria was a triumph and after she had been brought back four or five times, Mr. Barbarolli decided, evidently that that was enough and mounted the podium. But, nothing doing! The audience continued to applaud and yell for the soloist, who had to make three more bows.

At The Opera House

At the opera house we had a special "Tristan und Isolde," "La Traviata," "La Gioconda," "Manon," "Lohengrin," "La Boheme" and a special "Lakmé," a pretty well-assorted repertoire as these things go.

Lotte Lehmann and Lauritz Melchior drew a capacity audience to Carnegie Hall for a joint recital. Mr. Melchior sang Scandinavian works and Mme. Lehmann, German ones, and they joined in Wagnerian excerpts.

The little Filipino soprano, Enya Gonzalez, who was so well received as Madama Butterfly with the Gallo Opera last season, gave her first song recital, doing some excellent singing in spite of the fact that her tone production was not invariably the type most popular in this locality. Six Spanish Christmas songs by Nin, had their first New York hearing. They proved characteristic works of some interest. A concert aria by Mozart, "Non Piu! Tutte Ascolta!" was less in the young singer's style though she gave a musicianly performance of it. Some songs in English were well given and two Filipino Folk Songs arranged by Turina were excellent.

Two-Piano Recital

Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff gave a two-piano recital (about the 11,000th this season), offering a program that was largely of arrangements by Mr. Luboshutz, though Vittorio Giannini's new Concerto, an excellent work, had its first hearing. Among the best of these was the Coronation Scene from "Boris Godunoff." Of course, the beautiful if somewhat over-played D Major Sonata for Two Pianos also figured. In spite of the transcendent beauty of the slow movement of this work, it is beginning to verge on the chestnut class. Felix Fooc's new "Valse Tragique" proved interesting and was well received.

Glenn Darwin and Wilbur Evans, both barytones, were heard in excellent recitals both of which were well attended.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 21 1940

CULLED FROM THE MAIL POUCH

The Debate on American Music Is Carried On by Readers

Need for American Conductors

To the Music Editor:

LET me add my "two cents" to the current conflagration about the American composer. I had hoped that some one else would bring up the point which I am about to make. (I am not a composer!)

Can we expect a Polish, Italian, Austrian, German, Russian, Spanish or Chinese conductor, who has lived most of his life and received his musical training in another country, to give a sincere damn about the American composer "per se"? Witness Edward C. Potter's plight as expressed in his letter published Jan. 14. I know of many similar instances. These same conductors return from Europe each Summer with a bag full of European composers' works.

My argument is now self-evident. Bring the American conductor into his own and the American composer will have won half his fight. This is not a snake-oil remedy curing all ills, but I insist that one American conductor in a prominent position could do more to help American composers, singers and instrumentalists than all the foundation prizes, auditions, publishing houses and music schools in the country. Witness the excellent work of Dr. Albert Stoessel at Chautauqua, Worcester and with the Oratorio Society; also Dr. Howard Hanson at Rochester.

It is not that we do not have the talent and material from which conductors are made. The Federal Music Project has proved to excess that we have excellent native conductors and has been the first major "break" that American conductors have received. It remains for all sponsors and supporters of our orchestras to insist—yes, demand—that American conductors be hired to conduct their orchestras. With the "Big Three" and other major orchestras, the ruling could be made that an American conductor must be hired as assistant. ARTHUR AUSTIN.

New York, Jan. 14, 1940.

What Is National Music?

To the Music Editor:

THE insistence that American composers write "American" music is getting to be a little tiresome and more than a little silly. What is "American" music? As Marion Bauer so aptly puts it, "If we can be told what makes German music German, French music French and Russian music Russian," then perhaps we can get a line on what will make American music American.

It is indubitable, I think, that any "national" music is based upon the folksongs of that nation, and folksongs are the musical expression of the experiences of long centuries of national life. America has no folksongs because America is not a "folk." We are not a homogeneous nation but a heterogeneous collection of widely differing peoples assembled on this continent from the four quarters of the earth. In the city of Chicago alone twenty different languages are in common use. Out of this welter a "folk music" has not yet arisen.

Indian music is not "American" music, as some people maintain. Neither is Negro music "American." It has its origin in the African jungle, tinged with the sad experiences of slavery, which give it its plaintive quality.

Neither is "jazz" American music. Heaven forfend! "Jazz" is distinctly of Negro origin. It may, to some extent, express the carefree, happy-go-lucky energy of the American people, but that it is the idiom of American life or American idealism is unthinkable. America is not a nation of "jitterbugs."

In this mess of assorted languages and ideas that are assembled under the American flag the American composer must perforce employ the musical idioms of other lands, for there is not, and cannot yet be, a distinctive Aemrican musical idiom.

This is not to say that the American composer has no originality, for that would be most untrue. American composers have most decidedly developed originality and individuality. A composer describes the Grand Canyon, an American locomotive, a Montana landscape, the Circles of Washington, the Bowery, and in each and all of these are displayed originality, individuality, and humor that is perhaps characteristically American. They each describe distinctly American scenes, but it is all done in the European musical idiom. When a critic demands that American composers write "American" music, may we respectfully ask that he furnish the plans and specifications. EDWARD C. POTTER.

Washington, Jan. 16, 1940.

League of Composers' Record

To the Music Editor:

I HAVE followed with great interest the articles and correspondence in the past few weeks regarding American composers and American composition. I am bringing to your attention the following facts, because I believe the League of Composers has played a very vital part in the encouragement of American composition in this country and in Europe during the past sixteen years.

To my knowledge, with the exception of the great contribution which Mrs. Coolidge has made, the League of Composers has probably given more commissions to American composers than any other organization. At the present time we have given to American composers commissions for orchestra, chorus and chamber music, as well as for radio broadcasts, which total thirty new works in the last few years. This includes a recent Town Hall commission by the league which is the first Town Hall award for creative composition ever to be presented. All of these commissioned works have received outstanding premières by leading orchestras and musical ensembles, who have thus shown their confidence in the American composer, as well as in the choice of the men who have been commissioned.

The incentive to write new works for chamber orchestra was greatly encouraged in the early years of the league owing to the fact that we were introducing in this country many European works well known all over Europe, such as Stravinsky's "Histoire du Soldat," Bartak's "Village Scenes," Hindemith's "Marienleben," Malipiero's "Setti Canzoni," Bliss's "Madame Noy," etc. As a result the American composers came to recognize that there was a medium in this country for performing the contemporary works for chamber orchestra or for unusual ensemble. Then followed a series of new American works including Louis Gruenberg's "Daniel Jazz" and "The Creation," Emerson Whithorne's "Saturday's Child," Aaron Copland's "Music for the Theatre," Frederick Jacobi's "Assyrian Prayers," Lazare Saminsky's "Litanies of Women," etc., which were introduced by us to the public in this country.

The League of Composers proceeded to present a series of stage works to the New York public which had received outstanding success in the capitals of Europe. Among these works were de Falla's "El Retablo de Maese Pedro" (with life-size puppets), Stravinsky's "Les Noces," "Sacre du Printemps," and "Oedipus Rex," Schoenberg's "Glueckliche Hand" and "Pierrot Lunaire," Prokofieff's "Pas d'Acier" and Shostakovich's "Lady Macbeth of Mzensk," Monteverdi's "Il Combattimento di Tancredi," etc. The League of Composers then joined in a cooperative effort with the American Lyric Theatre to turn the scene once again to the American composer, and under their auspices last season presented Moore's opera "The Devil and Daniel Webster," and Copland's "Billy the Kid" and Carter's "Pocahontas" with the Ballet Caravan. Our belief is that there will be a further incentive for the American composers to write more compositions for the stage just as soon as the composers recognize that there are more mediums through which their works might be produced.

* * *

In tracing this development of the past history of commissioned works, chamber orchestra, stage, etc., our efforts have been to hold to the highest standard of discrimination in our choice, and we have had the very valuable cooperation of artists like Serge Koussevitzky, Leopold Stokowski, Fritz Reiner, Artur Rodzinski, Eugene Goossens and others, as well as a long list of eminent soloists, because of the confidence they have had in our efforts not only to encourage contemporary music but to present the best works available.

We have this year formed a national committee of composers who have joined the League of Composers in an active membership in order to advise us regarding the new men throughout the country who have a valuable contribution to add to these programs. In the development of this national plan, for the last two years we have presented, through the Columbia Broadcasting System, regional broadcasts under the direction of eminent composers in other cities. In February of this year we shall have broadcasts from Los Angeles, Philadelphia and Boston, under the direction of Louis Gruenberg, Randall Thompson and Quincy Porter. Last season our regional broadcasts were from Chicago, Cleveland and San Francisco, under Rudolph Ganz, Arthur Shepherd and Albert Elkus.

* * *

During these sixteen seasons the league has presented 636 works by living composers, of which 304 were by American composers who were represented by 111 American men and women. In addition to this list of works, carefully chosen by a committee of musicians, we have encouraged through the publication of Modern Music, a great many composers to present their viewpoint on a wide range of musical subjects, besides introducing a series of American portraits of living composers.

I trust this letter may be of interest in reviewing the American scene, for I believe that the problem of American music today, as in the past, lies in the effort made by all organizations to present music of the highest standards.

MRS. ARTHUR M. REIS,
Executive Chairman, League of Composers.

New York, Jan. 9, 1940.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 21 1940

SPEAKING FOR THE CZECHS

By OLIN DOWNES

SIGNIFICANT things can happen in an art, such as music, when the nation which creates that art deeply feels. The emotion cannot be simulated, and it must be emotion—not doctrine or propaganda. The composer who creates under such inspiration is then primarily the spokesman of the nation of which he is an integral part. If he is an artist of minor rank and of definite intellectual limitations he may produce a single march or air which endures as the crystallization in a small form of some great collective sentiment. But if he is a man of commensurate genius he can transmute and epitomise the emotional currents which surge through his nation in terms of universal and enduring art.

This holds true of much of the music of Bedrich Smetana, whose operatic and symphonic music figures upon the gala program to be given in aid of Czecho-Slovakia on the twenty-fourth of this month. Smetana was Bohemia's national bard in symphonic composition of the last half of the nineteenth century. Today his music again arouses and furiously excites his countrymen, so that the performance of his opera "Libussa," when it was given last May in Prague, had such an effect that the authorities of the "Protectorate" were compelled immediately to forbid its further presentation. And no wonder! The performance of an opera which treats of the liberation of the Czechs from foreign oppression is not calculated to ease the situation today in Prague.

* * *

AND so history repeats itself. Smetana, who died in 1884, was a Czech of Czechs. His fellow-countrymen suffered from many acts of oppression. It was under these conditions that Smetana composed his most representative scores. "Libussa," the opera, came in 1872. Two years later was begun the symphonic cycle of six tone-poems, grouped under the collective title of "Ma Vlast"—"My Country." This cycle was dedicated to the city of Prague, and its purpose was to make Smetana's country known and illustrious to the world. Indirectly, of course, retelling native legends and extolling the life and genius of his race in tones, the composer defied the aggressor, even as Sibelius, at another time, when Finland was ruled by her hereditary foe, Russia, sang songs of the fatherland and unending resistance to her foes. We know how, in the Eighteen Nineties and Nineteen Hundreds his "Finlandia," was proscribed.

The Smetana cycle, of which the fourth tone-poem, "Z Ceskych Luhuv a Jajuv"—"From Bohemia's Fields and Groves," will be played at the forthcoming concert, begins with the score of "Vysehrad," which is the name of the fortress of Libussa, liberator of her people, and in which very place, today, sit usurpers who rule. The present edifice was built in 1884, on the site of Libussa's castle, and the Hrad is today a noble spectacle, in a beautiful and harassed land.

It would be eminently worth while for conductors to look a little farther than the routine repertory which so obsesses them and play on various occasions, or in series, every one of these tone-poems, several of which are little known, while the others have long since established themselves. They are in truth the voice of Czecho-Slovakia.

* * *

THE motive of the great fortress reappears in the second tone-poem of this cycle, which Mr. Toscanini, among others, has performed often. Its title is that of the river that the Czechs call Vltavé and the Germans the Moldau. This river sweeps by field and forest; dances and national songs are heard over the flowing accompaniment; at last there is a mighty invocation of the castle—a page of epical splendor. The third of the cycle is "Sarka." She was the noblest of the mythical Bohemian Amazons. [illegible] is "Tabor," the stronghold from which the Taborites took their name, and the sixth "Blanik." Blanik is the mountain on which Hussite warriors are supposed to sleep until they rise to fight again for the liberty of their native land. The inferences of this symphonic cycle were obvious when it was composed in the years from 1874 to 1879, and they are as apropos today. Smetana, when he created those works, was tortured by the deafness which became almost absolute before he finished the series. But he was also in his strongest creative period, and aflame with the same emotions which possess his countrymen today.

It will be seen that patriotism can have a value, notwithstanding the open scorn or deprecation of this naive emotion by certain of our sophisticates. The coming program is not arranged in terms of mere propaganda, or music for an occasion. It is in greater part the expression in ways of inspired art of fundamental characteristics of a nation. Schumann remarked—and waggishly proved it by quoting fragments of the "Marseillaise" in one of the movements of his "Faschingschwank aus Wien," when the tune was forbidden in Vienna—that you can utter rebellion within the four walls of a symphony and the police be none the wiser. There are many compositions, however, such as "Finlandia," whose spirit is plainly revealed by title as well as emotional contents.

Works of grander dimensions and of the loftiest spirit, such as the Smetana cycle of which we have been speaking, also proclaim their intent on the title page as well as in the measures that follow. Then come those scores in which the fundamental emotion is apotheosized in terms of what is known as "absolute" music, such as the early Sibelius symphonies, which nevertheless are clearly in essense apostrophies to his people and nation, and war songs against the foe.

* * *

TO return to the Czech program, three of the compositions on it are now proscribed from performance in their own country. They are the works of Smetana, already mentioned, and the Second piano concerto of Boleslav Martinu, which will be played on this occasion for the first time in America. Martinu, a refugee, is now living in Paris. His position as a patriot has caused his music to be banned in Czecho-Slovakia. His concerto will be heard with much interest, for he is a composer of manifest talent with a strong smack of modernity who was first introduced here by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra when they played his symphonic poem, "Baguarre," in Boston, New York and other American cities.

Other Czech music of distinction and appositeness to the occasion will be Janacek's "Sinfonietta," and the second series, which has rarely been heard of late, of the Dvorak "Slavonic Dances."

The Janacek work was first performed in the United States by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky, March 4, 1927. It was then given without the twelve additional trumpets which are optional in the score. The "Sinfonietta" was also produced here by Otto Klemperer, with the inclusion of the twelve trumpets, at Philharmonic-Symphony concerts, Oct. 25 and 26, 1934. It is a work in not too ponderous a vein, full of life, and charged with that virility of address which characterized Janacek, a man advanced in years when he wrote this music. We can see him now, in Czecho-Slovakia's better days, stocky, vigorous of build, ruddy complexioned, laughing, living life to the full, and producing, almost to the time of his death several years ago, interesting music.

As for the Dvorak dances, the records of musical performance in this city are so many and varied that it would be hard to say how many times they have been heard here. But probably not many.

Smetana expressed the epic and Dvorak the lyric in the music of Czecho-Slovakia. This is a broad generalization, open at once to exceptions, as for example, the dramatic "Husitka" overture of Dvorak, in which he approaches Smetana's vein. On the whole, however, Dvorak was the man for the smaller forms and simpler expressions. When you hear "Vysehrad" you hear the bard smiting the lyre. When you hear the "Slavonic Dances," "Songs My Mother Taught Me," a hundred of the smaller piano pieces, you hear the truest Dvorak—this in spite of his larger symphonic works. The originators of this Czech concert can say, with pardonable pride, that it is not only a national occasion but a due observation of the significant artistic expression, through creations by various individuals and periods, of the Czech national genius.

This concert will be opened by Dr. Walter Damrosch, who will conduct the "Libussa" overture as an act of artistic as well as personal sponsorship of this occasion. The remainder of the program will be conducted by Herrman Adler, who will then make his American debut. He was born in Bohemia in 1899, and educated in Prague. He is a pupil of Viteslav Novak and Alexander Zemlinsky. Martinu's concerto will be introduced by the Czech pianist, Germaine Leroux.

121

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 21 1940

Czecho-Slovak Benefit Event On Wednesday

Damrosch Will Conduct Smetana Overture; Mme. Leroux in New Work

Walter Damrosch and Hermann Adler, a Czech conductor making his American debut, will direct the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra next Wednesday night in Carnegie Hall in a special program of Czecho-Slovak music given under the auspices of the American Friends of Czecho-Slovakia. Mr. Damrosch will open the program with the overture to Smetana's patriotic opera "Libuse." Germaine Leroux, who made her American debut in a Town Hall recital last month, will be the soloist in the first performance in this country of Bohuslav Martinu's second piano concerto. Mr. Adler will also conduct Smetana's "From Czech Meadows and Forests," the fourth symphonic poem in his cycle of six titled "My Country," a Sinfonietta by Leos Janacek and three Slavic Dances by Antonin Dvorak, the second from Series I and the eighth and seventh from Series II.

Martinu, who was born in 1890, studied with Josef Suk at the Prague Conservatory, and after five years with the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra as a violinist, went to Paris in 1923 for further study with Albert Roussel. He has been previously represented here in the orchestral field by two works, "La Bagarre," played by the Boston Symphony in 1927, and a concerto for string quartet and orchestra, played by the Philharmonic-Symphony in 1936 with the assistance of the Pro Arte Quartet. The second piano concerto is dedicated to Mme. Leroux. The composer is now living in Paris.

Music Unfamiliar Here

Both of the Smetana works on this program are seldom played here in the regular course of musical events. The overture to the patriotic opera "Libuse," whose heroine is a legendary Czech princess, was last performed in a concert of the Society of the Friends of Music on Oct. 26, 1930. "From Czech Meadows and Forests," whose title has also been translated as "From Bohemia's Fields and Groves," had its most recent performance in a Philadelphia Orchestra concert on Jan. 28, 1936. "Libuse" was composed in 1881, fifteen years after "The Bartered Bride." This opera, according to a recent pamphlet on Czech artistic life under the present protectorate by Mme. Leroux's husband, Milos Safranek, former Counselor in the Czecho-Slovak Foreign Office, has become "the symbol of national consecration."

It was last heard in Prague as the final program of a music festival last May, and has since been banned by the German occupying forces. The sinfonietta by Janacek (1854-1928), whose opera "Jenufa" was produced at the Metropolitan in 1924-'25, was first played here by the New York Symphony Orchestra in March, 1927, and revived by the Philharmonic-Symphony in October, 1934. Other major works of Janacek which have been heard here are the Festival Mass performed by the Friends of Music on Oct. 26, 1930, and "Taras Bulba," played by the Philharmonic in October, 1933.

The proceeds of the concert will be devoted to the Czecho-Slovak Relief Fund.

Conductor in Debut

Mr. Adler was born in 1899, and studied in Prague with Vitezslav and Alexander Zemlinsky. He conducted for several years in Brno, where he was associated with Janacek, and was conductor of the Bremen Opera from 1928 to 1932, and for the Kieff Philharmonic for the following five years.

Herbert Hoover, Governor and Mrs. Herbert H. Lehman, Mayor and Mrs. Fiorello H. LaGuardia, Dr. Alice Masaryk, Vladimir S. Hurban, Czecho-Slovak Minister to the United States, and Mrs. Hurban; Mr. and Mrs. James G. McDonald and Lieut. Gov. and Mrs. Charles Poletti are members of the honorary committee for this concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

JAN 21 1940

Left — THIS quintet Boston Symphony Orchestra players, consists of Gaston Elcus, violin; Paul Tortelier, cello; Jean LeFranc, viola Georges' Laurent, flute and Paul Bregor, piano. They will be heard under the auspices of Fairhaven - Mattapoisett Teachers' Association at 8:15 p. m. Jan. 24 in Fairhaven High School.

Crosby Photo.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 21, 19

Advertiser

RICHARD BURGIN, distinguished deputy-conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 21 1940

Boston Symphony Program

Conducted by [illegible] Burgin and with Josef Hofmann as soloist the Boston Sym[illegible] Orchestra will play the following program in the Metropolitan Theatre, Tuesday night, at 8:30 o'clock:

"Une Nuit sur le Mont Chauve" ("A Night on Bald Mountain"), Orchestral Fantasy .... Moussorgsky
Concerto for Pianoforte in A-minor, opus 54 .... Schumann
"Classical" Symphony, opus 10 . Prokofieff
  I. Allegro
  II. Larghetto
  III. Gavotte.
  IV. Finale
"Don Juan," Symphonic Poem (After Lenau) .... Strauss
"Ouverture Joyeuse" .... Poot

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 21 1940

Beethoven Association Holds Dinner for Dr. Koussevitzky

The Beethoven Association will hold a dinner in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Saturday, Feb. 17, at the Hotel Brevoort, as a testimonial of his recognition of American music. Deems Taylor will be the master of ceremonies, and Dorothy Maynor, soprano; Caspar Reardon, swing harpist, and Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, will be heard in the musical program.

A concert of South American music, with Joaquin Nin-Culmell, Cuban pianist, and Elsie Houston, Brazilian soprano, as the artists, will be held for members of the association tomorrow in its clubhouse, 30 West Fifty-sixth Street. The association is also holding a series of monthly luncheons, with prominent musicians as guest speakers.

Harold Wolff

C.S.M.

Richard Burgin

Jan 23

Assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will direct the concerts of tonight in the Metropolitan Theater, Providence, and of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 21 1940

Out of Town

With Serge Koussevitzky on vacation, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be[illegible] concertmaster and associate conductor, Richard Burgin, in its home concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Josef Hofmann will play the Sch[illegible]certo. The other numbers are Marcel Poot's "Overture Joyeuse" and Dvorck's second symphony.

Hugo Kortschak will conduct the season's fourth concert of the New Haven Symphony Orchestra tomorrow night in Woolsey Hall, Yale University, with Mabel Deegan as soloist in Sibelius's violin concerto. Sibelius and Finland will be honored on the same evening by the Scranton (Pa.) Philharmonic Orchestra under George Sebastian in a program including the second symphony and "Finlandia."

Nathan Milstein will make three appearances with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under Frederick Stock's direction this week, playing the Dvorak violin concerto Tuesday night and the Tchaikovsky concerto on Thursday night and Friday afternoon. In Cleveland, Artur Rodzinski will conduct a French program next Thursday and Saturday nights, including a ballet suite of Lully's music, Debussy's "Clair de Lune," the Franck symphony, Roussel's suite in F and Ravel's "La Valse."

Carlos Chavez, Mexican conductor and [illegible]ill be the guest leader of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra next Friday and Saturday, offering Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture and fourth symphony, Debussy's "La Mer" and excerpts from de Falla's "Three Cornered Hat." More than thirty-five American works have been entered in this orchestra's $1,000 prize competition. The judging of the entries will begin early in February by a jury composed of Vladimir Golschmann, the St. Louis Symphony's regular cond[illegible] and Eugene Goossens.

Joseph Szigeti will appear as soloist tomorrow night in the season's second concert of the University of Miami Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Arnold Volpe, and Jascha Heifetz is appearing today and tomorrow with the Dallas Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Jacques Si[illegible]. Both violinists will [illegible]hoven concerto.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 22 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JAN 22 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Richard Burgin conducting, will give a concert in Metropolitan Theatre tomorrow night. Josef Hofmann, pianist, will be soloist.

The program begins with Moussorgsky's curious and brilliant tone-poem, "A Night on Bald Mountain." Says a note on the score: "Subterranean sounds of unearthly voices; appearance of the spirits of darkness, followed by that of the god Chernobog; Chernobog's glorification and the Black Mass; the revels; at the height of the orgies there is heard from afar the bell of the little church which causes the spirits to disperse; dawn."

Mr. Hofmann will be soloist in the Schumann concerto in A minor. It is in three movements, allegro, intermezzo-andantino grazioso, and allegro vivace. Originally the first movement was a separate piece, and not a part of the concerto. It was called "Phantasie in A minor." Schumann wrote it in 1841. The two other movements were written four years later. The concerto demands superlative technique in the pianist.

A small symphony, Prokofieff's "Classical," is to be heard. We are informed that "the composer's idea in writing this work was to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores."

Strauss's early tone poem "Don Juan," which had Nikolaus Lenau's poem for inspiration, will be performed. Familiar now on the orchestra's programs, it was given its first American performance by the Boston Symphony in 1891. It is presumed to relate, more or less specifically, the Don's pursuits and conquests, his disillusionment and boredom, and his death.

An overture by the contemporary Belgian composer Marcel Post will receive its first New England performance. It appeared recently on a program in which Desire Defauw conducted the NBC Symphony.

121

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 21 1940

Czecho-Slovak Benefit Event On Wednesday

Damrosch Will Conduct Smetana Overture; Mme. Leroux in New Work

Walter Damrosch and Hermann Adler, a Czech conductor making his American debut, will direct the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra next Wednesday night in Carnegie Hall in a special program of Czecho-Slovak music given under the auspices of the American Friends of Czecho-Slovakia. Mr. Damrosch will open the program with the overture to Smetana's patriotic opera "Libuse." Germaine Leroux, who made her American debut in a Town Hall recital last month, will be the soloist in the first performance in this country of Bohuslav Martinu's second piano concerto. Mr. Adler will also conduct Smetana's "From Czech Meadows and Forests," the fourth symphonic poem in his cycle of six titled "My Country," a Sinfonietta by Leos Janacek and three Slavic Dances by Antonin Dvorak, the second from Series I and the eighth and seventh from Series II.

Martinu, who was born in 1890, studied with Josef Suk at the Prague Conservatory, and after five years with the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra as a violinist, went to Paris in 1923 for further study with Albert Roussel. He has been previously represented here in the orchestral field by two works, "La Bagarre," played by the Boston Symphony in 1927, and a concerto for string quartet and orchestra, played by the Philharmonic-Symphony in 1936 with the assistance of the Pro Arte Quartet. The second piano concerto is dedicated to Mme. Leroux. The composer is now living in Paris.

Music Unfamiliar Here

Both of the Smetana works on this program are seldom played here in the regular course of musical events. The overture to the patriotic opera "Libuse," whose heroine is a legendary Czech princess, was last performed in a concert of the Society of the Friends of Music on Oct. 26, 1930. "From Czech Meadows and Forests," whose title has also been translated as "From Bohemia's Fields and Groves," had its most recent performance in a Philadelphia Orchestra concert on Jan. 28, 1936. "Libuse" was composed in 1881, fifteen years after "The Bartered Bride." This opera, according to a recent pamphlet on Czech artistic life under the present protectorate by Mme. Leroux's husband, Milos Safranek, former Counselor in the Czecho-Slovak Foreign Office, has become "the symbol of national consecration."

It was last heard in Prague as the final program of a music festival last May, and has since been banned by the German occupying forces. The sinfonietta by Janacek (1854-1928), whose opera "Jenufa" was produced at the Metropolitan in 1924-'25, was first played here by the New York Symphony Orchestra in March, 1927, and revived by the Philharmonic-Symphony in October, 1934. Other major works of Janacek which have been heard here are the Festival Mass performed by the Friends of Music on Oct. 26, 1930, and "Taras Bulba," played by the Philharmonic in October, 1933.

The proceeds of the concert will be devoted to the Czecho-Slovak Relief Fund.

Conductor in Debut

Mr. Adler was born in 1899, and studied in Prague with Vitezslav and Alexander Zemlinsky. He conducted for several years in Brno, where he was associated with Janacek, and was conductor of the Bremen Opera from 1928 to 1932, and for the Kieff Philharmonic for the following five years.

Herbert Hoover, Governor and Mrs. Herbert H. Lehman, Mayor and Mrs. Fiorello H. LaGuardia, Dr. Alice Masaryk, Vladimir S. Hurban, Czecho-Slovak Minister to the United States, and Mrs. Hurban; Mr. and Mrs. James G. McDonald and Lieut. Gov. and Mrs. Charles Poletti are members of the honorary committee for this concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

JAN 21 1940

Left — THIS quintet Boston Symphony Orchestra players, consists of Gaston Elcus, violin; Paul Tortelier, cello; Jean LeFranc, viola; Georges Laurent, flute and Paul Bregor, piano. They will be heard under the auspices of Fairhaven - Mattapoisett Teachers' Association at 8:15 p. m. Jan. 24 in Fairhaven High School.

Crosby Photo.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 21. 19

RICHARD BURGIN, distinguished deputy-conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 21 1940

Boston Symphony Program

Conducted by Richard Burgin and with Josef Hofmann as soloist the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play the following program in the Metropolitan Theatre, Tuesday night, at 8:30 o'clock:

"Une Nuit sur le Mont Chauve" ("A Night on Bald Mountain"), Orchestral Fantasy .... Moussorgsky
Concerto for Pianoforte in A-minor, opus 54 .... Schumann
"Classical" Symphony, opus 10 . Prokofieff
I. Allegro
II. Larghetto
III. Gavotte.
IV. Finale
"Don Juan," Symphonic Poem (After Lenau) .... Strauss
"Ouverture Joyeuse" .... Poot

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 21 1940

Beethoven Association Holds Dinner for Dr. Koussevitzky

The Beethoven Association will hold a dinner in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Saturday, Feb. 17, at the Hotel Brevoort, as a testimonial of his recognition of American music. Deems Taylor will be the master of ceremonies, and Dorothy Maynor, soprano; Caspar Reardon, swing harpist, and Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, will be heard in the musical program.

A concert of South American music, with Joaquin Nin-Culmell, Cuban pianist, and Elsie Houston, Brazilian soprano, as the artists, will be held for members of the association tomorrow in its clubhouse, 30 West Fifty-sixth Street. The association is also holding a series of monthly luncheons, with prominent musicians as guest speakers.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Harold Wolff

C.S.M.

Richard Burgin

Jan 23

Assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will direct the concerts of tonight in the Metropolitan Theater, Providence, and of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 21 1940

Out of Town

With Serge Koussevitzky on vacation, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be [illegible] concertmaster and associate conductor, Richard Burgin, in its home concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Josef Hofmann will play the Schu[illegible]certo. The other numbers are Marcel Poot's "Overture Joyeuse" and Dvorck's second symphony.

Hugo Kortschak will conduct the season's fourth concert of the New Haven Symphony Orchestra tomorrow night in Woolsey Hall, Yale University, with Mabel Deegan as soloist in Sibelius's violin concerto. Sibelius and Finland will be honored on the same evening by the Scranton (Pa.) Philharmonic Orchestra under George Sebastian in a program including the second symphony and "Finlandia."

Nathan Milstein will make three appearances with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under Frederick Stock's direction this week, playing the Dvorak violin concerto Tuesday night and the Tchaikovsky concerto on Thursday night and Friday afternoon. In Cleveland, Artur Rodzinski will conduct a French program next Thursday and Saturday nights, including a ballet suite of Lully's music, Debussy's "Clair de Lune," the Franck symphony, Roussel's suite in F and Ravel's "La Valse."

Carlos Chavez, Mexican conductor a[illegible]ill be the guest leader of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra next Friday and Saturday, offering Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture and fourth symphony, Debussy's "La Mer" and excerpts from de Falla's "Three Cornered Hat." More than thirty-five American works have been entered in this orchestra's $1,000 prize competition. The judging of the entries will begin early in February by a jury composed of Vladimir Golschmann, the St. Louis Symphony's regular cond[illegible] and Eugene Goossens.

Joseph Szigeti will appear as soloist tomorrow night in the season's second concert of the University of Miami Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Arnold Volpe, and Jascha Heifetz is appearing today and tomorrow with the Dallas Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Jacques Singer. Both violinists will [illegible] Beethoven concerto.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 22 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JAN 22 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Richard Burgin conducting, will give a concert in Metropolitan Theatre tomorrow night. Josef Hofmann, pianist, will be soloist.

The program begins with Moussorgsky's curious and brilliant tone-poem, "A Night on Bald Mountain." Says a note on the score: "Subterranean sounds of unearthly voices; appearance of the spirits of darkness, followed by that of the god Chernobog; Chernobog's glorification and the Black Mass; the revels; at the height of the orgies there is heard from afar the bell of the little church which causes the spirits to disperse; dawn."

Mr. Hofmann will be soloist in the Schumann concerto in A minor. It is in three movements, allegro, intermezzo-andantino grazioso, and allegro vivace. Originally the first movement was a separate piece, and not a part of the concerto. It was called "Phantasie in A minor." Schumann wrote it in 1841. The two other movements were written four years later. The concerto demands superlative technique in the pianist.

A small symphony, Prokofieff's "Classical," is to be heard. We are informed that "the composer's idea in writing this work was to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores."

Strauss's early tone poem "Don Juan," which had Nikolaus Lenau's poem for inspiration, will be performed. Familiar now on the orchestra's programs, it was given its first American performance by the Boston Symphony in 1891. It is presumed to relate, more or less specifically, the Don's pursuits and conquests, his disillusionment and boredom, and his death.

An overture by the contemporary Belgian composer Marcel Post will receive its first New England performance. It appeared recently on a program in which Desire Defauw conducted the NBC Symphony.

172

THE BOSTON HERALD, SUNDAY, JANUARY 21, 1940

FINLANDIA—Tauno Hannikainen, Finnish conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra a week from Friday and Saturday, with his wife Arvida, as they told of war experiences at home.

Tauno Hannikainen Here on Concert Tour Hears Son Is Called to Arms in Finland

Conductor and Wife Praise U. S. Generosity

A four-word cable was waiting for Tauno Hannikainen, noted Finnish conductor, and his wife, Arvida, a former opera star, when they arrived in Boston yesterday for a two-month special concert tour of this country.

"He is soldier now," the cable read and it meant to them that their only son, 19, had been called up for active duty against the Russians.

Before April, Hannikainen expects to be at the front with his son, for he is of the "class of 1896," and the "class of 99 was called up only a few days ago.

So it was that they spoke as parents of a boy at the front and as citizens of an aroused nation rather than as musicians. They spoke first of the gratitude of their fellow - countrymen toward the United States.

"We bless the names of Hoover and Roosevelt," she said, "In Helsinki, when something about your country is heard, we say: 'Ah, God, that is America.' Even more than the money and the supplies we feel for the sympathy you have shown toward us."

Seated in the Back Bay apartment of Paul Cherkassky, long time violinist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the blonde, slightly-built conductor told how they had been greeted with cries of "Viva la Finlandia" during their trip through Italy to Naples, where they embarked on the Vulcania.

"Everywhere in Italy," added Mrs. Hannikainen, "when they learned we were from Finland they treated us as if we were royalty. In Germany, not a line about Finland in any of the papers."

Even more significant was the whispered word of friendship given them by a state employe during their journey through Germany. Officially, they said, they were treated politely and with every effort to speed them on their way. They were not allowed to bring any Swedish or Finnish papers across the border.

The coffee on the German train was almost undrinkable," he said.

SAW FIRST BOMBING

Both were in Helsinki when the first bombs fell on Nov. 30. He was in a barber shop, and with the other patrons ran to the street "in amazement," for they both stressed that the first attack came during a lull when negotiations with Russia seemed on a more friendly basis than for weeks.

"The children had been brought back from the country and were in school," she explained. "But our children are wonderful. They sit quietly for two, three, four hours in a bomb shelter.

"There was a sad incident of childhood on the boat we took to Sweden on the way over. A mother was dressing her young son. I heard him say: 'Do we go to the bomb shelter again, mama? Thank God, he was only being dressed then for breakfast. The Russians have bombed women and children as they were walking on open roads leading from the cities to the country.

"If the Russians should ever come into Finland they would find a dead country. Forests burned, cities destroyed and our dead bodies.

"I CAN SHOOT"

"I wish I were back there now. I can shoot, too, you know."

The father said simply: "When my work for Finland in this country is finished I will go back home at once. But now I would like to say that Finland will win, but we will win only if everybody helps. We are fighting a battle for the world, and we believe everybody will help us."

Hannikainen, conductor of the Turku Symphony Orchestra, is not unfamiliar to Boston music audiences, for two years ago he led the "Pops" in the second symphony of Sibelius. A week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, he will be the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Other concerts have not yet been planned, but it is believed that choral societies from Massachusetts Finnish centers may participate in a great benefit festival under his leadership.

Post
Jan 21

FINNISH LEADER TO CONDUCT BOSTON SYMPHONY

NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

HAVING performed yeoman service in acquainting the youth of this community with some of the great symphonies, overtures, tone poems, etc., Wheeler Beckett now proposes to initiate them into the mysteries of chamber music. On Wednesday afternoon at Jordan Hall there will begin a new Youth Chamber Music series at which Mr. Beckett will officiate as commentator and, on the second programme, as conductor of a small ensemble. Unlike the orchestral concerts, those of this new series of three Wednesday matinees will be available for adults as well as youngsters.

* * * *

It is a wonder that some enterprising transcriber has not orchestrated the whole of Schumann's Quintet (the march-like second movement has, indeed, been so arranged), but Arnold Schoenberg has made an orchestral version of Brahms' Quartet for Piano and Strings in G minor, Opus 25, and this synthetic symphony will receive its first Boston performance at the Symphony Concerts of this week which Richard Burgin will conduct. A notable feature of this pair of concerts will be the appearance as soloist of Joseph Hofmann, who has not played with our orchestra for many years. He will be heard in the Piano Concerto of Schumann, a work with which his name was often identified in days gone by. An "Ouverture Joyeuse" by the Belgian composer, Marcel Poot, stands at the head of Mr. Burgin's list.

* * * *

The Orchestra concert master and assistant conductor will also direct the concerts of Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 29 and 30, at which Albert Spalding will appear as soloist in the Violin Concerto of Brahms. Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, Strauss' "Don Juan" and a number entitled "Batuque" by the Brazilian composer, Oscar Fernandez, make the rest of Mr. Burgin's second programme, while Dr. Koussevitzky continues on vacation, the next pair of "regular" concerts will be conducted by the Finnish Tauno Hannikinen, who arrived in Boston direct from his war-torn native country last Thursday evening.

Possibly there are some among the subscribers of the Symphony Concerts who regret that Dr. Koussevitzky does not any longer preside over each and every one of them. But there is a great deal to be said in favor of guest conductors, particularly when the system provides us with so capable a leader as Nicolai Malko, who directed the concerts of last week. As for Mr. Hannikinen, he has already proved his worth through his conducting of Sibelius' Second Symphony as a Pop Concert two or three seasons ago. And aside from the fact that we have been enabled to hear as guest conductors such men as Sir Thomas Beecham, Sir Henry Wood, Sir Adrian Boult, Dimitri Mitropoulos, Georges Enesco and, now, Nicolai Malko, with their interestingly diverse approaches to the problems of interpretation and orchestral leadership, we are almost certain to hear from these visitors some works which would otherwise escape us. Wide as has been the range of Dr. Koussevitzky's choice, no one man, even in 16 seasons, may be expected to play everything that is worth the playing. And so while Dr. Koussevitzky is enjoying a well earned rest, the public of the Symphony Concert is also enjoying a species of recreation.

* * *

TELL OF BOMBINGS

Globe Jan 21

FINNISH CONDUCTOR AND WIFE
Tauno Hannikainen, conductor of the Turku, Finland, Orchestra, and his wife, Arvida, a Finnish opera singer.

Finn Here to Conduct Boston Symphony Describes Air Raids

By EDWARD and SAIMA LAYCOCK

Tauno Hannikainen, a distinguished musician who left Finland three weeks ago with his wife, Arvida, an opera singer, told Globe interviewers last night that the first bomb dropped on Heisinki by Soviet airmen struck the Soviet Embassy and sent its occupants fleeing to Finnish hotels.

Mr. Hannikainen came to Boston to conduct the Symphony Orchestra next week and will return to Finland. "I have merely exchanged my gun for my baton for the time being," he said.

His conversation was a quiet but moving recital of bravery and horror. "That first bomb," he remarked, "was a portent of the disaster that has happened to the Soviet invasion of Finland.

C.M.S. Jan 29

Tauno Hannikainen

Finnish conductor now in the United States. He will direct the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 2 and 3.

TON SUNDAY POST, JANUARY 21, 1940

RED FLIERS URGE FINNS HOLD OUT

Revolution Coming Soon in Russia, Predict Pamphlets Dropped Over Finland---One Received Here

FINNISH GUEST CONDUCTOR AND WIFE

Tauno Hannkainen and his wife are shown as they arrived in Boston. He will conduct the Boston Symphony on an arrangement made before the war started.

Finland's death struggle with Russia was brought into sharp focus in Boston last night when an eminent Finnish conductor, here to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his wife heard their 19-year-old son had just been called to arms in the homeland, and their hosts soon afterward got news from a daughter now living in Helsinki.

The daughter, Miss Irene Cherkassky, 18, graduate of Girls' Latin School, who is a movie actress in the Finnish capital, told her parents in a letter the astounding information that Russian planes had just dropped pamphlets urging the Finns to hold out and a revolution would ensue in Russia before long.

THREE WORDS

Tauno Hannikainen, famous Finnish musician, and his wife, Arvida, brought the letter when they arrived to stay as guests at the home of the girl's father, Paul Cherkassky, symphony player, and her mother, Mrs. Marjorie Church Cherkassky, prominent piano soloist. The intimate touch with Finland saddened the household at 26 Evansway, in the Fenway.

Tersely and in the briefest sort of language, the visiting couple were told in a cablegram: "Well. Ylermi soldier." Ylermi, the father explained with his weeping wife by his side, is the name of his son. The mother, an operatic star in her own right, was anguish stricken.

"Try to stand a month more and a revolution will take place in Russia," was the quotation from a pamphlet contained in the letter of the daughter to her parents. Of Finnish birth, she completed her schooling in Boston and two years ago returned to Helsinki for a career in the films, Mr. Cherkassky said.

The message from the skies, which, if true, will change the course of the war, was dropped by a Russian plane, the daughter wrote. She also described the daily bombings going on in the capital, but she assured her parents she was safe and unafraid.

Faces It All Calmly

Philosophically, she told her father and mother that while there was danger of death from every bombing raid, she intended to face her destiny. She said that if it was her destiny to die in Helsinki the prospect was being faced calmly by her.

Eye-witness description of the war's outbreak in Helsinki were given in vivid phrases by Mr. Hannikainen, who was conducting a rehearsal of the Helsinki Symphony Orchestra Nov. 30, the fatal day in Finland's history. He told of astounding order maintained by the population in the surprise attack that opened the hostilities.

"The bombers roared over and soon the explosives were smashing into bits buildings and homes," he said. At least 15 structures were ruined in that first raid, he estimated. Unable to keep his musical engagement in Helsinki, he returned to his home city, Turku, which is also under constant bombardment.

300 Planes a Day

"Every day from 300 to 500 Russian bombers strike at the Finnish city and towns with all their destructive force," Mr. Hannikainen asserted. With his wife, he left Finland for the United States to fulfill an engagement, made before the war, to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Bidding their only son farewell, not knowing at the time that the lad would be called into the service during their absence, they left Dec. 30, traveling to Sweden and thence overland by train through Germany to Italy, where they embarked on a boat Jan. 6 for New York. They noted with gratification in Italy that the Italians were sympathetic to the cause.

"Viva Finlandia," the couple were cheered at a station when Italians learned they were from Finland, according to Mrs. Hannikainen. The mother of the boy who is probably in the thick of the fight by now recovered her composure during the interview.

"Believe me," she asked earnestly, "the Finnish people appreciate the sympathy of the United States far more than money, regardless how badly the Finnish composer, declared Finland is in dire need of planes. "Finnish soldiers are sure they will win," he said. "They are determined that Russia will advance only over the corpses of all Finland. We Finns will destroy everything before allowing the Russians to take over the country."

He had little comment to make about the possibility of a revolution in Russia, as was hinted in the letter from Miss Chercassky. "We know the Russian workers do not want this war," he stated. "There is a strong possibility of an attempted overthrow of the Red government, but the Finns are not sitting quietly and hoping for this.

He will remain in the country for about two months and later, after conducting the Boston Symphony, will perhaps give concerts. He is also a violin and piano virtuoso. Asked if he had seen Sibelius, before leaving for his tour, he said the whereabouts of his friends was being kept a secret.

"Sibelius is still alive and well in a country retreat," he said. "The composer fled from Helsinki for the retreat in response to requests from the government and his friends."

ADVERTISER —JANUARY 21, 1940

Finns Can Win, With Help, Noted Musician Says Here

Tauno Hannikainen Comes to Direct Symphony

By LEO GAFFNEY

"If the Russians ever regain Finland they will find a dead, flat country . . . What they do not destroy we will destroy . . . as we have already destroyed in the Karelian Isthmus."

Just arrived in Boston, where he will soon be guest-conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tauno Hannikainen, distinguished Finnish musician, yesterday spoke of the war and the unanimous determination of his people to win it—"with help."

WAITING FOR HELP

"We are fighting a war for the whole world. We are defending everything. We are waiting for help."

"Specifically, what sort of help, Mr. Hannikainen?"

"Planes, chiefly," he said.

Slightly above average height, with burnished blond hair, the fine strong hands of a virtuoso pianist, the square shoulders and deep chest common to most men of his race, Hannikainen is 44.

With Mrs. Hannikainen—a Norse beauty, if ever there was one—he is visiting with Mr. and Mrs. Paul Cherkassky, the latter one of the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Fenway.

The doorbell rang.

"Your baggage, Tauno," guessed Mr. Cherkassky, hopefully.

It was a cablegram. Three cryptic words from the Hannikainen's 19-year-old son, Ylerbi, their only child. It read:

"WELL YLERBI SOLDIER."

It meant that Ylerbi was well, but that the blue-eyed high school boy was off on a mission of death in the Arctic snows.

Mother and father looked at the poor three words. His jaw muscles tensed. He said nothing. And though the maternal bosom heaved, the eyes reddened and all the blood drained from her face, the mother said nothing. It was an awkward moment for anybody else in that room.

Might as well try and divert their minds with questions, even though it were a torture to answer, thought this reporter.

". . . and what, Mr. Hannikainen, would you say of the spirit of your people at home? How does the average man take this war?" was asked.

ANSWERED WITH MUSIC

Maybe he couldn't speak then . . . vocally. But, in a language more eloquent than words, he answered us.

He went over to the grand piano in the bay window, sat down and suddenly thundered the "Porilaisten" marching song of prodigious vigor.

"Like that," he said simply as the concluding chord crashed.

Then we knew.

The Bolsheviks will win nothing in Finland.

Actual warfare descended on Helsinki like a thunderclap on November, 30, Thanksgiving Day here.

If you remember, the first threats of invasion had passed. Evacuated children had been returned. Schools reopened and all was quite serene under the Molotoff promise of, "Russia would always recognize the independence of Finland."

DEATH CRASHES MUSIC

At nine o'clock that morning Hannikainen was rehearsing the Helsinki Symphony Orchestra. At ninetwenty, nine Russian planes droned over the Conservatory.

Bombs blasted 15 good buildings; 100 were killed outright, while the orchestra played Cesar Franck's celestial D minor symphony, ineffable song of faith and peace!

At 2:45 again, that afternoon, more bombs, more death—and it is typical of Muscovite marksmanship that the Russian legation itself was smashed!

Helsinki had been set upon by an enemy with about as much sense of fair play as a band of Indians out to massacre. Helsinki got busy. Citizens had been organized. They reassembled.

Under daily fire from the skies, women and children were once more evacuated. Because all mechanical transportation was at once placed at the disposal of the military, evacuees left the city on foot.

Mrs. Hannikainen says that wherever the queues of fleeing people were discovered in open country they were raked by the guns of low-flying planes.

ALL CONSCRIPTED

Hospitals, in which she worked as a nurse, painted out the huge red crosses on their roofs. They had furnished too good a target!

All from 16 to 60 in Finland—this includes women—are conscripted. Mr. and Mrs. Hannikainen have their posts, too, but are here by special permission of the authorities to fulfil the Boston Symphony engagement made last year. Hannikainen will also conduct some benefit concerts in this country, then return to duty in about two months.

Photo by Sunday Advertiser

TAUNA HANNIKAINEN, director of Helsinki Orchestra, and his wife, just after they received cablegram from their son saying he had gone to war against Russia. Photo was taken at 26 Evans way, Fenway, yesterday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
NEWS
JAN 22 1940

Dr. Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has the distinction of producing more works by American composers than has any other conductor of an American major orchestra.

Trans, Jan 24

Music Notes

The Symphony has been changed for the concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 26 and 27. Richard Burgin, who is conducting, will present the Third Symphony of Brahms in F. major, instead of the Second Symphony of Dvorak, as announced. The first part of the program remains unchanged: Marcel Peet's "Ouverture Joyeuse," and the Piano Concerto of Schumann, with Josef Hofmann as soloist.

Mendelssohn's "Elijah" will be presented by 90 members of the Milton Town Chorus on Thursday evening, Feb. 4, at the Milton Woman's Clubhouse, for the benefit of the Milton Hospital. The soloists will be Anna Urqhuart, soprano, Georgina Dwyer, soprano, Katherine Berberian, contralto, Alanson Sturgis, tenor, Franklin Field, baritone. The performance will be conducted by Llewellen Crossman.

124

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
JAN 24 1940

Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra Presents Third Concert with Richard Burgin Conducting. — Josef Hofmann Heard as Soloist in Schumann's Concerto in A Minor, Opus 54.

By G. Y. Loveridge

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the third of its season's five concerts in Metropolitan Theatre last night. Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor, conducted, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky being on a short vacation.

A program selected from hither and yon achieved a fortunate balance, and the performance was generally excellent. There is sometimes a feeling that when Dr. K is away the men won't play as diligently as they are wont to do, but on this occasion they gave Mr. Burgin minute co-operation.

Josef Hofmann, mighty pianist, was soloist, in the Schumann concerto in A minor, Op. 54. For brilliance of execution his work was unsurpassable. His sonorous tone competes successfully with the full orchestra; his scales, even at the most intemperate velocities, are clear and even; his attention to ornaments and other details attests the master hand; his ease and precision of delivery astound every listener. We are one who do not find that in his playing the spirit keeps pace with the sound (to us, a fault of first significance), but we doff our chapeau, such as it is, to the superb command that he exercises over the tools of his art. After more than 50 years of concertizing, his powers seem undiminished.

Mr. Burgin provided a good collaboration, although frequently Mr. Hofmann, rather than his associate, appeared to be running the show. The soloist was at his best in the last movement, when the piano gushed forth such unclouded thunders and darting lights as few could arouse. Mr. Hofmann was summoned from the wings half a dozen times by the enthusiasm of the audience. Even after the lights had gone on to indicate intermission he had to return once more.

Moussorgsky's gaudy nightmare, "A Night on Bald Mountain," served to warm up both orchestra and audience. After intermission, there was a dashing display of Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony." Except in the gavotte—where, for one of the few times we remember, the strings weren't always speaking in a smooth voice—the performance glittered. In the finale, Mr. Burgin permitted the orchestra virtually to conduct itself, which it did with singularly bright effect.

Strauss's "Don Juan" was read with lusty emphasis. Horns and woodwinds distinguished themselves, although every choir joined splendidly to effect the wild orchestral frenzy that can be made to leap from the German master's little black notes.

The evening ended with a try at a Latin-American dance, "Batuque," by Fernandez. The orchestra was mainly noisy. It takes a hot band to put over this sort of thing; symphony players just don't seem to have the rhythmic urge.

The program contained another "urgent request" that the customers refrain from smoking at the rear of the auditorium. However, smoke-production was at a pre-depression level. Sometimes we deplore this situation. Then again we think that probably if people weren't smoking they would be cutting their initials in the pews, and perhaps it is all for the best.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 26 1940

GEORGE W. STEWART

Trombonist of Original Boston Symphony Orchestra Dies

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Jan. 25—George W. Stewart, a leader in music in Boston for sixty years until he was retired in 1934 by illness, died today at his home in Brighton. His age was 89.

The Stewart Library of Music, which he organized, is an important factor in the musical world. He was a trombonist of the original Boston Symphony Orchestra and traveled extensively on tours throughout the nation.

As manager of the Germania Band, and as owner-manager of his own touring Boston Festival Orchestra and of the Boston band which played Summer concerts, he was well known throughout the Eastern States. He was the sole music commissioner at the 1904 St. Louis World's Fair and at the 1915 San Francisco World Fair and went to Europe to bring famous bands here for those events.

A bachelor, he is survived by a sister, Miss Rose Stewart of Brighton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
JAN 26 1940

Prominent Hub Musician, George W. Stewart, Dies

BOSTON, Jan. 26 (AP)—Funeral services will be here Saturday for George W. Stewart, 89, nationally known musician and a member of the original Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died yesterday at his home.

A baritone and trombone player, he gained national prominence as music commissioner of two World's Fairs, St. Louis in 1904 and San Francisco in 1915.

In those posts he travelled to Europe and arranged for the appearances of Paderewski, Saint-Saens and other musicians.

He organized many bands and orchestras, one of the most widely known of which was the Boston Festival Orchestra which appeared at nearly every major music festival in the East for a quarter of a century.

He is survived by a sister, Miss Rose Stewart, with whom he made his home. Burial will be in Cambridge Cemetery, New York.

Hofmann Symphony Soloist

C.S.M. Jan 27

The Arts in Boston

In the absence of Dr. Koussevitzky, who is on his midwinter vacation, Richard Burgin, assistant conductor, is presiding over the Boston Symphony concerts of this week. In Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, he directed a program which listed the "Ouverture Joyeuse" of Marcel Poot, Schumann's Piano Concerto, and Brahms' Third Symphony. Josef Hofman was the soloist. The Poot item was played for the first time at these concerts.

Marcel Poot is a young Belgian composer, a member of a group of seven calling themselves the "Synthetists," after the style of the one-time French "Six." Mr. Poot had been represented previously on the programs of the Boston orchestra only by his Symphony, which was a lively piece. So is this overture, a brief, melodious work, easy to listen to, presenting no problems, which carries out pleasantly the suggestion in the name he and his associates have chosen for themselves.

The appearance of Mr. Hofmann in the Schumann had a special historical interest. He played the same work with the orchestra 27 years ago when Dr. Muck was its director. It was reported that his performance then did not meet with the approval of the conductor, who complained that in the last movement the pianist ran away with the orchestra.

Mr. Burgin probably will make no such complaint, since he and the orchestra seemed to be in no disagreement with the soloist. Mr. Hofmann brought to the performance his well-known virtuosity and brilliance of style, and he received an ovation at the close.

Nevertheless, this composition is not exactly Mr. Hofmann's piece of pie. He took great care in the exposition of its structure and in the revelation of its details, using rubato freely and employing a wide dynamic range, but he failed to give full value to its lyricism, treating it rather as a bravura vehicle, which it is not. Mr. Burgin secured an accompaniment which matched the pianist's performance in virtuosity and excelled it in lyrical quality.

L. A. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY, N. Y.
Knickerbocker News
JAN 26 1940

STEWART, MUSICIAN, BURIED TOMORROW

Boston —(AP)— Funeral services will be tomorrow for George W. Stewart, 89, nationally known musician and a member of the original Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died yesterday at his home.

A baritone and trombone player, Stewart gained national prominence as music commissioner of two world's fairs, St. Louis in 1904 and San Francisco in 1915.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW ORLEANS, LA.
STATES
JAN 26 1940

GREAT MUSICIAN DIES

(The Associated Press)

Boston Jan. 26.—Funeral services will be held tomorrow for George W. Stewart, 89 years old, nationally known musician and a member of the original Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died yesterday at his home.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
TIMES TRIBUNE
JAN 26 1940

Member of Boston's First Symphony Dies

Boston, Jan. 26.—(AP)—Funeral services will be held tomorrow for George W. Stewart, 89, nationally known musician and a member of the original Boston Symphony orchestra, who died yesterday at his home.

A baritone and trombone player, Stewart gained national prominence as music commissioner of two world's fairs, St. Louis in 1904 and San Francisco in 1915.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
JAN 27 1940

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Richard Burgin is conductor, and Josef Hofmann the soloist, at the Boston Symphony concerts this week. The program begins with the first local performances of the "Joyous Overture" by Marcel Poot; continues with Schumann's A minor Concerto, Mr. Hofmann at the piano, and ends with the Third Symphony of Brahms.

Not for 18 years, until yesterday afternoon, had Mr. Hofmann appeared with this orchestra at Symphony Hall. As was to be expected, the welcome he received from the Friday audience was warming.

To an excellent accompaniment by Mr. Burgin and the orchestra, Mr. Hofmann played the Schumann Concerto in characteristic vein. There were the familiar round tone, neither large nor small; the rippling arpeggios and scale passages turned out with Hofmannesque smoothness and agility; the equally familiar wrong notes and suggestion of harshness when the tempo was rapid and the chords loud and heavy.

Mr. Hofmann, splendid pianist though he is, probably is not of the temperament to cut loose in the unconstrained romantic fashion that Schumann seems to demand. The Hofmann way with this composer is more likely to be dignified at the expense of ardor. Hence his treatment of the Concerto was agreeable, interesting, but not at all moving.

Marcel Poot is a Belgian composer, not quite 40, who may be remembered for the pleasant Symphony that Mr. Burgin introduced here two years ago last November. It may also be recalled that his Symphony was less dissonant, harmonically, than the music of most of his generation. His "Joyous Overture" is just that, a tonal cocktail, and nothing more.

The impudent sweep of his chattering woodwinds, the gentle spiciness of his harmony, and his brevity suggest that Rossini might have written in much the same idiom had he been born a century later.

Brahms' Third Symphony is on the program as the result of two alterations that cast out, first, Schoenberg's transcription of a Brahms Quartet, and secondly, the Dvorak Second Symphony.

Like the Concerto—and presumably the Overture—the F major Symphony was given a sound, honest, musicianly reading; one wherein details were adjusted to the whole.

There was no attempt at virtuosity; in fact, one could note instances where the strings were not brought out enough, and where the tempo was a bit deliberate. Mr. Burgin's reading did not take off into the empyrean, but it was very satisfying.

The program will be repeated tonight. Next week Tauno Hannikainen, the Finnish musician, will be guest conductor. C. W. D.

HOFMANN PLAYS WITH SYMPHONY

Pianist Gives Schumann's Concerto With Artistry

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With Richard Burgin conducting and Joseph Hofmann making one of his now rare appearances as soloist, the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon proved a pleasant and at times stimulating occasion. One looks to Mr. Burgin for novel music or at least something off the beaten path. However, only one piece yesterday was new, a brief, brisk and generally agreeable but hardly memorable "Ouverture Joyeuse" by the Belgian Marcel Poot, after which came the Piano Concerto of Schumann and the Third Symphony of Brahms.

In point of fact, the programme as first announced had for its final number Schoenberg's transcription of Brahm's G minor Piano Quartet, but this promising item was dropped because of some difficulty regarding the score or parts and Dvorak's Second Symphony, put in its place, only to give way to the very familiar matter of Brahms' Third. Perhaps the Dvorak Symphony, unheard here since 1923, would have proved to be no great shakes but it would have been something different, and parts of Brahms' F major Symphony are not so good either. More than any of its three companions, it flickers and flares, gripping you one moment and leaving you in the lurch the next. Nor was the performance one calculated to disguise the music's shortcomings.

Not since 1922 had Mr. Hofmann appeared with our orchestra in Boston and his last performance of the Schumann Concerto here was in 1913. Something of a specialist in romantic music, he might be expected to play this perennially fresh Concerto both expertly and persuasively, and so he did, particularly in the second and third movements. His performance of the first, though by no means insensitive or perfunctory was nevertheless a little lacking in the poetic quality that sets it apart from all other movements for piano and orchestra.

To hear Brahms' after Schumann was to be reminded of the former's great indebtedness to the latter. Some day, as Von Buelow said of Verdi and Mascagni, the elder composer may be the younger's successor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 24 1940

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Gives Concert With Josef Hofmann as Soloist

By G. Y. Loveridge

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the third of its season's five concerts in Metropolitan Theatre last night. Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor, conducted, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky being on a short vacation.

A program selected from hither and yon achieved a fortunate balance, and the performance was generally excellent. There is sometimes a feeling that when Dr. K is away the men won't play as diligently as they are wont to do, but on this occasions they gave Mr. Burgin minute co-operation.

Josef Hofmann, mighty pianist, was soloist, in the Schumann concerto in A minor, Op. 54. For brilliance of execution his work was unsurpassable. His sonorous tone competes successfully with the full orchestra; his scales, even at the most intemperate velocities, are clear and even; his attention to ornaments and other details attests the master hand; his ease and precision of delivery astound every listener. We are one who do not find that in his playing the spirit keeps pace with the sound (to us, a fault of first significance), but we off our chapeau, such as it is, to the superb command that he exercises over the tools of his art. After more than 50 years of concertizing, his powers seem undiminished.

Mr. Burgin provided a good collaboration, although frequently Mr. Hofmann, rather than his associate, appeared to be running the show. The soloist was at his best in the last movement, when the piano gushed forth such unclouded thunders and darting lights as few could arouse. Mr. Hofmann was summoned from the wings half a dozen times by the enthusiasm of the audience. Even after the lights had gone on to indicate intermission he had to return once more.

Moussorgsky's gaudy nightmare, "A Night on Bald Mountain," served to warm up both orchestra and audience. After intermission, there was a dashing display of Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony." Except in the gavotte—where, for one of the few times we remember, the strings weren't always speaking in a smooth voice—the performance glittered. In the finale, Mr. Burgin permitted the orchestra virtually to conduct itself, which it did with singularly bright effect.

Strauss's "Don Juan" was read with lusty emphasis. Horns and woodwinds distinguished themselves, although every choir joined splendidly to effect the wild orchestral frenzy that can be made to leap from the German master's little black notes.

The evening ended with a try at a Latin-American dance, "Batuque," by Fernandez. The orchestra was mainly noisy. It takes a hot band to put over this sort of thing; symphony players just don't seem to have the rhythmic urge.

The program contained another "urgent request" that the customers refrain from smoking at the rear of the auditorium. However, smoke-production was at a pre-depression level. Sometimes we deplore this situation. Then again we think that probably if people weren't smoking they would be cutting their initials in the pews, and perhaps it is all for the best.

175

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NORWOOD, MASS.
MESSENGER

JAN 27 1940

Hannikainen to Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra

Tauno Hannikainen, long prominent as conductor of the State Opera in Helsinki, and the orchestra in Turku, Finland, will be the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the concerts in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, February 2 and 3. Mr. Hannikainen will divide his program between classical music, and the music of Sibelius. This program will include three works of Sibelius: one of them, "Lemminkainen's Homeward Journey", the last of the cycle of four tone poems on the hero of the Kalevala (which also includes "The Swan of Tuonela").

"Lemminkainen's Homeward Journey" will have its first performances at these concerts. The early tone poem "En Saga", which did much towards establishing the fame of Sibelius, has not been heard at the concerts of this orchestra for a number of years. The program will be concluded with the First Symphony in E minor. Mr. Hannikainen will open the program with Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in D minor, in the original version with cembalo accompaniment, and also Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore" No. 3.

Tauno Hannikainen comes of a musical family, his parents having both been teahers of music, and his three brothers being professional musicians as well. Tauno Hannikainen, before beginning his career as conductor, was a prominent 'cellist giving many chamber recitals of trios, with his brothers Ilmari, a pianist, and Arvo, concertmaster at Helsinki until the orchestra of the Finnish capital was disbanded by the war. Tauno Hannikainen has been the regular conductor of the orchestra at Turku since 1927, and has appeared as guest conductor in many European cities. He visited America in the summer of 1938, and was heard as guest in a performance of the Second Symphony of Sibelius at the Pops.

Mr. Hannikainen was rehearsing the Helsinki Symphony Orchestra when the first bomb raid came last November 30. The concert which he was preparing never took place. He has been serving civilian patrol duty in Turku. Since he had been engaged last year to visit America and conduct the famous orchestra in Boston as guest, the Finnish government has given him permission to make the intended journey. He arrived last week in New York with Mrs. Hannikainen on the Italian liner Vulcania, which he reached after crossing Germany under a special passport. He will shortly return to Finland for military service.

The music of Finland and of Sibelius in particular has long been performed with especial frequency and outstanding success by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its illustrious conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. Dr. Koussevitzky has included the symphonies of Sibelius on his programs on numberless occasions, and in the season of 1932-33 he performed the seven of them in succession. When the Helsinki Chorus visited in America in December, 1937, they made their first appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston and New York. In the autumn of 1935, Dr. Koussevitzky visited Helsinki to conduct the orchestra there as guest, presenting an all Sibelius program in the presence of the composer.

Hannikainen to Conduct Symphony

Traveler Jan 29

Tauno Hannikainen, long prominent as conductor of the State opera in Helsinki and the orchestra in Turku, Finland, will be the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the concerts in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Hannikainen will divide his program between classical music and the music of Sibelius. He will present Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra in D minor, in the original version, with cembalo accompaniment, and also conduct Beethoven's overture to "Leonore" No. 3. The program will otherwise consist of three works of Sibelius, one of them, "Lemminkainen's Homeward Journey," the last of the cycle of four tone poems on the hero of the Kalevala (which also includes "The Swan of Tuonela"). "Lemminkainen's Homeward Journey" will have its first performances at these concerts. The early tone poem "En Saga," which did much towards establishing the fame of Sibelius, has not been heard at the concerts of this orchestra for a number of years. The program will be concluded with the First Symphony in E minor.

Tauno Hannikainen has been the regular conductor of the orchestra at Turku since 1927, and has appeared as guest conductor in many European cities. He visited America in the summer of 1938 and was heard as guest in a performance of the Second Symphony of Sibelius at the Pops. He is making his present visit by special permission of his government.

FINN LEADER TO OFFER NOVELTIES

Post Jan 28

Mr. Hannikainen to Lead Symphony This Week

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

"HOW can a child discuss human and profound world problems in the language of music any more intelligently than in any other language? You can no more expect a child of 12 really to play Beethoven than you can expect him to write a Tolstoy novel. It just doesn't make sense. And for an audience to be asked to listen to such musical prattle is insulting." Thus speaks Norman Alexandroff, director of the recently organized National Artist Foundation, who says that his organization, which is designed to give deserving and impecunious young musicians a chance on the concert stage, will withhold such aid from child prodigies.

Now this department holds no brief for Wunderkinder. Rather, it quite agrees with Dr. Johnson, who compared them to a dog walking on its hind legs: something to provoke amazement rather than admiration. But does not Mr. Alexandroff (if the Associated Press despatch has quoted him correctly), go too far in this matter of the Tolstoy novel? Perhaps the writing of a Beethoven Sonata would count as a paralell achievement; but not the playing of it, though the latter does require a certain maturity. Indeed pianists who have not reached middle age are not likely to give a completely satisfactory account of those of the last period. It may also be questioned whether "profound world problems" have been discussed in music by Beethoven or anyone else. Music has its architectural, emotional, and graphic or pictorial sides, but it cannot present ideas, except perhaps those which relate to personal experience. Yet it is true that whatever the creator has felt the interpreter should be capable of feeling, even though he might not have been able to write the passage in question.

It is also true that our age, so much more notable for the performance of music than for the creation of it, may be guilty of putting too much emphasis upon the former. Many of us go to hear not Beethoven, but Toscanini, not Wagner, but Flagstad; not Tchaikovsky, but Koussevitzky. Nor does this only apply to the less sophisticated listeners. Even the critics, long familiar with the standard repertory are chiefly interested to see what the given conductor or artist can do with it.

The programme to be presented by the Finnish conductor, Tauno Hannikainen, at the Symphony Concerts of this week includes some numbers which will test his interpretative powers and a novelty or two where the interest will reside primarily in the piece itself. To be specific, his list includes Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings in D minor, Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, and three works by his great countryman, Sibelius: the Tone Poems, "Lemminkainen's Homeward Journey" and "A Saga" and the First Symphony. "Lemminkainen's Homeward Journey" will be heard for the first time in Boston.

Mr. Hannikainen, who appeared as guest conductor of the Pops in the summer of 1938, is making his present visit by special permission of his government. Under the circumstances, the interest in his appearances on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening is likely to run high. Before the Finnish guest takes over the orchestra, which is to say at the concerts of tomorrow evening and Tuesday afternoon, Richard Burgin will conduct. There is a new piece on his programme, too, a Brazilian dance, "The Batuque," by Oscar Lorenzo Fernandez. The rest includes Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, Strauss' "Don Juan" and the Brahms' Violin Concerto; with Albert Spalding as soloist.

HOFMANN SOLOIST

Transcript Jan 27

Eminent Pianist Plays Schumann Concerto with Boston Symphony

The appearance of Josef Hofmann in Schumann's A Minor Piano Concerto formed, quite rightly, the climax of the Boston Symphony concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon under the direction of Richard Burgin. Eighteen years, according to the program book, had elapsed since Mr. Hofman last played here with the Boston Symphony. Hardly had he sat down to the piano yesterday when the opening measures, tossed off with his customary immense authority and plastic feeling for each little phrase, brought home to us with a pang a sense of our great loss during these 18 years.

Yesterday's memorable impression was the more remarkable since Mr. Hofmann was not in his peak form, and since his essentially classical style and objective approach might have been assumed to be less inclined to the fanciful, romantic Schumann than some other composers.

When we say that Mr. Hofman was not in his peak form we mean merely that he did not play in his most inspired manner. For another pianist it would have been extraordinary. His attack was electric; his rhythm had infinite vitality; it was crisp and tense; his technique was of the kind for which most mechanical problems do not exist, his tone was suave and delicate, and his musical interpretation impeccable. All that was needed was the white heat of enthusiasm to fuse these varied elements into an inspired interpretation.

The movement that came nearest to it was the last. Here a kind of cumulative excitement was engendered which swept Mr. Hofmann along in its current. Not from a lack of technique, to be sure, but from sheer elan he developed for a few moments and lordly disregard of the notes that reminded listeners of the reputation of Mr. Hofmann's teacher, Anton Rubinstein.

Disregard of the notes is one thing however, and disregard of the beat quite another, particularly in ensemble playing. In the last movement there frequently seemed to be two opinions as to just where the beat fell.

An "Overture Joyeuse" by the Belgian composer, Marcel Poot, presented for the first time at these concerts, opened the program and Brahms' Third Symphony in F major completed it.

The Poot Overture is a lively, entertaining sort of piece that makes no attempt at profundity. It is skillfully put together with a neat balance between sentiment and the nervous brilliance of the opening page. Extremely ingratiating as much because of its amusing orchestration as because of any intrinsic character of the musical ideas, this work is easily understood at first hearing. It was cordially received, but it is more than probable that most of us will not hear it a second time.

The Brahms Symphony replaced the Dvorak Second Symphony which in turn had supplanted the Schoenberg transcription of Brahms G minor Quartet. It would have been amusing to hear the quartet transcription and since the Brahms Symphonies are so frequently played anyhow, it can hardly be claimed the program gained in interest by the change. Mr. Burgin's interpretation was sound nad musicianly but not too exciting.

E. D.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ASHEVILLE, N. C.
CITIZEN

JAN 28 1940

Simon Barer, widely acclaimed pianist, will play the Tschaikowsky B-flat minor Concerto with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra in its Sunday afternoon concert today at 3. Barer, who made his New York concert debut unheralded some three years ago, has since appeared with the Boston Symphony orchestra and was soloist with the orchestra at the famous Worcester festival last fall.

MUSIC

Herald Jan 27 '4

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 13th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Josef Hofmann, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Marcel Poot............Ouverture Joyeuse
Schumann
Brahms Symphony No. 3 in F major Op. 90
Piano Concerto in A minor Op. 54
Brahms. .Symphony No. 3 in F major Op. 9
Brahms
Symphony No. 3 in major Op. 90

The fashions and standards of piano playing are perhaps not as subject to change as those of singing or even of orchestral interpretation. Yet no one could listen to Mr. Hofmann play the Schumann Concerto yesterday afternoon without being aware that here was a radically different approach to that of Myra Hess last season or, in turn, to that of many younger pianists before the public.

We learn that Anton Rubinstein had an heroic disregard for meticulous accuracy; and he was universally esteemed as the greatest pianist of his day. If we could hear him today, those of us who are fervent admirers, say, of Mr. Gieseking or Mr. Serkin would doubtless be considerably shocked. Let us hope that we should not be so shocked as to fail completely to recognize the great virtues his contemporaries found.

Mr. Hofmann to some extent belongs to this school of piano playing that is not now in general favor. He might agree with Algernon in "The Importance of Being Earnest": "I don't play accurately—anyone can play accurately—but I play with wonderful expression. As far as the piano is concerned, sentiment is my forte. I keep science for life."

As far as the finale was concerned Mr. Hofmann's performance had the qualities of brilliance and excitement, if not of perfect polish. The first movement and the intermezzo were clearly played and with a fine feeling for tone. Mr. Hofmann's recent appearances in recital here had not prepared us for the stirring character of his playing with orchestra. We must admit that it was not entirely the conception of the Concerto that we prefer, but it could hardly be denied that it had an energetic life of its own. The orchestral accompaniment under Mr. Burgin was somewhat uneven in execution, though not in spirit.

Marcel Poot's "Joyous Overture" is a slight, neatly scored and written piece. It makes no great demands on the listener and sets out to be agreeable rather than profound. M. Poot's Symphony, which Mr. Burgin introduced here in 1937, was also a slight work. But the overture, being a shorter and more recent work, creates a more favorable impression.

It was perhaps a pity that Mr. Burgin did not see fit to adhere either to his plan of offering Schoenberg's transcription of the G minor Quartet of Brahms or to his second choice of Dvorak's 2d Symphony. No one can pretend that the four symphonies of Brahms are neglected in Boston. The Dvorak, though naturally not as great a work as the Brahms No. 3, has not been heard for some time; and the Quartet would certainly have aroused discussion.

Whatever his reasons, we ended up by being led along familiar paths. We were led, furthermore, with straightforward earnestness and dignity through what is probably the least popular of Brahms' symphonies. Philip Hale appeared to have preferred it to the others, but then he was not a dyed-in-the-wool Brahmsian and was never reluctant to qualify his praise in this direction.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week is a full one for the Boston Symphony. On Monday night and Tuesday afternoon Mr. Burgin will conduct Mozart's "Figaro" Overture, Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, Strauss' "Don Juan," Fernandez's "Batuque;" and Albert Spalding will be soloist in the Brahms Violin Concerto. On next Friday and Saturday, Tauno Hannikainen from Finland will be guest conductor. His program offers Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor, Beethoven's 3d "Leonore" Overture, Sibelius' "En Saga," "Lemminkainen's "Homeward Journey" and Symphony No. 1 in E minor.

CONCERTS THIS WEEK

Globe Jan 28

Symphony Hall

BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, Monday evening at 8:15 and Tuesday afternoon at 3. Fourth program of these series. Albert Spalding, the American violinist, will be soloist in the Brahms Violin Concerto. Mr. Burgin's program will otherwise consist of the Overture to Mozart's opera, "The Marriage of Figaro"; Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony; the tone poem, "Don Juan," by Richard Strauss, and a "Batuque," by Oscar Lorenzo Fernandez, Brazilian composer. A batuque is a popular Brazilian dance; Fernandez has written two of them, one for his opera, "Malazarte," and the other for his suite, "Reisado do Pastoreio." The second will be heard at these concerts.

BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra, Friday afternoon at 2:30 and Saturday evening at 8:15. Tauno Hannikainen will be guest conductor, dividing his program between classical pieces and music by Sibelius. The numbers follow: Handel: Concerto Grosso for strings in D minor (original version, with cembalo accompaniment); Beethoven: "Leonore" Overture No. 3; Sibelius: "Lemminkainen's Homecoming" (first time at these concerts); tone poem, "En Saga," First Symphony.

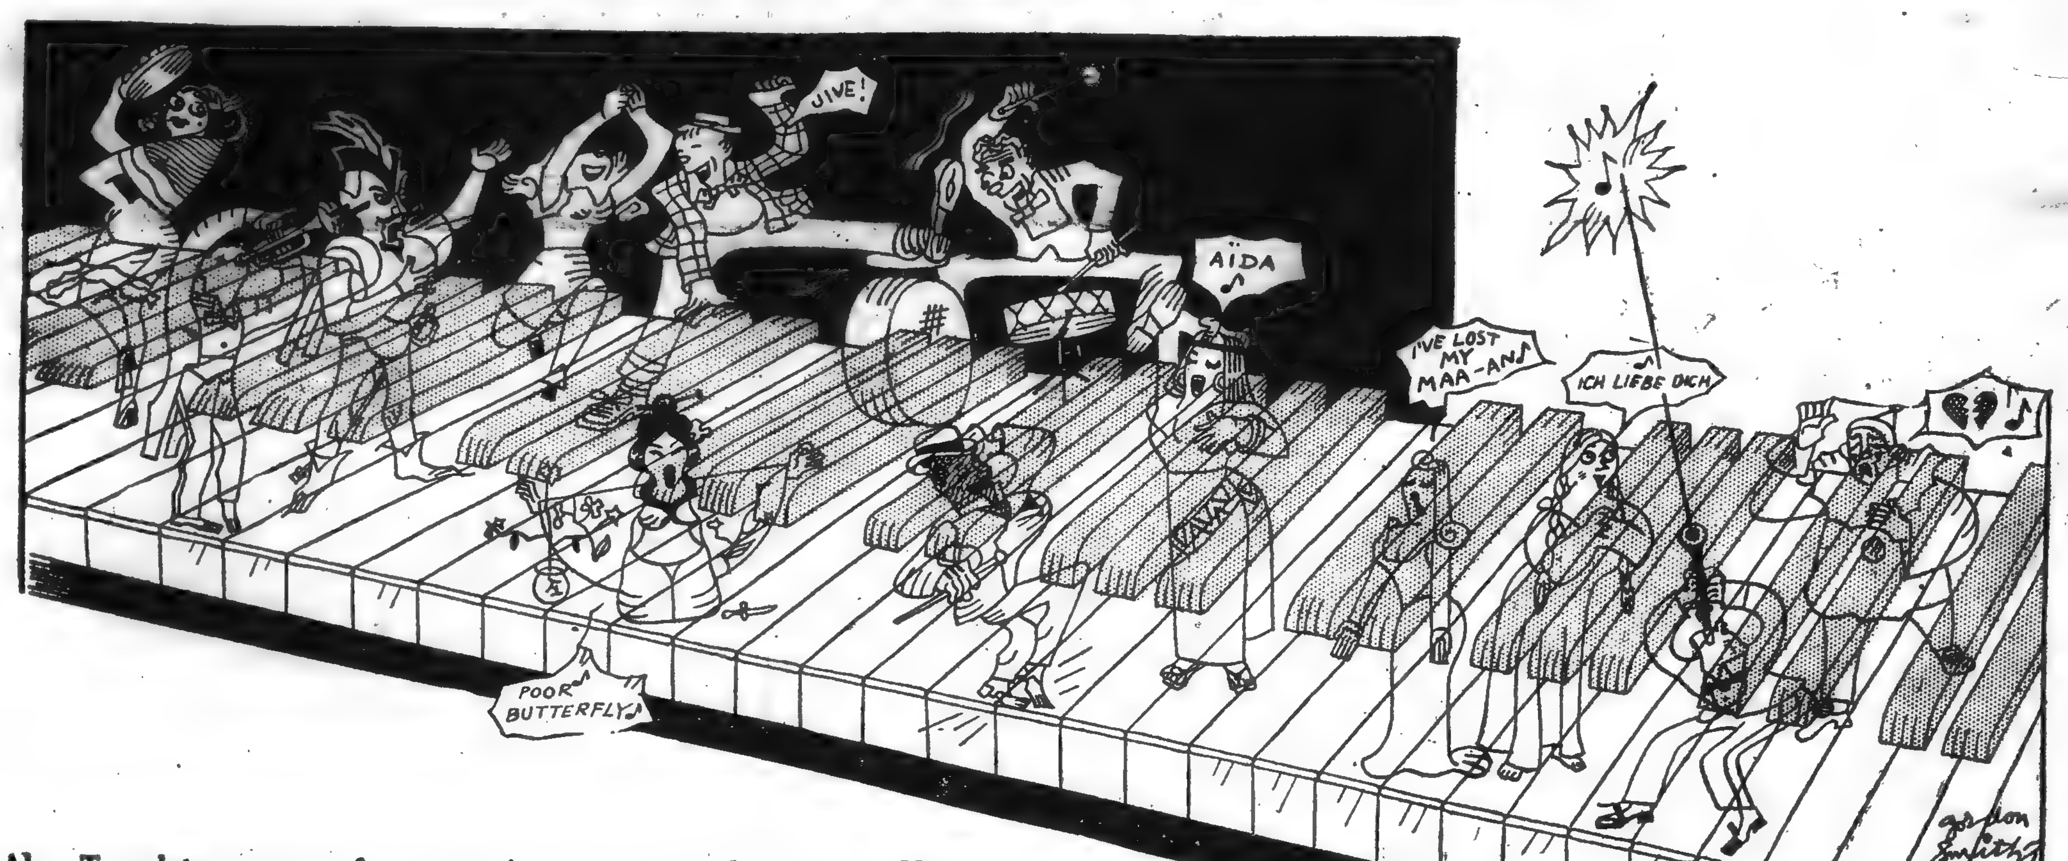
Tauno Hannikainen comes of a Finnish musical family, his parents having both been teachers of music, and his three brothers being professional musicians as well. Tauno Hannikainen, before beginning his career as conductor, was a prominent cellist, giving many chamber recitals of trios, with his brothers, Ilmari, a pianist, and Arvo, concert master at Helsinki until the orchestra of the Finnish capital was disbanded by the war. Tauno Hannikainen has been the regular conductor of the orchestra at Turku since 1927, and has appeared as guest conductor in many European cities. He visited America in the Summer of 1938, and was heard as guest in a performance of the Second Symphony of Sibelius at the Pops. He is making his present visit by special permission of his Government.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, JANUARY 21, 1940

In the annual poll of the radio editors of America, just completed, Templeton was chosen "outstanding new star for 1939." Others, in order: Ezra Stone, Glenn Miller, Raymond Gram Swing and Dennis Day.

Alec Templeton, Blind Pianist Now in Boston, Earned Success

Playing of Classical Swingster Delights Koussevitzky — Lively Anecdotes on Radio's New Star



Alec Templeton can perform amazing stunts on the piano. He can change instantly from classic to swing, back to opera, hot jazz, sweet music. His marvelous technique is a constant surprise and delight to his audiences wherever he plays. Carmen, "hot" music, Faust, jitterbugs, light opera, oomph stuff, Aida, blue music, Wagnerian, Bach, it's all the same to Alec.

BY LEO RABBETTE

He is blind—but he has brought vision, keen musical pleasure, and laughter to millions—Alec Templeton—he plays the great classics with the touch of a master concert pianist; he swings them and burlesques them with such verve and charm that he was chosen recently as the year's outstanding new star in radio—he is in Boston today, at Symphony Hall, with all his amazing and magical musical delights.

Who is Alec Templeton?

Three years ago the noted British band leader, Jack Hylton, brought over with him to Chicago, a young, slight and gentle pianist, who took the town by storm, playing Wagner to satisfy the most cultured musical ear; then swinging into the sound of a whole Wagnerian opera, yodeling meanwhile soprano arias out-of-tune, and throaty German declamations, while banging out brass chords till the piano seemed to toss out the whole uproar of a conservatory, while the audience held onto their chairs, weak with laughter. What a man!

Got Highest Accolade

When the Hylton band disolved, Alec Templeton went happily on, playing on diffferent radio programmes, and wowing the listeners-in, until this year he was rewarded with a programme of his own, and received the highest accolade from the Radio Editors' poll.

Alec is what the profession calls a "natural," always able to play, and always by ear, for he has been blind from birth. When he was 4 years old, his mother, a very good amateur pianist, was teaching his sister a simple melody. She played it over several times, and then her mother sent her down town on an errand.

Suddenly, Alec's mother was amazed to hear the same melody coming from the piano. She went in to scold her daughter for not going for that loaf of bread, and lo, there was little Alec punching out the melody with his chubby little fingers.

Starting with finger-exercises, when he was 3 years old, the future radio star wrote his first melody before he was five. In another year Little Alec had become so clever at the piano the rest of the family gave it up. "He made us all feel silly," his mother puts it.

When he was 12, young Templeton was playing over the British Broadcasting system. At Worcester College, Sir Ivor A. Atkins taught him organ-playing, and he had the good fortune of studying under Master of the King's Music, Sir Henry Walford Davies. After four years in the Royal College of Music he made his debut and was greeted with great enthusiasm.

England, however, never fully appreciated him; perhaps, too, it was something in the temper and the tempo of America, which brought out the comic spirit in him.

At any rate, when he sat down to play a serious classical programme in New York's Rainbow Room, his father was amazed, when he played just the light pieces which he knew, and then started combining, burlesquing and improvising, with such a satirical touch and such a delicious sense of fun, he had them all "rolling in the aisles," as they used to say in vaudeville. "I could smell they didn't want any serious stuff," he explained to his father later.

Knew His Sonatas

"I think America likes me," he says, "and I know I like America." And to prove it he has already taken out his first citizenship papers.

Pianist Templeton's amazing ability to simulate the masters musically is beautifully set forth in this anecdote related by William A. H. Birnie in his brilliant word portrait in the American Magazine. He says:

"We were talking, and I happened to mention that I had a particularly warm spot in my heart for Mozart. 'So have I,' beamed Alec Templeton, the blind pianist, who is one of the most amazing musicians of today, 'Would you like to hear me play one of his piano sonatas?'

" 'Of course,' I said enthusiastically, and Alec felt his way over to the baby grand. For the next 20 minutes I gazed out of that Chicago hotel window over the waters of Lake Michigan, while his fingers produced a ceaseless flow of the graceful, haunting melodies which have placed lonely Mozart among the great immortals of music.

" 'Thank you, Alec,' I said, when he finished. 'That was beautiful. Really beautiful.'

"He smiled quizzically. 'Ever heard it before?'

" 'No, I don't believe I have, but . .'

"Then Alec laughed aloud. 'That's not surprising. You see, I just wrote it last week.' He went on gaily before I recovered: 'Some day I want to give a concert and fool all the critics. I will call it "Recently Discovered Works by the Great Masters," and I will include Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart, Wagner, and all the rest.

" 'But what I will play will be my own compositions, in their styles. It'll be a great joke, don't you think?' "

In his programmes Alec Templeton usually mingles a few famous classical pieces with his own delightful specialties. It is his usual custom to ask the audience for any five different notes and improvises a melody on them. Also, he takes three suggested musical pieces and weaves them together in a most delightful and fascinating fashion.

Dr. Koussevitzky had heard Templeton play in Europe and was so taken with him that he really wanted to hear him in his recital at Symphony Hall last year. He said, "As I remember him, he was an excellent pianist and unique in his artistic parodies.

Koussevitzky Laughed

Though the week before had been strenuous the Boston Symphony conductor gave in to his friends and said, "I will hear the last and amusing section of the programme." However, the supposedly weary conductor arrived at the beginning of the concert. He listened with greatest concentration while Templeton gave serious performances of piano classics.

During the remainder of the programme, when Templeton went in for his inimitable high jinks of improvisation and parody, Dr. Koussevitzky laughed till tears ran down his cheeks. And, after the concert he hastened back stage and sought to secure Templeton as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a famous concerto.

Except for a conflict of dates, Alec would have been soloist on one of this season's Symphony programmes. What an amazing and variously gifted a musician is Alec, when Leader Koussevitzky, his sides still aching at the comedy playing of a musician, should consider him such a splendid serious artist as to desire to give him an appointment which is the envy of all pianists, as soloist in a concerto with Boston's great orchestra.

He Heard Templeton

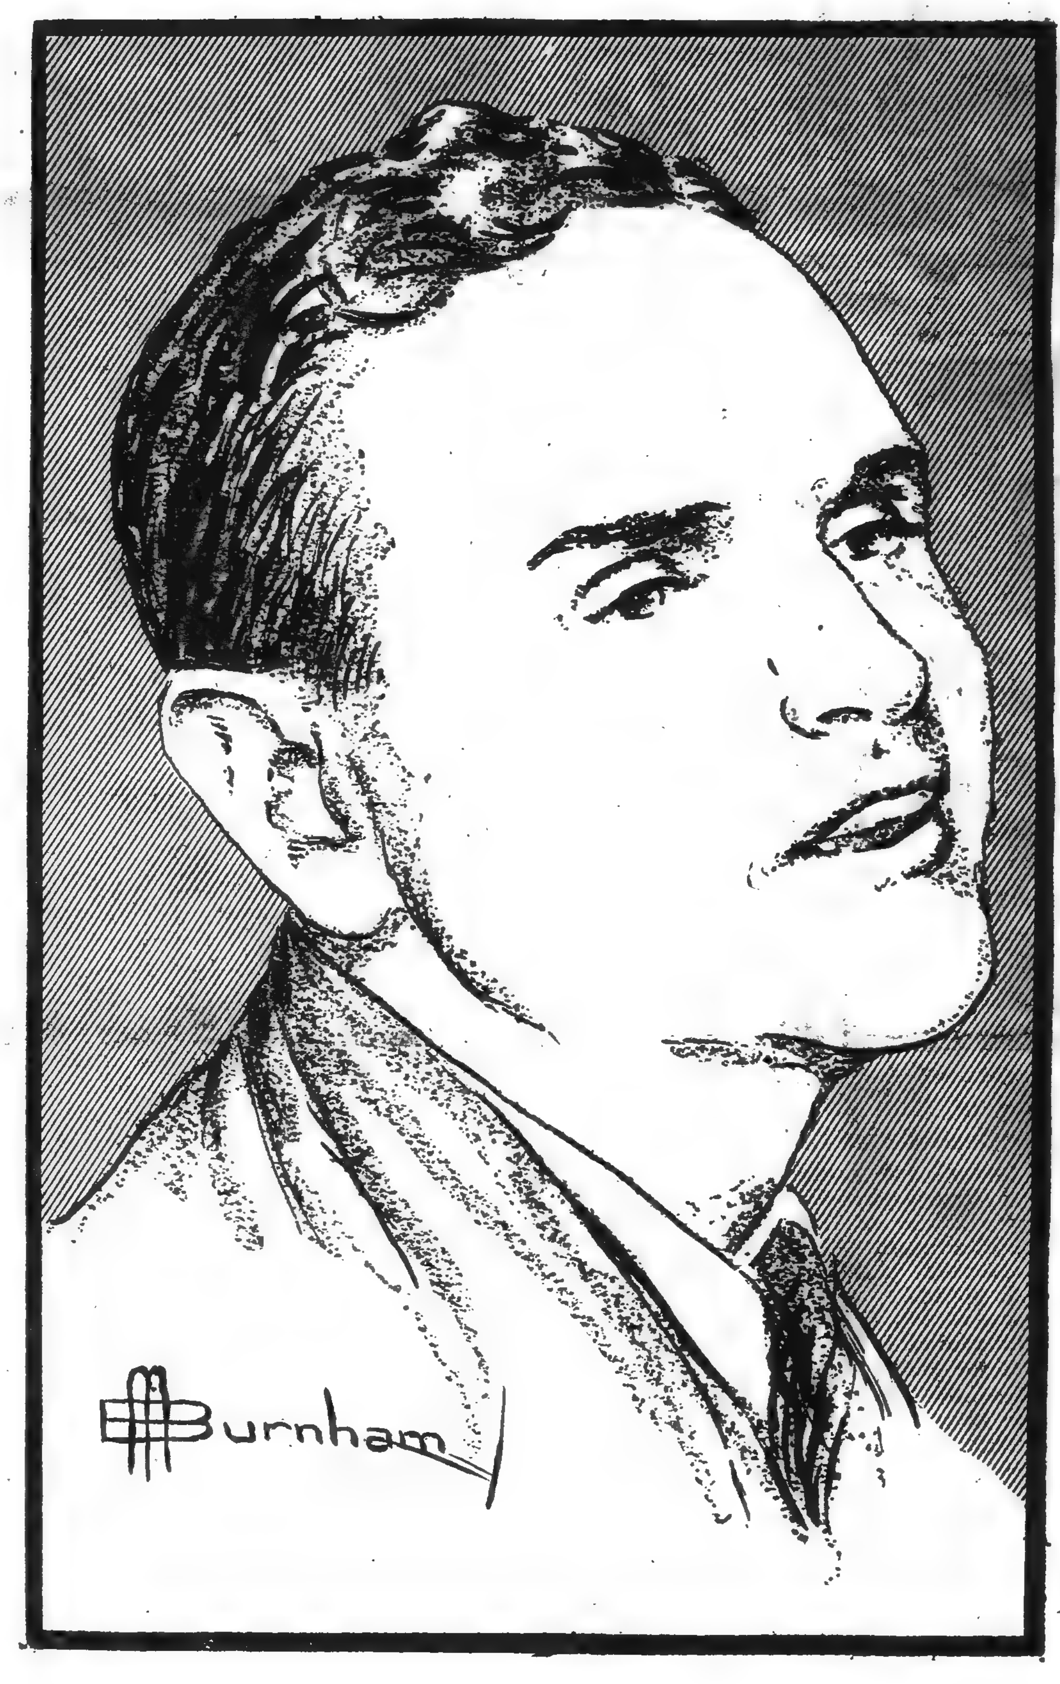
During the Symphony Orchestra conductor's absence this past week on his mid-winter vacation, the orchestra has been in charge of Nicolai Malko, Ukrainian conductor who has led his own orchestra in Copenhagen for the past 10 years.

Somewhere in his travels he heard Templeton with enthusiasm. He declares he was mystified by the way Templeton sits at the keyboard with his hands in his lap, and opening cold, reaches for notes at the most difficult intervals, to strike them unerringly from that flying start.

Even the greatest of sighted pianists glance at the keyboard before attacking such combinations of notes. Has Alec, perhaps, a sixth sense, of location? It's uncanny.

"There's John, That's Ed"

On his first personal appearance in Boston last year, Alec arrived a day or so ahead. Some half a dozen representatives of various publications gathered to meet him, and Templeton repeated the names of each person introduced as they gathered about a piano in the Copley-Plaza hotel.



Character portrait of Alec Templeton, famous blind English pianist, who is in Boston today.

Then pointing, he said, "Now let's see. That's John, that's Ed, that's Steve, that's Mary"—and so on, as he located each one and named them correctly. He explained he doesn't believe that anything but first names should be used after introductions, and desires everyone to call him Alec. "Mr. Templeton makes me cringe," he smiled.

After some preliminary chat, Alec was asked if he would care to give a keyboard characterization of any of those present. He replied, "My sketches are based on rather longer acquaintance with a subject than prevails here. However, I have a very definite impression of Miss Prim, here at my right. She is rather a diminutive person, but I'm positive she is not prim."

The blind pianist had judged the young woman's stature from the point from which her voice came as she stood by the piano. Her personality he had judged with perfect correctness from the few words she had exchanged with him.

Having just arrived in the East from a visit to Hollywood, Alec said he would be delighted to improvise sketches of Bing Crosby and Bob Burns. Then, by some magic, all his own, partly in the smoothness in the crooning accompaniment and with the added "boo-bo-bo-bo," all recognized Bing Crosby.

For Bob Burns, who is a modern Arkansas Traveller, he played tag with the theme of the old jolly "hoedown" of that name, tossed it around, and then produced some curious and amazing sounds by an ingenuous combination of notes, which would never belong together normally, to produce the familiar and astounding sound of Burns' bazooka.

Could Play Bazooka

Reporters do not ordinarily overplay enthusiasm, but at this they let themselves go in wholehearted and quick appreciation of these "musical portraits." Although Burns claims he is the only one who can, or wants to play the bazooka, the consensus of opinion was that Alec could do the same thing on a piano with consummate success.

Alec Templeton remembers people by the pitch and timbre of their voices, and he doesn't hesitate an instant. As a striking instance of this, here in Boston he talked with the man who arranged for his interview a little before and after; they had never met before.

The following night, while about to leave the symphony concert which they had both attended, this man saw Alec coming down the aisle.

As they moved toward the aisle, he said to his wife, "You must meet this remarkable man." And when Alec was about 20 feet away, he said, "There's Templeton with his father."

Whereupon, Alec instantly turned to him and called, "Oh, John, glad to hear you."

After listening to a whole concert, and there in the midst of the hubub and murmur of a thousand voices of the symphony crowd thronging out of the hall, he distinguished one small voice, which he had heard but for a few moments, and for the first time, the night before!

Both schools have great virtues and great possibilities; Alec Templeton brings out the best in each; his appeal is happily, at the same time an appeal to the musically illiterate, as well as to the musically initiate.

What a Memory!

As proof of this the jitterbugs start "cutting the rugs" when Benny Goodman plays his classico-jamborino, "Bach Goes to Town," and his serious "First Symphony" is most highly regarded by the finest symphony leaders in the country.

His blindness has really been the thing which has developed in him a most remarkable acuteness and memory in hearing. He has to hear and remember, and always his joy in this has been great.

At a party one night he was to accompany the notable violinist, Nathan Milstein. Somebody wanted them to play the "Symphonie Espagnole," of Lalo. Asked if he knew the accompaniment, Alec said he didn't but that if somebody would run through it once he would try it.

He listened attentively while the 32-minute-long accompaniment was being played, and then, instantly, from memory, he performed that accompaniment, with only one mistake!

Homer, too, who smote "his bloomin' lyre," was blind; and so was Milton, master of music in his way. Surely Alec Templeton, blind but of such fine inspiriting vision, belongs with these great musicians of all time.

Page 14—BOSTON SUNDAY ADVERTISER ★

177

Josef Hofmann Returns to Symphony

Jan 28

By LEO GAFFNEY

THE many years since the master pianist, Josef Hofmann, appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra were swept away. Symphony audiences at the week-end concerts thrilled again to the perfection of his playing—a few among those present recalling the pianist's first appearance on the same stage nearly forty years ago.

In the full ripeness of years Hofmann is now 64—there is no diminution of power, no hint of faltering fingers. Instead, the inspiring spectacle of one whom the years only increase.

Mr. Hofmann played the Schumann A minor Concerto with dazzling brilliance. And it was good that traditional Symphony Hall decorum was for once laid aside. Auditors at both concerts applauded unashamedly between the movements.

The perfect blend of orchestra and piano was never more beautifully fused, the execution of the solo part never more clearly expressed. It is a joy to reflect that one of the "giants" of olden days still endures in Mr. Hofmann.

Richard Burgin, conducting, shared in the prolonged applause together with his men.

MR. BURGIN began his program with Marcel Poot's Ouverture Joyeuse, heard for the first time at these concerts. If the work seemed short in length, perhaps it was because of its lively and joyous nature, not to mention the dashing manner of its performance.

One of a group of Belgian modernists, Poot betrays in his Ouverture much of the same hearty nature that prompted him to write a tone poem on the ineffable antics of Charlie Chaplin. Rippling and rolling with wit, the Ouverture is a glad gander down the boulevard of life—no more, no less.

Mr. Burgin's concluding number was the Brahms' Third Symphony in F major, no better choice for a New England audience turning to contemplative matters indoors on a bitter winter's day.

Let Hans Richter think of the great Third as "Brahms' Eroica"; permit Kalbeck his belief in the statue of Germania; Joachim his notion of Hero and Leander; W. F. Apthorp his image of Shakespeare's Iago, and Clara Schumann her vision of a "Forest Idyll"—it is enough for winter weary Bostonians in the present day to accept the Third as "just music" without specific inquiry into its meaning.

To us in the Nineteen Forties, not to be wholly melted at the lyricism preceding Brahms, nor yet completely taken out of ourselves by the masters succeeding him, the Third is the thing for our cautious emotions—this "emotionalism tranquilized."

Too, we take comfort and joy at the painstaking instrumentation, the sure sense of orchestral perfection in Boston—the solid unity of so many rich strings singing, the mellow horns, the haunting woodwinds, the bumpy thump of tympani . . . al[illegible]ing disciplined part in the [illegible]tricate development of profoundest musical thought.

Symphony Hall, Brahms—the best of wintry Boston!

Finn Conducts The Symphony

TAUNO HANNIKAINEN, conductor of the State Opera in Helsinki, and the orchestra in Turku, Finland, will be the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the concerts in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb. 2 and 3.

Mr. Hannikainen will divide his program between classical music, and the music by Sibelius. He will present Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra in D minor, in the original version with cembalo accompaniment, and also conduct Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore" No. 3.

The program will otherwise consist of three works of Sibelius: one of them, "Lemminkainen's Homeward Journey," the last of the cycle of four tone poems on the hero of the Kalevala (which also includes "The Swan of Tuonela").

Zighera Changes His Program

BERNARD ZIGHERA, founder and conductor of the Zighera Chamber Orchestra, composed of thirty leading members of the Boston Symphony, announces that the program-revision, necessitated by the European situation which has made it impossible for him to secure scores of the works he originally planned to present, is completed for the second concert in the Zighera Chamber Orchestra's 1940 series, on Monday evening, February 5, in Jordan Hall. The final program to be presented by the Orchestra on that evening at 8:30 o'clock is:

"Suite in C Major" by Bach; "Symphony in D Major, No. 31 (La Parisienne)" by Mozart; "Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen," by Gustav Mahler; "Introduction and Allegro," by Ravel; "A La Musique," by Chabrier.

Monday, Tuesday Symphony

NEXT Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 29 and 30, in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in the fourth pair of concerts of this series. Albert Spalding, the famous American violinist, will appear with the orchestra in the Concerto of Brahms.

Richard Burgin, who will conduct these concerts, will begin with Mozard't Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," and present the following numbers in the second part of the program: Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony: Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan" and a "Batuque" of Oscar Lorenzo Fernandez, a composer of Brazil.

POST

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Last night's Symphony Concert, conducted by Richard Burgin, offered two surprises, one pleasant, the other not so pleasant. By way of conclusion, the programme listed a dance, by title "Batuque," from the pen of the Brazilian composer, Oscar Fernandez, whose very name was unknown here until this number was announced. In its primitive, savage energy, this "Batuque" made any other South American or West Indian music which has reached us sound pallid and anaemic. Here is something for Arthur Fiedler's Pop Concerts, yet not out of place at those of the winter season.

The less pleasant surprise was the tame performance of Brahms' Violin Concerto that came from Albert Spalding. Perhaps Mr. Spalding was not in the vein and will give a better account of himself this afternoon. Only in the slow movement did the music come into its own. This Concerto, like other works of Brahms, needs a good deal of help from its interpreters. Nor was the performance of Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony one to put that jeu d'esprit in the most favorable and flattering light. The music needs a sort of pointing up that it receives from Dr. Koussevitzky. Otherwise, it falls a little flat.

To turn to more agreeable matters, the concert was notable for offering two things that we are not apt to receive nowadays from the chief conductor, a Mozart Overture and a Strauss tone poem. The former, that to "The Marriage of Figaro," sparklingly played, was good to hear; the latter, "Don Juan," was excitingly projected, as it was when Mr. Burgin conducted it at a pair of "regular" concerts, earlier in the season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

JAN 30 1940

Boston Symphony Is Led by Burgin

Gives Sympathetic Frame For Albert Spalding in Brahm's Violin Concerto

By exception, the Boston Symphony Orchestra management found seats this month for the Mercury representative at their Monday evening concert rather than the Tuesday afternoon of the paired series of six. It was exhilirating to see every seat in great Symphony Hall intently occupied, save for six, no doubt vacant from illness.

This sudden change of routine left us a bit dazed on arrival so a lively but seemingly perfunctory performance of Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" was a good equilibrium gaining number. Next came the important feature: Albert Spalding, our ranking, definitely American violinist, as soloist in Brahms' only concerto (D major) for his instrument. Mr. Spalding had played the concerto with the orchestra in 1927. He entered with the finest bearing we recall from any guest artist on Symphony Hall stage—giving the impression of a polished gentleman of the world.

Richard Burgin, conducting during Dr. Koussevitzky's southern vacation, gave to the concerto a serenity of poetic interpretation that yet had its life, pace and atmosphere of the world of nature. Mr. Spalding's tone is ineffably sweet and pure and true but small. Mr. Burgin's own tone, when playing, is not large and he perhaps understood the dynamics to maintain. It was an experience to treasure against other performances—a rare interpretation of the closely integrated instrumentation. Much of the solo work was set off against the woodwind choir with subtle support from the strings. The grading up to a climax within a gently beautiful texture was a fine point of the closing Allegro. With especial reason, Mr. Spalding returned to applause long repeated, leading Mr. Burgin by the hand.

When Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony" was first played by this orchestra in 1927 we had not had our joy in his "Peter and the Wolf" which continues popularity in record and ballet. Now on rehearing, one sits with a happy smile, recognizing gay little tricks of ongoing and tune. Instead of Mozart, we now think of the facile hand that set in word and instrumentation a Russian child's story. Mr. Burgin conducted with the lightest and brightest of spirits and a faster pace than the four brief movements originally were given, if memory can be trusted.

For Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," Mr. Burgin fell off a bit in elegance and in romance—suggesting rather "Ein Heldenleben"; but to every musician his own conception of this typical philanderer.

Fernandez, the Brazilian, though recently known in Boston through other musical organizations, had his first hearing of jungle music at these concerts. "Batuque" from the suite "Reisado do Pastoreio" is definitely of Negro origin. It is hot at start; insinuating, fascinating, slows up to send the melody from brasses to string echo, and then mounts hotter and hotter, faster and faster. Ravel's Bolero is tame beside it. The orchestra throughout the concert gave brilliant response to Mr. Burgin's demands. The same program is repeated this afternoon at 3 o'clock. A.C.R.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER

JAN 30 1940

13-Minute Symphony One of Features of Concert in Boston

Prokofieff's "Classical" Work Played Last Night and Again Today---Spalding Appears As Soloist At Symphony Hall

Vividly contrasted music marked the Monday evening concert in the supplementary series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which in the absence of Dr. Koussevitzky on brief vacation was conducted with more than ordinary freedom and fervor by Richard Burgin, the concert master of the group. The occasion brought to the platform again the eminent American violinist Albert Spalding. The program will be repeated this afternoon for the especial benefit of out-of-town music lovers.

There was pleasant opening in the sprightly strains of Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro." Whatever may have been true of the story on which it was based, it will be agreed that the music is innocent and charming.

Merry music also was Prokofieff's 'Classical" Symphony. Not often in Symphony hall is there opportunity to hear a symphony in four movements that runs just thirteen minutes all told. But Prokofieff, while adhering closely to the traditional formula, had the skill and the wit to condense it within that limit, quite a feat in itself. Couched in the terms of Mozart and Haydn, it has just enough suggestion of modernity to give it pep as well as piquancy.

Mr. Burgin infused the Strauss tone poem "Don Juan" with a good deal of warmth and color, notably so in the passage in which the tuba and brass instruments sound above the rest of the orchestra that dominating melodic theme that is the most thrilling climax of the work.

For merry close to the program was the "Batuque," or Negro Dance, imported into Brazil and utilized by one of the country's composers, Oscar L. Fernandez. In its reiterated theme and rhythm it is akin to the more familiar Bolero of Ravel. Which may help to explain why it caught the fancy of the audience.

Mr. Spalding managed the intricacies of the Brahms Concerto for Violin in D major, with apparent ease and surety. Of old there used to be complaints that the orchestration overpowered the solo instrument. And for a time violinists fought shy of it. But after all, as one commentator said, in the end the violin wins out. Certainly Mr. Spalding more than held his own in the spirited measure of the Finale, exuberant and joyous music calling for all the assets of a virtuoso.

S. R. F.

Jan 30 '40 Herald

MUSIC

MONDAY SYMPHONY

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The fourth concert of the Monday evening series was given last night in Symphony Hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting. Albert Spalding, violinist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Mozart. Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro."
Brahms—Concerto for violin in D major Op. 77.
Prokofieff—Classical Symphony Op. 25.
Strauss—"Don Juan," Tone Poem Op. 20.
Fernandez—"Batuque."

It would be hard to offer a more attractive program than that which Mr. Burgin has assembled for the fourth of the Monday-Tuesday series. All of it was familiar, cordially welcomed material from the symphonic repertoire, except for the Fernandez "Batuque." Nor did we have to cudgel our wits and senses to appreciate that at a first hearing.

The greatest of all violin concertos has been the subject of so much comment and has been received with such bated breath recently, owing to the splendid recording by Mr. Heifetz and the Boston Symphony, that we confess to some trepidation while anticipating Mr. Spalding's performance. We need not have worried and should all along have bolstered ourselves with the recollection of those marvelous violin and piano sonata recitals that Mr. Spalding and the late Ossip Gabrilowitsch used to give here not so long ago.

In spite of one or two disconcerting mannerisms, Mr. Spalding gave an admirable interpretation of the concerto. The slow movement, perhaps, has a hint of affectation; but by and large the performance was sound musically and effectively conveyed the spirit of this most poetic of concertos. Mr. Burgin and the orchestra supported sympathetically.

Little need by said of either Prokofieff's Classical Symphony or Strauss' "Don Juan." They are at opposite aesthetic poles and are both deservedly popular orchestral pieces. The performances were excellent last night. The only work of O. Lorenzo Fernandez to have been heard here before was a Trio Brasileiro, played at a Flute Players' concert in December 1938. The present piece by the Brazilian composer is a showy and vigorously rhythmical South American Negro dance. It should make a good piece for the Pops, although it requires a large orchestra.

The concert will be repeated this afternoon at 3 o'clock. The fifth concerts in the series will be given on Monday and Tuesday, March 4 and 5. Webster Aitken, pianist, will be the soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 31 1940

WORDS About Music And Musicians

Tauno Hannikainen will conduct the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall this week.

The program will open with Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in D minor, Op 6, No. 10, followed by Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72. Three Sibelius works will make up the rest of the music: the tone poem, "En Saga," Op. 9, the first performances at these concerts of "Lemminkainen's Homeward Journey," Op. 22, and the Symphony No. 1 in E minor, Op; 39.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, TUESDAY, JANUARY 30, 1940

Spalding Soloist With Symphony

Concerto Of Brahms Is Played

Since Dr. Koussevitzky is still absent on his mid-season holiday, it fell to Richard Burgin to conduct the Boston Symphony concerts of the program last night, and this afternoon. The program includes Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," the Brahms Violin Concerto with Albert Spalding as soloist, Prokofieff's "Classical" and "Batuque" by Fernandez.

As may be seen from the items listed, this program represented three German schools of musical thought, as well as some Russian and Brazilian—though the Russian might be termed such in letter only, as the "Classical Symphony" of Prokofieff has become an international classic. Mr. Burgin gave a thoroughly illuminating and piquant performance. He has not, in recent years, given a better account of himself as a conductor.

The Mozart overture also found Mr. Burgin in a flexible mood, and the small graces of the score were revealed with a deft touch. It was pleasant to find last night that Mr. Burgin had been able to throw aside the square cut method of projecting a symphonic score in favor of a more plastic molding of musical lines.

Mr. Spalding played the Brahms Concerto with verve and sensitiveness. For the more lyric melodies he summoned a beautiful tone, the quality of which was not appreciably altered in the more stirring bravura passages. The evident rapport between conductor and artist resulted in a performance which fully justified the ovation which followed. Mr. Spalding generously shared it with conductor and orchestra, with M. Gillet coming in for a bow on his own account, following his sympathetic performance of the lines allotted the oboe.

The Strauss and the Fernandez were each what might best be ermed as "characteristic" pieces, nd each, although performed with irtuosity, appeared somewhat out f place. Possibly one or the other lone would have made a better mpression. Certainly the Brazilin composer has written an exting opus; a "Pops" audience ould doubtless find it thrilling. e audience last night applauded vith enthusiasm. G. M. S.

MUSIC

Spalding at Symphony

American Violinist Plays Brahms Concerto—Burgin Leads Work of Brazilian, Fernandez

By EDWARD DOWNES

A colorful bill of fare was offered yesterday to Monday night patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when Albert Spalding appeared as soloist in the Brahms D major Violin Concerto and Richard Burgin conducted a collection of works that ranged from the sophistication of Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" to the primitive appeal of Fernandez's "Batuque," from the 18th century of Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" to the 20th century Rococo of Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony.

Mr. Spalding was warmly applauded for the poise and musicianship of his playing and for his suave, ingratiating tone. These things were in evidence throughout his performance, as were his excellent taste, his command of proportion and climax. For one listener, however, the most moving utterance of Mr. Spalding was in the slow movement where the carefully controlled lyricism of his musical speech rose to a pitch of intensity and a poetic fancy seldom attained in the other movements. In the final Allegro Giocoso, and more particularly in the boisterous theme of its opening pages, we were not always clear whether the orchestra was following Mr. Spalding or Mr. Burgin. Surely with two musicians of their high calibre, such ambiguity ought to be avoidable.

Eternal Sunshine

As full of laughter and dancing wit as any overture ever penned, Mozart's Overture to his "Marriage of Figaro" does not profit from the full complement of strings that a modern orchestra has at its disposal. For one thing, no matter how accurate those strings may be (and it would be hard to surpass those of the Boston Symphony) they never can sound with the crystalline clarity that half their number can achieve. Another reason is that their forte must always sound much too loud for the rest of the orchestra. Nor is this last objection to be remedied by simply having the whole body of strings play mezzo-forte or by doubling the winds. That is not the same thing at all.

Had Mozart been used to an orchestra of modern proportions he would unquestionably have scored his works differently. Why should we not have the same regard for Mozart's orchestra that he would have had for ours?

Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony on the other hand, though, a nostalgic tour de force, a gentle spoofing of the Rococo masters, is rightly given with full strings. It was, by and large, the most brilliant performance of the evening, from the orchestral point of view. Its rhythms had a thrust and vitality, and the instruments a tonal sheen that stimulated the audience to audible expressions of delight, even between the movements where applause was taboo.

Richard Strauss's early tone poem, "Don Juan" in spite of all its surface glamour, its undeniable banalities here and there, is such a volcanic explosion of youthful genius that it continues to rock the emotions of this generation and will probably still be erupting lustily long after many a contemporary production of greater subtlety and more fastidious taste has dimmed and disappeared from our programs. Mr. Burgin's interpretation was one of telling dramatic impact.

Negro Inspiration

Oscar Lorenzo Fernandez's "Batuque" from his suite "Reisado do Pastoreio" had been played before with the Boston Symphony by the Brazilian conductor, Burle Marx. After Villa-Lobos, Fernandez is the most prominent of Brazilian composers, and his work is said to be more strictly indigenous in character than that of his older and more illustrious colleague. The piece played last night, which bears the subtitle "Danzi di Negri," wakened impressions that were not unfamiliar in a country that has had its own share of African musical influences.

Though clothed in sophisticated orchestral garb, the source of its rhythms and melodic figures was primitive, and primitive was its appeal, its throbbing, dance-inciting pulse and the wild climax of sheer physical volume. A peculiarly effective work, though it might sound too simple on seasoned hearing.

The program is being repeated this afternoon in Symphony Hall. The next concerts of the Monday-Tuesday series will take place on March 4 and 5.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Richard Burgin conducted the fourth Monday concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Symphony Hall last night. Albert Spalding, the American violinist, was soloist in the Brahms Concerto. The program otherwise consisted of the Overture to Mozart's opera, "The Marriage of Figaro"; the Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," a wild "Batuque" by the Brazilian Oscar Lorenzo Fernandez, and Prokofieff's own joke on the formalism of the 18th century, his delicious "Classical" Symphony.

One who has always been a fervent admirer of Albert Spalding found his performance last night alternately enjoyable and unaccountably disappointing. In the slow movement and such other portions of Brahms' epic work that may be termed "sustained song," Mr. Spalding was at his considerable best. Then his light, silvery tone, his chaste phrasing, his sturdy intellectual grasp of the music were most effective. But when liveliness and agility were demanded the tone became acid, the pitch doubtful, and his playing in general fell below the high standards expected of him. The fact that he and Mr. Burgin were consistently at odds over the tempo may have been due to not enough rehearsal. Nevertheless, the conductor's pace seemed the right one.

A batuque is a Brazilian dance of Negro ancestry. This particular batuque of Mr. Fernandez comes from an orchestral suite, and was done here a few years ago by one of the Federal project orchestras. It is some of the wildest music these ears have ever heard, and might come right from the jungle. Only a little imagination is necessary to conjure a vision of some voodoo ceremony with these frenzied sonorities as accompaniment, all over a heavily percussive rhythm that goes da-da-da-da-dum-daa.

Mr. Burgin achieved readings of the Mozart Overture and the Strauss tone poem that were exciting if not meticulous. The "Classical" Symphony was another matter, and while it was lively, the orchestral tone was rough. This piece should be as glittering, smooth and sophisticated as a debutante out in cafe society.—C. W. D.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

JAN 31 1940

MOMENTS MUSICAL

By SIDNEY R. FLEET

To Whom Announcements and Communications on Musical Matters May Be Addressed at This Office.

ON THE CALENDAR.

Feb. [illegible]—Luboshutz and Nemenoff, I[illegible] Pianists, Memorial Auditoriu[illegible] p. m.

Feb. 21—Annual Concert Temple Choir, Memorial Auditorium, 8 p. m.

For the first time in the history of the musical programs in the Moses Greeley Parker course there will be opportunity to hear a recital of music for two pianists. Enforced cancellation of a scheduled lecture for that date, has resulted in the engagement of erre Luboshutz and his wife, Nemenoff, who as duo rated today in the have followed al progr

on the platform during his recital.

Boston Programs.

Tauno Hannikainen, guest conductor from Finland, will lead the regular concerts of the [illegible] Symphony Orchestra this week Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in a program in which three compositions by the great Finnish composer Sibelius will be featured. These will be the tone poem "En Saga; Lemminkinen's Homeward Journey," for its first performance at these concerts and the First Symphony. Rounding out the program will be Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in D minor and No. 3 of Beethoven's overtures to "Leonore."

Out-of-Town Music Lovers Enjoy Concert

Monday Evening's Program by Symphony Orchestra and Albert Spalding Repeated in Boston Yesterday

Vividly contrasted music marked the Monday evening concert in the supplementary series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which in the absence of Dr. Kousevitzky on brief vacation was conducted with more than ordinary freedom and fervor by Richard Burgin, the concert master of the group. The occasion brought to the platform again the eminent American violinist Albert Spalding. The program was repeated yesterday afternoon for the especial benefit of out-of-town music lovers.

There was pleasant opening in the sprightly strains of Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro." Whatever may have been true of the story on which it was based, it will be agreed that the music is innocent and charming.

Merry music also was Prokofieff's 'Classical" Symphony. Not often in Symphony hall is there opportunity to hear a symphony in four movements that runs just thirteen minutes all told. But Prokofieff, while adhering closely to the traditional formula, had the skill and the wit to condense it within that limit, quite a feat in itself. Couched in the terms of Mozart and Haydn, it has just enough suggestion of modernity to give it pep as well as piquancy.

Mr. Burgin infused the Strauss tone poem "Don Juan" with a good deal of warmth and color, notably so in the passage in which the tuba and brass instruments sound above the rest of the orchestra that dominating melodic theme that is the most thrilling climax of the work.

For merry close to the program was the "Batuque," or Negro Dance, imported into Brazil and utilized by one of the country's composers, Oscar L. Fernandez. In its reiterated theme and rhythm it is akin to the more familiar Bolero of Ravel. Which may help to explain why it caught the fancy of the audience.

Mr. Spalding managed the intricacies of the Brahms Concerto for Violin in D major, with apparent ease and surety. Of old there used to be complaints that the orchestration overpowered the solo instrument. And for a time violinists fought shy of it. But after all, as one commentator said, in the end the violin wins out. Certainly Mr. Spalding more than held his own in the spirited measure of the Finale, exuberant and joyous music calling for all he assets of a virtuoso.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM

GENERAL FEATURES
WORCESTERSHIRE SAUCE

SECTION FIVE
WORCESTER, SUNDAY, JANUARY 21, 1940

LOCAL FEATURES
HAPPY TIME PAGE

39

Glimpses of the Art and Ideals Of Serge Koussevitzky

By George Foxhall

With Three Drawings From a Series Made From Life by Martha Burnham

Photographic study of Dr. Koussevitzky at rehearsal, by Richard Tucker.

AT THIS moment it seems inevitable that everybody who is familiar with the subject of this story will, in the end, be dissatisfied with the story itself. The restless and urgent spirit of a great artist cannot be captured, and then defined in words. Even his own words are powerless. For that which is great in him is a great longing and an eternal search, and a vision for which there are no words. We [illegible] even tell you written entirely by American composers. For years he has been one of the most ardent, as he is one of the most powerful, encouragers of American composers. I would write a story about Koussevitzky and American music. And then—. It was very disconcerting, but I knew the answer long before I asked the question. Long before I asked the question I knew that the story must be, not Koussevitzky and gato to the lovely whispers of the strings.

Lovely! But not lovely enough! I could not think how it could be more beautiful. But to Koussevitzky it was not beautiful. To him the blur of imperfection came somewhere into it like a haunting sorrow. A salvo of sharp raps rattled on the conductor's music-stand. He leaned more closely toward the first violins. His voice has world in which so perfect a synchronization of complex elements must be attained, as in the perfect meeting of the sensibilities and execution of the hundred instruments of a symphony orchestra and the interpretive mind of the conductor. Even the greatest skill must find itself refined to the utmost sense of search. Patience and patience! And can it be wondered that in minds so sensitive to every thread of tone and harmony and volume and tempo, and their infinite complexities as they are united in the instruments and in the mind of the conductor, that patience is sometimes submerged by discouragement, or even by that deeper irritation that must hold itself in silence until the artist's ideal finds again the indestructible kinship of artists and the joy of striving toward their united aim.

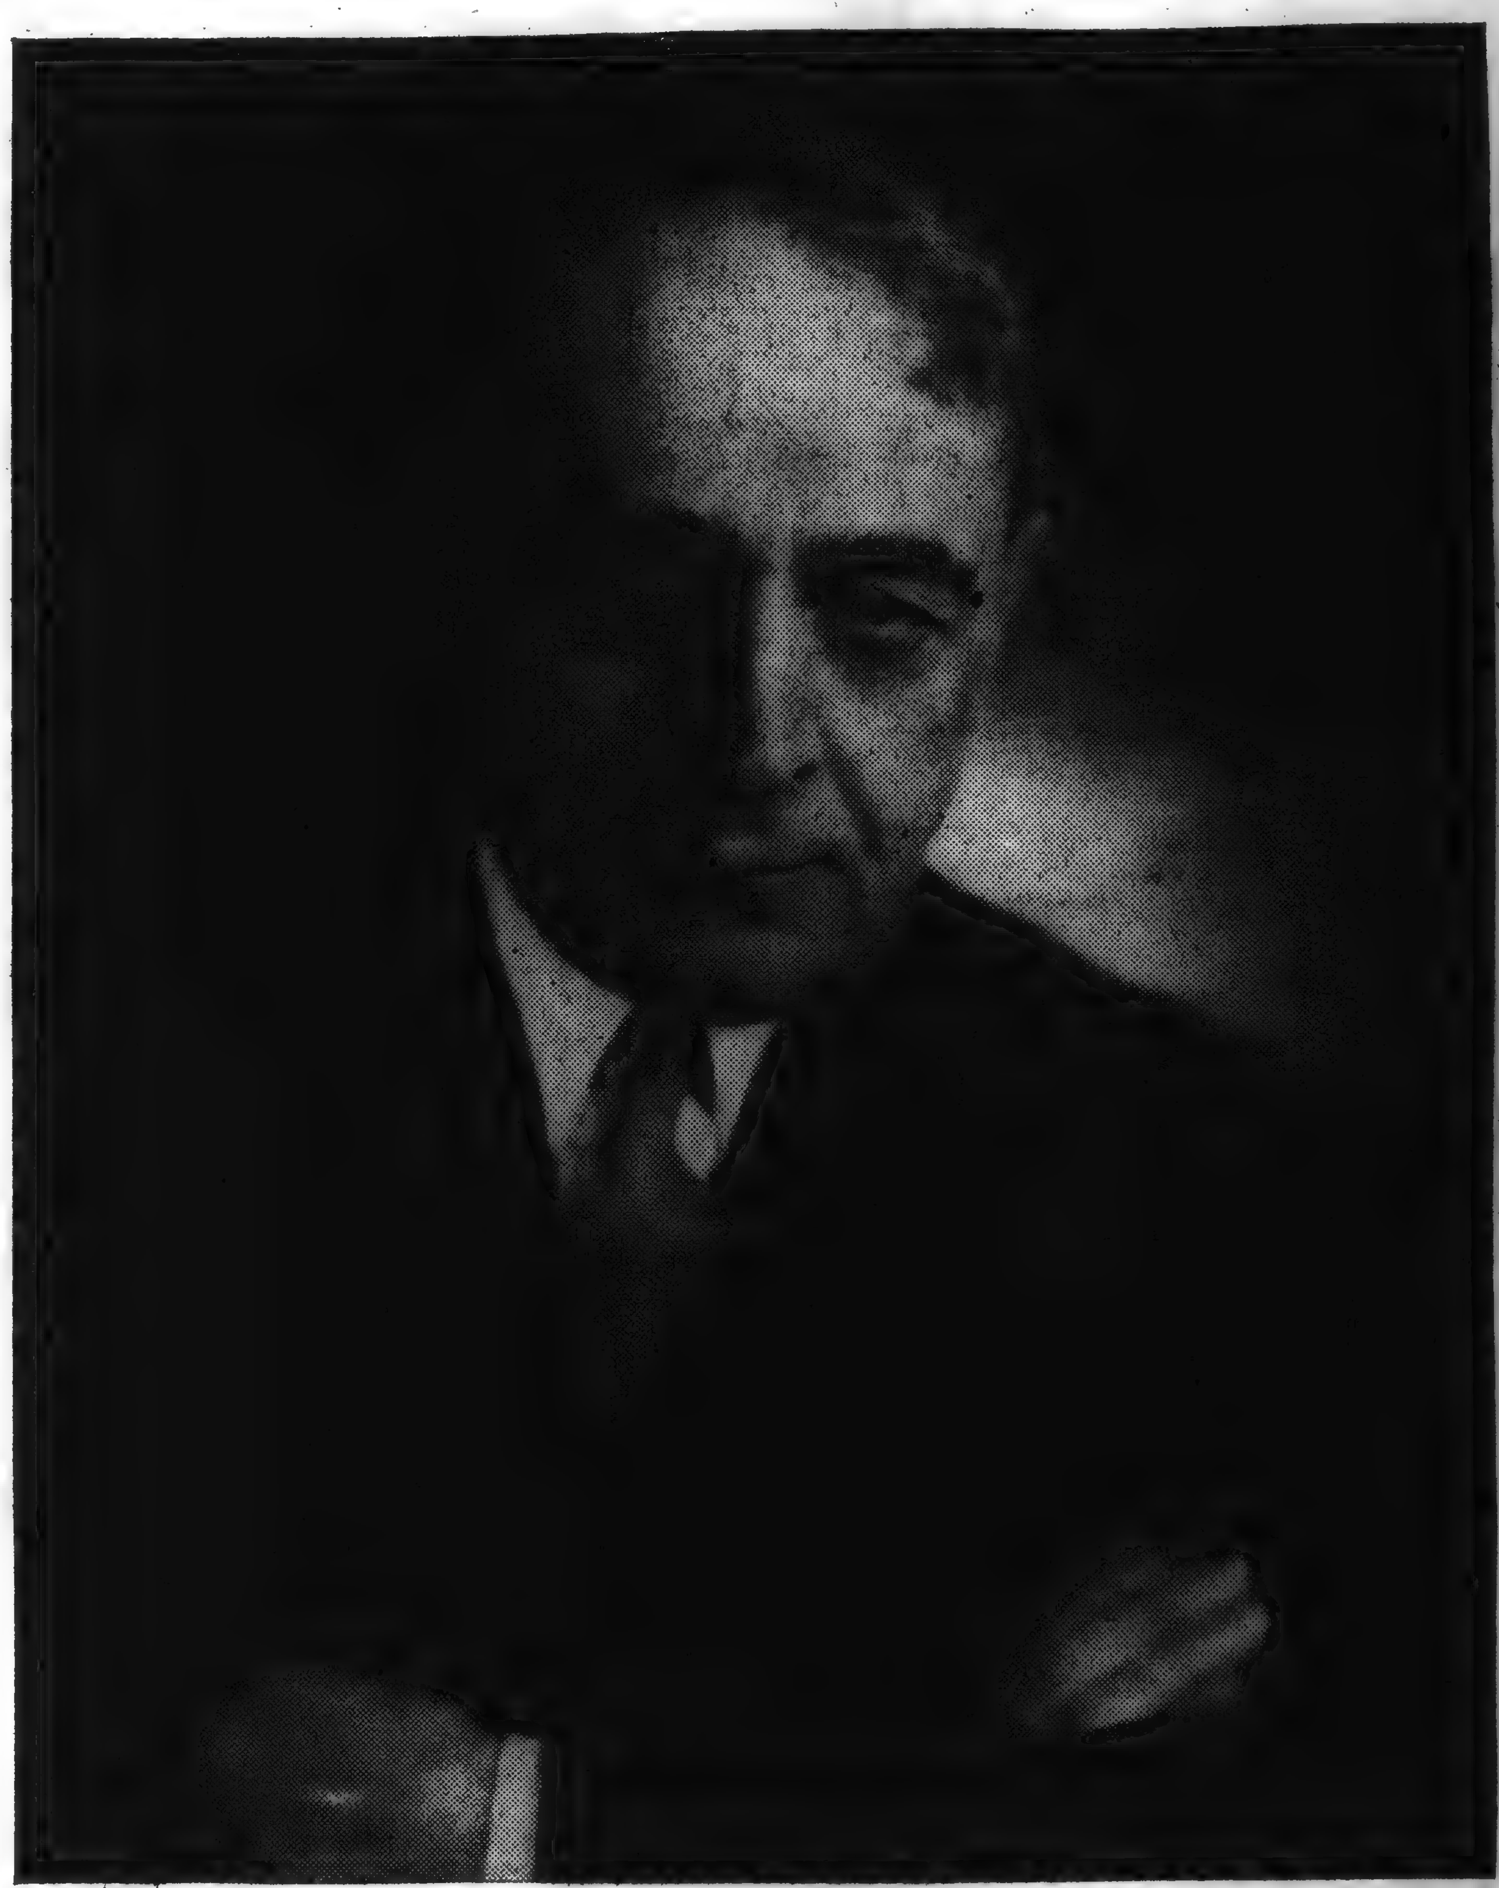
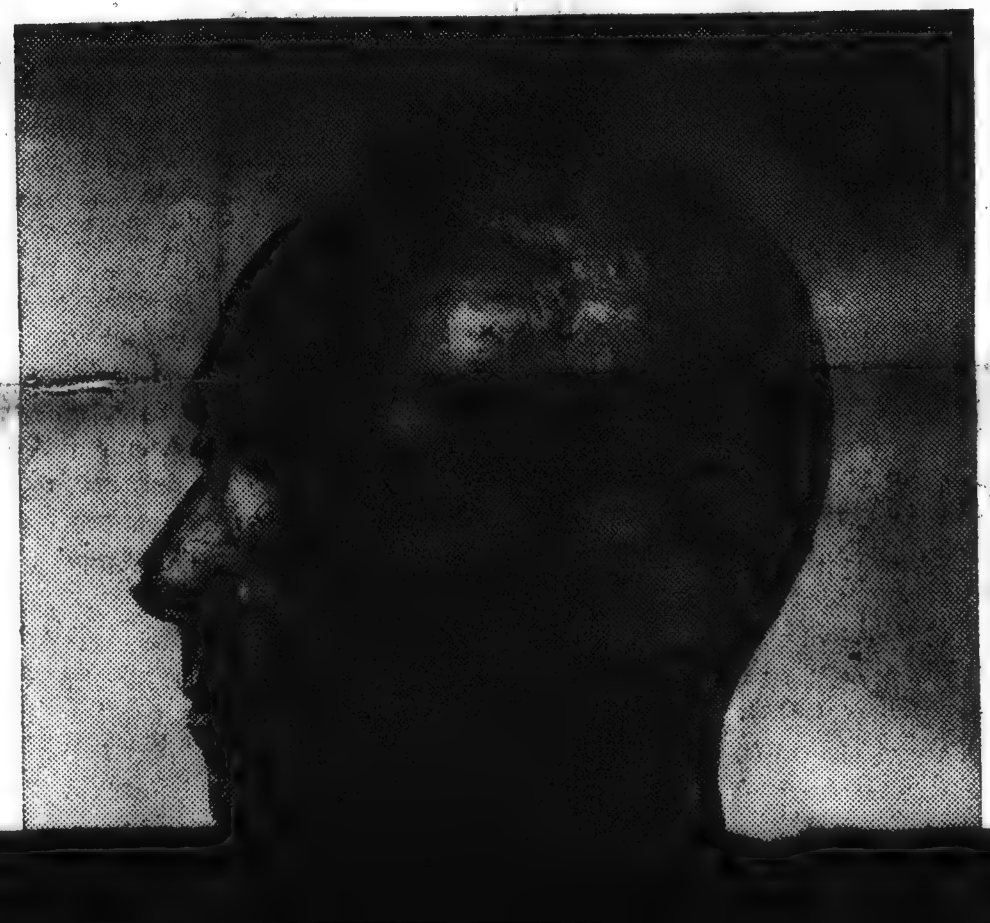
THAT IS what you chiefly feel about a rehearsal of Koussevitzky and his orchestra. There is here a concentrated and united sense of purpose; an intensity of listening—to the music and to the conductor—that will, you feel, accomplish anything. Among these men are many artists of distinction; teachers, concert artists, men known throughout the world of music for musicianship and skill. But here they retain only the intensity of the desire for perfection, as enunciated by the great leader whose genius weaves the pattern of a mightier artistry into their own, which they recognize, and in which they find a new fulfillment.

It seems to me that at once the most difficult and the most



Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, Boston Symphony Orchestra



as if we are all held breathless by an enormous anxiety; as if we are all praying that nothing shall mar this perfect moment in our lives.

The anxiety is ended. There is a great silence. Slowly the things that can be more easily sustained flow back to us; voices, people moving, instruments being packed, sheet music gathered, corridors, stairs, greetings; all the pleasant and endurable commonplaces of life. ....

WE WERE in the conductor's suite. Fresh from his shower and trim in a smart business suit Dr. Koussevitzky showed now no signs of the intense labor of the past three hours. His complexion is ruddy, his eyes couragement to American composers, too, Dr. Koussevitzky. I have just been reading Edward Alden Jewell's book on 'Is There An American Art?' It suggests to me the parallel question, 'Is There An American Music?' "

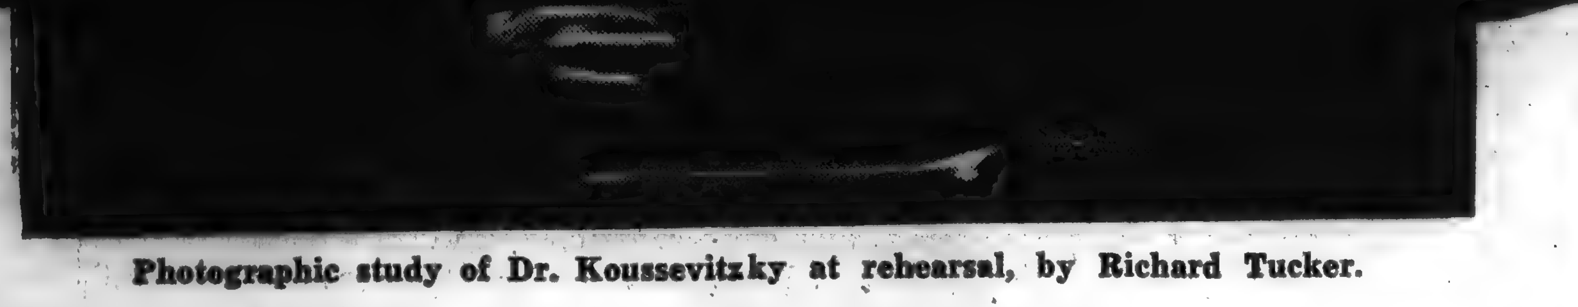
Dr. Koussevitzky smiled. "I have not become familiar with American painting," he said, "but I would say that in the true sense art should not be localized. It is true that the work of artists is affected by their environment to the extent that it will perhaps show certain tendencies of idiom or method or viewpoint, but the fundamental elements that make it art will be universal. The great German, Italian, French, English, Russian mas-



Photographic study of Dr. Koussevitzky at rehearsal, by Richard Tucker.

AT THIS moment it seems inevitable that everybody who is familiar with the subject of this story will, in the end, be dissatisfied with the story itself. The restless and urgent spirit of a great artist cannot be captured, and then defined in words. Even his own words are powerless. For that which is great in him is a great longing and an eternal search, and a vision for which there are no words. We may even tell you his uttered opinions, with great accuracy, but those opinions are the fruit of so much, and are leading to so much. Lacking the dynamics of his own utterance, they will fall short of being the living ideas that glowed under the spell of a revealing personality.

For a long time I had hoped that I might write a story about Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, and one of the great orchestra conductors of our time. But one does not burst casually in on such an adventure. The opportunity must be fitting and the purpose something more than curiosity. And at last it came.

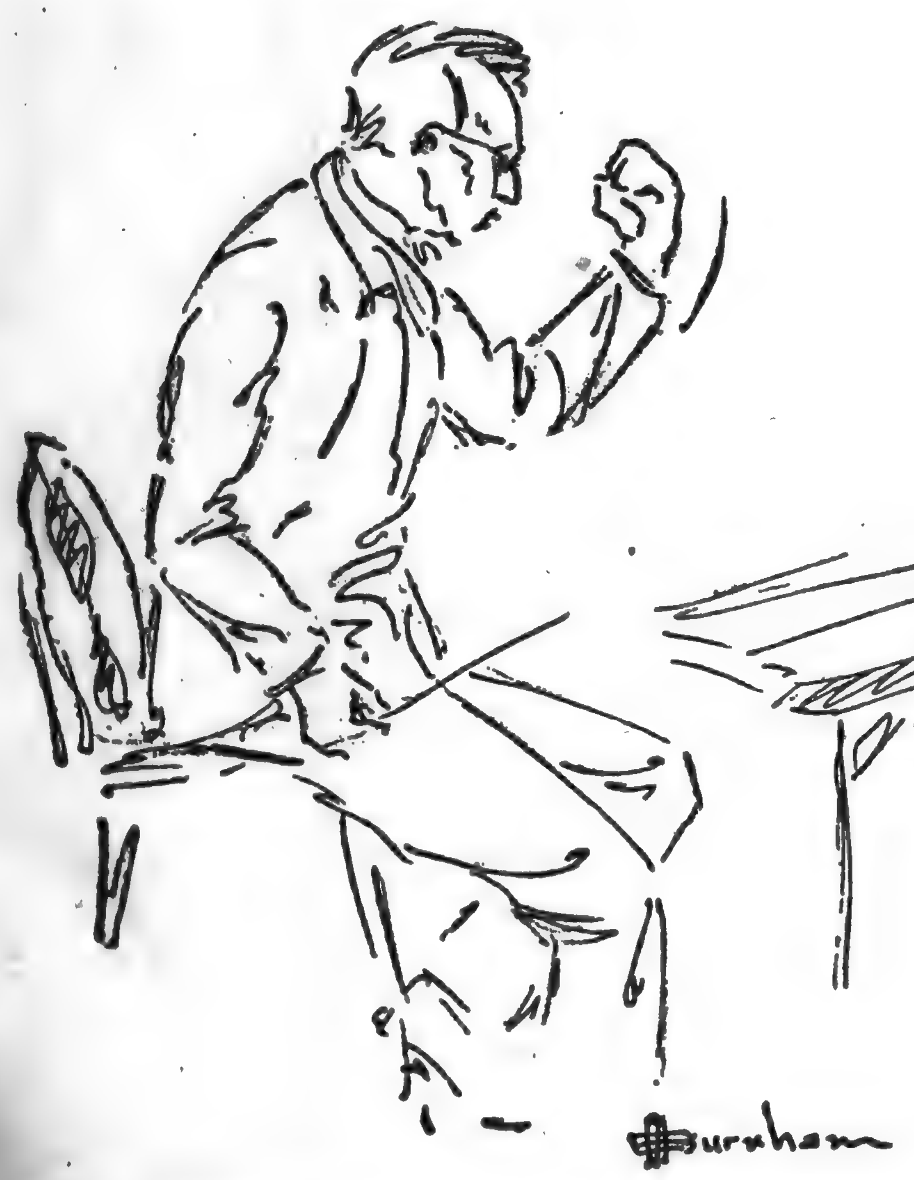
At first it seemed very simple. Koussevitzky had, in the face of opposition that would have balked a less resolute person, produced in New York a symphonic program of music written entirely by American composers. For years he has been one of the most ardent, as he is one of the most powerful, encouragers of American composers. I would write a story about Koussevitzky and American music. And then—. It was very disconcerting, but I knew the answer long before I asked the question. Long before I asked the question I knew that the story must be, not Koussevitzky and American Music, but Koussevitzky.

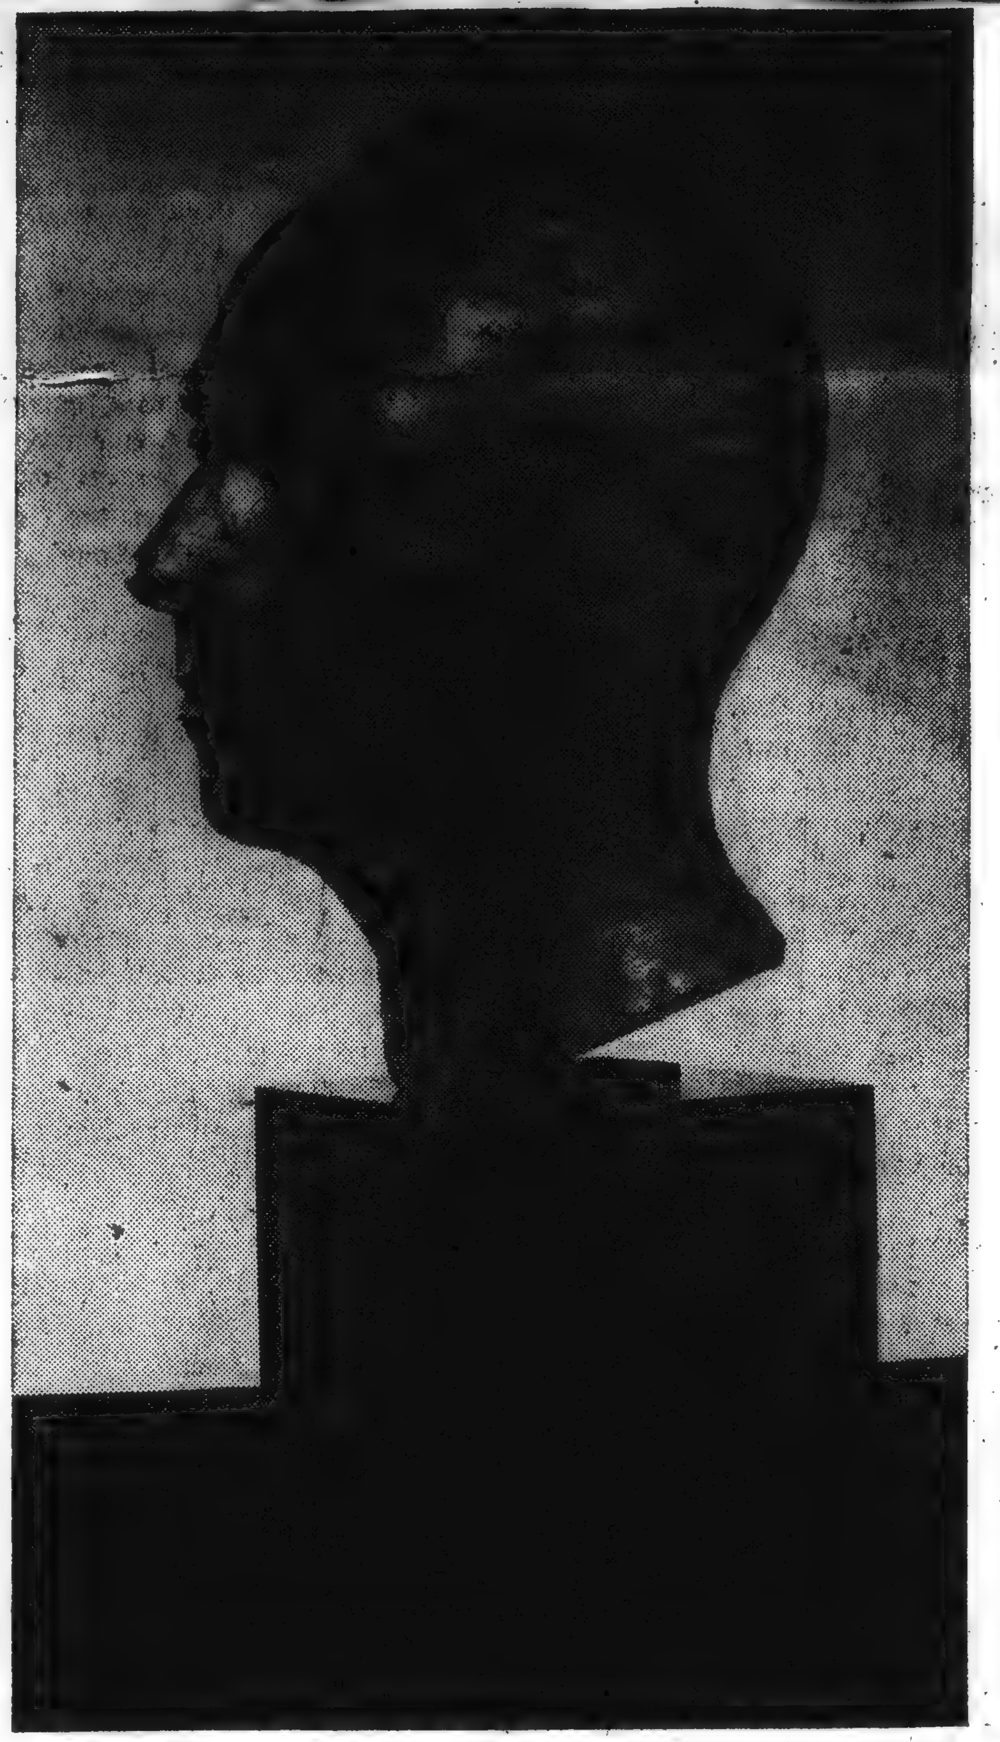
FOR HOURS I sat in the balcony at Boston Symphony Hall and watched a rehearsal. A great curtain shut off the empty auditorium at about the fourth or fifth row, for even one of the most perfect of halls will echo when empty.

On the platform a limited orchestra was playing a work by Mozart. On a dais to which was bolted a plain chair, a man in a loosely fitting costume was crouched sidewise, half in and half out of the chair, talking softly yet urgently to the first violins; smiling, coaxing, frowning; his baton moving in little beats of persuasive rhythm, his left hand tensely open and moving in little lifting gestures; his whole being absorbed in a deep intensity; his voice a soft obbligato to the lovely whispers of the strings.

Lovely! But not lovely enough! I could not think how it could be more beautiful. But to Koussevitzky it was not beautiful. To him the blur of imperfection came somewhere into it like a haunting sorrow. A salvo of sharp raps rattled on the conductor's music-stand. He leaned more closely toward the first violins. His voice has a soft, musical quality, enhanced by those charming idiosyncrasies of speech noticeable in cultivated people who have come late to the English tongue.

"Gentlemen!" he said, and then paused, as if to reveal to them by silence the weight of his distress. "A thousand times I must tell you." His tones were low but earnest; the gentle reproach of one who realizes the merit and skill of his listeners; who knows that only some painful aberration can be responsible for this impasse; and who is at a loss to find the key to it. Then hope returned; not buoyantly perhaps, but definitely. The soft voice rippled on; illustrative, sure, courteous. Again the strings became messengers of the lovely music, bringing amazing and precious language to a dream of beauty that, so long ago, had been beyond words. The conductor smiled. Again he was half out of the chair. He was leaning toward the instruments as if to catch every breath of tone. He was not smiling at the first violins. His face was lifted upward. He was smiling at something so nearly perfect that of all other things he was, for the moment,. unaware. Silence came, like a pause in living. And then — "That was good," said the master softly. "That was very good."



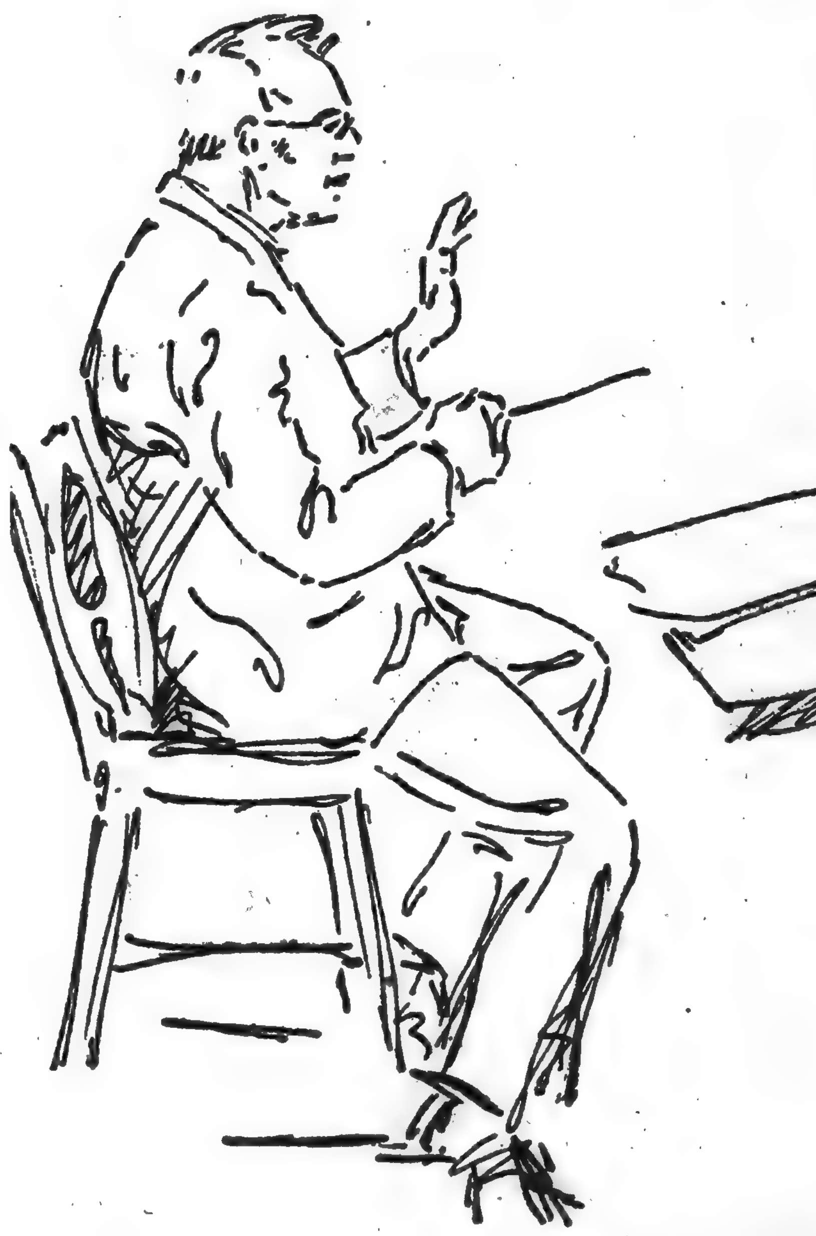


Bronze head modeled by Gitou Knoop. (Paris)

BUT MINE was a privileged, and, in a way, a confidential position. That does not mean that anything transpired which could not be told without embarrassment to anybody. On the contrary! It means that mere narration, unless greatly gifted, would by no means convey the relationship that a sensitive person must perceive between the orchestra and the conductor. Great leadership, I think, is a joint product, where great results are achieved. Only men of great capacity can be greatly led. It is difficult to imagine anything else in the beautiful of their experiences in the orchestra must be in the rehearsals; just as, in the painting of a picture or the writing of a poem, the weariness, the discouragement, and the pain of the search for a beauty of the soul that has not yet been reached by the mind, blend at last in a moment of discovery more exquisite than that work will ever bring again.

The Mozart work gave way to one by Schubert, with a full orchestra, and that, in turn to one so magnificently moving, terminating in a finale so incredibly beautiful that it would be futile to try to write about it—the last movement of the Ninth Symphony of Gustave Mahler. I do not think that I shall ever again hear anything like this, for here I watched this great conductor working it with infinite patience to its glorious fulfillment. Many passages had been done over and over, interspersed by those characteristic and momentary moods of volubility or silence that form the so well understood language with which the conductor communicates the intensity of his perception to the orchestra. And with each accomplishment would come some sign of pleasure, peculiarly radiant and spontaneous. "Good! Good! That was very good." And once, at the conclusion of, I think, an oboe solo, "Brava! That was very fine."

SUDDENLY, it seemed, perfection entered. There were no more pauses. The string choirs were taking up successively, and interweaving, such music as can never be described; lovely with the mighty spirit of a master, conquering, for all of us, the despair of a broken life; rising to an exalted defiance of death, by creating, from elements of pure beauty, immortality.



Only the strings are playing—and not all of them at once. Everybody else is listening; leaning forward as if in hypnotic concentration. The conductor is listening. His baton seems to be but the involuntary pulse of a deep hope. It is as if we are all held breathless by an enormous anxiety; as if we are all praying that nothing shall mar this perfect moment in our lives.

The anxiety is ended. There is a great silence. Slowly the things that can be more easily sustained flow back to us; voices, people moving, instruments being packed, sheet music gathered, corridors, stairs, greetings; all the pleasant and endurable commonplaces of life. ....

WE WERE in the conductor's suite. Fresh from his shower and trim in a smart business suit Dr. Koussevitzky showed now no signs of the intense labor of the past three hours. His complexion is ruddy, his eyes sparkling, his figure well-knit and muscular looking.

"Were you at the rehearsal?" he asked.

"Yes, sir."

"What did you find?"

"I found something so beautiful that it moved me more than anything I recall."

"The Mahler?"

"Yes, sir."

"I am very happy to hear you say that. It moves me, also, when I am playing it."

For a moment we looked at the busy traffic of the street.

"Mahler is not so well known in this country, but he will be. We performed the Ninth Symphony in 1931 and again in 1933. The growing discrimination of the American public in musical matters will make his place secure."

"You have given great encouragement to American composers, too, Dr. Koussevitzky. I have just been reading Edward Alden Jewell's book on 'Is There An American Art?' It suggests to me the parallel question, 'Is There An American Music?' "

Dr. Koussevitzky smiled. "I have not become familiar with American painting," he said, "but I would say that in the true sense art should not be localized. It is true that the work of artists is affected by their environment to the extent that it will perhaps show certain tendencies of idiom or method or viewpoint, but the fundamental elements that make it art will be universal. The great German, Italian, French, English, Russian masters did not deliberately write great German, Italian, French, English, or Russian music. They wrote music. That the idiom, method, or viewpoint were purely secondary is proved by the fact that the great masters in each group wrote great music, equally acclaimed throughout the world.

"There is no German music, Italian music, French music, American music, for the artist. There is just music.

"NEVERTHELESS, it is in America that we shall find the hope for the future of music as the great reconciling influence which is the true hunger of the world for the arts. We have here such magnificent equipment; splendid schools of music all over the country; a

Turn to Page Six

WORCESTER SUNDAY TELEGRAM, JANUARY 21, 1940

Glimpses of the Art and Ideals Of Serge Koussevitzky

(Continued from Page One)

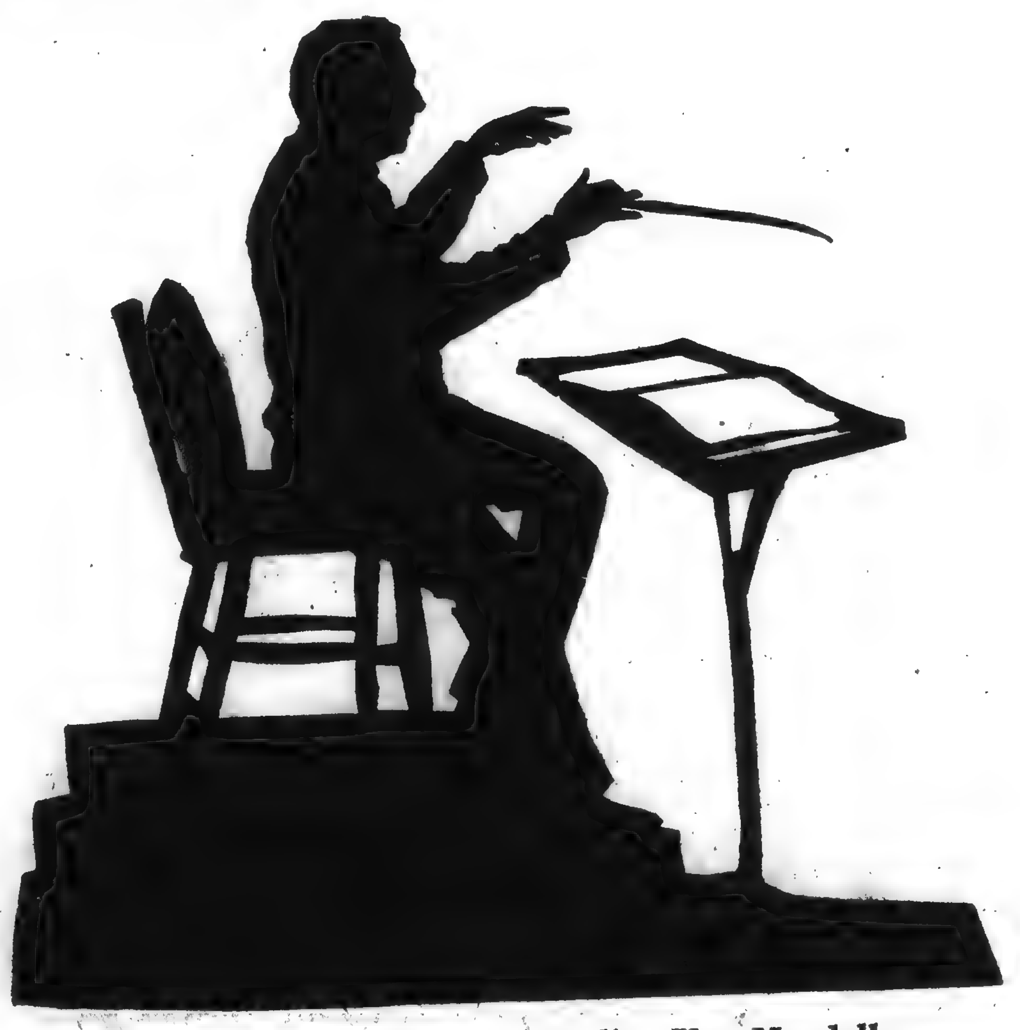
tremendous public of intelligent and educated people, constantly developing in aspiration toward and understanding of the best in the arts; the ability to support fine musical organizations which cannot be maintained solely by their own financial returns; composers and artists of brilliant ability; and a tremendous group of students and amateur artists and aesthetes constantly keeping the love of music alive throughout the domestic and social life of the country. No land in the world is similarly equipped; so little distracted by the misfortunes of war or unrest; so animated by the compelling vigor that pursues accomplishment."

BUT THIS brought another line of thought. I asked the master if he thought this urge for accomplishme[illegible] an unmixed blessing.

"I think we have a definite peril there," he said. "I don't think our educational system is wrong, because what the system should be I would not know. But I think our educational objectives in general are wrong. Our young people go to college and study for degrees, or they study one of the arts. It is impressed upon them, and it becomes their own sole point of view, that this is for the furtherance of their career in the practical world. But a career should be incidental to the fullness of one's life, not itself the fullness of life.

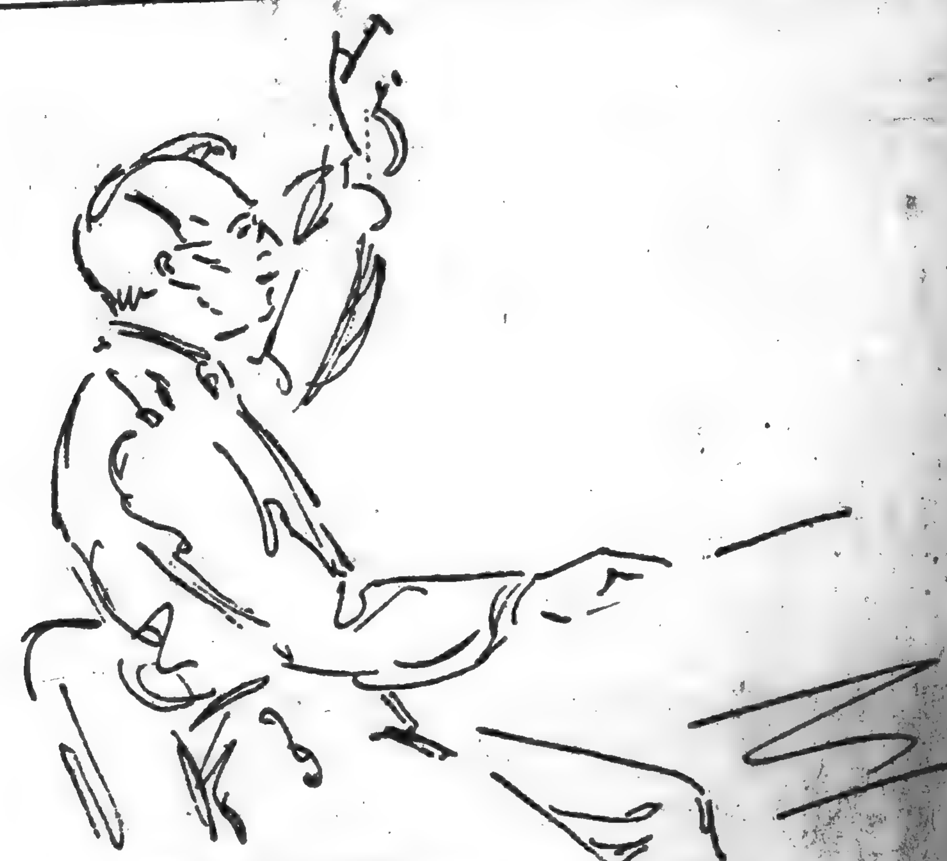
"The degree! The art! These are not for one's pride, but for one's joy. In acquiring the degree we have had laid before us the rich and lovely treasures of the world's learning. This is a great privilege; an unfolding of lives, added, magically, to our own life. If we are to use this in our career it must always be based upon the awareness that as other lives have been unfolded and added to ours, so now we must unfold and add ours to others, not because we have, of ourselves, so much, but because we have received so much. There is no true gain without true fulfillment, and that must be within our lives before it can be truly symbolized by our careers.

"If we study an art we must study it for the love of the art, not for the sake of attaining greatness or success in it. We must abandon the attitude that every student must be a virtuoso or a failure. Many people bring great joy to their own lives and others without ever attaining fame. If you can study an art be grateful and humble, for you have the work of the great souls of the world for your guidance. If so that you can shape this love to your career, that, also, is your joy, but what the student must seek to know is, 'How does this art speak, for me, to the spirit of mankind,' for thus it has been speaking, for true artists, through the ages.



Silhouette by the Baroness Eveline Von Maydell

"AND THERE is more that the student and the artist should learn. And that is, that these great privileges have not been available to all, but that these others, also, find their own beauty and have their own joy. And those who have these special privileges should think of these others, and work to bring to them ever a finer awareness of those beauties that truly belong to all. And they should learn from them, too, that not only in their own field is beauty, but that there is the joy of making in every field where human hands and human hearts toil for the fulfillment of life, and serve each other and the world in honesty of purpose. We should teach our students that there should be no special vanity in being a scholar or being an artist, but a special privilege and a special joy; and with that a special duty which the soul of the artist must find and fulfill, to ease the world's weariness, even at the cost of his own."



As I drove home my mind went over the life of this man, who, as a homeless and penniless boy had suffered so much for love of the art which, through this love, had become a career. It has taken him to the greatest heights in the musical world, but it has taken him, I think, to a fulfillment that is sweeter than fame. A great artist! A wise and gentle spirit!

182

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
FEB 2 - 1940

Pinch Hitter

DOROTHY MAYNOR
Bats for Enesco.

Concert Shift Brings Negro Soprano

Dorothy Maynor, young Negro soprano who was "discovered" last summer by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will come to Rochester, Feb. 23.

Miss Maynor, who sang her first solos in her father's Methodist Church in Norfolk, Va., will come to Eastman Theater to fill the cancelled engagement of Georges Enesco, Rumanian violinist, who is ill at his home.

Last August the 28-year-old singer attended the Berkshire Music Festival, where Dr. Koussevitsky was persuaded to let her sing. An instant "hit," Miss Maynor in the past five months has scored a huge sucess in New York and been pronounced "the musical discovery of the decade." She has been classed with such distinguished Negro singers as Marian Anderson, contralto; Roland Hayes, tenor, and Paul Robeson, baritone.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
FEB 3 - 1940

Greason Paintings Of Orchestra Now in New York

Donald C. Greason's painting of Serge Koussevitzky and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on display at the Berkshire Museum last summer during the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, are now on exhibition at the Hudson C. Walker Galleries in New York City.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
FEB 3 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
YONKERS, N. Y.
YONKERS RECORD
FEB 1 - 1940

Most Important Local Discovery In "Echoes" Bill

After-dinner listeners to WEAF will get their chance to hear Dorothy Maynor, acclaimed as the most important vocal discovery of recent years, when the sensational Negro soprano appears as the guest soloist on "Echoes of New York" on Tuesday, Feb. 6, at 7:30 p. m.

When Miss Maynor sang for Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, at the Berkshire Festival last Summer, he hailed her as "a native Flagstad," exclaiming: "One of the finest singers I have ever heard!" In November Miss Maynor made her formal debut in Town Hall to the acclaim of the metropolitan critics.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
FEB 2 - 1940

Finland Said Protecting Sibelius 'Like a National Treasure' in War

So Says Tauno Hannikainen, Finnish Conductor, Who Will Lead Boston Symphony Tonight

Boston, Feb. 1—(AP)—Jean Sibelius, Finland's great composer, is being protected "like a national treasure," Tauno Hannikainen, Finnish orchestral conductor, here to be a guest leader if the Boston Symphony orchestra, said tonight.

"I last saw Sibelius at an orchestra rehearsal in Helsinki at the outbreak of the war," related Hannikainen, conductor of the Turku orchestra, "but since then the government has hidden him well in a secret place as a precautionary step to preserve Finland's great genius."

The Finn, who was invited by Director Serge Koussevitzky to be a guest conductor here tomorrow as a result of the stamp of recommendation which Sibelius placed upon him, was excused from civilian guard duty by his government in order to conduct in this country.

He has performed here before, however, his rendition of the Sibelius Second Symphony with the Boston Pops orchestra in 1938 having a large part to do with the invitation to come again.

Forty-four years old and of medium stature, Hannikainen speaks English haltingly, but well enough to put his ideas over to the Boston musicians. His wife was in the balcony today as the Finn, coatless, sent the orchestra through a dress rehearsal of tomorrow's program.

Three works by Sibelius, including one new to Boston—"Lemmin-Kainen's Homeward Journey" — were played, along with two by Handel and Beethoven. The orchestra men, however, while noting an indefinable element of excitement in his interpretation of Sibelius, gave most of their applause for his conducting of the Handel "Concerto Grosso," and the Beethoven Leonore Overture No 3.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES HERALD
FEB 3 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
FEB 3 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 3 - 1940

BROOKLINE, MASS
CHRONICLE
2/1/40

— Give To Community Fund —

The series of youth concerts by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Wheeler Beckett will be resumed at Jordan Hall next Wednesday afternoon at three-thirty o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
FEB 2 - 1940

MUSIC NOTES.

Although Serge Prokofieff has been unable to obtain visas which would permit him to make his scheduled visit to the United States this year, American audiences will be introduced to one of his latest major works next month. Gregor Piatigorsky will play his Cello Concerto in E Minor, op. 58, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on March 21 and 23.

Rise Stevens, young American contralto of the Metropolitan Opera, has been engaged by the San Francisco Opera Company for its 1940 autumn season, which precedes the Metropolitan season. She will sing the title role of Strauss's "Rosenkavalier" in a production to be given in English. Lotte Lehmann will be the Marschallin. Miss Stevens also has been re-engaged for the opera season at the Teatro Colon of Buenos Aires this summer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
FEB 2 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NORWICH, CONN.
BULLETIN
FEB 2 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BANGOR, ME.
NEWS
FEB 2 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
FEB 2 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
FEB 2 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
FEB 2 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
FEB 3 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
FEB 3 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM WILMINGTON, DEL.
NEWS
FEB 3 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
FEB 3 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. LOUIS, MO.
STAR TIMES
FEB 2 - 1940

Asserts Finns Protect Sibelius as a Treasure

BOSTON, Feb. 2.—(U. P.)—Since the start of the Russian-Finnish fighting, Finland's famous composer, Jean Sibelius, has been hidden and protected "like a national treasure," according to Tauno Hannikainen, Finnish conductor.

Jean Sibelius.

Here as guest leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Hannikainen, conductor of the Abo Orchestra, said in an interview last night:

"I last saw Sibelius at an orchestra rehearsal in Helsingfors at the outbreak of the war. But since then the government has hidden him well as a precautionary step to preserve Finland's great genius."

Hannikainen was excused from civilian guard duty in Finland to keep his agreement with the Boston orchestra.

In his first appearance today, he was to conduct three of Sibelius' works, including "Lemminkainen's Homeward Journey" in its Boston premiere.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DALLAS, TEX.
JOURNAL
FEB 2 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram
FEB 2 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
FEB 2 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD JOURNAL
FEB 2 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
FEB 2 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
HERALD
FEB 2 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
FEB 2 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM
FEB 3 - 1940

Finnish Conductor Wins Ovation From Boston Symphony Audience

BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON, Feb. 2—A member of Finland's civic home guard, on special leave for the duration of a musical mission, conducted the world famous Boston Symphony Orchestra today and evoked an ovation of stamping feet and cheers from a traditionally staid Friday audience.

The conductor was Tauno Hannikainen, 44-year old leader of the Turku orchestra who came here with Jean Sibelius' stamp of approval.

Blond and of medium stature, Hannigainen gave a reading entirely from memory of three of the Finnish master's works—"Lemminkainen's homeward journey," heard for the first time in Boston; the one poem, "En Saga," and the first symphony.

Accustomed to more urbane and sophisticated treatment of Sibelius' scores, Boston quickly noted a flavor of race and intensity that heretofore had been absent.

Subordinating sonority and balance for the driving force of rhythm and emotion, Hannikainen's interpretation of the first symphony was a considerably wilder one than usually heard, but one that nevertheless was technically skillful, critics agreed. Handel's concerto grosso in D minor and Beethoven's Leonore Overture No. 3 rounded out the program.

Hannikainen's wife was in the audience as he conducted. From here he will go to Washington to see Finnish Minister Hjalmar Procope and possibly undertake other engagements in America as part of Finland's good-will expression.

It was Hannikainen's second trip to the United States in 1938, he conducted the Boston pops orchestra in the Sibelius second symphony—a rendition that resulted in an invitation to return this year.

183

Tauno Hannikainen Warmly Received as Symphony Concert Conducto

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 14th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tauno Hannikainen conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Handel...Concerto Grosso in D minor Op. 6. No. 10
Beethoven..."Leonore" Overture No. 3 Op. 72
Sibelius...."En Saga," Tone Poem Op. 9
Sibelius..."Lemminkainen's Homeward Journey" Op. 22
Sibelius...Symphony No. 1 in E minor Op. 39

There would have been a warm welcome here for Mr. Hannikainen, out of respect for Finland, even if he had proved less fine a conductor than in fact he was. As it is, there is fortunately no need to indicate any reservations. He is a stirring conductor and achieved eloquent interpretations with the full co-operation of the orchestra. The most exciting performance was undoubtedly that of Sibelius's First Symphony.

It was interesting to hear so early a work of Sibelius as the tone poem, "En Saga," which, in spite of Mr. Koussevitzky's enthusiasm for the great Finnish composer, has not been heard here since 1910. There are fascinating pages in it, notably at the beginning. Mr. Cecil Gray, in typically cross-grained fashion, makes a virtue out of the persistent use of a pedal point in this work. Yet it is just that which makes the music seem over-long. Still, the devotees of Sibelius's music can hardly afford to pass up "En Saga" merely because it is not perfect of its kind.

Yet more curious is it that Mr. Koussevitzky should never have chosen "Lemminkainen's Homeward Journey." Here is a completely brilliant and successful tone poem. In spite of the rugged vigor of the music, there are undercurrents of joy and sadness. This is much more than the evocation of a single mood, a more important work, in consequence, than its lovely companion, "The Swan of Tuonela."

Sibelius's First Symphony is in some ways more durable than his Second, which is more often played and is deemed by the perky Mr. Gray to be a great improvement. The scherzo is well nigh unique, the first movement is thrilling and the andante is a hauntingly beautiful intermezzo. The finale, perhaps, is somewhat emptier; but then so is the finale of the Second Symphony. As we have said, Mr. Hannikainen conducted a magnificent performance of the First Symphony. Small wonder that the audience, cordially disposed from the first for obvious reasons, should have stamped and cheered.

A good deal of fuss was made, via the channels of the program book, of the authenticity of this performance of Handel's Concerto Grosso. But a piano was substituted for the announced harpsichord (some programs noted one, some another), and its activity in the continuo was very circumscribed. All in all it sounded exactly the same as the customary performances of Handel's music in this form, with the "air" played as slowly as was humanly possible. Beethoven's great overture was given a ringing interpretation that revealed Mr. Hannikainen's skill in the science of effect.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky returns from his holiday to conduct Vincent d'Indy's Symphony No. 2 in B flat major; Bach's Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor, transcribed by Respighi; Prokofieff's Violin Concerto No. 2, with Jascha Heifetz as soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN ✓
FEB 3 - 1940

The Boston Symphony Orchestra can now [illegible] well as heard. Donald C. Greason, once of Brooklyn, but more recently of Boston, has been painting it. The results are now on view in the Hudson Walker Gallery, 38 East Fifty-seventh street.

These representations, it must be said at once, have an old tonal quality. The word for it, at the moment, escapes me. "Humid" almost describes it. Can Boston be humid in winter? Mr. Greason ought to know, of course, for he did these pictures on the spot. And Boston has accepted them without a murmer. That, probably, is all that matters. New York opinion on such a subject could have no weight. I have never been in Boston in winter. Nor in London. I was warned about both places—but chiefly about the chilly dampness. No one ever told me about the humidity. One lives and learns. It was the suggestion of London murkiness in these pictures that appeased Boston, no doubt. Boston has never shaken off the thralldom of London and most of the citizens—in spite of the widely publicized warning by Mrs. Roosevelt's elocutionary teacher—still use the broad "ahs" in casual speech.

That Mr. Greason was deliberately playing to the vanity of Boston in this matter can be seen in the light and frolicsome wash-drawings which haven't a bit of murkiness and might almost be mistaken for drawings of our Philharmonic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ✓
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
FEB 3 - 1940

Boston Symphony.

Donald C. Greason shows his sketches, paintings and drawings of the Boston Symphony at the Hudson D. W[illegible]ry, and a regular trip behind the scenes this is. We see the rehearsals, performances and the various divisions of the orchestra and two studies of Koussevitzky himself. Drums and Harps is a regular study in forms and looks almost like an abstract composition.

Recent oils and drawings by Dorothy Eaton and a series of water colors by Richard S. Daggy are displayed at the Montross Gallery. Miss Eaton shows decorative and highly colored rather than subtle flower subjects and a few portraits. Daggy portrays the Connecticut country around Silvermine, where he lives, also with emphasis on color. January Thaw, Playground and Riverstreet are particularly effective.

* * * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y. ✓
HERALD-TRIBUNE
FEB 4 - 1940

The Boston Symphony

Donald C. Greason, fascinated by the idea of painting the musicians of a great orchestra, devoted many months two years ago to painting the Boston Symphony under the direction of Se[illegible]ussevitzky. His earlier shows in Boston and at the Berkshire Museum, preliminary to his present one at the Hudson Walker Gallery, were so successful that practically all of the work was acquired by music-loving art collectors. Mr. Greason's new pictures of the rehearsing musicians combine atmospheric effect with sharply fixed characterization. Some of the drawings were done in a flash and are vivid notations of musicianly groups and individuals; the oils, in their soft brownish tonalities, represent a more formal adjustment of the subject to the problem of pictorial representation, and are well organized as well as cleverly painted. The effect, however, is more decorative than essentially vital.

HANNIKAINEN AT SYMPHONY

Post — Feb 3

Finnish Conductor Offers Sibelius' Works

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

When Tauno Hannikainen was engaged as guest conductor of the Symphony Orchestra no one concerned suspected what the future was to bring forth. And in view of recent tragic events, his appearance at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon had much more than mere musical significance.

No doubt the performance of Sibelius' First Symphony, with which the concert closed, would have aroused enthusiasm under any circumstances. But there was plainly more than the customary reaction to musical excitements in the demonstration that followed.

Exciting the performance of the Symphony undeniably was, and full of bardic strength and vigor and a certain elemental force. It was also at times coarse in tone, almost to brutality. The least characteristic, quite naturally, of the Finnish composer's symphonies, this E minor has been more effectively and persuasively presented here by Dr. Koussevitzky and others. Indeed, the paradox of the concert was that Mr. Hannikainen made a more favorable impression as conductor in the first two numbers of his programme, Handel's D minor Concerto Grosso for strings and the Third "Leonore" Overture of Beethoven, than in the three Sibelius pieces which followed.

Very possibly Mr. Hannikainen did all that might be done for "En Saga," previously played here for the first and only time in 1910, and for "Lemminkainen's Homeward Journey," which was new to Boston. Both are of the earlier Sibelius, antedating even the First Symphony. "En Saga" now strikes one as naive and bombastic and too long for its content, while the musical depiction of the legendary Lemminkainen's ride is not much more than a super-hurry—to borrow a term from the cinema. Sibelius was no more fittingly represented by these three pieces than Wagner would be by excerpts from "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," and "Tannhaeuser," or Strauss by "Aus Italien," "Macbeth" and "Don Juan."

To return to Handel and Beethoven, in these works, Mr. Hannikainen showed himself to be a resourceful and accomplished conductor, sure of himself and of his orchestra, directing both without a score and without vainglory. And under the circumstances it is remarkable that he could have achieved such concentration and maintained such poise. Had he permitted them to wander, his thoughts must have strayed very far from Boston and from so unimportant a pursuit as music-making. When he returns to Finland he will take with him a general God-speed from the two audiences which so briefly knew him.

Globe

MUSIC

Feb 3 '40

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The coming of Tauno Hannikainen as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brings topical drama as well as musical interest. The fact of a leading Finnish musician leaving, by express permission of his Government, his duties in the home guard of his valiantly embattled country, was bound to strike a sympathetic response in the American heart. And so it did. Mr. Hannikainen's first appearance on the stage at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon was merely the beginning of a welcome that crescendoed into stamping and cheers at the end of the concert.

Under the circumstances of his visit, it is not easy to dissociate completely, admiration for Hannikainen, as musician, from public esteem of him as a Finn—a citizen of a country for which American democracy has abiding respect. It may be said, however, that yesterday's demonstration was intended for the artist as well as the patriot.

Mr. Hannikainen divided his program between music by his countryman, Jean Sibelius, and two classic numbers—the D minor Concerto Grosso for strings, Op. 6, No. 10, by Handel, and Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3. From Sibelius came the early tone poem "En Saga," the orchestral "legend," "Lemminkainen's Homeward Journey" (first time at these concerts), and the First Symphony.

Many in the audience must have been most curious to hear how Mr. Hannikainen would conduct the works by Sibelius; here surely would be as authentic interpretations as possible from the racial point of view. And there are some who remembered the strong, unconventional reading which he gave to the Second Symphony of Sibelius at a Pop concert here in 1938.

As one had expected, all three pieces sounded more "Finnish" (for want of a better term) than probably they ever had in Symphony Hall. The cosmopolitan urbanity, sculptured grandeur and total splendor to which Bostonians have become accustomed at Sibelius performances were missing; in their place were a definite—if not describable—flavor of race, and an intensity, almost savage in the heroic E minor Symphony, that was overwhelming.

While Mr. Hannikainen has a keen ear for sonority and balance of tone among the different sections of the orchestra, he is willing to subordinate these matters to the general driving force of rhythm and emotion when the music seems to justify it. Thus, although the style of Beethoven's marvelous overture was good and the interpretation not at all exaggerated, the reading was full-bodied rather than meticulous.

A well-equipped musician, Mr. Hannikainen conducts from memory. His gestures are forceful, but not eccentric, and his appearance on the stand is modest. His feeling for style was evident in his excellent treatment of Handel's Concerto Grosso. Except for too slow a pace in the Air, Handel's noble music went along with requisite vitality and dignity. Incidentally, those majestic final cadences at the end of movements were not slowed up too much, as many conductors are prone to do with them.

The Concerto Grosso was not played exactly according to the original version, as promised in first announcements. Numerous strings were used, the "continuo" part was entrusted to a piano rather than a harpsichord, and the "concertino" group of solo strings was doubled in number.

In view of the splendid impression Mr. Hannikainen made, it is to be regretted that we cannot have more than one program from him. What an experience it would be to hear him conduct symphonies by Sibelius! As it is, hail and farewell.—C. W. D.

Finnish Conductor Welcomed

C.S.M. Feb 3 '40

The Arts in Boston

Tauno Hannikainen, Finnish conductor, was warmly greeted and enthusiastically acclaimed by yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony audience. He had been excused by his government from military service in order to keep his engagement to act as guest conductor of the local orchestra. Although the audience for the most part was undoubtedly in sympathy with Mr. Hannikainen politically, it seemed evident that its cordiality to him was based chiefly on musical grounds.

The visitor's program paid tribute to the classics and did honor to his native country through the scores of Sibelius. Beginning with Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, in D minor, op. 6, no. 10, it proceeded to Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore" No. 3. Then it turned to the great Finnish composer, offering the tone poems, "En Saga" and "Lemminkäinen's Homeward Journey," and the First Symphony, in E minor.

Mr. Hannikainen (who had been heard here once at the Pop concerts) disclosed himself as a conductor remarkable for his mastery of both music and orchestra. He conducts without score, according to the prevailing fashion, and although he is vigorous in his direction he makes no unnecessary motions. He has a strong rhythmic sense, and a feeling for tonal color, qualities very useful in the music of Sibelius. He also has a clear conception of the structure of a score, and is able to obtain the exposition that he wants from the orchestra. Above all, he has a tremendous flair for the dramatic.

The Handel was delectably done. Mr. Hannikainen, said the program book, used the score in its original form, restoring the harpsichord continuo as part of the concertino. (A piano was used instead of the harpsichord.) The version is of great clarity and purity of line. The Air was taken at too slow a pace, more Largo than Lento, and the melodic line was broken. But the Allegro moderato was tossed off with the most effortless gaiety and charm.

The visitor's dramatic instincts had full play in the Beethoven overture, which came to a performance of electric effect. Yet here began to appear a tendency to overdo such effects. The slow passages were too slow, the fast ones too fast. The pianissimos and the fortissimos ran to the extremes of the dynamic scale, but the grades between were less well differentiated; climaxes were not given their full power because they were not built up gradually enough. Moreover, there was an inclination to emphasize accent at the expense of phrase.

These tendencies became more apparent in the symphony. Here phrases, instead of flowing, were bent at an angle, inner voices were obscured, balance was disturbed; and because of these flaws, and of extravagances in tempi, the result was often a muddy texture. Coming from Finland, Mr. Hannikainen might be expected to be more or less authoritative in his Sibelius; but the composer seems to have a habit of praising the interpretations of whoever performs his works. Performances, therefore, must carry their own conviction.

The two tone poems were novelties here. "En Saga" was last played in Symphony Hall in 1910, and the other one had never been played at these concerts before.

"En Saga" is an early piece which contains most of the elements and characteristics of Sibelius' later work. It came to a thrilling performance under Mr. Hannikainen's baton. The "Lemminkäinen" poem, the last of the four constituting the composer's account of the Finnish war hero, is shorter but also full of vitality and of the atmosphere of the Norse legends, and it, too, was excitingly performed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 4 - 1940

TAUNO HANNIKAINEN, Finnish conductor, has been engaged to direct this season in London, Paris and Warsaw. For the duration of his present visit to America he has been excused from civilian guard duty by his government. Last week he was scheduled to conduct the Boston Symphony in two concerts in its home city.

FINNISH CONCERT

Transc
Feb 3

Hannikainen Wins Ovation in Debut With Unfamiliar Works of Sibelius

A performance of Sibelius First Symphony as exciting in the epic sweep of its conception as it was poignant in detail, was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall under the direction of Tauno Hannikainen, the Finnish conductor who made his debut as director of a regular Boston Symphony concert, and in so doing scored something of a triumph. The breadth of the Finnish conductor's intellectual grasp, the vitality and communicativeness of his spirit, as evident in a simple phrase as in the thunder of orchestral sonorities, proclaimed him at once an artist of unusual gifts and attainments.

A certain portion of the enthusiastic ovation accorded him yesterday may be attributed to our deep sympathy and admiration for all things Finnish which the present heroic conduct of Finland inspires in us. Proof of this is the warmth with which Mr. Hannikainen was applauded the first time he appeared on the stage of Symphony Hall, before the audience had heard him conduct a single bar of music. But there was a vast difference between the first friendly applause and the cheering and stamping after his conclusion of the Sibelius First Symphony in E minor, the climax of the afternoon.

Another feature of a notable afternoon was the first performance by the Boston Symphony of Sibelius' early work, "Lemminkainen's Homeward Journey," recently revised by the composer. A third Sibelius work which had not been played by the Boston Symphony but once before, in 1910: "En Saga," a D minor Concerto Grosso for string orchestra by Handel, Opus 6, No. 10, and Beethoven's third "Leonore" Overture completed the program.

"Lemminkainen's Homeward Journey," composed in 1896, revised once in 1900 and again in recent months, is based on the great Finnish epic, the Kalevala, and the exploits of its hero, Lemminkainen. It is a companion piece to the better known "Swan of Tuonela," "Lemminkainen in Tuonela" and "Lemminkainen and the Maidens" which in turn had their origin in a project for an opera based on the underworld of Finnish mythology. A printed note in the score reminds us that Lemminkainen is the warrior-hero of Finnish myth, whose daring and beauty make him the favorite of women. Exhausted by a long series of wars and combats, he determines to seek his home.

Then, in the words of the Kalevala: Lemminkainen "From his cares constructed horses, Coursers black composed from trouble, Reins from evil days he fashioned, Saddles from his secret sorrows. Then his horse's back he mounted. . . . And he rode upon his journey . . ." It is this ride on Lemminkainen's magic horses which Sibelius music describes.

Its style is of the early Sibelius, full of the eerie imagining of rune and legend, discoursing upon the feuds of warriors, witches and the grim forces of northern nature — describing, rather than interpreting, as the later Sibelius is more wont to do.

Legendary Music

"En Saga," an even earlier work than "Lemminkainen's Homeward Journey" was the cornerstone of Sibelius' fame in European concert centers. Never, before or since, one feels, has weirder alchemy been practiced with an orchestra. The sounds that issue from it defy description. It is like the unreal night of the northern winters, whose whispering voices transport us to a land where saga and myth are the only reality.

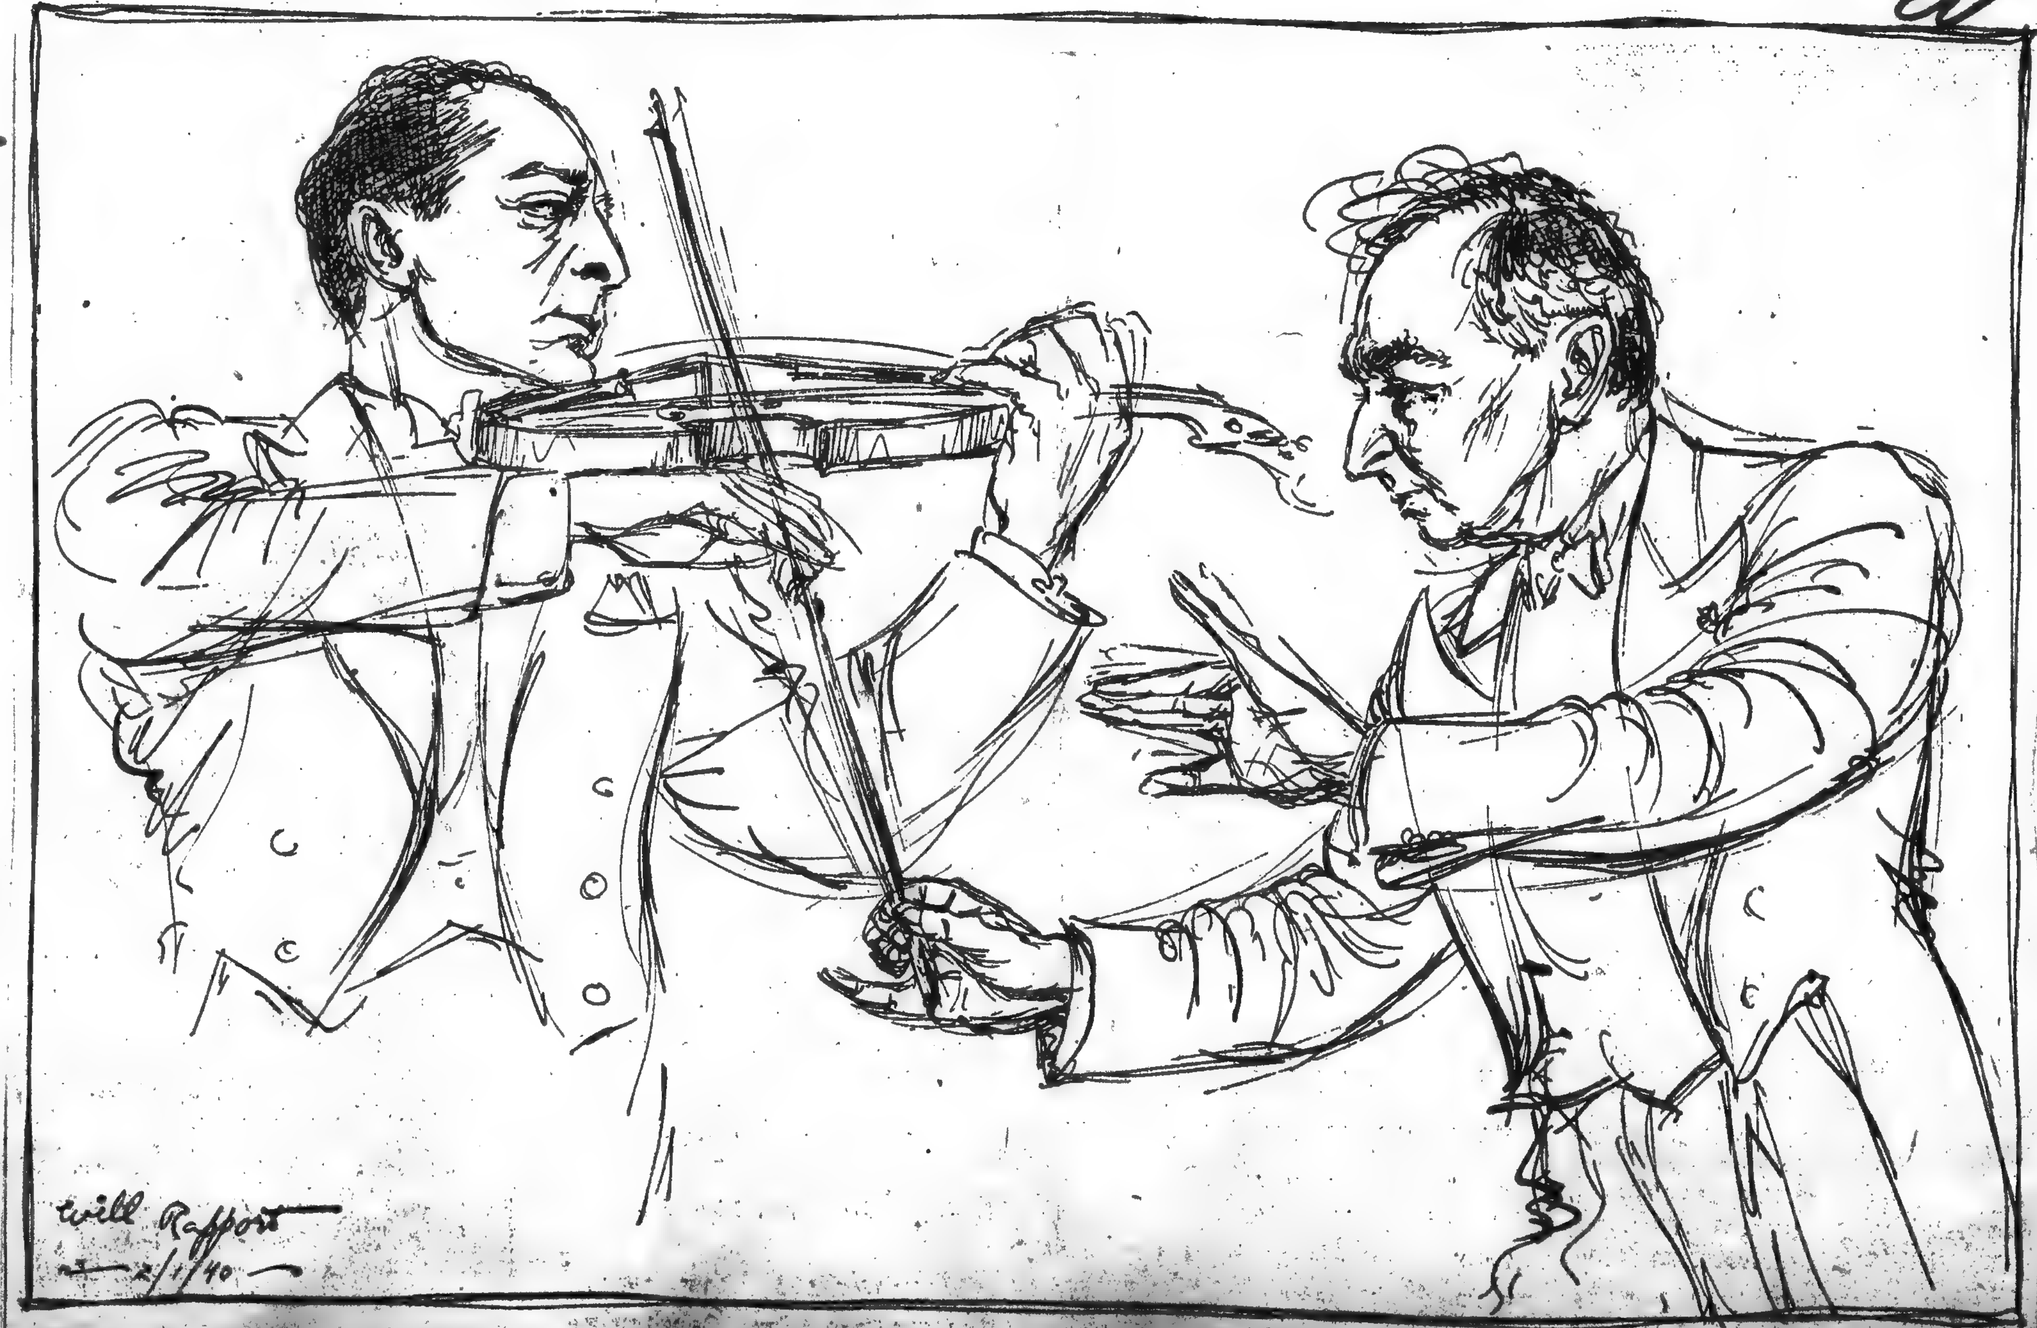
A tendency to broad tempi was particularly obvious in the opening bars of the "Leonore" Overture as Hannikainen took them. Here the pace was a shade too deliberate in spite of the intensity with which he was able to invest each phrase. The rest of the overture was extremely dramatic, the timbre of the orchestra clear and brilliant.

The most exhilirating movements of the Handel Concerto Grosso which began the program were the contrapuntal allegros. The instrumental body was at all times transparent and the rhythm vigorous and exact. Though the overture to the Concerto and the slow air were carefully worked out, they seemed to one listener rather stiffly self-conscious and unwieldy. A piano was used for the realization of the thorough-bass since the carrying power of the harpsichord had been found too weak in rehearsal.

It was in the Sibelius Symphony that our Finnish guest revealed his powers to their fullest extent: the plastic touch he can give to a melodic line, the drive of his rhythms, the tragic undertones he commands and the mixture of exultation and despair that informed the tremendous final movement. It was an impressive culmination.

RETURN OF KOUSSEVITZKY: MUSIC NEWS AND CURRENT COMMENT

Co-Interpreters of Prokofieff Second Concerto



Jascha Heifetz, soloist next Friday and Saturday with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Prokofieff Violin Concerto. | Serge Koussevitzky returning from a three weeks' mid-winter vacation to resume conductorship of that same orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

FEB 4 - 1940

Heifetz to Introduce Prokofieff Concerto

Will Play With Bostonians Next Week in Carnegie Hall

Serge Prokofieff's second violin concerto will have its first New York performance with orchestra in one of Serge Koussevitzky's programs for ~~the Boston~~ Symphony Orchestra's third visit of the season to Carnegie Hall on Friday night (instead of the usual Thursday) and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 16 and 17. Jascha Heifetz, who gave the first American performances of the concerto with this orchestra two years ago and has also recorded it with the Boston Symphony, will be the soloist. The orchestra's third appearance of the season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music will be on Thursday night, Feb. 15.

Although Prokofieff's second concerto has not yet been played here with orchestra, it has had two or three New York performances with piano accompaniment. The Russian composer's recently written cello concerto in E minor will be introduced to America in the Boston concerts of March 21-23, with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist. The violin concerto will be played by Mr. Heifetz in Boston next Friday and Saturday with Vincent d'Indy's second symphony, in B flat, and Respighi's transcription of Bach's passacaglia and Fugue in C minor as the other numbers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

FEB 3 - 1940

HEIFETZ TO PLAY NEW WORK

Jascha Heifetz will introduce the Second Violin Concerto of Prokofieff to local listeners when he is heard with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at ~~Carnegie Hall~~ Friday evening, February 16, and Saturday afternoon, February 17.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM ✓

FEB 4 - 1940

New Edition of Hale's Concert Notes

GREAT CONCERT MUSIC, Philip Hale's Symphony Programme Notes, edited by John N. Burke; Garden City Publishing Company, no price given.

Here is a new and inexpensive edition of Philip Hale's Symphony Notes, collected under the title, Great Concert Music. We say inexpensive: we know it must be, for the Garden City Publishing Company makes a practice of new editions which sell for far less than the originals. But they also make a practice of not putting the prices on their book jackets.

This book is useful not only to those who attend symphony concerts, but to persons who listen to the symphony orchestras on the radio, and undoubtedly has gained many new readers who are radio listeners since its publication in 1933. It includes material not only from the Boston Symphony Orchestra programs, which he wrote for 32 years, but selections from his music criticisms for the Boston Herald and other newspapers and music magazines. From the vast accumulation of his critical writings and explanatory notes, 125 works were chosen. Beginning with Bach, these take us through Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Brahms and Wagner to Strauss, Stravinsky, Deems Taylor and Ravel. In all there are 43 composers whose works are discussed, varying from one or two to as many as 10 by Brahms and 16 by Beethoven, including all nine symphonies.

We are made better acquainted with Mr. Hale by the introduction by his friend, Lawrence Gilman, who tells of the critic's enormous amount of information about a vast variety of matters, and closes with the lines which Sir George Grove said of Shubert, a saying Hale himself was fond of quoting, which Mr. Gilman applies to Hale: "There never has been one like him, and there never will be another."—M. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

FEB 4 - 1940

Dorothy Maynor, whose soprano accomplishments have soared to a new high, is heard in Handel's O Sleep, Why Dost Thou Leave Me?, and in Pamina's air: Alas I Feel It, from Mozart's The Magic Flute. With Koussevitzky leading the Boston Orchestra in the background, Miss Maynor's voice is revealed to great advantage. With Arpad Sandor at the piano Miss Maynor shows her talent as a lieder singer in Schubert's Ave Maria and Gretchen at the Spinning Wheel, both items sung in German.

The impelling heroic tenor of Mr. Melchior gives abundant significance to the singing of Sigmund's Love Song, and the Forging Song (from Siegfried) with Ormandy leading the Philadelphia Orchestra. Paul Robeson has made another artistic recording in the singing of the Russian folk song, Night, in Russian, and the Lermontoff-Gambs Lullaby. Lawrence Brown is at the piano for both items.

On the instrumental side Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for String Quartet and String Orchestra led by Sir Adrian Boult constitutes an admirable addition to instrumental ensemble recordings. This seldom heard work and also the Adagio for strings which is included in the album are the work of inspiration and expert craftsmanship.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y. ✓
TIMES

FEB 4 - 1940

Symphony orchestras have become decided attractions for artists. Elsewhere on this page will be found comment on the drawings of members of the Philharmonic, by S. Barnard Lintott. At Hudson Walker's are paintings and drawings of the Boston Symphony, by Donald Greason, who held an exhibition at Symphony Hall, Boston, not long ago. Mr. Greason depicts the whole orchestra in rehearsal under the baton of Koussevitzky, as well as sections of the orchestra, such as harps and drums, in the play of light and shadow which makes the great musical instrument almost as fascinating to watch as [illegible]. [illegible] D.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 4 - 1940

Cleveland to Play Classic Of Beethoven

Rodzinski Will Lead Orchestra in Bushnell Concert Friday, February 9

The Seventh Symphony of Beethoven is the feature of the program which the Cleveland Orchestra will play here in the fifth event of the Bushnell Concert Series at the Bushnell Memorial on Friday, February 9. Other numbers in which Artur Rodzinski will lead the Cleveland musicians include: Haydn's "Clock" Symphony and two Wagner compositions, Prelude to Act III, Dance of the Apprentices and Finale from the "Die Meistersinger," and Wotan's Farewell, Magic Fire Music, and Ride of the Valkyries, "Die Walkuere."

Regarding the Beethoven work, John N. Burk, program annotator of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, writes in part as follows:

"It would require more than a technical yardstick to measure the true proportions of this symphony—the sense of immensity which it conveys. Beethoven seems to have built up this impression by wilfully driving a single rhythmic figure through each movement, until the music attains, (particularly in the body of the first movement, and in the 'Finale') a swift propulsion, an effect of cumulative growth which is akin to extraordinary size. The three preceding symphonies have none of the quality—the slow movement of the Fourth, many parts of the 'Pastoral' are static by comparison. Even the Fifth Symphony dwells in violent dramatic contrasts which are the antithesis of sustained, expansive motion. Schubert's great Symphony in C major, very different of course from Beethoven's Seventh, makes a similar effect of grandeur by similar means in its 'Finale.'

"The long introduction (Beethoven had not used one since his Fourth Symphony) leads, by many repetitions on the dominant, into the main body of the movement, where the characteristic rhythm, once released, holds its swift course, almost without cessation, until the end of the movement. Where a more modern composer seeks rhythmic interest by rhythmic variety and complexity, Beethoven keeps strictly to his repititious pattern, and with no more than the spare orchestra of Mozart to work upon finds variety through his inexhaustible invention. It is as if the rhythmic germ has taken hold of his imagination and, starting from the merest fragment, expands and looms, leaping through every part of the orchestra, touching a new magic of beauty at every unexpected turn. Wagner called the symphony 'the Dance in its highest condition; the happiest realization of the movements of the body in an ideal form.' If any other composer could impel an inexorable rhythm, many times repeated, into a vast music—it was Wagner."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& Republican

FEB 4 - 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY TUESDAY THE 13TH

Serge Koussevitzky to Conduct Works by Beethoven, Ravel and Schumann

Dr Serge Koussevitzky has programmed two "first" symphonies for the Boston symphony concert at the Auditorium on Tuesday night the 13th under the auspices of the Springfield Community Concert association and the Junior league.

Beethoven's First is already well known to most concert audiences as well as radio listeners and the notable Beethoven festival given by Arturo Toscanini over the radio during the season has brought this composer close to the attention of the public. Although his First shows the marks of his so-called "first" period, when he adhered to the so-called classical style, it was in its day regarded as a radical departure from accepted form. To modern ears, however, it is clear and Mozartean in outline and as ideal as a Haydn symphony for the opening of a program.

Schumann's First is less well known, although the great romanticist has become increasingly popular as a symphonist in recent years. Although he found miniature forms most congenial, like the "Papillons" and "Carnival" for piano, his symphonic works show an interesting side to his creative gift. Comparing these two "firsts" the essential differences between the classical and romantic periods are at once evident. The symphonies of Beethoven may be compared to architectural structures, while those of Schumann, more impassioned, more spread out and more melodious, are like landscapes painted with a feverish hand.

The Beethoven First will open the Boston Symphony concert and the Schumann First will close it. As a center piece, Ravel's brilliant "Daphnis et Chloe" suite, will be played. This is one of the most popular works of the modern orchestral repertoire.

The complete program follows:—

Symphony No 1 in C-major ....
Op 21 .... Beethoven
Adagio molto; allegro con brio
Andante cantabile con moto
Menuetto: Allegro molto e vavace
Finale: Adagio; allegro molto e vivace
Daphnis et Chloe suite .... Ravel
Lever du Jour
Pantomime
Danse Generale
Intermission
Symphony No 1 in B-flat ...... Schumann
Andante; allegro molto vivace
Larghetto
Scherzo: Molto vivace
Allegro animato e grazioso

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 5 - 1940

BARBIROLLI SIGNS FOR 2 MORE YEARS

Philharmonic Re-engages Him as Conductor for 22 Weeks of 30-Week Season

WALTER WILL BE GUEST

Dimitri Mitropoulos Also to Direct in 14 Concerts, First Time With the Orchestra

John Barbirolli has been re-engaged for two more seasons as conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society, and Bruno Walter and Dimitri Mitropoulos have been engaged as guest conductors for next season, it is announced by the society's board of directors. During the season 1940-41, the society's ninety-ninth, Mr. Barbirolli will direct twenty-two weeks of a thirty-week season, which will begin on Oct. 10 and close on May 4. Under his direction the orchestra will go on tour for two and a half weeks, from Nov. 18 to Dec. 5.

Mr. Walter, who has been associated with the Philharmonic for many years in the past, will conduct fourteen concerts, from Jan. 13 through Feb. 9. Mr. Walter directed the old New York Symphony for three consecutive seasons from 1922, and in 1932 he appeared for the first time with the Philharmonic-Symphony. He returned for several years thereafter. Mr. Walter's reputation is international. Before the Anschluss he was Arturo Toscanini's associate in the Salzburg Festivals. Later he became active in the musical life of Paris, and he was soon honored by the French Government with the title of commander of the Legion of Honor. Mr. Walter opened the current season of the Los Angeles Symphony and will appear as guest conductor of the National Broadcasting Symphony Orchestra on Saturday night.

Mr. Mitropoulos, the conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, will be guest conductor of the Philharmonic for fourteen concerts from Dec. 16 to Jan. 12. Although he has appeared with the NBC Orchestra at Radio City, he has never conducted in New York in a regular concert. He studied at the Athens Conservatory, became assistant conductor of the Berlin Staatsoper, and in 1932 made his debut in Paris with the Orchestre Symphonique. He made his American debut in 1936 with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the invitation of Serge Koussevitzky, who extended the invitation for the next year. That season he was invited to become conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony. He was born in Greece.

Record Feb 5

Stravinsky at 57 Decides He'll Marry

Igor Stravinsky, foremost living Russian composer, conductor and occupant of the Charles Eliot Norton chair of poetry at Harvard, confirmed, on his arrival here from New York last night, that he is soon to be married. He did not name the woman.

IGOR STRAVINSKY
"Oh yes, I'll marry soon."

Reports that had preceded him from New York were that his bride-to-be is Vera Sondekine, a Russian dancer. Where the wedding is to take place is also a secret. One report is that Cambridge will be the scene.

"Married?" he echoed when he was questioned on his arrival at Back Bay station. "Oh, yes, I am to be married soon. I can't say any more."

An agent volunteered for him. "Yes, he is to be married, maybe soon, maybe not soon. We will let you know."

He was met by Elliott Forbes, a son of Edward Forbes, director of the Fogg Museum, at whose Cambridge home Stravinsky is staying while lecturing at Harvard. He returned last night after concluding a tour during which he conducted the New York Philharmonic, the Pittsburgh Symphony and the Philadelphia orchestra. In recent years he has also conducted Boston Symphony.

Friends of the 51-year-old musician were wondering what had happened to his romance with Dagmor Godowsky, whom he was once reported as about to wed.

Stravinsky's music is quite unorthodox. His "Rite of Spring" when first played at Paris virtually caused a riot. Known as an extreme modernist his "Fire Bird" suite was written with glowing orchestral coloring. Since then he has written harmonies that even musicians find harsh. He is at work on a new symphony which will be played here by the Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

FEB 6 - 1940

Koussevitzky Reception Guest.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be guest of honor at a reception to be given by the directors of the American Association for Assistance to French Artists, Inc., at the home of Mrs. Donald Brown, 135 East Sixty-sixth street, on Thusrday, February 15.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& Republican

FEB 6 - 1940

Boston Orchestra Here Tuesday Night

The Boston Symphony orchestra, directed by Dr Serge Koussevitzky, will present the third of the present series of concerts being sponsored by the Springfield Community association and the Junior League on Tuesday night at the Auditorium.

The program, to which only members of the association will be admitted, will be as follows:—

Symphony No 1, Op 21..........Beethoven
Adagio molto; allegro con brio
Andante cantabile con moto
Menuetto; allegro molto
Finale
Daphnis et Chloe suite..............Ravel
Lever du jour
Pantomime
Danse generale
Intermission
Symphony No 1, Op 38...........Schumann
Andante; allegro molto vivace
Larghetto
Scherzo; trio
Allegro animato

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

FEB 6 - 1940

Sibelius Protected

Tauno Hannikainen, the Finnish conductor who made a guest appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week, was discussing Sibelius in the course of an interview on his country's music. Since the Russian invasion began, said Mr. Hannikainen, the great Finnish composer has been kept in protective hiding "like a national treasure."

This, surely, will add to the world's steadily increasing appreciation of Finland's national character. Nations at war have been diligent in protecting such national treasures as stained glass windows, paintings and various other objets d'art. But what of their human national treasures? Some of them have been placed in front-line trenches, and some have been lost. Sibelius would not, at his present age, be sent to the trenches in any country, but would he be given special protection elsewhere?

There is a story, possibly apochryphal but hardly less significant for all that, about four British "national treasures" during the World War. George Bernard Shaw, H. G. Wells, Thomas Hardy and Sir James Barrie were, it is said, assembled for an evening in a room in London when a German bomb exploded nearby.

If nations must fight, they should at least be civilized enough to preserve such genius as they have, and preserve it jealously, even against its patriotic will.

THIS CLIPPING FROM GLOUCESTER, MASS.
TIMES
FEB 8 - 1940

ART NOTES

New Director.

Charles H. Sawyer, who has been director of the Addison Gallery of Americain Art at Andover since its inception, has been appointed director of the Worcester Art Museum, to succeed Frances H. Taylor, Lanesville summer resident, recently drafted for the Metropolitan Museum directorship. Mr. Sawyer was born in Andover in 1906, attended Phillips academy and was graduated from Yale in 1926. He is recognized as a specialist in art education.

Greason Show in New York.

Donald Greason of Rockport, who won considerable critical acclaim for his oil and pencil studies of the Boston Symphony orchestra in action when they were exhibited at Symphony hall, Boston, is exhibiting the remaining works at the Hudson D. Walker galleries in New York. The pictures have been described as low-harmonied oils, drawings expertly restrained, over-laid with a subtle-valued gray wash.

Music Notes

Mass. Feb 8

The public debut in Boston of Dorothy Maynor, described as the most important new singer of the season, will take place on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 25. Miss Maynor will make her first appearance here at the annual Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given on that date under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Dr. Koussevitzky announces the following program: Handel's Concerto in B minor; the Air "Oh, Sleep, why dost thou leave me?" from Handel's "Semele"; Air of Pamina from Mozart's "Magic Flute"; the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and "Elsa's Dream"; the Air, 'Depuis le jour" from "Louise." Miss Maynor will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the four arias. Serge Koussevitzky will close the concert with a performance of the Second Symphony of Sibelius in D major.

Mathis der Maler

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the 16th pair of Friday and Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall on Feb. 23 and 24, following the orchestra's third visit of the season to New York and other cities during the coming week. Dr. Koussevitzky will present for first performance here an orchestral concerto of Boris Koutzen, the Russian composer now living in New York. The Concerto is written for five solo instruments with string orchestra, consisting of Recitative, Passacaglia and Finale. He will also conduct Hindemith's Symphony, "Mathis der Maler," music which takes as its subject three altar pieces by the early German painter, Matthias Gruenewald. The closing number will be the Symphony in C, of Serge Taneiev.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
FEB 9 - 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GIVE BROOKLYN CONCERT

On Thursday evening, Feb. 15, the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will present the third concert of the current Brooklyn season in the Opera House at the Academy of Music.

Mrs. Edward C. Blum and Mrs. Walter Truslow, in charge of boxes for the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts, have announced the box holders for the concert on Thursday night. Box 1 has been taken by Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt. Mrs. Dean C. Osborne will be hostess in Box 2. Box 3 will be occupied by Mrs. Benjamin Prince and her guests. The Brooklyn Woman's Club and the Adelphi Alumnae Association are to be represented in Boxes 4 and 5. Mrs. Thomas E. Murray, Jr. has reserved Box 6, and Box 7 will be occupied by Navy officers and their guests. Boxes 9 and 12 have been taken for the use of musically gifted Girl Scouts and students from Brooklyn and Queens high schools who are leaders and players in school orchestras.

Forecast of Program

The program for the third Boston Symphony Concert will include Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun by Debussy, Excerpts from Ravel's Daphnis et Chloe, and Brahms' Symphony No. 2.

Under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, and the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, these concerts are now in their fifty-fourth season in Brooklyn.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
FEB 10 1940

Third Boston Symphony Concert To Be Heard Here Thursday; Boxholders Are Announced

Boxholdes for the season's third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, on Thursday evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, include Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Benjamin Prince and Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr. A box will be occupied by Navy officers and their guests and other boxes have been taken by the Brooklyn Woman's Club and the Adelphi Alumnae Association. Musically gifted Girl Scouts and students who play in high school orchestras of Brooklyn and Queens will be guests in other boxes.

The program will include Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, Debussy's Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun, excerpts from Ravel's Daphnis et Chloe and Brahms' Symphony No. 2.

Under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, and the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, these concerts are now in their fifty-fourth season here.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CAMDEN, N. J.
POST
FEB 10 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER
FEB 9 - 1940

Boston Symphony Here Wednesday

Dr. Koussevitzky to Play Beethoven, Brahms, Prokofieff

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conducting will make its annual appearance for The Philadelphia Forum on Wednesday, Feb. 14, in the Academy of Music. The program consists of the Beethoven No. 1 Symphony, Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," and the Brahms No. 2 Symphony. "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale, which will be given its first Philadelphia performance by Dr. Koussevitzky, will have Richard Hale as narrator.

For 15 years Dr. Koussevitzky has been at the helm in Boston and has increasingly proved Deems Taylor a discerning prophet, for of his first concert in New York in November, 1924, Mr. Taylor wrote: "The Boston Symphony Orchestra is in the hands of a musician of profound insight and extraordinary technical command, one who may cause it to equal, perhaps surpass, its former legendary glories."

Dr. Koussevitzky is generally regarded as the foremost conductor of Russian music, and has probably over the years played more American compositions than any other conductor. Few modern compositions have been so enthusiastically received as Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" when he introduced it in Boston and in New York.

Dr. Koussevitzky was born in Russia, was professor in the Moscow Conservatory and double bass soloist in the Imperial Orchestra. He was generally regarded as the world's greatest double bass virtuoso. He organized the Koussevitzky Symphony Orchestra of 85 musicians, which made extensive journeys throughout Russia, and in 1920 he founded the "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris and at various times conducted orchestras in England, Germany, Italy and Spain before coming to the Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
B'klyn, Section 1 86
FEB 11 1940

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
FEB 10 1940

Boston Symphony Gives Season's Third Concert At Academy Thursday

Koussevitzky to Present Works by Handel, Debussy, Ravel and Brahms

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will give its third Brooklyn concert in a series of five for the current season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music next Thursday evening. The program follows:

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, op. 6, by Handel; "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," by Debussy (eclogue by S. Mallarme); orchestral excepts from "Daphnis et Chloe" (second suite), by Ravel, and Symphony No. 2 in D major, by Brahms.

The Academy of Music concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are held under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee. On Tuesday afternoon a discussion of the Boston Symphony program will be held by Jonathan Schiller, lecturer in music at the institute, who will speak in the lecture hall of the Brookyn Academy of Music at 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
FEB 10 1940

Heifetz to Appear With Koussevitzky

Jascha Heifetz will be the soloist on one of the two programs which Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give at Carnegie Hall next week. The orchestra, making its third visit of the season, will play Friday evening and Saturday afternoon. Mr. Heifetz will be heard at the latter concert, playing the Concerto No. 2 of Prokofieff for the first time here. Friday's all-French concert will consist of D'Indy's Symphony No. 2, in B-flat major; a suite from Faure's music to "Pelleas et Melisande," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe." The remainder of Saturday's program will be Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor, Opus 6, No. 6; the Symphony No. 1 of Schumann and the Bach-Respighi Passacaglia in C minor.

The Boston Symphony will play under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction at the Brooklyn Academy of Music next Thursday evening. The program lists the Handel Concerto Grosso in B minor Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" and the Second Symphony in D major of Brahms.

THIS CLIPPING FROM GALVESTON, TEX.
TRIBUNE
FEB 9 - 1940

The World of Music

New York, Feb. 9.—(UP)—The latest work of the Russian modernist composer, Serge Prokofieff, will be introduced to this country on March 21 and 23 by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

It is Prokofieff's 'cello concerto in E minor, Opus 58. The soloist will be Gregor Piatagorsky, who is regarded by Koussevitzky as one of the greatest 'cellists of the day.

New York will hear its first performance of the Prokofieff second violin concerto on Feb. 16, when the Boston Symphony will make its third visit of the season to Carnegie Hall. The soloist will be Jascha Heifetz.

The second violin concerto was given its first performance in this country by the Boston Symphony and Heifetz two seasons ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
FEB 10 1940

Boston Symphony To Play Latest Prokofieff Work

NEW YORK (UP).—The latest work of the Russian modernist composer, Serge Prokofieff, will be introduced to this country on March 21 and 23 by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

It is Prokofieff's 'cello concerto in E minor, Opus 58, The soloist will be Gregor Piatagorsky, who is regarded by Koussevitzky as one of the greatest 'cellists of the day.

New York will hear its first performance of the Prokofieff second violin concerto on Feb. 16, when the Boston Symphony will make its third visit of the season to Carnegie Hall. The soloist will be Jascha Heifetz.

The second violin concerto was given its first performance in this country by the Boston Symphony and Heifetz two seasons ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
FEB 10 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BEAUMONT, TEX.
JOURNAL
FEB 9 - 1940

Trans Feb 9

187

MUSIC

The B.S.O. in Cambridge

Dr. Koussevitzky Returns to Lead Symphonies By Beethoven and Brahms and a Work by Faure

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Dr. Koussevitzky, gave the fifth of its series of eight Cambridge concerts in Sanders Theater last night. Dr. Koussevitzky, returning from his mid-winter vacation, chose Beethoven's First Symphony to begin the concert, continued with Gabriel Faure's "Pelleas et Melisande" Suite from the Stage Music to Maeterlinck's Tragedy, and concluded with Brahms' Second Symphony.

Nothing became the occasion more successfully than the opening number. With wonted vigor and delicacy the orchestra made a paean of the Beethoven Symphony, frequently slighted because it is not so easily effective as the later Beethoven Symphonies.

This symphony may not have the breadth of the Third or the drama of the Fifth, yet it has a liveliness and certain strength and a continuous flow of melody carefully disposed to all the orchestra that give it force. Beethoven was still exploring the revered forms and restraint was still more powerful than imagination, but he was able to secure a theme and then play upon it with delightful invention.

The Faure Suite, in three parts, is probably as much indebted to Wagner as to Faure. A "little" Wagner might have written the second and third parts, romantic, turbulent and interspersed with tortuous melodies. Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation was lyrical, fitting the music, and the orchestra played contentedly.

It has been suggested, never proved, that Brahms occasionally fell asleep while composing and awoke with a strident triple fortissimo in progress. Parts of the Second Symphony could be offered as proof, particularly the wanderings in the second and third movements. In them he was quite evidently nodding, or at least working out the uninteresting corollaries to a musical problem which he was too proud to omit.

Then there is the fourth movement, with its passionate conception and climax. Brahms is walking alone, for there is none to keep pace with him. The orchestra played it that way last night, and the movement was exhausting in its command and charge.

J. G.

Contest Music Is Full of Genuine Feeling

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

By a Staff Photographer

Prize of South American Tour Held by Judges of Music Tryouts

Left to right: Paul Fedorowsky, violinist; Miss Margaret T. Conlin, cello applicant; James Pappoutsakis, flutist; Arthur Fiedler, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The three men are judges in a Nation-wide symphony selection. They are meeting many applicants.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony concert at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon was among the liveliest of the season. Reasons were three: the return of Conducter Serge Koussevitzky after his midseason vacation, Jascha Heifetz as soloist in the Second Violin Concerto of Prokofieff, and a striking program that began with the B-flat Symphony by Vincent D'Indy and ended with Respighi's transcription of the Bach Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor.

The D'Indy Symphony was last given by the Boston Symphony in 1932; hence the time was more than ripe for its reappearance. The music of D'Indy as a whole has not received, hereabouts, the attention it merits. Only a few sporadic performances in various quarters, the past several years, have been the lot of one who must be counted among the foremost French composers of the early 20th century. One hopes that Mr. Koussevitzky will give us more of D'Indy from now on.

The B-flat Symphony is an amazing speciment of complex integration, music at once of the brain and the heart, rich in material and detail, beautifully wrought and deeply intense. According to the manner of its time, the Symphony is also very long, and if one listens carefully for the better part of an hour, the process is exhausting.

Why bother with the question of whether it is a masterpiece? Those who say it isn't can point scornfully to D'Indy's pre-occupation with the "cyclical form" of thematic manipulation, and insist that artifice got the upper hand of inspiration. They can also show you the influence of Wagner as diluted through Richard Strauss and Franck, and even mention one strong resemblance to the "Poem of Ecstasy" by Scriabin (although Schiabin's music came later than the Symphony).

The important point is that the Symphony is able to stand by itself after almost 40 years, and considering how much other music has withered in the same time, that is saying a good deal. As he now conducts it, Mr. Koussevitzky emphasizes the emotional side without exaggeration, and skillfully proportions the wealth of details to the monumental size of the whole. Yesterday's audience received work and performance cordially.

Mr. Heifetz introduced the Prokofieff Second Violin Concerto here two years ago, all to the general pleasure. Another hearing confirms, yes increases, admiration for its brilliant wit, the cleverness with which Prokofieff set off a solo violin against a small orchestra. There are plenty of melodies also, of which nobody will complain. The slow movement really takes off into a soaring interlude of sentiment quite astonishing for a modern. Perhaps the finale is the weakest movement of all; Prokofieff's clowning with what seem to be dance hall tunes all mixed up in dissonance is a bit overdone.

Mr. Heifetz, always a favorite with the Boston public, gave the Concerto a supremely clever performance. Is there any other violinist who could do it so well, who could surmount its fussiness and difficulties with such consistently beautiful tone? Applause for Mr. Heifetz became what was once called an "ovation."

Respighi's orchestral version of the Bach passacaglia and fugue for organ is a terribly swollen affair, but when played by a virtuoso orchestra like the Boston Symphony it becomes very exciting. What magnificent sonorities there were yesterday afternoon!

To repeat a belief held by this reviewer a man may follow three courses when he sets out to transcribe Bach's organ music for orchestra; he may imitate the organ (which Respighi did), he may smother the musical ideas under great blotches of orchestral color (which Respighi has also done), or he may choose the most musicianly way of arranging the piece in terms of the orchestra (which Respighi did least of all). The Respighi version therefore stands convicted of being bad art, but very thrilling. A Scotch verdict!

C. W. D.

KOUSSEVITZKY AGAIN LEADS

Symphony Gives Brilliant Friday Programme

Post — Feb 10

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is fun to travel and also nice to get home. It is stimulating to have such guest conductors at the Symphony concerts as Messrs. Malko and Hannikainen, but it also is good to have Dr. Koussevitzky back on the job. His presence at the concert of yesterday afternoon afforded a comfortable feeling of all being right with the world.

Tonally, moreover, the orchestra in three brief weeks was getting a little out of hand. Some of its proper sheen and lustre was lost, for example, in Mr. Hannikainen's quest for vitality. Yesterday it was in this respect quite itself again, nor was vitality lacking when that quality was in order.

There is such a thing as superb playing of mediocre music, but yesterday there was a fine programme to boot. After too long an absence from it, d'Indy's Second Symphony, a work at once noble and affecting was restored to the repertory. Jascha Heifetz returned to play Prokofieff's delightful second violin concerto, which he introduced to this city and to America in December, 1937. And for satisfying conclusion—for any but the purists who object to such transcriptions—Dr. Koussevitzky offered Respighi's "orchestral interpretation" of Bach's great C minor organ Passacaglia and Fugue.

Already this season Dr. Koussevitzky has played two compositions by d'Indy, the "Istar" Variations and the monumental Symphony of yesterday. Nevertheless this reviewer is going to do an Oliver Twist and ask for more. Not yet has Dr. Koussevitzky conducted here the beautiful tripartite tone poem, "A Summer Day on the Mountain," while the charming and exhilarating "Symphony on a Mountain Air" is not heard anywhere near as often as it should be.

It was once rumored that Mr. Heifetz would play here the Concerto of William Walton, which he and the Cleveland Orchestra, Mr. Rodzinski conducting, brought to its world premiere in that city last fall. And while it would have been interesting to hear this latest product of the gifted Englishman, Prokofieff's Concerto richly deserved a second performance. The first of its two movements with their lyric flow so unusual in this melodically barren day wear the best, but the third, if a little too full of tricks, orchestral and otherwise, is entertaining and amusing. The performance was of a quality that might easily be imagined, in view of those participating in it. One thing is certain—the piece will never be made to sound any better. It is almost as superfluous to remark upon the audience's enthusiasm.

C.S.M. Feb 9

Young Musicians Exhibit Wares For Symphony Place and Tour

Smoke from the nearby railroad yard occasionally blotted out the sunlight, but for the most part, it was a cheerful morning at the Keith Violin Studios on Boylston Street, where 20 out of 300 local applicants for a new national symphony orchestra were being put through their paces.

The new orchestra, as yet nameless, is to be under the direction of Leopold Stokowski, musical director of the Philadelphia Orchestra. Mr. Stokowski is seeking 109 talented young men and women between the ages of 16 and 25 years to form a symphonic group which he will organize, train, and take along on a good will tour of Central and South America this summer.

Aid in the task of recruiting players from the thousands of young applicants is being carried out under the supervision of the National Youth Administration. In Boston, where applications have been particularly heavy, requests for auditions have been pouring in since late December when the formation of the orchestra was first announced locally by John L. Donovan, Jr., Massachusetts N. Y. A. Administrator.

Eliminations Starting

This morning eliminations began in earnest. Violins, violas, and cellos took preference. One by one, youthful musicians entered the front room, tuned their instruments with the aid of Benoit Goulet at the piano, and turned to face the three judges. And the judges were a distinguished group, led by Arthur Fiedler, Conductor of the Boston Symphony during the Pops and Esplanade seasons. In addition to Mr. Fiedler, Paul Fedorowsky, violinist, and James Poppoutsakis, flutist, both of whom play with the Boston orchestra, were on hand to pass on the merits of the applicants.

Since it is a case of the best man wins the position—and since musicians all over the country will compete against one another until the final eliminations are made—the young people went at their instruments with as concentrated an artistry as they could muster.

First came Miss Margaret T. Conlin, a cello student from Boston. Deep, resonant tones came from her instrument. But the judges wanted more. Play this scale, they said. Play a scale with four notes to each bow. Mr. Fiedler stood up, watching the music over the player's shoulder, at times humming the tune or beating out the rhythm. Play that in two-four time. Faster, the judges demanded. Then:' "Next!"

Smile or Raise Eyebrows

In came Victor Alpert, a viola player from Roxbury. "What are you going to play?" the judges wanted to know, and immediately Mr. Alpert got down to the business of playing his piece on what he admitted was a brand-new viola.

So other applicants came, played, departed. The judges made notes, smiled, or occasionally raised eyebrows in sincere alarm as a false note rasped out. They were sympathetic or unmoved in turn. But by April 1, they intend to have given every applicant a chance. And soon after that, other auditions throughout the State, throughout the country, will have slowly tested and assembled other strings, other horns, other tympani until Mr. Stokowski has what he hopes will be the best young orchestra which can be obtained.

But, in the meantime, the N. Y. A. wants it understood that no saxophones, mandolins, or pianos are required. Of pianists, there will be but one—a professional. And as for saxophones and mandolins—well, the symphony feels it can get along without them.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 11 1940

The Boston Flute Players Club, which is not dedicated to flutes, flute-players or flute music, is holding its one-hundredth concert this afternoon in its home town. The group is in its nineteenth season, and is proud of the anniversary concert which has been reached without help of an angel.

One more curious thing about the Flute Players Club is that its musical director is Georges Laurent, who is employed in the Boston Symphony Orchestra as first flute player.

THE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1940

Koussevitzky Returns to Conduct Symphony Concert

Prokofieff's Second Violin Concerto Features Program

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 15th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Jascha Heifetz, violinist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 2 in B flat major, Op. 57..........d'Indy
Violin Concerto in G minor No. 2, Op. 63..........Prokofieff
Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor for organ, transcribed by Respighi......Bach

Prokofieff's Second Violin Concerto is definitely entitled to a place among the very few successful works in this field. Repeated hearings of the records made by the same artists as in yesterday's performance have shown that the Concerto wears well. Prokofieff's first venture into what is admitted to be a difficult medium is not to be casually dismissed, but it is a less grateful work to hear and less sympathetic towards the solo instrument than his second. I: he has had half the success in an even tougher problem, that of the 'Cello Concerto which we are to hear in late March, he will have earned the thanks of all musicians for providing the world with a wider repertoire of such pieces.

The Concerto is classical in feeling, though it does not follow the exact form established by Mozart. It is more plausibly cast in the model set by Mendelssohn. The melodies, particularly the second theme of the first movement and the main theme of the andante, are sometimes what Sir Donald Tovey has called—with reference to Schumann—"recklessly pretty." Observe, however, that Prokofieff never slops over, as a lesser man might have been tempted.

Not only is the work as a whole a masterly exhibition of skill in the blending and contrasting of violin and orchestra, it is also full of "trouvailles," of neat strokes of pure genius. Such, for example, is the passage at the end of the andante where the violin takes the accompaniment pizzicato and the orchestra has the melody.

The orchestration is miraculous and of an unbelievable transparency. Take the use of wood-winds in the very tricky finale or the delicacy of the accompaniment in the andante. The classicism of this concerto is to be found in the tidiness of its form, its abrupt endings and its artistic restraint. Prokofieff has created a work that will endure both because it is in a field which badly needs newcomers and because it is a remarkable example of pure musical composition.

Mr. Heifetz, Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra give the same superb performance of it that they did two seasons ago and that they do, whenever you choose to turn it on, in the records. The interpretation of the finale brought out the only real change. This has been greatly refined, and many details are heard that were not before. Possibly this is a result of Prokofieff's own opinion when he heard the records during his last visit to America. There was prolonged applause for Mr. Heifetz.

The Symphony in B flat by Vincent d'Indy is an extraordinary work. In it the composer brought to logical and highly ingenious fruition that cyclical form of which Franck had made rather sprawling, if sonorous, use. The score is a mine of musical erudition, and the manner in which d'Indy uses his materials is amazing. It could be, and has been, justly said that this Symphony brilliantly employs the Wagnerian "leit-motif" principle in abstract music and that consequently the composer deserves the title, much more than Bruckner, of the symphonic Wagner.

But that is largely from the intellectual point of view, for emotionally—with one or two exceptions—the music is remote from Wagner. The Symphony is also intellectually stimulating and hardly makes a favorable impression on the unprepared or inattentive listener. It is not to be enjoyed in the manner that one takes pleasure in a hot shower bath. Considerable mental effort is required, and then the Symphony's fine quality can be recognized.

As always happens after his mid-winter holiday, Mr. Koussevitzky conducted performances that were astonishingly good even for the high standards that he regularly sets. The d'Indy Symphony, for instance, emerged with splendid clarity and force. Respighi's exciting version of Bach's C minor Passacaglia and Fugue was magnificently interpreted. In short, if Mr. Koussevitzky cannot be always with us, it is good sport when he comes back like a lion and shows us all over again what great conducting can be.

The orchestra will be out of town next week. The concerts of Feb. 23 and 24 offer a Concerto by Koutzen, Hindemith's "Mathis de Maler" Symphony and Taneiev's Symphony in C.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
American Art News

FEB 10 1940

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY IN PICTURES BY GREASON

REHEARSALS of orchestras are not common property of painters. John Sargent once (as long ago as 1876) painted the rehearsal of the Pas de Loup orchestra of the Cirque d'Hiver, an impulsive, quickening study now in the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston. This same music-conscious city, proud of the famous symphony under the Koussevitzky baton, may now be proud of it in paint, too. For Donald Greason, in what must have been an inspiring commission, was allowed to go behind the scenes of the symphony rehearsals and, with the financial coöperation of that aggregation, has emerged at the Hudson Walker Gallery with a series of paintings and pen-and-wash drawings which, if slightly lacking the great dynamic quailty of Sargent's canvas where you can almost feel the vibration of musical air, are engaging and more correct. In this respect the best is the large uncatalogued scene, the orchestra visible from the left balcony box. Mr. Koussevitzky's by now white hair gleams between the design formed by two harps and a music-stand. In this and in the smaller canvas, Rehearsal, From the Left Balcony, the browns of the strings make a lovely patch of color, while in Performance No. 2 the blue illumination above the musicians is nicely painted. One of the best wash drawings is that of the bass-viol player.

J. W. L.

KOUSSEVITZKY BACK

Transcript Feb 10

Leads Boston Symphony in D'Indy, Prokofieff, Bach—Heifetz Soloist

With something more than its usual warmth, the Friday afternoon Symphony audience welcomed Serge Koussevitzky back to the conductor's podium yesterday in Symphony Hall.

Dr. Koussevitzky had been absent for three weeks, during which time we had heard as many conductors wield his baton. There had been some remarkably stirring performances, but three weeks is fully as long as one likes to spare Dr. Koussevitzky during the season, even for his well-earned mid-winter rest.

His return was lent additional lustre by the participation of Jascha Heifetz in Prokofieff's Second Violin Concerto, a work which he introduced to this country three seasons ago with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Vincent D'Indy's long and taxing Second Symphony in B flat major opened the program and Ottorino Respighi's theatrical "interpretazione orchestrale" of the great Bach C minor Passacaglia and Fugue for organ completed it.

To this listener, the most engrossing event of the afternoon was Prokofieff's Concerto which Koussevitzky and Heifetz projected with eloquent grasp of its style and technical brilliance. By no means the work of an extremist, this Concerto is in fact written in a recognizable key: G minor; it contains a good deal of something identifiable as melody, according to the most conservative standards. It even has emotions. Not particularly acute or stormy ones, to be sure, but still they are there: emotions, frank and unashamed.

They show perhaps most clearly in the slow movement which is particularly melodious, the violins of the orchestra and the solo violin engaging in lyric dialogue and duet of great delicacy. Heifetz was in his best form: to the singing brilliance of tone, the meticulous pitch of his custom he added a subjective fervor that has not always been his to command.

Though this concerto never becomes a show piece, the last movement sparkled with some of Mr. Heifetz's best bravoura playing. He tossed it off lightly and unpretentiously as did Koussevitzky, but the audience was aware of the nice points made, the perilous difficulties nonchalantly met and responded with enthusiastic applause and many recalls for both artists.

The D'Indy Symphony has been extravagantly praised. It is, of course, the work of a master musician and poet, but it has its limitations. Much has been made of its cyclical form principle which, though D'Indy took it very seriously, has not proved the inevitable step forward in the evolution of the sonata form that D'Indy conceived it to be. The themes of the first movement which recur later in the Symphony, are vigorous and pregnant and the whole first movement is uncommonly stimulating. There is also much that is ingenious and beautiful as the work unfolds, but to one listener the sum of its movements seemed immoderately long, and not always inspired. The neo-Wagnerian grandeur of the final pages is beginning to sound a little hollow.

Respighi's arrangement of the Bach Passacaglia and Fugue is, despite its bad taste, an awe-inspiring piece. The designation, "interpretazione orchestrale," which is Respighi's own, saves him from a lot of criticism. Still it is a question whether a transcription that attempts to approximate the effect of Bach's organ, would not be a more rewarding experience in the concert hall. Certainly it would have little in common with the thunderous roar and the brassy climaxes heard yesterday.

It is a little quaint, we feel, to see among Respighi's six horns, four trumpets, three trombones, tuba and other instruments that labor so hard to "interpret" the modest 18th century organ, a modern organist who remains practically inaudible throughout the orchestral din.

In spite of all this, it remains an imposing number and Dr. Koussevitzky, past master of orchestral magic, directed it with a cumulative excitement and shattering dramatic impact that brought down an avalanche of applause.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
FEB 11 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 11 1940

Group to Honor Koussevitzky

The Beethoven Association will give a dinner on Saturday at the Hotel Brevoort for Serge Koussevitzky, in recognition of his "distinguished service to American music and musicians." A program will be given by Dorothy Maynor, soprano, assisted by Arp[illegible] at the piano; Caspar Reardon, swing harpist; Jesus Maria Sanroma and Abram Chasi[illegible] pianists. Deems Taylor will be the toastmaster.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 11 1940

PROGRAMS OF THE WEEK

Philadelphia and Boston Orchestra Visits Add to Symphonic Fare

BOTH the Philadelphia and Boston Symphony Orchestras are scheduled to give concerts this week at Carnegie Hall. The pianist, Artur Rubinstein, will be soloist with the Philadelphia, and Jascha Heifetz will appear with the orchestra from Boston. On the Thursday and Friday programs of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra Vladimir Horowitz will make his first appearance as soloist with this organization since 1935, playing Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 2:30 P. M. Conductor, Serge Koussevitzky; soloist, Jascha Heifetz, violin.

Concerto Grosso, for string orchestra, in B minor, Op. 6..........Handel
Symphony No. 1, in B flat, Op. 38..........Schumann
Violin Concerto No. 2, in G minor, Op. 63 (first time)..........Prokofieff
Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor for organ..........Bach-Respighi

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 8:45 P. M. Conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

Symphony No. 2, in B flat, Op. 57...D'Indy
"Pelleas et Melisande," Suite from the Stage Music to Maeterlinck's Tragedy, Op. 80..........Faure
Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un faune..Debussy
Orchestral excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe" (Second Suite)..........Ravel

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Brooklyn Academy of Music, 8:30 P. M. Conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

Concerto Grosso for string orchestra in B minor, Op. 6..........Handel
Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un faune..Debussy
Orchestral excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe" (Second Suite)..........Ravel
Symphony No. 2, in D, Op. 73.....Brahms

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
FEB 11 1940

Forum to Hear Bostonians

Symphony Plays 'Peter and Wolf'

The B[illegible] Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will make its annual appearance for the Philadelphia Forum on Wednesday in the Academy of Music. The program consists of the Beethoven First Symphony in C, Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," and the Brahms Second Symphony in D.

"Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale, which will be given its first Philadelphia performance, will have Richard Hale as narrator.

For fifteen years Dr. Koussevitzky has been at the helm in Boston

Dr. Koussevitzky was born in Russia, was professor in the Moscow Conservatory and double bass soloist in the Imperial Orchestra. He was generally regarded as the world's greatest double bass virtuoso. He organised the Koussevitzky Symphony Orchestra of 85 musicians, which made extensive journeys throughout Russia; in 1920 he founded the "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, and at various times conducted orchestras in England, Germany, Italy and Spain before coming to the Boston Symphony.

188

Koussevitzky Returns to Conduct Symphony Co

Prokofieff's Second Violin Concerto Features Program

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 15th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Jascha Heifetz, violinist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 2 in B flat major, Op. 57 .... d'Indy
Violin Concerto in G minor No. 2, Op. 63 .... Prokofieff
Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor for organ, transcribed by Respighi ..... Bach

Prokofieff's Second Violin Concerto is definitely entitled to a place among the very few successful works in this field. Repeated hearings of the records made by the same artists as in yesterday's performance have shown that the Concerto wears well. Prokofieff's first venture into what is admitted to be a difficult medium is not to be casually dismissed, but it is a less grateful work to hear and less sympathetic towards the solo instrument than his second. If he has had half the success in an even tougher problem, that of the 'Cello Concerto which we are to hear in late March, he will have earned the thanks of all musicians for providing the world with a wider repertoire of such pieces.

The Concerto is classical in feeling, though it does not follow the exact form established by Mozart. It is more plausibly cast in the model set by Mendelssohn. The melodies, particularly the second theme of the first movement and the main theme of the andante, are sometimes what Sir Donald Tovey has called—with reference to Schumann—"recklessly pretty." Observe, however, that Prokofieff never slops over, as a lesser man might have been tempted.

Not only is the work as a whole a masterly exhibition of skill in the blending and contrasting of violin and orchestra, it is also full of "trouvailles," of neat strokes of pure genius. Such, for example, is the passage at the end of the andante where the violin takes the accompaniment pizzicato and the orchestra has the melody.

The orchestration is miraculous and of an unbelievable transparency. Take the use of wood-winds in the very tricky finale or the delicacy of the accompaniment in the andante. The classicism of this concerto is to be found in the tidiness of its form, its abrupt endings and its artistic restraint. Prokofieff has created a work that will endure both because it is in a field which badly needs newcomers and because it is a remarkable example of pure musical composition.

Mr. Heifetz, Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra give the same superb performance of it that they did two seasons ago and that they do, whenever you choose to turn it on, in the records. The interpretation of the finale brought out the only real change. This has been greatly refined, and many details are heard that were not before. Possibly this is a result of Prokofieff's own opinion when he heard the records during his last visit to America. There was prolonged applause for Mr. Heifetz.

The Symphony in B flat by Vincent d'Indy is an extraordinary work. In it the composer brought to logical and highly ingenious fruition that cyclical form of which Franck had made rather sprawling, if sonorous, use. The score is a mine of musical erudition, and the manner in which d'Indy uses his materials is amazing. It could be, and has been, justly said that this Symphony brilliantly employs the Wagnerian "leit-motif" principle in abstract music and that consequently the composer deserves the title, much more than Bruckner, of the symphonic Wagner.

But that is largely from the intellectual point of view, for emotionally—with one or two exceptions—the music is remote from Wagner. The Symphony is also intellectually stimulating and hardly makes a favorable impression on the unprepared or inattentive listener. It is not to be enjoyed in the manner that one takes pleasure in a hot shower bath. Considerable mental effort is required, and then the Symphony's fine quality can be recognized.

As always happens after his mid-winter holiday, Mr. Koussevitzky conducted performances that were astonishingly good even for the high standards that he regularly sets. The d'Indy Symphony, for instance, emerged with splendid clarity and force. Respighi's exciting version of Bach's C minor Passacaglia and Fugue was magnificently interpreted. In short, if Mr. Koussevitzky cannot be always with us, it is good sport when he comes back like a lion and shows us all over again what great conducting can be.

The orchestra will be out of town next week. The concerts of Feb. 23 and 24 offer a Concerto by Koutzen, Hindemith's "Mathis de Maler" Symphony and Taneiev's Symphony in C.

KOUSSEVITZKY BACK

Transcript Feb 10

Leads Boston Symphony in D'Indy, Prokofieff, Bach—Heifetz Soloist

With something more than its usual warmth, the Friday afternoon Symphony audience welcomed Serge Koussevitzky back to the conductor's podium yesterday in Symphony Hall.

Dr. Koussevitzky had been absent for three weeks, during which time we had heard as many conductors wield his baton. There had been some remarkably stirring performances, but three weeks is fully as long as one likes to spare Dr. Koussevitzky during the season, even for his well-earned mid-winter rest.

His return was lent additional lustre by the participation of Jascha Heifetz in Prokofieff's Second Violin Concerto, a work which he introduced to this country three seasons ago with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Vincent D'Indy's long and taxing Second Symphony in B flat major opened the program and Ottorino Respighi's theatrical "interpretazione orchestrale" of the great Bach C minor Passacaglia and Fugue for organ completed it.

To this listener, the most engrossing event of the afternoon was Prokofieff's Concerto which Koussevitzky and Heifetz projected with eloquent grasp of its style and technical brilliance. By no means the work of an extremist, this Concerto is in fact written in a recognizable key: G minor; it contains a good deal of something identifiable as melody, according to the most conservative standards. It even has emotions. Not particularly acute or stormy ones, to be sure, but still they are there: emotions, frank and unashamed.

They show perhaps most clearly in the slow movement which is particularly melodious, the violins of the orchestra and the solo violin engaging in lyric dialogue and duet of great delicacy. Heifetz was in his best form: to the singing brilliance of tone, the meticulous pitch of his custom he added a subjective fervor that has not always been his to command.

Though this concerto never becomes a show piece, the last movement sparkled with some of Mr. Heifetz's best bravoura playing. He tossed it off lightly and unpretentiously as did Koussevitzky, but the audience was aware of the nice points made, the perilous difficulties nonchalantly met and responded with enthusiastic applause and many recalls for both artists.

The D'Indy Symphony has been extravagantly praised. It is, of course, the work of a master musician and poet, but it has its limitations. Much has been made of its cyclical form principle which, though D'Indy took it very seriously, has not proved the inevitable step forward in the evolution of the sonata form that D'Indy conceived it to be. The themes of the first movement which recur later in the Symphony, are vigorous and pregnant and the whole first movement is uncommonly stimulating. There is also much that is ingenious and beautiful as the work unfolds, but to one listener the sum of its movements seemed immoderately long and not always inspired. The neo-Wagnerian grandeur of the final pages is beginning to sound a little hollow.

Respighi's arrangement of the Bach Passacaglia and Fugue is, despite its bad taste, an awe-inspiring piece. The designation, "interpretazione orchestrale," which is Respighi's own, saves him from a lot of criticism. Still it is a question whether a transcription that attempts to approximate the effect of Bach's organ, would not be a more rewarding experience in the concert hall. Certainly it would have little in common with the thunderous roar and the brassy climaxes heard yesterday.

It is a little quaint, we feel, to see among Respighi's six horns, four trumpets, three trombones, tuba and other instruments that labor so hard to "interpret" the modest 18th century organ, a modern organist who remains practically inaudible throughout the orchestral din.

In spite of all this, it remains an imposing number and Dr. Koussevitzky, past master of orchestral magic, directed it with a cumulative excitement and shattering dramatic impact that brought down an avalanche of applause.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
FEB 11 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 11 1940

Group to Honor Koussevitzky

The Beethoven Association will give a dinner on Saturday at the Hotel Brevoort for Serge Koussevitzky, in recognition of his "distinguished service to American music and musicians." A program will be given by Dorothy Maynor, soprano, assisted by Arp[illegible] at the piano; Caspar Reardon, swing harpist; Jesus Maria Sanroma and Abram Chasins, [illegible] pianists. Deems Taylor will be the toastmaster.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 11 1940

PROGRAMS OF THE WEEK

Philadelphia and Boston Orchestra Visits Add to Symphonic Fare

BOTH the Philadelphia and Boston Symphony Orchestras are scheduled to give concerts this week at Carnegie Hall. The pianist, Artur Rubinstein, will be soloist with the Philadelphia, and Jascha Heifetz will appear with the orchestra from Boston. On the Thursday and Friday programs of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra Vladimir Horowitz will make his first appearance as soloist with this organization since 1935, playing Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 2:30 P. M. Conductor, Serge Koussevitzky; soloist, Jascha Heifetz, violin.

Concerto Grosso, for string orchestra, in B minor, Op. 6 .... Handel
Symphony No. 1, in B flat, Op. 38 .... Schumann
Violin Concerto No. 2, in G minor, Op. 63 (first time) .... Prokofieff
Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor for organ .... Bach-Respighi

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 8:45 P. M. Conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

Symphony No. 2, in B flat, Op. 57 ... D'Indy
"Pelleas et Melisande," Suite from the Stage Music to Maeterlinck's Tragedy, Op. 80 .... Faure
Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un faune .. Debussy
Orchestral excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe" (Second Suite) .... Ravel

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Brooklyn Academy of Music, 8:30 P. M. Conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

Concerto Grosso for string orchestra in B minor, Op. 6 .... Handel
Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un faune .. Debussy
Orchestral excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe" (Second Suite) .... Ravel
Symphony No. 2, in D, Op. 73 .... Brahms

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
FEB 11 1940

Forum to Hear Bostonians

Symphony Plays 'Peter and Wolf'

The Bos[illegible] Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will make its annual appearance for the Philadelphia Forum on Wednesday in the Academy of Music. The program consists of the Beethoven First Symphony in C, Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," and the Brahms Second Symphony in D.

"Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale, which will be given its first Philadelphia performance, will have Richard Hale as narrator.

For fifteen years Dr. Koussevitzky has been at the helm in Boston

Dr. Koussevitzky was born in Russia, was professor in the Moscow Conservatory and double bass soloist in the Imperial Orchestra. He was generally regarded as the world's greatest double bass virtuoso. He organised the Koussevitzky Symphony Orchestra of 85 musicians, which made extensive journeys throughout Russia; in 1920 he founded the "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, and at various times conducted orchestras in England, Germany, Italy and Spain before coming to the Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
American Art News ✓
FEB 10 1940

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY IN PICTURES BY GREASON

REHEARSALS of orchestras are not common property of painters. John Sargent once (as long ago as 1876) painted the rehearsal of the Pas de Loup orchestra of the Cirque d'Hiver, an impulsive, quickening study now in the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston. This same music-conscious city, proud of the famous symphony under the Koussevitzky baton, may now be proud of it in paint, too. For Donald Greason, in what must have been an inspiring commission, was allowed to go behind the scenes of the symphony rehearsals and, with the financial coöperation of that aggregation, has emerged at the Hudson Walker Gallery with a series of paintings and pen-and-wash drawings which, if slightly lacking the great dynamic quailty of Sargent's canvas where you can almost feel the vibration of musical air, are engaging and more correct. In this respect the best is the large uncatalogued scene, the orchestra visible from the left balcony box. Mr. Koussevitzky's by now white hair gleams between the design formed by two harps and a music-stand. In this and in the smaller canvas, Rehearsal, From the Left Balcony, the browns of the strings make a lovely patch of color, while in Performance No. 2 the blue illumination above the musicians is nicely painted. One of the best wash drawings is that of the bass-viol player.

J. [illegible]. L.

184

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

FEB 11 1940

2 Dance Troupes Billed

2 Orchestras And 2 Operas Scheduled

Next week will present the most crowded music calendar of the local season, with 10 important events listed.

Ted Shawn and his Men Dancers will present a week of dance drama at the Erlanger Theater, starting with a matinee tomorrow. A dance cycle of three dramas, each a full evening long, will be given for nine performances.

"O, Libertad," offered first tomorrow matinee, is a dance-drama of American conquest. "Dance of the Ages," first given Tuesday evening, treats of man in nature and nature in man. "The Dome," a philosophical dance treatise, will be given Wednesday evening. All will be repeated twice during the week.

Shawn did the choreography and Jess Meeker the music for the dances.

Graham Troupe.

Martha Graham and her dance group will open their fourth transcontinental tour at Town Hall tomorrow, under auspices of the Philadelphia Dance Association.

Miss Graham's program will include "Columbiad," "Every Soul Is a Circus," "Frontier" and "American Document."

The Philadelphia Orchestra will give a Youth Concert tomorrow in the Mastbaum Theater, with Eugene Ormandy conducting, and Frances Greer as soloist.

The program includes Sibelius' Seventh Symphony and "Finlandia," Beethoven's Grand Fugue and Debussy's "Printemps." Miss Greer will sing three arias.

"La Boheme."

Tuesday the Metropolitan Opera Company will present Puccini's "La Boheme," with Bidu Sayao as Mimi, Charles Kullman as Rodolfo, George Cehanovsky as Schaunard, Giuseppe DeLuca as Marcello, and Annamary Dickey as Musetta. Gennaro Papi will conduct.

Wednesday the Philadelphia Forum will present the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky in its annual visit. The program consists of Beethoven's First Symphony, Brahms' Second, and Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf." The last, in its first local performance, will have Richard Hale as narrator.

Philadelphia Orchestra
Eugene Ormandy, conducting.
Alexander Hilsberg, soloist.
All-Beethoven Program.
Overture to "Egmont."
Violin Concerto, D major.
Symphony No. 5, in C minor.

The Philadelphia-La Scala Opera Company will present Bizet's "Carmen" Thursday, with Joan Peebles in the title role, Laddis Kiepura in his American debut as Don Jose, and Joseph Royer as Escamillo.

Maria Sokil will sing Micaela and other roles will be taken by Nino Ruisi, Mildred Ippolito, Bernice Schalker, Walter Stafford, Blakely Ritter and Constanzo Sorvino. Angelo Canarutto will conduct.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, who leads his Boston Symphony Orchestra into the Academy Wednesday, studies a score in an off-moment at home.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 11 1940

BENEFIT BY STRAVINSKY

IGOR STRAVINSKY will appear as conductor and pianist in a program of his own compositions to be presented Thursday afternoon, March 14, in Town Hall, under the auspices of the Committee for Relief in Allied Countries. The proceeds will be devoted to general relief work overseas, with a part of the sum set aside at Mr. Stravinsky's request for the direct aid of musicians and their families suffering hardships because of the war.

A special feature of the concert will be the initial performance in New York of Mr. Stravinsky's Dunbarton Oaks concerto for fifteen instruments, which will be played under the composer's baton by an ensemble made up of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This work had its world première two years ago in Paris. It is named for the Georgetown home of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Wood Bliss, both of whom are leading officials of the Committee for Relief in Allied Countries.

The original score, which belongs to the Dunbarton Oaks library, is now on loan at the Library of Congress and ultimately will become the property of Harvard University, as will the other art treasures of the Dunbarton Oaks library collection.

The concerto is said to differ from other works of its composer in character, revealing a new facet of his inventive powers. It has been mentioned as "distinguished by purity of form and almost classic simplicity, with a multiplicity of rhythms," and also as "one of his most significant contributions to musical literature." Before its performance here the composition will be presented in Cambridge, Mass., on March 6, and in Boston, on March 8.

Besides the new concerto the program will contain "Histoire du Soldat," for small orchestra with percussion instruments; the octet for winds, and the two-piano concerto, with the composer at the piano, in the performance of which he will be assisted by Adele Marcus.

Hannikainen Chosen To Conduct in New York

CSM Feb 13

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has selected Tauno Hannikainen, visiting Finnish conductor, to be the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first guest conductor in a New York concert in 35 years.

After watching Hannikainen conduct the second of two symphony programs here, Feb. 3, Dr. Koussevitzky chose him to lead the orchestra's Brooklyn Academy of Music program Feb. 15 and the latter half of its Carnegie Hall concert in New York, Feb. 17.

Hannikainen, who in peace time is the leader of Finland's Turku Orchestra, is in this country on leave from the Finnish Home Guard.

De Bellis Studios

CSM Feb 12

Dorothy Maynor

To sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Pension Fund Concert Sunday afternoon, Feb. 25.

Post Feb 11

"FIND" TO SING HERE

Miss Maynor With Symphony

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

TWO artists, a pianist and a singer, who are very much in the limelight just now, will shortly appear on the stage of Symphony Hall. The pianist, Vladimir Horowitz, comes to us after an extended absence; the singer, Dorothy Maynor, will make her Boston debut. To be more specific as to dates, Mr. Horowitz will be heard in recital here tomorrow evening, while Miss Maynor will be assisting artist at a concert given for the Symphony Orchestra's pension fund, two weeks from today.

According to the New York critics Mr. Horowitz has come back to the concert stage, from which he was taken by a serious and protracted illness, with his old virtuosity unimpaired and his musicianship deepened. His programme comprises Mendelssohn's F minor Prelude and Fugue, the C major Fantasy and Toccata of Schumann, the Barcarolle and four Etudes of Chopin, four more Studies by Debussy and Mr. Horowitz's own Variations on a theme from "Carmen."

Continued ↑

Since Miss Maynor was a discovery of Dr. Koussevitzky, who heard her last summer during the course of the Berkshire Festival, it is fitting that she should make her first appearance in Boston at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. To the accompaniment of that body, she wlil sing the familiar "Oh, Sleep, Why Dost Thou Leave Me?" from Handel's "Semele," Pamina's air from Mozart's "Magic Flute," Elsa's Dream from "Lohengrin" and "Depuis le jour" from Charpentier's "Louise." As it happens, another singer, the Polish tenor, Jan Kiepura, will be heard at Symphony Hall on the evening of that same Sunday.

While on the subject of singers there are five who will be heard in Boston this week, two tenors, two sopranos and a contralto.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.

FEB 10 1940

MUSIC

A COMMENTATOR on the musical scene—on the music, and on the ideas, the activities, the institutions which music brings into existence—is, I pointed out a while ago, bound to concern himself with other men's comment, since this is itself a part of the scene and a part that in considerable degree determines the rest. Criticism is one of the things that have interested me as a critic; it is the thing I am interested in as I look back on the eighteen years in which, at intervals, I have written for The Nation.

The critic has important functions: as a mere reporter, an appraiser of the particular musical event, he has the duty to give his reader not only an honest judgment but the basis of this judgment, the ideas about music and performance which will add up in the reader's mind to musical understanding, to a basis for his own judgment; the particular event gives the critic the occasion to consider the actual working of this organization or that institution in the light of what would be desirable; and events that determine the working of an institution, its structure, its very existence, are occasions for the critic to speak not only to his readers but for them. How, in those eighteen years, were these functions performed by the critics of important New York newspapers? Badly, I would say, recalling Olin Downes on the Times, Deems Taylor and Samuel Chotzinoff on the World; and this placed an even greater responsibility on men with the equipment, the position of W. J. Henderson of the Sun and Lawrence Gilman of the Tribune.

Henderson's competence, honesty, and vigor made him the only first-line critic one could read with respect. Yet Walter Damrosch's career led him to conclude that "a sound musician, who is also a man of energy, generous impulses, and broad outlook, can get well up toward the mountain tops without blowing his alp-horn every moment"—an appraisal which lent force to Shaw's contention that a critic should know no man, that "his hand should be against every man, and every man's hand against his." It is an appraisal, moreover, which I draw attention to because it was this sort of treatment, most of it less honest than Henderson's, that enabled Damrosch to do the damage he did.

Henderson not only was uncritical of a friend; he was, in his last years, a little crotchety. Irritated by the commotion over virtuoso conductors he insisted that the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and the music of Beethoven and Brahms would remain even without Toscanini and even with a conductor of lesser magnitude, though he must have known that orchestra and music would sound different under such a conductor; he cited the excellence which the Boston Symphony had achieved under a single permanent conductor as a reason for the New York Philharmonic to do likewise, though he must have known that the Boston orchestra owed its excellence at least as much to the competence as to the permanence of its conductors. Writing in this way Henderson not only gave his readers incorrect ideas on conductors and orchestral performance but placed powerful arguments in the hands of the people who finally brought about the engagement of Barbirolli as single permanent conductor of the New York Philharmonic, which considerably reduced the orchestra's usefulness to the community.

More reprehensible, however, was Gilman's contribution to the same result. Henderson lived to hear the orchestra and Beethoven and Brahms as they sounded when conducted by Barbirolli, and disapproved. But Gilman, after Barbirolli's first appearance, wrote of a performance of Brahms's Fourth which had torn passion to tatters that it had "set the seal of musical piety and eloquence upon Mr. Barbirolli's gifts as an interpreter"; the modest virtues of some other performances elicited the statement that "the whole magnificent orchestra, strings and wind alike, sang with a clarity and depth and lusciousness of tone, an imaginative choiceness of phrasing and of style"; and Barbirolli himself was elevated into "something better and rarer and finer than a conductor of power and sensibility. He permits us to think that he is akin to those uncommon interpreters who give us a measure of 'that inner standard of distinction, selection, refusal' which an incorruptible artist once defined: who have sifted from experience 'all that seemed beautiful and significant, and have treasured above all things those savings of fine gold.'" With this review Gilman was a great help to the influential people of the Philharmonic Symphony Society who were out to put Barbirolli over—the help, perhaps, that an orchestra's program annotator should be; but he failed in his obligations to his position as critic, to his readers, to the community whose orchestra the Philharmonic was.

He failed in these obligations, though he helped the people on the Metropolitan board, when in 1932 he wrote of the low quality of the Metropolitan's repertory as something imposed on an unsubsidized company by the low taste

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

FEB 11 1940

Koussevitzky Presents Work By Prokofieff

Second Violin Concerto Has Its First Orchestral Hearing Here Friday

Serge Prokofieff's second violin concerto will have its first New York performance with orchestra in the Boston Symphony's concert next Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, with Jascha Heifetz as the soloist under Serge Koussevitzky's direction. The remainder of the program consists of familiar music, Handel's concerto grosso in B minor, Op. 6, No. 6, Schumann's first symphony, in B flat major, and Respighi's orchestration of Bach's passacaglia and fugue in C minor.

The Prokofieff concerto was first played in Madrid on Dec. 1, 1935, and was first performed in this country by Mr. Heifetz and the Boston Symphony in Symphony Hall on Dec. 17, 1937. It has been recorded by the same artists. The first of the two or three performances which it has had here with piano accompaniment was given by Byrd Elliot in Carnegie Hall on Nov. 5, 1938. The Russian composer's first concerto, a much earlier work, has had six orchestral performances in New York during the last fifteen years.

The Boston Symphony's third evening program of the season in Carnegie Hall will be held next Friday evening under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, instead of the customary Thursday, and will be entirely devoted to French music, including two works frequently heard here, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Ravel's second suite from "Daphnis et Chloe." The other two works are much less familiar. Vincent d'Indy's second symphony in B flat major, once described by Lawrence Gilman as "noble but uncompromising," was composed in 1902-'03; its only New York performances during the last fifteen years were those given by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under Werner Janssen on Nov. 8, 9 and 11, 1934. The Philharmonic also performed four excerpts from Gabriel Fauré's incidental music to Maeterlinck's "Pelléas et Mélisande," the Prelude, "Fileuse" and Adagio which Dr. Koussevitzky will present next Friday, and the Sicilienne, on April 7 1938. The music was composed in1898 while Debussy was working on his music drama based on this text, and first heard in a London production of the play on June 21 of that year with Mrs. Patrick Campbell as Mélisande. It was first heard with the play in this country in Boston in 1902.

In the season's third concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music next Thursday night, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the Handel, Debussy and Ravel works listed above, and the second symphony of Brahms.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DALLAS, TEXAS
NEWS

FEB 11 1940

Boston Symphony To Introduce Prokoviev Work

NEW YORK, Feb. 10 (UP).—The latest work of the Russian modernist composer, Serge Prokoviev, will be introduced to this country on March 21 and 23 by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

It is Prokoviev's cello concerto in E Minor, Opus 58. The soloist will be Gregor Piatagorsky, who is regarded by Koussevitzky as one of the greatest cellists of the day.

New York will hear its first performance of the Prokoviev second violin concerto on Feb. 16, when the Boston Symphony will make its third visit of the season to Carnegie Hall. The soloist will be Jascha Heifetz.

The second violin concerto was given its first performance in this country by the Boston Symphony and Heifetz two seasons ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS TRIBUNE

FEB 12 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

FEB 11 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM UTICA, N. Y.
Observer Dispatch

FEB 11 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM WILMINGTON, DEL.
STAR

FEB 11 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES-PICAYUNE

FEB 11 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM LINCOLN, NEB.
STATE JOURNAL

FEB 11 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BILLINGS, MONT.
MORNING GAZETTE

FEB 11 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM STILLWATER, OKLA.
PRESS

FEB 12 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM CARLISLE, PA.
SENTINEL

FEB 12 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM MUNCIE, IND.
STAR

FEB 11 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WHEELING, W. VA.
NEWS

FEB 11 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM ASHLAND, KY.
INDEPENDENT

FEB 11 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM WILMINGTON, DEL.
NEWS

FEB 12 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHARLESTON, S. C.
NEWS-COURIER

FEB 11 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

FEB 15 1940

Hannikainen to Lead The Boston Symphony

Serge Koussevitzky, who was to have conducted the Boston Symphony at the Brooklyn Academy of Music tonight, has relinquished the baton for this concert in favor of Tauno Hannikainen, young Finnish conductor who directed the orchestra with notable success in Boston earlier this month. The program has been changed and will consist of Handel's D minor Concerto Grosso, Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3, and the First Symphony and "En Saga" of Sibelius.

Mr. Hannikainen will conduct the First Symphony of Sibelius at the Saturday afternoon concert at Carnegie Hall. The remainder of the program will be under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction and will present Jascha Heifetz in the Second Concerto of Prokofieff as originally announced.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

FEB 12 1940

Page 14—BOSTON SUNDAY ADVERTISER

Koussevitzky Returns In Triumph

Feb 11

By LEO GAFFNEY

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY returned to the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the week-end concerts, after a longer-than-usual mid-winter vacation, and was greeted like a long lost brother.

The program was D'Indy's Second Symphony in B-flat Major; Prokofieff's Second Violin Concerto (G-minor), with Jascha Heifetz in bedazzling solo, and Respighi's orchestral transcription of the Bach C-minor Passagaglia and Fugue for Organ.

If any man were so depraved as to dispute the supremacy of the Boston orchestra the performance of the D'Indy and the Bach-Respighi would be enough to straighten him out.

Regardless of D'Indy's particular peak in the great panorama of symphonic music, the development of the two principal themes in his Second Symphony, the flashing brilliance of orchestral color, the flight and descent of melody, the manner in which a tune can become a coursing thrill through the whole orchestral body—all add up to an astounding feat—when accomplished by the forces of Koussevitzky.

The same excitement carried over into the Passacaglia and Fugue. A passaglia, as of course you know, is a twin brother of the chaconne, both derived from Spanish sources. "Pasar" in Spanish means "to walk," and "calle" a road. Hence a passacaglia is an old form of music by wandering minstrels. It's theme, in the bass, is repeated over and over again, with as much ornamentation as the higher-voiced and smarter instruments can pile on top of it. The chaconne—to get the whole thing cleaned up—works itself out in the same fashion and derives from the Basque word "chocuna," meaning "pretty."

NO telling where Bach got the magnificent rolling groundwork for this particular Passacaglia, but you can hardly imagine anyone else weaving such fine strands of melody all around and over it. It has always made a mighty thing to play upon the organ, and many a fine Flemish and Italian hand has tried its cunning at weaving more melodies on the same old loom. It remained for Ottorino ("Pines of Rome") Respighi to spin the whole thing out for the full force of orchestra and organ.

As played by Koussevitsky it is a Passacaglia to end all passacaglias—or that is the impression in this corner.

As to Mr. Heifetz' playing of the Prokofieff, what is there to report, other than the confounding fact that it brushed perfection? Prokofieff's strange tunes, undulations, ornaments and what-nots came out with stupefying dexterity.

It was, somehow, reviving to get out into Massachusetts ave. afterward and hear a horrible handorgan wheezing "The Wearin' of the Green"—which is, as Joxer Daly might say, a darlin' tune, too.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 12 1940

HANNIKAINEN TO LEAD THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Finn, First Guest Leader Here, to Direct Sibelius on Saturday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be directed by a guest conductor at Carnegie Hall for the first time during its thirty-five years of visits here on Saturday afternoon, when Tauno Hannikainen of Turku [Abo], Finland, will lead the Sibelius First symphony at the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. It will be Mr. Hannikainen's first appearance here, although he will conduct Thursday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

The Brooklyn program, which will be entirely under Mr. Hannikainen's baton, will consist of Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 10, the Beethoven Third Leonore overture, Sibelius's "En Saga" and First symphony. At the Carnegie Hall concert Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the Bach-Respighi Organ Passacaglia and the orchestral part of the Prokofieff Second violin concerto, in which Jascha Heifetz will be soloist. Mr. H[illegible]nen will direct the Sibelius work as the second half of the program.

Mr. Hannikainen was the regular conductor of the orchestra at Turku until the war suspended all musical activity and he was drafted for civilian guard duty. He received permission to accept the guest conductorship of the Boston Symphony on Feb. 2 and 3, in which he scored great successes. He has been permitted to remain in this country for a few more guest appearances before he resumes military duty in Finland.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

FEB 13 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB 14 1940

Hannikainen To Lead Boston Symphony Here

Koussevitzky Impressed By Finnish Conductor

For the first time in 35 years of visits to Brooklyn and New York the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be led by a guest conductor. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has invited Tauno Hannikainen, the conductor from Turku, Finland, to lead the orchestra in the concert at the Academy of Music tomorrow night.

Tauno Hannikainen was the regular conductor of the orchestra at Turku until all music was suspended on account of the war. He was rehearsing the orchestra of Helsinki when the first air raid of last November interrupted all music. He was drafted for civilian guard duty but he had been engaged before the beginning of the present season to visit America and conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra so his government gave him permission to fulfill this engagement. Arriving in America last month, having crossed Germany by special passport, and having sailed from Italy, Mr. Hannikainen conducted the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston on Feb. 2 and 3, with extraordinary success. His musicianship and his moving interpretation of three works of Sibelius were highly praised.

Because he looks with special favor on the conductor's ability Dr. Koussevitzky has invited him to conduct the whole concert in the Academy of Music when he will present Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 10, Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture, Sibelius' En Saga and First Symphony. His first appearance in Manhattan will be on Saturday afternoon.

---

of the opera-going public to which it had to cater, and saluted Gatti-Casazza for his "dauntless action" in giving "Elektra," his "truly heroic idealism" with "Pelléas." For the truth, which Gilman knew, was that after the courageous Hammerstein had given these two works in 1907, the timid Gatti had waited until 1925 for "Pelléas" and 1932 for "Elektra," and that only his low taste and complacency had been responsible for the low level of repertory and performances even in the prosperous years when the opera-going public had eaten out of the Metropolitan's hand. And there were other such failures.

But it was not only when he spoke that Gilman failed; as often the failure was in his silence. The ideas with which Taylor, Chotzinoff, and Downes filled the heads of their readers demanded critical consideration no less than the sounds made by conductors and violinists; but Gilman observed the code of music critics that I described recently: he never mentioned a fellow-critic except to pay him a compliment. In all the years that Chotzinoff blew his penny trumpet on the World his performances did not draw a word of comment from Gilman; only when Chotzinoff published "Eroica" did Gilman break his silence, and then only to describe Chotzinoff as a critic with a "quick and warm responsiveness," a "guarding sense of measure and restraint," a style that was "spare, expressive, precise." Nor did Gilman find it necessary to comment on Downes until Downes published the talks he had given in the intermissions of the New York Philharmonic broadcasts. Then, referring to "the largely pretentious and semi-literate gush, rich in ignorance and error," with which Downes's predecessor had disfigured the broadcasts, Gilman quoted a passage by Downes: "In his scores he [Tschaikovsky] cries out, shakes his fist at the skies, remembers the agony of thwarted love, and the end of every man's desire. Admire such a man, such a neurotic, such a pessimist? I adore him, and rate him a thousand times higher than aesthetes who have never known Tschaikovsky's weakness and terror, who shudder at such emotional indecencies, and pull their skirts together at the sound of them." And of this Gilman wrote: "This is the right note, admirably skilful in its manner of insinuating information, yet never relapsing . . . from the plane of thought and feeling appropriate to a great subject."

Moreover, it was, as Gilman said, important that radio listeners who were hearing symphonic music for the first time be assisted with correct information and discriminating comment; yet this was the first time that he referred to the gush and ignorance with which Downes's predecessor had misled them for several years. The obligation of the music critic to concern himself with the broadcasting and recording of music, Gilman observed correctly on another occasion, was inescapable; yet he evaded it: he did not write a word about the program policies of the broadcasting stations, the rubbish that was spoken with the music, and he did not review records; nor, as a result, did anyone else review them in the Herald Tribune until quite recently.

Evidently, in the criticism of the past eighteen years there is little to recall with pleasure or respect.

B. H. HAGGIN

191

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN
FEB 12 1940

RUSSIAN CHOOSES FINN TO LEAD ORCHESTRA

Hannikainen Will Conduct Boston Symphony in N. Y.

Boston, Feb. 12—(AP)—Tauno Hannikainen, 44-year-old visiting Finnish conductor, was chosen today by Russian-born Serge Koussevitzky to be the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first guest conductor in a New York concert in 35 years.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who heard the last of two symphony programs Hannikainen conducted here, selected him to conduct the orchestra's Brooklyn Academy of Music program on Thursday and the last half of its Carnegie Hall concert in New York Saturday.

Both programs will include works by the Finn's countryman, Jan Sibelius.

Hannikainen, described by Dr. Koussevitzky as "extremely talented," is in this country on leave from the Finnish Home Guard. In peace-time, he is the leader of the Abo Orchestra in Finland.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
FEB 12 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NORWICH, N. Y.
SUN
FEB 12 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
POST
FEB 12 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER
FEB 12 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
Democrat-Chronicle
FEB 12 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD
FEB 12 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM WILMINGTON, DEL.
NEWS
FEB 13 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
FEB 13 1940

Boston Symphony Plays Here Tonight

The Boston Symphony orchestra, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will present the third of the present series of concerts being sponsored by the Springfield Community Association and the Junior League tonight at the Municipal Auditorium.

The program, to which only members of the association will be admitted, will be as follows:

Symphony No. 1, Op. 21..........Beethoven
 Adagio molto; allegro con brio
 Andante cantabile con moto
 Menuetto; allegro molto
 Finale
Daphnis et Chloe suite....................Ravel
 Lever du jour
 Pantomime
 Danse generale
  Intermission
Symphony No. 1, Op. 38..........Schumann
 Andante; allegro molto vivace
 Larghetto
 Scherzo; trio
 Allegro animato

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
FEB 12 1940

Hannikainen Will Conduct In New York

BOSTON (AP) — Russian-born Serge Koussevitsky selected Taune Hannikainen, 44-year-old visiting Finnish conductor, yesterday to be the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first guest conductor in a New York concert in 35 years.

After observing Hannikainen conduct the last of two symphony programs here Feb. 2 and 3, Dr. Koussevitsky chose him to lead the orchestra's Brooklyn Academy of Music program Feb. 15 and the last half of its Carnegie Hall concert in New York Feb. 17.

Hannikainen, who in peace time is the leader of Finland's Turko Orchestra, is in this country on leave from the Finnish Home Guard.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
FEB 13 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH
FEB 12 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM LYNN, MASS.
ITEM
FEB 12 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
FEB 12 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
FEB 12 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Evening Public Ledger
FEB 12 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CONCORD, N. H.
Monitor & N. H. Patriot
FEB 12 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER
FEB 12 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
JOURNAL
FEB 12 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SO. NORWALK, CONN.
SENTINEL
FEB 12 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
FEB 12 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
FEB 12 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
FEB 12 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
FEB 12 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram
FEB 12 1940

About The City

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra goes to New York this week to give its 35th annual concerts, it will have a guest conductor for the first time in that city. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the regular conductor, announced today that Tauno Hannikainen, conductor of the Turku (Finland) orchestra, will conduct the Boston Orchestra at the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Thursday night, and at Carnegie Hall, New York city, Saturday afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD-NEWS
FEB 12 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
FEB 13 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
CHRONICLE
FEB 12 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram
FEB 14 1940

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Concert Program In Springfield

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra paid tribute to spring with a concert including Schumann's First symphony and orchestral excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" at the Springfield municipal auditorium last night. The third offering of the evening was the First symphony of Beethoven.

The program opened with the Schumann work, one of the most famous of all pieces of "spring" music. This bright symphony waas presented with usual Boston symphony finesse. From the opening call of the horns, thru the romantic second movement, and on to the gay brilliance of the third and fourth movements, the orchestra gave an exhilarating interpretation.

Beethoven's First symphony, delightful by itself, seemed out of place in last night's program, especially coming right after the Schumann symphony. Two symphonies in one concert are an earful anyway, and the lack of contrast between these two made for a somewhat unbalanced program. However, no one can find fault with Beethoven on any program, or with the Boston symphony's performance of his work.

The contrast missed in the first part of the evening arrived with a flourish with the playing of Ravel's gorgeous "Daphne et Chloe" suite, which was far and away the high point of the evening. This composer uses all the color resources of the orchestra, a wide dynamic range, and exuberant feeling, to create a brilliant piece of deliineation. Under Koussexitzky's masterful baton every shimmering woodwind passage and every climax of brasses was richly appreciated.

It was announced during intermission that the fourth concert in the Springfield Community series will be given by the Metropolitan Quartet, March 14,, instead of March 12. The postponement is due to the fact that the members of the group have been called by the Metropolitan Opera company for a performance on the original date.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
FEB 14 1940

Two Symphonies and Ravel Suite Comprise Fine Boston Program

Two "first" symphonies and orchestral excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis and Cloe," second suite, made up the excellent program which Dr Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra presented last night in the packed Municipal Auditorium. It was the third concert in the current series of Community concerts, under the auspices of the Junior League.

Those who feared that the inclusion of two "first" symphonies would not give the program sufficient impressiveness and grandeur, reckoned not with the genius of Koussevitzky or the resources of the orchestra, although it was the brilliant Ravel reading which proved the greatest popular favorite. Koussevitzky was gracious but firm in declining, despite the torrential applause which followed the Ravel, to add an encore. Almost anything would have been anticlimactic.

The Schumann work, which he himself called the "Spring symphony" was written 99 years ago this month shortly after he had married, and during a year which saw a tremendous outpouring of smaller compositions, particularly songs. His initial attempt at symphony writing had to be corrected in several of its unplayable passages by friends, among them Mendelssohn, chosen to conduct its first performance.

The symphony was not his forte, but in the four he wrote, there is a perennial freshness awaiting the conductor who can recognize it. The Boston reading, scheduled to be repeated this summer at the Stockbridge festival, is one which brings to life all the Schumann spirit, and makes listeners wonder that it is not more frequently programmed. The larghetto movement, made to glow by the strings, was particularly lovely.

The Beethoven which suffers in comparison with his later symphonies now seems more in the chamber music category, but at the time it was damned for what seemed to be revolutionary ideas. His moving rapidly from key to key in the opening movement was little short of heresy, and his use of brass brought criticism that the score seemed written for a band instead of an orchestra.

The tunefulness of the andante cantabile movement, the surprising celerity of the minuet, and the capricious theme of the finale, however, add to its charm. Seldom have the incomparable strings of the orchestra been heard to better effect than in the finale when every bit of virtuosity is required not only to play the notes at a dazzling speed, but to imbue them with the lightness and beauty which is theirs.

The glowing orchestration of the Ravel ballet music almost made the two previous selections seem drab and just a little "old fashioned," except for those who realized that this was another century and that this was music for the theater. Here were moments of pastoral beauty; here were some of the orchestra's most tremendous climaxes; here was evidence that Koussevitzky ranks among the forefront of interpreters of the modern French masters. This, too, will be heard at Tanglewood this summer. it was all in all a highly satisfactory evening and another excellent advertisement for the Berkshire festival.

During intermission, Atty Raymond T. King announced that the Metropolitan quartet, artists in the final concert of the series, had engagements at the "Met" on March 12, and that the concert would be given on the 14th, a fortunate move in that it will permit the Boston orchestra to be heard at Smith college on the original date.

Among the interesting reunions brought about by the concert was the meeting of two former Estonians, Ludwig Juht, bass viol virtuoso, and Dr Theodore W. Wiel of American International college. The members, like the orchestra itself, are by now old friends of the community.

D. D.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
FEB 14 1940

KOUSSEVITZKY LEADS SUPERB RAVEL READING

Boston Symphony Heard in Community Concert Series

By Willard M. Clark

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to the Auditorium last night to give the third of the Community Concerts and their visit was an occasion for rejoicing. It was a concert of mounting excitement which culminated in one of those superb readings of Ravel's "Daphne and Chloe" suite, such as only Dr. Koussevitzky can achieve.

Two First Symphonies

The program included the First Symphony of Robert Schumann and the First Symphony of Beethoven. The Ravel work concluded the program. While one might have wished two symphonies of greater contrast it was interesting to hear the two "firsts" side by side.

Schumann called his symphony the "Spring" symphony, but as one listened to its last night one thought more of the winds of March than of the gentle warmth of May. There were moments of exquisite beauty but for the most part the music was in a hearty vein and Dr. Koussevitzky saw to it that it was so interpreted. It was a splendid performance and one could only marvel again at the perfect discipline of this group of players. The slightest desire of the conductor was immediately realized.

From neither the technical nor the interpretive standpoint did the performance of Beethoven's First Symphony equal that of the Schumann symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky has never seemed so happy in his readings of the Beethoven symphonies, but even this cannot account for the hesitant, somewhat ragged performance of the first two movements of the work. On the other hand the Menuet and the Finale were played with a clarity and tonal and dynamic contrasts which delighted the ear.

It was in the Ravel suite that Dr. Koussevitzky and his men were most effective. They seemed to have been waiting for it and when the time came they gave to it all that splendor of tone which their virtuosity can summon. The Russian conductor knows no peer as an interpreter of this sort of music nor can the Boston players be equaled in their performance of it. They imbued the work with every conceivable color, and carried it on and on, with such brilliance, and at such a pace, that it left one awed and breathless.

During intermission Atty. Raymond T. King, president of the Springfield Community Concerts Association, announced that the appearance of the Metropolitan Opera Quartet scheduled for March 12 would be made on March 14. The postponement is due to operatic commitments.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
FEB 13 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL PLAY TONIGHT

The Boston Symphony orchestra, directed by Dr Serge Koussevitzky, will present the third of the 1939-40 concerts being given under the auspices of the Springfield Community Concert association and the Junior League at the Auditorium tonight. Admission to the concert, as to all those given by the association, is reserved for members only. The program begins at 8.30.

Dr Koussevitzky has programmed two first symphonies by two great composers for tonight. They are those of Beethoven, which will open the program, and of Schumann, which will close it. Following the Beethoven opus and preceding intermission the orchestra will play Ravel's brilliant "Daphnis et Chloe" suite.

CSM Feb 13

Berkshire Festival Programs

Artur Rodzinsky, conductor of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, will direct one of three Tchaikovsky programs at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival at Stockbridge this summer. These programs will celebrate the composer's centenary.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the other concerts in the season of three weeks. A feature will be the performance of the Bach B minor Mass, with the chorus provided by the new Tanglewood School. Among the soloists of the festival will be Dorothy Maynor and Albert Spalding.

The scope of the festival is to remain essentially symphonic, not operatic. Dr. Koussevitzky is now enabled greatly to broaden the repertory, due to the extension of the season to three weeks, and also to the inauguration of his long-contemplated school, the student enrollment of which assures a fine chorus.

During the first week of the festival, which opens Aug. 1, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the first symphonies of Beethoven, Schumann, and Sibelius. Later, the Second Symphony of Brahms and the Third ("Eroica") of Beethoven will be presented. A panorama of modern composition will be afforded by other works. These include: Fauré's suite, "Pellèas et Mèlisande," Ravel's Second "Daphnis et Chloé" Suite, Stravinsky's "Capriccio" (with Jesús M. Sanromá as piano soloist), Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler," Roy Harris's Third Symphony, and Respighi's orchestration of Bach's Passacaglia.

Dorothy Maynor will be presented as soloist in a group of arias. Albert Spalding will be soloist in the Tchaikovsky Concerto. Other compositions commemorating the Tchaikovsky centenary will be the Second, Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Symphonies, the Overture, "Romeo and Juliet," Serenade for Strings, and Second Suite.

Wagnerian excerpts and a symphony of Haydn round out the festival plans.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

FEB 15 1940

Concert Party

MRS. FREDERIC B. PRATT will entertain Mr. and Mrs. Sidney W. Davidson and their guests at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert ~~this evening~~, when the third concert of the season will be heard at the Institute at the Academy of Music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

FEB 15 1940

MANY TO ENTERTAIN AT BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt will entertain Mr. and Mrs. Sidney W. Davidson and their guests in Box 1 at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert tonight when the third concert of the season will be heard at the Institute at the Academy of Music.

Mrs. Benjamin Prince's guests in Box 3 will be Mr. and Mrs. Eric Hall Haight and their guests, Mr. and Mrs. Karp Mikhalenkoff and Mr. and Mrs. Charles B. Gulick, Jr.

The Woman's Club Box will be occupied by Mrs. Oliver G. Carter and Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. Thomas Henry McClintock, Mrs. Jason Davis, Mrs. Wilson Briggs Zimmer, Mrs. Frederic W. Burbank, Mrs. Theodore F. Vosseler and Mrs. De Hart Bergen.

The Navy Box

In the Navy Box, Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clark H. Woodward will entertain Captain and Mrs. C. G. Mayo and their daughter, Mrs. Amanda Boyden; Captain and Mrs. C. W. O. Bunker, and Commander and Mrs. W. H. Smith.

The program tonight will include Handel's Concerto Grosso, the Overture to "Leonore," No. 3 by Beethoven, the Sibelius Symphony No. 1 and the Tone Poem "En Saga." This is the third concert in the 1939-40 series presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS

FEB 14 1940

DR. ARTUR RODZINSKI, conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra, has been invited by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be a guest conductor in one of the three Tschaikowsky programs in the 1940 Berkshire Symphonic Festival at Stockbridge, Mass., next August.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OMAHA, NEB.
Morning World-Herald

FEB 14 1940

Berkshire Symphonic Seeks World Title

Boston, Feb. 13 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, an~~nounced today~~ his plans for the 1940 Berkshire symphonic festival at Stockbridge, which, its sponsors hope, will reach world leadership this year because of conditions abroad.

For its seventh season, the festival has been extended from two weeks to three.

BERKSHIRE PROGRAMS

Trans. Feb 13

Serge Koussevitzky announced today details of his plans for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival which, considering European conditions, should assure world leadership to this New England summer event in this seventh year of its existence, the fifth under Dr. Koussevitzky's directorship.

Because of the extension of the season from two to three weeks, and the inauguration of the Berkshire Music Center, the student enrollment in which ensures a fine chorus, Koussevitzky is enabled greatly to broaden the repertory. There will be nine programs in all, playing from Aug. 1 to 18.

The choral group will join with the full orchestra and soloists in the performance of Bach's B-Minor Mass.

In celebration of the centenary of the birth of Tchaikovsky, one week's programs will be devoted to his music. Koussevitzky nas inviter Artur Rodzinsky, conductor of the Cleveland Symphony and summer resident of Stockbridge, to be guest conductor of one of the three Tchaikovsky programs.

During the first week of the festival, which opens Aug. 1, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the first symphonies of Beethoven, Schumann and Sibelius—a striking study in three eras of symphonic history. Later, the Second Symphony of Brahms, and the Third ("Eroica") of Beethoven will be presented. A panorama of modern composition will be afforded by Faure's suite, "Pelleas et Melisande," Ravel's Second "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite, Stravinsky's "Capriccio" (with Jesus M. Sanroma as piano soloist), Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" and Roy Harris's Third Symphony.

Dorothy Maynor, sensational young Negro soprano discovered by Koussevitzky during last year's festival, will be presented as soloist in a group of arias. Albert Spalding, distinguished violinist and summer resident of the Berkshires, will be soloist in the Tchaikovsky Concerto. Other compositions commemorating the Tchaikovsky centenary will be the Second, Fourth, Fifth and Sixth Symphonies, the overture-fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," Serenade for Strings, and his Second Suite.

A group of Wagnerian excerpts, one Haydn Symphony, and Respighi's transcription of Bach's C minor Passacaglia and Fugue round out Koussevitzky's festival plans.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 14 1940

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL ANNOUNCES PROGRAM

One of Three-Week Series to Mark Tchaikovsky Centenary

The seventh Berkshire Symphonic Festival, to be given at Tanglewood, near Stockbridge, Mass., between Aug. 1 and 18, will present Artur Rodzinski as guest conductor and the following soloists: Dorothy Maynor, Negro soprano; Albert Spalding, violinist, and Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist. The festival will, as usual, be under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. One series will be devoted ~~to music~~ of Tchaikovsky, in celebration of the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth.

Another feature of the programs will be the Bach B minor Mass, to be sung by the chorus of the new Berkshire Music Center, which will open for six weeks on July 8.

The works for the three series of concerts will be apportioned as follows:

Series A

Aug. 1, 3, 4—First symphonies of Beethoven, Schumann and Sibelius; C major symphony of Schubert, Second symphony of Brahms and Third symphony of Roy Harris; other works include Bach's Passacaglia (orchestrated by Respighi), Faure's suite "Pelleas et Melisande," Stravinsky's "Capriccio" (Mr. Sanroma, soloist), Prokofieff's "classical" symphony and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" No. 2.

Series B

Aug. 8, 10 11—Tchaikovsky Festival: First, Second, Fourth, Fifth and Sixth ("Pathétique") symphonies, violin concerto (Mr. Spalding, soloist), overture "Romeo and Juliet," serenade for strings, Second suite and other works to be announced.

Series C

Aug. 15, 17, 18—Third ("Eroica") symphony of Beethoven, First of Brahms and a symphony of Haydn; other works include Wagner excerpts, Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler," arias by Dorothy Maynor and Bach's Mass in B minor by the Festival Chorus of the Berkshire Music Center.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

FEB 14 1940

Boston Programs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will ~~be on tour~~ this week, making its customary visit to New York and Brooklyn. Report from New York is that on Saturday afternon in Carnegie hall, part of the program will be directed by Tauno Hannikainen, the Finnish conductor who recently made such a good impression as guest conductor in Boston. It is also reported that he will conduct the entire program on Thursday night in Brooklyn. It is seldom that Dr. Koussevitzky turns over the baton to another at the New York engagements of the orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Evening Public Ledger

FEB 15 1940

Forum Devotees Brave Storm

The whistling wind whipped the snowflakes into a whirl of cold confusion last night, but it didn't keep the music lovers at home.

Burrowing their way through drifts, in seal caps, great coats, galoshes and mittens, out they came to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra give its ~~only performance~~ here this season.

The event was another in the splendid offerings of the Philadelphia Forum this year.

After shaking off the snow from seven counties, the audience settled down to an enchanting evening. Perhaps a blizzard is the best introduction to Beethoven and Brahms. The applause was deafening, and Mr. Koussevitsky was brought back to the stage again and again.

Mrs. William Houston Greene was there. Nothing would keep her away from an outstanding musical program.

And so was Gertrude Ely, in a British reefer of copper tweed with a diagonal copper band on her brown suede peaked cap.

Mrs. Richard C. Bull came in ski boots and gray plaids, which contrasted with her husband's warm brown tweeds.

Mrs. Lewis Van Dusen and her daughter, Alverta, wore vibrant shades of blue.

There were many men in the audience. We noticed particularly Owen J. Wister, Arthur V. Meigs and Richard Barrows.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

FEB 15 1940

Music

Large Crowd Braves Storm to Hear Symphony

By EDWIN H. SCHLOSS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by its distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, paid its annual visit to the Academy of Music under Philadelphia Forum auspices last night.

Weather considered, a large audience was on hand, though the storm converted what would ordinarily have been a sell-out into a house about two-thirds full.

Well Rewarded.

Those who battled their way to Broad and Locust sts. against the elements were rewarded by an evening of exceptionally fine orchestral playing judged even by the traditionally high standards maintained in the Academy by its regular tenants.

As has been his custom here in past years, Dr. Koussevitzky devoted his program to two symphonies and a novelty. The major works were the First Beethoven and the Brahms' Second. The novelty was the first performance here of "Peter and the Wolf,' an orchestral fairy tale for children by the wittiest of modern composers, Serge Prokofieff.

Walt Disney Theme.

"Peter," first played for the little Stalinites of Moscow four years ago is a charming excursion into childhood fantasy with a score that fairly cries aloud for the co-operative art of Walt Disney. It was given last night with a narrator, Richard Hale, who after addressing the storm-tossed forumites as "dear children," told of Peter's adventures with a friendly bird (a flute); a duck (oboe); a not-so-friendly cat (clarinet); and a not-at-all friendly wolf (french horns). There was also an admonitory bassoon representing Peter's grandfather.

Orchestration Delightful.

The orchestral accompaniment is delightfully scored to the narrative. It is graphic, naively humorous, gay and witty music that ought to become a classic at children's concerts and perhaps is already on its way to that class in Boston where Dr. Koussevitzky introduced it two seasons ago. It will probably be played here by Stokowski at a childrens concert in March.

As to the more adult and substantial matters discoursed last night, the performance of the Beethoven First was a model of clarity and design, light-handed and crisp in its unfolding.

Some Acoustical Blur.

In deference to the symphony's Mozartean spirit and texture, it was played with a reduced string section. There was some blurring of brass and wind tones in the tuttis, probably due to the conductor's unfamiliarity with the acoustics of a strange hall. The concluding Brahms Second gave the Bostonians a better chance to show their sonority of tone and the richness of orchestral resources, which were impressive. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of the Second was a bit more restrained than the Brahms usually heard from the same stage, but, again, was distinguished for its clarity and instinctive musical understanding.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER

FEB 15 1940

FORUM CONCERT GIVEN BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Last night's storm diminished the size, but not the enthusiasm of the audience that greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its ~~annual~~ concert in the Academy of Music. Under its conductor, Serge Kroussevitzky, it played for the Philadelphia Forum.

The "standbys" on the program were Beethoven's First Symphony and Brahms' Second. Both were given the excellent readings for which Koussevitzky is noted, and the orchestra played with its customary perfection. The novelty was "Peter and the Wolf," the fantasy by Serge Prokofieff, with Richard Hale as the narrator. It was the first performance in Philadelphia of this fine example of the Russian composer's whimsical humor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

FEB 15 1940

Music Notes

Tauno Hannikainen, Finnish conductor, will make his New York debut as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, conducting Handel's concerto grosso in D minor, op. 6, No. 10, Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture and Sibelius's "En Saga" and first symphony. In the Boston Symphony's program for Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Hannikainen will conduct the Sibelius symphony; the rest of the program, including Serge Prokofieff's second violin concerto with Jascha Heifetz as soloist, will be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

FEB 15 1940

Boston Symphony Concert Tonight; Many Box Parties Are Arranged For Third Program of Series

Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt will be hostess in Box No. 1 tonight at the season's third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Mr. and Mrs. Sidney W. Davidson will be among her guests.

In Box No. 3, Mrs. Benjamin Prince will have as her guests Mr. and Mrs. Eric Hall Haight, Mr. and Mrs. Karp Mikhalenkoff and Mr. and Mrs. Charles B. Gulick, Jr. The box of the Brooklyn Woman's Club will be occupied by Mrs. Oliver Goldsmith Carter, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. Thomas Henry McClintock, Mrs. Jason Davis, Mrs. Wilson Briggs Zimmer, Mrs. Frederic W. Burbank, Mrs. Theodore F. Vosseler and Mrs. De Hart Bergen.

In the Navy Box, Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clark H. Woodward will entertain Captain and Mrs. C. G. Mayo, Mrs. Amanda Boyden, Captain and Mrs. C. W. O. Bunken and Commander and Mrs. W. H. Smith.

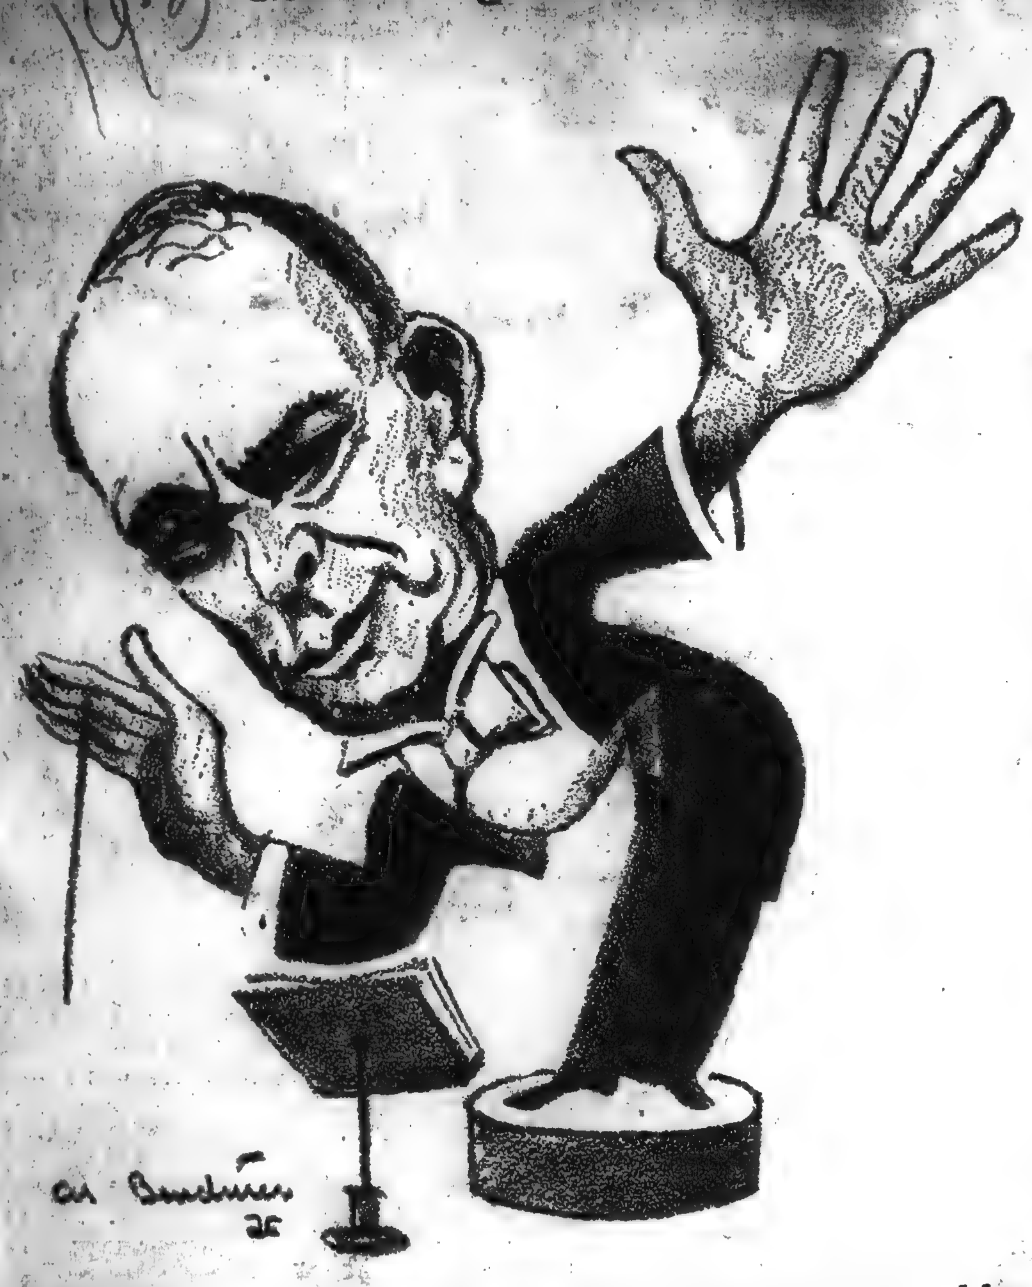
The box of the Associate Alumnae of Adelphi Academy will be occupied by Miss Emma Jessie Ogg, Mr and Mrs. William Slater and Miss Rochia Martin.

The orchestra makes its appearances here under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE EVENING BULLETIN—PHILADELPHIA, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1940

193

Controlling The Decibels



Serge Koussevitzky calls for more from the trumpets and less from the strings in the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert at the Academy of Music

MUSIC IN REVIEW

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Beethoven, Brahms and Prokofieff

BY HENRY PLEASANTS

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra blew into the Academy of Music with the blizzard, last night, and a surprisingly large audience blew in from Broad and Locust sts. It was hardly an evening for visiting, but the Bostonians were doubtless animated by a determination that the show must go on, while the Philadelphians presumably felt that a little inconvenience was small enough price to pay for hearing the Boston orchestra.

The concert was of a type calculated to make the listener forget about barometer readings, broken power lines and the momentary agonies of transportation. The orchestra is a unique and magnificent instrument and its conductor one of the dynamic and forceful personalities of the contemporary musical scene. And on this occasion Mr. Koussevitzky and his ensemble were engaged in an uncommonly well chosen program.

The splendor of the Boston strings and the precision of their playing were effectively demonstrated in the Symphony No. 1 of Beethoven with which the evening's music making began. This was a marvellously balanced and ideally paced performance in which there was as much to enjoy in the sheer beauty of the orchestral performance as in the vigor and humor and sentiment of Beethoven's Opus 21.

The symphony also served to establish a mood receptive to the drolleries of Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" which followed. The orchestra was assisted in this music by the veteran actor and singer, Richard Hale, who acted as narrator and to a considerable extent as interpreter of Prokofieff's skilfull and ingenious whimsy. The Russian composer may not tower above his contemporaries as an influence on the music of his time, but neither this nor any other age has produced another musical humorist as deft or as resourceful. The innocent fable which received its first local performance last night was immensely enjoyed by everyone including, it seemed, Mr. Hale, Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra.

The serious business of the evening was the second symphony of Brahms which occupied the second half of the program. Mr. Koussevitzky is an admired interpreter of all the Brahms symphonies, and he brought to this performance of the No. 2 the large scale, the extensive dynamic range and the vigorous dramatic utterance which are characteristic of his Brahms readings in general. If some passages, particularly in the first movement, seemed rather over-dramatized the point should be mentioned strictly as a matter of opinion. There no doubting either the forcefulness or the definitive quality of this performance. The concert was under the auspices of The Forum to whom the city is indebted for the annual visits of the Boston Orchestra.

Large Crowd Braves Storm To Hear Boston Symphony

By LINTON MARTIN

Serge Koussevitzky and his superb Boston Symphony Orchestra didn't let a little thing like the wild if far from warm welcome of the weather deter them from giving their annual concert for the Philadelphia Forum in the Academy last night as scheduled.

Perhaps it simply seemed a typical old home week New England greeting for the musical lads from "way down East." At any rate, they gave without stint of the best they had for a surprisingly large audience that braved the raging blizzard. And that best aroused real regret that the Boston band under the magnificent generalship of Koussevitzky is heard here but once a year, and for that we have to thank the enterprise of William K. Huff as executive manager of the Forum.

AMUSING NOVELTY

Between two rock-ribbed symphonies of the classic repertoire, played with a beauty of tone and masculine strength of interpretation that made their performance an exhilarating delight, Mr. Koussevitzky placed one brightly amusing and musically witty novelty. This was Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf," on a program that opened with a sparkling presentation of the Mozartean First Symphony of Beethoven, and ended with the Brahms Second Symphony.

The Prokofieff work, heard here for the first time on this occasion, was even more inventive and clever than his "Lieutenant Kije" suite, which has now been played on both Boston Symphony and Philadelphia Orchestra programs in this city. Richard Hale filled the role of narrator for "Peter and the Wolf."

MOCK-GRUESOME TALE

This quite captivating composition for small orchestra was first presented in Moscow three years ago at a Children's Concert of the Moscow Philharmonic, and was introduced by Mr. Koussexitzky to his Boston Symphony subscribers the following season. It is a mock-gruesome animal tale, in which the different instruments represent the various animals as well as Peter and Grandfather.

Thus, the bird is a flute, the duck is an oboe, the cat a clarinet, Grandfather a bassoon, Peter is the string quartet, the wolf is represented by three ominous horns, and drums and percussion represent the shooting and the hunters.

The music ranges from broad humor to sly satire, and the music is strongly colored by Russian folk themes. Its mirthful melodrama was hugely relished by the audience and evoked enthusiastic response.

SUPERB PRESENTATION

In their totally different ways, the Beethoven First Symphony and the Brahms Second were presented with that zestful energy, dynamic intensity, and bright buoyancy which are characteristic of the Koussevitzky conducting. Familiar as both enduring works are, they took on a quality of individuality that was wholly refreshing, and the forthrightness of the presentation of the Beethoven work afforded excellent contrast to the shining detail disclosed in every movement of the Brahms symphony.

It was a superb program, superbly presented. We could do with more symphonic performances of the sort.

THE PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER
February 15, 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

FEB 16 1940

CONCERT TONIGHT FOR FINNISH AID

Season's First Program by Williams Glee Club

While the recordings arranged by the North Adams Festival club are arranged primarily to offer an opportunity for patrons of the Berkshire Symphonic festival to become familiar with the programs that are to be presented next season by the Boston Symphonic orchestra, all who care to hear the recordings are invited to attend the club's meetings, officials of the club stated today.

The club's second meeting will be held this evening at 8 o'clock in the historical room at the North Adams Public library. At this evening's meeting recordings of Beethoven's Third (Eroica) Symphony and of Debussy's La Mer (The Sea) will be played and James Morley Chambers, supervisor of music in the public schools, will offer comments. The library has received the reproducing machine, loaned to the club by the Berkshire Symphonic festival.

Memberships in the club are still available.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

FEB 16 1940

Melchior in Title Role of Tannhaeuser

Whole Cast Excellent in Opera Presented at the Metropolitan

By PITTS SANBORN.

There was enough of excellence in last night's Tannhaeuser to make it an eloquent plea for the perpetuation of Metropolitan opera. Lauritz Melchior in the name part may not have been perfection in the opening scene, but his performance rose in a crescendo of vocal accomplishment and dramatic power till with the narrative of the tragic pilgrimage to Rome it seemed unsurpassable.

Pitts Sanborn

Wolfram is absolutely Herbert Janssen's role. Last evening he had voice, feeling, style, everything you could wish, for the delivery of its lyric measures. Emanuel List, too, has rarely sung the Landgraf Hermann with such tonal richness.

Venus is seldom impersonated so successfully as she was by Kerstin Thorborg. Here and there the music runs above her easy range, but to some of it she gave a sensuous appeal that usually has been lacking. And in appearance and acting she was uncommonly successful in suggesting the goddess.

All of which is prefatory to praise for Helen Traubel. In her brief operatic career Mme. Traubel had not attempted Elisabeth previously. To judge from her achievement last night she will do so often. To the eye she was an imposing figure as the sainted lady of the Wartburg and frequently she was as imposing to the ear.

In the Dich theure Halle she was evidently somewhat nervous, though singing with care and determination, and in the prayer, which is taxing in various ways, neither her remarkable voice nor her technical accomplishment was victorious as will doubtless be the case in time. Yet much of her singing was quite of the first class.

Unfortunately the eminent qualities of the chief singing-actors were not reflected in certain other departments. Occasionally the choral singing was, to say the least, peculiar, and Erich Leinsdorf's addiction to rapid tempi did not always make for righteousness. Admirable as was the conductor's will to energy, it would be hard to justify his treating the prelude to the third act as if it were the prelude to act III of Siegfried.

What was really funny was the Bacchanale—not only the pace at which it was taken, but a show that looked like Valpurgis Night in the Venusberg. It differed from the last previous choreography and insofar at any rate was an improvement.

his work numerous measures of captivating melody, strains that curl themselves around you and bewitch you with the sensuousness of their appeal. They were rarely forthcoming in such guise.

Mr. Barbirolli was—it seemed—at his wits' ends to keep us. That he did was a miracle of responsiveness not only on his side but also on that of all the musicians, who scraped, and tootled and pounded, according to their duties, with the vim and energy that could take care of a season's concerts.

Purcell, the 17th century English composer, was represented in the opening spot by a selection of eight dances from his Fairy Queen, arranged by Mr. Barbirolli. These were delivered adequately, their simple charm and grace hinting nothing at what was to come. And for the second number the conductor had decided on the fourth symphony of Beethoven, which had its moments of indecision as well as those of flowing speech.

The applause was cordial for these, but the rafters rang and rang after Mr. Horowitz's sensational accomplishment. Very likely, they are still ringing.

R. C. B.

* * *

Hannikainen Makes Local Debut.

A young Finnish conductor, Tauno Hannikainen, made his orchestral debut in the New York area at the Brooklyn Academy of Music last night. Mr. Hannikainen's podium bow may be put down as a sensation. Brooklyn—in its restrained way—went wild over him.

In yielding the stick to his Finnish colleague, ~~Serge Kousse~~vitzky also allowed revision of the program, and naturally Sibelius claimed the lion's share of Mr. Hannikainen's attention. And the Finn had many vital things to say on that score.

If conductors are born, not made, Mr. Hannikainen is both a born conductor and a born Sibelius conductor. He conducted En Saga and the first symphony as if he had listed the Kalevala from birth and imbibed Sibelius with his first draught.

There was personal fervor to his directing and gripping drama. The readings were intense and fiery, tender and probing. Maybe the fact that Mr. Hannikainen was billed as a Finn was responsible, but he led as if he knew every lake in Finland, every crag, every fjord, and had gone to school in Tavastehus.

Mr. Koussevitzky himself could not have unfurled the drama of En Saga more compellingly. One saw the wordless epic unfold as on a mediaeval tapestry. Mr. Hannikainen's pulse and the music beat as one. In the symphony he made every note count. Every phrase became a vital organ in a breathing entity.

Besides the Sibelius numbers Mr. Hannikainen led Handel's D minor concerto grosso and Beethoven's third Leonore overture. Both went smoothly, beautifully. But Sibelius was Mr. Hannikainen's element last night. There he was chez lui.

L. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPARTANSBURG, S. C.
HERALD

FEB 15 1940

News of Sibellius

Tauna Hannikainen, Finnish conductor, recently in Boston to give a series of concerts with the Boston ~~Symphony Orchestra~~, said that Jean Sibellius, Finland's great composer, is well and is being protected "like a national treasure."

Immediately after the first bombing of Helsinki by the Russians it was rumored that Sibellius had been killed. Music lovers the world over were disturbed until the rumor was denied. Hannikainen said he saw Sibellius at an orchestra rehearsal at the outbreak of the war, but since then "the government has hidden him well in a secret place as a precautionary step to preserve Finland's great genius." The more one learns of Finland the more one admires its [illegible] cul- tur [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

FEB 16 1940

Hannikainen Is Received With Enthusiasm Here

Young Finn Conducts Boston Symphony Orchestra

Tauno Hannikainen, young Finnish conductor, who made his American debut as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston [illegible] ago, made his first New York appearance with the Bostonian musicians last night in their third concert of the season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. His program included Handel's concerto grosso in D minor, Op. 6, No. 10; Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture and two works by the conductor's eminent compatriot, Jean Sibelius, the tone poem "En Saga" and the First Symphony. He was introduced to the audience by James G. McDonald, president of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

Musicians attending the concert spoke of Mr. Hannikainen's work with enthusiasm, and he was warmly received by a large audience. He will share the Boston Symphony's Carnegie Hall program with Serge Koussevitzky next Saturday afternoon, and his interpretation of the Sibelius symphony on that occasion will be reviewed in next Sunday's Herald Tribune.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

FEB 16 1940

~~Boston~~ Symphony Orchestra Welcomed ~~by Large~~ Audience

A capacity audience last evening heard the Boston Symphonk Orchestra's third concert of the borough season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Tauno Hannikrainen, Finnish conductor, was received warmly as guest conductor. A complete review of the concert will be found in today's "Brooklyn Citizen."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

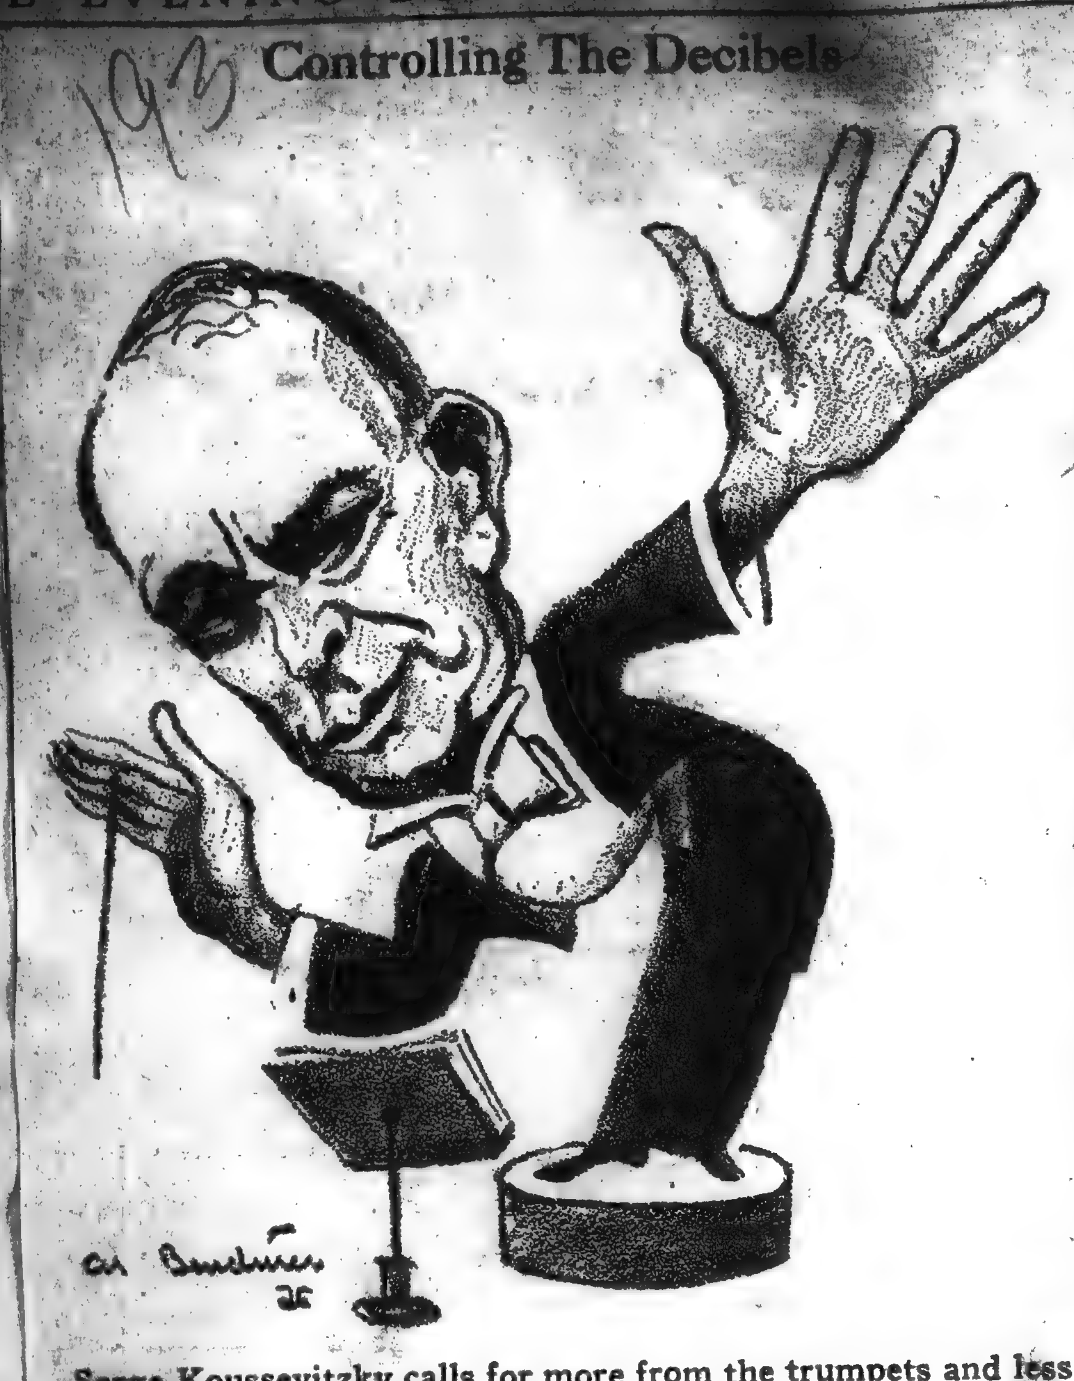
FEB 16 1940

Koussevitzky Feted

A reception in honor of [illegible]. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was held ~~yesterday by the b~~oard of directors of the American Association of Assistance to French Artists, Inc., at the home of Mrs. Donald W. Brown, 135 East Sixty-sixth Street. About seventy-five persons attended. The organization, with headquarters at 535 Park Avenue, was founded on Feb. 1 to provide relief for "the artists of France and their families who are suffering extreme privation due to war conditions." Mrs. Mabel Randall-MacIver is chairman.

THE EVENING BULLETIN—PHILADELPHIA, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1940

Controlling The Decibels



Serge Koussevitzky calls for more from the trumpets and less from the strings in the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert at the Academy of Music

MUSIC IN REVIEW

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Beethoven, Brahms and Prokofieff

BY HENRY PLEASANTS

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra blew into the Academy of Music with the blizzard, last night, and a surprisingly large audience blew in from Broad and Locust sts. It was hardly an evening for visiting, but the Bostonians were doubtless animated by a determination that the show must go on, while the Philadelphians presumably felt that a little inconvenience was small enough price to pay for hearing the Boston orchestra.

The concert was of a type calculated to make the listener forget about barometer readings, broken power lines and the momentary agonies of transportation. The orchestra is a unique and magnificent instrument and its conductor one of the dynamic and forceful personalities of the contemporary musical scene. And on this occasion Mr. Koussevitzky and his ensemble were engaged in an uncommonly well chosen program.

The splendor of the Boston strings and the precision of their playing were effectively demonstrated in the Symphony No. 1 of Beethoven with which the evening's music making began. This was a marvellously balanced and ideally paced performance in which there was as much to enjoy in the sheer beauty of the orchestral performance as in the vigor and humor and sentiment of Beethoven's Opus 21.

The symphony also served to establish a mood receptive to the drolleries of Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" which followed. The orchestra was assisted in this music by the veteran actor and singer, Richard Hale, who acted as narrator and to a considerable extent as interpreter of Prokofieff's skilfull and ingenious whimsy. The Russian composer may not tower above his contemporaries as an influence on the music of his time, but neither this nor any other age has produced another musical humorist as deft or as resourceful. The innocent fable which received its first local performance last night was immensely enjoyed by everyone including, it seemed, Mr. Hale, Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra.

The serious business of the evening was the second symphony of Brahms which occupied the second half of the program. Mr. Koussevitzky is an admired interpreter of all the Brahms symphonies, and he brought to this performance of the No. 2 the large scale, the extensive dynamic range and the vigorous dramatic utterance which are characteristic of his Brahms readings in general. If some passages, particularly in the first movement, seemed rather over-dramatized the point should be mentioned strictly as a matter of opinion. There no doubting either the forcefulness or the definitive quality of this performance. The concert was under the auspices of The Forum to whom the city is indebted for the annual visits of the Boston Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

FEB 16 1940

CONCERT TONIGHT FOR FINNISH AID

Season's First Program by Williams Glee Club

While the recordings arranged by the North Adams Festival club are arranged primarily to offer an opportunity for patrons of the Berkshire Symphonic festival to become familiar with the programs that are to be presented next season by the Boston Symphonic orchestra, all who care to hear the recordings are invited to attend the club's meetings, officials of the club stated today.

The club's second meeting will be held this evening at 8 o'clock in the historical room at the North Adams Public library. At this evening's meeting recordings of Beethoven's Third (Eroica) Symphony and of Debussy's La Mer (The Sea) will be played and James Morley Chambers, supervisor of music in the public schools, will offer comments. The library has received the reproducing machine, loaned to the club by the Berkshire Symphonic festival.

Memberships in the club are still available.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

FEB 16 1940

Melchior in Title Role of Tannhaeuser

Whole Cast Excellent in Opera Presented at the Metropolitan

By PITTS SANBORN.

There was enough of excellence in last night's Tannhaeuser to make it an eloquent plea for the perpetuation of Metropolitan opera. Lauritz Melchior in the name part may not have been perfection in the opening scene, but his performance rose in a crescendo of vocal accomplishment and dramatic power till with the narrative of the tragic pilgrimage to Rome it seemed unsurpassable.

Pitts Sanborn

Wolfram is absolutely Herbert Janssen's role. Last evening he had voice, feeling, style, everything you could wish, for the delivery of its lyric measures. Emanuel List, too, has rarely sung the Landgraf Hermann with such tonal richness.

Venus is seldom impersonated so successfully as she was by Kerstin Thorborg. Here and there the music runs above her easy range, but to some of it she gave a sensuous appeal that usually has been lacking. And in appearance and acting she was uncommonly successful in suggesting the goddess.

All of which is prefatory to praise for Helen Traubel.

Large Crowd Braves Storm To Hear Boston Symphony

By LINTON MARTIN

Serge Koussevitzky and his superb Boston Symphony Orchestra didn't let a little thing like the wild if far from warm welcome of the weather deter them from giving their annual concert for the Philadelphia Forum in the Academy last night as scheduled.

Perhaps it simply seemed a typical old home week New England greeting for the musical lads from "'way down East." At any rate, they gave without stint of the best they had for a surprisingly large audience that braved the raging blizzard. And that best aroused real regret that the Boston band under the magnificent generalship of Koussevitzky is heard here but once a year, and for that we have to thank the enterprise of William K. Huff as executive manager of the Forum.

AMUSING NOVELTY

Between two rock-ribbed symphonies of the classic repertoire, played with a beauty of tone and masculine strength of interpretation that made their performance an exhilarating delight, Mr. Koussevitzky placed one brightly amusing and musically witty novelty. This was Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf," on a program that opened with a sparkling presentation of the Mozartean First Symphony of Beethoven, and ended with the Brahms Second Symphony.

The Prokofieff work, heard here for the first time on this occasion, was even more inventive and clever than his "Lieutenant Kije" suite, which has now been played on both Boston Symphony and Philadelphia Orchestra programs in this city. Richard Hale filled the role of narrator for "Peter and the Wolf."

MOCK-GRUESOME TALE

This quite captivating composition for small orchestra was first presented in Moscow three years ago at a Children's Concert of the Moscow Philharmonic, and was introduced by Mr. Koussexitzky to his Boston Symphony subscribers the following season. It is a mock-gruesome animal tale, in which the different instruments represent the various animals as well as Peter and Grandfather.

Thus, the bird is a flute, the duck is an oboe, the cat a clarinet, Grandfather a bassoon, Peter is the string quartet, the wolf is represented by three ominous horns, and drums and percussion represent the shooting and the hunters.

The music ranges from broad humor to sly satire, and the music is strongly colored by Russian folk themes. Its mirthful melodrama was hugely relished by the audience and evoked enthusiastic response.

SUPERB PRESENTATION

In their totally different ways, the Beethoven First Symphony and the Brahms Second were presented with that zestful energy, dynamic intensity, and bright buoyancy which are characteristic of the Koussevitzky conducting. Familiar as both enduring works are, they took on a quality of individuality that was wholly refreshing, and the forthrightness of the presentation of the Beethoven work afforded excellent contrast to the shining detail disclosed in every movement of the Brahms symphony.

It was a superb program, superbly presented. We could do with more symphonic performances of the sort.

THE PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER
February 15, 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPARTANSBURG, S. C.
HERALD

FEB 15 1940

News of Sibellius

Tauna Hannikainen, Finnish conductor, recently in Boston to give a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said that Jean Sibellius, Finland's great composer, is well and is being protected "like a national treasure."

Immediately after the first bombing of Helsinki by the Russians it was rumored that Sibellius had been killed. Music lovers the world over were disturbed until the rumor was denied. Hannikainen said he saw Sibellius at an orchestra rehearsal at the outbreak of the war, but since then "the government has hidden him well in a secret place as a precautionary step to preserve Finland's great genius." The more one learns of Finland the more one admires its people, their government and their culture.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

FEB 16 1940

Boston Symphony Orchestra Welcomed by Large Audience

A capacity audience last evening heard the Boston Symphonk Orchestra's third concert of the borough season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Tauno Hannikrainen, Finnish conductor, was received warmly as guest conductor. A complete review of the concert will be found in today's "Brooklyn Citizen."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

FEB 16 1940

Koussevitzky Feted

A reception in honor of . Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was held yesterday by the board of directors of the American Association of Assistance to French Artists, Inc., at the home of Mrs. Donald W. Brown, 135 East Sixty-sixth Street. About seventy-five persons attended. The organization, with headquarters at 535 Park Avenue, was founded on Feb. 1 to provide relief for "the artists of France and their families who are suffering extreme privation due to war conditions." Mrs. Mabel Randall-MacIver is chairman.

Symphony Orchestra

Tauno Hannikainen, young Finnish conductor, who made his American debut as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston [redacted] ago, made his first New York appearance with the Bostonian musicians last night in their third concert of the season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. His program included Handel's concerto grosso in D minor, Op. 6, No. 10; Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture and two works by the conductor's eminent compatriot, Jean Sibelius, the tone poem "En Saga" and the First Symphony. He was introduced to the audience by James G. McDonald, president of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

Musicians attending the concert spoke of Mr. Hannikainen's work with enthusiasm, and he was warmly received by a large audience. He will share the Boston Symphony's Carnegie Hall program with Serge Koussevitzky next Saturday afternoon, and his interpretation of the Sibelius symphony on that occasion will be reviewed in next Sunday's Herald Tribune.

---

* * *

Horowitz Scores at the Piano.

A large audience in Carnegie Hall last night heard an amazing pianistic performance by Vladimir Horowitz and it left the auditorium in a daze from the spectacular display of power and headlong racing. Mr. Horowitz, who has but recently returned to this country, played the solo part in the Rachmaninoff Concerto in D minor, No. 3, op. 30. The assisting orchestra, of course, was the Philharmonic-Symphony conducted by John Barbirolli.

The artist's conception of the concerto, which was the third and last number in the program, is one of overwhelming scope. Whole worlds are the stones that make up a cosmic avalanche. And such was the tension and the super quiviveness of the pianist all through that those moments of lyricism which abound in the work might well have been pauses between cataclysms.

As an exhibition of extraordinary technic, Mr. Horowitz's reading was in the incomparable class. And if all that Rachmaninoff had to say could be said only with unrestrainable bursts of speed and force then the soloist achieved all the ends. But the composer had seen fit to put into his work numerous measures of captivating melody, strains that curl themselves around you and bewitch you with the sensuousness of their appeal. They were rarely forthcoming in such guise.

Mr. Barbirolli was—it seemed—at his wits' ends to keep us. That he did was a miracle of responsiveness not only on his side but also on that of all the musicians, who scraped, and tootled and pounded, according to their duties, with the vim and energy that could take care of a season's concerts.

Purcell, the 17th century English composer, was represented in the opening spot by a selection of eight dances from his Fairy Queen, arranged by Mr. Barbirolli. These were delivered adequately, their simple charm and grace hinting nothing at what was to come. And for the second number the conductor had decided on the fourth symphony of Beethoven, which had its moments of indecision as well as those of flowing speech.

The applause was cordial for these, but the rafters rang and rang after Mr. Horowitz's sensational accomplishment. Very likely, they are still ringing.

R. C. B.

* * *

Hannikainen Makes Local Debut.

A young Finnish conductor, Tauno Hannikainen, made his orchestral debut in the New York area at the Brooklyn Academy of Music last night. Mr. Hannikainen's podium bow may be put down as a sensation. Brooklyn—in its restrained way—went wild over him.

In yielding the stick to his Finnish colleague, Serge Koussevitzky also allowed revision of the program, and naturally Sibelius claimed the lion's share of Mr. Hannikainen's attention. And the Finn had many vital things to say on that score.

If conductors are born, not made, Mr. Hannikainen is both a born conductor and a born Sibelius conductor. He conducted En Saga and the first symphony as if he had listed the Kalevala from birth and imbibed Sibelius with his first draught.

There was personal fervor to his directing and gripping drama. The readings were intense and fiery, tender and probing. Maybe the fact that Mr. Hannikainen was billed as a Finn was responsible, but he led as if he knew every lake in Finland, every crag, every fjord, and had gone to school in Tavastehus.

Mr. Koussevitzky himself could not have unfurled the drama of En Saga more compellingly. One saw the wordless epic unfold as on a mediaeval tapestry. Mr. Hannikainen's pulse and the music beat as one. In the symphony he made every note count. Every phrase became a vital organ in a breathing entity.

Besides the Sibelius numbers Mr. Hannikainen led Handel's D minor concerto grosso and Beethoven's third Leonore overture. Both went smoothly, beautifully. But Sibelius was Mr. Hannikainen's element last night. There he was chez lui.

L. B.

194

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB 16 1940

Hannikainen Directs Boston Symphony in Debut Here

Brilliant Finnish Conductor Hailed At the Academy

Brooklyn was signally honored last night when Tauno Hannikainen, noted Finnish conductor, made his debut in the metropolitan area by leading the world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the orchestra, had cancelled a program scheduled to be directed by himself and had substituted Mr. Hannikainen after the Finnish conductor had made a decidedly favorable impression on a Boston audience Feb. 2. The last two selections on the program were by Jan Sibelius, a countryman of Mr. Hannikainen.

It was the first time in 35 years that a guest conductor had led the Boston orchestra in a New York concert. The new leader was introduced to a capacity audience by James G. McDonald, president of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

Review by Miles Kastendieck on Page 9.

"We are thankful to Dr. Koussevitsky for the opportunity to present this brilliant young Finnish conductor for the first time in the metropolitan area," Mr. McDonald said.

"He should know that citizens of the United States today, regardless of creed or political affiliation, have experienced a great rush of feeling and sympathy for the Finnish people. This feeling is being expressed in a real effort to be of assistance, not only throughout the country, but especially so here in Brooklyn."

GIVEN OVATION

The audience rose to greet Mr. Hannikainen when he appeared on the stage and called him back to the platform repeatedly after each selection. The program consisted of the Concerto Grosso of Strings by Handel, the Overture to Leonore No. 3 by Beethoven and the tone poem En Saga and the Symphony No. 1 of Sibelius.

Mr. Hannikainen, conductor of Finland's Turko Orchestra, is in this country on leave from the Finnish Home Guard. He will conduct the second half of the Boston orchestra's program in Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, tonight.

For his debut in the Metropolitan Area, Tauno Hannikainen, Finnish conductor, led the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Academy of Music last night. The musician received the congratulations of James G. McDonald, president of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, above. Surrogate and Mrs. George A. Wingate, right, were among the guests.

It was a big musical event for Brooklyn and it drew many of the borough's notables, among them Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, above. The Finnish conductor, on leave from his country's Home Guard, was invited to appear by Serge Koussevitsky, regular conductor of the orchestra. His second concert here will will be given at Carnegie Hall. (Eagle Staff photos.)

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB 16 1940

—MUSIC OF THE DAY—

Finnish Conductor Acclaimed at Debut

Hannikainen Warmly Received as Guest Leader of Boston Symphony at Academy

By MILES KASTENDIECK

As Dr. Koussevitzky predicted when he sent the Finnish conductor, Tauno Hannikainen, to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night, Brooklyn was favored with his debut. While there was nothing sensational about his first metropolitan appearance, the audience was quick to recognize in Mr. Hannikainen a conductor of exceptional attainments and an artist of parts. When he came to interpret the music of his own country, the voice of Finland spoke through the music of Sibelius with an exultation and a poignancy singularly moving. It touched the innermost feelings of the listener, making him realize that this 44-year-old conductor had that communicative power which brought an audience nearer to the heart of the music interpreted.

Because of the incisiveness of his beat, the playing of the orchestra took on a transparency which revealed hidden beauties in almost everything on the program. The performances came alive with the pulsation of his rhythmic sense, and glowed with a richness of sonorities which assumed an unusual texture in their overtones: The tone was covered even at its most brilliant points while the pianissimo was a revelation of softness. Only an artist could have so molded orchestral tone to his wishes. Mr. Hannikainen was favored in having the Boston Symphony to conduct. Its response to him was a tribute to its own achievements.

The program began with Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in D Minor. At first the performance unfolded cautiously—a procedure noticeable more than once during the concert. But in the Allegros the music sprang to life. It became apparent almost at once that Mr. Hannikainen's concept of a slow movement was studied and his pacing deliberate. Thus the Air was almost stiff in its broad tempo. The Allegros which followed fairly sparkled with contrapuntal interest.

Beethoven's Leonore Overture No. 3 was in some ways an acid test. The introduction moved with too measured a tread though the pacing revealed beauties otherwise sacrificed. It gained in intensity with the Allegro portion though it never reached the dramatic climax inherent in the music.

The performances of the evening were those of Sibelius' tone poem "En Saga," the composer's first purely orchestral work, and his Symphony No. 1 in E Minor. While the symphony was nobly done, the high point of the evening for this listener was the extraordinary revelation of the Finnish temperament expressed through Mr. Hannikainen's utmost penetration of the earlier score. Here the sombre quality of the music (attained through a series of fascinating pedal-points) told of wide expanses of land and the grim strength of a people, of their joy and their despair. It was a beautiful performance of music strangely compelling, and the most interesting because it represented the beginning of a great career.

All the vitality and thrust of the symphony was present in this performance though one was conscious that it was controlled by a master hand. Again, the Andante marked ma non troppo lento, was paced too slowly, but again the Allegro scherzo crackled with rhythmic life. The finale was an impressive conclusion to an impressive performance.

Throughout the evening Mr. Hannikainen obviously knew his music thoroughly. He conducted without scores, appeared to give innumerable cues often indicating the playing with keen attention to detail. While perhaps fastidious in this, he manages to co-ordinate the music so that it is the whole of which one thinks, not its parts. Because of his artistry, Mr. Hannikainen is no doubt a conductor who would wear particularly well.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

FEB 16 1940

N. Y. SYMPHONY DEBUT

NEW YORK, Feb. 15 (AP)—Tauno Hannikainen, young Finnish conductor, will make his New York debut tonight, conducting the Boston Symphony orchestra in a concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB 16 1940

Boston Symphony Concert

Third in Season's Series Presented Last Evening

Music lovers gathered last night to attend the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season in Brooklyn at the Academy of Music. Many of the subscribers to the series entertained guests. With Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clark H. Woodward in the Navy box were Capt. and Mrs. C. G. Mayon and their daughter, Mrs. Amanda Boyden; Capt. and Mrs. C. W. O. Bunker and Commander and Mrs. W. H. Smith.

Mrs. Benjamin Prince's guests in her box were Mr. and Mrs. Eric Hall Haight and their guests, Mr. and Mrs. Karp Mikhalenkoff and Mr. and Mrs. Charles B. Gulick Jr.

Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt entertained Mr. and Mrs. Sidney W. Davidson.

The Woman's Club box was occupied by Mrs. Oliver G. Carter, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. Thomas Henry McClintock, Mrs. Jason Davis, Mrs. Wilson Briggs Zimmer, Mrs. Frederick W. Burbank, Mrs. Theodore F. Vosseler and Mrs. DeHart Bergen.

In the Adelphi Alumnae box were Miss Emma Jessie Ogg, Mr. and Mrs. William Slater and their guest, Rochia Martin; Mrs. William B. Parker, Mrs. John F. Moult and John F. Moult Jr.

An account of the program appears elsewhere in today's paper.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

FEB 16 1940

Tauno Hannikainen, Finnish Conductor, Makes Debut Here

Gets Ovation at Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert at Academy

By PAUL J. BROWN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has almost invariably played here under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, gave a concert last night with Tauno Hannikainen, Finnish protege of Dr. Koussevitzky, on the podium. It was a most successful concert and a most commendable metropolitan debut for Mr. Hannikainen.

The Finnish conductor, blond, well set-up, graceful and younger appearing than his forty-four years, directed opera and symphony orchestras in Helsinski and Abo before he came to this country, where he conducted the Boston Orchestra as a guest for the first time in 1938. His parents were both music teachers and his three brothers are musicians. Tauno was, like John Barbirolli, a cellist before he became a conductor.

The major part of the concert last night consisted of the works of the Finnish composer, Sibelius. There were the tone poem, "En Saga," notable for its abundance of melodic beauty, the work which established Sibelius as a great composer, and the First Symphony in E Minor. The latter, a musical composition so rich in well developed themes that it may defy the usual symphonic structure, is one of unusual inventiveness that tings, harmonious and songful. It was in conducting the Sibelius music that Mr. Hannikainen was at his best, every moment master of the orchestra, audience and situation.

The program opened with Handel's Concerto Gross, No. 10 for String Orchestra, which seemed to suffer for what we may call the new conductor's stage-fright. He was greatly improved in presenting Beethoven's "Leonore" Overtime, No. 3, possibly the most masterful of compressed recountings of musical drama. It was not until the Sibelius "En Saga" that Mr. Hannikainen was fully in command and at ease. It was fully understandable why Dr. Koussevitzky added an extra Sibelius work to the program when he decided to give the program over to his protege. A capacity audience applauded the conductor, and the concert vigorously.

The Boston Symphony's next, the fourth of its scheduled five concerts, will be given on Friday evening, March 15.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 17 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS D'INDY WORK

B Flat Composition Is Part of an All-French Program at Carnegie Hall

DEBUSSY PIECE IS GIVEN

'L'Apres-midi d'un Faun' Is Presented in Second Half With Ravel and Faure

By OLIN DOWNES

Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, gave superlative performances last night in Carnegie Hall, in a program which consisted entirely of French music.

This music dated roughly from the turn of the century in France. Its earliest item was Debussy's "L'Apres-midi d'un Faun," of 1894, and its latest the suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" of 1912. It was a perspective of a singularly rich and important period in French composition, and the aroma of that period was in all the performances.

From that period the d'Indy B flat symphony emerges as the most forward-looking, if not the most original creation. And it is incredible to look back and remember how utterly incomprehensible this music was when the symphony was first heard in America in 1904 and 1905. It seemed impossibly ugly, cerebral in an irritating degree, a product of elbow grease and the midnight lamp, and nothing more. Last night's performance would have made the score crystal clear, and of engrossing interest and brilliancy, if these things had not been previously demonstrated. Not only is the music constructed with remarkable logic and cogency of thought, but it is often sensuous in a way reminiscent not only of Cesar Franck but of other and less spiritual Frenchmen. It is also symphonic in a degree Franck did not succeed in being, and the finale is a movement that would loom tremendous in any context.

d'Indy's Works Compared

But another thing is now evident which was not apparent a quarter of a century ago. This is the symphony's direct reliance upon the worth in similar form of Franck. Although the much bolder dissonance and the far more prominent and astringent counterpoint of d'Indy more than once serve to disguise the derivations, one has only to compare d'Indy's opening with Franck's—the motive for the low strings, the answer of the wind choir, d'Indy's form in his slow movement, which, like Franck's, combines the elements of the slow movement and the scherzo; and d'Indy's elaboration of the cyclic form but a hundred details of d'Indy's development which echo pet devices of Franck; and finally the Franck idiom itself, which peeps out constantly from under the hem of the symphonic garment. Oh yes! There are many masterly complexities that Franck never would have dreamed of; and a much more recondite scheme of modulation; and a degree of structural intricacy that Franck would not even have attempted. That is all in all in the intellectual show window. Franck's symphony is the true origin of d'Indy's, and d'Indy, noble in purpose as in deed, and a great musician, nevertheless can never compass the simple creative achievement of the master whom he worshiped. But his is a superb symphony, and it was given an unforgettable performance.

Shorter Works Played

The second half of the program offered three shorter works for the interpretation of which the Boston Symphony is everywhere famous, and they rejoiced the audience. These were the Fauré suite from that composer's music for Maeterlinck's drama of "Pelleas et Melisande"; Debussy's "L'Après-midi" and the second "Daphnis and Chloe" suite of Ravel.

The day may come when white-whiskered old gentlemen will say, "Believe it or not, there were orchestras—at least there was an orchestra—which could play like that"; as the time is very likely to come when some leader of an antiquarian frame of mind "revives" the music of "Daphne and Chloe," and the program quotes the rapturous comment of music reviewers of this period—over the score as well as the interpretation—and youngsters will raise eyebrows and say to each other with a grin, "Can you imagine it? That stuff! The old man still goes crazy over it!" If some one lives and stands by who heard such a performance as last night's he will say, "It's probably no use my telling you. But it wasn't the music itself so much as the way they played it. If you had heard a leading orchestra of the period break into Ravel's finale like a pack in full cry—in a certain case I have in mind, a veritable pack of orchestral virtuosi—musicians of the most brilliant technical equipment and sensitive taste, under a leader whose élan and control would have carried a lesser group to sheer victory—then, my boy, you'd know what Ravel's music from 'Daphnis et Chloe' can mean and how it can sound. For you never will."

Things may develop in that direction. Certainly Ravel's gorgeous orchestral fabrication will not last forever. Now there is little to surpass it for brilliancy and a palette of tone-colors as rich and rare as any one of the French impressionists or post-impressionists ever dreamed. But it depends for its life upon performance. The music is thin; its craftsmanship has such glitter and precision that it amounts in itself to creation. True, the score has one other claim to attention: it is fundamentally of the formal and decorative quality of French art of past centuries. Look under its coruscating surface—the piquant, biting rhythms and colors and splendid manners—and you have a court ballet of the sort that diverted Roi Soleil in his palaces, and the kind of art which emanated from those lordly days.

In this the music is truly French. So is Faure's "Pelleas" suite, played with exquisite sentiment, utterly French, and in a more genuinely emotional and fanciful manner. And how beautifully was it played! But the music of the evening which will last as long as any work of the modern era, and remain through many generations the timeless reverie and the secret flowering of centuries of an antique Latin culture—Debussy's "L'Apres-midi"—that indeed, in the retrospect of the evening, most captivates the memory and most poignantly speaks of the spirit of a paganism, older perhaps than the written record of man. When all is said, if any single performance showed above the other in sheer beauty and capture of the most evanescent thoughts, it was Debussy's music, which became the chef-d'oeuvre of the evening.

Finnish Conductor Leads Boston Symphony Today

Tauno Hannikainen

Tenhovaara

Tauno Hannikainen, 44-year-old Finnish conductor, who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sibelius's First Symphony at its concert this afternoon in Carnegie Hall, is the first guest conductor to appear with that organization during the thirty-five years it has visited this city. Until the war suspended musical activities in his country Mr. Hannikainen was the regular director of the orchestra at Turku [Abo].

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
FEB 17 1940

—MUSIC OF THE DAY—

Koussevitzky Directs All-French Program

Features d'Indy Second Symphony With Bostonians in Carnegie Hall

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night but Mr. Hannikainen, who made so vivid an impression at the Academy of Music on Thursday night, will share the podium with him in Carnegie Hall this afternoon. This third evening concert of the Bostonians was given over entirely to French music. If audience applause may be taken as a criterion, French music makes only a mild stir. The orchestra, however, played according to its customary excellence, thereby creating its usual effect.

The program began with a beautifully fashioned performance of d'Indy's Symphony No. 2 in B Flat. As absolute music, it will appeal most to the student who can follow its ingenious design of musical materials, for above all else, d'Indy was a true believer in musical structure. Thus it is that commentators speak so highly of the Second Symphony as "one of the noblest works of its century." But the average listener still wants more to hold his attention in spite of the tonal loveliness of much of the orchestration. With the passing of time, though, this music will gain more favor with the general public, especially when it is presented under the best auspices as it was on this occasion.

The post-intermission numbers included Faure's "Pelleas et Melisande" Suite which was heard in Brooklyn earlier in the season; Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" second suite, which are familiar exhibits in the Koussevitzky repertoire.

* * *

ANOTHER 'BARBER'

Change of casting for Rossini's "Il Barbiere di Siviglia" brought back John Charles Thomas for his first appearance [redacted] season, Armand Tokatyan as Almaviva after a considerable lapse of time, and Hilde Reggiani for her first Rosina. Thomas gave his familiar interpretation of Figaro and in many ways the best performance of the evening. Tokatyan made a very creditable Count, entering fully into the buffoonery of the performance. Mme. Reggiani proved to be little more than a serviceable Rosina. Her singing of Benedict's "Il Carnevale di Venezia" variations in the Lesson Scene was successfully gymnastic if somewhat tonnally edgy.

The usual clowning ventured into raucous and rowdy fun-making which apparently delighted the audience beyond any discriminating sense of proportion. Louis D'Angelo as Dr. Bartolo and Virgilio Lazzari as Don Basilio frolicked in merry fashion. Mr. Papi conducted in his usual way. The upshot of the whole thing was that the performance ran away with itself and sadly needed to be pointed up.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
FEB 17 1940

FRENCH MUSIC BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky Leads Work by D'Indy.

What began in Carnegie Hall last night as a scholarly jaunt through some unfamiliar French countryside, under the guidance of Serge Koussevitzky, became, before its end, a typical triumphant tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There was interest, edification and frequent satisfaction in the second symphony of D'Indy and Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande" suite, but it was not until the homely (in these days) patterns of Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and the second of Ravel's "Daphis and Chloe" suites were reached that Mr. Koussevitzky achieved the kind of music making that can be heard in Carnegie Hall only twice weekly, five times a season.

D'Indy's score has a monotony, induced by a series of melodic patterns to which the composer reverted in order to give the work unity, but the first movement is an uncommonly logical, closely knit creation and the scherzo has a good deal of originality. There was little continuity of line to cling to in the slow movement, and the finale worked itself to an obviously planned peroration on the Franckian model, but certainly there was ample justification for playing the work. The three excerpts from Faure's stage music were simple, tender and melodic, though with no stronger profile than that imparted to them by Mr. Koussevitzky's graphic treatment of the score.

To this taste the concert attained its climax in the infinitely subtle and skillful treatment of the Debussy prelude. Performances of "L'Apres-midi" are as plentiful as falling leaves in autumn, but how often does one hear so just a blend of sensuality and asceticism, so restrained and calculated an evocation of the quintessential Debussy? To Mr. Koussevitzky, for recognizing how the pastels of Debussy's palette could best be combined to color his outline, and to the orchestra for its ability to fulfill that recognition, the audience owed a vote of thanks—which it was not hesitant to extend. In the Ravel score, leader and men repeated the familiar miracle of re-creation, which is close most remarkable one can ven in this day of orchestral sity.

I. K.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
FEB 17 1940

Koussevitzky Conducts Program of French Music

Serge Koussevitzky brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Carnegie Hall last night for their third visit of the season, offering a well-chosen program of French music. Vincent D'Indy's Symphony No. 2, in B-flat major, occupied the opening half of the program. The remainder contained a suite of three incidental pieces written by Faure for Maeterlinck's "Pelleas et Melisande," Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe."

The concert boasted a conspicuous S. R. O. sign, but by the nature of the applause it seemed that it was the familiar Debussy and Ravel scores that had filled the house. These were played as Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra have played them many times before, with the orchestra displaying inimitable virtuosity and tonal brilliance in the Ravel suite.

The neglected D'Indy symphony deserved an infinitely warmer reception than it received, both for itself and for the fine manner in which it was performed. D'Indy has been accused of being unduly scholarly and eclectic, but last night the symphony seemed a noble work, concerned only with the loftiest sentiments. The composer's technical refinement and care in scoring the symphony, especially his masterly writing for the brass instruments, was particularly evident in the performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
FEB 17 1940

French Music Conducted by Koussevitsky

Boston Symphony Plays D'Indy and Faure on Carnegie Hall Program

By Jerome D. Bohm

Modern French music occupied the attentions of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky's direction in Carnegie Hall last night. First on the program was the Second Symphony in B flat, Op. 57, of D'Indy, which had not been heard here since November, 1934, when it was performed by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra. It is a long work which hardly rewards the listener for the considerable effort entailed in concentrating on its four movements. The thematic material, not unnaturally, often calls to mind D'Indy's adored master, Franck; and there are even suggestions of Tchaikovsky in the opening movement. But it is an intellectualized romanticism which D'Indy gives us, or rather a classicism which strives unsuccessfully to break the bonds of dry formalism to convey a personal message. Even the instrumentation, despite the great demands it frequently makes on the musicians, is almost totally wanting in sensuousness.

Although this symphony was penned after the creation of some of Debussy's most idiomatic products, there is scarcely a trace therein of harmonies which stem for any source later than Wagner. D'Indy was a cerebral artist and for all the mastery of architectonics disclosed fails to arouse anything in the listener but ennui. Mr. Koussevitzky directed it with obvious affection and unfailing zeal and the orchestra, as always, played magnificently.

The ensuing contribution, the Suite from Faure's Music to Maeterlinck's "Pelleas et Melisande," is an undistinguished effort on this composer's part even if one does not make the inevitable comparison with Debussy's masterpiece. This music is without true physiognomy and might serve as incidental music for any French play from Racine to Rostand, although one can think of no dramatic work which would profit by having these excerpts as a musical background. Here again it was only the exquisite playing of the orchestra which was absorbing.

An interpretation of Debussy's "Apres midi d'un Faune" which made the amorous quadruped sound more than customarily languid preceded Mr. Koussevitzky's justly famous conveyance of the "Lever du jour," "Pantomine" and "Danse Generale" from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," which brought the evening to a brilliant close.

At the same time in the Chamber Music Hall of the same building, Olga Paul, mezzo-contralto, was heard in Italian airs by Boretti and Grossi, Handel's 'Dank sei Dir, Herr," German lieder by Schubert, Erich Wolff, Hugo Wolf and Sibelius, in folk songs of various lands and in songs in English, by Manning, Rogers, Janowitz and Woodman. Otto Janowitz was the accompanist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
FEB 17 1940

Music Notes

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the first part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's rev[redacted] for this afternoon at Carnegie Hall, including Respighi's arrangement of Bach's Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor and Serge Prokofieff's second violin concerto, with Jascha Heifetz as the soloist. After the intermission Sibelius's first symphony will be directed by Tauno Hannikainen, Finnish conductor, who made his first appearance here in the Boston Symphony's concert last Thursday night in Brooklyn.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

FEB 17 1940

French Program Of Music Magic At Carnegie Hall

Boston Symphony And Koussevitzky Win Acclaim

The all-French program offered by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night was a journey into a world of magic, Greek myth and never-never witchery.

Each of the composers—d'Indy, Faure, Debussy, Ravel—practiced the white and black magic of orchestral sorcery. Each knew his way about in the fascinating world of tone. Each knew the secret of recapturing a myth, a legend, a mood, in a fabric of tone, and probing its every nuance and suggestion. And each was a musician of ideas and ideals.

Take the d'Indy symphony in B-flat major, opening the program—the terrific surge of its power, its unrelenting rhythmic drive, but, most of all, the fascination of instrumental colors changing almost imperceptibly and becoming a wonder world of Walt Disney fantasy.

Odyssey in Music.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra were just the musicians for it. Apthorp called this titanic work the life and adventures of a melodic couple. It is a veritable Odyssey in a realm of gold. All sorts of things happen along the way—conflict, drama, shimmering vistas, dream-wrapped horizons. Mr. Koussevitsky brought all this into vivid view.

The last two movements, in sheer cumulative power and hurtling propulsion, surpass anything else in French symphonic literature. Of course, there is a touch of Berlioz and a dash of Franck. But what symphonic master of modern France doesn't have some Franck and some Berlioz in his blood? The more the better!

Second on the program was Gabriel Faure's incidental music to Maeterlinck's Pelleas et Melissande, which many suppose Debussy had cornered on the operatic exchange. True, Debussy's music gets closer to that quality which is Maeterlinck and Bergson and mysticism—that life is all flux, continuous, an elan vital streaming through consciousness in one long gush. The quality that made one critic call Debussy's opera a jelly-fish.

Faure's Music Naive.

But Faure's music is something else again. There is obvious form, but within it a legendary otherworldiness all its own—a naive, childlike vision of life, as if Melisande had caught the whole image of life gazing into the cylinder of a well. One feels the human being in Fauer's Melisande, the sylph in Debussy's.

After that Debussy's Afternoon of a Faun came like a pagan flashback from the medieval mists. The orchestra became one suggestion. Rather, the suggestion of a suggestion. If Mallarme's poem "makes only allusions," Debussy's music makes allusions to allusions—one more step away from brute fact, one more veil.

The Bostonians caught every inflection of the "prelude," and the flute player chanted the sense-tinged, reverie-like theme of the Faun like an inspired Theocritan goatherd. Orchestra and leader went completely Greek. It was definitely the faun's night.

Ravel's second Daphne et Chloe suite brought things to a brilliant close. Beside this magician of sheer tone, d'Indy, Faure, Debussy were mere sorcerer's apprentices. This is the orchestra gone inebriate, mounting to one huge spasm of whirling frenzy. Mr. Koussevitzky made one feel that it was the last word in tone and color. Nature could do no more. The concert began as French night, became Greek night and ended Walpurgis night. L. B.

VENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, FEBRUAR

Dorothy Maynor in Pension Fund Concert,

Above: Serge Koussevitzky's sensational discovery: the young Negro soprano, Dorothy Maynor, who will make her first public appearance in this city at the Pension Fund Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 25. Invited to sing at a picnic of the Symphony last summer at Tanglewood, she made a brilliant impression which was confirmed last fall by her debut in New York. To the right: Jan Kiepura, Polish tenor, who sings in Symphony Hall Sunday evening, Feb. 25, for the benefit of his destitute countrymen. This is one of a series of American charity concerts which are to replace the benefits Mr. Kiepura was accustomed to give each year in Warsaw.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

196

FEB 18 1940

Koussevitzky Honored At Beethoven Dinner

Cited for Distinguished Service to American Music

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was cited for "his distinguished service to the cause of American music and American composers" at a dinner given last night in his honor by the Beethoven Association at the Hotel Brevoort, Fifth Avenue and Eighth Street. Dorothy Maynor, Negro soprano, a protegee of Dr. Koussevitzky; Caspar Reardon, harpist, and Jesus Sanroma and Abram Chasins, pianists, offered a program of American music.

Georges Barreres, president of the association, said that Dr. Koussevitzky "always has a new trick up his sleeve" and made the suggestion that the conductor, who formerly ran a Volga River music boat in Russia, might eventually turn to managing and conducting a Hudson River music boat with stops at Kingston and Poughkeepsie.

Deems Taylor, the toastmaster, said Dr. Koussevitzky didn't conduct American music with any condescension or sense of surprise, because the music wasn't so bad, after all. He has given American composers self-respect, Mr. Taylor said.

Among the American composers whose works were played or sung last night were George Gershwin, W. C. Handy, Carl Engel, Paul Nordoff and Mr. Chasins.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAYTON, OHIO
JOURNAL

FEB 18 1940

Westminster Graduate

Dorothy Maynor, the Negro soprano who has come to the forefront during this season after having been introduced to the musical world by Serge Koussevitzky last summer, is a graduate student of Westminster Choir school, Princeton, N. J. This school was founded in Dayton by Dr. John Finley Williamson more than a decade ago.

Miss Maynor appeared recently as soloist with a Westminster Motet choir which presented a concert in a southern city.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

FEB 17 1940

Boston Symphony Plays Modern Music

By GRENA BENNETT.

Modern music, in the best French manner, monopolized last evening's program of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall. Although it was an entirely Gallic combination there was sufficient variety in the matter presented by one of the finest orchestras in existence. The large and fashionable audience was in a receptive and responsive mood and the event was as enjoyable as it was entertaining.

The concert opened with D'Indy's second symphony. Most of the music has been described as austere but this is superimposed upon gracious melodic invention that pervades each of its four sections and affords the interpreters ample opportunity for displaying their prime musicianship.

An orchestral suite by Faure entitled "Pelleas et Melesande" inspired by the Maeterlinck play, and a part of the composer's stage music, was the second delectable offering which was followed by Debussy's iridescent "Afternoon of a Faun" and excerpts from Ravel's second suite "Daphnis et Chloe."

* * *

Last evening's performance of "The Barber of Seville" at the Metropolitan Opera House was notable for the season's debut of John Charles Thomas as Figaro and the first time here of Hilde Reggiani as Rosina. Mr. Thomas' version of the loquacious barber was even more voluble than either the librettist or the composer intended, for he interpolated words and music ad lib.

However, his admirable voice was heard to good advantage and his acting was properly unctuous. Miss Reggiani sang brilliantly and fluently her highly embellished arias, especially in the "Carnival of Venice" in the lesser scene.

Armand Topatyan, whose Metropolitan appearances are usually commendable, was miscast as Almaviva, for he was compelled to sing florid music that is absolutely unfitted to his vocal equipment. The humorous role of Bartolo and Basileo were delightfully portrayed by Louis D'Angelo and Virgilio Lazzari.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 17 1940

Music

Beethoven's "Pastoral" Included in Boston Symphony Program for Tuesday Night.—WPA Orchestra to Move from Hope High to Stuart After Tomorrow's Concert.

The latest communique from Symphony Hall announces the following revised program from the Boston Symphony's concert in Metropolitan Theatre on Tuesday night:

Mozart, Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro;" Beethoven, Symphony No. 6 in F-major ("Pastoral"); Brahms, Symphony No. 4, in E-minor.

Beethoven's "Pastoral" has not been played here by the Boston orchestra for 40 years—since January, 1900, when Gericke conducted it. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct on Tuesday.

* * *

The concert that was to have been given by the Rhode Island WPA Symphony Orchestra in Hope high school auditorium tomorrow night has been postponed until a week from tomorrow night. It will then be given in Gilbert Stuart Junior high school auditorium, according to Winfield A. Cunningham, director of the Rhode Island music project. The remaining concerts in the orchestra's Sunday series also will be given at Gilbert Stuart.

* * *

Sandor Vas, pianist, a member of the faculty of the Eastman School of Music, will give a concert in Alumnae Hall, Pembroke College, on Thursday night. He is presented by the Brown University Music Department. Mr. Vas is on a tour sponsored by the arts program of the Association of American Colleges.

Mr. Vas is a Hungarian, but has been in this country 15 years.

He will remain two and one-half days at Brown, visiting classes and conferring with faculty and students. His recital will be free to the public.

The program:

Fantasia in C-minor	Bach
"I Call to Thee" Organ Chorale Prelude	Bach-Busoni
"Jesu, joy of man's desiring" Chorale from the Cantata 147	Bach-Hess
Gigue in G-major from French Suite	Bach
Impromptu in F-minor op. 142, No. 1	Schubert
Sonata Pathetique op. 13 Grave-Allegro di molto Adagio Cantabile Rondo	Beethoven
Novellette No. 8	Schumann
La soiree dans Grenade Les collines d'Anacapri	Debussy
Burlesk (. . . a little tipsy)	Bartok
Two Hungarian peasant songs	Weiner
March Humoresk Ruralia Hungarica	Dohnanyi

Martha Baird Allen, pianist, and the Musical Art Quartet, which gave a series in the School of Design Museum early in the season, will be the artists for a Finland Benefit Concert in the auditorium of Pawtucket Senior high school a week from tomorrow afternoon at 3:30 o'clock.

* * *

Edith Gyllenberg Waxberg, pianist, will play for the Women's Club of Danielson Wednesday afternoon.

* * *

The Gilbert and Sullivan Group of the Brown-Pembroke Orchestra will give "The Pirates of Penzance" in Faunce House Theatre a week from next Thursday night, and will repeat it on the two nights following. William Dinneen, assistant in the Brown University music department, is production manager. Prof. Arlan R. Coolidge, head of the department, will conduct the performances.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

FEB 18 1940

Boris Koutzen's Poem In Association's List

Composer Is Also Represented in Boston Program

Boris Koutzen, Russian-American violinist and composer, will be represented by the first public performance of a symphonic poem, "Valley Forge," in Leon Barzin's program for the fourth concert of the National Orchestral Association's regular series at Carnegie Hall tomorrow night. Another work by Mr. Koutzen, a concerto for clarinet, cello, flute, bassoon and horn, which was first played by the association in March, 1935, will enter the Boston Symphony Orchestra's [illegible] in its home concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday night. The composer, now a member of the NBC Symphony, made his New York recital debut in October, 1934, playing his violin sonata and a nocturne.

Mr. Barzin's program also includes music by another New York composer, Anis Fuleihan's symphony, which was introduced by the Philharmonic - Symphony in 1936-'37. Karl Ulrich Schnabel will be the soloist in Mozart's piano concerto in 1 flat (K 449) and Chopin's Andante Spianato and Polonaise.

In Serge Koussevitzky's program for next Friday and Saturday the Koutzen concerto will be followed by symphony and Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WAUKESHA, WIS.
FREEMAN

FEB 17 1940

The latest work of the Russian modernist composer, Serge Prokofieff, will be introduced to this country on March 21 and 22 by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Serge Ko[illegible]

It is Prokofieff's 'cello concerto in E minor, Opus 58. The soloist will be Gregor Piatagorsky who is regarded by Koussevitzky as one of the greatest cellists of the day.

197

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
FEB 18 1940

MUSIC

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Tauno Han[illegible]tor, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall with Jascha Heifetz violinist, as soloist in the following program:

Bach-Respighi,
Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor
Prokofieff,
Violin Concerto No. 2, in G minor, Op. 63
Dr. Koussevitzky conducting
Sibelius,
Symphony No. 1, in E minor, Op. 39
Mr. Hannikainen conducting

Novelty in Two Senses

During the fifteen years which have elapsed since Serge Koussevitzky made his American debut and for two decades before that, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always played under the leadership of its regular conductor in its concerts in Carnegie Hall. But Serge Koussevitzky did not cite the current ardent sympathy for Finland as the principal reason for turning over the podium to Tauno Hannikainen, conductor of the orchestra of Turku (Abo), in the latter half of yesterday afternoon's program. "You will see," he told the capacity audience, "that this heroic little country had not only great composers, but brilliant conductors."

Mr. Hannikainen, who will celebrate his forty-fifth birthday a week from tomorrow, is one of four brothers who hold important positions with Finnish musical organizations. Several years of activity as a cellist preceded his first major conductorial engagement with the State Opera in Helsinki from 1922 to 1927, when he was appointed to his present position. On the outbreak of the Russian war, he was assigned to civil guard duty, but was released by the Finnish authorities in order to fill his engagement with the Boston Symphony. Both in Boston on Feb. 2 and 3, and in Brooklyn Thursday evening, his programs included the first symphony of his great compatriot which was the vehicle for his Manhattan debut.

* * *

It takes, of course, more than a single work to give comprehensive evidence for an estimate of a conductor's interpretative powers, but the impression gathered from the performance of the symphony was one of notable talent and authority. His direction, often marked by vigorous and forceful gestures, suggested the mastery of the technical aspect of his art, clearly set forth expressive ideas and the ability to have them reproduced in the playing of his musicians. It seemed undeniably apparent that his acquaintance with Sibelius's symphony in E minor has been of long standing, that his understanding of the score is thorough from an emotional as well as a technical point of view. The wide and contrasted expressive resources of the music, its vivid and generous colors; its poignant outbursts and broad, ingratiating lyric measures were disclosed in a manner which won the conductor an ovation of unusual length at the close.

Sibelius's later symphonic style had not been fully integrated when he wrote this work before the turn of the century, but, in this rehearing, its individual characteristics and atmosphere made an impression far outweighing occasional and frequently noticed hints of the influence of the composer's seniors. The stamp of the composer's creative musical personality seemed unusually pronounced in a composition which is still vivid and eloquent after more than forty years.

* * *

Prokofieff's second violin concerto postdates his first work in this form by twenty-two years. It has been heard here in the recording made by Mr. Heifetz with this orchestra, who introduced it to Boston in December, 1937, and twice in recital with piano accompaniment. This concert, however, provided the first opportunity to hear it in a New York concert hall.

Mr. Prokofieff, in the music which has been performed here by himself and others, has revealed himself as a composer of various styles. His command of clashing, plangent harmonic and instrumental color had an especially convincing revelation in the early Scythian Suite; his suggestion of brooding horror in "Sept, ils sont sept" is still memorable after fifteen years or more. We have frequently heard him in a neo-classic vein in his Classical Symphony, or as an expert musical wit in his relatively recent "Peter and the Wolf."

None of these characteristics, however, is exhibited in the second violin concerto. This can be taken as bearing out a remark made by the composer in "The New York Times" ten years ago, when he expressed his hope that he had become simpler and more melodic. "Of course," he observed, "I have used dissonances in my time, but there has been too much dissonance."

Tauno Hannikainen

Guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon

Lyricism, indeed, characterizes most of the thematic material of the concerto. Another characteristic is its prevailingly meditative and unproclamative mood. The orchestration is notable both for its skill and its delicacy and subtlety of color, but the color is seldom pronounced; even in the relatively sprightly finale, there are few, if any, full-throated instrumental outbursts. The violin solo, as in several other recently wrought concertos, is often conceived as a part, while the principal part, of the orchestral fabric. Both the solo instrument and the ensemble fill and exchange the roles of proponent of the main musical idea and of commentator and embroiderer upon it. It is grateful to the soloist, while exacting; there are demands for swift-paced deftness as well as the disclosure of a long lyric line, but it offers no apparent cadenzas or primarily bravura passages.

* * *

Some of the long-breathed themes lack a pronounced and memorable profile, and a certain lack of thematic contrast can be noticed in the first two movements; interest is not always evenly sustained. But the work as a whole appeals as sincere music of considerable imaginativeness, and the slow movement has a persuasive poetic appeal. Mr. Heifetz, in his familiar and admirable interpretative form, and the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky gave the concerto a thoroughly integrated and expressively devoted performance which reflected their thorough understanding of the notes and atmosphere of the music, and was fervently applauded.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
FEB 18 1940

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME THE COMING WEEK

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will present music of Boris Koutzen, Paul Hindemith and Beethoven at the next pair of concerts to be given on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next, at Symphony Hall, February 23 and 24. Dr. Koussevitzky will introduce to these concerts the music of Boris Koutzen, a composer of Russian birth who is a citizen of this country. The piece is a Concerto for Five Solo Instruments (Flute, Clarinet, Bassoon, Horn and 'Cello) with String orchestra. The Concerto takes the form of a Recitative, Passacaglia, and Finale. Hindemith's "Symphony"—Matnis der Maler, has been heard at these concerts, but not under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky. The "Symphony," which consists of three excerpts from Hindemith's opera of the same name, takes its titles from the religious paintings of the early German composer, Matthias Grunewald: Angelic Concert, Entombment, and Temptation of Saint Anthony. The closing number will be the "Pastoral" Symphony of Beethoven, No. 6.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 18 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY DIRECTED BY FINN

Hannikainen Gets Ovation for Interpretation of the Sibelius Work at Carnegie Hall

HEIFETZ VIOLIN SOLOIST

Plays Prokofieff 2d Concerto —Bach Organ Passacaglia Heard Under Koussevitzky

By OLIN DOWNES

An unprecedented feature of the concert given yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall was the appearance with that organization, in the second half of its program, of the young Finnish conductor, Tauno Hannikainen, as "guest" leader in the performance of the First symphony of his countryman, Jean Sibelius.

This was the first time that a guest conductor had appeared with the Boston Symphony at its New York concerts. Following the very brilliant performance under Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky of the Bach-Respighi arrangement of the organ Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor, and the New York première, with Jascha Heifetz as soloist, of Prokofieff's Second violin concerto, and the intermission, Dr. Koussevitzky addressed the audience. He remarked that while every one wished to aid Finland, his invitation to Mr. Hannikainen to direct the symphony was not based upon that consideration alone, but was due to the fact that in Finland they had not only great composers but very gifted conductors. Dr. Koussevitzky then presented Mr. Hannikainen.

Cherished Every Note

That young man stepped forward with a becoming modesty but also with an air of conviction which augured well for the immediate future. With the first bleak notes of the clarinet with which the symphony opens, this impression was confirmed. One sensed the end of the work, in fact, in this beginning—an immediate token of the conductor's imagination and power of synthesis. It was evident that Mr. Hanniainen cherished every note of the score. He neglected no detail, whether it was one of instrumental color or of wildly dramatic expression. But always there was spaciousness, breadth, sweep of line, greatness.

The sensation of primeval forces at play at once seized the listener—this, and the heroic and tragical spirit which inhabits the music. No one who thus hears the symphony easily forgets its many significant characteristics: the rhythmical shock of the theme that leaps from the orchestra, battle-drunk, at the beginning of the allegro; the skirlings and wailings of the instruments which, from solitary places, prophesy war; the savage dances and the fantastical broodings and glintings of the middle part of the scherzo; the mournful majesty of the lamentation heard, as if through the storm, in the finale. Nothing was missed; everything was said as it can only be communicated by music.

The performance had its final necessary ingredients complete poise and control; the balancing of all elements; power held long in reserve for shattering climaxes, and reigning over all, a sovereign nobility.

To Return to Finland Soon

If anything had been needed to prove the quality of the music, Mr. Hannikainen would have provided it. Richly did he deserve the homage of the audience. He soon returns to Finland, where heroics are not confined to music, and musicians and even perfectly common men value principles and liberty and know how to die. It seemed, at the end, that the audience could not do him sufficient honor.

This episode was not the only impressive feature of the afternoon. Bach, plus Respighi, plus Koussevitzky, was certain to make a sensation, which it did. In the performance of the Prokofieff concerto, conductor and violinist—Koussevitzky and Heifetz—vied with each other in the composer's interest. Prokofieff can hardly hope at any time for a more favorable presentation of his concerto. It is ingeniously, even brilliantly, written for the solo instrument, although it may be said that Mr. Heifetz sacrificed many of the interests of the virtuoso that the audience might the better understand a new score. Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestral part was as remarkable a contribution. The concerto is undeniably a clever and dexterous piece of work, duly modern in texture and of a certain piquancy. Whether it is more than a smart piece of writing is to be seen, or proclaimed by those more confident than this commentator of the composition's intrinsic merit. Performer and concerto were well received.

N.Y. Herald Tribune 18

Koussevitzky Names Works In Berkshires

Tchaikovsky Centennial Will Be Celebrated in Second Week's Series

Serge Koussevitzky has announced the principal works to be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under his direction in the seventh annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival during the first three weeks of August in the Music Shed on the Tanglewood estate, Lenox, Mass. The dates are Thursday nights, Aug. 1, 8, 15; Saturday nights, Aug. 3, 10, 17, and Sunday afternoons, Aug. 4, 11 and 18.

Works to be played in the three programs of the first week (Series A) include the first symphonies of Beethoven, Schumann and Sibelius; Schubert's symphony in C major, Brahms's second symphony, Roy Harris's third symphony, Respighi's orchestration of Bach's Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor; Faure's incidental music for "Pelleas et Melisande," Stravinsky's capriccio for piano and orchestra, with J. M. Sanroma as soloist, Prokofieff's Classical Symphony and Ravel's second suite from "Daphnis et Chloe."

As an observance of the hundredth anniversary of the composer's birth, the programs of the second week (Series B) will be devoted to music by Peter Ilyitch Tchaikovsky, including his violin concerto, with Albert Spalding as soloist; the first, second, fourth, fifth and sixth (Pathetic) symphonies, "Romeo and Juliet," Serenade for strings, second suite and other works. One of these three programs will be directed by Artur Rodzinski, conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra.

Bach's Mass in B minor, the first major choral work to be performed in this festival, will be heard in one of the concerts of the third week (Series C) with the assistance of the Festival Chorus of the Berkshire Music Center, which, with Dr. Koussevitzky as director, and G. Wallace Woodworth, chairman of Harvard University's music department, as assistant director, will open its first six weeks' session July 8. Dorothy Maynor, Negro soprano, whose vocal assets first became well known when she sang at a party given by Dr. Koussevitzky for the Boston Symphony's musicians last summer at Tanglewood, will sing arias. Instrumental works announced for this series include Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Brahms's first symphony, a Haydn symphony and Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" symphony.

Further information about the festival may be obtained by writing to its office in Stockbridge, Mass., or its New York office in Steinway Hall. Inquiries about living accommodations in the Berkshires may be addressed to the Berkshire Hills Conference at the Court House in Pittsfield, Mass.

Dr. Rodzinski, who is the first guest conductor to appear in these concerts, has a farm near Stockbridge, and Mr. Spalding is a resident of Great Barrington.

The first two Berkshire festivals, in 1934 and 1935, were conducted by Henry Hadley. The association of the Boston Symphony with this series began in 1936. The site was moved to Tanglewood in 1937, and the Music Shed was first used in 1938.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& Republican
FEB 18 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 18 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
FEB 18 1940

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
FEB 18 1940

Sadness Marks Finn Conductor's New York Concert

Tauno Hannikainen Leads Boston Symphony as Wife Weeps

New York, Feb. 17.—(AP.)—Finland today furnished the Boston Symphony its first guest conductor in the last 35 years of the famous orchestra's visits to New York, Tauno Hannikainen, blond, chunky and in his early forties.

But although his version of the first symphony of his compatriot Jean Sibelius was cheered, the occasion was not too happy for one of the audience, the conductor's wife who wept through most of the performance. The Hannikainens came last month to America from Finland so that his agreement to conduct for his friend Serge Koussevitzky could be kept, leaving their son behind in the army.

When today's news of Finnish retreats reached Mme. Hannikainen, even her husband's success could not stop her tears. They have had no word from the boy since they left home.

The conductor must return shortly to Finland where he also may be called for army duty. He was excused from military service by his government to keep his pledge to Boston.

The newcomer conducted the last half of the concert, and Dr. Koussevitzky the first, which included Respighi's transcription of Bach's C Minor Passacaglia and Fugue, and a performance of the Russian Prokofieff's Second Violin Concerto by the Russian violinist, Jascha Heifetz.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
FEB 18 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN
FEB 18 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DAVENPORT, IA.
DEMOCRAT-LEADER
FEB 18 1940

TAUNO HANNIKAINEN

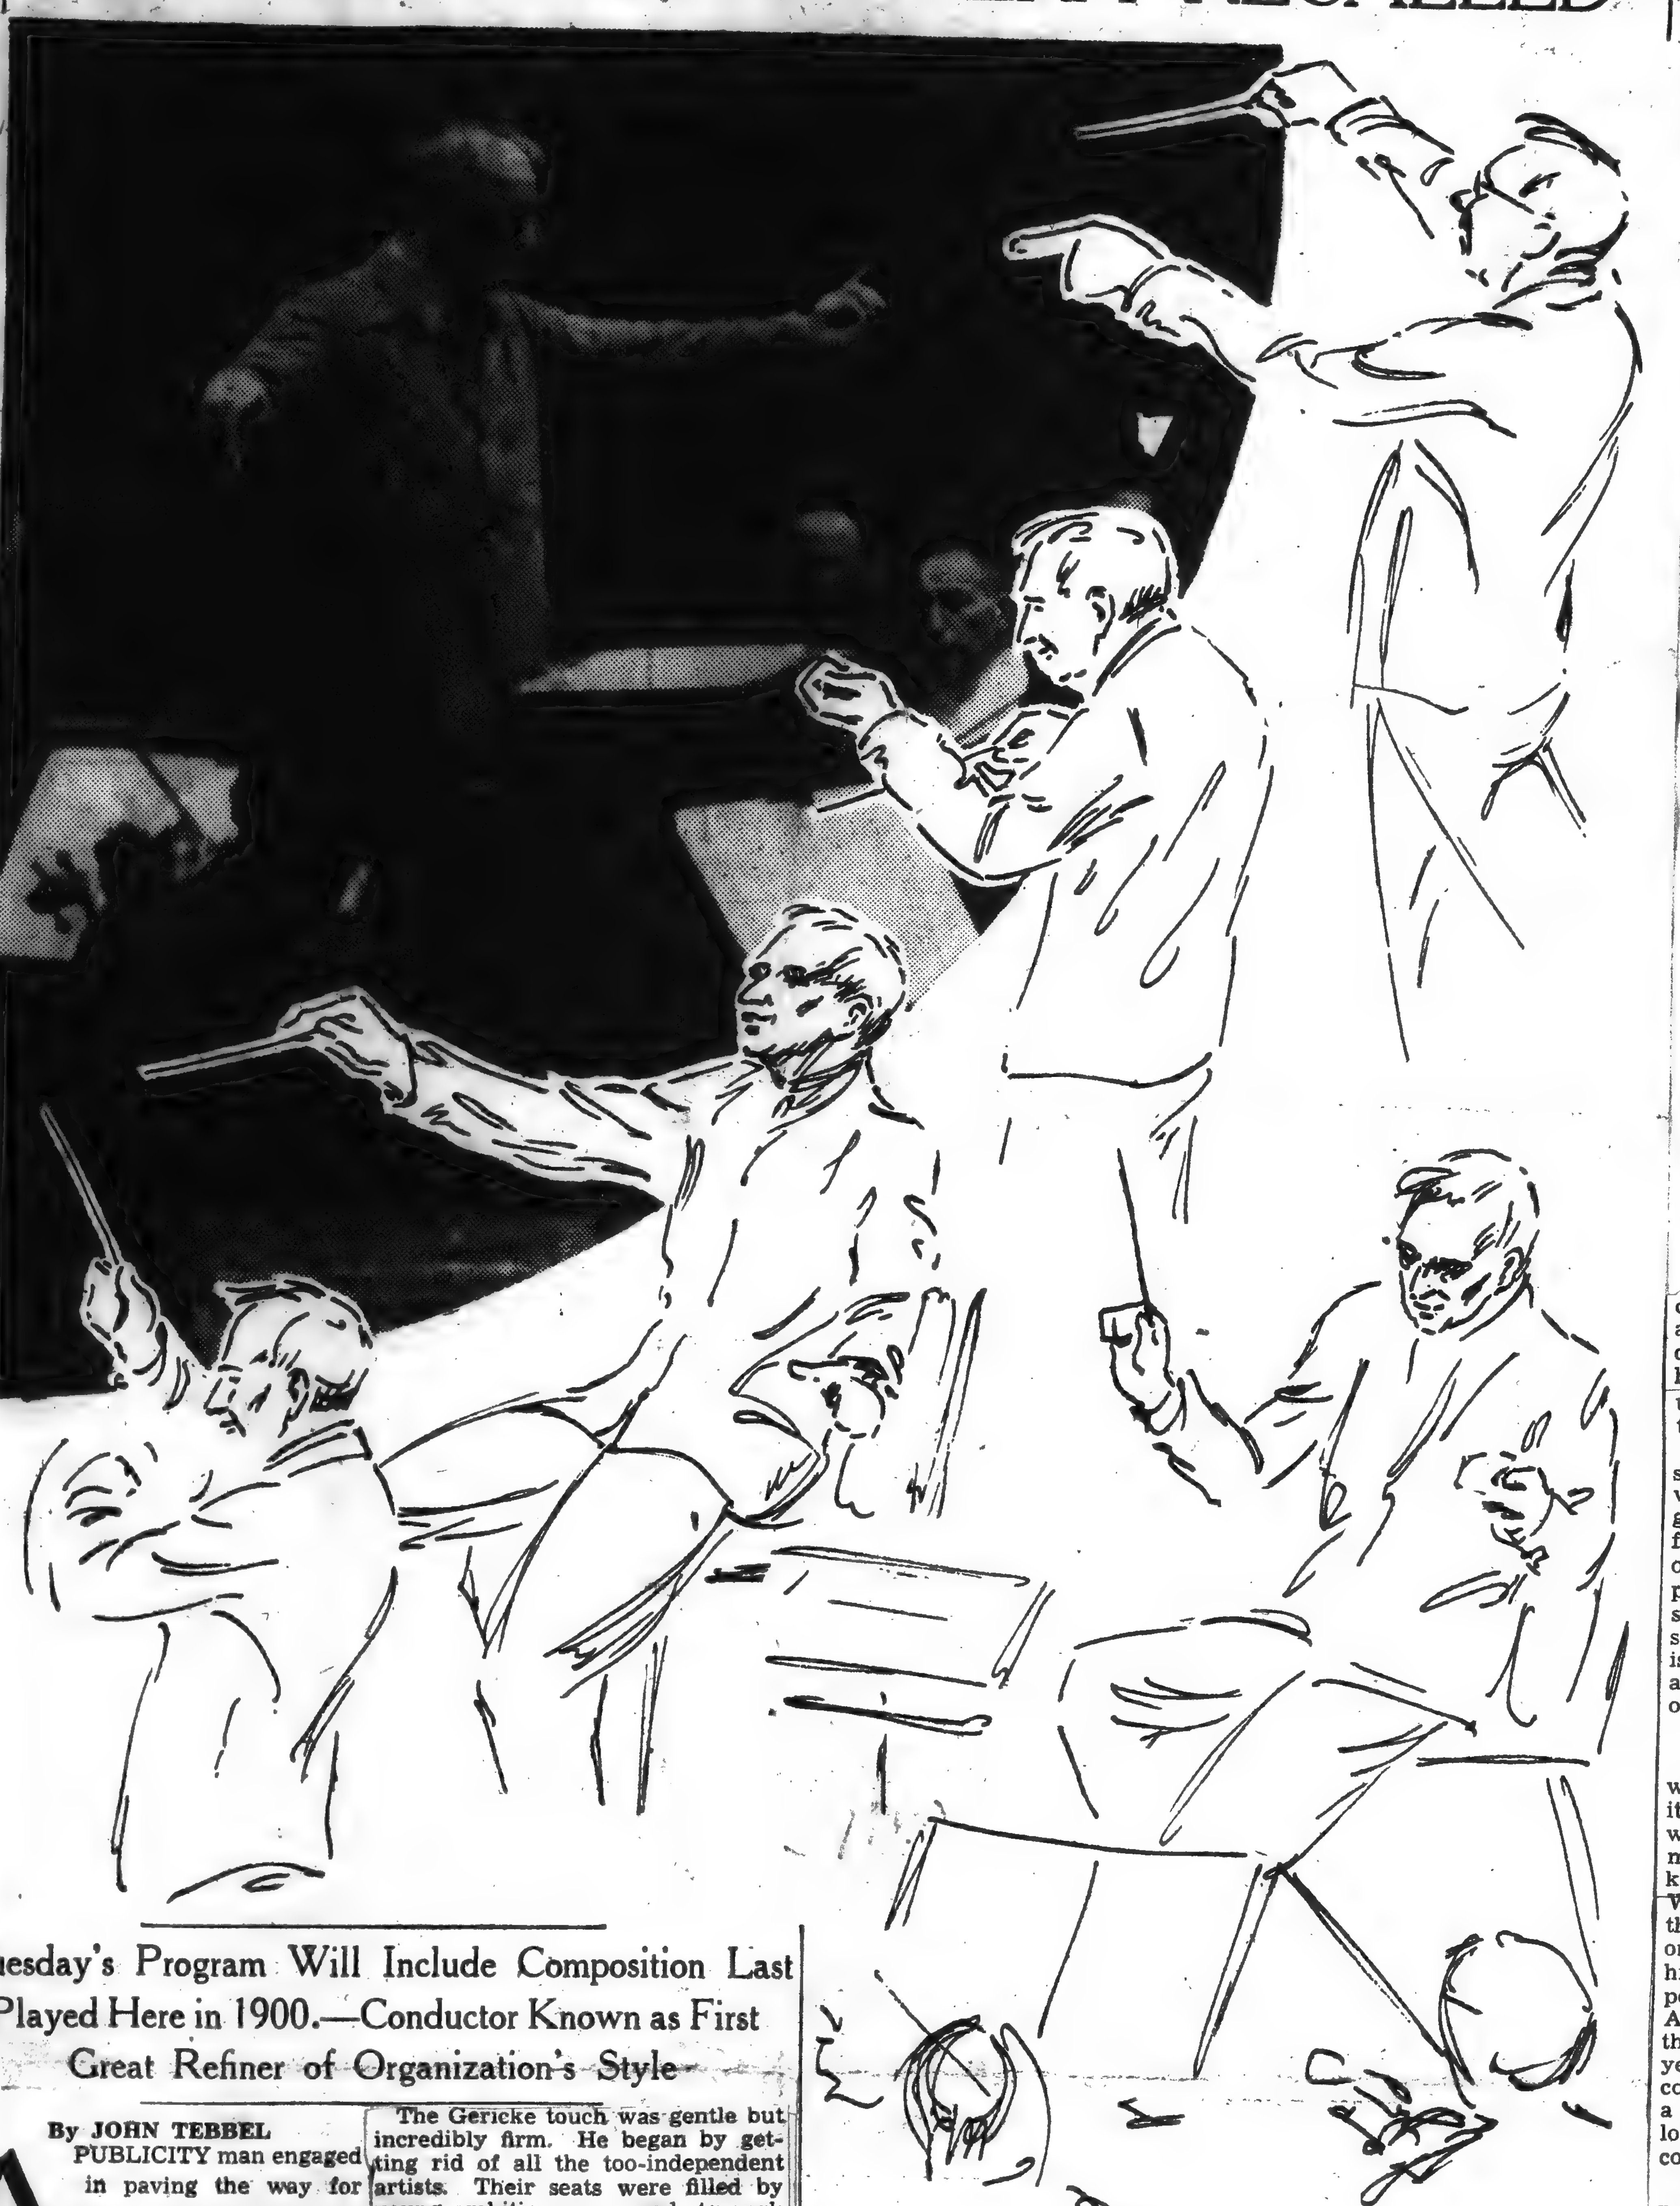
. . . of Turko, Finland, was the guest conductor with the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon, directing the Sibelius First Symphone at the request of Serge Koussevitsky. Mr. Hannikainen was the regular conductor of the symphony at Turku until the war suspended all musical activities and he was drafted for civilian guard duty. He came to this country to conduct the Boston orchestra and has permission to remain in the United States for a few more guest appearances before he returns to Finland to resume military duty there.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 18 1940

198

GERICKE SYMPHONY ERA RECALLED



PANORAMA OF A MAN WHO KNOWS WHAT HE WANTS: Serge Koussevitzky at a rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a conductor who must have what he expects—else the orchestra doesn't play what it is rehearsing. Martha Burnham, young Boston artist, depicts the maestro in these hitherto unpublished pen-and-ink sketches, made during practice. Richard Tucker snapped the candid camera shot at another session.

Tuesday's Program Will Include Composition Last Played Here in 1900.—Conductor Known as First Great Refiner of Organization's Style

By JOHN TEBBEL

A PUBLICITY man engaged in paving the way for some phenomenon or other bestows all kinds of miscellaneous information on a newspaper, some of it helpful, some provocative and some purely apocryphal. Bob Humphrey, who turns up now and then on behalf of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has left us an [illegible] which falls definitely in the provocative class.

When the Bostonians perform Beethoven's sixth symphony Tuesday night in Metropolitan Theatre, Mr. Humphrey declares, it will be the first time they have offered it in this city since 1900.

That announcement should make many an oldster sit back, feel what is left of his hair, and exclaim: "Why, it was only yesterday; wasn't it, that Wilhelm Gericke came down here?"

Yesterday it was, but a long yesterday. Nineteen Hundred—that was the third season of Gericke's second term as conductor (he had already led the orchestra from 1884 to 1889) and it was also a time when the organization was rounding itself out as a major orchestra.

First Great Refiner

Gericke was the first great refiner of the Boston Symphony's style, which was ready but rough when he first came to it. The ranks were full of musicians so excellent in their own right that they thought of themselves as virtuosi instead of members of an ensemble, and they were largely undisciplined.

The Gericke touch was gentle but incredibly firm. He began by getting rid of all the too-independent artists. Their seats were filled by young, ambitious men, ready to work hard as a group. They played with a tremendous enthusiasm which the painstaking Viennese found himself constantly forced to suppress.

It became a legend in the orchestra: the hands of Mr. Gericke were always in an attitude of shushing. Players who couldn't stand this refining process simply quit. The method succeeded admirably, however, and the orchestra found itself playing with a silken tone never before associated with it. Moreover the Gericke discipline made his men extremely responsive. In the end, the Boston Symphony had won a place for itself among the world's best.

Strauss Delighted

During this period in the orchestra's life, Richard Strauss visited Boston to conduct his own compositions. He was delighted with the outfit but the effect of Gericke's treatment became amusingly evident, even under Richard's baton.

"You play that finely; but a little too finely," Strauss told the orchestra at the end of a particular passage in rehearsal. "I want some roughness here."

Even as late as 1904, two years before Gericke retired for the last time, the musicians sometimes quit under his pressure. A New York newspaper carried an item telling of a tuba player from the Boston orchestra who "returned to New York last month, giving as a reason for his resignation that he would have perished of lung trouble if he had remained. Every time he took a full breath Mr. Gericke eyed him, and put forth that repressive left hand. The poor brass player had to swallow his own smoke, so to speak, and as consumption threatened him, he came to this city, where he blatteth as he listeth."

This story probably comes under the heading of apocrypha. At any rate, we should like to know someone with a prodigious memory who could recall exactly what kind of treatment Gericke gave to the Beethoven sixth when he played it here in 1900. Presumably the violent "pastoral" portions were carefully restrained until the symphony emerged as more pasture than pastoral. And yet it was undoubtedly a careful, finished reading, of a kind which might today come from the baton of Walter Damrosch, Sir Henry Wood or Thomas Beecham.

Program Changes Discussed

There is something of Gericke in Dr. Koussevitzky and we never realized it so clearly until the little matter of program changes came up. We have chided the Bostonians frequently of late for announcing one program, then turning up with something entirely different at the last minute. Providence has had this experience frequently. New York got a particularly severe dose of it last week.

Inquiring about this matter, we were told that several factors influence the changes. Perhaps a composition has been played by another orchestra too close to an announced concert, maybe some local preference calls for a switch. Yet these are things which might conceivably happen to any orchestra and no other major symphony announces so many changes as does Boston. The answer obviously lies elsewhere.

It lies, in fact, where you might expect it: in the personality of Dr. Koussevitzky himself. Like Gericke, he is constantly driving his men to better things and refuses to satisfy himself with something less when he asks more. Consequently, if the orchestra is rehearsing a program and the performance of some piece does not meet his exacting demands, he simply refuses to play it at all until it comes up to standard. Hence the changes.

That may be harsh treatment sometimes for concert-goers who whet their appetite for one thing and get another, but it certainly makes for polished concerts and the Boston orchestra is noted for its superlative performances. It may not be the best symphony orchestra in the world; still we would wager that its work is consistently, week after week, on a higher level than that of any other.

Complaint Heard

About Tuesday night's program we have heard some complaint that it is concerned only with standard war-horses and does not reflect much of Dr. Koussevitzky's well-known sympathy for new music. Well, they were saying the same thing of Wilhelm Gericke in 1885, only the complaint then centred on his natural love for German composers. There was a clamor for American music, in spite of the fact that Critic Louis Elson observed a year later: "If all the symphonic composers of America were to hold a mass-meeting, they could be lodged in one double room in any country hotel."

The situation is much improved now and the Boston Orchestra's library has one of the most formidable collections of American music extant. Ironically, credit for the beginnings of that collection must go largely to Mr. Gericke, who was more sympathetic than his public believed.

Personally, we look forward to Tuesday's program because experience has proven that nine out of ten performances of the "Pastoral" are pedestrian and the tenth is so unexpected that the listener believes he has never heard this familiar work before. Dr. Koussevitzky, by reason of his passion for perfection, may be expected to turn in such a reading.

Good Curtain Raiser

As for the Mozart overture, it's a good curtain raiser on any program. And the Brahms fourth, most neglected of his symphonies, is in our opinion an artistic as well as a chronological climax to the composer's work in that field, particularly the magnificent final movement, written in the form of a passacaglia.

If Wilhelm Gericke's ghost lingers around the brazen architecture of the Metropolitan on Tuesday night, he will be pleased with the program, we think, and more than pleased to find that the orchestra now possesses a conductor who not only has refined it even further but has given to it a special force of sheer virtuosity which makes it play like a single, superb instrument.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

FEB 19 1940

Berkshire People Attend Carnegie Hall Concert

A number of Berkshire residents were in the overflow audience at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

On the first half of the program conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, Jascha Heifitz appeared as soloist in Prokofieff's Violin Concerto No. 2 in G Minor, Op. 63. Tauno Hannikainen, 42-year-old Finnish conductor, wielded the baton for the second half of the program during which the orchestra played Symphony No. 1 by the Finnish composer, Sibelius.

In presenting Mr. Hannikainen, Dr. Koussevitzky, a Russian, told the audience: "You will see that this heroic little country has not only great composers but brilliant conductors."

It was the first time in the 15 years Dr. Koussevitzky has been conducting the orchestra that he had invited a guest conductor to perform at Carnegie Hall. At the conclusion of the concert, the audience thundered its approval with applause, stamping and whistling.

Later, in the privacy of his dressing room, both the Finnish conductor and his wife, appreciating the reception were nevertheless worried because they said: "Bolsheviks! Didn't you hear the whistling?" They were relieved wher told that whistling meant approva and was not synonymous with hissing as it is in some Europear countries.

The Hannikainens return to Fin land soon. The conductor who i in the reserves expects to be callec to fight the Russians. His son, in th army now is somewhere in Karelis They have not heard from hir since war began.

Mr. Hannikainen attended th Berkshire Symphonic Festival fo the dedication of the Tanglewoo shed in 1938. He said he hopes t return.

199

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 18 1940

MUSIC and MUSICIANS

BY JOHN TEBBEL

IF you want to hear the new-found voice of Dorothy Maynor, Negro soprano, in a thorough test of its capabilities, wander up to Boston's Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon and listen to her as soloist with the Boston orchestra. She plans to sing "Oh, Sleep, Why Dost Thou Leave Me?" from Handel's "Semele;" Pamina's aria from Mozart's "Magic Flute;" "Elsa's Dream," from "Lohengrin;" and "Depuis le Jour" from "Louise." That, we submit, is a lineup which would make an ordinary soprano wake up in a cold sweat the night before performance.

The orchestra says it will contribute a Handel concerto grosso, the prelude to "Lohengrin," and Sibelius's second symphony—but don't count on it. It may be three other numbers.

◆ ◆ ◆

The Boston outfit was up to its old tricks of program changing in New York last week, where it played two programs, one in Brooklyn Friday night, the other in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. Both the occasions, as first announced, contained no Sibelius and listed no other conductor and yet, by that strange alchemy of the Boston program makers, both had acquired Sibelius and a guest conductor only one day later. Because this column goes to press early, we were unable to report what else happened on the Bostonians' visit, but we are morally certain that Manhattan got its first hearing yesterday afternoon of the new Prokofieff violin concerto, performed by Jascha Heifetz.

◆ ◆ ◆

This writer has hoped audibly on several occasions that someone would do something different for American opera. Someone is, even now. Ernst Krenek, the disciple of atonality who has already written one good opera, is hard at work on another, with Emmett Lavery. It will be something new. Of customary length, it deals with the problem of man's adjustment to a changing world in terms of the people who are likely to hear the work. Its subtitle is "Portrait of an Age", the singers number six and the orchestra includes only five men, listing piano, percussion and "radio devices." All this, the composers hope, will herald a new form of opera designed to reach "a vast new audience."

◆ ◆ ◆

Try To Believe It Department, Boston Division: The Boston Flute Players Club, which held its 100th concert last Sunday, is not devoted to flutes, flute players or flute music. They concede only one thing to sanity: Georges Laurent, the club's musical director, plays first flute with the Boston Symphony.

DOROTHY MAYNOR
Sings in Boston next Sunday

◆ ◆ ◆

The New York Philharmonic played to packed houses everywhere on its recent tour but the final figures show little more than an even break. Transporting an orchestra is like feeding an elephant, the managers say.

◆ ◆ ◆

Women's Suffrage Note: Elsa Hilger, a female who plays in the 'cello section of the Philharmonic Orchestra, moves to first chair for the summer series in Robin Hood Dell. The Philadelphians have three other women: a violinist and two harpists. No woman has ever occupied a First chair in any major orchestra before, so far as we know.

Sun. Herald, Feb. 18/40
PAGE TWELVE A

Maynor to Sing

Dorothy Maynor, celebrated Negro soprano, who will be the guest soloist at the Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which takes place Feb. 25 at Symphony Hall. This marks Miss Maynor's first important concert appearance in this city.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

FEB 19 1940

Music and The Drama

NEW YORK HEARS FINN LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY IN RENDITION OF SIBELIUS

A wholly exceptional feature of the memorable concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky conductor, Friday afternoon in Carnegie Hall was the appearance as guest leader for the first time in this city of Tauno Hannikainen, who directed in that capacity the performance of the First Symphony of his countryman, Jean Sibelius, reports Olin Downes of the New York Times.

Following performances by Dr. Koussevitzky of the Bach-Respighi organ Passacaglia and Fugue, and the New York premiere of Prokofieff's Second Violin Concerto, with Jascha Heifetz as soloist, the director appeared with Mr. Hannikainen on the stage. Dr. Koussevitzky remarked that while every one wished to aid Finland, his procedure was not based upon the fact that Finland had great conductors as well as composers. Then Dr. Koussevitzky presented Mr. Hannikainen to the audience.

With the opening measures—the molding of the clarinet solo to the acme of expressiveness—Mr. Hannikainen showed his quality as a musician and impressed his audience by his heroic spirit and poise and control of the situation.

Mr. Hannikainen knew every note of his score and put all his young heart and his good musician's brain into it. He was not there to prove his prowess as a virtuoso; only to drive home the music. No detail of it was neglected by him, whether it were one of instrumental color or wildly dramatic utterance. The consuming emotion of the composer when he created the music was also the conductor's. The sense of heroic tragedy and the vibrations of the natural world were fused in his wholly comprehending conception, which had the sweep of the tempest.

At the same time there was the quality which is that of a thorough musician and a thoughtful artist, and, also, apparently, of the Finnish nature: that of balance, reserve power, and synthesis. No climax was so intense that it was disproportionate, or that the orchestra ran away with the leader. There was complete and unspoken control. When a headlong development reached its peak it was after long ascent and the irresistible accumulation of energy.

Mr. Hannikainen soon returns to Finland, where heroics are not confined to music, and musicians and even perfectly common men value principles and liberties and know how to die. This could be felt in the symphony he interpreted, and the spirit of his presentation. He was applauded and cheered for long moments when he finished.

These were dramatic moments of the afternoon, but not the only impressive ones. For Dr. Koussevitzky opened the concert with a masterly and mightily climaxed reading of the Bach Passacaglia, and he and Mr. Heifetz, the two masters that they are, for the benefit of Prokofieff's concerto.

That composer could hardly have hoped for a better showing. The concerto is undeniably a clever and ingenious composition, very adroitly scored both for orchestra and solo instrument. Whether it is more than that is to be determined by later hearings or by those more confident than this commentator is of the composition's intrinsic merits. Performer and concerto were well received by the audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 19 1940

Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Play Beethoven's "Pastoral" in ~~Fourth Concer~~t of Season at Metropolitan Theatre Tomorrow Night; Trio Presents Program at Wheeler School.

One of the most famous examples of "program" music—Beethoven's sixth symphony, known as the "Pastoral"—comes to town tomorrow night for the first time in 40 years. At least, it will be the first time in that span that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has brought it here.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has selected the overture to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro" and the Brahms fourth symphony for the rest of the program. The concert, the fourth of the season's five, will be in Metropolitan Theatre.

The "Pastoral" has fallen into some disrepute in recent years, as being, perhaps, too obvious and too trivial, especially for the work of a master. However, this is by no means a general opinion, and there are still persons who brazenly assert that they like it better than a good many other things that assault the ears under the guise of mightier music. Beethoven put down his intentions in words as well as in notes on this occasion. The movements are labeled: "The awakening of serene feelings on arriving in the country," "By the brook," "A jolly gathering of country folk," (including a dandy thunderstorm), and "Gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm."

The melodious overture to "Figaro" ought to be one of the better things of the evening; it is a masterly employment of strings, and the orchestra has some of the best strings now employed anywhere.

Of Brahms's fourth and last symphony, in E minor, Philip Hale wrote: "The symphony has not the spic grandeur of the first, the geniality of the second, the wealth of varied beauty that distinguishes the third." Brahms himself was not certain whether he had done well or ill, but the fourth seems nowadays to have established itself firmly. Its movements are allegro non troppo, andante moderato, allegro giocoso, allegro energico e passionato. The last movement is especially interesting to students because it is in an unusual form. It is a passacaglia, an old dance form, of ground-bass-and-variations structure.

G. Y. L.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

FEB 19 1940

BARBIROLLI PLAYS SUITE BY POWELL

Bostonians Led by Finnish Guest—Heifetz, Soloist.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

An American novelty was yesterday afternoon's chief contribution to a week end of orchestral events, in the course of which a new conductor had been introduced on Saturday. The unfamiliar composition, John Powell's suite, "A Set of Three," achieved its first complete performance at the hands of John Barbirolli and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony. The new conductor, Tauno Hannikainen, made his bow with the Boston Symphony, sharing the Saturday ~~afternoon~~ program with Serge Koussevitzky. On Saturday evening Bruno Walter made his second appearance with the NBC Symphony, presenting a program of Handel, Mozart and Brahms.

There was Handel also on Mr. Barbirolli's Sunday program. It took the form of an Arietta and Passacaglia from an unspecified work or works, as transcribed for orchestra by Sir Hamilton Harty, and this was a first performance by the Philharmonic. The Arietta was charming in effect and the Passacaglia also well worth the playing, though the performance was one driven to hardness and blatancy by an excess of energy.

Mr. Powell's suite is made up of three pieces, "Snowbird on the Ashbank," "Green Willow" and "Haste to the Wedding," each based on folk melodies extant in Virginia. Mr. Powell has drawn generously on his traditional material, using as many as three tunes in a section, with a result that there is a super-abundance of ideas, as there is something of excess in the scoring. But both the ideas and the scoring have charm, and "Green Willow" achieves a really stirring climax. The performance was Mr. Barbirolli's best achievement in an afternoon that included also Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and Ravel's "Bolero."

Mr. Hannikainen made an admirable impression with the first symphony of Sibelius, though possibly the orchestra played a little less well for him than it had played in performances of this same work by Dr. Koussevitzky. There was one obvious bobble in the horns. But rhythmic figurations were sharply emphasized, melodies sang with spirit and freshness, the structure was clear and every bar carried conviction. The Finnish conductor, who is soon to celebrate his forty-fifth birthday and whose regular post is at Turku (Abo), displayed technical skill to match his enthusiasm.

Mr. Koussevitzky's part of the program consisted of the Bach-Respighi Passacaglia in C minor, which achieved a brilliant performance; and Prokofieff's second violin concerto, with the solo part in the virtuoso keeping of Jascha Heifetz. The concerto had been played here previously, but not with orchestra. It is a work of much ingenuity but little heart. The performance was a superlative one.

Conducting from the piano, Mr. Walter made delightful music of Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, in G minor. Mozart's "Haffner" symphony was exquisitely fashioned thereafter. The Brahms second symphony completed an evening of beautiful playing.

200

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

FEB 19 1940

MORNING GOSSIP

NO NIGHTINGALE
(From Kaleidograph)

No nightingale must ever sing
In these New England pines
Where open ledges are aflame
With scarlet columbines.

Our nature needs a calmer song
For evenings such as these,
When petal dew comes drifting down
From moonlit apple trees.

Our hermit thrush and whip-poor-will Respect the way we live—
But who could hear a nightingale
And stay conservative?
—Catharine A. Burnham.

A wholly exceptional feature of the memorable concert given by the Boston Symph[redacted]chestra, Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky conductor, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, writes Olin Downes in the New York Times, was the appearance as guest leader for the first time in this city of Tauno Hannikainen, who directed in that capacity the performance of the First Symphony of his countryman, Jean Sibelius.

Following performanecs by Dr. Koussevitzky of the Bach-Respighi organ Passacaglia and Fugue, and the New York premiere of Prokofieff's Second Violin Concerto, with Jascha Heifetz as soloist, the director appeared with Mr. Hannikainen on the stage. Dr. Koussevitzky remarked that while every one wished to aid Finland, his procedure was not based upon that consideration alone but the fact that Finland had great conductors as well as composers. Then Dr. Koussevitzky presented Mr. Hannikainen to the audience.

With the opening measures—the molding of the clarinet solo to the acme of expressiveness—Mr. Hannikainen showed his quality as a musician and impressed his audience by his heroic spirit and poise and control of the situation.

Mr. Hannikainen knew every note of his score and put all his young heart and his good musician's brain into it. He was not there to prove his prowess as a virtuoso; only to drive home the music. No detail of it was neglected by him, whether it were one of instrumental color or wildly dramatic utterance. The consuming emotion of the composer when he created the music was also the conductor's. The sense of heroic tragedy and the vibrations of the natural world were fused in his wholly comprehending conception, which had the sweep of the tempest.

At the same time there was the quality which is that of a thorough musician and a thoughtful artist, and, also, apparently, of the Finnish nature: that of balance, reserve power, and synthesis. No climax was so intense that it was disproportionate, or that the orchestra ran away with the leader. There was complete and unspoken control. When a headlong development reached its peak it was after long ascent and the irresistible accumulation of energy.

Mr. Hannikainen soon returns to Finland, where heroics are not confined to music, and musicians and even perfectly common men value principles and liberties and know how to die. This could be felt in the symphony he interpreted, and the spirit of his presentation. He was applauded and cheered for long moments when he finished.

These were dramatic moments of the afternoon, but not the only impressive ones. For Dr. Koussevitzky opened the concert with a masterly and mightily climaxed reading of the Bach Passacaglia, and he and Mr. Heifetz, the two masters that they are, for the benefit of Prokofieff's concerto.

That composer could hardly have hoped for a better showing. The concerto is undeniably a clever and ingenious composition, very adroitly scored both for orchestra and solo instrument. Whether it is more than that is to be determined by later hearings or by those more confident than this commentator is of the composition's intrinsic merits. Performer and concerto were well received by the audience.

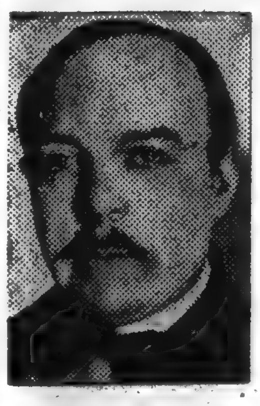
THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

FEB 19 1940

Orchestras Lead Week-End Music

By PITTS SANBORN.

Orchestras were much to the fore in the music of the week end. In Carnegie Hall on Saturday Rudolph Ganz conducted in the morning a concert in the Philharmonic-Symphony's Young People's Series; in the afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the officiating organizatio[redacted]terday afternoon the Philharmonic-Symphony appeared as usual. Of course, there was the regular Saturday night broadcast of the N. B. C. Symphony.



Pitts Sanborn.

The Town Hall was occupied on Saturday by Isaac Stern, violinist, in the afternoon and by Rose Book, soprano, in the evening. Yesterday the Primrose Quartet appeared there in the afternoon and the American Ballad Singers in the evening, framing between them the customary concert of the New Friends of Music.

The Metropolitan's Saturday operas were Die Walkuere for the matinee and Madama Butterfly at night.

Moniuszko's Halka was presented in the Mecca Temple last evening by the Polish-American Opera Company.

* * *

Boston Symphony Has Guest Conductor.

For the first time in the long history of the Boston Symphony's visits to Manhattan a guest conductor participated, being Tauno Hannikainen, the Finnish conductor who had directed the orchestra's concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Thursday.

In the first half of the program Serge Koussevitzky presided, the numbers being Respighi's orchestral transcription of Bach's organ Passacaglia in C minor and the first local performance with orchestra of Prokofieff's second violin concerto.

Then Mr. Koussevitzky turned to the house and presented Mr. Hannikainen, saying that his invitation to the Finnish musician to conduct was due not only to the general desire to aid Finland but to the fact that gifted conductors as well as great [redacted]rs are to be found in that country. Mr. Hannikainen proved his quality in a telling account of the First Symphony of Sibelius.

Prokofieff's clever and ingenious concerto naturally gains in effect when played with orchestra. Also to its advantage was the excelling art of Jascha Heifetz in the solo part.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 21 1940

Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra Brings Beethoven's "Pastoral" to Metropolitan Theatre and Pleases Audience with Peaceful Interlude in Troubled Times and Stormy Weather.

By G. Y. Loveridge

In a world full of international problems, third term rumors and slush, it was a pleasure to creep away into the homey confines of Metropolitan Theatre last night and listen to Beethoven telling how he went walking in the woods and fields about Vienna more than a century ago. The cannon were bellowing in those days, too, but the ugly little man was thinking of other things, and what he was thinking is still beautiful today. And useful.

It was Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra that brought us these tranquil moments for gloomy times. The recent oversupply of weather kept a number of seats empty, but there was a heartening turnout of the undaunted. Both the applause and the intermission cigarette smoke were produced in record quantities.

Dr. Koussevitzky opened the meeting with a spirited and wholly agreeable reading of the overture to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro." The splendid strings, seasoned with a bit of woodwind, brass and percussion, provided as tasty a musical hors d'oeuvre as could be desired. One regretted that there was hardly more than a bite of it.

On, then, to Beethoven's "Pastoral," his symphony No. 6, in F-major. Though this is regarded by many persons as one of the great man's lesser efforts, though its bird calls and its tempest in a tympanum are sneered at, there are those who still have an effection for it and who find it satisfying. Apparently there were few dissenters in last night's audience, for the applause was so sustained that Dr. Koussevitzky had to return a number of times, and finally to lift up the orchestra.

Brahm's Symphony

Peace and contentment were indeed the dominant moods of this work as unfolded by Dr. Koussevitzky. Possibly they were too dominant; the brook might have flowed a bit faster and no harm done, and more electricity in the thunderstorm would not have been amiss. But in all it was a vicarious excursion of the greatest charm and restfulness, no ants in the food, no sunburn, nothing but a lazy outing in the country, a summer day preserved in music against winter scarcity.

Brahms's Symphony No. 4, in E-minor, hewed from a rugged block of sound, was the rest of the program. Dr. Koussevitzky is always in there pitching, as the practitioners of a less elegant pursuit are wont to say; in this interpretation he focused all his physical and spiritual power. The sparse themes and severe outlines of the symphony took on compelling proportions and relationships, the orchestra, save for an attack or two that wasn't precisely joined, was superb, yielding tones of awesome mass and clarity; and the shading and moulding of the work were always significant.

We found ourself a trifle impervious to the last movement, but departed from the premises with a sense of having heard a masterful handling of a stubborn and lofty comp[illegible]ion.

Will Sing Sunday

De Bellis

Miss Dorothy Maynor

Negro soprano is to be guest soloist at the Boston Symphony Pension Fund Concert Sunday afternoon.

C.S.M. Feb 21 '40

How Negro Spirituals Are Sung

Negro spirituals have been so commercialized and misrepresented through unsympathetic interpretation that in many cases their real meaning has been lost, much to the distress of those who love these religious folk songs and think of them as spiritual messages, said Miss Dorothy Maynor, the young negro soprano "discovery" of Serge Koussevitzky, in an interview today.

Miss Maynor, who is in Boston to sing as guest soloist at the Boston Symphony Pension Fund concert at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, spoke with feeling on the subject of the spirituals.

"Unfortunately," she explained, "they are not solos. They are really for groups of voices, unaccompanied. I had to smile when I was preparing to sing a spiritual the other day," she went on, "to think of people wanting to put spirituals with viols, horns, and trumpets. They are poor even with a piano."

The Discovery

It is not as a singer of negro spirituals, however, that Miss Maynor has risen from obscurity to one of the musical discoveries of the year. Only last summer she was an unknown vocal student visiting the Berkshire Festival in Stockbridge, and then suddenly it came—the opportunity that all young singers hope for. Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave her an audition.

Since then things have happened so fast that Miss Maynor is still a little bewildered, hardly believing it all.

First, there was Mr. Koussevitzky's amazement and delight at the remarkable quality and range of this young soprano. A native Flagstad, he described her excitedly to his friends.

And the very next day, at his special invitation, she sang before one of the most critical musical audiences in the country. It was at the private picnic which Mr. and Mrs. Koussevitzky give each year to the members of the orchestra. And the famous conductor watching their faces knew that he was right. He had discovered a rare and beautiful voice.

Critics Enthusiastic

Word spread to the Berkshire Hills, and on to New York, so that by the time Miss Maynor made her concert debut in Town Hall in November, she was not a totally unknown singer. In fact, the house was sold out, and the enthusiasm of the New York critics was equal to, if not even more unrestrained than that of the little group which had first heard Miss Maynor at a private picnic in the Berkshires.

In grateful memory of this occasion, Miss Maynor's program at Symphony Hall on Sunday will include the same songs which she sang at that simple picnic in the green Berkshire Hills, the echoes of which have aroused the keen interest of the musical world.

It was a Boston woman, Miss Harriot Curtis, who first recognized the promise of this negro singer and made it possible for her to study voice for three years in New York under Wilfred Klamroth. Prior to that Miss Maynor was a pupil at the Westminster Choir School in Princeton, N. J., where she was studying to become a teacher of music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 21 1940

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Provides Kind Interlude in Stormy Weather

By G. Y. Loveridge

In a world full of international problems, third term rumors and slush, it was a pleasure to creep away into the homey confines of Metropolitan Theatre last night and listen to Beethoven telling how he went walking in the woods and fields about Vienna more than a century ago. The cannon were bellowing in those days, too, but the ugly little man was thinking of other things, and what he was thinking is still beautiful today. And useful.

It was Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symph[redacted]Orchestra that brought us these tranquil moments for gloomy times. The recent oversupply of weather kept a number of seats empty, but there was a heartening turnout of the undaunted. Both the applause and the intermission cigarette smoke were produced in record quantities.

Dr. Koussevitzky opened the meeting with a spirited and wholly agreeable reading of the overture to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro." The splendid strings, seasoned with a bit of woodwind, brass and percussion, provided as tasty a musical hors d'oeuvre as could be desired. One regretted that there was hardly more than a bite of it.

On, then, to Beethoven's "Pastoral," his symphony No. 6, in F-major. Though this is regarded by many persons as one of the great man's lesser efforts, though its bird calls and its tempest in a tympanum are sneered at, there are those who still have an effection for it and who find it satisfying. Apparently there were few dissenters in last night's audience, for the applause was so sustained that Dr. Koussevitzky had to return a number of times, and finally to lift up the orchestra.

Brahm's Symphony

Peace and contentment were indeed the dominant moods of this work as unfolded by Dr. Koussevitzky. Possibly they were too dominant; the brook might have flowed a bit faster and no harm done, and more electricity in the thunderstorm would not have been amiss. But in all it was a vicarious excursion of the greatest charm and restfulness, no ants in the food, no sunburn, nothing but a lazy outing in the country, a summer day preserved in music against winter scarcity.

Brahms's Symphony No. 4, in E-minor, hewed from a rugged block of sound, was the rest of the program. Dr. Koussevitzky is always in there pitching, as the practitioners of a less elegant pursuit are wont to say; in this interpretation he focused all his physical and spiritual power. The sparse themes and severe outlines of the symphony took on compelling proportions and relationships, the orchestra, save for an attack or two that wasn't precisely joined, was superb, yielding tones of awesome mass and clarity; and the shading and moulding of the work were always significant.

We found ourself a trifle impervious to the last movement, but departed from the premises with a sense of having heard a masterful handling of a stubborn and lofty composition.

20

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

FEB 22 1940

GRACE NOTES

When the Finnish guest conductor, Tauno Hannikainen, led the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Feb. ~~2, 3 in the~~ Sibelius First Symphony, he gave, naturally, a more rugged reading than Dr. Koussevitzky, who is the acclaimed exponent of Sibelius in America. At those concerts, there was on exhibit, in the first balcony foyer, a bowl of translucent sea-green Finnish glass of oddly irregular shape—its thick cross-section along the top inscribed as having been presented to Serge Koussevitzky by the Helsinki University Chorus in 1938, the year they sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra from their Kalevala myths set by Sibelius.

In a case nearby, were two letters in German written by the Finnish composer to Dr. Koussevitzky, paying tribute to the Boston conductor's interpretation of the Sibelius scores: "Alles war voll von Leben und Natur" (It was replete with life and nature), might be deciphered among other expressions of satisfaction and compliment.

Mr. Hannikainen gave a superb performance in the Beethoven Leonore No. 3 overture and revealed for the first time at these concerts "Lemminkainen's Homeward Journey" in the powerful imagry of the Kalevala and the on-driving music of Finland's epic symphonist. Hannikainen is only on leave to fill engagements entered into before the Russian invasion. Why can't Jesus Sanroma or some such daring spirit kidnap him for the duration of the war?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 25 1940

DOROTHY MAYNOR WINS PRIZE

By unanimous vote, Dorothy Maynor, Negro soprano, was selected as the winner for 1940 of the Town Hall Endowment Series Award by the Town Hall music committee, Walter W. Naumburg, chairman. The award is made each season to the artist under 30 years of age whom the New York music critics and the committee consider to have given the outstanding performance of the year at Town Hall, the critics cooperating by suggesting candidates for the honor.

Miss Maynor, who is the third recipient of the annual award, will thereby be granted an appearance in recital on the Town Hall Endowment Series next season. It happens that she is participating in this year's series as well, having been chosen to replace Georges Enesco, this Wednesday night, in consequence of the fact that the Rumanian violinist was forced to cancel his American tour due to ill health.

* * *

Until she sang at a picnic given by Serge Koussevitzky for his men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and their guests last August during the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Miss Maynor was unknown to the public. Her singing on that occasion and at her debut recital in Town Hall in November definitely established her as one of the most gifted vocalists of the younger generation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

FEB 23 1940

Finns Hope to Win, Says Wife of Maestro

Mrs. Hannikainen Expresses Gratitude for American Help. Tells of Women's Part in War.

By DOROTHY C. WALKER.

"Everyone in Finland has the feeling that we will win this war, but it is only a feeling. If we should lose we will die as a people."

So, in tones of disciplined anxiety, spoke Mrs. Tauno Hannikainen, wife of the noted Finnish conductor, who recently arrived with her husband to seek aid for her homeland.

She spoke with deep appreciation of America's aid. "Women the world over are sisters," she said, "and we women of Finland feel the sympathy of American women for us and are strengthened by it. We are very, very grateful for all you have done and are only sorry that at this time military help is more vital than moral aid."

Since every hand is needed in the besieged country now, Mrs. Hannikainen was reluctant to leave Finland. "I wanted to stay and help," she explained. "But my son—he is 21—said as he left to join the army: 'Mommy, you must go with father. You're his mascot, and you can best fight for us by going with him.'" With farewells spoken the Hannikainens began the trip to America.

"The most dangerous part of the journey," the conductor's wife said, "was getting out of Finland. Our home is in Turku, on the west coast—we don't know whether it's still standing, as the city has been bombed—and we had to travel at night over unfamiliar inlets and bays to get out. Going south, we crossed Germany and sailed from Italy for America. The crossing itself was safe."

* * *

Persuaded by Mrs. Hoover.

But even after she was in America and her husband's performance as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra had been [illegible] praised, Mrs. Hannikainen still felt that her place was in Finland. It was Mrs. Herbert Hoover who persuaded her otherwise.

"Mrs. Hoover reminded me that music is an international language," she said, "and that through it we could reach many hundreds of thousands of people."

Of the countrywomen she left behind Mrs. Hannikainen said: "They were the country's greatest help when this war began so suddenly. Because we are a small nation the women have to take their place beside their men in the trenches. They first did that 20 years ago, when Finland was fighting for her independence. At that time the Lotte Svard was organized, taking its name from an old poem in which a wife accompanies her husband to battle."

* * *

Defend Their Homeland.

"When that war was over," the conductor's wife continued, "the Lotte Svard was maintained. Through a strong sports program it grew until it numbered 200,000 women—all trained to defend their homeland if the need should arise. Today you will find Lotte Svards in front-line forts, managing hospitals, directing evacuation. They do everything a man does except carry a gun."

This willingness to aid in men's work doesn't mean that Finnish women don't care for their homes.

"The divorce rate is very low in my country," Mrs. Hannikainen pointed out. "We are devoted to our families, but we are also prepared to help our husbands, no matter what happens. It is only because we are deeply religious that we can face this invasion with calmness."

Mrs. Hannikainen, who is a dark, vivacious woman of middle years, doesn't know how long she'll be in America. "We will probably remain some time," she says simply. "It depends on my husband's work."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

FEB 24 1940

Serge Koussevitzky appeared for the Boston Symphony's evening concert in Carnegie Hall with neither a soloist nor a homemade arrangement. On this occasion, he devoted a rather long evening to French composers, beginning with the second symphony of Vincent d'Indy and calling it a night with the second suite of excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé," one of Mr. Koussevitzky's greatest interpretations. The d'Indy symphony, which ran nearly an hour (including an intermission for seating late-comers but nothing so inartistic as applause between movements) was solid and scholarly, and won more of an ovation than rarely heard solid and scholarly symphonies generally draw. The credit probably belongs largely to Mr. Koussevitzky and the tone of his orchestra.

The approach of the Metropolitan revival of Debussy's "Pelléas et Mélisande" lent timeliness to three passages from Gabriel Fauré's music for a stage production of the same drama that Debussy later set as an opera. The selections were well written, but nobody seemed to think Debussy's reputation as a "Pelléas" composer was in any danger.

The Symphony Concert

CSM
Feb 24

The Arts in Boston

A novelty, a modern work renewed, and a repertory item make up the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's sixteenth pair of concerts, the first of which was given in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The works listed are a Concerto for five solo instruments and string orchestra by Boris Koutzen; Hindemith's so-called symphony, "Mathis der Maler," and Beethoven's Sixth Symphony.

Mr. Kutzen is a Russian-American who is a member of the NBC Orchestra. His concerto, already analyzed in these columns, proved to be a pleasing work, well put together, superimposing an impressionistic harmonic scheme upon competent contrapuntal writing. The thematic material is agreeable and malleable, and there is an emotional intensity underlying the score. The work is wanting, however, in variety. The mood becomes a little monotonous. A livelier section is needed for contrast.

The Hindemith "symphony" was conducted yesterday by Dr. Koussevitzky for the first time. Its two previous hearings were under the baton of Richard Burgin, assistant conductor. Dr. Koussevitzky threw a new light upon the work, clarifying its structure. He also imbued it with a powerful dramatic quality which it had lacked before, for this hearer. It now turns out that there is a tremendous force in this score, especially in the first and the last movements, which we had not suspected.

This is not the first time we have been made to see the beauties of symphonic scores by listening to Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of them. That ability of his to clarify them and at the same time to imbue them with a profound emotional quality distinguishes him among conductors. In a day of uncertainty, in the arts as well as in politics, we are fortunate in having him to illuminate and to ignite for us the masterpieces of music.

L. A. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BENNINGTON, VT.
BANNER

FEB 24 1940

Negro Singer to Pay Back Favor

Boston, Feb. 24 (AP)—Turn about is fair play, so Dorothy Maynor, the negro soprano "discovered" by Boston Symphony conductor Serge Koussevitzky, will donate her services when the orchestra gives its annual pension fund concert on Sunday.

Miss Maynor, a public school music supervisor who won critical raves after her debut last winter, will sing several arias at the concert in appreciation for the interest the Boston musicians showed in her when she sang in an audition for Dr. Koussevitzky at the Berkshire symphonic festival last summer.

At that ime, she was hailed as "another Kirsten Flagstad." A native of Norfolk, Va., Miss Maynor discovered that unlike other singers who have awakened to find themselves famous, she never got to sleep at all after her debut.

"I was so nervous," she said, "that I couldn't go to bed until I had read the reviews."

THIS CLIPPING FROM ROANOKE, VA.
WORLD-NEWS

FEB 24 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM RUTLAND, VT.
HERALD

FEB 24 1940

SOLOIST WINS RARE OVATION

Dorothy Maynor at Pension Fund Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Enthusiasm such as is rarely heard at Symphony Hall marked the Boston debut there yesterday afternoon of Dorothy Maynor, soprano, the vocal find of the season, as soloist at a Boston Symphony pension fund concert. Ever since Dr. Koussevitzky first proclaimed the unusual excellence of Miss Maynor's voice, after a private audition at the Berkshires last August, we of Boston have heard and read frequent references to it. Happily we were not disappointed yesterday.

As disclosed in Handel's "Oh, Sleep, Why Dost Thou Leave Me?" from "Semele," Pamina's aria from "The Magic Flute," Elsa's Dream from "Lohengrin," and "Depuis le jour," from "Louise," Miss Maynor's voice is one of extraordinary purity and beauty and—within certain limits—of expressiveness as well. It cannot be denied that there was a lack of individuality, or rather of individualizing, in Miss Maynor's presentation of the music of Handel, Mozart, Wagner and Charpentier. The real impersonation, the dramatic coloring was carried out in Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestra which, as it seemed, had never before sounded so ravishingly. However, the combination of Miss Maynor, Dr. Koussevitzky and the band was irresistible and the ensuing ovation has already been mentioned.

Of itself, the orchestra was heard in Handel's B minor Concerto Grosso, Opus 6, No. 12, the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Second Symphony of Sibelius. Beyond most Wagner the "Lohengrin" Prelude is Dr. Koussevitzky's dish. Yesterday he was less conductor than conjuror, drawing from the orchestra a series of sounds each more radiant and effulgent than the last. A stirring performance of Sibelius' rather overworked Symphony was climax, or anti-climax, according to how each listener heard it.

Forthcoming Musical Events

TODAY—The annual pension fund concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will be given in Symphony Hall at 3:30 P. M. Dorothy Maynor, Negro soprano, will make her first public appearance in Boston at this concert. She will sing with the orchestra the following arias: O sleep why dost thou leave me? from Handel's "Semele"; Ach ich fuehl's from Mozart's "The Magic Flute"; Elsa's Dream from Wagners' "Lohengrin"; Depuis le jour from Charpentier's " Louise." The orchestra will play Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor for strings, the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and, for the last half of the program Sibelius' 2d Symphony in D major.

Jan Kiepura, tenor of the Metropolitan Opera, will give a concert for the benefit of Polish relief in Symphony Hall at 8:30 P. M. No program has been received in time for this column.

At the Gardner Museum, Fenway Court, at 2 P. M., Gladys Gleason, pianist, and Frances Brockman, violinist, will share a program.

At the Public Library lecture hall Marion Fisher Robertson, mezzo-soprano, will give a recital at 3:30 P. M.

NEW CONCERTO VERY PLEASING

Symphony Plays Koutzen's Composition

Feb 24, N Y Post

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A first announced, the programme of yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert listed a Concerto, new to Boston, for five solo instruments with string orchestra, by Boris Koutzen; Hindemith's so-called Symphony, "Mathis der Maler," hitherto conducted here only by Richard Burgin; and the Symphony of Taneiev, which Dr. Koussevitzky brought to its first Boston hearing a few seasons ago. Then out came Taneiev's Symphony and into its place went the "Pastoral" of Beethoven.

When the concert was heard the change proved to be a wise one. Unquestionably Beethoven's Symphony contrasted better with what had gone before, and it gave the audience at least one familiar number and one that has stood the test of time, even though some parts of it wear better than others. Whether "Mathis der Maler," speaking of the Symphony, not the opera from which it is taken, is a masterpiece, is not for us of today to say. We stand to close to it. As for Mr. Koutzen's Concerto, though pleasant and soothing, it is plainly of no great import.

A member of the N. B. C. orchestra, Mr. Koutzen came to this country from Russia in 1922 and joined the Philadelphia Symphony as violinist. As one who has had orchestral experience, he handles his instruments understandingly. He has also heard and remembered considerable music by others. At least the combination of solo flute, clarinet, bassoon, horn and 'cello with string orchestra is original. Brought to the stage by Dr. Koussevitzky after the performance, Mr. Koutzen was cordially received by the audience.

A devoted exponent of modern music, Dr. Koussevitzky is still not always its ideal interpreter. Sometimes, to the music's advantage, as with Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms," and sometimes to its disadvantage, as with 'Mathis der Maler" yesterday, he is prone to conduct such music warmly, romantically—or as warmly and romantically as he may—rather than with the cool detachment, aloofness and impersonality that are supposedly its characteristic voice. It is easy to find an affinity between the music of Hindemith and the tryptich of Matthias Gruenewald that inspired it. In yesterday's performance there was more suggestion of the Italian painters who were the German's contemporaries.

The "Pastoral" was another story. All that can be done to reanimate the more tedious portions of this Symphony Dr. Koussevitzky does. He discreetly speeds up the music of the Brook, that like Tennyson's goes on forever, and he makes the sound of the orchestra gladden our ears, as in the last movement, when the music itself offers little of interest. And as played yesterday, the Storm seemed more than ever a remarkable orchestral achievement for the year 1808.

20

[illegible] CLIPPING FROM
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

FEB 22 1940

GRACE NOTES

When the Finnish guest conductor, Tauno Hannikainen, led the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Feb. [illegible] in the Sibelius First Symphony, he gave, naturally, a more rugged reading than Dr. Koussevitzky, who is the acclaimed exponent of Sibelius in America. At those concerts there was on exhibit, in the first balcony foyer, a bowl of translucent sea-green Finnish glass of oddly irregular shape—its thick cross-section along the top inscribed as having been presented to Serge Koussevitzky by the Helsinki University Chorus in 1938, the year they sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra from their Kalevala myths set by Sibelius.

In a case nearby, were two letters in German written by the Finnish composer to Dr. Koussevitzky, paying tribute to the Boston conductor's interpretation of the Sibelius scores: "Alles war voll von Leben und Natur" (It was replete with life and nature), might be deciphered among other expressions of satisfaction and compliment.

Mr. Hannikainen gave a superb performance in the Beethoven Leonore No. 3 overture and revealed for the first time at these concerts "Lemminkainen's Homeward Journey" in the powerful imagry of the Kalevala and the on-driving music of Finland's epic symphonist. Hannikainen is only on leave to fill engagements entered into before the Russian invasion. Why can't Jesus Sanroma or some such daring spirit kidnap him for the duration of the war?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 25 1940

DOROTHY MAYNOR WINS PRIZE

By unanimous vote, Dorothy Maynor, Negro soprano, was selected as the winner for 1940 of the Town Hall Endowment Series Award by the Town Hall music committee, Walter W. Naumburg, chairman. The award is made each season to the artist under 30 years of age whom the New York music critics and the committee consider to have given the outstanding performance of the year at Town Hall, the critics cooperating by suggesting candidates for the honor.

Miss Maynor, who is the third winner of the annual award, will be granted an appearance [illegible] on the Town Hall Endowment Series next season. It happens that she is participating in this year's series as well, having been chosen to replace Georges Enesco this Wednesday night, in consequence of the fact that the Rumanian violinist was forced to cancel his American tour due to ill health.

* * *

Until she sang at a picnic given by Serge Koussevitzky for his men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and their guests last August during the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Miss Maynor was unknown [illegible]. Her singing on that [illegible] and at her debut recital [illegible] Hall in November definitely established her as one of the most gifted vocalists of the younger generation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
FEB 23 1940

Finns Hope to Win, Says Wife of Maestro

Mrs. Hannikainen Expresses Gratitude for American Help. Tells of Women's Part in War.

By DOROTHY C. WALKER.

"Everyone in Finland has the feeling that we will win this war, but it is only a feeling. If we should lose we will die as a people."

So, in tones of disciplined anxiety, spoke Mrs. Tauno Hannikainen, wife of the noted Finnish conductor, who recently arrived with her husband to seek aid for her homeland.

She spoke with deep appreciation of America's aid. "Women the world over are sisters," she said, "and we women of Finland feel the sympathy of American women for us and are strengthened by it. We are very, very grateful for all you have done and are only sorry that at this time military help is more vital than moral aid."

Since every hand is needed in the besieged country now, Mrs. Hannikainen was reluctant to leave Finland. "I wanted to stay and help," she explained. "But my son—he is 21—said as he left to join the army: 'Mommy, you must go with father. You're his mascot, and you can best fight for us by going with him.'" With farewells spoken the Hannikainens began the trip to America.

"The most dangerous part of the journey," the conductor's wife said, "was getting out of Finland. Our home is in Turku, on the west coast—we don't know whether it's still standing, as the city has been bombed—and we had to travel at night over unfamiliar inlets and bays to get out. Going south, we crossed Germany and sailed from Italy for America. The crossing itself was safe."

* * *

Persuaded by Mrs. Hoover.

But even after she was in America and her husband's performance as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra had been [illegible] praised, Mrs. Hannikainen still felt that her place was in Finland. It was Mrs. Herbert Hoover who persuaded her otherwise.

"Mrs. Hoover reminded me that music is an international language," she said, "and that through it we could reach many hundreds of thousands of people."

Of the countrywomen she left behind Mrs. Hannikainen said: "They were the country's greatest help when this war began so suddenly. Because we are a small nation the women have to take their place beside their men in the trenches. They first did that 20 years ago, when Finland was fighting for her independence. At that time the Lotte Svard was organized, taking its name from an old poem in which a wife accompanies her husband to battle."

* * *

Defend Their Homeland.

"When that war was over," the conductor's wife continued, "the Lotte Svard was maintained. Through a strong sports program it grew until it numbered 200,000 women—all trained to defend their homeland if the need should arise. Today you will find Lotte Svards in front-line forts, managing hospitals, directing evacuation. They do everything a man does except carry a gun."

This willingness to aid in men's work doesn't mean that Finnish women don't care for their homes.

"The divorce rate is very low in my country," Mrs. Hannikainen pointed out. "We are devoted to our families, but we are also prepared to help our husbands, no matter what happens. It is only because we are deeply religious that we can face this invasion with calmness."

Mrs. Hannikainen, who is a dark, vivacious woman of middle years, doesn't know how long she'll be in America. "We will probably remain some time," she says simply. "It depends on my husband's work."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

FEB 24 1940

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY appeared for the Boston Symphony's evening concert in Carnegie Hall with neither a soloist nor a homemade arrangement. On this occasion, he devoted a rather long evening to French composers, beginning with the second symphony of Vincent d'Indy and calling it a night with the second suite of excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé," one of Mr. Koussevitzky's greatest interpretations. The d'Indy symphony, which ran nearly an hour (including an intermission for seating late-comers but nothing so inartistic as applause between movements) was solid and scholarly, and won more of an ovation than rarely heard solid and scholarly symphonies generally draw. The credit probably belongs largely to Mr. Koussevitzky and the tone of his orchestra.

The approach of the Metropolitan revival of Debussy's "Pelléas et Mélisande" lent timeliness to three passages from Gabriel Fauré's music for a stage production of the same drama that Debussy later set as an opera. The selections were well written, but nobody seemed to think Debussy's reputation as a "Pelléas" composer was in any danger.

Forthcoming Musical Events

TODAY—The annual pension fund concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will be given in Symphony Hall at 3:30 P. M. Dorothy Maynor, Negro soprano, will make her first public appearance in Boston at this concert. She will sing with the orchestra the following arias: O sleep why dost thou leave me? from Handel's "Semele"; Ach ich fuehl's from Mozart's "The Magic Flute"; Elsa's Dream from Wagners' "Lohengrin"; Depuis le jour from Charpentier's "Louise." The orchestra will play Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor for strings, the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and, for the last half of the program Sibelius' 2d Symphony in D major.

Jan Kiepura, tenor of the Metropolitan Opera, will give a concert for the benefit of Polish relief in Symphony Hall at 8:30 P. M. No program has been received in time for this column.

At the Gardner Museum, Fenway Court, at 2 P. M., Gladys Gleason, pianist, and Frances Brockman, violinist, will share a program.

At the Public Library lecture hall Marion Fisher Robertson, mezzo-soprano, will give a recital at 3:30 P. M.

CSM, Feb 24

The Symphony Concert

The Arts in Boston

A novelty, a modern work renewed, and a repertory item make up the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's sixteenth pair of concerts, the first of which was given in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The works listed are a Concerto for five solo instruments and string orchestra by Boris Koutzen; Hindemith's so-called symphony, "Mathis der Maler," and Beethoven's Sixth Symphony.

Mr. Kutzen is a Russian-American who is a member of the NBC Orchestra. His concerto, already analyzed in these columns, proved to be a pleasing work, well put together, superimposing an impressionistic harmonic scheme upon competent contrapuntal writing. The thematic material is agreeable and malleable, and there is an emotional intensity underlying the score. The work is wanting, however, in variety. The mood becomes a little monotonous. A livelier section is needed for contrast.

The Hindemith "symphony" was conducted yesterday by Dr. Koussevitzky for the first time. Its two previous hearings were under the baton of Richard Burgin, assistant conductor. Dr. Koussevitzky threw a new light upon the work, clarifying its structure. He also imbued it with a powerful dramatic quality which it had lacked before, for this hearer. It now turns out that there is a tremendous force in this score, especially in the first and the last movements, which we had not suspected.

This is not the first time we have been made to see the beauties of symphonic scores by listening to Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of them. That ability of his to clarify them and at the same time to imbue them with a profound emotional quality distinguishes him among conductors. In a day of uncertainty, in the arts as well as in politics, we are fortunate in having him to illuminate and to ignite for us the masterpieces of music.

L. A. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BENNINGTON, VT.
BANNER

FEB 24 1940

Negro Singer to Pay Back Favor

Boston, Feb. 24 (AP)—Turn about is fair play, so Dorothy Maynor, the negro soprano "discovered" by Boston Symphony conductor Serge Koussevitzky, will donate her services when the orchestra gives its annual pension fund concert on Sunday.

Miss Maynor, a public school music supervisor who won critical raves after her debut last winter, will sing several arias at the concert in appreciation for the interest the Boston musicians showed in her when she sang in an audition for Dr. Koussevitzky at the Berkshire symphonic festival last summer.

At that ime, she was hailed as "another Kirsten Flagstad." A native of Norfolk, Va., Miss Maynor discovered that unlike other singers who have awakened to find themselves famous, she never got to sleep at all after her debut.

"I was so nervous," she said, "that I couldn't go to bed until I had read the reviews."

THIS CLIPPING FROM ROANOKE, VA.
WORLD-NEWS

FEB 24 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM RUTLAND, VT.
HERALD

FEB 24 1940

SOLOIST WINS RARE OVATION

Dorothy Maynor at Pension Fund Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Enthusiasm such as is rarely heard at Symphony Hall marked the Boston debut there yesterday afternoon of Dorothy Maynor, soprano, the vocal find of the season, as soloist at a Boston Symphony pension fund concert. Ever since Dr. Koussevitzky first proclaimed the unusual excellence of Miss Maynor's voice, after a private audition at the Berkshires last August, we of Boston have heard and read frequent references to it. Happily we were not disappointed yesterday.

As disclosed in Handel's "Oh, Sleep, Why Dost Thou Leave Me?" from "Semele," Pamina's aria from "The Magic Flute," Elsa's Dream from "Lohengrin," and "Depuis le jour," from "Louise," Miss Maynor's voice is one of extraordinary purity and beauty and—within certain limits—of expressiveness as well. It cannot be denied that there was a lack of individuality, or rather of individualizing, in Miss Maynor's presentation of the music of Handel, Mozart, Wagner and Charpentier. The real impersonation, the dramatic coloring was carried out in Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestra which, as it seemed, had never before sounded so ravishingly. However, the combination of Miss Maynor, Dr. Koussevitzky and the band was irresistible and the ensuing ovation has already been mentioned.

Of itself, the orchestra was heard in Handel's B minor Concerto Grosso, Opus 6, No. 12, the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Second Symphony of Sibelius. Beyond most Wagner the "Lohengrin" Prelude is Dr. Koussevitzky's dish. Yesterday he was less conductor than conjuror, drawing from the orchestra a series of sounds each more radiant and effulgent than the last. A stirring performance of Sibelius' rather overworked Symphony was climax, or anti-climax, according to how each listener heard it.

NEW CONCERTO VERY PLEASING

Symphony Plays Koutzen's Composition

Feb 24. N Y Post

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A first announced, the programme of yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert listed a Concerto, new to Boston, for five solo instruments with string orchestra, by Boris Koutzen; Hindemith's so-called Symphony, "Mathis der Maler," hitherto conducted here only by Richard Burgin; and the Symphony of Taneiev, which Dr. Koussevitzky brought to its first Boston hearing a few seasons ago. Then out came Taneiev's Symphony and into its place went the "Pastoral" of Beethoven.

When the concert was heard the change proved to be a wise one. Unquestionably Beethoven's Symphony contrasted better with what had gone before, and it gave the audience at least one familiar number and one that has stood the test of time, even though some parts of it wear better than others. Whether "Mathis der Maler," speaking of the Symphony, not the opera from which it is taken, is a masterpiece, is not for us of today to say. We stand to close to it. As for Mr. Koutzen's Concerto, though pleasant and soothing, it is plainly of no great import.

A member of the N. B. C. orchestra, Mr. Koutzen came to this country from Russia in 1922 and joined the Philadelphia Symphony as violinist. As one who has had orchestral experience, he handles his instruments understandingly. He has also heard and remembered considerable music by others. At least the combination of solo flute, clarinet, bassoon, horn and 'cello with string orchestra is original. Brought to the stage by Dr. Koussevitzky after the performance, Mr. Koutzen was cordially received by the audience.

A devoted exponent of modern music, Dr. Koussevitzky is still not always its ideal interpreter. Sometimes, to the music's advantage, as with Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms," and sometimes to [illegible] "Mathis der Maler," [illegible] duct such music warmly, romantically—or as warmly and romantically as he may—rather than with the cool detachment, aloofness and impersonality that are supposedly its characteristic voice. It is easy to find an affinity between the music of Hindemith and the tryptich of Matthias Gruenewald that inspired it. In yesterday's performance there was more suggestion of the Italian painters who were the German's contemporaries.

The "Pastoral" was another story. All that can be done to reanimate the more tedious portions of this Symphony Dr. Koussevitzky does. He discreetly speeds up the music of the Brook, that like Tennyson's goes on forever, and he makes the sound of the orchestra gladden our ears, as in the last movement, when the music itself offers little of interest. And as played yesterday, the [illegible] seemed more than ever a [illegible] orchestral achievement for [illegible]

202

TO AID PENSION FUND

Feb 25 Post

Miss Dorothy Maynor, young soprano, who has won national acclaim since she was discovered last summer by Serge Koussevitzky. She is to sing today at Symphony Hall for the benefit of the Symphony Orchestra pension fund.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Koussevitzky Directs Performance Of Hindemith's 'Mathis der Maler'

A stirring performance of Hindemith's symphony, "Mathis der Maler," from his powerful opera of the same name, was the climax of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. This was the first time that Dr. Koussevitzky had directed this Hindemith work here, though it was first performed by the Boston Symphony several years ago under the direction of our versatile concertmaster, Mr. Burgin. The second half of yesterday's program was taken up with Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, and it opened with the first performance in Boston of a Concerto for Five Solo Instruments and String Orchestra by Boris Kouzen.

Mr. Kouzen, though born in Russia, is now an American citizen and a member of the NBC Symphony Orchestra in New York. His works have been played by major orchestral organizations of this country, the concerto heard yesterday having been first performed by the National Orchestral Association of New York in March, 1935.

The solo instruments are flute, clarinet, bassoon, horn and cello. But with the exception of the cello, they do not stand out saliently above the orchestra and when they play the general effect is simply that of an orchestra with limited wind contingent. When they do not play one is reminded again, if that were necessary, of the magnificent quality of the Boston Symphony strings, the clarity and glow of their tone.

As handicraft, Mr. Kouzen's Concerto is an excellent piece of work, smooth and effective. As music this reporter did not find it overly exciting, though in the finale at least a definite mood was established. Perhaps this work would have seemed more significant, had it not made its appearance on the program beside a work of such colossal invention, depth of emotion and technical bravoura as the Hindemith Symphony. At any rate Mr. Kouzen was on hand to acknowledge the applause of the audience.

A Contemporary of Duerer

Little is known of the life of Matthias Gruenewald, one of the greatest of all German painters, who has left us a mere handful of pictures, but he has been a frequent source of inspiration to musicians and writers. He seems to have excited both facets of Hindemith's personality, for Hindemith is the author of the libretto as well as the music of "Mathis der Maler." Hindemith commands, by the way, a pregnant, forceful literary style, and his libretto is of high artistic worth.

As in Gruenewald's works today, so probably in Gruenewald's own life his gigantic Isenheim Altar played a dominent role. In Hindemith's opera, it acquires even a symbolic significance, the Temptation of St. Anthony representing in reality the temptation of Mathis to desert his art for other, illusory fields of activity. The three movements of the Symphony correspond to three of the finest panels of the Isenheim Altar: "Angelic Concert," "Entombment," and "Temptation of St. Anthony." The three symphonic episodes are all extracted from the score of the opera.

The Hindemith of "Mathis der Maler" (1934) is not the musical enfant terrible of yore. He had sowed his artistic wild oats in an earlier period of near-atonalism and sensational radicalism. What remained was a quickened sense of harmonic values, and an intensely emotional basis for his music. Or so it seemed yesterday, for "Mathis" is of exalted feeling both in contemplation and in action. There is, no question of the composer's ability to express clearly and forcefully whatever his mind and emotions prompt, and thus with this symphony one has the feeling of listening to a classic work.

The "Angelic Concert" has much of the austere grace and fantasy that shows in the corresponding panel of the Isenheim Altar. The "Entombment" has a noble mysticism, but the "Temptation of St. Anthony" is music of violent emotion, struggle, and confusion—all leading to the final triumphant of clarity. Among it vivid moments are the boldly sculptured line of the opening bars, the fierce clash of opposing forces, a fugato and the final exultant brass chorale. Hindemith used old church melodies and technical devices we need not discuss here. At least one listener yesterday felt himself in the presence of an authentic masterpiece.

After this adventurous music, Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony seemed comfortably familiar. It was played with superb sympathy and understanding by Dr. Koussevitzky and his men.

The next concert to this series which takes place on Friday afternoon, March 1, lists Mahler's Fifth Symphony and Szymanowski's Symphonie Concertante for Piano and Orchestra, with Jan Smeterlin as soloist, E. D.

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 16th regular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Koutzen
Concerto for five solo instruments and string orchestra
Hindemith. Symphony, "Mathis der Maler"
Beethoven
Symphony No. 6 in F major Op 68, "Pastorale"

The most interesting feature of this concert was the magnificent interpretation of Hindemith's Symphony. After Mr. Koussevitzky's clear and vital reading of it, there ought not to exist any doubt in the minds of a critical listener of the music's merits and quality. If asked to cast a vote, we should unhesitatingly say that the "Mathis der Maler" symphony is a masterpiece. It may not be your kind of masterpiece, but it would be specious reasoning to try to suggest that the mind that conceived it and the hand that wrote it down were not those of a master of his craft.

The sharpest complaints about Hindemith's music by those who don't like it are usually couched in such phrases as "a sewing machine of dissonant counterpoint," "mechanical skullduggery," "little that strayed from the cerebral and the adroit." "Cerebral" is a favorite club with many critics, and it is based on the fallacy that you can exercise your imagination without thinking.

Certainly this symphony is the work of a highly ingenious and learned brain. But it is decidedly unfair to argue that the music was manufactured without a spark of inspiration. How anyone can listen to the marvelous interplay of themes in the first movement, the starkness and simplicity of the "Entombment" and the contrast of ferocity and tranquility in the finale without being emotionally stirred is beyond us. The matter itself is striking as well as the skill with which it was got down on paper. This is not merely what the Germans call "Augenmusik."

The odd thing about the "Mathis der Maler" symphony is that one does not readily understand how it fits into or comes out of an opera. It is such a complete work of art as a symphony. The question, perhaps, should not concern us too deeply, since, under present operatic conditions in this country, it is highly unlikely that we shall ever see it mounted on the stage. We may be satisfied that we can listen to it as one of the most remarkable modern scores for orchestra.

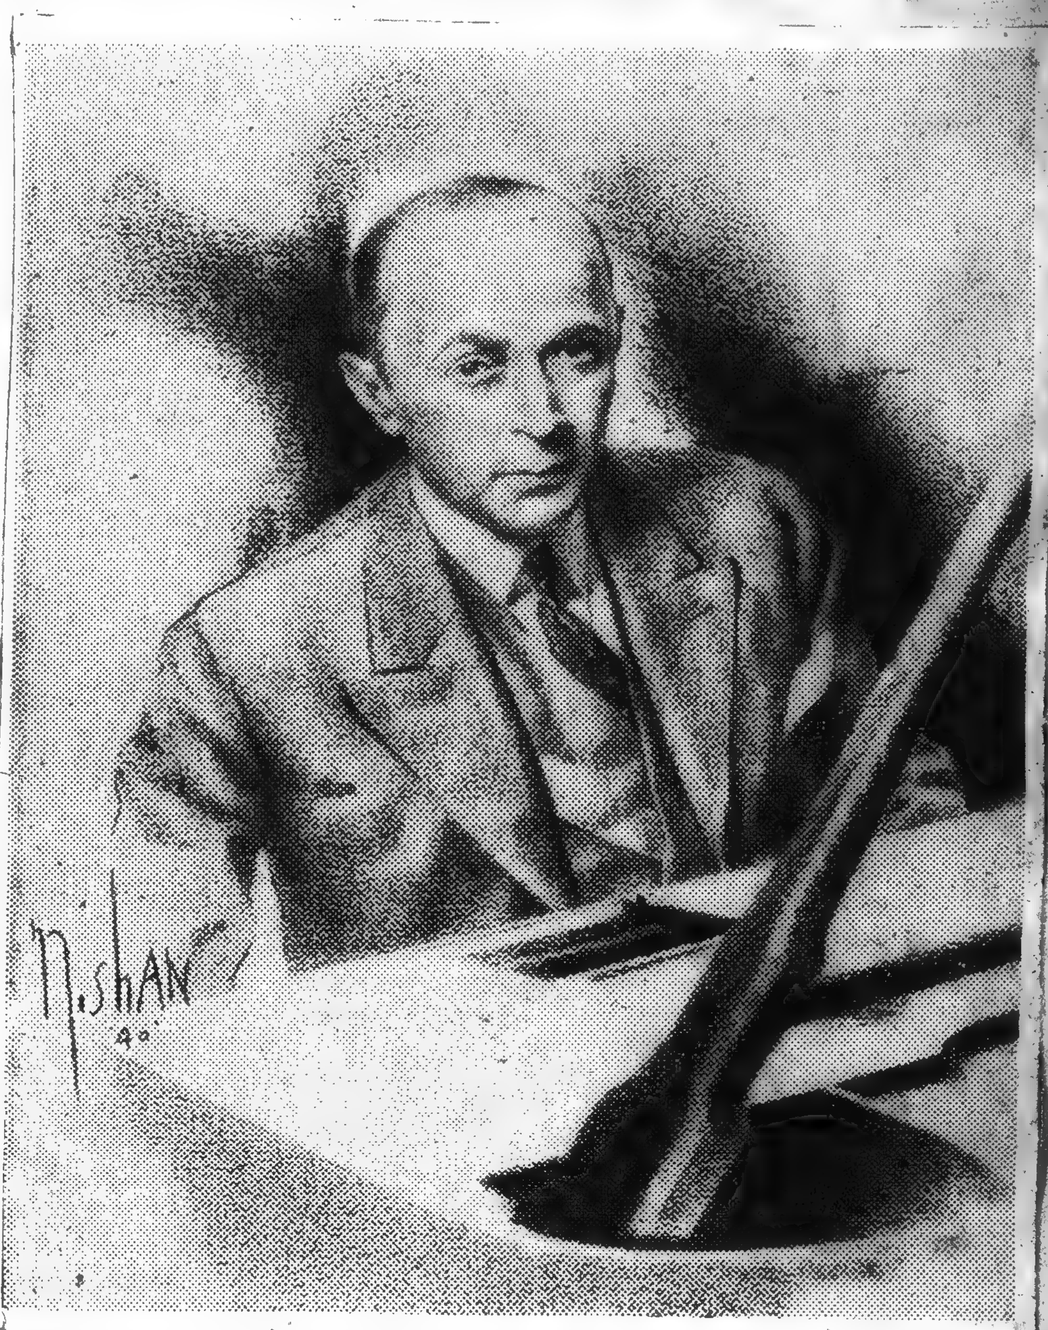
As we have said, the performance was extraordinary. It was not without one or two entrance troubles, but these did not in the least mar the effect of the whole. It was a great triumph for Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretative skill.

Unhappily, by comparison Mr. Boris Koutzen's concerto for five solo instruments and string orchestra seems rather dim. Why he called it a concerto is certainly confusing. It is not modeled on the 18th century concerto grosso nor on the virtuoso's concerto nor on the "symphonie concertante." It really should be called only by its subtitle "Recitativo, Passacaglia and Finale." The cello, to be sure, has some prominence, but the other instruments are just voices in the ensemble, whereas a concerto implies some idea of contrast.

As a straight orchestral piece Mr. Koutzen's music has much to recommend it, particularly in the fine writing for strings. The main difficulty, not to put too fine a point upon it, is that the music is dull. It can be admired, but without the warming thought that one would like to hear it again. Mr. Koutzen came forward to acknowledge the applause.

At first glance it might be conjectured that Beethoven's Pastoral symphony was not an ideal choice to follow the Hindemith, but actually its soothing melodies and unsophisticated charm were just the thing at this point. The performance was smooth as silk, and the audience visibly relaxed in this congenial atmosphere.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Jan Smeterlin will be soloist in Szymanowski's Symphonie concertante for piano and orchestra, and Mr. Koussevitzky will lead Mahler's 5th Symphony.



Jan Smeterlin, famous Polish pianist, who will be the soloist this week at the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall. He will play in Szymanowski's "Symphonic Concertante."

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The music of Boris Koutzen, 38, a naturalized Russian now living in New York, was for the first time represented on a program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. Mr. Koutzen's piece is a concerto for five solo instruments—cello, bassoon, horn, clarinet and flute—and strings. It was followed by the "symphony" of three orchestral excerpts from Hindemith's opera "Mathis der Maler" ("Matthias the Painter"), and the "Pastoral" Symphony of Beethoven. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

So unobtrusive is Mr. Koutzen's Concerto that it invites quick judgment as pleasant but inconsequential. Unlike much modern music, which generally makes a strong impression, favorable or otherwise, the first time you hear it, the Concerto is reticent to the point of being rather baffling. The three sections, recitativo, passacaglia and finale, are not only bound together, but they are all of a piece melodically, rhythmically, in harmony and dynamic emphasis. They run along on an unvaried level of expression until at the end one is aware only of having listened to an agreeable but monotonous tissue of sound.

It is hardly necessary to add that the harmonic style is conservative for these times. The recitativo, to be sure, starts off promisingly with its lyrical cello solo, but that promise is not fulfilled, and the passacaglia, potentially one of the most distinctive forms, is hardly recognizable as such. The composer bowed from the stage after the performance.

Mr. Koussevitzky had never conducted "Mathis der Maler" before (Richard Burgin introduced it here in 1934 and repeated it two seasons later). With the memory of this vigorous, imaginative score and of Mr. Burgin's forthright interpretation in mind, one had looked forward to an interesting comparison of readings.

As usual with Mr. Koussevitzky, one was not disappointed. He treats "Mathis der Maler" in his own way, giving it much contrast of tempo, emphasizing color and as much emotional feeling as can be extracted. Where Mr. Burgin's reading was powerful but plain, Mr. Koussevitzky inclines to sophistication, producing a sense of complexity. There is, of course, a good deal to be said on both sides. Considering the temper of the music, and the inspiration behind the score (Matthias Gruenewald's three 16th century religious paintings in the museum at Colmar, Alsace) one favors Mr. Burgin's treatment.

Apart from two or three loose ends during "Mathis der Maler," the orchestra was, with Hindemith as well as with the "Pastoral" Symphony that followed, a fabulous instrument of magnificent technic and gorgeous tone.

Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting of the Symphony was long since familiar to Bostonians. The performance yesterday was no departure from his personal, dramatizing interpretation, one of many nuances, let well within the scope of the right style for Beethoven.

The program will be repeated tonight at 8:15. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky will present Mahler's Fifth Symphony and, for the first times in Boston, the Symphonie Concertante by Karol Szymanowski with Jan Smeterlin as piano soloist.

C. W. D.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

FEB 25 1940

Boston Men Will Play New Prokoffieff Work

The latest work of the Russian modernist composer, Serge Prokofieff, will be introduced to this country on Mar. 21 and 23 by the Boston symphony under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

It is Prokofieff's cello concerto in E minor, Opus 58. The soloist will be Gregor Piatagorsky, who is regarded by Koussevitzky as one of the greatest cellists of the day.

New York heard its first performance of the Prokofieff second violin concerto on Feb. 16, when the Boston symphony made its third visit of the season to Carnegie hall. The soloist was Jascha Heifetz.

The second violin concerto was given its first performance in this country by the Boston symphony and Heifetz two seasons ago.

Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" was first heard in Milwaukee Feb. 19 being played by the Chicago orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAYTON, OHIO
JOURNAL

FEB 25 1940

Prokofieff Work To Be Introduced

The latest work of the Russian modernist composer, Serge Prokofieff, will be introduced to this country, March 21 and 23, by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

It is Prokofieff's 'cello concerto in E minor, Opus 58. The soloist will be Gregor Piatagorsky, who is regarded by Koussevitzky as one of the greatest 'cellists of the day.

203

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, MONDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1940

Dorothy Maynor With Symphony Orchestra-

Rising Singer Is Heard At Pension Fund Concert

By L. A. Sloper

Dorothy Maynor, the new-found soprano, conquered a large audience in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. As soloist at a Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, she won in fact an ovation. At the close of her part of the program, she was recalled many times and the handclapping was reinforced with cheers and stamping of feet.

This, her first public appearance in Boston, had been heralded by exceptionally favorable reports Dr. Koussevitzky himself had "discovered" her voice and had enlisted the aid of patrons of music for its development. Under his auspices, in effect, the singer appeared yesterday, and the two artists shared the honors of the occasion.

The program was well arranged to display the range of her abilities. Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor for string orchestra, which opened the proceedings, prepared the way for the aria, "Oh Sleep, why dost thou leave me?" from the same composer's "Semele," which was followed by the aria, "Ach, ich fühl's," from Mozart's "Magic Flute." Then the Prelude to "Lohengrin" introduced "Elsa's Dream." The air, "Depuis le jour," from Charpentier's "Louise," was the singer's final number. For orchestral finale, the program listed the Second Symphony of Sibelius.

* * *

Miss Maynor, though evidently not completely at ease, gave a performance that undoubtedly encouraged the hopes of her sponsors for her. So far as the audience was concerned, her very lack of assurance won sympathy, probably because it appeared to manifest modesty and humility in face of all this acclaim. She seemed to be saying, with Synge's Playboy, "Is it me?"

As to the voice, Dr. Koussevitzky's ear did not deceive him. It is of exceptional purity, clarity, and sweetness. Intonation was accurate, although high notes were not always hit square in the center. By the testimony of yesterday's performance, it is not a big voice. It does not soar easily above the full orchestra. Judging from the selections, it may be that Miss Maynor's friends expect her eventually to go on the lyric stage. Her voice would hardly fill an opera house, with the volume it achieved yesterday.

It is possible that the singer was holding herself in a little, concentrating upon the technical problems confronting her. There were moments in the aria from "Louise" when her high notes came out with greater volume than before. But in those moments the voice also took on a slight edge. It is possible that with the greater assurance that should come of further study she may achieve not only greater power but a bigger and more rounded tone.

Miss Maynor was at her best in Louise's air. No doubt her warm reception had helped her to greater composure. No doubt, also, the romantic lyricism of Charpentier proved easier for her than the musical exactions of Handel and Mozart or the dramatic requirements of Wagner.

* * *

It seems unlikely that Miss Maynor will become a Wagnerian soprano. As for the classical style, she has not yet penetrated to its musical secrets; that may come. But she has a natural lyric voice of great beauty which is capable now of giving much pleasure. As she grows, she will no doubt attain to a smoother phrasing, a more certain feeling for rhythm, and above all a more profound musical perception. She will perhaps, too, discover in herself and be able to release a greater depth of emotion. As an interpreter, she has much to learn.

The orchestra did some superb playing, especially in the Handel number. Since Dr. Koussevitzky was at the top of his form, the symphony, which I did not hear, presumably made its customary success.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Sanromá-Burgin-Bedetti Trio

They will play Tuesday evening in Jordan Hall in the final concert of Aaron Richmond's Chamber Music Series. Richard Burgin, Jean Bedetti, and Jesús María Sanromá are shown, in the usual order.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 25 1940

Paul Hindemith has been engaged as visiting lecturer by Buffalo University, Cornell University and Wells College for their second terms. As already announced, he will head the advanced composition department at the Berkshire Academy during July and August. His new violin concerto will receive its première by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under ~~Dr.~~ Serge Koussevitzky, with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's concertmaster as soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

FEB 25 1940

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

The Fifth Symphony of Mahler, in C minor, and the "Symphonie Concertante" of Szymanowski, with Jan Smeterlin as soloist, will comprise the next programme for the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra to be given in Symphony hall on March 1 and 2. The "Symphonie Concertante" is the only work for Piano and Orchestra which was left by the Polish composer on his death in 1937. Although the composer appeared as soloist in this work in European cities, Mr. Smeterlin, his compatriot and a close friend, also appeared in performances of it in Europe. The piece will have its first Boston hearing at the concerts of next week. Mahler's Fifth Symphony, sometimes called the "giant" symphony, was revived by Serge Koussevitzky and repeated in the season of 1937-38.

Transcript Feb 26th

MUSIC

Pension Fund Concert

Dorothy Maynor, Negro Soprano, Discloses One of the Greatest Voices of the Day

By EDWARD DOWNES

At last Dorothy Maynor has made her Boston debut. As guest artist at the Pension Fund Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon she loosed such a storm of friendly emotions and such wild enthusiasm as staid Symphony Hall is seldom privileged to hear. There were many factors contributing to the demonstration.

Boston had waited long for her debut. She had begun widely to be talked about after her singing at a picnic of the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood last summer. There followed, some months ago her appearance at a meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony, a public debut in New York's Town Hall, at which she was acclaimed as one of the great voices of the day, an appearance as soloist with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society. Finally, yesterday afternoon, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, who had done so much to launch her career, she made her first public appearance in Boston.

Her disarmingly friendly manner, her patent sincerity, her naive joy in the music and in being able to sing it so affectingly and a modesty of demeanor as great as it is rare, are among the qualities which at once won her audience's heart.

That she is a musician of astonishingly secure instinct as well as high intellectual achievement, was evident in every phrase she sang. Just as important, her singing has a direct emotional appeal and warmth that are given to few. Add to this one of the most sensitively brilliant voices before the public today, and you have a staggering total. No wonder Dr. Koussevitzky, is enthusiastic and proiud of his protege.

Four Classics

She sang four exacting tests of the singer'sa rt, each one of a different school and style. They were "Oh Sleep, why dost thou leave me?" from Handel's "Semele," Pamina's air, "Ach, ich fuehl's" from the "Magic Flute" by Mozart, Elsa's Dream from Wagner's "Lohengrin" and "Depuis le jour" from Charpentier's "Louise."

Of these, "Depuis le jour" provided the most lavish display of those qualities which give Miss Maynor's voice its position among the greatest of the present day. The beginning was sung softly, delicately, with a pianissimo so exquisitely rounded that it had a peculiar brilliant glow. As reminiscences of Louise's "premier jour d'amour" succeeded one another, her voice took on a dreamy, sensuous color, a nostalgic languorousness and finally a naive exultation which at last sank back again into the "souvenir charmant" of the first day of her freedom. It was a masterpiece of psychological delineation as well as great singing. There was just one point where she forced her voice rather badly in an effort to ride the great orchestral outburst at the climax of the air. The rest was pure joy.

Her Standards

In fairness to Miss Maynor, however, it should be said her singing of the other three numbers, fine as it was, did not represent the greatest of which she is capable. In spite of the cordial attitude of the audience, she was palpably nervous. Perhaps the great respect she bears Dr. Kousevitzy's musicianship and the exacting reputation of Boston audiences had something to do with it. At any rate, her voice did not always flow with the sovereign ease of certain performances on her recordings.

Above all, the high tones in fortissimo are a very real danger to Miss Maynor. When she sings them with ease, they are full, strong, with a silvery sheen. When she forces them, as was often the case yesterday, those high tones take on a hard quality too reminiscent of dozens of other voices.

As interpretations the Handel and the Wagner were extraordinary. The beautifully sustained arch of Handel's melodic line and the subtle dramatic suggestiveness of Elsa's Dream, were realized with the mastery of a superlative musician.

One mentions the danger points in Miss Maynor's voice only in the fervent hope that she will allow no amount of public demand, which must already be tremendous, not managerial pressure from any side to dragoon her into extensive concert work, before she has her phenomenal voice completely under control. An unlimited number of concert engagements must already be hers for the taking and the modern tendency is all for quick exploitation of all present talent, at no matter what future cost. To the present possessor of such glorious gifts and to the potential possessor of the unlimited powers that lavish nature and great art combined can mean—to such a fortunate person one or two years more given over chiefly to study, can signify nothing but the soundest investment in all the world.

Sibelius Second Symphony

If we have spoken here chiefly of Dorothy Maynor's voice, it by no means implies any reflection on the powerfully moving performance of Sibelius Second Symphony under Koussevitzky's baton, which made up the second half of the program. Whether it was Finland's present fate, the desperate heroic stand she is making for civilization and for all of us, that so inspired Dr. Koussevitzky, we cannot tell. Obviously the audience as well as the symphony players themselves brought an extra weight of emotion to yesterday's performance. It was the greatest we had been privileged to hear of that symphony: a thing of dark premonitions, the slow movement a wailing lament for tragedies past and cruel deeds to come, an atmosphere of impending storm in the scherzo, and then in the finale, the mighty battle chant as it rises slowly, reluctantly at first from the depths of the orchestra, gathering power and momentum as it comes for the struggle that must end in victory or in total annihilation. In the symphony it ends with the exultant hymn of victory.

Repetition of "Mathis"

A second hearing of Hindemith's Symphony "Mathis der Maler" at the Saturday evening performance of the Boston Symphony, convinced one afresh of the significance, the mastership and of the greatness in this music. Dr. Koussevitzky and his men were in brilliant form. Boris Kouzen's Concerto, which opened the program seemed no more interesting than on Friday, but the performance of the Beethoven "Pastoral" Symphony more than made up for any boredom experienced earlier in the evening.

THE GROWTH OF ORCHESTRAS

A Book That Studies the Economic Problems of America's Symphonic Ensembles, Great and Small

Feb 25 Times

By OLIN DOWNES

A STUDY and factual analysis of the amazing growth of orchestral music in the United States, especially since the turn of the century, have long been needed. The results of such an investigation now appear in a volume, "America's Symphony Orchestras and How They Are Supported," by Margaret Grant and Herman S. Hettinger, published by W. W. Norton & Co. The investigation, made possible by a grant from the Carnegie Corporation of New York, was undertaken particularly as a study of the economic problems of the American orchestras, great and small, whose remarkable evolution, especially since the turn of the century, constitutes perhaps the outstanding musical phenomenon of this period.

* * *

THESE orchestras are unrivaled in quality and in number proportionate to the population of the cities anywhere in the world. Their numbers are increasing so rapidly that the report's estimate of some 250 to 300 symphony orchestras now functioning in places, great and small, in the country is probably over-conservative. The number is almost certainly between 300 and 350. Yet these orchestras do not and cannot, on the basis of earned income, pay their bills. Proof is yet forthcoming that they can ever hope to do so. To investigate this phase of the problem is the avowed purpose of the report, which, however, has a broader significance.

The fact that in 1900 America had six major orchestras and that it now has sixteen, with budgets aggregating $5,000,000 and an annual attendance of 2,750,000, is sufficiently imposing. But this is secondary to other findings—namely, that while at the turn of the century seven major and six secondary orchestras had been founded, twenty-nine orchestras, six major and twenty-three secondary, had been organized by 1920; that the following decade produced fifty-five more orchestras, of which two were of the major rank, and the decade since 1930 "has witnessed the formation of eighty-four orchestras, or nearly as many as were founded during the entire previous century."

The major orchestras are listed as the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (1842), the St. Louis Orchestra (1880), the Boston Symphony Orchestra (1881), the Chicago Symphony Orcnestra (1891), the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra (1895), the Philadelphia Orchestra (1900), the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra (1903), San Francisco Symphony Orchestra (1909), Cleveland Orchestra (1918), Detroit Symphony Orchestra (1919), Philharmonic Orchestra of Los Angeles (1919), Pittsburgh Orchestra (1926) — "this having been preceded by an orchestra founded in 1895 and discontinued in 1910, which was one of the important orchestras of its time"—Rochester Civic-Symphony Orchestra (1929), Indianapolis Symphony Orchestra (1930), National Symphony Orchestra, Washington, D. C. (1931), and Kansas City Philharmonic Orchestra (1933). In a separate category is put the NBC Symphony Orchestra, organized by David Sarnoff in 1937, and headed by Arturo Toscanini, an undertaking of the greatest importance for the symphonic audiences of the air.

* * *

NOT less impressive, but rather more so, is the number of symphony orchestras of professional and semi-professional status, 300,000 or more, which exist in all sorts of communities, and the 30,000 amateur orchestras in high schools, colleges and conservatories, as estimated by Dr. Joseph Maddy of the National Music Camp at Interlochen, which devote themselves to the practice of symphonic music. Furthermore, four-fifths of our symphony orchestras, taken as a body, have sprung up since 1919, and half of them since 1929, the year of the great panic and its catastrophic consequences. In that period orchestral subscriptions fell off less in ratio then the amounts spent for groceries and rentals.

* * *

LEADING orchestras of the country, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra, and the Boston Symphony, have operated in recent years with an average deficit of 12 per cent, while many of the secondary orchestras grappled with deficits of 50 per cent and more. Yet the great majority of these orchestras have continued, and their numbers are increasing. They tend to grow in personnel and improve in quality. The results of the government's excursion into music, at first undertaken purely as a relief measure, are very important, though studied by themselves. In the aggregate the WPA orchestras not only set to work hundreds and thousands of musicians but give an enormous opportunity to American composers and general impetus to the whole development in this field. Some of these WPA orchestras, also, as in the present situation in Buffalo, are turning from government subsidized bodies into organizations developed by private enterprise. Then there is the picture of the endless variety of type and the various methods of maintenance adopted by the amateur or semi-professional orchestras which are becoming so striking a feature of the American scene, in small towns and farming communities as well as civic centers. It is an extraordinary democracy of effort, which enriches the experience of citizens in every walk of life.

The radio and the records, as often observed in these columns, have contributed very greatly to these developments. It was feared by the record manufacturers, circa 1920, that the radio would ruin their trade, at least so far as symphonic records were concerned. The same anxiety concerning the influence of radio was felt regarding the future of symphony orchestras. Symphonic audiences, as also, for instance, those of the Metropolitan Opera House, bear unmistakable witness to the manner in which the hearing of music over the air has increased their interest. As for the records, 3,500,000 "classical" recordings were sold last year, and a large proportion of these was symphonic.

The major costs of the symphony orchestras are those of the personnel. The salaries of players and conductors represent two-thirds to three-quarters of the running expenses. If fees to soloists are added, personnel expenses may amount to four-fifths of the major orchestra budgets.

* * *

WHAT of conductors' fees? They average approximately 10 per cent of the personnel cost—approximately $60,000 in the Boston, New York, Philadelphia groups; $30,000 in the groups of the secondary bodies. "But even if savings could be effected by reducing conductors' costs, the question would still remain as to whether such reductions might not also involve loss of public support and diminished ticket sales. The personality and ability of the conductor, for better or worse, carry much more weight with the average American concert-goer than does the quality of the orchestra or the nature of the program. . . .

"For this reason there is no way of measuring the suitability of conductors' salaries in terms of statistics. They are and must be determined by competition in the open market. This question, together with that of the use of guest artists and soloists, is an inseparable part of the larger problem of merchandizing symphony orchestras—adapting symphony concerts to the desires of the actual and potential market and promoting their wider acceptance."

The palm for economical management, "superb" merchandizing, the biggest annual wage but not the highest weekly wage for the players is awarded the Boston Symphony, which employs fewer soloists than any other major orchestra in the land. "But it should be noted that this accomplishment has been largely facilitated by the absence in Boston of the inflexibility imposed by the usual union agreement." And certainly this is a field in which musical unionism, in most of our cities, could afford to cooperate with orchestral managements as it has not consistently done.

* * *

METHODS of management and of propaganda for orchestral music are considered, and the chapters devoted to these subjects will arouse profitable discussion. If they could result in a coordinated and cooperative study of their problems by all of the major orchestral managements and in some scientific study of every allied problem, the report would have gone far toward achieving its purpose.

It points out some of the obvious deficiencies of method which still rule in too many places. It advocates a more democratic policy in the constitution of orchestral boards, a more extended survey than has yet been possible of symphonic audiences, the taking of the opprobrium of caste and "high-browism" out of orchestral music, methods of intelligent popularization of good music in the community, and the enlistment of all classes of citizens in the building up of orchestra publics.

These are directions in which the investigators would have gone much farther than they have if they had had the time and facilities to do so. As a matter of fact, their excellent report, rich and comprehensive as it is, only scratches the surface of a complex and extremely interesting situation. Their investigation should be extended and carried on through years to come.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD

FEB 29 1940

Boston Symphony Will Play Composition of Prof. Nabokoff

Prof. Nicolas Nabokoff

Word was received yesterday by Dr. Nicholas Gualillo, director of the Syracuse Symphony orchestra, that the Second Symphony of Prof. Nicolas Nabokoff, who will direct the Wells college chorus in its concert Thursday, March 7, with the local symphony, will be given its premier performance early next month by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Prof. Nabokoff, who has been director of music at Wells college since 1936, is widely known as a composer and his first symphony was likewise given its premier by the Boston symphony.

Prof. Nabokoff is also the composer of the musical score for the Monte Carlo ballet's presentation of "Union Pacific," and others of his compositions have met with success in European cities.

A grandson of Dmitri Nabokoff, author of the legislation abolishing serfdom in Russia, Prof. Nabokoff was born in that country and received his musical education in Russia, Germany and France. He first came to the United States in 1933 to give a series of lectures on the great traditions of music and has remained in this country since that time.

For the March 7 concert of the Syracuse Symphony orchestra, he will direct the Wells college chorus and the orchestra in Debussy's "Blessed Damosel."

The chorus is comprised of 34 voi[illegible]. Soloists are Miss Mary B. Davenport and Miss Helen Clayton.

The March 7 concert will be the final one in the winter series of the Syracuse symphony. The orchestra will be heard during the summer, however, in a series of concerts at Syracuse university, while plans for its next winter season are now being made.

THIS CLIPPING FROM STERLING, COLO.
ADVOCATE

✓

FEB 29 1940

IN THE STERLING PUBLIC LIBRARY

Philip Hale, one of the foremost musical authorities in the world, left a compilation of forty years he spent as Boston's music critic is "Great Concert Music," to survive him. This book contains 125 chosen works drawn from a wealth of his descriptive program notes of 1000 and upward, editorials and pertinent critical paragraphs from newspaper files on concerts by the Boston Symphonic orchestra. Hale discuss[illegible] the 3-B Composers: Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms; Debussy, Franch, Hayden, Liszt, Rachmaninoff, Rimsky-Korsakov, Sibelius, Stravinsky, Tschaikowsky, Wagner and others. No modification has been made by omissions of Hale's frank and satirical expressions of preferences among the composers, and his ridicule may be observed to be directed at the snobbish element in the public, rather than at the composers. This guide book, of historical value to students of music and to young critics, is an invaluable contribution to musical literature, and not intended for student and expert alone, but for all who love fine music.

204

THE GROWTH OF ORCHESTRAS

A Book That Studies the Economic Problems of America's Symphonic Ensembles, Great and Small

Feb 25 Times

By OLIN DOWNES

A STUDY and factual analysis of the amazing growth of orchestral music in the United States, especially since the turn of the century, have long been needed. The results of such an investigation now appear in a volume, "America's Symphony Orchestras and How They Are Supported," by Margaret Grant and Herman S. Hettinger, published by W. W. Norton & Co. The investigation, made possible by a grant from the Carnegie Corporation of New York, was undertaken particularly as a study of the economic problems of the American orchestras, great and small, whose remarkable evolution, especially since the turn of the century, constitutes perhaps the outstanding musical phenomenon of this period.

* * *

THESE orchestras are unrivaled in quality and in number proportionate to the population of the cities anywhere in the world. Their numbers are increasing so rapidly that the report's estimate of some 250 to 300 symphony orchestras now functioning in places, great and small, in the country is probably over-conservative. The number is almost certainly between 300 and 350. Yet these orchestras do not and cannot, on the basis of earned income, pay their bills. Proof is yet forthcoming that they can ever hope to do so. To investigate this phase of the problem is the avowed purpose of the report, which, however, has a broader significance.

The fact that in 1900 America had six major orchestras and that it now has sixteen, with budgets aggregating $5,000,000 and an annual attendance of 2,750,000, is sufficiently imposing. But this is secondary to other findings—namely, that while at the turn of the century seven major and six secondary orchestras had been founded, twenty-nine orchestras, six major and twenty-three secondary, had been organized by 1920; that the following decade produced fifty-five more orchestras, of which two were of the major rank, and the decade since 1930 "has witnessed the formation of eighty-four orchestras, or nearly as many as were founded during the entire previous century."

The major orchestras are listed as the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (1842), the St. Louis Orchestra (1880), the Boston Symphony Orchestra (1881), the Chicago Symphony Orchestra (1891), the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra (1895), the Philadelphia Orchestra (1900), the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra (1903), San Francisco Symphony Orchestra (1909), Cleveland Orchestra (1918), Detroit Symphony Orchestra (1919), Philharmonic Orchestra of Los Angeles (1919), Pittsburgh Orchestra (1926) — "this having been preceded by an orchestra founded in 1895 and discontinued in 1910, which was one of the important orchestras of its time"—Rochester Civic-Symphony Orchestra (1929), Indianapolis Symphony Orchestra (1930), National Symphony Orchestra, Washington, D. C. (1931), and Kansas City Philharmonic Orchestra (1933). In a separate category is put the NBC Symphony Orchestra, organized by David Sarnoff in 1937, and headed by Arturo Toscanini, an undertaking of the greatest importance for the symphonic audiences of the air.

* * *

NOT less impressive, but rather more so, is the number of symphony orchestras of professional and semi-professional status, 300,000 or more, which exist in all sorts of communities, and the 30,000 amateur orchestras in high schools, colleges and conservatories, as estimated by Dr. Joseph Maddy of the National Music Camp at Interlochen, which devote themselves to the practice of symphonic music. Furthermore, four-fifths of our symphony orchestras, taken as a body, have sprung up since 1919, and half of them since 1929, the year of the great panic and its catastrophic consequences. In that period orchestral subscriptions fell off less in ratio then the amounts spent for groceries and rentals.

* * *

LEADING orchestras of the country, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra, and the Boston Symphony, have operated in recent years with an average deficit of 12 per cent, while many of the secondary orchestras grappled with deficits of 50 per cent and more. Yet the great majority of these orchestras have continued, and their numbers are increasing. They tend to grow in personnel and improve in quality. The results of the government's excursion into music, at first undertaken purely as a relief measure, are very important, though studied by themselves. In the aggregate the WPA orchestras not only set to work hundreds and thousands of musicians but give an enormous opportunity to American composers and general impetus to the whole development in this field. Some of these WPA orchestras, also, as in the present situation in Buffalo, are turning from government subsidized bodies into organizations developed by private enterprise. Then there is the picture of the endless variety of type and the various methods of maintenance adopted by the amateur or semi-professional orchestras which are becoming so striking a feature of the American scene, in small towns and farming communities as well as civic centers. It is an extraordinary democracy of effort, which enriches the experience of citizens in every walk of life.

The radio and the records, as often observed in these columns, have contributed very greatly to these developments. It was feared by the record manufacturers, circa 1920, that the radio would ruin their trade, at least so far as symphonic records were concerned. The same anxiety concerning the influence of radio was felt regarding the future of symphony orchestras. Symphonic audiences, as also, for instance, those of the Metropolitan Opera House, bear unmistakable witness to the manner in which the hearing of music over the air has increased their interest. As for the records, 3,500,000 "classical" recordings were sold last year, and a large proportion of these was symphonic.

The major costs of the symphony orchestras are those of the personnel. The salaries of players and conductors represent two-thirds to three-quarters of the running expenses. If fees to soloists are added, personnel expenses may amount to four-fifths of the major orchestra budgets.

* * *

WHAT of conductors' fees? They average approximately 10 per cent of the personnel cost—approximately $60,000 in the Boston, New York, Philadelphia groups; $30,000 in the groups of the secondary bodies. "But even if savings could be effected by reducing conductors' costs, the question would still remain as to whether such reductions might not also involve loss of public support and diminished ticket sales. The personality and ability of the conductor, for better or worse, carry much more weight with the average American concert-goer than does the quality of the orchestra or the nature of the program. . . .

"For this reason there is no way of measuring the suitability of conductors' salaries in terms of statistics. They are and must be determined by competition in the open market. This question, together with that of the use of guest artists and soloists, is an inseparable part of the larger problem of merchandizing symphony orchestras—adapting symphony concerts to the desires of the actual and potential market and promoting their wider acceptance."

The palm for economical management, "superb" merchandizing, the biggest annual wage but not the highest weekly wage for the players is awarded the Boston Symphony, which employs fewer soloists than any other major orchestra in the land. "But it should be noted that this accomplishment has been largely facilitated by the absence in Boston of the inflexibility imposed by the usual union agreement." And certainly this is a field in which musical unionism, in most of our cities, could afford to cooperate with orchestral managements as it has not consistently done.

* * *

METHODS of management and of propaganda for orchestral music are considered, and the chapters devoted to these subjects will arouse profitable discussion. If they could result in a coordinated and cooperative study of their problems by all of the major orchestral managements and in some scientific study of every allied problem, the report would have gone far toward achieving its purpose.

It points out some of the obvious deficiencies of method which still rule in too many places. It advocates a more democratic policy in the constitution of orchestral boards, a more extended survey than has yet been possible of symphonic audiences, the taking of the opprobrium of caste and "highbrowism" out of orchestral music, methods of intelligent popularization of good music in the community, and the enlistment of all classes of citizens in the building up of orchestra publics.

These are directions in which the investigators would have gone much farther than they have if they had had the time and facilities to do so. As a matter of fact, their excellent report, rich and comprehensive as it is, only scratches the surface of a complex and extremely interesting situation. Their investigation should be extended and carried on through years to come.

THIS CLIPPING FROM STERLING, COLO.
ADVOCATE

FEB 29 1940

✓

IN THE STERLING PUBLIC LIBRARY

Philip Hale, one of the foremost musical authorities in the world, left a compilation of forty years he spent as Boston's music critic in "Great Concert Music," to survive him. This book contains 125 chosen works drawn from a wealth of his descriptive program notes of 1000 and upward, editorials and pertinent critical paragraphs from newspaper files on concerts by the Boston Symphonic orchestra. Hale discuss [illegible] the 3-B-Composers: Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms; Debussy, Franch, Hayden, Liszt, Rachmaninoff, Rimsky-Korsakov, Sibelius, Stravinsky, Tschaikowsky, Wagner and others. No modification has been made by omissions of Hale's frank and satirical expressions of preferences among the composers, and his ridicule may be observed to be directed at the snobbish element in the public, rather than at the composers. This guide book, of historical value to students of music and to young critics, is an invaluable contribution to musical literature, and not intended for student and expert alone, but for all who love fine music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD

FEB 29 1940

Boston Symphony Will Play Composition of Prof. Nabokoff

Prof. Nicolas Nabokoff

Word was received yesterday by Dr. Nicholas Gualillo, director of the Syracuse Symphony orchestra, that the Second Symphony of Prof. Nicolas Nabokoff, who will direct the Wells college chorus in its concert Thursday, March 7, with the local symphony, will be given its premier performance early next month by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Prof. Nabokoff, who has been director of music at Wells college since 1936, is widely known as a composer and his first symphony was likewise given its premier by the Boston symphony.

Prof. Nabokoff is also the composer of the musical score for the Monte Carlo ballet's presentation of "Union Pacific," and others of his compositions have met with success in European cities.

A grandson of Dmitri Nabokoff, author of the legislation abolishing serfdom in Russia, Prof. Nabokoff was born in that country and received his musical education in Russia, Germany and France. He first came to the United States in 1933 to give a series of lectures on the great traditions of music and has remained in this country since that time.

For the March 7 concert of the Syracuse Symphony orchestra, he will direct the Wells college chorus and the orchestra in Debussy's "Blessed Damosel."

The chorus is comprised of 34 voi [illegible] Soloists are Miss Mary B. Davenport and Miss Helen Clayton.

The March 7 concert will be the final one in the winter series of the Syracuse symphony. The orchestra will be heard during the summer, however, in a series of concerts at Syracuse university, while plans for its next winter season are now being made.

205

THIS CLIPPING FROM LIFE
CHICAGO, ILL.
FEB 26 1940

KOUSSEVITZKY, EX-BULL FIDDLER, CONDUCTS BEST U. S. ORCHESTRA

A few years ago, the big three of U. S. orchestra conductors were Toscanini, Stokowski and Koussevitzky. Today Toscanini conducts comparatively few concerts with his NBC radio orchestra. Stokowski does part-time work with the Philadelphia Orchestra. This leaves Sergei Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, as No. 1 full-time conductor in the U. S. The orchestra he leads is considered by most musicians to be the finest in the world. Respected by composers for sponsoring new work, Koussevitzky was honored this month by the Beethoven Association in New York for his services to American music.

To the 110 men in his orchestra, Koussevitzky is a tyrant who can be appeased only by fine playing. To the adoring dowagers of Boston, he is an amiable and courtly grand seigneur who never has time for a social life. Childless, he lives in a solid suburban house in Brookline, outside Boston. He likes good clothes, good food and champagne. He gets $35,000 or $40,000 a year. To Boston he is well worth it.

When Koussevitzky came to Boston, the city was in the musical dumps. Its once-great orchestra had fallen on evil days. Quickly dominating the orchestra—no easy job for a new leader—he soon made it sing like a choir of symphonic angels. Permanent conductor since 1924, Koussevitzky now takes the orchestra to the Berkshires every August for one of America's most important summer music festivals.

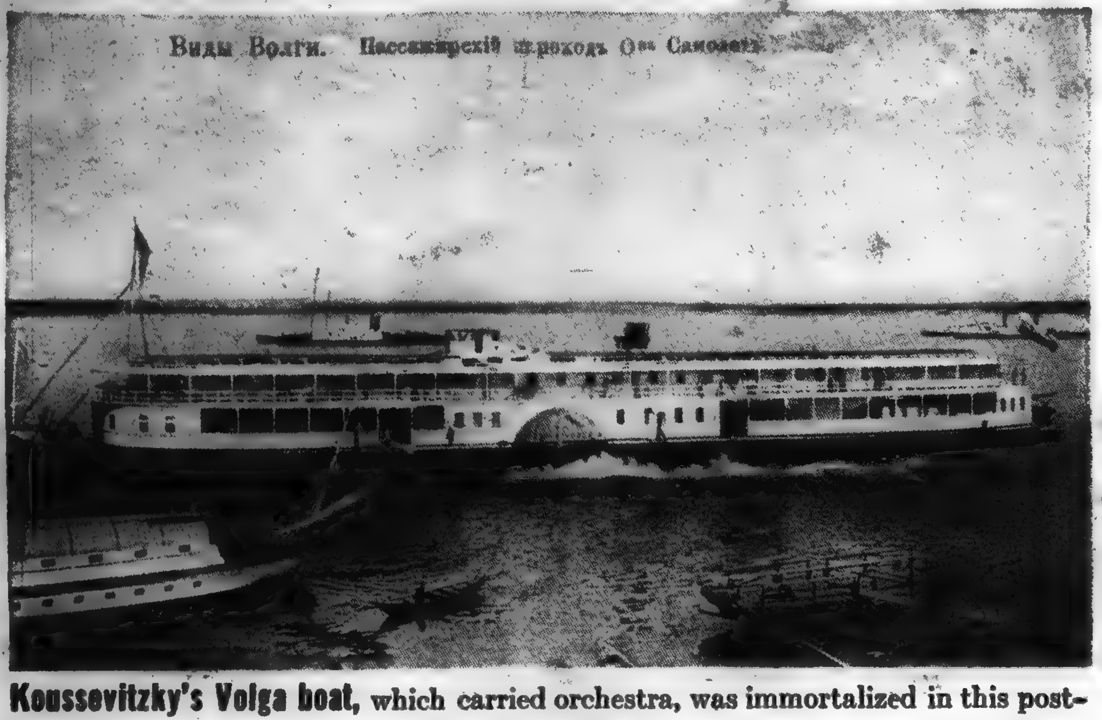
Sergei Koussevitzky was born in a Russian village in 1874. Son of a poor violin teacher, he went to Moscow for a musical scholarship. The only ones open were for trombone, horn and double bass. He chose the double bass and within a few years was the best bull-fiddle virtuoso in Europe. He became a conductor after his marriage, stayed in Russia until 1920 when, out of all sympathy with the Bolsheviks, he departed forever from his native land, leaving most of his and his wife's money behind.

TURNING, HE BECKONS QUIETLY FOR THE CELLOS TO PLAY UP

CONTINUED ON NEXT PAGE

9X

Koussevitzky (continued)



Koussevitzky's Volga boat, which carried orchestra, was immortalized in this postcard. Russian means: "Scenes of the Volga: Passenger Steamer of Samolet Line."

VOLGA BOAT TOUR BROUGHT HIM FAME

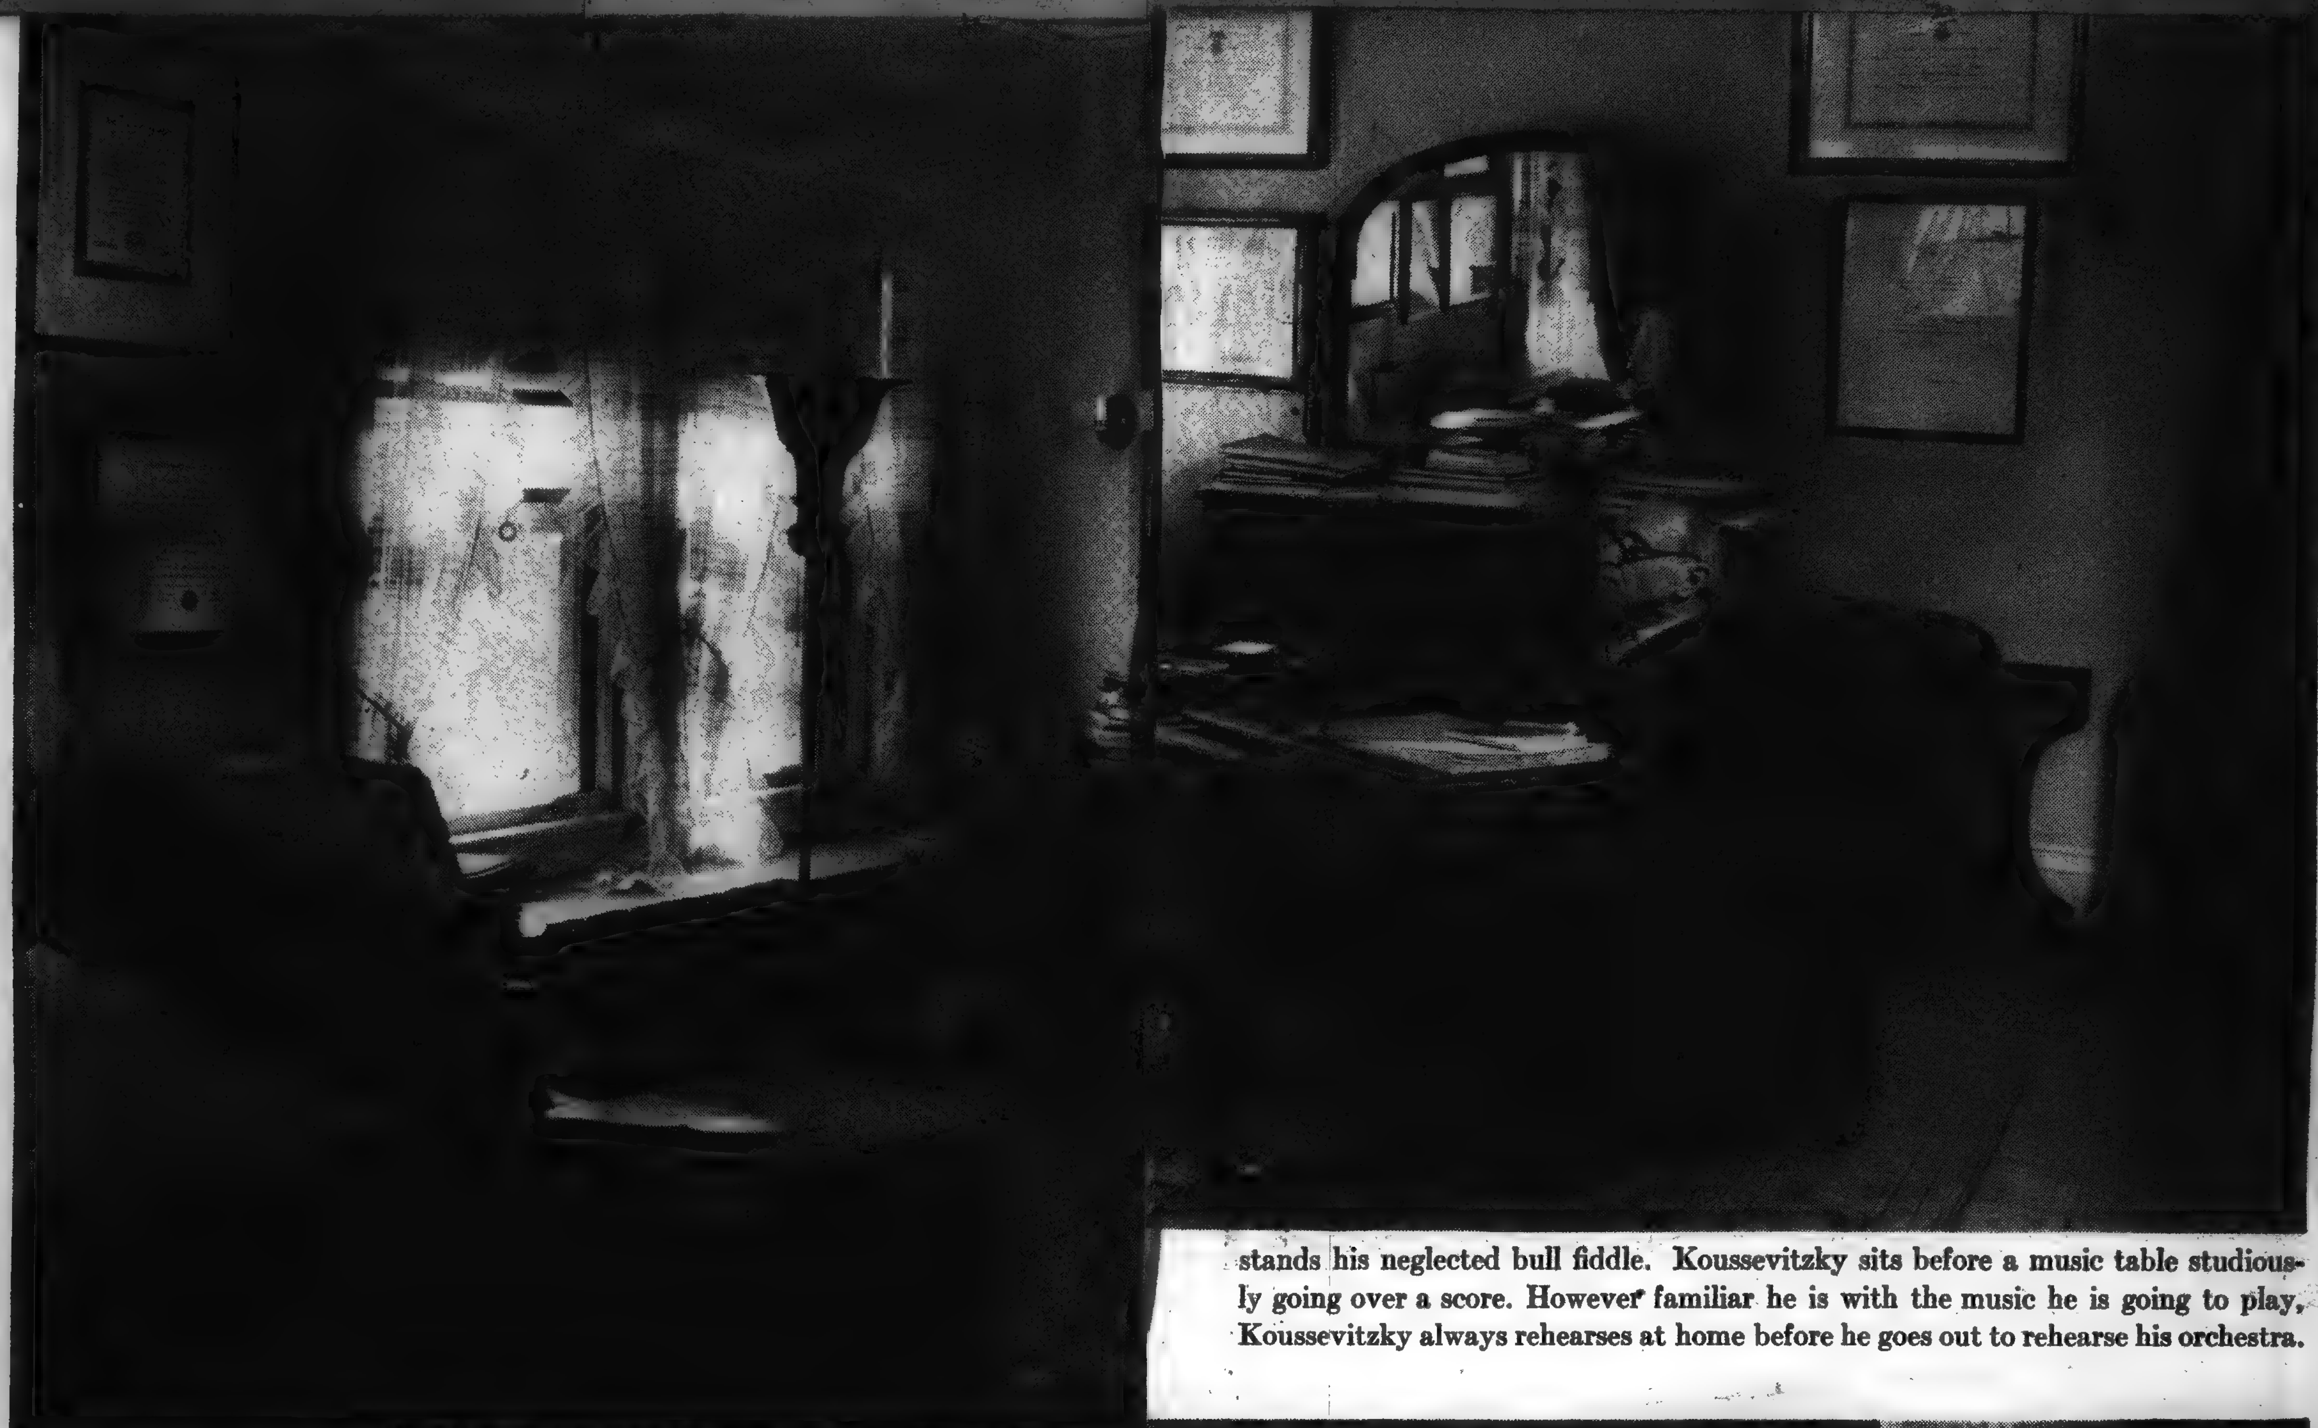
Koussevitzky first saw his wife when he was playing a double-bass solo in a concert and she, Natalya Konstantinovna, was in the audience. The young bull fiddler fell in love then and there. But it was two years before he met Natalya and two more years before he married her. She was the daughter of a rich man and wealthy in her own right.

Sergei Koussevitzky's great desire was to give up the double bass and become an orchestra conductor. In 1910, after he had been abroad studying and conducting orchestras, Natalya helped finance a symphony for Sergei. It gave concerts in Moscow and St. Petersburg. Then, in the spring, the Koussevitzkys hired a Volga River sidewheel steamboat. They put the 85-piece orchestra on board and sailed up and down the Volga from Tver to Astrakhan, playing at towns along the way. The concerts, repeated in 1912 and 1914, were a huge success. They brought fine music to Russia's hinterland and greater fame to Koussevitzky.

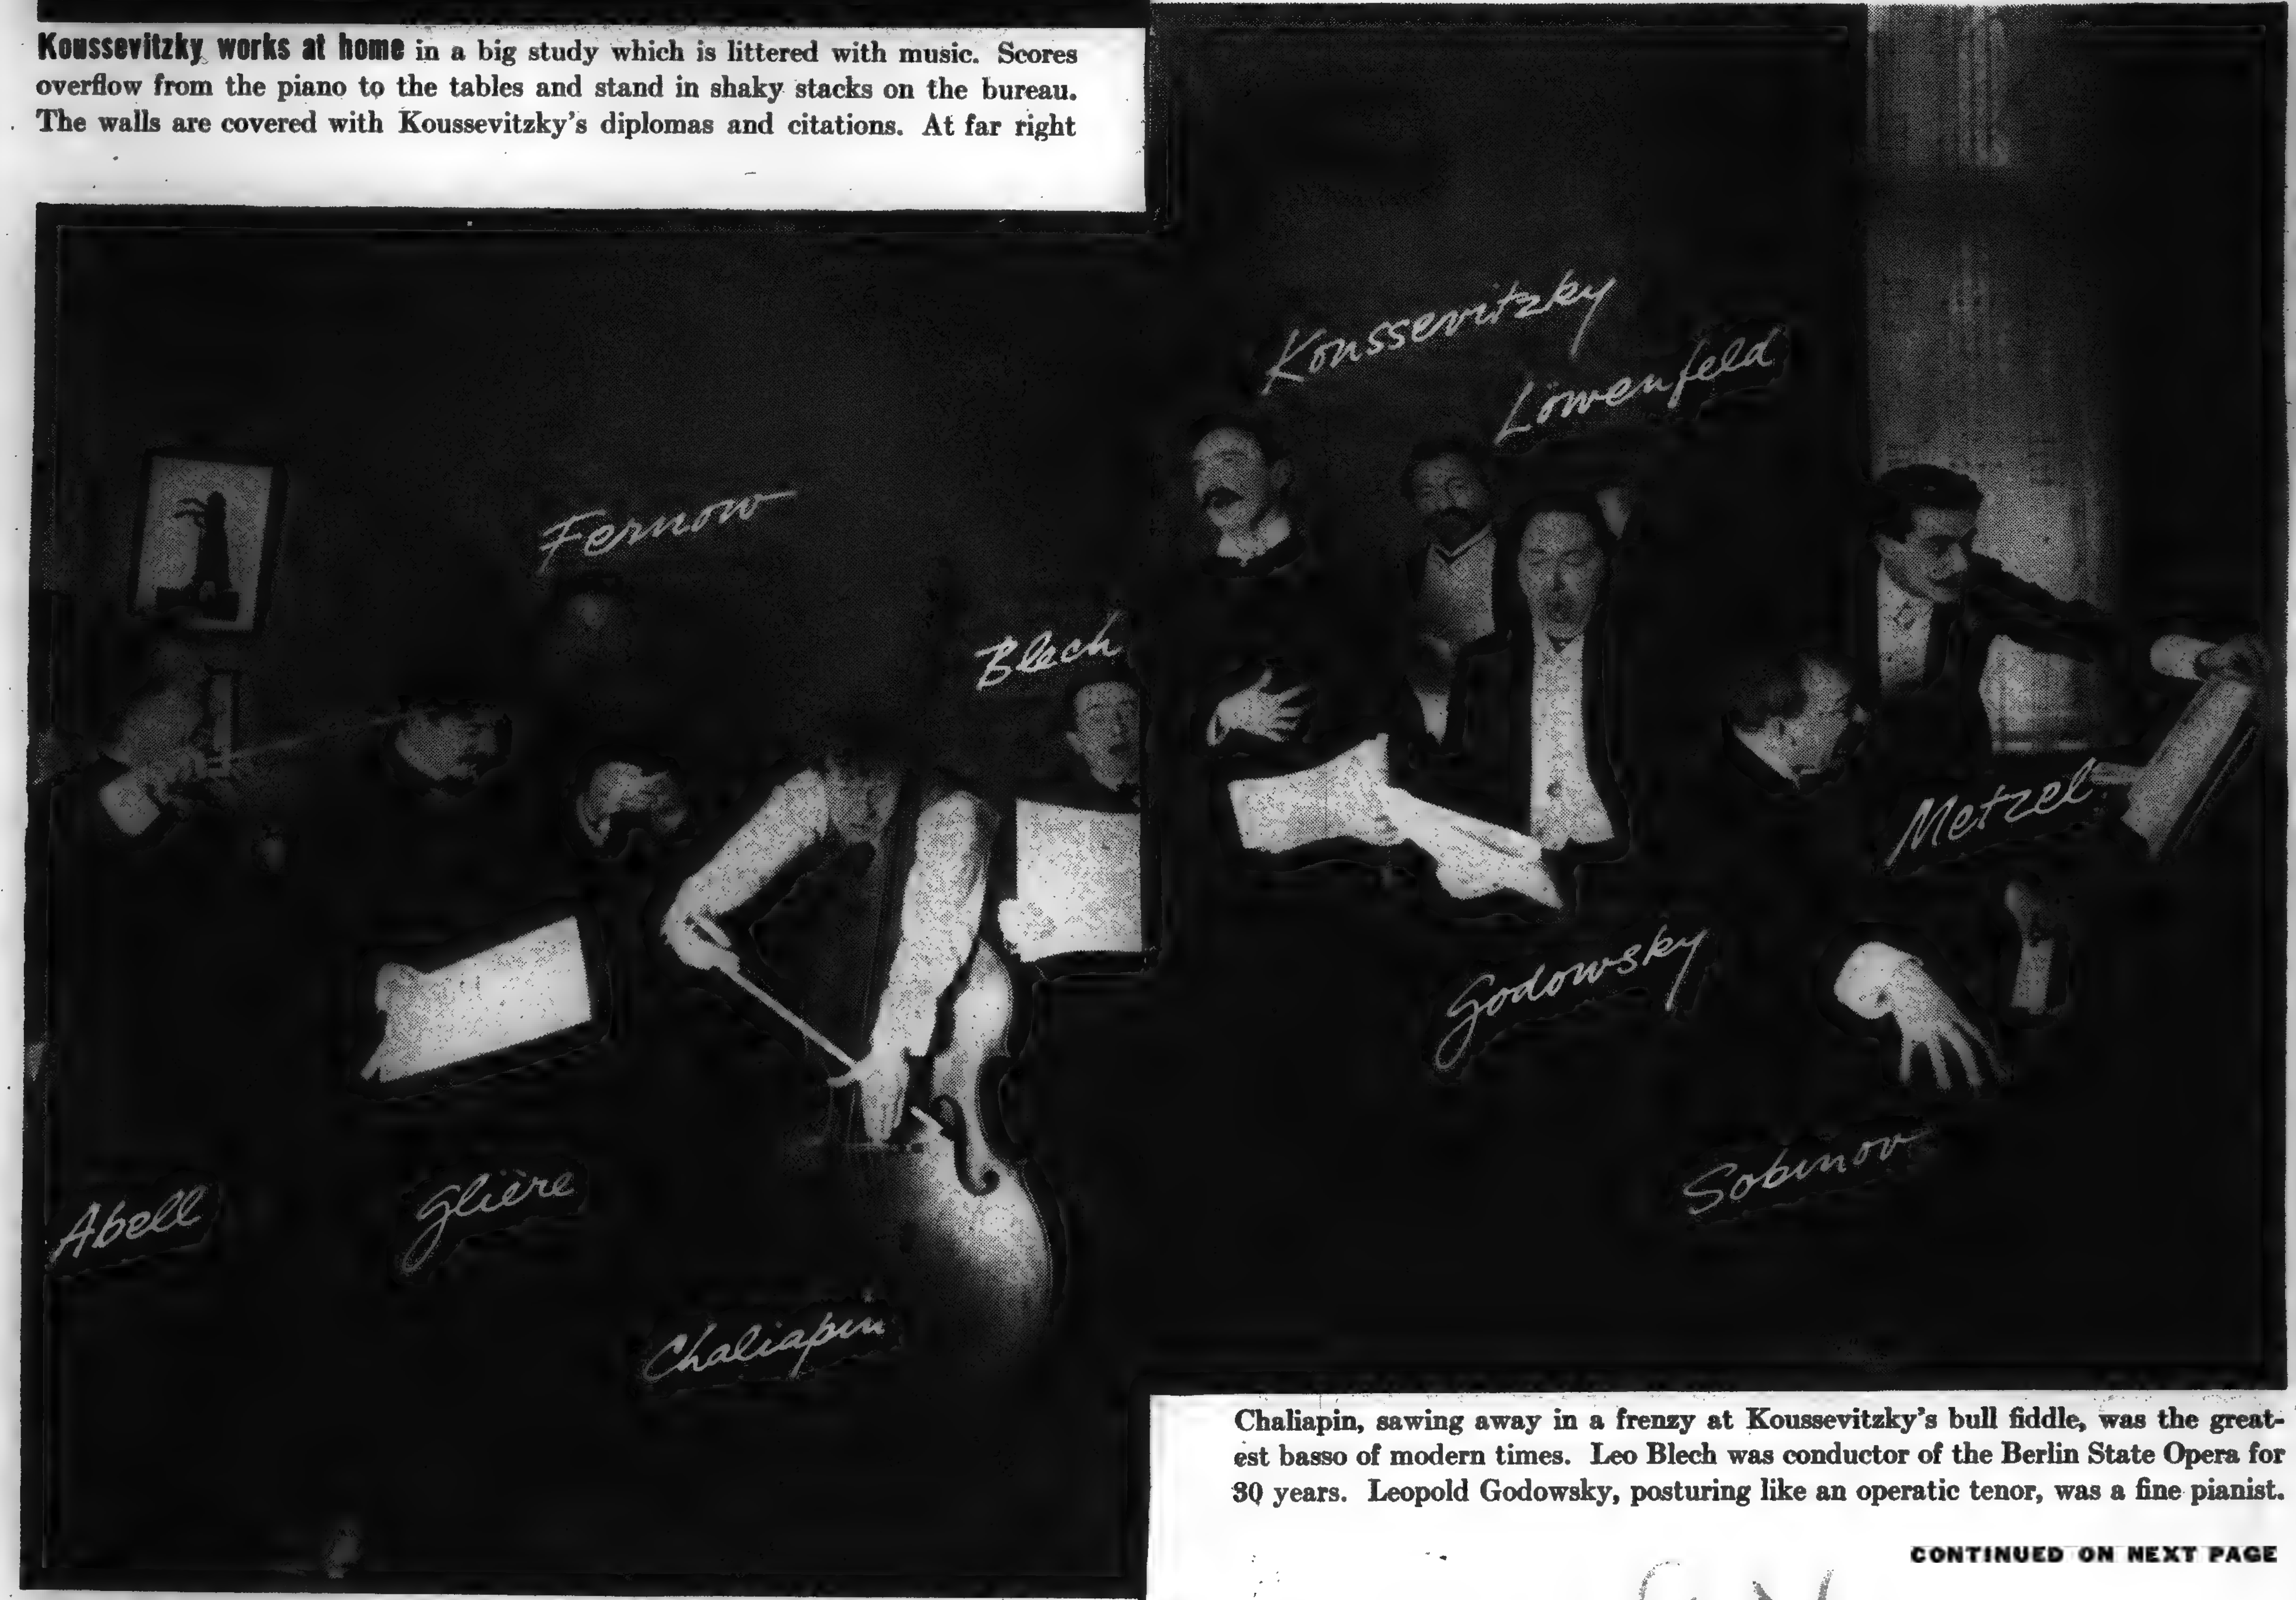
Aboard the Volga steamboat in cap and Bohemian tie, stands Koussevitzky with Arthur Abell (left) and Edouard Risler, who was the touring orchestra's piano soloist.

The conductor's wife also went along with a party of friends. Here Mrs. Koussevitzky sits on the boat deck at the end of the table, presiding over the samovar.

9X



Koussevitzky works at home in a big study which is littered with music. Scores overflow from the piano to the tables and stand in shaky stacks on the bureau. The walls are covered with Koussevitzky's diplomas and citations. At far right stands his neglected bull fiddle. Koussevitzky sits before a music table studiously going over a score. However familiar he is with the music he is going to play, Koussevitzky always rehearses at home before he goes out to rehearse his orchestra.



A group of famous musicians gathered at Koussevitzky's house in Berlin in 1907 and gave a mock concert. This is Koussevitzky's own picture of the event. Reinhold Glière, Russian composer, is best known for his ballet, Red Poppy. Feodor Chaliapin, sawing away in a frenzy at Koussevitzky's bull fiddle, was the greatest basso of modern times. Leo Blech was conductor of the Berlin State Opera for 30 years. Leopold Godowsky, posturing like an operatic tenor, was a fine pianist.

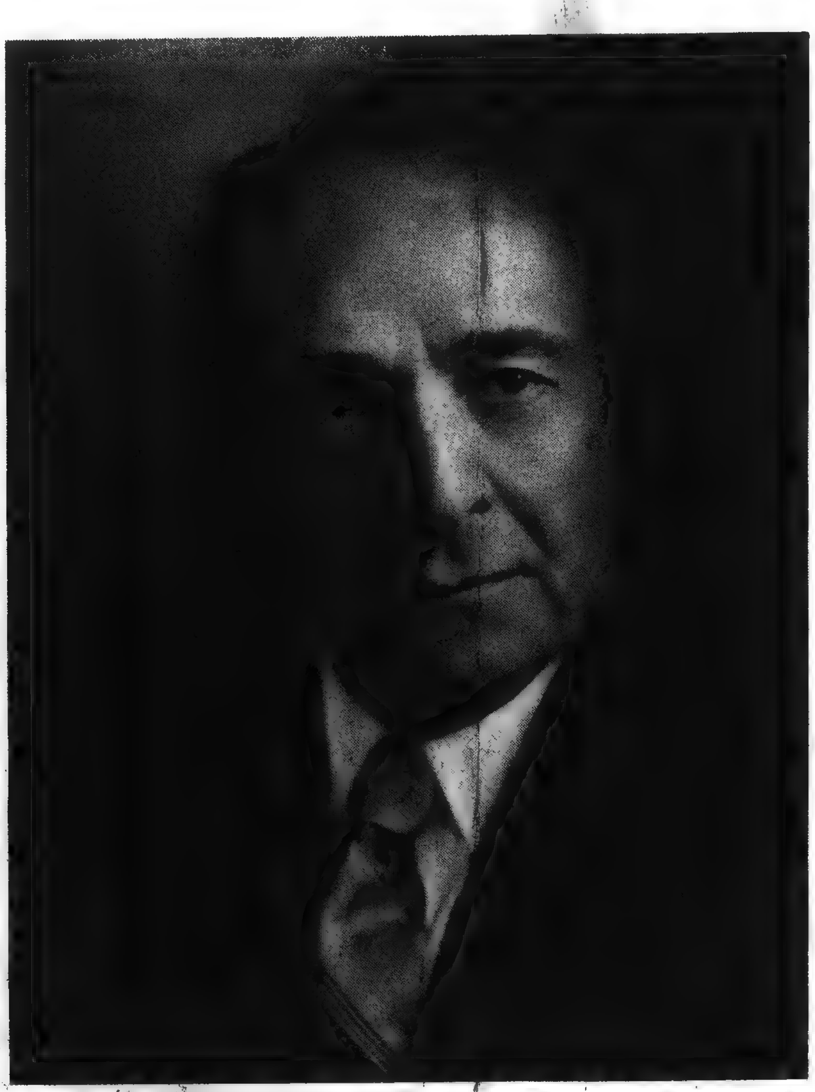
CONTINUED ON NEXT PAGE

9X

9X

PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

PHILA. FORUM
MAGAZINE
PHILA., PA
FEB. 1940



Copyright Bachrach Studios

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

FROM Oscar Levant's devastating criticism of the leading symphony conductors in his newly published A Smattering of Ignorance, only Serge Koussevitzky emerges comparatively unscathed. "Aside from his musical personality," says the irrepressible Oscar, "Koussevitzky is altogether more a legend to the outside world than an actuality. Though his is the only non-union orchestra in the country it is in effect a closed shop as far as the emanation of gossip is concerned. He is unparalleled in the performance of Russian music. . . . He is also an enthusiast for Mahler and K. P. E. Bach, which, for a conductor of Russian background, is almost as astonishing as his mastery of the double bass.

"Few reports leak out of the Kremlin-like secrecy which surrounds the preparation of his programs, but his players have an internal pride in their status as members of the orchestra—unquestionably the finest in the world.

"Over a similar period no conductor in America has produced so many valid new works, both domestic and foreign, and the value mounts steadily."

Of all of these new works none have been more valid than Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," which Dr. Koussevitzky will give its first Philadelphia performance Wednesday evening February 14 when the Boston Symphony will be heard in its annual concert.

For fifteen years Dr. Koussevitzky has been at the helm in Boston and has increasingly proved Deems Taylor a discerning prophet, for of Koussevitzky's first concert in New York in November, 1924, Mr. Taylor wrote in the old World: "The Boston Symphony Orchestra is in the hands of a musician of profound insight and extraordinary technical command, one who may cause it to equal, perhaps surpass, its former legendary glories."

One of the last reviews written by the late W. J. Henderson, dean of the critics, confirmed what Mr. Taylor had foretold many years before, "One sometimes is lost in wonder at the glory of the tone of the Boston orchestra, so rich, so lucent, so filled with delicate qualities and withal so virile and forthright. And with the tone go finish, precision, unanimity and infinite elasticity. It is a great orchestra and is greatly directed."

FEBRUARY EVENTS

PLEASE BE CAREFUL TO CONSULT THIS CALENDAR AND KEEP IT BEFORE YOU. NO OTHER NOTICE OF EVENTS THAN IS CONTAINED ON THIS PAGE WILL BE SENT TO MEMBERS, EXCEPT IN CASES OF ESPECIALLY ARRANGED TIMELY EVENTS. ALL EVENTS ARE IN THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC AT 8.30, UNLESS STATED OTHERWISE.

PLEASE READ THE MAGAZINE CAREFULLY EACH MONTH

Wednesday evening, February 7—"Conquering the Grand Canyon," illustrated with still and color motion pictures, AMOS BURG, explorer of dangerous rivers. Only Philadelphia appearance. Guest tickets One Dollar each.

* * *

Wednesday evening, February 14—THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY conducting. Annual Philadelphia concert. Guest tickets Two Dollars and a Half each.

* * *

Monday evening, February 19 and Tuesday evening, February 20, at 8.30, Locust Street Theatre — Lillian Hellman's "The Little Foxes," with TALLULAH BANKHEAD and a superb supporting cast. Special reserved seat checks for one of the performances, which must be presented for admission to the theatre, will be mailed to the members in the week of February 12. The regular Forum membership ticket does not admit. A limited number of guest tickets at regular theatre prices will be on sale at the Theatre Box-Office only on and after Monday, February 12.

* * *

Guest tickets for these events may be secured by members, upon presentation of the membership ticket only, from George T. Haly, Weymann's, 1613 Chestnut Street, a fortnight in advance of the date or at any time during the month in which the event is scheduled, and at the Academy of Music Box-Office the night of the event.

SEATS WILL BE HELD ONLY UNTIL 8.25. THE DOORS WILL CLOSE PROMPTLY AT 8.30 AND LATE COMERS WILL NOT BE ADMITTED.

THOSE HOLDING AMPHITHEATRE AND FAMILY CIRCLE SEATS WILL ENTER THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC FROM THE LOCUST STREET ENTRANCES, ALL OTHERS FROM BROAD STREET.

Ladies are requested to remove their hats so as not to obstruct the view of those behind them.

* * *

Thursday evening, February 29—"The New Books and Plays," WILLIAM LYON PHELPS. Second of three and only talks in Philadelphia. Guest tickets One Dollar each.

* * *

Monday evening, March 4—ROBERT and GABY CASADESUS, distinguished French pianists. Only appearance of the season. Guest tickets One Dollar and a Half each.

* * *

Thursday evening, March 7—THE NINETEENTH PRESENTATION OF THE PHILADELPHIA AWARD. Guest tickets One Dollar and a Half each.

* * *

Monday evening, March 11—Johann Strauss' "Die Fledermaus" (in English), THE PHILADELPHIA OPERA COMPANY. Guest tickets One Dollar and a Half each.

* * *

Wednesday evening, March 13—ARGENTINITA AND HER SPANISH ENSEMBLE. Only Philadelphia appearance. Guest tickets One Dollar and a Half each.

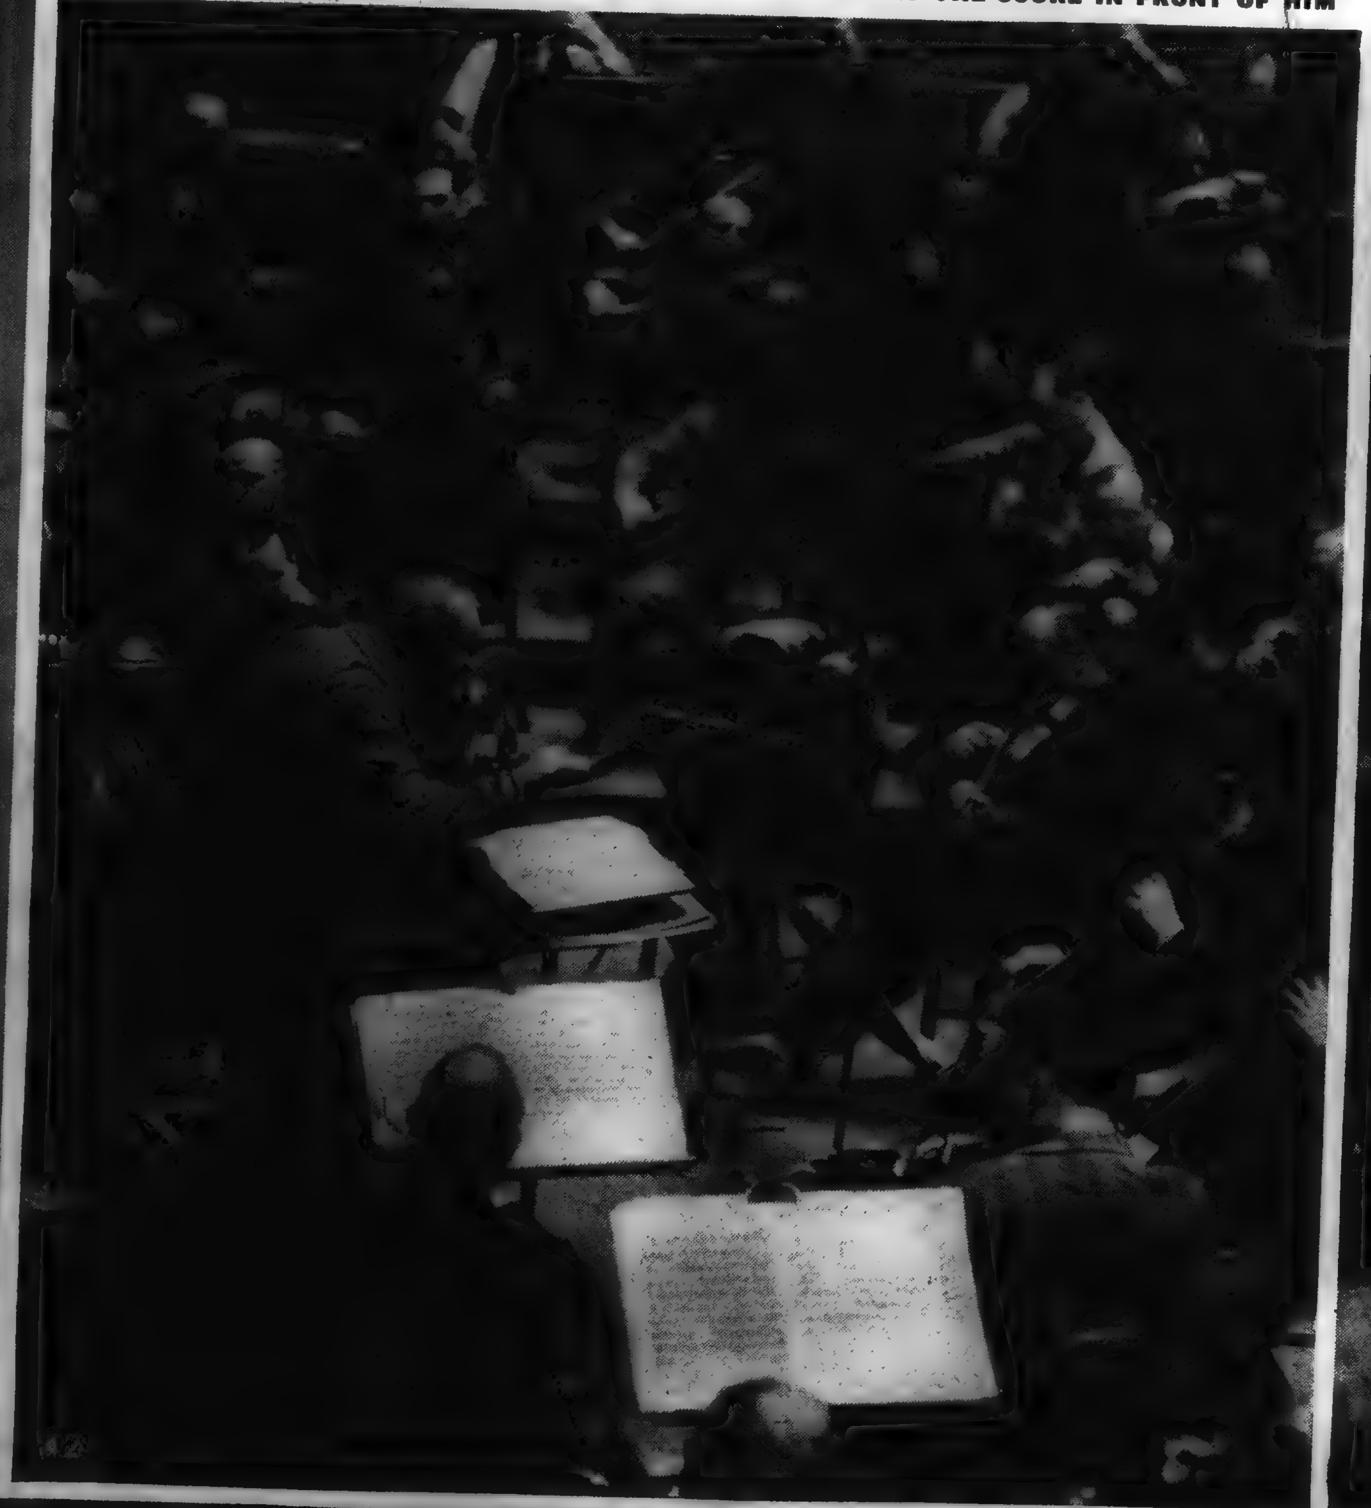
* * *

Wednesday evening, March 20—"The New Books and Plays," WILLIAM LYON PHELPS. Last of three and only talks in Philadelphia. Guest tickets One Dollar each.

* * *

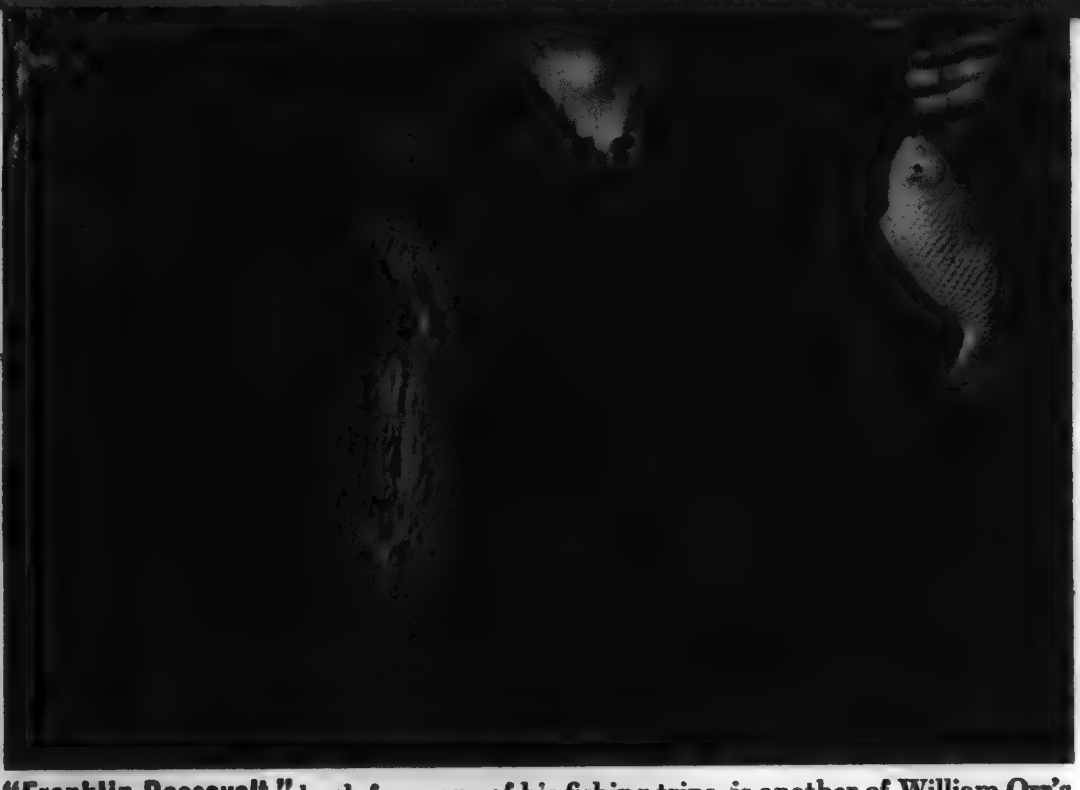
Koussevitzky's bull fiddle stands neglected in the conductor's study. With tears in his eyes he explains that he is so busy that he has scarcely touched the instrument for five years.

Koussevitzky's wife, whom he once serenaded with his bull fiddle, pats him fondly on the head. His first great patron, she has always been his greatest and most worshiping admirer.



SEATED ON PODIUM AT REHEARSAL, KOUSSEVITZKY PEERS AT THE SCORE IN FRONT OF HIM

"YOU MUST ZING," HE EXCLAIMS. "YOU MUST BLAY THE NUTS" (MEANING "THE NOTES")



"Franklin Roosevelt," back from one of his fishing trips, is another of William Orr's imitations. Says the President here, "I'm an angler, I've worked all the angles."

Bernice Parks dances a hot Guatemala rumba which brings down the house, as she sings a cordial invitation to the audience to meet her "down in Chichicastenango."

Try this idea...

In between the others...
SMOKE A KOOL

1. It gives your throat a welcome change.
2. The mild menthol is definitely refreshing.
3. You'll enjoy all your smoking more.

P. S. KOOLS are so much easier on your throat, lots of folks smoke 'em all the time.

TUNE IN — Paul Sullivan Reviews the News—CBS —every night except Sat.

UNION MADE

VALUABLE COUPON ON EACH PACK . . . FOUR EXTRA IN CARTONS
Good in the United States for dozens of luxury premiums like these Playing Cards—Initial or fancy back. Best Quality. 60 coupons. 2 decks—100

FREE. Write for illustrated new edition B & W premium booklet, No. 17. Address the Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corporation, Box 599, Louisville, Kentucky.

Tilt-Top Table. Solid walnut. Marquetry inlay. 18" x 12½". 21¼" high. 375 coupons.

B & W COUPONS ALSO PACKED IN RALEIGH & VICEROY CIGARETTES & BIG BEN SMOKING TOBACCO

11

8X

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 25 1940

207

Sibelius Music Brings Tears in New York

BY JOHN TEBBEL

HONEST sentiment is so much a stranger to New York that it made headlines last week. While the young Finnish conductor, Tauno Hannikainen, led the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his wife sat in a Carnegie Hall box and wept—partly because the music of Sibelius reminded her of home, mostly because the remembrance of home brought with it the thought of her son in the Finnish Army. No word has come from him since he left for the front.

A few critics noted her tears with some amazement. All the writing men present, we thought, missed the boat in their reviews because they spoke only of the music and not of the large ocean of sentiment upon which the last half of the concert floated. It was one of the few occasions in Carnegie Hall, or anywhere else, that we have seen honest emotion expressed by listeners.

Every Seat Sold

There was plenty of the other kind, the arty variety. Every seat had been sold and standing room was occupied to the limit of the fire laws. We stood, too, in the distinguished company of Roy Harris, the American composer, and several lesser lights in the musical world. Jammed in with us was a covey of those intellectual snobs who infest New York. They had come, as one woman drawled, "to hear that clever new thing of Prokofieff's," which translated means his second concerto.

Jascha Heifetz played the new work in his customary masterful manner. Between movements, the intellectuals were hard at work with their tongues. They divided into two camps: the gushers, who breathed "I love that thing" and "It's an experience, really, isn't it, I mean"; and the superior souls who looked down their noses, smiled amusedly, and remarked: "It's rather entertaining but scarcely reason enough to come all the way down here."

At intermission, in the art gallery, we heard them again until the mannered, parrot-like babble drove us to the sanctity of the gentlemen's lounge.

When the concert resumed, we looked around and discovered that, true to form, the intellectuals had vanished. This was because the Sibelius first symphony occupied the second half of the program and Sibelius is no longer new music. They had come to hear something new by Prokofieff, not to hear music at all. Prokofieff would furnish enough material for a week's sterile chatter at cocktail parties. Sibelius had been pumped dry long ago.

Introduced by Koussevitzky

Dr. Koussevitzky introduced Mr Hannikainen. He began: "I am sure we all want to express our sympathy for the Finns." Applause, mingled with stray hisses. The hissers were noisily shushed. For nearly all the listeners, it was a musical and not a political occasion. One doubts if most of them were vitally concerned about the Finns, but at the same time they were going to hear Sibelius conducted by a Finn. They expected and wanted to be thrilled by it without interference from partisan ideologists.

Hannikainen strode on the stage, a big blond man who looked much younger than his 40-odd years. He began the performance and everyone was hypnotized almost from the first bar.

He is not graceful. His angular method of conducting would make Stokowski, for instance, shudder. But we have never seen so much concentrated emotion poured into an orchestra from the podium. Hannikainen leaned over at the orchestra and swept it along with his hands, he shook his fist at it, his body weaved with the rhythms, he explored every note in the score and made the most of each one.

Naturally, his emotion communicated itself instantly to the audience. The strange, wild beauty of the music itself induces sadness and to this was added the obvious sentiment engendered by the headlines in the newspapers outside and the convincing, almost overpowering, sentiment of the conductor.

Others Also Wept

Mrs. Hannikainen was not the the only one who wept. Women wiped their eyes frequently. A man next to us who had chewed gum unemotionally through Heifetz, choked up and swallowed it. In the air was that curious, electric tension of an audience united into one person by a common emotion. It was another demonstration of the way in which music can use nationalism, the essence of war, to ride triumphantly over it. If stupid people had not been able to ban Beethoven and Brahms in the first World War, we believe a good many listeners might have forgotten about the conflict—at least until it became a personal matter.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
FEB 23 1940

Unbiased Writer's Eloquent Tribute to Famous Orchestra

EXALTING one's own community or any of its assets generally brings incredulous smiles from residents of other places, but when fulsome praise comes from afar, it is given respectful attention. A case in point is the Boston Symphony orchestra, which has drawn the plaudits of discriminating reviewers in New York as well as in the numerous other large cities where it has played..

Those who know something of the history of the Boston orchestra from its founding by the late Major Henry L. Higginson back in 1881, are aware of the long line of eminent conductors that have directed its course. Among them were George Henschel, Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikish, Emil Paur, Karl Muck, Max Fiedler, Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteau and the present leader, Serge Koussevitzky. Critical opinion will differ on the relative merits of the various conductors, some maintaining that Gericke was supreme, others that Muck ranked highest and many more will insist that Kousevitzky has brouhgt the orchestra to a state of perfection hitherto unattained. But the consensus of opinion, not only in Boston, but elsewhere, is that the Boston Symphony has held its place firmly in the musical world during the 59 years of its existence. A slight internal brawl did interfere with its personnel some 20 years ago, but this was quickly remedied. Today the orchestra takes rank with the finest in the world, as attested to by one of the most observing and learned music reviewers this country has produced—the late Lawrence Gilman.

Following one of the orchestra's concerts in Carnegie hall in New York, Mr. Gilman wrote in the Herald-Tribune: "The audience that gathered in Carnegie hall for the first Boston Symphony concert of the season was a sight to cheerd the most despondent music-lover—if any such were in the neighborhood. The occasion wore an unmistakable air of festival. No palms or wreaths or smilax or potted plants adorned the stage or auditorium. They were not required. The audience itself provided the adornment and the festal note. It was a remarkable audience—so large that one had the odd impression that there were at least two persons occupying every seat. A sense of well-bred eagerness hummed through the hall—for this audience was nothing if not well-bred. It was an audience that diffused intelligence and well-being and responsiveness and gentle manners. It was both excited and restrained. It was electrically vibrant. It was determined to be musically pleased, and certain that it would be. It greeted Mr. Kousevitzky, when he appeared upon the stage, with an explosive outburst of applause; and one expected to see it rise to its feet, in emulation of the orchestra's action—undoubtedly it wanted to, but felt a bit shy. The words Success, Prestige, Achievement were not inscribed upon banners or in electric lights above the platform. They did not need to be, for one could read their meaning in every facet of the spectacle. The orchestra has climed, slowly, steadily, indomitably. Today, 20 years after the disaster that it suffered, it has come through, magnificently and completely. It is now one of the two of three excelling orchestras of the world, a superb instrument of beauty and eloquence; and the organization that directs it is a model of dignity, efficiency, and artistic self-respect. If all this is not a triumph of will and spirit and integrity over adversity and mischance, a triumph that cannot be too loudly cheered, one does not know what else to call it. Mr. Koussevitzky is a deft and canny program-builder, with a lively sense of public psychology. He had devised for his first evening concert in Carnegie hall a perfectly constructed list of pieces, fit for the occasion, the place, the mood, the time. First the 'Tombeau de Couperin' of Ravel, with its exquisite artificiality and grace, its delicate touch of harmonic asperity, its craft and guile and charm. Then the great Fifth Symphony of Sibelius, with its nobly heroic passion and inspiration. And, as closing piece, another Fifth Symphony, which, as Sir James Barrie's Policeman would certainly have recognized, is infalliable. The whole program, in fact, was infalliable. Its hearers followed it with absorbed intentness, and rewarded each performance with that peculiar kind of fervor that one notes at a Boston Symphony concert."

Mr. Gilman, who died last September at the age of 61, was program annotator of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra for many years, but this did not blind him to the virtues of organizations from other climes. His tribute to the Boston orchestra is eloquent testimony of a rare objective viewpoint.

—A. L. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW REPUBLIC
NEW YORK, N. Y.

FEB 26 1940

Miniature Suite, by John Christopher Smith; The Power of Music, by William Boyce. Arthur Fiedler's Sinfonietta (Victor, two 10-inch records; $2.50 with album). Now that Harl MacDonald admits that he—not Smith, who used to copy music for Handel—wrote all but four bars of this suite, it is time to say that in spite of the hoax the music does sound eighteenth-century, and that it is brisk and competent. The Sinfonietta, unless it has been reorganized recently, is made up of first and second-chair men from the Boston Symphony. Although weighted a little too heavily in favor of the winds, its performance is clean-cut and lively. There is considerable to recommend this little set—the quiet passages for muted strings in the slow movement of the Suite, the sure, clean playing of the oboe, an unusually beautiful flute tone (it must be Laurent), and the brisk little fugue of the Boyce overture which was, in fact, written by Boyce. The surface of these records is a little rough. Otherwise the recording itself is good.

Symphony No. 9 in D Minor (Unfinished), by Anton Bruckner. Siegmund von Hausegger and the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra (Victor, 14 sides; $14). After having been misrepresented to the world for decades in an unfortunate transcription by one of the composer's disciples, Bruckner's last symphony now appears for the first time on records in its original form. Even with the last movement unwritten, the work is very long. Ideas unroll slowly with lengthy themes, piling up like clouds over a wide plain. Once arrived, they are reluctant to go. Long sustained chords give a horizontal effect at times, and the mood of the whole is autumnal. There are dull stretches (particularly in the Adagio movement), and there are pieces of Beethoven and Wagner sticking out here and there. But in general it is a scholarly work, finely recorded and superbly performed.

Either the Munich acoustics or the recording equipment used were unusually good, for in places the sound of the strings comes close to what you would hear in a hall. The brass is broad and powerful, as brass should be. Prolonged, smooth tympani rolls on the basic note build a solid foundation for Bruckner's plays on the chord of D minor, and deserve special mention. Reputedly in the very good graces of its prominent (you know who) neighbor up in Berchtesgaden, the Munich orchestra faces certain hurdles in the American market. Its performance of this work, nevertheless, is first-class.

Symphony Number Two in D, by Beethoven. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Victor, 7 sides; $7). By speeding up the standard tempos, Koussevitsky has been able to cut the usual eighth side, and to lop $1 from the price of this set. The orchestra plays with a drive and brilliance which are striking at times, but which add nothing to the substance of the work, and are only obtained at the expense of the warmth and charm which are usually associated with this symphony. Structural weaknesses, mercifully slurred over by most conductors, are brought forth with a hard glitter. This performance does not measure up to the Boston Symphony's usual high standard, or to the recording of the same work made for Columbia by Weingartner and the London Symphony (8 sides; $6) last year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM EAST LIVERPOOL, O.
REVIEW

MAR 1 - 1940

The World Of Music

NEW YORK—The latest work of the Russian modernist composer, Serge Prokofieff, will be introduced to this country on March 21 and 23 by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

It is Prokofieff's 'cello concerto in E minor, Opus 58. The soloist will be Gregor Piatagorsky, who is regarded by Koussevitzky as one of the greatest 'cellists of the day.

New York will hear its first performance of the Prokofieff second violin concerto on Feb. 16, when the Boston Symphony will make its third visit of the season to Carnegie hall. The soloist will be Jascha Heifetz.

The second violin concerto was given its first performance in this country by the Boston Symphony and Heifetz two seasons ago.

(United Press Correspondence)

MUSIC

Herald March 2

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 17th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Jan Smeterlin, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 5 in C sharp minor..Mahler
Symphonie Concertante for piano and orchestra, Op. 60..........Szymanowski

Yesterday's was a remarkably contrasted program: the brilliance and conciseness of the Szymanowski Concerto after the massiveness of Mahler. For us the former was incomparably the more interesting work, and for that reason preference shall be given it here.

It is, first of all, a most admirably contrived work. The balance between the piano and the orchestra is beautifully juggled, as it were. In any ordinary concerto the solo instrument is naturally favored; but in this type of composition, the "symphonie concertante," the problem is rather different. Here the piano, with the exception of a short cadenza in the first movement, is an integral part of the orchestra. It does not stand apart in sharply contrasted isolation.

Secondly, the melodic writing is exceedingly graceful, for example the entrance of the piano in the first movement. Thirdly, the contrast of movements is most effective. The spareness of the andante falls perfectly before the vigorous and exciting, dance-like finale. We recall Szymanowski's 2d Violin Concerto, played here five years ago, with great pleasure. To that favorable impression may now be added this splendid Symphonie Concertante.

Mr. Smeterlin was obviously just the soloist for the work. His knowledge of the score at first hand from the composer, his beautifully clean technique and clear touch, combined with Mr. Koussevitzky's skill in blending the orchestra with the piano, made the perfromance a memorable event.

Further performances of the Mahler 5th Symphony serve but to make clearer its virtues and vices. The first part of two movements is much the best. Here Mahler is at his most impressive. We must also confess to having come round to the adagietto. But that virtue is largely dependent on the performance. If you have an orchestra of strings as fine as the Boston Symphony and if you have a conductor like Mr. Koussevitzky who is willing to play it as slowly as possible and with corresponding warmth of tone, all is well. If not, not.

On the other side, the finale is for us still mainly sententious and the scherzo a prime example of Mahler's inability to criticize his own work. The scherzo is very much like Strauss; but Strauss knew how to get away with the commonplace and make shameless and effective use of it. The spectacle of Mahler trying to be vulgar is like that of a clergyman telling a broad story so as to be thought a good fellow.

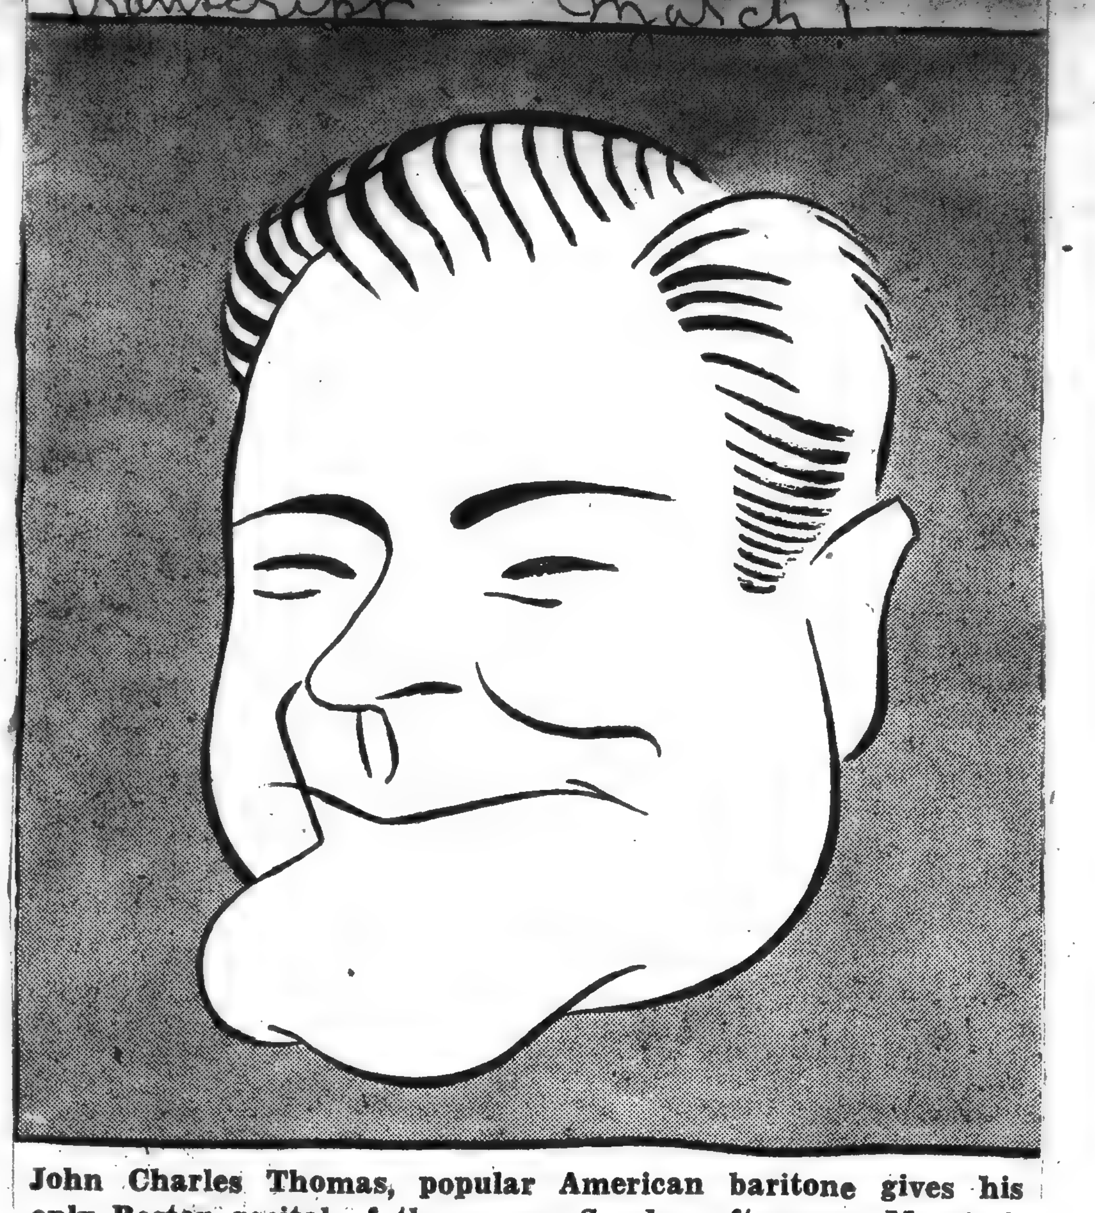
We once made the statement, apropos of this same 5th Symphony, that Mahler was an inartistic composer. He both was and was not. He tried so hard that it hurts to observe the huge expenditure of intellect. And he so often failed. He did so, to be sure, in a big way; and that is some compensation. But we also rejoice the more when he succeeded, as in the first part of this Symphony.

Yesterday's performance, as we have indicated in the case of the adagietto, was a superb realization of the Symphony. Mr. Koussevitzky's skill in setting forth this long work is little short of marvelous. And then to turn his hand to the utterly different Szymanowski is further cause for wonder and acclaim.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the soloist will be Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist, in Prokofieff's new Concerto in E minor Op. 58 and Strauss' "Don Quixote." The opening number will be Prokofieff's Classical Symphony.

Singing in Symphony Hall

Transcript March 1



John Charles Thomas, popular American baritone gives his only Boston recital of the season Sunday afternoon, March 3.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

MAR 3 - 1940

Article on Music From Portugal

THE HISTORY and outlook of music in America, from the Metropolitan opera to such symphonic groups as Dr. Serge Koussevitsky's Symphony orchestra, the Worcester Music Festival and other manifestations of music throughout the country are the subject of a well-written and substantiated article in "Arte Musical" of Lisbon, Portugal, by Mrs. Claudio Carneyro (Katherine Hickel) formerly of this city. In the Christmas number Mrs. Carneyro, American wife of the brilliant young Portuguese composer and pianist, enumerates for her adopted countrymen the musical inclinations, and outstanding musical institutions of music centers of the United States, going into detail about the Festival which she attended for so long, as child and young girl. When I finish with the magazine, well-printed, most artistically bound, of some 24 pages, in cream covers with hunter's green letters, it is to go to Mr. Hamilton B. Wood of the Music Festival Association for the files of the organization or his own personal reference. The Longy School of Music in Cambridge with its Worcester born principal, Miss Minna Holl, is also described. She speaks of the Negro spirituals as a particularly North American type of music, in brief, in the limited space of a five-page article she contrives to cover much ground of the classical culture of music in America.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORWICH, CONN.
BULLETIN

MAR 1 - 1940

ARTHUR ABELL PICTURED WITH SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Arthur Abell, a graduate from Norwich Free Academy, class of 1889, appears in several photos with Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in a recent issue of a well known pictorial magazine. The pictures were taken in Russia and Germany more than 30 years ago.

Mr. Abell has been a close personal friend of Koussevitzky for 42 years and it was acting upon his advice that the former manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Brennan, went to Paris to engage Koussevitzky 16 years ago.

Globe

MUSIC

March 2

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

If the Fifth Symphony of Gustav Mahler has a few more such cordial receptions as it enjoyed at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon it will cease to be "debatable" music. As this reviewer observed the last time it was heard here, just about two years ago, "little by little the music of Mahler makes its way." Even those who are less than whole-souled Mahlerians could hardly begrudge the popular success yesterday of both score and interpretation.

The 70-minute-long Symphony was followed by the first Boston performance of the Symphonie Concertante for piano and orchestra by the late Polish composer, Karol Szymanowski. Jan Smeterlin was the soloist. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

An odd fact about listening to Mahler is that the more you hear the less you are preoccupied by what first seems to be the "banality" of his melodies, the square-cut rhythms and the thundering sonorities he obtained from a very large orchestra. As you become acquainted with Mahler, dominating impressions are first wonder at the complex mind which produced so involved, so technically difficult a music, then admiration and affection for the noble cast of his romantic imagination. And after a while even the exhausting concentration demanded is less and less a matter of effort.

Mahler was perhaps the last creative artist whose spirit was shaped by the visionary ideals of the 19th Century (a period, incidentally, that has taken many an undeserved hard word): his music can be grasped only through understanding of those ideals. If you seek merely for technical skill, impersonal correctness, mastery of form, for sophistication or cleverness in Mahler, bewilderment and disappointment are your inevitable reward.

Only when one has some idea of the emotional side of Mahler is it possible to recognize his sense of grotesquerie w· not clumsy humor, that his long-drawn slow movements, his lush melodies and intricate harmonies were not a manifestation of pompousness. All these were simply the natural way of expression for a son of the 19th Century whose heart was as full of warmth as his mind dwelt upon beauty. Mahler had, of course, his weaknesses, most conspicuously the length at which he wrote.

Yesterday's performance was a marvel of romantic fervor. Perhaps Mr. Koussevitzky dragged the adagietto; what did that matter in the total effect? The orchestra served both Mahler and Koussevitzky well count the performance an event of the season. When, by the way, are we to hear again "The Song of the Earth," Mahler's greatest masterpiece?

Szymanowski's work had the misfortune to come after the Symphony, when all but a very few compositions would be anti-climax. In spite of Mr. Smeterlin's brilliant execution of the solo part, the Symphonie Concertante must be acknowledged a disappointment.

If only Szymanowski, who actually was a gifted though not first-rank composer, had been able to sustain his music at the level of its most interesting pages, there would have been a different story. It begins nicely, a seductive sort of tune in the piano implying a good deal of rhythmic and harmonic fun to come. The joke is spoiled when the ghosts of Ravel and Stravinsky caper about in orchestra and piano, and presently the whole thing is over, leaving a sense of animated monotony without much point.

C. W. D.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE

MAR 1 - 1940

"Koussevitzky, [illegible] Conducts Best U. S. Orchestra". Thus runs a headline in "Life" Feb. 26 issue. The following is from the story under the above quoted caption: "To the 110 men in his orchestra, Koussevitzky is a tyrant who can be appeased only by fine playing. To the adoring dowagers of Boston, he is an amiable and courtly grand seigneur who never has time for a social life. He likes good clothes, good food and champagne. He gets $35,000 or $40,000 a year. To Boston he is well worth it."

PLAY MAHLER'S 5TH SYMPHONY

Orchestra Gives Bohemian Full Justice

Post — March 2

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Not yet have any repercussions of the international situation reached the Symphony Concerts. Neither Trojans nor Tyrians are discriminated against. This week Mahler and Szymanowski, a Bohemian and a Pole, divide the programme, and next week it will be Prokofieff and Straus, a Russian and a German. Let us hope that this happy state of affairs remains unaltered.

Jewish by blood and Czech by birth, Mahler was nevertheless so closely allied to the German school of his day that it is hard to think of him in any other terms. Certainly the Fifth Symphony, by which he was represented yesterday, partakes of the grandiloquence that characterized both "Ein Heldemleben" and the "Symphonia Domestica" of Strauss, between which it stood in point of composition. Through the Eighth Symphony this tendency toward bigness was to progress, until in that so-called "Symphony of a Thousand," expansion of means could hardly go farther. Yet it was Mahler himself who, in "The Song of the Earth" and the Ninth Symphony, started the reaction against what Henry T. Finck used to deride as Jumboism in music.

A true child of its time, then, is this "Giant" Symphony, which starts in the gloom of C-sharp minor and ends in the brightness of D major, a key that with Mahler was always synonomous with exuberance of spirit. Now that music has gone as far from this largeness of utterance as it conceivably could, witness Stravinsky's "Card Game," as the reductio ad absurdum of the contrary tendency; audiences might either be repelled or attracted by it. Judging from the reception accorded yesterday's performance, as well as the two others under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, it is decidedly a case of attraction.

And after the almost naked forthrightness of Mahler's music, the late Karol Szymanowski's "Symphonie Concertante" for piano and orchestra, which was played here for the first time with Jan Smeterlin as soloist, seemed somehow singularly muddled and uncertain. And as Mahler swamped even Wagner when Dr. Koussevitzky revived this symphony in October, 1937, so did he come close to obliterating poor Szymanowski. Perhaps it would have been kinder to play the two pieces in reverse order, or even to play the symphony itself. Neither Mahler's nor Bruckner's symphonies seems to tolerate companionship.

It is hard to be definite about such matters, but yesterday's performance of this symphony did not seem to be as cunningly adjusted on the tonal side as the two which Dr. Koussevitzky gave us in 1937, though the lovely Adagietto for strings and harp was beautifully set forth. Mahler scores sonorously and at times shrilly and Dr. Koussevitzky was not inclined to let us forget it. In spite of this, or perhaps because of it, the glorious Finale was literally and otherwise quite overpowering. With Szymanowski's only partly successful composition, soloist and orchestra strove valiantly, but, as suggested, the cards were stacked against them.

THIS CLIPPING FROM IOWA CITY, IA.
DAILY IOWAN

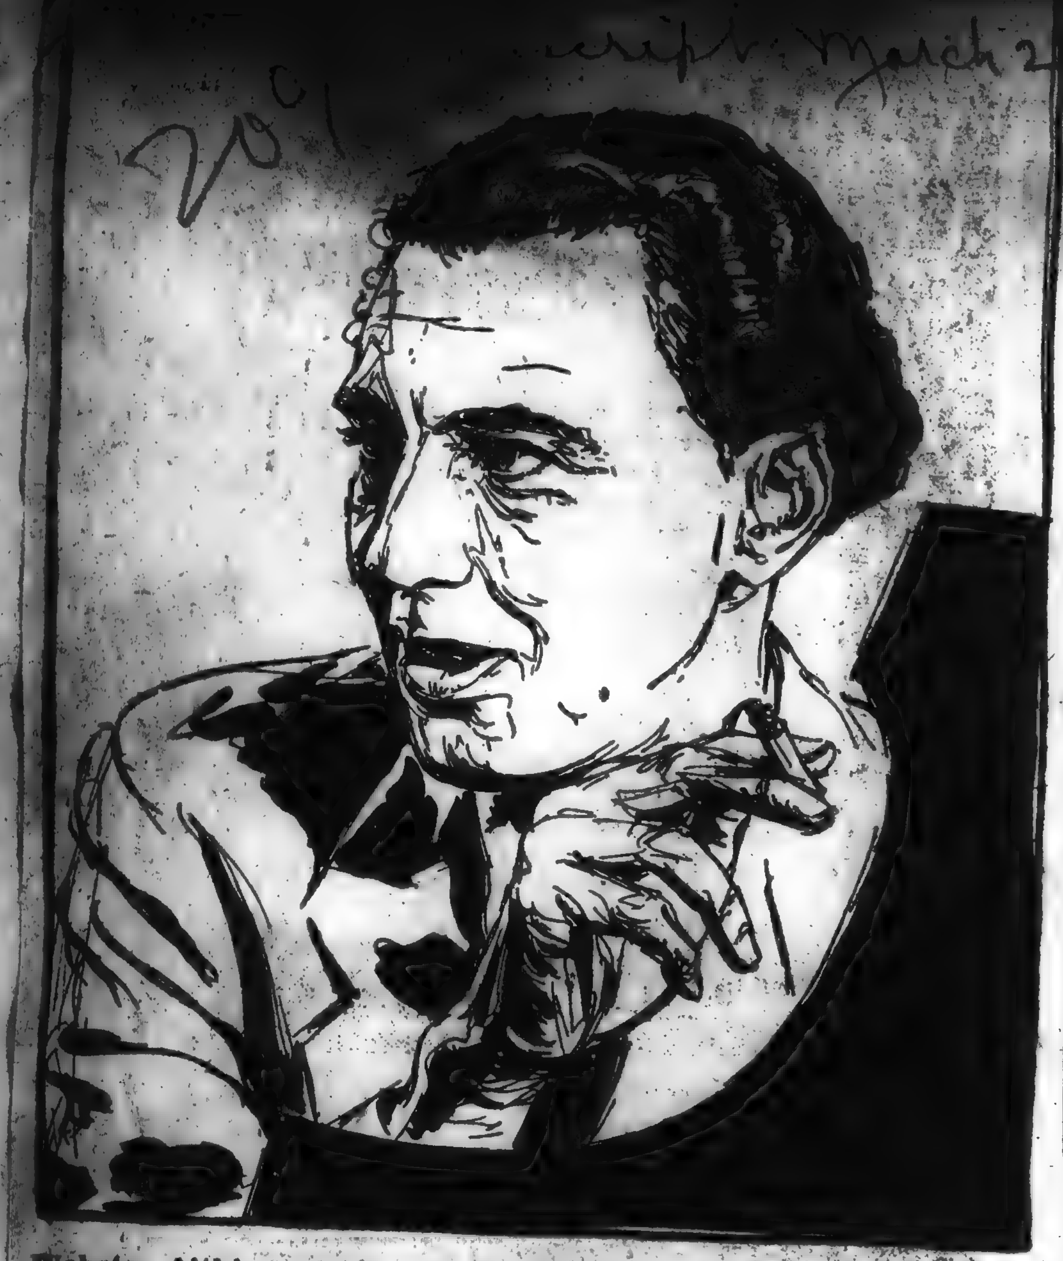
MAR 2 - 1940

To Play Sibelius Symphony in Union Music Room Today

The Boston symphony orchestra, under the direction of [illegible] Koussevitzky, will play "Symphony No. 2 in D Major" by Sibelius in a recorded program in the music room of Iowa Union this afternoon from 1 to 2 o'clock.

Movements of the symphony to be played are Allegretto, Andante, Vivacissimo, and Allegro moderato.

20 Transcript March 2



Webster Aitkin, soloist in Mozart's B major Piano Concerto with Boston Symphony Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon.

Polish Music

Smeterlin Soloist with Symphony In New Szymanowski Composition

By EDWARD DOWNES

The first performance in Boston of Karol Szymanowski's "Symphonie Concertante for Piano and Orchestra" was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Serge Koussevitzky conducted and the Polish pianist, Jan Smeterlin, took the solo part. The first of the program was taken up with Gustav Mahler's gigantic Fifth Symphony. Smeterlin has done much to propagate the music of his countryman Szymanowski and yesterday he proved himself a sensitive and sympathetic propagandist. There was extraordinary verve and vitality in his playing which gave the incisive rhythms of the score an exhilarating snap and resiliency. In loud passages his tone, when it was audible over the orchestral din, was crisp and brilliant. In the quieter episodes such as the Andante, he had a pellucid, pearling touch which combined beautifully with the solo violin and wind instruments.

This is the ouly work for piano and orchestra which Szymanowski has left us and it was no accident that he named it a "Symphonie Concertante" instead of "Piano Concerto." For though it contains passages of extreme difficulty for the piano, and even has considerable stretches where only the piano is heard, yet the whole is dominated by the orchestra, not by the solo insstrument.

Its instrumentation is brilliant and noisy, and the rhythms are exciting. Whether very much else beside excitement is engendered by this Szymanowski opus is a question that will be answerd by time. At least one listener yesterday was left completely cold.

Dr. Koussevitzky enjoys a justly founded repute as one of the most brilliant program-builders before the public, but his flair seemed to have deserted him yesterday. Surely Mahler's appallingly long Fifth Symphony could have been followed by something of more definitely contrasting character than the Szymanowski. Or the other way around, the Szymanowski could have had a more ingratiating introduction than the Mahler.

In spite of the moments of high lyric inspiration, flashes of dramatic genius, the Fifth Symphony is wearying. Its orchestration is bold and subtle, the themes are frequently distinguished and the emotion sincere, but the work as a whole is amorphous. In a composition of such length—it lasted 70 minutes yesterday—the most carefully contrived form is needed to present the matter intelligibly and enjoyably.

Koussevitzky has an unusual flair for Mahler's music, but the response of the orchestra was uneven. The brasses did not cover themselves with glory. Their slips and inaccuracies of pitch were all too frequent.

It is only fair to add that the Mahler Symphony (or its interpretation) was heartily applauded.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 4 - 1940

NEW MUSIC

Polish music had its place in the sun on Friday in Boston when Koussevitsky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a ~~first~~ performance of Szymanowski's Symphonie Concertante for piano and orchestra, Op. 60. The eminent Polish pianist Jan Smeterlin was the soloist. His admirable musicianship, combined with his obvious zeal in interpreting the music of his friend and countryman, gave as authentic a reading to this complex score as one could imagine.

As for the orchestra and its leader, there seems to be no limit to the difficulties they can surmount. The listener can only marvel at the skill that takes them over erratic rhythms and incomprehensible chords. We clapped with exuberance at this Szymanowski performance but truth compels the admission that it was mainly because everyone reached the double bar at once and the thing came out even.

Szymanowski treats the piano as a part of the orchestra, and only at intervals is it allowed to sing a lyric bit. The opening bars are delightfully misleading but before one gets settled for enjoyment, the composition quickly becomes queer. Szymanowski sometimes writes in the manner of the harsh modern German school without the motion which they introduce by their wanderings in a keyless maze. At times his rhythms are those of Ravel's insistent tympani and his chords those of Debussy's impressionism without the fragile grace of the Frenchman. In the andante molot sostenuto a truly inspired bit was written for flute and harp with a cloudy accompaniment on the piano and now and again a delicate reed tone from nowhere in particular. Otherwise, we found this Symphonie Concertante too thick and heavy, with far too much percussion. It suffered by contrast with its companion piece on the program, the Symphony No. 5 in C-sharp minor by Mahler which was played beautifully.

R. T.

. . . .

GREEN MAGAZINE, Boston, Sunday, March 3, 1940

24

The Symphony Plays Mahler's Majestic Fifth

By LEO GAFFNEY

TAKING his own word for it, Gustav Mahler in his Fifth Symphony let himself go, leapt out of the world of men and affairs to some far distant shore where only those of the same mind may follow.

Since, as the Irish dramatist, Paul Vincent Carroll puts it, "there are no words at all for some of the things we think and feel," the German Mahler cannot very well name the place of his transfiguration.

Nor can anyone else. The Mahler Fifth is a free roaming of the spirit which each listener can only experience for himself. In the formal week-end concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky reproduced in its entirety the lengthy and profound piece, from the vast and impassioned funeral march, through the ineffably tender adagietto for harp and strings, to the tumultuous conclusion — all with magnificent eloquence—and it all added up to only what the individual listener could make of it.

If lucky, the transported auditor might achieve the chaste and rarefied plane of Mahler. Most of us, without doubt, fell miserably short.

THE second half of the program—there were but two numbers—was taken up by the Szymanowski Symphonie Concertante for Piano and Orchestra, with no less a person than Jan Smeterlin for soloist.

Brilliant though the performance was, it was a come-down from the pearly peaks of Mahler. The all-but-atonal nature of the work seemed too raucous in contrast. But that is the hazard of program-making.

As the Concertante wore on, it was possible to admire the artful dodging of piano and orchestra—none ever quite superseding the other—and the general vigor.

And when admiration lagged, there was respect for the intricacies of pattern, chordal humors and the virtuosity of all concerned.

Karl Muck

Herald March

It is ironic that Dr. Karl Muck should die in another period of world history when international animosities inevitably reawaken and sharpen memories of that bitter winter of 1917-18 in Boston. Behind those incidents in Providence, Baltimore and elsewhere, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra's failure to play "The Star Spangled Banner" became virtually a political issue, there were months of rumors, suspicions and uncertainties. These finally led to Dr. Muck's internment in a Georgia concentration camp as an alien enemy, and to the decision of the venerable Major Higginson, who had loyally supported his conductor during the crisis, to surrender the orchestra's management to a board of trustees. It was a disagreeable and trying period for all concerned, and one indeed from which the orchestra did not entirely recover until the coming of Dr. Koussevitzky in 1924.

Better, then, that we remember Karl Muck as he was in the earlier years. Then, superb musician, tireless drillmaster, and artist of detail, he raised the Boston Symphony Orchestra to a position of unchallenged eminence in the musical world. Better to recall him as Philip Hale wrote of him in The Herald in the winter of 1915-16:

> These concerts in Boston are so remarkable, they have been so remarkable under the leadership of Dr. Muck, that they are now taken by too many as a matter of course. For the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not merely one that contains accomplished virtuosos; the orchestra is a virtuoso. It is an instrument that, having been brought to a state of perfect mechanism by Dr. Muck, responds to his imaginative and poetic wishes. He stands there calm, undemonstrative, graceful, elegant, aristocratic; a man of singularly commanding and magnetic personality even in repose. The orchestra is his speech, the expression of the composer's music as it appeals to the conductor's brain, heart and soul.

Music Exhibit Goes on Display At Kirstein Memorial Library

Monitor March 4

A great deal of interest is being expressed by patrons of the Kirstein Memorial Library in a music exhibit which has just gone on display, according to Miss Dorothy F. Nourse, Branch Librarian in charge. This is the first time, Miss Nourse said, that music has been featured in an exhibit there. The show will remain until March 20. It is the loan of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An attractive window on City Hall Avenue and a large case on the third floor divide honors, with paintings by Donald Greason of Rockport, Mass., causing much comment. Sibelius's autographed picture and music, and printed scores of Tschaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, Beethoven's Ninth, and Stravinsky's "Pétruchka" are company for the manuscript score of Harvard's Edward Burlingame Hill, whose retirement next fall was announced yesterday.

Mr. Hill is represented by his Ode for the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Harvard is also represented in the poem that goes with this, written by Robert Hillyer. Some of the Boston Symphony's guest conductors of this past winter have autographed copies of their music, and an interesting illustrated cover of Tchaikovsky's "Queen of Spades" is shown. The Library is also showing quite a few books in connection with the exhibit, such as two of Wagner's operas illustrated by Arthur Rackham. One is the "Valkyrie"; the other contains "Siegfried" and "The Twilight of the Gods." A new book which came out last week, "America's Symphony Orchestras," loaned to the Library, is by Margaret Grant and Herman S. Hettinger.

John Burk's book that is being published March 20 on Clara Schumann may also be seen. Mr. Burk is further represented by "Philip Hale's Program Notes." The Library finds demand for its "The Boston Symphony Orchestra: 1881-1931," by Mark DeWolfe of Boston, which is also on display. Among new and popular books, Miss Nourse finds, are Deems Taylor's "Of Men and Music," and Aaron Copland's "What to Listen for in Music."

The framed autographed pictures and music were lent by Boaz Piller of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Also available are biographies of the men represented in the window.

The upstairs exhibit features the manuscript score of "Metamorphoseon," a work written for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony, by Ottorino Respighi, and the original manuscript score of the Fourth Symphony of Sergi Prokofieff. One finds also autographed pictures of both Respighi and Prokofieff, as well as one of Walter Piston. Jerome Brush's pencil sketches of players in the Boston Symphony, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra," Miss Nourse says, are very popular. A large framed picture of the Boston Symphony, an oil painting of Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, and posters by the Library staff, add to the interest of the exhibit.

RARE CONCERTO

Post Mar 5

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Conservatively, Mr. Burk's programme notes stated that "there is no positive record of a previous performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra "of the Piano Concerto in B-flat major of Mozart (K. No. 450), with which the young American pianist, Webster Aitken, introduced himself to Boston at Symphony Hall last night. One of three piano concertos composed in the spring of 1784, when Mozart was 28, this one in B-flat major is a piece of such charm that we are most grateful to Mr. Aitken for bringing it to our attention.

Not only do the first and third movements disclose Mozart's characteristic grace, his infallible certainty of touch, his unfailing sense of proportion, but the slow movement evinces a depth of feeling that we do not always find, even in his more famed creations.

No doubt some of the credit for the appeal of this Concerto must go to Mr. Aitken, who proved himself to be a Mozart player par excellence, and some must go to Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, the latter providing an exquisite accompaniment. Let us hope that we may soon have the pleasure of hearing Mr. Aitken in recital. The familiar matter of Arthur Foote's Suite for strings in E major and Brahms' Second Symphony, both played at the regular concerts of the season, made the rest of the programme, which will be repeated this afternoon.

CONSIDERING MUSIC OF THE PAST

March 3 Post

Musicians Digging Into All the Records

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

ONE SIGN of the times omitted from last week's summary of the Thirties is the great increase of interest in the music of the more or less remote past. For a time the music turned out from month to month and year to year, together with the accepted classics, was sufficient fare for concert-goers. And if we go back still further we find that the music performed was almost entirely contemporaneous. Even Bach was all but forgotten for nearly a century.

Now, however, with the music of the day falling off both in quality and in quantity, at least as far as Europe is concerned, it is more important than ever before that we do not miss any tricks from the past.

A lot of research is sometimes needed before some of these treasures can be brought to light, and many musicians and musicologists (a comparatively new term) are devoting their attention to this sort of tonal archaeology. Italy was all agog last summer over a Vivaldi festival which shed new light upon the accomplishments and importance of that 17th century composer. Here in Boston we have the Society of Early Music, which is working in a field first cultivated by the late Arnold Dolmetsch. And Thursday evening at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, a concert by the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, under the direction of G. Wallace Woodworth, will be partly devoted to the music of two composers who are but names to many and probably not even that to many more, Giovanni Gabrieli (1557-1612) and Alexander Dargomijsky (1813-69). The Russian, who chanced to be born in the momentous year that was responsible for both Wagner and Verdi, will be represented by a chorus from his unfinished fairy opera, "Rogdana." The Italian, who was organist at St. Mark's in Venice from 1585 until his death, will be heard through a "Processional and Ceremonial Music," for voices, organ and brass, written for performance in St. Mark's. A brass choir from the Boston Symphony Orchestra will assist and E. Power Biggs will preside at the organ. As a picturesque touch, the reverse side of the advance programme contains a reproduction of Gentile Bellini's richly detailed painting, "Processione in Piazza San Marco."

Nor does Mr. Woodworth neglect the composers of the present. Walter Piston, Randall Thompson and E. B. Lawton, all Harvard alumni, have place on the programme, which is completed by Mozart's "Masonic Music" and two secular choruses by Handel. A distinguished list.

By token of his Second Violin Concerto, not to mention "Peter and the Wolf," Serge Prokofieff, as was suggested here last week, is one European who is keeping his end up. At the Symphony Concerts of this week Gregor Piatigorsky will participate in the first Boston performance of the Russian composer's new concerto for violoncello. The programme opens with his "Classical" Symphony, and the final number is Strauss' "Don Quixote," in the performance of which Mr. Piatigorsky once more assumes here the important part for 'cello.

The fifth and last pair but one of the supplementary series of Symphony Concerts falls tomorrow evening and Tuesday afternoon. Webster Aitken, a rising American pianist, will be the soloist and his chosen piece is Mozart's Concerto in B-flat major, K. 450. The other numbers on this programme are Arthur Foote's Suite in E major for strings and the Second Symphony of Brahms.

210

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

MAR 4 - 1940

Dr. Karl Muck, Famed Musician, Dies in Stuttgart

Led Boston Symphony, Was Interned in U. S. During World War

By the Associated Press.

STUTTGART, Germany, March 4.—Dr. Karl Muck, 80, noted interpreter of Wagnerian music at the Bayreuth Festivals and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1906 to 1908 and again from 1912 to 1918, died today.

Dr. Muck's last appearance as a national music figure was during the Leipzig observance of the 50th anniversary of Richard Wagner's death in February, 1933.

At that time Hitler had just come into power and he sat in the front row of the famous Gewandhaus. On the occasion of his last birthday Dr. Muck received the Order of the German Eagle from Hitler.

In Great Days

Dr. Karl Muck, famous Wagnerian conductor, as he appeared at the height of his career.

Muck a Conductor For Half a Century

Karl Muck, greatest of Wagnerian conductors, wielded his baton throughout five decades and was an inhabitant of three worlds—the old world of pre-war monarchical Germany, the fated world of the Weimar republic and the totalitarian world of Hitler's ascendency.

Chosen by Frau Cosima Wagner to direct the annual Wagnerian festival in Beyreuth, he so identified himself with this institution over the course of more than 20 years that to think of the Ring operas o of Parsival inevitably was to think of him.

Refused to Play Anthem.

During his second engagement a conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck was interned as an enemy alien. He refused t play the American national anthen at the beginning of a concert i Providence, R. I.

Reports that he was at odds witl Hitler arose from his resignation a conductor of the Hamburg Philhar monic Orchestra. Last autumn, how ever, he was decorated by De Fuehrer, an event which bore ou his contention that he had resigne because of the Hamburg Senate' decision to merge the Philharmoni with the orchestra of the municipa theater.

Dr. Muck was born in Wuerzbur on Oct. 22, 1859, to the wife of councilor to the Bavarian government. He made his public debu at 11, as a pianist, and soon thereafter as a first violinist with symphony orchestra.

In University at 16.

But his education was by n means along strictly musical lines Graduating from the Gymnasium h entered Heidelberg University a the early age of 16. He transferre a year later to the University o Leipzig, where he concentrated upo philosophy and classical philology At the same time he was a studen at Leipzig Conservatory of Musi under Ernst Friedrich Richter an Karl Reinecke.

At 20, when he received hi Ph. D., he was appearing as pian soloist in Leipzig's Gewandhaus concert and had decided to make hi career entirely in music.

In 1880 he became choir master o the municipal opera in Zurich Later he became theatrical conductor in Salzburg and filled engagements in the civic opera houses in Bruenn and Graz. In 1886 he became first conductor at Prague.

Called to Berlin

By 1892, when he was called to the Berlin Royal Opera as first conductor, he was already famous ranked with Hans Richter and Feli Weingaertner in a sort of musica triumvirate.

He first came to America and th Boston Symphony for the two year 1906-08. In 1911, when he was offered the post of musical directo general at the Royal Opera i Munich, he rejected the proffer t return to the United States.

His extraordinary, almost copperplate reading of Wagnerian score exactly as Wagner had written then made him the ideal exponent o these works for the musically in itiated, although he was not a popularly brilliant conductor to swee lay audiences off their feet.

Adhere to Score.

Such legends as grew up abou im were built upon this tenaciou adherence to score, upon his strikin resemblance to Richard Wagne (especially in profile) and upon hi tremendous capacity for cigarets.

The resemblance to Wagner le to rumors that he was the grea master's son, rumors which Dr Muck ignored, and his heavy cigare consumption was blamed by some for the nicotine poisoning which enfeebled his later days.

Dr. Muck continued as conductor of the Boston Symphony for a time after the United States entered the first World War, but his lack of tact made some such denouement as that which led to his internment almost inevitable.

Called It Unsuitable.

His explanation of his refusal to play the national anthem was not unlike that which Toscanini gave a few years ago when he refused to play the Fascist anthem during a concert in Italy. In both instances the conductors emphasized their feeling that the national hymns were unsuitable to the occasion.

In the internment camp he was a companion of the former German consul general in New York, whose daughter, the Baroness von Schollley, was to care for him during his last lays in her Stuttgart home.

Dr. Muck was released in 1919 and returned to Germany. He wouldn't re-enter the United States, although offered large financial inducements to do so.

Instead, he conducted as guest conductor in various cities until 1922, when he became conductor of the Hamburg orchestra. In 1927 he resumed his activities in connection with the Bayreuth festival, alternating in 1930 with Toscanini.

His last appearance before a great audience was in 1933, when he conducted at a Leipzig memorial concert on the 50th anniversary of Wagner's death. The following year he became partially paralyzed and three years later was unable to walk.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL-AMERICAN

MAR 4 - 1940

Dr. Karl Muck Dies; Was Noted Conductor

STUTTGART, Germany, March 4 (By International News Service).—Dr. Karl Muck, internationally known symphonic conductor and interpreter of Wagnerian music, died today at the age of 80.

Dr. Muck was for many years conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Karl Muck, Former Head Of Boston Symphony

Transcript March 4

Noted Wagnerian Interpreter Was Friend of Hitler

STUTTGART, Germany, March 4 (AP)—Dr. Karl Muck, celebrated interpreter of Wagnerian music at the Bayreuth festivals and former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died today at the age of 80.

He conducted the Boston Symphony from 1906 to 1908 and again from 1912 to 1918.

Dr. Muck's last appearance as a national music figure was during the Leipzig observance of the 50th anniversary of Richard Wagner's death in February, 1933.

At that time Hitler had just come into power and he sat in the front row of the famous Gewandhaus. On the occasion of his last birthday, Dr. Muck was awarded the Order of the German Eagle by Hitler himself.

By Edward Downes

In Boston today, when Dr. Koussevitzky, present director of the orchestra, halted a rehearsal to inform the players of Dr. Muck's death, the musicians rose in a silent two minutes tribute to their former leader.

In spite of his decoration by Adolf Hitler, Karl Muck was not the man to have gloried in the achievements of the present Nazi regime. Muck was an ardent and uncompromising patriot, but his intellectual and ethical standards were both too high for any cordial relationship to have existed between himself and National Socialism. As a matter of fact his last public appearance in Germany was just one month after Hitler's accession to power.

It was this same uncompromising attitude which led to bitter attacks on Muck in 1918 while he was conductor of the Boston Symphony. Political passions ran high in those days—even at Symphony concerts. The Boston press contained references to "the unspeakable Dr. Muck," Muck's wife was accused of being active as a German spy, and so it went. The climax was reached at a concert of the Boston Symphony in Providence when a request was received that Muck precede the performance with the Star Spangled Banner.

Cleared by Higginson

The anthem was not played, but the late Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the orchestra, exonerated Muck at the time, asserting that the request had been received only that afternoon just as the orchestra was entraining for Providence, and that there had been no time for a rehearsal.

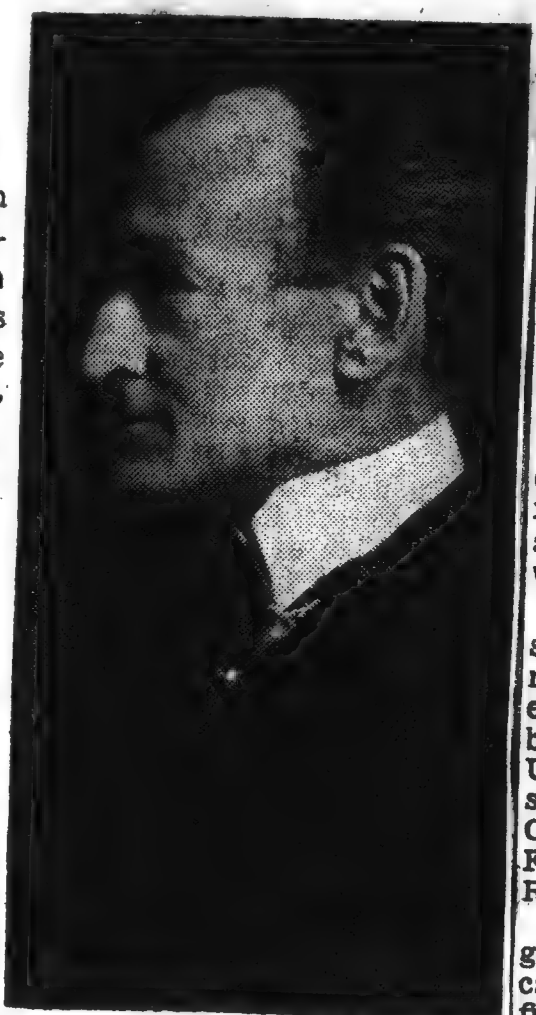
"Indeed, Dr. Muck was not even consulted and did not hear about the episode until the next day," wrote M. A. De Wolfe Howe in his 50th anniversary book on the history of the orchestra.

Dr. Muck subsequently conducted the "Star-Spangled Banner" at other concerts elsewhere in the East, but rising wartime hysteria caused him so much embarrassment that he finally resigned.

As a result of popular feeling, Dr. Muck's activities were investigated and finally he was imprisoned as an enemy alien. Though his feelings about America must have been mixed when he was finally permitted to return to Germany in 1919, it is known that in later years he was made very happy by communications from former friends in America, and one of the few pupils he ever consented to take in conducting was the American woman conductor, Antonia Brico.

About his internment, Dr. Muck once told a reporter of the Berlin Tageblatt: "For some time I was unmolested, even after America entered the conflict. In March, 1918, however, I was interned, my wife remained in our house in Boston, and I was sent to the prison camp, where I was confined with 4500 other persons.

"The treatment and shelter were altogether worthy. The food was not to be complained of." He attribdted his imprisonment to "hysteria" which, he said, was due to "British propaganda."



KARL MUCK
As Boston Remembers Him

Helped Establish Orchestra

Though he was subsequently active in Germany as conductor of the Hamburg Philharmonic Orchestra and at the Wagnerian Bayreuth Festivals, Bostonians quickly lost track of him. Yet it would seem appropriate to say today that Muck helped establish the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the enviable position it holds among the orchestras of the world.

Renowned for his ruthless discipline and for an austere manner in personal contacts, he was actually capable of the warmest friendship and an almost embarrassing generosity when his exterior reserve had been pierced and his feelings moved.

"His sometimes brusque exterior hid a most tender sympathetic heart," wrote Miss Brico, who was his last pupil. "The years I knew him he did not care to mingle in groups or go out socially, but he would sit for hours after a rehearsal or concert with one or two friends with whom he would exchange reminiscences. He had a keen sense of humor and loved to relate choice bits from his rich experiences all over the globe."

Again at Bayreuth

Since 1901 Muck had conducted Wagner's "Parsifal" at Bayreuth and when the Bayreuth Festivals were resumed after the war in 1923, he again played a prominent part in them. He had promised Richard Wagner's widow, Cosima, that as long as her son, Siegfried Wagner, lived, he, Muck, would conduct "Parsifal" at Bayreuth. Muck's word was inviolable and, though the pro-Nazi leanings of Siegfried Wagner's wife, Winifred, must have been increasingly distasteful to him, he conducted through the season of 1930, which was also the year of Arturo Toscanini's debut at Bayreuth. In the midst of the 1930 festival Siegfried Wagner died and Muck never returned to Bayreuth. He had kept his word to Cosima.

Born in Wuerzburg, the son of a Bavarian government official, Muck made his first public appearance as a pianist at the age of 11. Nine years later he was able to appear as soloist with the famous Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra and that same year he received his Ph.D. in philosophy and classical philology!

Was Diligent Pupil

Karl was a diligent pupil in school, despite his great love for music, and at the age of 16, he entered the University of Heidelberg. A year here; then to the University of Leipzig. At the same time entering the Leipzig Conservatory as a pupil of Ernest Friedrich Richter and Karl Reinecke.

Earlier in his career he was engaged as a choirmaster, then became a theatrical conductor, filled engagements at the municipal opera houses of Zurich, Bruenn and Graz, and in 1886 became first conductor at the Deutsches Landestheater of Prague.

There he attracted wide attention and together with Dr. Hans Richter and Felix Weingaertner, he became known as one of the three outstanding conductors of Germany.

Returned Here in 1911

On the death of Felix Mottl in 1911, he was offered the post of musical director general of the Royal Opera in Munich. He refused, however, in favor of an offer to come to Boston as conductor of the Symphony for the second time.

When Dr. Muck died, he had no near relatives. His wife died in 1924, and they lost their only child when he was very young.

DR. MUCK, ONCE HEAD OF SYMPHONY, DIES

Post

Dr. Karl Muck, eminent interpreter of Wagnerian music and victim of World war hysteria in this country, where he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1906 to 1908, and from 1912 to 1918, died at Stuttgart, Germany, yesterday. He was 80 years of age, and a partial invalid for the past six years.

He returned to Germany in 1919 following his release from an internment camp where he had been confined as an enemy alien when anti-German sentiment, running high, brought about an investigation and internment after his alleged refusal to allow the orchestra to play the Star Spangled Banner at a Providence concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PASADENA, CALIF.
STAR-NEWS

MAR 4 - 1940

Death Calls

Noted Musician Dies at German Home

STUTTGART, Germany, March 4. (AP)—Dr. Karl Muck, celebrated interpreter of Wagnerian music at the Bayreuth Festivals and former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died today at the age of 80.

He conducted the Boston Symphony from 1906 to 1908 and again from 1912 to 1918.

Dr. Muck's last appearance as a national music figure was during the Leipzig observance of the 50th anniversary of Richard Wagner's death in February, 1933.

At that time Hitler had just come into power and he sat in the front row of the famous Gewandhaus. On the occasion of his last birthday, Dr. Muck was awarded the Order of the German Eagle by Hitler himself.

Dr. Muck was interned as an enemy alien in New York in 1918 and released the following year. He lived with his daughter, Baroness von Scholley, during his declining years at Stuttgart.

KARL MUCK DIES; NOTED WAGNERIAN

Former Conductor of Boston Symphony Stricken at Age of 80 in Stuttgart

INTERNED BY U. S. IN WAR

Roused Protests All Over the County by Failure to Play National Hymn

Times

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, March 4—Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for several years before this country entered the World War, died in Stuttgart today in his eighty-first year.

STUTTGART, Germany, March 4—Dr. Karl Muck, who was celebrated as an interpreter of Wagnerian music at the Baireuth Festivals, conducted the Boston Symphony from 1906 to 1908 and again from 1912 to 1918. His last appearance as a national music figure was during the Leipzig observance of the fiftieth anniversary of Richard Wagner's death in February, 1933.

At that time Hitler had just come into power and the Chancellor sat in the front row of the famous Gewandhaus. On the occasion of Dr. Muck's last birthday, he received the order of the German Eagle from Hitler himself.

Driven From Podium in War

Among modern conductors there were few more self-effacing or more given to faithful renditions of the music on the stand before them than Dr. Muck, who was driven from the podium of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the wave of wartime hysteria that swept this nation in 1918.

Critics accorded him the reputation of being a classical conductor in the true sense of the word, and many of them considered him the outstanding Wagnerian interpreter of his day. By reason of his never-failing rendition of a score exactly as it was written, he was chosen by Cosima Wagner as musical chief of the Wagner festivals at Baireuth. There his conducting of "Parsifal" and "The Ring" was an outstanding feature for more than thirty years.

Few critics, commenting upon other conductors' renditions, failed to compare them with Dr. Muck's exacting but stimulating presentations.

Unlike other contemporary conductors, Dr. Muck eschewed popular brilliance and the acrobatics of leadership. He was primarily a musician's musician. His reading was copper plate; he conducted for the sake of the musical elect. It was often said that with Dr. Muck a dotted eighth note invariably remained a dotted eighth, never to be sacrificed for even the broadest or most individual reading of a climax.

Interned as Enemy Alien

Dr. Muck was twice conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it was under the personal sponsorship of its founder, the late Henry Lee Higginson—from 1906 to 1908 and from 1912 to 1918. In the last of those years he was vigorously attacked by Mrs. William Jay, a director of the New York Philharmonic Society; Bishop Manning, Theodore Roosevelt and others because of his German birth and his alleged refusal to play the national anthem during a concert at Providence, R. I.

He was eventually arrested on suspicion of espionage and interned at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., as an enemy alien. When released after the armistice, he left America voluntarily and never visited this country again.

After his return to Germany he conducted as a guest in various cities and became the conductor of the Hamburg Philharmonic concerts in 1922. He resumed his activities at the Baireuth Wagner Festival in the Summer of 1927 and became alternating conductor with Arturo Toscanini three years later.

In 1933 he resigned from his Hamburg post, finding himself unable to acquiesce in the ideas of the Nazi authorities concerning the consolidation of the Hamburg Philharmonic with the Hamburg Opera, and the political "coordination" of both.

Dr. Muck was born at Darmstadt in Bavaria on Oct. 22, 1859, the son of Dr. Jakob Muck, Bavarian Ministerial Counsellor, and Anna Hofmann Muck. He was graduated from the gymnasium at Wurzburg at the age of 17.

He had begun his piano studies as a child, but did not make his debut until after he had studied philosophy and classical philology at Heidelberg and Leipzig Universities and received his degree of Doctor of Philosophy from the former. At the same time he studied at the Leipzig Conservatory under Ernst Richter and Karl Reinecke. His first professional appearance on the concert stage came in 1880 at Leipzig.

DR. KARL MUCK

Carlo Edwards, 1929

Conducted in Russia

Four years later he turned seriously to the art of conducting, and for two years led orchestras at Zurich, Salzburg, Brunn and Graz. He then became First Kapellmeister of the German Landestheater in Prague, under the famous operatic conductor, Angelo Neumann, holding this important post from 1886 to 1892. During this period he also conducted the "Nibelungen" performances in Petrograd and Moscow and was leader during a Summer season at the Lessing Theatre in Berlin.

After leaving Mr. Neumann he went to Berlin where he was appointed Kapellmeister of the Royal Opera, a post he held until he came to the United States in 1912. While with the Royal Opera he was on close terms with Kaiser Wilhelm, who granted him leave to come to Boston in 1906. On the death of Felix Mottl in 1911, he was offered the post of director of the Royal Opera in Munich, but refused it. It was rumored at the time of his second visit here, in 1912, that he was dissatisfied with the dictatorial manner of the Kaiser and anxious to be away from his control.

While with the Royal Opera he often conducted, as a substitute, the symphony concerts of the Berlin Royal Orchestra. Between 1894 and 1911 he was a frequent conductor of the Silesian festivals. His first connection with the Baireuth Festival of Wagnerian music came in 1901 at the invitation of the composer's widow. During his years in Boston he returned to the Baireuth post each Summer.

Before coming to Boston, ostensibly on a more or less permanent visit, he was a guest conductor at Vienna, Paris, London, Petrograd, Moscow, Madrid, Copenhagen and Brussels. In these music centers his leadership was well thought of. In 1899 he was invited to Covent Garden, London, to conduct a season of German opera, and between 1903 and 1906 he directed the Philharmonic concerts in Vienna.

Defended by Higginson

The musically and socially elect of Boston took to him at once. With Mrs. Muck he occupied an apartment in the Fenway in the fashion Back Bay section, and he was a frequent guest in many of the city's leading homes. Nobody in Boston suspected him of subversive activities, despite his Bavarian origin and his former close connection with German royalty, even after the start of the war. The storm broke in Providence when he "failed" to play "The Star-Spangled Banner." It was not on the program, and Major Higginson refused to change the program at the last minute to include it.

The Providence Journal led the local attack, which spread to New York and other cities. Major Higginson warmly defended him, at the risk of being considered unpatriotic. Finally agents of the Department of Justice arrested him. While he was detained they searched his home and that of a friend and seized some letters which they said were incriminating. These letters, later printed in The New York American, reveal nothing particularly subversive.

After several years Dr. Muck again became a leading German conductor. He raised the Hamburg Philharmonic to a high artistic level until, at the age of 75, he resigned because of Nazi interference. Dr. Muck was a firm believer that music should be left to the musicians and kept free of race or politics. Critics who visited Germany in the Summers of 1931 and 1932 found him as able a conductor as ever, still leading the orchestra in "Parsifal" with the same fidelity to the score that had marked him as a great classicist in his Boston days.

Dr. Muck married but had no children. His wife died shortly after their return to Germany.

Boston Symphony Rises in Tribute to Dr. Karl Muck

Former Conductor Here Dies in Germany at 80; Left U. S. Under Fire

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra stood at rehearsal here yesterday and paid silent tribute to their former leader, Dr. Karl Muck, who died yesterday in Stuttgart, Germany, at the age of 80.

The 110 members rose for two minutes on request of their conductor Serge Koussevitzky. Dr. Muck directed the Boston group in 1906-08 and 1912-18.

Dr. Muck's last appearance as a national music figure in Germany was during the Leipzig observance of the 50 anniversary of Richard Wagner's death in 1933. At that time, Hitler, who had just come into power, sat in the front row of the famous Gewandhaus. On his last birthday, Dr. Muck was awarded the order of the German Eagle by Hitler.

DR. KARL MUCK

As conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the World War, Dr. Muck became the central figure in a "cause celebre" when wartime patriotic groups sought to "put him to the test" by demanding the playing of the "Star Spangled Banner" prior to a concert in Providence, R. I., Oct. 30, 1917.

The anthem was not played, but the late Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the orchestra, exonerated Muck at the time, asserting that the request had been received only that afternoon just as the orchestra was entraining for Providence, and that there had been no time for a rehearsal.

Dr. Muck subsequently conducted the "Star Spangled Banner" at other concerts elsewhere in the East, but rising wartime hysteria caused him so much embarrassment that he finally resigned.

In 1918 Muck was arrested in Boston as an enemy alien, and was interned at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., by the Department of Justice. Released in 1919 he returned to Germany where, after directing in many cities, he was appointed conductor of the Hamburg concerts.

Dr. Muck was born in Wuerzburg, Germany, Oct. 22, 1859, the son of a councilor in the Bavarian government. At the age of 11 he made his debut as a pianist.

Symphony Rehearsal Halts to Honor Muck

Members of the Boston Symphony orchestra were in rehearsal yesterday when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, present director, was notified of the death in Germany of Dr. Karl Muck. Dr. Koussevitzky stopped the rehearsal to announce the passing of the orchestra's famed former leader, and the musicians rose and stood in silence for two minutes in tribute to his memory.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Webster Aitken, young American pianist, played for the first time in this city, last night, appearing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a Mozart concerto. The evening began with the E major Suite for strings by the late Arthur Foote, and ended with the Second Symphony of Brahms. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

Mr. Aitken is a Californian, now a few months under 32. He was a pupil of Artur Schnabel in Vienna, and had a concert career in Europe before making his American debut in New York in 1935. The Mozart Concerto he played last night is one of several which have for some strange reason continued to be unfamiliar. As the program book stated, there is "no positive record of a previous performance by the Boston Symphony."

This Concerto is in B-flat, was composed in the Spring of 1784, and is numbered in the Koechel thematic catalogue as 450. Mozart might have written on the score "in the style of Mozart" for here is a handy reference of Mozart formulae, melodic, and rhythmic, that further has quite a few actual reminiscences of other Mozart works. Paradoxically, it sounds a good deal like Haydn at times.

Mr. Aitken played fluently, choosing a middle course between a Dreschina and a robust style. His finger work is neat if somewhat defeated by a heavy foot on the pedal, and save when he favors a little rubato, the music ripples along in true Mozart fashion. Mr. Aitken's performance won him deserved approval.

The Foote Suite, which has "product of New England" written all over it, was an appetizing opening-piece, as the D major Symphony of Brahms provided a hearty ending. Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of Brahms was, up to the last movement, in the classical vein, and from that point on more dramatized and individual. Throughout the evening the orchestra was at best.

This program is the fifth in the Monday-Tuesday series and will be played again at 3 this afternoon. The series will be concluded with a Tchaikovsky program April 29 and 30. C. W. D.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

MAR 4 - 1940

DR. KARL MUCK IS DEAD AT 80

Was Former Conductor of Boston Symphony.

CHARLES F. SPLITDORF DIES

Magneto Inventor Was Retired Manufacturer of Appliances.

STUTTGART, Germany, March 4 (A. P.).—Dr. Karl Muck, celebrated interpreter of Wagnerian music at the Bayreuth festivals and former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died today at the age of 80 years. He conducted the Boston Symphony from 1906 to 1908 and again from 1912 to 1918.

Dr. Muck's last appearance as a national music figure was during the Leipzig observance of the fiftieth anniversary of Richard Wagner's death in February, 1933.

At that time Hitler had just come into power and he sat in the front row of the famous Gewandhaus. On the occasion of his last birthday Dr. Muck was awarded the Order of the German Eagle by Hitler himself.

Interned During War.

As conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the world war, Dr. Muck became the central figure in a "cause celebre" when wartime patriotic groups sought to "put him to the test" by demanding the playing of "The Star-Spangled Banner" prior to a concert in Providence, R. I., on October 30, 1917.

The anthem was not played, but the late Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the orchestra, exonerated Dr. Muck at the time, asserting that the request had been received only that afternoon just as the orchestra was entraining for Providence, and that there had been no time for a rehearsal.

"Indeed Dr. Muck was not even consulted and did not hear about the episode until the next day," wrote M. A. De Wolfe Howe in his fiftieth anniversary book on the history of the orchestra.

Dr. Muck subsequently conducted "The Star-Spangled Banner" at other concerts elsewhere in the East, but rising wartime hysteria caused him so much embarrassment that he finally resigned. He was later interned during the war and became embittered toward America.

Dr. Karl Muck Dies in Reich

Long Conductor of Symphony Was 80

STUTTGART, Germany, March 4 (AP).—Dr. Karl Muck, celebrated interpreter of Wagnerian music at the Bayreuth festivals and former conductor of the Boston Symphony rochestra, died today at the age of 80.

Death of Dr. Karl Muck in Stuttgart, Germany, yesterday at the age of 80 years ended the career of a man who through two decades was alternately the idol of Boston's musical world and a refugee from the wrath of a war-embittered citizenry.

From 1906 to 1908 and again from 1912 until he was sent away to an internment camp in 1918, he was director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He was credited with being the man whose contributions were among the greatest in building the reputation of the Boston organization to a point where its recognition was world-wide.

LOYAL TO FATHERLAND

When war came he remained loyal to his German fatherland. Although many leading Bostonians stood firmly by him, public resentment grew and finally he was interned. In 1919 he was returned to Germany and his American career was over.

While the government interned him simply as an "enemy alien" amid rumors of other charges which never were proved, it seemed to have been his refusal or failure to play the Star Spangled Banner at concerts which crystalized public sentiment against him. Notably in Providence and in Baltimore and at Carnegie hall in New York, incidents arose.

Dr. Muck was conducting the Boston Symphony when the world war began in 1914. He was frankly on the side of Germany. His connections in his fatherland were many and in high places. He had come to Boston in 1912 with the consent and special blessing of Kaiser Wilhelm himself.

FRIEND OF MUENSTERBERG

Dr. Hugo Muensterberg, then at Harvard University and a storm center in controversy over alien propaganda, was his close friend and associate. The names of the two were often linked in the discussions which waged over German propaganda activities.

When the United States entered the war, Dr. Muck, according to statements at the time, did not change his views. He still hoped for a triumph of German arms. Many charged he not only hoped—that he worked for it.

But he also had loyal friends here, notably Henry L. Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony, and Charles A. Ellis, its manager.

Finally, in March, 1918, Dr. Muck was arrested as an enemy alien. He was taken from his apartment in the Fenway to East Cambridge jail. There he was held for a week. Friends saw him occasionally, brought him food, furnished him with counsel. Then he was taken to the Boston federal building and questioned.

There were rumors that the case of Dr. Muck involved more than internment. His papers were seized. Much of his correspondence, bearing up his hopes for a German victory, was published.

Finally he was ordered interned and was taken to Fort Oglethrope, Georgia, and later to Chicamauga Park, near Chattanooga, where he remained until August, 1919, nearly a year after the close of the war.

In Boston today, when Dr. Koussevitzky, the present director of the orchestra, halted a rehearsal to inform the players of Dr. Muck's death, the musicians rose in a silent two minutes' tribute to their former leader.

212

DR. KARL MUCK

His Death Recalls Problems of the Artist In Time of War

By OLIN DOWNES

THE later years of Dr. Karl Muck, from the time of the American episode of the "Star - Spangled Banner"—the exact story of which is told for the first time, we believe, in the letter of William Walter in a column on the adjoining page—were tragic. He was incarcerated under the Espionage Act, for offenses which were never proved, and of which he was innocent, at Fort Oglethorpe. This was the result and inevitable consequence of conditions and passions of wartime, which Dr. Muck and the then obstinate management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should have foreseen and heeded in time. It was a costly error.

. Returned to Germany when the war was over, Muck was no hero welcomed home, but, on the contrary, because of his earlier close associations with the pre-war regime, a man in marked disfavor with the republican government. The more a refuge and a haven must Baireuth have appeared to him when it reopened its theatre. There Muck was not only the leading conductor, whose "Parsifal" was everywhere famous, but general music director, whose appointments and decisions affected all the performances. At Baireuth Muck remained till the death of Siegfried Wagner, when he severed his official association with the institution.

* * *

IT was written that he should die, bedridden, last Monday in Stuttgart, in the home of his faithful friend, the Baroness von Scholley, who cared for him to the last. In his prime Muck was one of the most fascinating and aristocratic figures that ever distinguished the conductor's platform.

His presence was indicative of one of the greatest musicians and conductors of his epoch, reflecting grace and power, intellect and command. The fine forehead, with the concave temples, which surmounted the very clear, keen eyes, and the nose long, aquiline, and tempered like a blade, were features that tapered down to the firm, narrow chin, slightly projecting, with the thin lips and the somewhat ironical cast of the mouth. The countenance made some think of Richard Wagner ~~(there were legends, wholly unfounded, of Muck's relationship to the Master)~~ and others of a rather insolent and intellectual Mephistopheles!

Boston was fascinated by Muck, who minded it less than some supposed. He had the instinct of good theatre, and was probably not without appreciation of his role on life's stage. It must be conceded that he took his part, consciously or otherwise, superlatively well. He had also a good sharp wit, though they said that at heart he was soft to the point of being sentimental.

Symphony Hall assembled, and walk across the stage and mount the podium.

There he dominated the orchestra and the audience and the occasion. He was not tall, but so slender and poised that he gave the impression of height, energy held in iron control, imperious command, tension and sensitivity. He conducted with exemplary economy of gesture and the disdain of a patrician.

* * *

TECHNICALLY, the skill and independence of both arms were notable. This was what conducting should be — brains, not brawn, will, communicative power. You realized, as you watched and listened to him, how significantly modern, subtle and transcendental the real art of conducting is; the play of invisible forces which it represents; the perception and mastery, by the leader, of things unseen.

With Muck the outward show and the visible practical technique of orchestral leadership were concentrated and utilized to the indispensable minimum, the while that, in a strange way, you were conscious of an impalpable drama and the decisive and unquestionable part that the leader was taking in it. Muck himself, and his conducting, in and of themselves, were things to watch and feel and undergo as an experience.

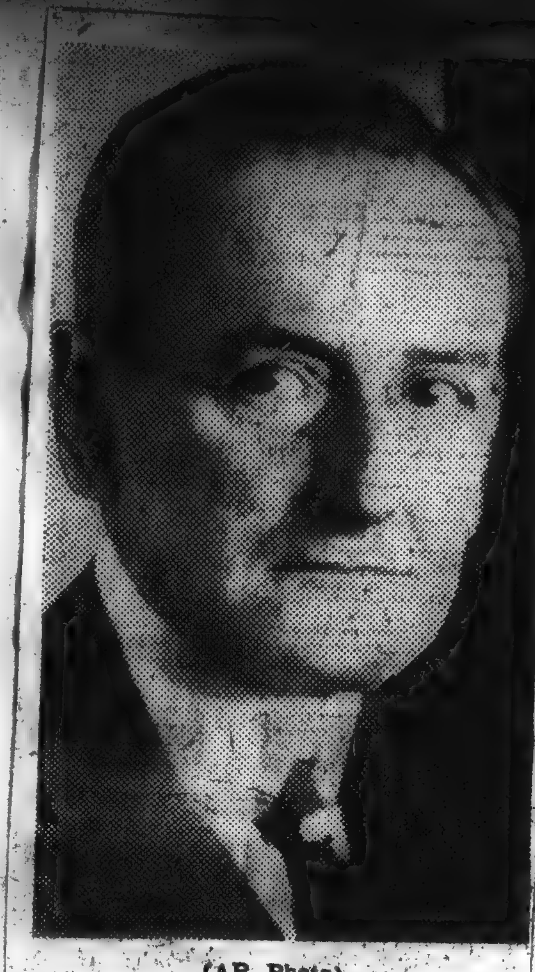
In Boston and in other cities of America Muck gave certain unforgettable performances. He learned the greater part of his symphonic repertory here. In Czecho-Slovakia and in Germany and Austria he had won his spurs principally as a conductor of opera, which is the most valuable preliminary training an orchestra leader can have. He had conducted symphony concerts by the orchestra of the Berlin Royal Opera, had alternated with Mottl for three seasons with the Vienna Philharmonic and made incidental appearances on other symphonic programs before coming to the Boston Symphony in 1906.

* * *

ARRIVED here, Muck realized the importance of the post he had accepted, came to have an immense liking for Boston, where he was very popular, and discovered that his repertory was unequal to the demands of his audiences. His programs of the first two years, in particular, were unsatisfactory, though his conducting was held in the highest esteem.

He then consulted, especially, Emil Ferir, the first violist, and Georges Longy, the first oboist of the Boston Symphony at the time, in his studies of the French symphonic repertory.

Muck was never a modernist, though he dutifully "investigated" certain new scores. He came out of a concert at which he had given the Boston première of the Schoen- "Five Pieces for Orchestra." an't tell you whether we've d music," he said, "but I as- you we've played every one of enberg's notes, just as they're en."



(AP Photo)
DR. KARL MUCK

and detailed of all conductors in marking his scores, in which no effect was taken for granted or left to chance. He was entirely against conducting without score. Sometimes he would touch up instrumentation, but rarely, and usually with taste and discretion.

Muck was less sensuous in his tonal coloring than he was a man for structure and line, and noble, virile proportions. In a work like Sibelius's grim Fourth symphony he was incomparable. Brahms was one of his greatest achievements, also Bruckner and Wagner. His "Eroica" was a supreme conception.

* * *

MODERN music seldom found Muck at best advantage. But he could be a true romantic on occasion, as witness the historic performances he gave of Liszt's "Faust" symphony. For the moment Symphony Hall had turned into a cathedral, where the most solemn rites were in progress. Muck, essentially classicist, was one of the greatest conductors of a generation that had also among leaders Mahler, Nikisch, Mottl, Chevillard, Lamoureux, Weingartner to consider. He was wholly without vanity or pretense as regarded his interpretations. To fulsome praise he would say, as he said to Antonia Brico of this city, who was his pupil, "I serve the work."

As long as he could keep his feet, which he did partly with the aid of the eternal cigarettes which finally poisoned him, Muck conducted the concerts of the Hamburg Symphony Orchestra and gave them special fame. His last years were perforce those of an invalid and recluse. They were passed in virtual isolation from a world with which he could have felt little in common and which forgot him. Sic transit! Few men had had so much of glory and honor in their heyday and experienced such reversals and changes in the life about them afterward.

To the last, Muck spoke of his days in Boston as the happiest he had known, notwithstanding the bitterness with which the wartime experience filled him. America was fortunate in the ministrations of one of the greatest conductors of his day at the zenith of his powers. His art will not be replaced, nor, by those who knew it, forgotten.

Dr. Karl Muck Dies, Aged 80

Symphony Leader Once Boston Idol

STUTTGART, Germany, March 4, (AP)—Dr. Karl Muck, celebrated interpreter of Wagnerian music at the Bayreuth festivals and former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died today at the age of 80.

He conducted the Boston Symphony from 1906 to 1908 and again from 1912 to 1918.

DECORATED BY HITLER

Dr. Muck's last appearance as a national music figure was during the Leipzig observance of the 50th anniversary of Richard Wagner's death in February, 1933.

At that time Hitler had just come into power and he sat in the front row of the famous Gewandhaus. On the occasion of his last birthday Dr. Muck was awarded the Order of the German Eagle by Hitler himself.

DR. MUCK ONCE IDOL OF HUB MUSICAL WORLD

Death of Dr. Karl Muck in Stuttgart, Ger., today at the age of 80 years, ended the career of a man who through two decades was alternately the idol of Boston's musical world and a refugee from the wrath of a war-embittered citizenry.

From 1906 to 1908 and again from 1912 until he was sent away to an internment camp in 1918, he was director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He was credited with being the man whose contributions were among the greatest in building the reputation of the Boston organization to a point where its recognition was world-wide.

LOYAL TO FATHERLAND

When war came he remained loyal to his German fatherland. Although many leading Bostonians stood firmly by him, public resentment grew and finally he was interned. In 1919 he was returned to Germany and his American career was over.

While the government interned him simply as an "enemy alien" amid rumors of other charges which never were proved, it seemed to have been his refusal or failure to play the Star Spangled Banner at concerts which crystalized public sentiment against him. Notably in Providence and in Baltimore and at Carnegie hall in New York, incidents arose.

Dr. Muck was conducting the Boston Symphony when the world war began in 1914. He was frankly on the side of Germany. His connections in his fatherland were many and in high places. He had come to Boston in 1912 with the consent and special blessing of Kaiser Wilhelm himself.

FRIEND OF MUENSTERBERG

Dr. Hugo Muensterberg, then at Harvard University and a storm center in controversy over alien propaganda, was his close friend and associate. The names of the two were often linked in the discussions which waged over German propaganda activities.

When the United States entered the war, Dr. Muck, according to statements at the time, did not change his views. He still hoped for a triumph of German arms. Many charged he not only hoped—that he worked for it.

But he also had loyal friends here, notably Henry L. Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony, and Charles A. Ellis, its manager.

Soon audiences noticed that the Star Spangled Banner was not being played at Symphony concerts.

public nce was the
was oked

for a concert in Baltimore. Word came that he refused similarly to play the anthem. The concert was cancelled and a mass meeting was held in Baltimore, presided over by Gov. Edwin Warfield—of the family from which Wallis Warfield, the Duchess of Windsor, gets her name—presided. The flag and the national anthem were extolled. Dr. Muck was denounced.

"Kill Muck," a woman in the audience shouted. Disorder threatened. An army band, preceded by 100 armed citizens, came into the hall and played the anthem. A letter, lauding the flag and calling for patriotism, was read from Cardinal Gibbons.

A substitute orchestra gave the scheduled concert two nights later and those who had paid money to hear the Boston Symphony were given their money back.

When a similar situation threatened in Brooklyn, where the orchestra was to appear, Maj. Higginson went personally to that city and composed matters. Thereafter the anthem was played, usually at the close of the concert and critics said Muck and his musicians, many of whom were aliens, gave it their best.

Finally, in March, 1918, Dr. Muck was arrested as an enemy alien. He was taken from his apartment in the Fenway to East Cambridge jail. There he was held for a week. Friends saw him occasionally, brought him food, furnished him with counsel. Then he was taken to the Boston federal building and questioned.

INTERNED, PAPERS SEIZED

There were rumors that the case of Dr. Muck involved more than internment. His papers were seized. Much of his correspondence, bearing up his hopes for a German victory, was published.

Finally he was ordered interned and was taken to Fort Oglethorpe, Georgia, and later to Chickamauga Park, near Chattanooga, where he remained until August, 1919, nearly a year after the close of the war.

Through all of those proceedings, Dr. Muck said nothing. Officials who questioned him obtained little information. He did not resist internment and did not defend himself.

But when he finally was sent back to Germany in August, 1919, he was bitter, apparently, against everything in the United States except Boston.

"I leave the United States with no regrets," he said as he sailed away, never to return. "The United States is a country controlled by sentiment which closely resembles mob rule."

RETAINED LOVE FOR BOSTON

But of Boston he had said a few days before at Chickamauga Park:

"For Boston I have the best of feelings. The years I spent with the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave me the greatest artistic pleasure I ever had in my life."

In that he was echoing sentiments which he expressed in 1908 when he returned to Berlin after two years with the Boston Symphony.

"Boston is the American Athens," he said in an interview with the Berlin press, "and it possesses an art-loving and musically cultured public."

In that interview he had added:

"Everywhere in America I found artistic musical life in full swing."

ORCHESTRA PAYS TRIBUTE

Since the war, writers on musical subjects have variously recorded that Dr. Muck was not to blame for the episode of the "Star Spangled Banner."

"Indeed Dr. Muck was not even consulted and did not hear about the episode until the next day," M. A. DeWolfe of the Providence incident in his 50th anniversary book on the history of the orchestra.

When word of Dr. Muck's death reached Serge Koussevitzky, present director of the orchestra, he was conducting a rehearsal. Dr. Koussevitzky stopped the rehearsal to inform the orchestra. The musicians rose and stood in silence for two minutes in tribute to the memory of Dr. Muck.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

MAR 4 - 1940

Dr. Karl Muck Dies at 80 in Germany

Noted Wagnerian Conductor Was Center of U. S. Storm

Special to The Post

STUTTGART, Germany, Mar. 1.—Dr. Karl Muck, world famed conductor of the music of Richard Wagner, died today at 80.

Dr. Muck had been an invalid since 1934, when his habit of smoking 100 strong cigarettes a day brought nicotine poisoning. He last conducted in 1933 at the fiftieth Bayreuth Festival. On his last birthday, Hitler decorated him with the order of the German Eagle.

His death will recall to Americans his unfortunate career in the U. S., where, as an enemy alien, he was forced to resign as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1917. Ultimately he was interned in a prison camp at Oglethorpe, Ga.

Called Home by Kaiser

Dr. Muck was trice engaged as conductor of the Boston orchestra. In 1908, after a two-year appearance, he was called home by the Kaiser. After four years he was permitted to return to the U. S., and he held the Boston conductorship until 1918.

In November, 1917, when all things German were subject to a form of lynch law in the U. S., he was charged with refusing to play "The Star-Spangled Banner" at a concert on the ground that it was "not art." The facts have never been made clear, although it is likely that he did decline, in a moment of tactlessness.

In any case, Boston stormed. So did New York, Baltimore and every other city which had scheduled the Boston Symphony for that year. Subsequently Dr. Muck played the anthem, declined to acknowledge the tumultuous applause, and resigned.

On Mar. 25, 1918, Dr. Muck was arrested in Boston as an enemy alien.

He was taken to Oglethorpe,

DR. KARL MUCK

and held for the duration of the war. He sailed for Germany in August, 1919.

Born in Wurzburg in 1859, he was an accomplished musician at 10.

2/2

DR. KARL MUCK

His Death Recalls Problems of the Artist In Time of War

By OLIN DOWNES

THE later years of Dr. Karl Muck, from the time of the American episode of the "Star - Spangled Banner"—the exact story of which is told for the first time, we believe, in the letter of William Walter in a column on the adjoining page—were tragic. He was incarcerated under the Espionage Act, for offenses which were never proved, and of which he was innocent, at Fort Oglethorpe. This was the result and inevitable consequence of conditions and passions of wartime, which Dr. Muck and the then obstinate management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should have foreseen and heeded in time. It was a costly error.

Returned to Germany when the war was over, Muck was no hero welcomed home, but, on the contrary, because of his earlier close associations with the pre-war regime, a man in marked disfavor with the republican government. The more a refuge and a haven must Baireuth have appeared to him when it reopened its theatre. There Muck was not only the leading conductor, whose "Parsifal" was everywhere famous, but general music director, whose appointments and decisions affected all the performances. At Baireuth Muck remained till the death of Siegfried Wagner, when he severed his official association with the institution.

* * *

IT was written that he should die, bedridden, last Monday in Stuttgart, in the home of his faithful friend, the Baroness von Scholley, who cared for him to the last. In his prime Muck was one of the most fascinating and aristocratic figures that ever distinguished the conductor's platform.

His presence was indicative of one of the greatest musicians and conductors of his epoch, reflecting grace and power, intellect and command. The fine forehead, with the concave temples, which surmounted the very clear, keen eyes, and the nose long, aquiline, and tempered like a blade, were features that tapered down to the firm, narrow chin, slightly projecting, with the thin lips and the somewhat ironical cast of the mouth. The countenance made some think of Richard Wagner ~~(there were legends, wholly unfounded, of Muck's relationship to the Master)~~ and others of a rather insolent and intellectual Mephistopheles!

Boston was fascinated by Muck, who minded it less than some supposed. He had the instinct of good theatre, and was probably not without appreciation of his role on life's stage. It must be conceded that he took his part, consciously or otherwise, superlatively well. He had also a good sharp wit, though they said that at heart he was soft to the point of being sentimental.

But nobody would have suspected that. In fact, if it had been suspected it would rather have spoiled the show. It was worth the journey simply to see Muck step through the stage door at the right of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall assembled, and walk across the stage and mount the podium.

There he dominated the orchestra and the audience and the occasion. He was not tall, but so slender and poised that he gave the impression of height, energy held in iron control, imperious command, tension and sensitivity. He conducted with exemplary economy of gesture and the disdain of a patrician.

* * *

TECHNICALLY, the skill and independence of both arms were notable. This was what conducting should be — brains, not brawn, will, communicative power. You realized, as you watched and listened to him, how significantly modern, subtle and transcendental the real art of conducting is; the play of invisible forces which it represents; the perception and mastery, by the leader, of things unseen.

With Muck the outward show and the visible practical technique of orchestral leadership were concentrated and utilized to the indispensable minimum, the while that, in a strange way, you were conscious of an impalpable drama and the decisive and unquestionable part that the leader was taking in it. Muck himself, and his conducting, in and of themselves, were things to watch and feel and undergo as an experience.

In Boston and in other cities of America Muck gave certain unforgettable performances. He learned the greater part of his symphonic repertory here. In Czecho-Slovakia and in Germany and Austria he had won his spurs principally as a conductor of opera, which is the most valuable preliminary training an orchestra leader can have. He had conducted symphony concerts by the orchestra of the Berlin Royal Opera, had alternated with Mottl for three seasons with the Vienna Philharmonic and made incidental appearances on other symphonic programs before coming to the Boston Symphony in 1906.

* * *

ARRIVED here, Muck realized the importance of the post he had accepted, came to have an immense liking for Boston, where he was very popular, and discovered that his repertory was unequal to the demands of his audiences. His programs of the first two years, in particular, were unsatisfactory, though his conducting was held in the highest esteem.

He then consulted, especially, Emil Ferir, the first violist, and Georges Longy, the first oboist of the Boston Symphony at the time, in his studies of the French symphonic repertory.

Muck was never a modernist, though he dutifully "investigated" certain new scores. He came out of a concert at which he had given the Boston première of the Schoenberg "Five Pieces for Orchestra." "I can't tell you whether we've played music," he said, "but I assure you we've played every one of Schoenberg's notes, just as they're written."

He was one of the most exact and detailed of all conductors in marking his scores, in which no effect was taken for granted or left to chance. He was entirely against conducting without score. Sometimes he would touch up instrumentation, but rarely, and usually with taste and discretion.

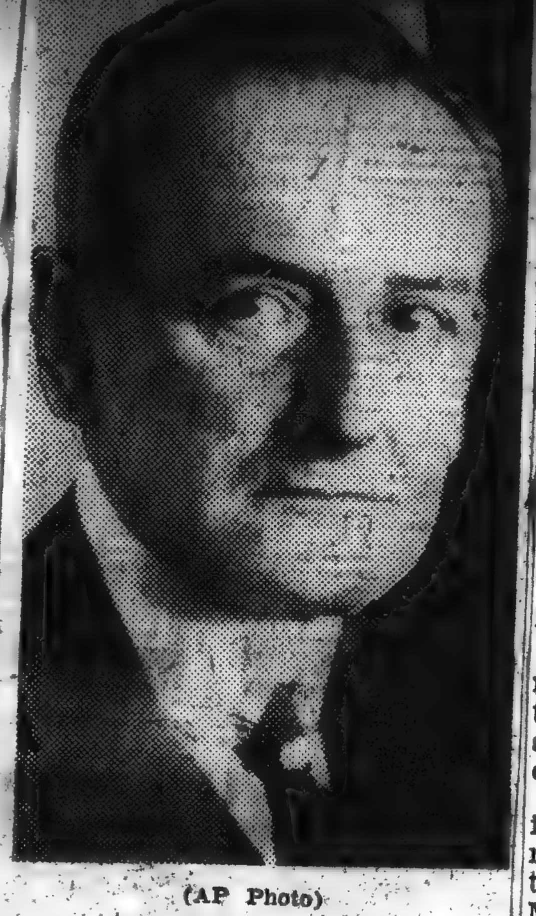
Muck was less sensuous in his tonal coloring than he was a man for structure and line, and noble, virile proportions. In a work like Sibelius's grim Fourth symphony he was incomparable. Brahms was one of his greatest achievements, also Bruckner and Wagner. His "Eroica" was a supreme conception.

* * *

MODERN music seldom found Muck at best advantage. But he could be a true romantic on occasion, as witness the historic performances he gave of Liszt's "Faust" symphony. For the moment Symphony Hall had turned into a cathedral, where the most solemn rites were in progress. Muck, essentially classicist, was one of the greatest conductors of a generation that had also among leaders Mahler, Nikisch, Mottl, Chevillard, Lamoureux, Weingartner to consider. He was wholly without vanity or pretense as regarded his interpretations. To fulsome praise he would say, as he said to Antonia Brico of this city, who was his pupil, "I serve the work."

As long as he could keep his feet, which he did partly with the aid of the eternal cigarettes which finally poisoned him, Muck conducted the concerts of the Hamburg Symphony Orchestra and gave them special fame. His last years were perforce those of an invalid and recluse. They were passed in virtual isolation from a world with which he could have felt little in common and which forgot him. Sic transit! Few men had had so much of glory and honor in their heyday and experienced such reversals and changes in the life about them afterward.

To the last, Muck spoke of his days in Boston as the happiest he had known, notwithstanding the bitterness with which the wartime experience filled him. America was fortunate in the ministrations of one of the greatest conductors of his day at the zenith of his powers. His art will not be replaced, nor, by those who knew it, forgotten.



(AP Photo)
DR. KARL MUCK

Dr. Karl Muck Dies, Aged 80

Symphony Leader Once Boston Idol

STUTTGART, Germany, March 4, (AP)—Dr. Karl Muck, celebrated interpreter of Wagnerian music at the Bayreuth festivals and former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died today at the age of 80.

He conducted the Boston Symphony from 1906 to 1908 and again from 1912 to 1918.

DECORATED BY HITLER

Dr. Muck's last appearance as a national music figure was during the Leipzig observance of the 50th anniversary of Richard Wagner's death in February, 1933.

At that time Hitler had just come into power and he sat in the front row of the famous Gewandhaus. On the occasion of his last birthday Dr. Muck was awarded the Order of the German Eagle by Hitler himself.

DR. MUCK ONCE IDOL OF HUB MUSICAL WORLD

Death of Dr. Karl Muck in Stuttgart, Ger., today at the age of 80 years, ended the career of a man who through two decades was alternately the idol of Boston's musical world and a refugee from the wrath of a war-embittered citizenry.

From 1906 to 1908 and again from 1912 until he was sent away to an internment camp in 1918, he was director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He was credited with being the man whose contributions were among the greatest in building the reputation of the Boston organization to a point where its recognition was world-wide.

LOYAL TO FATHERLAND

When war came he remained loyal to his German fatherland. Although many leading Bostonians stood firmly by him, public resentment grew and finally he was interned. In 1919 he was returned to Germany and his American career was over.

While the government interned him simply as an "enemy alien" amid rumors of other charges which never were proved, it seemed to have been his refusal or failure to play the Star Spangled Banner at concerts which crystalized public sentiment against him. Notably in Providence and in Baltimore and at Carnegie hall in New York, incidents arose.

Dr. Muck was conducting the Boston Symphony when the world war began in 1914. He was frankly on the side of Germany. His connections in his fatherland were many and in high places. He had come to Boston in 1912 with the consent and special blessing of Kaiser Wilhelm himself.

FRIEND OF MUENSTERBERG

Dr. Hugo Muensterberg, then at Harvard University and a storm center in controversy over alien propaganda, was his close friend and associate. The names of the two were often linked in the discussions which waged over German propaganda activities.

When the United States entered the war, Dr. Muck, according to statements at the time, did not change his views. He still hoped for a triumph of German arms. Many charged he not only hoped—that he worked for it.

But he also had loyal friends here, notably Henry L. Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony, and Charles A. Ellis, its manager.

Soon audiences noticed that the Star Spangled Banner was not being played at Symphony concerts. The matter came strikingly to public attention at a concert in Providence in November, 1917. Dr. Muck was said to have refused to play the anthem when requested. There was wide denunciation of him.

DENOUNCED IN BALTIMORE

The orchestra then was booked for a concert in Baltimore. Word came that he refused similarly to play the anthem. The concert was cancelled and a mass meeting was held in Baltimore, presided over by Gov. Edwin Warfield—of the family from which Wallis Warfield, the Duchess of Windsor, gets her name—presided. The flag and the national anthem were extolled. Dr. Muck was denounced.

"Kill Muck," a woman in the audience shouted. Disorder threatened. An army band, preceded by 100 armed citizens, came into the hall and played the anthem. A letter, lauding the flag and calling for patriotism, was read from Cardinal Gibbons.

A substitute orchestra gave the scheduled concert two nights later and those who had paid money to hear the Boston Symphony were given their money back.

When a similar situation threatened in Brooklyn, where the orchestra was to appear, Maj. Higginson went personally to that city and composed matters. Thereafter the anthem was played, usually at the close of the concert and critics said Muck and his musicians, many of whom were aliens, gave it their best.

Finally, in March, 1918, Dr. Muck was arrested as an enemy alien. He was taken from his apartment in the Fenway to East Cambridge jail. There he was held for a week. Friends saw him occasionally, brought him food, furnished him with counsel. Then he was taken to the Boston federal building and questioned.

INTERNED, PAPERS SEIZED

There were rumors that the case of Dr. Muck involved more than internment. His papers were seized. Much of his correspondence, bearing up his hopes for a German victory, was published.

Finally he was ordered interned and was taken to Fort Oglethorpe, Georgia, and later to Chickamauga Park, near Chattanooga, where he remained until August, 1919, nearly a year after the close of the war.

Through all of those proceedings, Dr. Muck said nothing. Officials who questioned him obtained little information. He did not resist internment and did not defend himself.

But when he finally was sent back to Germany in August, 1919, he was bitter, apparently, against everything in the United States except Boston.

"I leave the United States with no regrets," he said as he sailed away, never to return. "The United States is a country controlled by sentiment which closely resembles mob rule."

RETAINED LOVE FOR BOSTON

But of Boston he had said a few d[illegible] before a[illegible] Chickamauga Park:

"For B[illegible] I have the best of feelings. The years I spent with the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave me the greatest artistic pleasure I ever had in my life."

In that he was echoing sentiments which he expressed in 1908 when he returned to Berlin after two years with the Boston Symphony.

"Boston is the American Athens," he said in an interview with the Berlin press, "and it possesses an art-loving and musically cultured public."

In that interview he had added: "Everywhere in America I found artistic musical life in full swing."

ORCHESTRA PAYS TRIBUTE

Since the war, writers on musical subjects have variously recorded that Dr. Muck was not to blame for the episode of the "Star Spangled Banner."

"Indeed Dr. Muck was not even consulted and did not hear about the episode until the next day," M. A. DeWolfe of the Providence incident in his 50th anniversary book on the history of the orchestra.

When word of Dr. Muck's death reached Serge Koussevitzky, present director of the orchestra, he was conducting a rehearsal. Dr. Koussevitzky stopped the rehearsal to inform the orchestra. The musicians rose and stood in silence for two minutes in tribute to the memory of Dr. Muck.

---

lcan the U alien,
as condu ... the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1917. Ultimately he was interned in a prison camp at Oglethorpe, Ga.

Called Home by Kaiser

Dr. Muck was trice engaged as conductor of the Boston orchestra. In 1908, after a two-year appearance, he was called

...ber, 1917, when all ...erman were subject to ... lynch law in the U. S., ...rged with refusing to ... Star-Spangled Ban... ...concert on the ground ...was "not art." The facts ...ever been made clear, al... it is likely that he did ...n a moment of tactless-

... case, Boston stormed. ...ew York, Baltimore and every other city which had scheduled the Boston Symphony for that year. Subsequently Dr. Muck played the anthem, declined to acknowledge the tumultuous applause, and resigned.

On Mar. 25, 1918, Dr. Muck was arrested in Boston as an enemy alien.

He was taken to Oglethorpe,

DR. KARL MUCK

...nd held for the duration of the ...war. He sailed for Germany in August, 1919.

Born in Wurzburg in 1859, he 213

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

MAR 5 - 1940

Dr. Karl Muck, Retired Wagner Conductor, Dies

Boston Symphony's Ex-Leader Interned in '18; Refused to Play Anthem

STUTTGART, Germany, March 4 (AP).—Dr. Karl Muck, celebrated interpreter of Wagnerian music at the Bayreuth Festivals and former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died today. He was eighty years old.

Favorite of Musical Elect

Dr. Karl Muck was never the sort of popular conductor to sweep an audience into a frenzy of emotion. His meticulous readings of scores made him the favorite of the musical elect and he probably was Germany's greatest conductor of classical music. A man of impeccable taste, he was worlds apart in temperament from the tempestuous Richard Wagner, yet he was the favorite conductor of Wagner's widow, Cosima, and for thirty years conducted the Wagner Bayreuth Festivals.

He conducted the Boston Symphony from 1906 to 1908 and from 1912 to 1918, his precise genius being admirably suited to the quiet Boston culture. In 1918 he became one of the most distinguished victims of the anti-German frenzy which swept the country after the United States entered the World War. He was interned at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., until 1919, and then returned to his country. After that no power on earth could drag him back to America, although many rich offers were made to him.

His last public appearance was at Bayreuth in 1933 at the fiftieth anniversary of Wagner's death. Since then he had lived in Stuttgart at the home of Baroness von Scholley, daughter of a former German Consul General in New York, who was one of his oldest friends and his former prison mate at Fort Oglethorpe. During his last years he had been immersed in Oriental philosophy and had rarely left the house. He suffered from a nicotine poisoning, the result of a daily quota of 100 cigarettes, which almost paralyzed him during the last three years.

Played in Recital at 11

Dr. Muck was born in Darmstadt, the son of a councilor of the government of Bavaria, which was then not a part of the German Empire. A musical prodigy, he made his first public appearance when he gave a piano solo at a chamber music recital at the age of eleven years. He also played the violin with a local symphony orchestra as a boy.

At the age of sixteen he entered Heidelberg University as one of its youngest pupils. A year later, according to German custom, he went to the University of Leipzig to study philosophy and the classics, and while there studied music at Leipzig's famous conservatory under Ernst Freidrich Richter and Karl Reinecke.

He made his solo debut as a pianist at Leipzig at the age of twenty, the same year he took his degree of Doctor of Philosophy.

Was Conductor in Prague

In 1886, he became the first conductor at the Deutsches Landestheater in Prague, where he attracted nation-wide attention and soon came to be ranked with Dr. Hans Richter and Felix Weingaertner as one of Germany's finest conductors. He toured Europe with the Prague orchestra, playing before Kaiser Wilhelm in Berlin, the Russian court at St. Petersburg and the wealthy burghers of Hamburg. In 1892 he became conductor at the Royal Opera in Berlin under the patronage of the Kaiser.

In 1899, Dr. Muck was conducting the opera at Covent Garden in London, and was offered a reputed $27,000 a year to conduct at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. For some reason the offer was rejected. But in 1906 the late Maj. Henry L. Higginson, founder and director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, persuaded him to come to Boston to conduct the orchestra for its twenty-sixth season.

Boston had a great symphony orchestra before Dr. Muck took over the baton, and he kept it at its high level. In the Boston Symphony's New York season, the New York critics were approving although not so enthusiastic. By 1912, however, his copper-plate interpretations were enthusiastically indorsed in New York as well as Boston. He always eschewed strange, inner meanings in the scores, preferring to think that a dotted eighth note was a dotted eighth note without any secret significance.

Wagnerian Music Expert

Associated Press
Dr. Karl Muck

In November, 1917, Dr. Muck aggravated a rising tide of anti-German feeling by refusing to play "The Star-Spangled Banner" at concerts on the ground that a symphony orchestra was not a military band. Patriotic societies denounced him in rather extravagant terms and even the late Theodore Roosevelt proclaimed him an alien menace.

On March 26, 1918, after the uproar had almost died down, he was interned. He resigned from the Boston Symphony, and Maj. Higginson, who had supported him through the whole affair, promptly resigned, too. Without its patron and conductor, the Boston Symphony fell into chaos and almost passed out of existence. It was not until 1924 when Serge Koussevitzky became conductor that the symphony resumed its place as one of the world's great orchestras.

In 1919, he returned to his native Germany, feeling extremely bitter about this country. He conducted in various cities until 1922 when he became conductor of the Hamburg Philharmonic concerts, which he raised to a high artistic standard.

Resembled Wagner

Dr. Muck conducted at the Bayreuth festivals almost uninterruptedly from 1901 to 1930. He promised Cosima Wagner he would always help her son, Siegfried Wagner, with the festivals and kept his word until Siegfried died in 1930. In the last years he was nestor, or patriarch, of the festivals and shared the conductor's podium with Arturo Toscanini. In 1933, although he was very ill, he returned once more to conduct at the fiftieth anniversary program. He bore a close physical resemblance to Wagner.

Last October Chancellor Adolf Hitler presented to Dr. Muck the plaque of the German Eagle, the highest monor for culture in Germany.

Dr. Muck's wife died in 1921. Their only child, a son, died in 1881.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

MAR 5 - 1940

Music Notes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give this season's fourth pair of concerts under Serge Koussevitzky's direction at Carnegie Hall on Thursday night and Saturday afternoon, March 14 and 16. The March 14 program consists of Mozart's overture to "Le Nozze di Figaro," the first New York performance of Serge Prokofieff's cello concerto, with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist, and Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote." In the March 16 concert Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Beethoven's first symphony, Hindemith's symphony, "Mathis der Maler"; excerpts from Fauré's "Pelléas et Mélisande" music, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Ravel's second "Daphnis et Chloé" suite.

The Music and Art Lovers Club, under direction of Clemente de Macchi, will present Leoncavallo's "Pagliacci" in concert form tonight in Suite 853-856, Carnegie Hall, for the benefit of the Municipal Opera As[illegible]'s scholarship fund.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

MAR 5 - 1940

DR. KARL MUCK DIES, FAMED CONDUCTOR

STUTTGART, Germany, March 4 (A. P.).—Dr. Karl Muck, celebrated interpreter of Wagnerian music at the Bayreuth festivals and former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died today at the age of 30.

DR. KARL MUCK

He conducted the Boston Symphony from 1906 to 1908 and again from 1912 to 1918.

Dr. Muck's last appearance as a national figure was duing the Leipzig observance of the 50th anniversary of Richard Wagner's death in February, 1933.

HONORED BY HITLER

At that time Adolf Hitler had just come into power and he sat in the front row of the famous Gewandhaus. On the occasion of his last birthday, Dr. Muck was awarded the Order of the German Eagle by Hitler himself.

From 1901 to 1930 Dr. Muck conducted at Bayreuth where great interest centred in his interpretation of "Parsifal." He also conducted the Hamburg Philharmonic and at the Berlin Opera, where he shared with Richard Strauss the title of General Director of Music.

INVALID SINCE 1934

Since 1934 Dr. Muck had been an invalid and he was able to stand only with great difficulty. His illness was said to have been due to nicotine poisoning, the result of having smoked more than 100 cigarettes a day for a number of years.

He was born at Wuerzberg and was recognized as a child prodigy, making his debut at 11 and taking his diploma at Heidelberg University at 16.

PATRIOTISM 'TESTED'

As conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the World War, Dr. Muck became the central figure in a "cause celebre" when wartime patriotic groups sought to "put him to the test" by demanding the playing of the "Star Spangled Banner" prior to a concert in Providence, R. I., on Oct. 30, 1917.

The anthem was not played, but the late Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the orchestra, exonerated Dr. Muck, asserting the request had been received only that afternoon just as the orchestra was entraining for Providence, and there had been no time for a rehearsal.

INTERNED DURING WAR

"Indeed Dr. Muck was not even consulted and did not hear about the episode until the next day," wrote M. A. De Wolfe Howe in his 50th anniversary book on the history of the orchestra.

Dr. Muck subsequently conducted the "Star Spangled Banner" at concerts in Philadelphia and elsewhere in the East, but rising wartime hysteria caused him so much embarrassment that he finally resigned. He later was interned during the war at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., and became embittered toward America.

In Boston today, when Serge Koussevitzky, present conductor of the orchestra, halted a rehearsal to inform the players of Dr. Muck's death, the musicians rose in a silent two minutes tribute to their former leader.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

MAR 5 - 1940

Boston Symphony Pays Homage to Dr Muck

Boston, March 4—(AP)—News of the death in Stuttgart, Ger., today of Dr Karl Muck, 80, world-celebrated interpreter of Wagnerian music, interrupted a rehearsal by Boston's Symphony orchestra, an organization to which he brought renown until World war passions sent him to a prison camp.

For two minutes the musicians stood in silence, with heads bowed, after they were informed of their former leader's death.

On his last birthday, Dr Muck was awarded the order of the German Eagle by Adolf Hitler in person. Hitler, shortly after coming into power, occupied a front seat at Dr Muck's last appearance as a national music figure—the Leipzig observance in 1933 of the 50th anniversary of Richard Wagner's death.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
TIMES

MAR 5 - 1940

DR. KARL MUCK, 80, DEAD IN GERMANY

Famed Wagnerian Conductor Victim of War Hysteria in U.S. in 1918

STUTTGART, Germany, March 4 (AP).—Dr. Karl Muck, celebrated interpreter of Wagnerian music at the Bayreuth festivals and former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died today at the age of 80.

He conducted the Boston Symphony from 1906 to 1908 and again from 1912 to 1918.

Dr. Muck's last appearance as a national music figure was during the Leipzig observance of the fiftieth anniversary of Richard Wagner's death in February, 1933.

At that time Hitler had just come into power and he sat in the front row of the famous Gewandhaus. On the occasion of his last birthday, Dr. Muck was awarded the Order of the German Eagle by Hitler himself.

As conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra during the World war, Dr. Muck became the central figure in a "cause celebre" when wartime patriotic groups sought to "put him to the test" by demanding the playing of the "Star-Spangled Banner" before a concert in Providence, R. I. fall.

The anthem was not played, but the late Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the orchestra, exonerated Muck at the time, asserting that the request had been received only that afternoon just as the orchestra was entraining for Providence, and that there had been no time for a rehearsal.

"Indeed Dr. Muck was not even consulted and did not hear about the episode until the next day," wrote M. A. De Wolfe Howe in his fiftieth anniversary book on the history of the orchestra.

Dr. Muck subsequently conducted the "Star-Spangled Banner" at other concerts elsewhere in the east, but rising wartime hysteria caused him so much embarrassment that he finally resigned. He later was interned during the war and became embittered against America.

In Boston today, when Dr. Koussevitzky, present director of the orchestra, halted a rehearsal to inform the players of Dr. Muck's death, the musicians rose in a silent two-minute tribute to their former leader.

DR. KARL MUCK

Whatever his political and personal misfortunes in the United States may have been, leading to his internment here and his subsequent embitterment during the World war, no one will gainsay the fact that Dr. Karl Muck, who just died in Stuttgart, Germany, was probably the greatest Wagnerian conductor of his time. It was under him that the Boston Symphony Orchestra achieved a world eminence which was only recaptured after years of arduous toil at the hands of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the present conductor. His unspectacular methods in conducting, his precision and devotion to the integrity of the score, was exactly the style which in his day endeared him to

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TELEGRAPH

MAR 5 - 1940

Dr. Karl Muck, 80, Dies in Germany

BERLIN, March 4.—Dr. Karl Muck, famous conductor, died today at Stuttgart. He was recognized as one of the greatest of the Wagnerian conductors.

From 1901 to 1930 Dr. Muck conducted at Beyreuth, where great interest centered in his conducting of "Parsifal." He had conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Hamburg Philharmonic and at the Berlin Opera. At the Berlin Opera he shared with Richard Strauss the title general director of music.

CONDUCTOR DIES

DR. KARL MUCK

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEWS

MAR 5 - 1940

DR. KARL MUCK
Wagnerian Authority

Stuttgart, March 4 (AP).—Dr. Karl Muck, 80, celebrated interpreter of Wagnerian music at the Bayreuth festivals and former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died today.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HANOVER, PA.
SUN

MAR 5 - 1940

KARL MUCK

(From the New York Times)

Dr. Karl Muck lived to see Germany, the land of his birth and of some of his greatest triumphs, involved in a second major war. The first had meant a bitter, unforgettable experience for him. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when the war began and when the United States entered it. Because he was a German by birth, although a Swiss citizen at that time, criticism was heaped upon him. It was charged that he had refused a request to conduct the "Star-Spangled Banner" in Providence one evening in October, 1917. Actually, on the testimony of Henry Lee Higginson, founder and chief sustainer of the orchestra, Dr. Muck did not know of the request. Later on he conducted our national anthem regularly. But the agitation, once begun, increased until in March, 1918, he was arrested and interned as an enemy alien.

Dr. Muck was one of the great conductors of his time. His career as a director of opera and symphony orchestras won him acclaim in the world's outstanding music centers. In the eight seasons that he conducted the Boston Symphony he brought it to what was then its "highest point of art". He built a virtuoso orchestra and gave it "a living voice". Philip Hale said: "He stands there calm, undemonstrative, graceful, elegant, aristocratic; a man of singularly commanding and magnetic personality even in repose. The orchestra is his speech, the expression of the composer's music as it appeals to the conductor's brain, heart and soul". He was not only a musician of broad sympathies and profound learning, but a scholar in other fields as well.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LANSDALE, PA.
North Penn Reporter

MAR 5 - 1940

We always liked the way Major Higginson stuck by Dr. Karl Muck, back in the days of World War 1, in that row over the playing of the "Star Spangled Banner" by the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra. Major Higginson was always fair and, what is more, he knew a good conductor. The incident is recalled by the death yesterday of Dr. Muck, in Germany, at the age of eighty.

214

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 5 - 1940

KARL MUCK

Dr. Karl Muck lived to see Germany, the land of his birth and of some of his greatest triumphs, involved in a second major war. The first had meant a bitter, unforgettable experience for him. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when the war began and when the United States entered it. Because he was a German by birth, although a Swiss citizen at that time, criticism was heaped upon him. It was charged that he had refused a request to conduct the "Star-Spangled Banner" in Providence one evening in October, 1917. Actually, on the testimony of Henry Lee Higginson, founder and chief sustainer of the orchestra, Dr. Muck did not know of the request. Later on he conducted our national anthem regularly. But the agitation, once begun, increased until in March, 1918, he was arrested and interned as an enemy alien.

Dr. Muck was one of the great conductors of his time. His career as a director of opera and symphony orchestras won him acclaim in the world's outstanding music centers. In the eight seasons that he conducted the Boston Symphony he brought it to what was then its "highest point of art." He built a virtuoso orchestra and gave it "a living voice." Philip Hale said: "He stands there calm, undemonstrative, graceful, elegant, aristocratic: a man of singularly commanding and magnetic personality even in repose. The orchestra is his speech, the expression of the composer's music as it appeals to the conductor's brain, heart and soul." He was not only a musician of broad sympathies and profound learning, but a scholar in other fields as well.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER
MAR 5 - 1940

Tribute to the Musician

It was wholly fitting that when the news of the death of a former conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, was announced by Dr. Koussevitzky during a rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the musicians should have arisen and paid a silent tribute to his memory.

The circumstances under which he left the orchestra during the World war are still fairly fresh in mind. His alleged refusal to lead the orchestra in the Star Spangled Banner at a concert in Providence came at a time when feeling ran high. But there has never been any question of his ability as a musician and especially as a conductor. Under his leadership the orchestra became an extremely sensitive ensemble and some of its finest achievements up to the coming of the present conductor were achieved under Dr. Muck's guidance.

Prejudice against the German should not be allowed to obscure the talents of the musician.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
MAR 6 - 1940

The Conning Tower

Sound the Trumpet, Beat the Drums!
Ethereal Mildness, Here She Comes!

Let jocund music sound,
Warble like anything!
Today I've found
That soon it will be Spring.

Jug-jug, too-roo-le-lay!
And too-witta-woo! (I mean,
Winter, away!
Let Flora be our queen!)

Send for Richard Strauss!
("Till Eulenspiegel's Pranks.")
Soon kommen heraus
Die Giants und die Yanks.

An air by Maurice Ravel,
Or maybe Georges Bizet,
Will do quite well
To start the year's croquet.

Let Rimsky-Korsakoff,
Loudly played by bands,
Then see me off
To lie on Jones Beach sands.

Fun in assorted boats
(Heave ho, my lads!) gains much
When Eric Coates
Assists with his jolly touch.

To still our fears and qualms
(Life's rather full of menace)
Johannes Brahms
Will help. And so will tennis.

So hey-nonny-no! Cuccu!
I shout hey-dinga-ding-ding!
(And so do you.)
Let's toot, let's flute, for Spring!

FORREST IZARD

+ + +

[Note by Editor to printer: Set it; I'm sick of stuff on Winter.]

+ + +

When somebody like Dr. Karl Muck dies, newspapers go to the clipping department, known as The Morgue, and dig out stuff for obituaries. When prominent persons begin to be ill, or to age, or both, the morgue editors begin revising, and try to bring the biographies up to date. The Times, for example, said yesterday: "Among modern conductors there were few more self-effacing or more given to faithful renditions of the music on the stand before them than Dr. Muck, who was driven from the podium of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the wave of wartime hysteria that swept this nation in 1918. . . . The storm broke in Providence when he 'failed' to play 'The Star-Spangled Banner.' It was not on the program, and Major Higginson refused to change the program at the last minute to include it." The Herald Tribune said of the same happening: "In November, 1917, Dr. Muck aggravated a rising tide of anti-German feeling by refusing to play 'The Star-Spangled Banner' at concerts on the ground that a symphony orchestra was not a military band. Patriotic societies denounced him in rather extravagant terms and even the late Theodore Roosevelt proclaimed him an alien menace." It is to be noted that in the Herald Tribune he refused to play the national anthem "at concerts on the ground that a symphony orchestra was not a military band"; in the Times he "failed" to play it at a Providence concert.

C.S.M. March 5

Aitken as Symphony Soloist

The fifth program in the current series of Monday-Tuesday concerts was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the Suite in E major for string orchestra, Op. 63, by Arthur Foote, and the Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D major. Midway in the program stood the Mozart Piano Concerto in B flat (K. No. 450), with Webster Aitken in his debut appearance as soloist with the Boston orchestra.

Those who braved the storm to attend this concert were rewarded by an evening of melody. Mr. Foote's suite is written in this composer's most ingratiating manner. The listener is again impressed with the fine melodic line and technical mastery which it reveals. The suite last night received one of the most sympathetic publications in recent years, and merited the warm applause of the audience.

Mr. Atken is a sensitive musician with a competent technique and a modest approach to his task. Had his timing been more accurate the performance would have been more interesting, yet his lack of affectation in presenting this crystalline music and the evident respect which he has for his instrument and for the aims of the composer is to his credit. Mr. Aitken was warmly applauded.

The performance of the Brahms symphony has probably been unsurpassed by this orchestra in recent years. Dr. Koussevitzky appeared to consider it last night as a type of joyous ode, which commenced quietly and serenely but gradually increased in intensity until the final measures were almost a shout, discreetly delivered but unmistakable. It was a performance which occasioned much applause. G. M. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
MAR 5 - 1940

Mrs. Marie Page, Artist, Is Dead

Painted Portrait of Mary E. Woolley

BOSTON, March 4 (AP)—Mrs. Marie Danforth Page, 70, nationally known portrait painter, died in a hospital today of complications resulting from a fall.

Her recent works included portraits of Mary E. Woolley, president emeritus at Mt. Holyoke College, and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Webster Aitkin Soloist in Mozart Concerto; Koussevitzky Applauded in Brahms Symphony

Transcript By EDWARD DOWNES March 5

Webster Aitkin, gifted young Californian pianist, appeared last night as soloist with the Boston Symphony on the fifth of the Monday-Tuesday programs. His vehicle was the Mozart Concerto in B-flat major, K-450, if you can use the word "vehicle" in connection with a performer of such modesty and retiring good taste as Mr. Aitkin. He never in any way obtruded his personality between Mozart and the audience.

Serge Koussevitzky conducted beside the Concerto, a Suite in E major for String Orchestra by the American composer, Arthur Foote and Brahms' Second Symphony. In spite of dismally sleety weather there were few vacant seats in the hall and the applause, particularly after the Brahms Symphony, indicated that listeners went out into the rain fortified with the warmth of their own enthusiasm.

Ingratiating American Work

When it was performed by the Boston Symphony last fall, one was moved to admiration for the solid craftsmanship and melodic charm of the Foote Suite. Last night's performance gave no reason to subtract from what was said at that time.

One of the simpler, more light-hearted of Mozart's mature concertos, the B flat major, is not often heard. In fact there is no positive record that it has ever been played before by the Boston Symphony. Though it is full of what in another composer might be called 18th century musical cliches, they are transformed by the magical Mozart touch and there are many startling flashes of genius. One such, half way through the slow movement is an arresting progression of descending chords in the orchestra while the piano covers the sinking line of the topmost voice with trills. The first and last movements are more brilliant, the first with its glittering rush of scale passages in the solo instrument and the last with a rondo theme of a gay insouciance that was nicely caught by Koussevitzky and Mr. Aitkin. However in the performance of the first movement, strings and wood wind could have been better balanced.

Mr. Aitkin himself did his most impressive playing in the slow movement which under his fingers had intensity and simplicity. The rest of his performance was musicianly and in good taste, if not particularly exciting. Technical polish and ease one takes for granted nowadays.

Koussevitzky interpreted the Brahms with familiar dramatic fervour. A shade brisker tempo than is customary brought the Adagietto of the third movement nearer to scherzo character and accentuated a note of contrast between movements that was altogether welcome. The closing pages of the first movement had a depth and power, and the climax of the last movement an exultant eloquence that will remain in the memories of those who listened and heard.

March 6

News of Music

Trans

In memory of Dr. Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky and his players will open the program of their next pair of concerts, on March 21 and 23, with the Allegretto from Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. This far from conventional choice is a singularly appropriate one for this occasion since it was frequently the choice of Dr. Muck himself when he and the orchestra did homage to departed friends and musicians. The afternoon concert will be given on Thursday, March 21, instead of Friday, since it occurs in Holy Week. The evening concert will take place on Saturday as usual. This coming week, the orchestra will make its fourth visit to New York and other cities.

Polish Soloist, Polish Music

Monitor By L. A. Sloper March 5

As if to emphasize the fact that the Polish nation lives, Dr. Koussevitzky has set upon this week's Boston Symphony program a recent work by a Polish composer, and called upon a Polish pianist to join the orchestra in its interpretation. The work is Szymanowski's Symphonie Concertante, and the pianist is Jan Smeterlin. The only other item of the program is Mahler's Fifth Symphony.

Szymanowski, who is generally regarded as the greatest Polish composer since Chopin, has strangely enough been very little heard at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Only his Second Symphony, played in 1922 under Mr. Monteux, and his Second Violin Concerto, played by Albert Spalding in 1934, had been heard in Symphony Hall. All the more urgent, then, was it that this late work of his should be brought to hearing here at this time.

⁂

The Symphonie Concertante was well chosen for what we have assumed to be the conductor's purpose. For this music—which was analyzed in these columns on Thursday—seems to be clearly national in character. Not only in the employment of folk-like thematic material, but in its inner impulse and expression, the score seems to reflect the nature of the Polish people as we know it from their music and their literature.

Like the Second Violin Concerto, this work does not reveal itself to the ear too readily on a first hearing. Its mood is austere for the most part, its harmonic scheme is astringent, its rhythmic pattern complex. But its material is salient, and its construction is clear enough to the attentive listener.

⁂

Again as in the work for violin and orchestra, the Symphonie Concertante is not written for the display of a soloist's virtuosity. The piano takes its place as an orchestral instrument, though one which is given ample solo participation. This is the modern style, and a style which lends itself more easily than the old-fashioned one to symphonic expression where a solo instrument is involved. Certainly the expression is symphonic here, and certainly the work made a deep impression for its conceptual brilliance, its well-knit texture, and its emotional content.

The performance, so far as one could judge without a better acquaintance with the score, was admirable on the part of both soloist and orchestra. The response of the audience was cordial, considering the relative inacessibility of the work.

Playing Mahler's Fifth Symphony for the third time in Boston, Dr. Koussevitzky again gave it a characteristically effective performance. The piece serves at least to display the virtuosity and the tonal splendors of the orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
MAR 5 - 1940

MRS. PAGE, PAINTER, DIES IN BOSTON

BOSTON, March 4 (AP) — Mrs. Marie Danforth Page, 70, nationally-known portrait painter, died in a hospital today of complications resulting from a fall.

Her recent works included portraits of Mary E. Woolley, president emeritus at Mt. Holyoke College, and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

She had received the Julia Shaw prize, the Thomas A. Proctor prize and the Isador medal from the National Academy of Design.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

213

MAR 6 - 1940

Boston Symphony Reveals Program

Koussevitzky to Conduct March 13 in Woolsey Hall Concert.

The appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, which has become an almost annual event in New Haven, will conclude the current Woolsey Hall concert series next Wednesday evening.

The concert, given under the auspices of the Yale University School of Music, will begin at 8:30 in Woolsey Hall, New Haven.

The program, announced today by Mr. Koussevitzky, is as follows:

Symphony No. 1 in C major, ...
Op. 21 .... Beethoven
Adagio molto; Allegro con brio
Andante cantabile con moto
Menuetto; Allegro molto e vivace
Finale: Adagio; Allegro molto e vivace

Symphony, "Mathis der Maler".. .... Hindemith
Angelic Concert
Entombment
Temptation of Saint Anthony

INTERMISSION

"Pelleas et Melisande," Suite from the stage
Music to Maeterlinck's tragedy, Op. 80 .... Faure
Prelude: Quasi adagio
"Fileuse": Andantino quasi allegretto
Molto adagio
Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un faune (Eclogue by S. Mallarme) .... Debussy
Orchestral Excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe" (Second Suite) .. Ravel
Lever du jour—Pantomime—Danse generale

THIS CLIPPING FROM BURLINGTON, VT.
FREE PRESS

MAR 8 - 1940

Stephen Foster's Name Chiseled On Memorial Arch

BOSTON, Mar. 7 (AP)—Ignoring George Gershwin and Victor Herbert, 67 musicians and critics have voted to have the names of Stephen Foster and Edward MacDowell chiseled into the stone dome of the new $300,000 Edward Hatch memorial shell under construction here.

50 Are Chosen

Fifty composers, considered to be the most significant in all music history, were chosen from a list of 97 names prepared by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, and Arthur Fiedler, leader of the Esplanade Orchestra, which will occupy the new shell on the banks of the Charles River for its series of summer concerts. The balloting was restricted to composers who have died.

Along with Gershwin and Herbert, those who failed to make the American group were John Philip Sousa, Charles Griffiths, Henry Hadley and Henry Gilbert, while the successful ones, in addition to Foster and MacDowell, were Arthur Foote, George W. Chadwick and Charles Martin Loeffler.

Unanimous Vote

The names of Bach, Haydn and Mozart received unanimous votes for inclusion in the classical group, while Beethoven, Brahms and Tschaikowski were endorsed similarly in the romantic.

Others who received unanimous votes were Wagner, in the operatic group; Monteverdi, in the preclassical group, and Debussy, among the moderns.

Schubert and Schumann each lacked one vote of being chosen unanimously. Two persons failed to list Handel as among the leading composers in his group.

The popular composers chosen included Johann Strauss, the waltz king, and Arthur Sullivan, of the team of Gilbert and Sullivan.

The original list of 97 names ranged from Josquin des Pres, born in 1445, to Gershwin, born in 1898.

Globe March 7

Vote on Names to Appear on Esplanade Shell Casts Light on Musical Opinion

Seventy New England musicians, concert patrons and writers on music have just balloted to select the names of 50 composers in the whole history of music who, they believe, are entitled to have their names chiseled upon the stone dome of the magnificent Edward Hatch Memorial Shell now under construction from the funds of the Maria Hatch Bequest as a permanent home for the Esplanade Concerts.

Richard Shaw, the architect, wishing to insure a choice of names as far as possible free from critical controversy, referred the problem of selection to the trustees of the Hatch Bequest, John Burke and William J. Hickey Jr. The only stipulation made by Mr. Shaw was that the number of names chosen would have to be limited to a total of 550 letters of the alphabet.

From the trustees a request for help went to Arthur Fiedler, founder and conductor of the Esplanade Concerts, and to Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Ballot Contains 97 Names

The result was a ballot. It contains 97 names of composers ranging from Josquin des Pres, born in 1445, to George Gershwin, born in 1898. To avoid controversial difficulties, living men were omitted. On the other hand, as indicated by the inclusion of Gershwin's name, composers of popular music were not excluded from the company of eminent masters of serious music.

Johann Strauss, Arthur Sullivan, Offenbach, Coleridge-Taylor (first Negro composer to win world fame), Stephen Foster, and Sousa were named on the ballot, along with Palestrina, Lasso, Corelli, Scarlatti, Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms, Moussorgsky, Ravel, and the American composers, Foote, Chadwick, MacDowell, and Henry Gilbert.

Right at the start of planning the ballot, it was decided not to limit the names to orchestral composers, merely because the Esplanade Concerts since their establishment had presented only programs of instrumental music.

Names were printed on the ballot under seven headings: Pre-Classical, Classical, Romantic, Modern, Operatic, American and Popular. From a total of 97 names, 50 were to be selected by each recipient of a ballot.

Estimates of Musical Standing

The final tabulation, announced in part last night, shows some striking estimates of musical standing.

Of the Americans, MacDowell was ranked beside Mendelssohn with 64 votes; Foote beside Offenbach with 39; Chadwick had a vote less, but one more than Stephen Foster, who led Gounod by one vote. Loeffler received a vote less than Gounod, but two more than Gershwin. Since Gershwin, like Elgar, received 33 votes, both the American and the Englishman failed to draw half of the total. Victor Herbert trailed Gershwin by three votes, but led Charles Griffes by one and Sousa by five. However, Sousa led Massenet and Resphigi by one vote.

The voting on familiar European composers, serious and popular, yielded some interesting quirks.

The unanimous choices were Debussy, Wagner, Brahms, Bach, Beethoven, Haydn, and Mozart.

Unnanimity was missed by Schubert and Schumann by one vote, and Handel by two. Tchaikovsky, Chopin, Franck, and Palestrina received all but four votes. Saint-Saens and Sullivan succeeded in drawing 50 or more votes, but Massenet failed in this.

Strauss, Verdi, Berlioz Tie

Johann Strauss who, like Verdi and Berlioz, got 62 votes, had a margin of one over Rimsky-Korsakov and Ravel, who each beat Bizet by three and Grieg by six. Moussorgsky, once obscure, won 54 votes.

Neither Sibelius nor Stravinski were included on the ballot, but their names may be added to the stone dome on the basis that musically speaking their life work is about over.

The names of all 50 composers who won in the balloting are not made public at this time for the reason that the architect is going to be allowed a certain amount of latitude because of the mechanical phase of his task. The list has been furnished him, however, to help him in his final selection. It is also stated that three additional American composers will have their names engraved on the dome even though they did not actually finish among the winning 50.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

MAR 6 - 1940

WORDS About Music And Musicians

Gregor Piatigorsky, noted cellist, will be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts in Symphony Hall this week.

The program will open with Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, Op. 25, followed by the first performances in the United States of the Prokofeiff Concerto for Cello in E minor, Op. 58. The Strauss "Don Quixote," Op. 35, will complete the program with Piatigorsky as cello soloist and Jean LeFranc as viola soloist.

* * *

Biruta Ramoska, young Hartford soprano, will take part in a student's recital at the Institute of Musical Art of the Juilliard School of Music in New York Friday evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER

MAR 9 - 1940

Favorite Composers

As the new permanent music shell to be constructed on the Charles River Esplanade in Boston does not provide as much space for inscriptions as our own Memorial Auditorium, the selection of the names of 50 composers, most significant in all musical history, was a task fraught with the problems that invariably arise in the compilation of similar lists of the favorite or the famous. Taste and standards of appreciation differ and it is impossible to satisfy all.

In this case Dr. Koussevitzky and Arthur Fiedler had reduced the possibilities to about 100, wisely ruling out living composers. It was the task of a committee of critics and musicians to pare this down to fifty. It was a foregone conclusion that the three B's, Bach, Beethoven and Brahms would be conspicuous on any list. One would expect to find Schubert and Schumann high up in the voting, as well as Handel, Haydn and Mozart. Most of us would include Mendelssohn and Tschaikowsky in the musical hall of fame, which certainly would be incomplete without Wagner. On these there seems to have been pretty general agreement.

Of American composers it was to have been expected that Stephen Foster, MacDowell and George W. Chadwick would be chosen. And that in Boston there would be support for Arthur Foote.

The sifting process, naturally was more difficult when it came to the composers of popular music. Of foreign composers in this class most of us would cite Strauss, the waltz king, and Sir Arthur Sullivan. There will be complaints that Victor Herbert, John P. Sousa and George Gershwin were left out. But while both the former are deservedly popular, it will take the passage of time to evaluate the position to which the admittedly talented Gershwin is entitled.

On the whole, the committee has done a pretty good job, with a prospect of wider approval than is sometimes the case in making such selections out of a wealth of material.

LAKEFIELD, MINN
STANDARD
3/7/40

Most of us have a low opinion of bolshevik Russia and what comes out of there. However, most of us could name a number of Russians who were or are a credit to their country. One such is Sergei Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra since 1924. The Boston orchestra claims the championship of the world. Sergei was born in 1874 in a small Russian village, the son of a poor violin teacher. He got his musical education in Moscow, but for lack of opportunity to choose had to take up the bull fiddle. Within a few years he was regarded as the best full fiddle virtuoso in Europe. Not being in sympathy with the Bolsheviks he settled permanently in the United States in 1920. Koussevitzky earns $40,000 a year, is married but has no children. His tastes run to good clothes, good food and champagne. The Boston orchestra numbers 110 members and Boston is justly proud of that musical organization. Opportunity is still knocking. It was a long way to go for Sergei from a poor bull fiddle student in Moscow to leader of the best symphony in the world. Perhaps another Koussevitzky is even now blaring away locally to future, fame and fortune. Who knows?

HERALD, THURSDAY, MARCH 7, 1940

Music Lovers 'Elect' Composers For Inscription on New Shell

A New England "electoral college" of musicians, concert patrons and writers on music has been voting this week to determine the names of music composers to be chiseled on the dome of the new Edward Hatch Memorial Shell, being constructed for Esplanade concerts.

Unanimously chosen were Bach, Beethoven, Haydn, Mozart, Debussy, Wagner and Brahms. Schubert and Schumann missed unanimity by one vote each, and Handel by two; Tchaikovsky, Chopin, Franck and Palestrina received all but four votes.

The American composer, MacDowell, ranked with Mendelssohn with 64 votes; Foote, also an American, ranked with Offenbach, with 39; Stephen Foster, composer of some of America's most popular folk songs, led Gounod, popularly known for his "Ave Maria," by several votes.

George Gershwin ranked with Elgar with 33 votes; Victor Herbert got 30; Charles Griffen, 29; Sousa, 25; Massenet and Respighi, 24.

Among the European composers were Saint-Saens and Sullivan who got more than half the votes; Johann Strauss, Verdi, Berlioz, 62 each; Rimsky-Korsakov and Ravel, 61 each; Bizet, 58; Grieg, 55; Moussorgsky, 54.

The ballot was the result of attempts to avoid controversy. Richard Shaw, architect for the shell, referred the problem of the selection of names to trustees of the Hatch Bequest, John Burke and William J. Hickey, Jr. His only stipulation was that the number of names would be limited to a total of 550 letters.

Arthur Fiedler, founder and conductor of the Esplanade concerts, and Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra, were consulted by the trustees, and the ballot was evolved.

It contained 97 names of composers, ranging from Joaquin des Pres, born in 1445, to Gershwin, born in 1898. [redacted]

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS HERALD

MAR 8 - 1940

Fiedler Will Announce Results Of All-American Orchestra Audition

Results of the State Audition for the NYA-sponsored All-American Youth Orchestra, held Thursday afternoon, will be announced later by Arthur Fiedler, eminent Boston musician and conductor, who was in charge of the hearing. Seventeen instrumentalists were heard by the Auditions Board, Joseph Malkin, Boston cellist, who was Mr. Fiedler's assistant, Walter Habenicht of Bangor and David E. Fisher, Harold M. Lawrence, Katherine Hatch Graffam, Frank J. Rigby, Joseph L. Goudreau and Carl Liberty of Portland.

Contestants were graded by the board on technique, tone, intonation, phrasing, rhythm and sight reading ability. Mr Fiedler, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and conductor of the famous Boston "Pops" as well as of the summer Esplanade concerts, will base his decision on these findings.

The regional audition, to which state winners are eligible, will be held in Boston, probably in April, he said.

216

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

MAR 7 - 1940

Gershwin and Herbert Ignored For MacDowell and Foster

BOSTON, (AP). — Ignoring George Gershwin and Victor Herbert, 67 musicians and critics voted last night to have the names of Stephen Foster and Edward MacDowell chiseled into the stone dome of the new $300,000 Edward Hatch memorial shell under construction here.

50 Chosen

Fifty composers considered to be the most significant in all music history, were chosen from a list of 97 names prepared by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, and Arthur Fiedler, leader of the Esplanade Orchestra, which will accupy the new shell on the banks of the Charles River for its series of summer concerts. The balloting was restricted to composers who have died.

Along with Gershwin and Herbert, those who failed to make the American group were John Philip Sousa, Charles Griffiths, Henry Hadley and Henry Gilbert, while the successful ones, in addition to Foster and MacDowell, were Arthur Foote, George W. Chadwick and Charles Martin Loeffler.

The names of Bach, Haydn and Mozart received unanimous votes for inclusion in the classical group, while Beethoven, Brahms and Tchaikowsky were endorsed similarly in the romantic.

Others who received unanimous votes were Wagner, in the operatic group; Monteverdi, in the preclassical group, and Debussy, among the moderns.

Schubert and Schumann each lacked one vote of being chosen unanimously. Two persons failed to list Handel as among the leading composers in his group.

The popular composers chosen included Johann Strauss, the waltz king, and Arthur Sulivan, of the team of Gilbert and Sullivan.

The original list of 97 names ranged from Josquin Des Pres, born in 1445, to Gershwin, born in 1898.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

MAR 7 - 1940

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Play at Smith Tuesday

Koussevitsky Will Conduct Sixth and Final Concert in Series at Greene Hall

The Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, will present the sixth and final concert in the Smith college concert course on Tuesday evening, March 12, at 8, in John M. Greene hall. Tickets for standing room will be available at the door on the evening of the concert.

Of exceptional interest to followers of new music will be "Mathis der Haler," composed in 1934 by Paul Hindemith, which is included on Tuesday evening's program. A native of Germany, Hindemith has been rated by many critics as one of the outstanding composers of the day. He will be remembered by numerous concert-goers of the vicinity for his appearance at Sage hall two years ago, when he played a program of works for viola of his own composition.

The compelte program is as follows:

Symphony, No. 1 in C major Op. 21 — Beethoven
Symphony, "Matnis der Maler," (Mathias the Painter) — Hindemith
Angelic concert
Entombment
Temptation of St. Anthony
"Pelleas et Melisande," suite from the stage music to Maeterlinck's tragedy, Op. 80 — Faure
Prelude to Lohengrin — Wagner
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg" — Wagner

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

MAR 7 - 1940

CHOOSE NAMES OF COMPOSERS FOR NEW SHELL

Foster, MacDowell on List, Gershwin, Herbert Ignored for Boston Honors

BOSTON, March 6 (AP) — Ignoring George Gershwin and Victor Herbert, 67 musicians and critics voted tonight to have the names of Stephen Foster and Edward MacDowell chiseled into the stone dome of the new $300,000 Edward Hatch memorial shell under construction here.

50 Chosen

Fifty composers, considered to be the most significant in all music history, were chosen from a list of 97 names prepared by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, and Arthur Fiedler, leader of the Esplanade Orchestra, which will occupy the new shell on the banks of the Charles River for its series of summer concerts. The balloting was restricted to composers who have died.

Along with Gershwin and Herbert, those who failed to make the American group were John Philip Sousa, Charles Griffiths, Henry Hadley and Henry Gilbert, while the successful ones, in addition to Foster and MacDowell, were Arthur Foote, George W. Chadwick and Charles Martin Loeffler.

The names of Bach, Haydn and Mozart received unanimous votes for inclusion in the classical group, while Beethoven, Brahms and Tchaikowsky were indorsed similarly in the romantic.

Others who received unanimous votes were Wagner, in the operatic group; Monteverdi, in the preclassical group, and Debussy, among the moderns.

Schubert and Schumann each lacked one vote of being chosen unanimously. Two persons failed to list Handel as among the leading composers in his group.

The popular composers chosen included Johann Strauss, the waltz king, and Arthur Sullivan, of the team of Gilbert and Sullivan.

The original list of 97 names ranged from Josquin Des Pres, born in 1445, to Gershwin, born in 1898.

The Boston Globe

Published by GLOBE NEWSPAPER COMPANY
242 Washington St. Boston, Mass.
(Established March 4, 1872. Evening edition first issued March 7, 1878. Sunday edition first issued Oct. 14, 1877.)

THURSDAY, MARCH 7, 1940

SUBSCRIPTION RATES

	Daily Per Mo.	Daily Per Yr.	Sunday Per Mo.	Sunday Per Yr.
Boston Postal Zone	.75	9.00	.55	6.50
Zones 1, 2, 3 (including New York city and all New England except Northern Maine)	.50	6.00	.50	6.00
Elsewhere in U. S. and Canada	.80	9.60	.70	8.40

(Please do not send cash. Use money orders or checks.)

BACK NUMBERS (Per Copy)

	Daily	Sunday
Under three months old	5c	15c
Three to six months old	10c	20c
Six to nine months old	15c	25c
Nine months to one year	25c	50c
More than one year old	Out of Print

The Associated Press is exclusively entitled to the use for publication of all news dispatches credited to it or not otherwise credited in this paper and also the local news published herein. All rights of republication of special dispatches herein are also reserved.

Globe Man's Daily Story

A woman, introduced to Anton Rubinstein, the Russian pianist, exclaimed: "O, Mr. Rubinstein, I am so glad to meet you! I have tried so hard to get a seat for your recital. Haven't you a seat you could let me take?"

"There is only one seat at my disposal, madam," Rubinstein replied, "but you are welcome to sit at the piano!"

PEN AND CHISEL

When the site of Boston is excavated centuries hence, archeologists leaning on their spades will pause over blocks of stone inscribed with the names of composers, to remark, "Those Bostonians must have been some pumpkins!" The use of the structure which they are excavating, called "Hatch Memorial," will present no great puzzle. Situated on an esplanade by the waterside it was clearly a concert platform like the Odeon on the southern slope of the Acropolis. Here, plainly, an orchestra played to multitudes who listened in the open air.

What will interest the excavators far more (if the orchestra, architect and trustees will pardon this hanging of archeological crape before their building is up) is the collection of composers' names, for from these they will be able to infer the state of musical intelligence in an American city of 1940. If concerts of such music were given, as they must have been, free to the people in the open air, an extraordinary diffusion of literate musical taste is argued.

Let us help them a little. Suppose we inclose in a sealed metal box, to be placed in the corner stone, copies of this morning's newspapers (printed not on wood pulp) which recite how these names to be inscribed on the dome and entablatures of the Hatch Memorial came to be chosen. A list of composers was sent to seventy persons of musical education. These were asked to check a given number of preferences from names under seven headings: preclassical, classical, romahtic, modern, operatic, American and populai. Unlike a Gallup poll, where an ignoramus equates a savant, these voters were technically proficient. Their judgment therefore reflects the rank of the world's composers in one of the most highly cultivated musical centers in America; for although this is not a popular plebiscite, it does denote the quality of music which, being played at free public concerts, is gladly heard by the multitude.

The first surprise is unanimity. Of the sixty-seven who voted, every one agreed on Bach, Beethoven, Haydn, Mozart, Brahms, Wagner and Debussy; all but one voted for Schubert and Schumann, all but two for Handel and all but three for Mendelssohn and MacDowell, although MacDowell is there because he seemed the most obvious first choice as an American composer. Score: Germany 10, France 1, America 1.

To check the original lists sent out from Symphony Hall would make an interesting school exercise. The first choices are simple. "Operatic"? Wagner and Verdi, of course! "Preclassical"? (the term is a bit arbitrary), Bach and Handel are easy. "Classical"? Beethoven, Haydn, Mozart. "Romantic"? Brahms, Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Franck, Berlioz. "Modern"? Debussy, Ravel, D'Indy. "Popular"? Strauss (no initial: you can have Richard or Johann, though "popular" is not full justice to Richard), then Grieg, Saint-Saens. . . . So far all is smooth going; it is when the borderline cases are reached that pencils being to be gnawed.

Reputation goes on two legs. One is the talent of the composer, the other the intelligence of the public. Beethoven's later works were not understood until more than fifty years after his death, Bach's "Matthew Passion" and B-Minor Mass had to wait a century. If the Hatch Memorial had been built forty years ago, Brahms would never have beaten his forerunner romantics, Schubert and Schumann, and perhaps his pen would not have carried his name to the stonecutter's chisel at all. Two living composers who, by their years, have probably written most of their works, may be included: Sibelius and Stravinsky.

Presumably we still have quite a little while to go before the archeologists start digging us up, so why not leave plenty of blank spaces on the entablatures of the Hatch Memorial? Our prospects of producing composers to fill them look fairly good.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

March 8 — THE BOSTON HERALD,

MEETING OF THE ARTS—Tallulah Bankhead, star of "The Little Foxes," with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, eminent conductor, as she attended the rehersal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall yesterday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

MAR 9 - 1940

MEMORY OF MUSIKMEISTER MUCK, VICTIM OF WAR-TIME HYSTERIA

Dear Editor: In the account of Dr. Karl Muck, one-time conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as given in his obituary in The Post are some inaccuracies regarding certain episodes during the war in 1917.

As I remember from the happenings of that period he had received instructions from Major Higginson, who virtually supported the Boston Symphony Orchestra financially, not to play the "Star Spangled Banner" and that is why he did not do so. Major Higginson it was who stated that it had no place at a symphony concert.

Conductor Muck was undoubtedly a victim of wartime hysteria. He always insisted that he was a Swiss citizen and not a German subject. In wartime, however, reason goes into a state of suspended animation hypnotized by unreasoning passion.

A. EDWARD POTTER.

217

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

MAR 9 - 1940

Carleton Smith Says U. S. Lags As a 'Neighbor'

Back From 22,000-Mi. Trip, He Advises Sending Best Culture to All Republics

The United States should send the best of its culture to Latin America to bolster its good neighbor policy, in the opinion of Carleton Smith, music critic, economist and lecturer, who has just returned from a four-and-a-half-month tour of South and Central America. He proposes that this country send its best symphony orchestras, its best dance bands, and above all, that it send teachers to establish United States schools.

"The good neighbor policy is good as far as it goes, but it doesn't go far enough," Mr. Smith said yesterday in his apartment at the Waldorf-Astoria. "It has done a lot to allay their suspicion of us, but the flying fortresses are still a little too reminiscent of the big stick, and it has certainly been proved that the big stick doesn't work."

Mr. Smith, who is the music critic of "Esquire," said that he went to Latin America primarily to record folk music in out-of-the-way villages, but that he also was interested in observing the economic and political situation in each country. He taught economics for five years at the University of Chicago and holds a doctor of philosophy degree in that subject. He carried letters of introduction from Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, wife of the President, and so was able to talk to persons in all walks of life, from the Presidents of nearly every country he visited to peasants in villages so remote that they had not yet heard of the World War of twenty-two years ago. He traveled 22,000 miles, mostly by air, and visited every country in both South and Central America.

Cites Need to Buy More

"We'll never be good neighbors with the people of Latin America until we buy more from them," Mr. Smith said. "Argentina, which is the richest and strongest nation in South America, and the most like us in so many ways, hates us, despises us culturally, and, of course, we buy less from them than from any other country down there." He said he thought the ultimate solution of this economic situation must be "three or multi-cornered" trade, by which the United States would sell to Argentina, Argentina would sell to England and England would sell to us. In the meantime, he feels there are a number of things the United States could do "easily and cheaply" to ameliorate the situation.

"We should send them Toscanini and the N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra, Stokowski and the Philadelphia Symphony, or Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony," Mr. Smith said. "They are very proud and sensitive people, and they'll feel insulted if we send anything but the best. The governments would give free theaters and subsidies in many instances. We should also send them our best dance orchestras; we should stress Spanish in our schools as much or more than French and German, and we should send them school teachers."

"Expect Us to Enter War"

"The cultural approach is ideal," he pointed out. "First, because it subtly flatters them. Second, they like music and it is our common heritage from Europe—it needs no translation." He added that the United States short-wave broadcasts to Latin America did not compare with the symphonic programs sent out from Berlin, Rome and London. He said he tried all over South America to tune in the Toscanini broadcasts from New York, but that he could not get them.

"All South America expects us to enter the war after the next election," Mr. Smith said, "and Getulio Vargas (the President of Brazil) told me that Brazil would enter the war on the side of the United States the day after we went in. The Argentines say they never will. Chile, where it now takes thirty pesos to buy a dollar, is too poor to be of any help, and the other countries are uncertain.

"I found to my amazement that the people of Dutch Giana expect the United States to take them over, and they can hardly wait. Fifteen people in Paramaribo told me that Hitler would move into the Netherlands, and that we would take Dutch Guiana to keep him from taking it. The Aluminum Company of America has been down there for fifteen years buying bauxite, and paying higher wages than they've ever received before. The people think the United States would develop their country, which the Dutch haven't done."

Mr. Smith said that the people in South America generally still are resentful because United States firms had gone in and "bought what they consider too great concessions from grafting officials." He added, however, that the United States generally was respected, primarily because of the excellence of the air service offered by Pan American Airways and because of United States films, which are preferred.

Says British Control Argentina

"Vargas told me that Pan American had united his country," Mr. Smith said. "He can get mail through, find out what is happening. There are few roads. One of the best things we could do would be to build a Pan-American highway from the United States all the way down through South America. The Grace steamship lines have a monopoly, and it's cheaper for the people to go to Europe than to come to the United States."

Mr. Smith indicated that the British were to a great extent responsible for the black eye which the United States has in Argentina. "The British control Argentina," he said. "They own the railroads, the banks, most of the newspapers. They establish industries to compete with us, and they won't let the people use pounds to buy from us.

"Argentina's import control is as strict as Hitler's. The people want our automobiles and typewriters, but they can't get dollars with which to buy them, unless we buy from them. Phonograph records made in New York cannot be sold in Argentina until they have been sold in England. Then, imported from England, they are 40 per cent cheaper than they would be coming directly from the United States, since five pesos are required to buy a dollar but only twelve to buy a pound (yesterday a pound was $3.89½)."

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Herald Mar 9

Symphony Concert

The 18th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The soloist was Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist. The program was as follows:

Allegretto from Symphony No. 7 in A major, Opus 92............Beethoven
Concerto for Violoncello in E minor, Opus 58....................Prokofieff
"Don Quixote" Opus 35..........Strauss

Concertos for the violoncello are so rare and have so rarely, if ever, been completely successful that a new one from so skillful a composer as Prokofieff is an event of the utmost importance. Perhaps it would be as well to say at once that the new work is very interesting on more than one count but that it is by no means as attractive as the 2nd Violin Concerto, heard here recently, or the Piano Concertos. The retort to that, of course, is that no music for solo 'cello and orchestra ever has been as effective and popular as that involving violin or piano.

The first movement makes its way easily and at once to the ear. A charming, lyrical melody is heard against a varying ostinato background. You can't miss the effect of this or fail to take plesure in it. Prokofieff is too old a hand to make a botch of this kind of musical writing. With the second movement, allegro giusto and a coda in slower time, there also is not much difficulty in becoming acclimatized. Those of us who have heard and admired much of Prokofieff's music will not be stumped here, though we may feel that he has elsewhere done the same thing better. With the coda, though, enters that curious element which is the stumbling-block of the variations.

It would take a number of hearings to place a finger on what seems to be the trouble. At first bat we should say that Prokofieff became so interested in the 'cello as virtuoso instrument that he was content with that aspect alone. One of the pitfalls in writing for the 'cello is the tendency to use it solely for rhapsody. This can occasionally be managed, as in Bloch's "Solomon"; but with Prokofieff in the middle variations of the finale it bogs him down in a queer, static way. For a highly rhythmical composer this is an odd position to be caught in.

What evidently fascinated him in this movement was the chance to exploit the solo 'cello and unusual combinations of instruments. If, then, he was absorbed in the instrumentalists, he forgot the other listeners. We should reflect, though, that it would be presumptuous to condemn the Concerto on the ground that we were unable to assimilate easily some of the last movement. Grateful as it was in itself, the typically bustling Prokofieff finish seemed, again, strangely out of place.

This is, moreover, much too interesting a work to be shelved, even if 'cello concertos were as common as daisies. Mr. Piatigorsky played it with that overwhelming technique of which he is master and which he needed here in full measure. Both he and Mr. Koussevitzky had an obvious enthusiasm for their interpretation of the score. If this was in part a new and different Prokofieff, they certainly showed no disappointment and worked with a will to get the best possible results.

Mr. Piatigorsky was likewise the eloquent soloist in Strauss' "Don Quixote," in which also Mr. Lefranc contributed his expert share. The music, unlike many of Strauss's other tone poems, has to have the program. With that in mind there is no doubt but that Strauss brilliantly achieved what he set out to do. From the emotional point of view and at this distance in musical history "Don Quixote" should not be heard too often, for it can become wearisome. Incidentally, the Boston public should by this time know their Strauss well enough to leave before it begins rather than insult the musicians by walking out in the middle. Mr. Koussevitzky secured a remarkably fine performance; and any Strauss-hater could have taken his pleasure on the technical side.

The concert opened with a fitting tribute to the genius of Karl Muck, former conductor of the orchestra, who died this week, by offering the allegretto from Beethoven's 7th Symphony. The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will be out of town.

Globe

MUSIC

March 9

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Friday audience at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon heard what must have been one of the greatest performances ever given of Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote." It was one of those rare, "miraculous" occasions when orchestra, conductor and soloist were completely attuned to each other and to the music. The cellist was Gregor Piatigorsky, who also appeared in the first American performance of the new Cello Concerto by Prokofieff. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

The beginning of the program was altered to include the allegretto from the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, played in memory of Dr. Karl Muck, the great former conductor of the Boston Symphony who died last Monday. This classical excerpt, appropriate memorial to a man who was famed for the classic beauty of his conducting, was reverentially played, and so received by most in the audience, save a few who were so thoughtless as to applaud.

Mr. Piatigorsky and Mr. Koussevitzky had before given memorial accounts of the "fantastic variations on a theme of knightly character," but yesterday they exceeded even their best. The tone of the solo cello took on, in addition to its usual silken fineness, the living warmth of a human voice; that of the orchestra was rich and luminous beyond description.

Their interpretation was poetic, with Cervantes' lovable ridiculous knight and squire fairly coming to life as the chivalric adventures unrolled. It was also a performance of a thousand fine shadings of phrase, color and emphasis, of a recreative cunning that took the coarse edges from what are proverbially called Strauss' "vulgarities." The closing pages when the old knight's dying gasp is followed by those few orchestral measures that make a perfect finish to the whole, had the audience in a spell.

The applause which followed indicated how deeply the listeners had been moved. Mr. Piatigorsky, much admired in Boston, drew an "ovation" along with Mr. Koussevitzky and the members of the orchestra.

Some day a composer is going the limit in condensing the orchestral part of a concerto by writing just two unison chords, one at the start, one at the end, leaving the solo instrument to carry on alone between. Prokofieff has done very nearly that in his long Cello Concerto. After the first movement—and but for a coda at the end of the finale—the orchestra has nothing but the thinnest of accompaniments to play, and that very trivial.

What has become of the aggressive talent that gave us the "Scythian" and "Chout" suites, "Peter and the Wolf," "Lieut. Kije," the Fifth Piano Concerto and the Second Violin Concerto? The lyrical first movement of the Cello Concerto made one think: "Here is music just as novel and beautiful as the Second Violin Concerto."

But from that point only the cello part, which indeed has some passages that even the Piatigorsky tone and skill are hard put to make sound well, is of any interest. The instruments of the orchestra are reduced to mutterings so subdued that there is not the slightest contrast. And in this fashion the Concerto goes on and on.

The program will be repeated at 8:15 tonight. Next week the orchestra goes to New York. C. W. D.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRENTON, N. J.
STATE GAZETTE

MAR 9 - 1940

The new 'cello concerto of Serge Prokofieff will be introduced to New York by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist, when the orchestra makes its fourth visit of the season for two concerts in Carnegie Hall on March 14 and 16. The concerto had its first American hearing in Boston this week.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL-AMERICAN

MAR 9 - 1940

Benefit Concert

COUNT RENE DE SAINT-QUENTIN, French Ambassador to the United States, is among several representatives of the diplomatic corps coming from Washington next Thursday to attend the benefit concert for French musicians in distress, which will feature Igor Stravinsky, conductor-pianist, and 21 musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MUCK TRIBUTE BY SYMPHONY

Post March 9

Part of 7th Symphony Is Played in His Memory

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The man who first made the Boston Symphony Orchestra what it is was honored yesterday by the man who was destined to return it to its lofty place. In other words, yesterday's Symphony Concert began with a performance of the Allegretto from Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, in memory of the late Dr. Karl Muck. If on paper this movement did not seem particularly to the point, it proved in the hearing far more appropriate than the conventional funeral music from Beethoven or Wagner.

From the news angle the other item of interest yesterday was the first American performance of Prokofieff's new Violoncello Concerto, with Gregor Piatigorsky as the soloist, but from the purely musical point of view, the playing of Strauss' "Don Quixote," with Mr. Piatigorsky as solo 'cellist and the Orchestra's Jean Lefranc as solo violist, overtopped all else. This remarkable projection of Strauss' most imaginative tone poem had already been revealed to us in 1933 and 1935. The captious might have complained yesterday that both Dr. Koussevitsky and Mr. Piatigorsky were inclined to dwell a little too lovingly upon the more expressive phrases, slightly to sentimentalize the Knight's attitude toward that figment of his disordered brain, the Lady Dulcinea. Yet anything more beautiful than Don Quixote's affirmation of the chivalric ideal (Strauss' noblest page) or anything more affecting than the final episode of Don Quixote's death could hardly be imagined.

Paradoxically, Don Quixote provides us with the best argument against programme music and the best case for it. No other tone poem of Strauss requires of the listener so detailed a knowledge of what is being set forth. Like Wagner's "Ring," the score must be studied in advance. Yet no other tone poem, regardless of the authorship, can so well reward, so completely justify such study.

In the face of this stirring and moving experience to write adequately of a new concerto is far from easy. As Mahler crushed Szymanowski last week, so did Strauss yesterday reduce Prokofieff almost to the vanishing point. As a matter of fact, the Concerto is most uneven. The first movement is charming; the second, slightly less persuasive and the third, though full of ingenuity, seems to get nowhere. As is not seldom the case with 'cello concertos, the net impression is one of monotony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

MAR 9 - 1940

Koussevitzky Offers Next to Last Concert Of Boston Orchestra

Mozart, Stravinsky and Brahms Works Scheduled for Friday Program at Academy

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will give its fourth Brooklyn concert in a series of five for the current season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music next Friday evening. The program will be given over to numbers by Mozart, Stravinsky, and Brahms, and will feature Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist during Stravinsky's "Capriccio for Orchestra with Piano Solo."

The following program will be played:

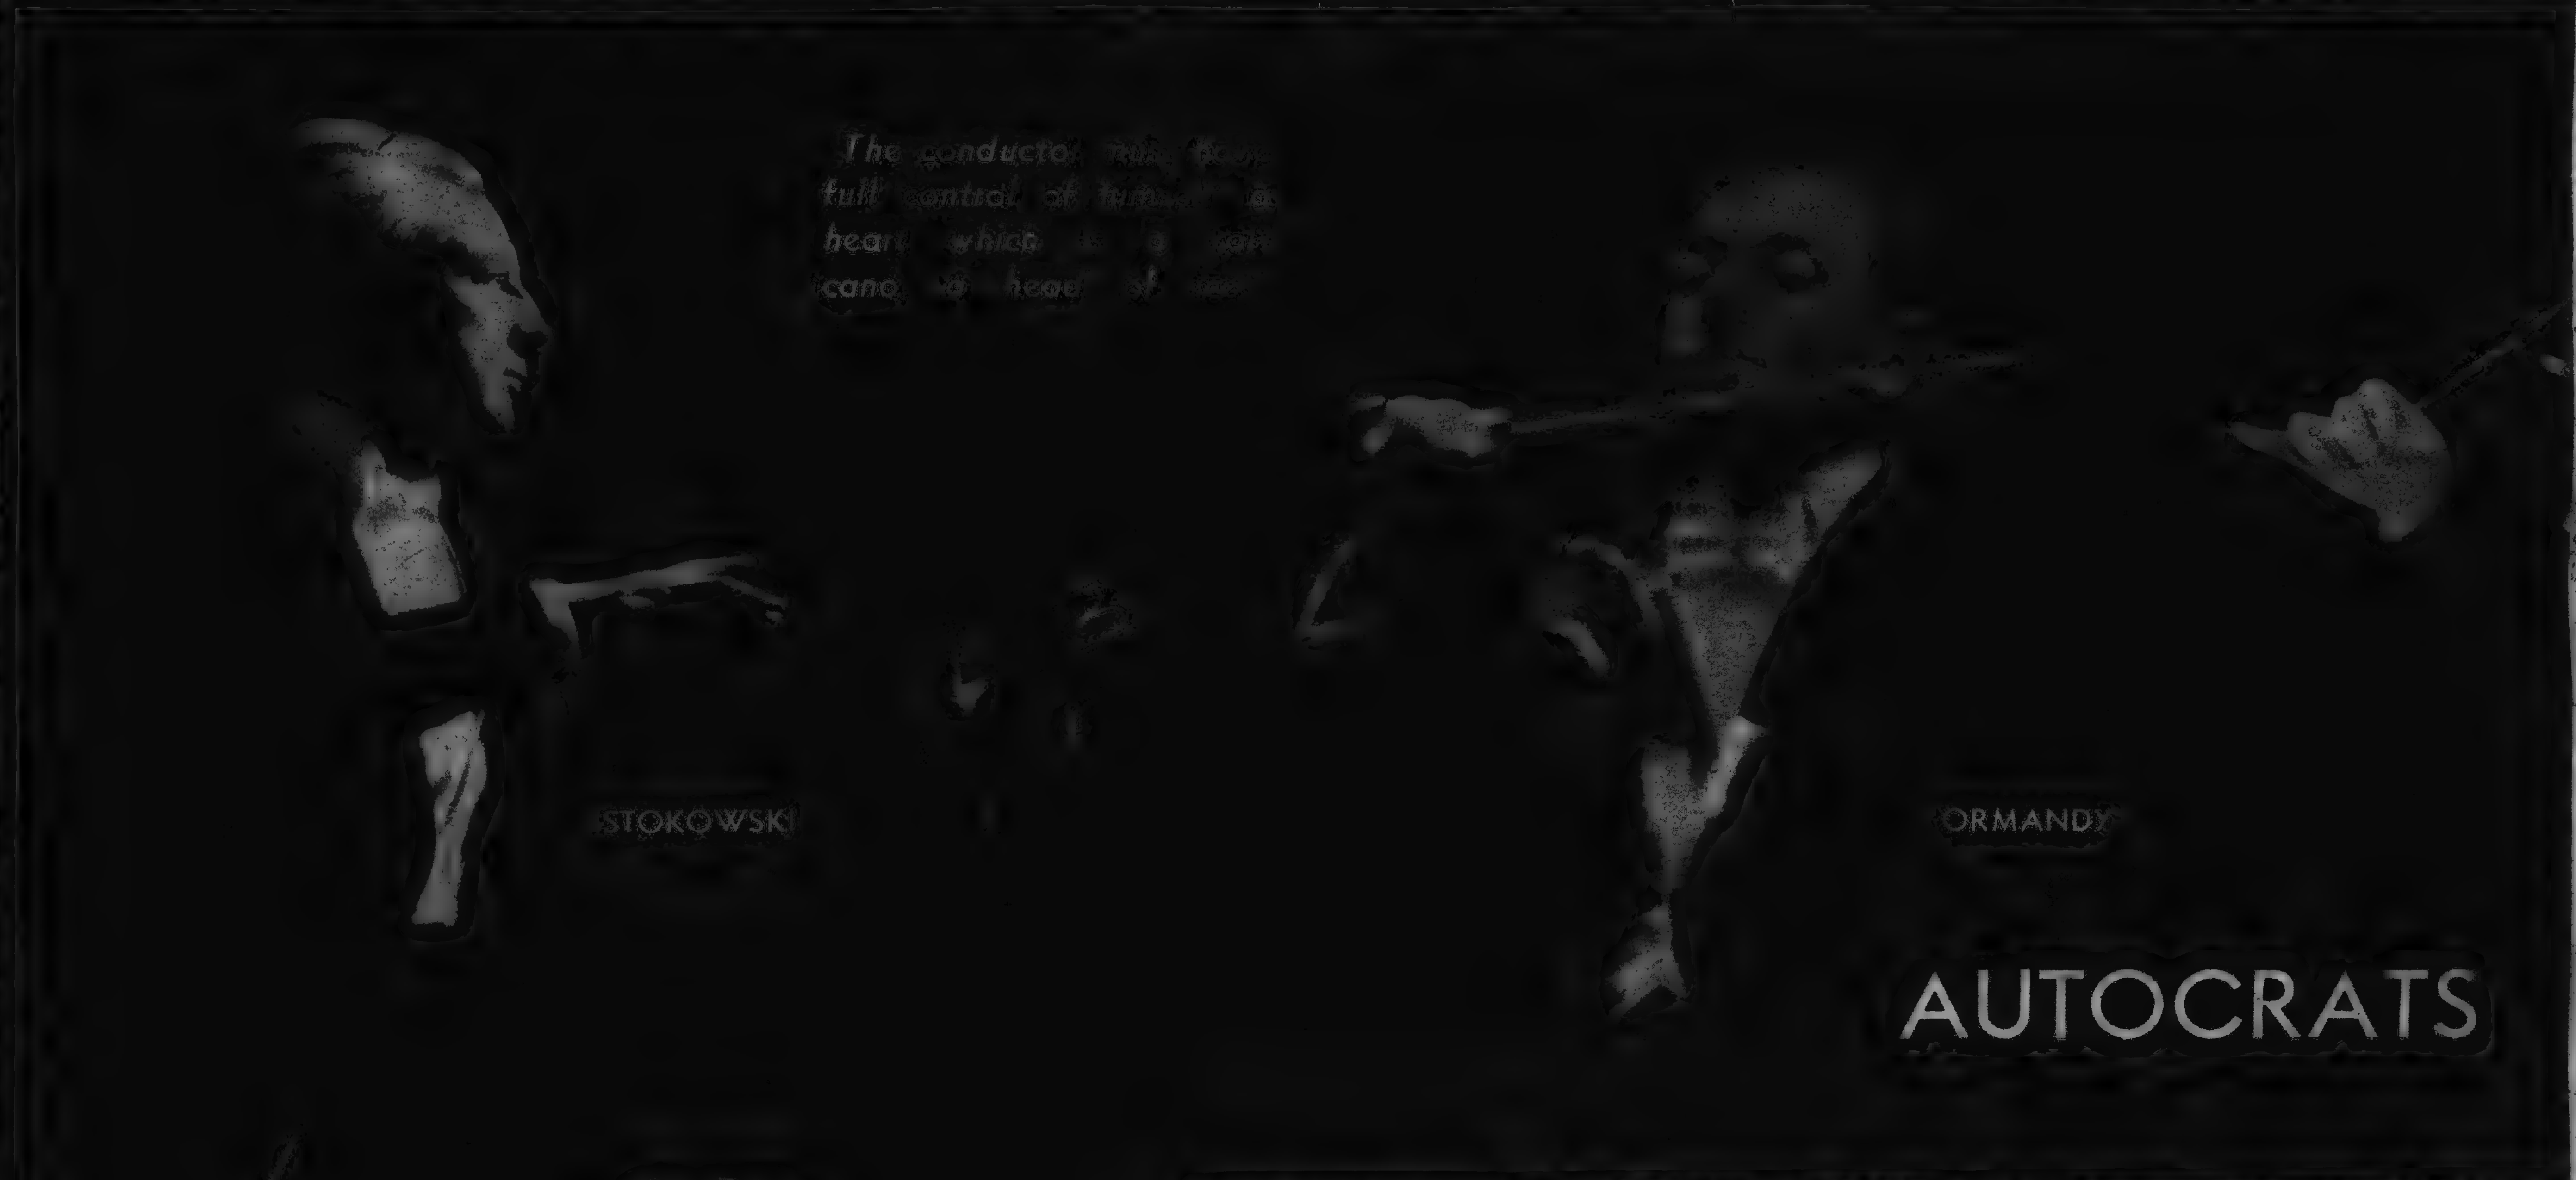
Symphony in C major, No. 34 (Koechel No. 338) by Mozart, Gapriccio for Orchestra with Piano Solo by Stravinsky and Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op 73 by Brahms.

The Academy of Music concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are held under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, and a Brooklyn committee.

On Tuesday afternoon, a discussion of the program will be held by Jonathan Schiller, lecturer in music at the Institute, who will speak in the lecture hall of the Brooklyn Academy of Music beginning at 4 o'clock.

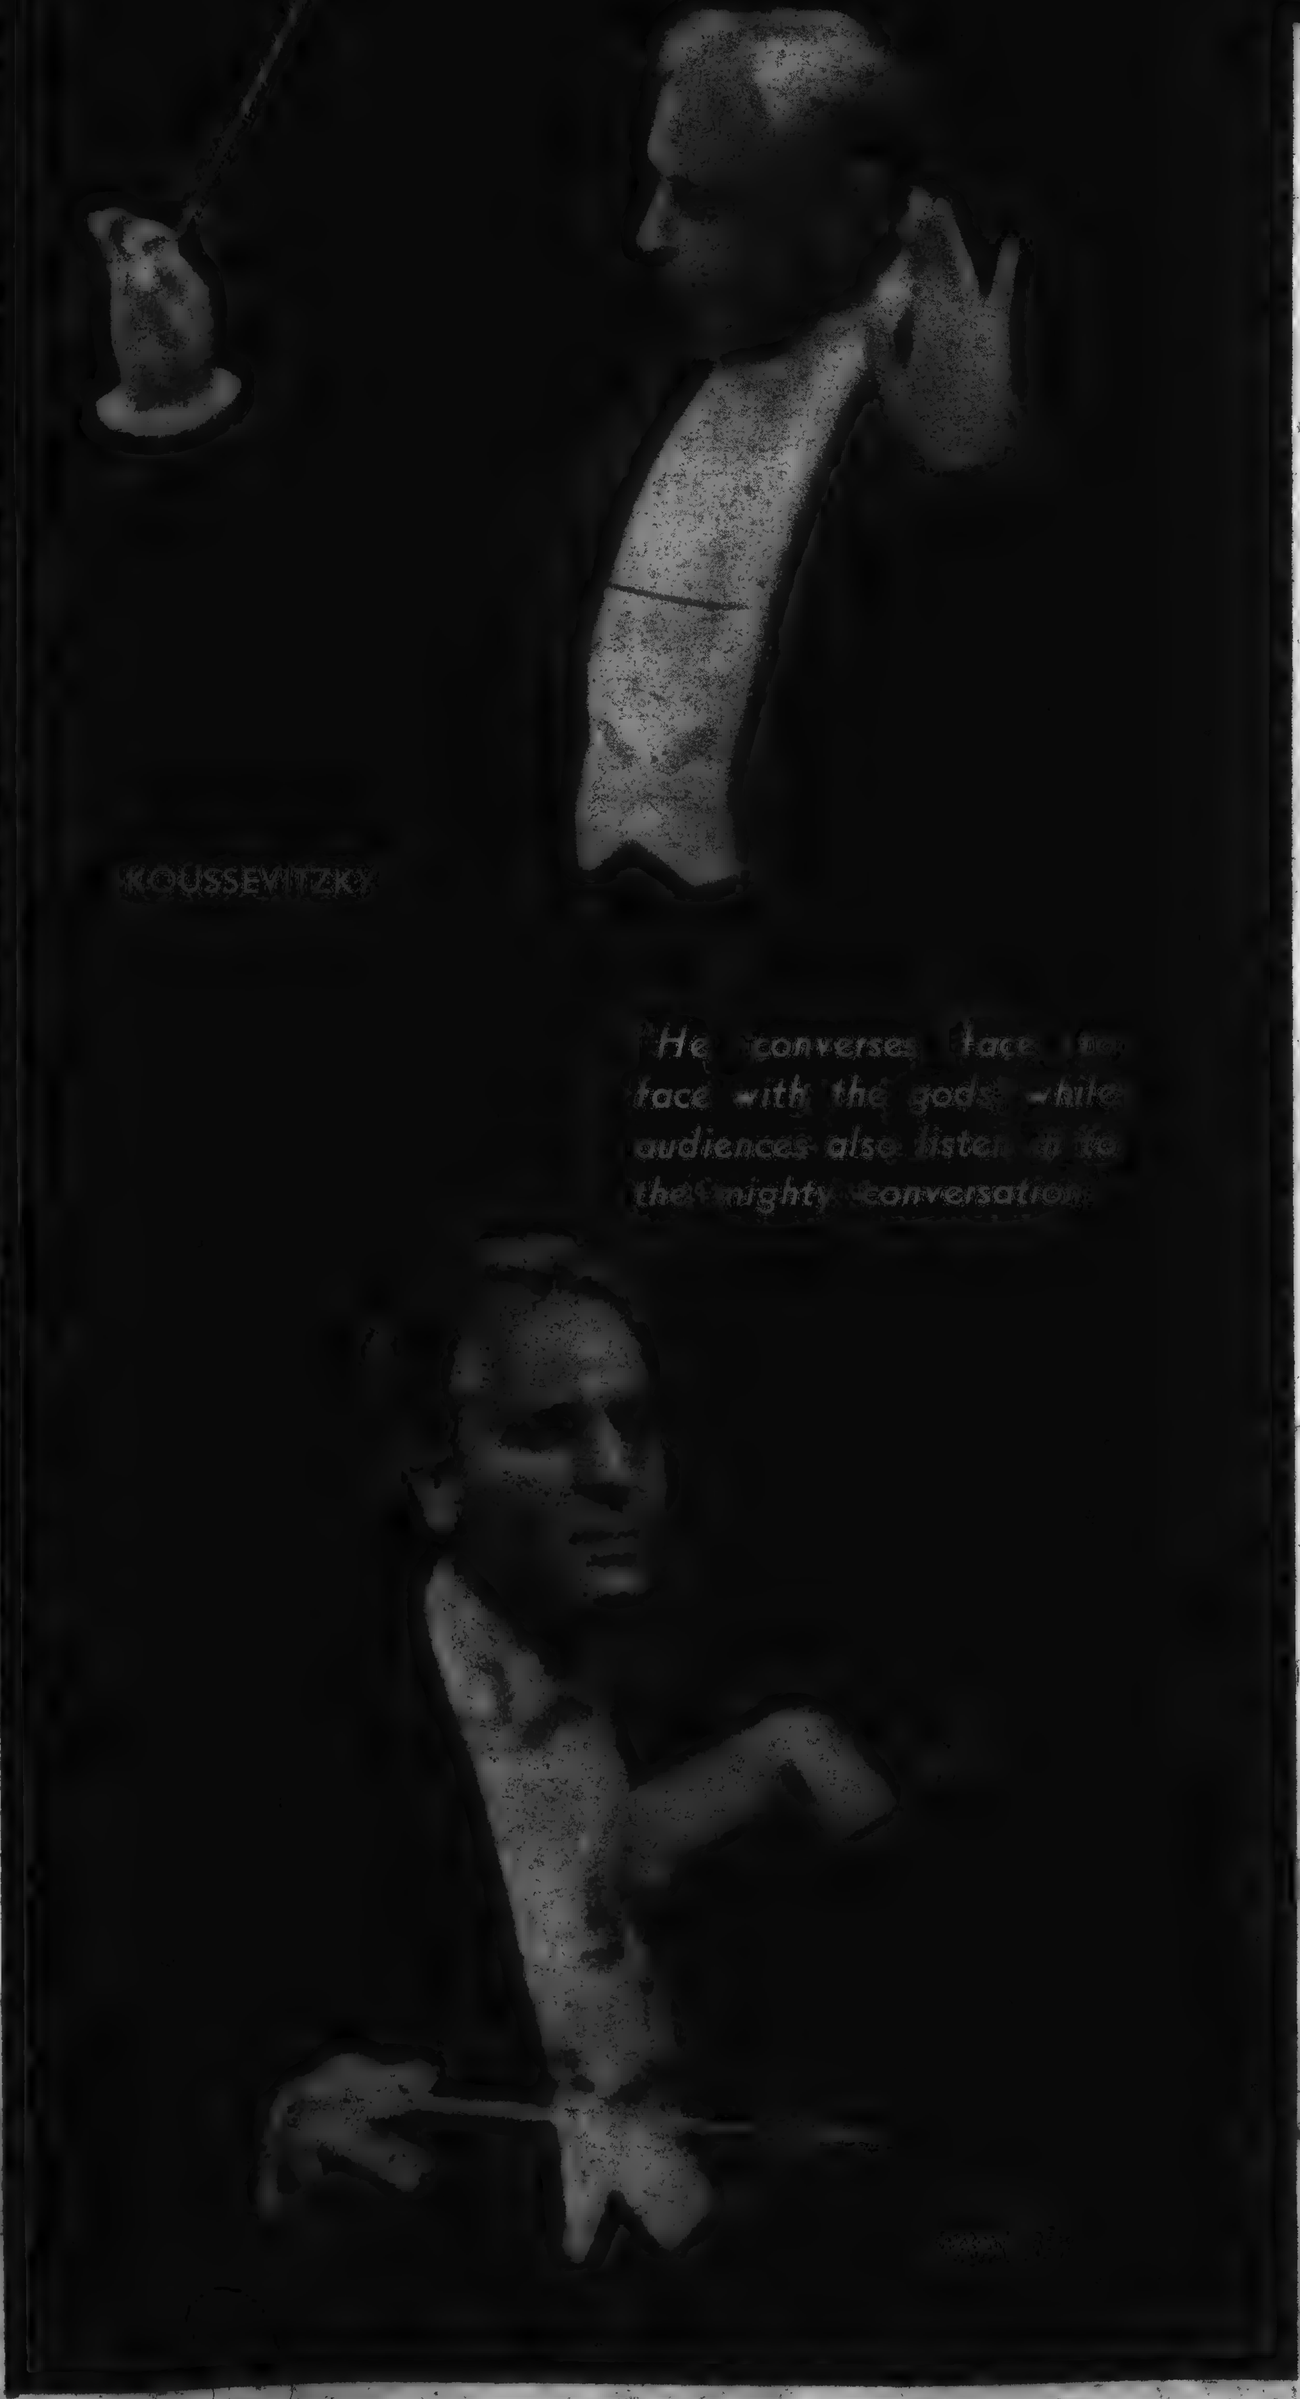
THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 10 1940

218



The conductor must have full control of himself, a heart which [illegible] volcano, a head of [illegible]

AUTOCRATS



"He converses face to face with the gods while audiences also listen in to the mighty conversation."

Koussevitzky - Walter - Enesco - Muck

By OLIN DOWNES

WHEN it is considered that the art of modern orchestral conducting is scarcely a century old, the recentness of that figure referred to contemptuously or angrily by musicians of the older school—"prima donna conductor"—will be realized. These are the people who tell you that there is no great mystery about conducting; that this laudation of some celebrated figure of the baton is Barnum & Bailey exhibitionism; that it is not the conductor who gives the "virtuoso" performance, but the perspiring "virtuosos" of the orchestra that he conducts; that there would be no difference among half the conductors who appear before the public if these knights of the baton and the swallow-tail performed behind a screen, and that it is simply the splendor of the orchestral tone, with its thousand colors and sonorities, which dazzles the innocent and only partially musical bystander, causing him to bestow the adulation upon the stick waver which the latter utilizes to his eminent advantage with the press and the box office.

The comparative recentness of this development may be gauged also by the perfectly serious complaint that the celebrated violinist, Pablo Sarasate, who died in 1908, made to the late Fernandez Arbos, the Spanish conductor, who was Sarasate's intimate friend. Sarasate had been off on a tour. He came back fuming, aghast at a new turn that circumstances were taking in his world.

"WHAT do you think, Fernandez," said he—Fernandez being also at that time a prominent violinist and teacher rather than the well-known conductor he became in the latter half of his life—"What do you think? Musicians don't have to play any longer if they want to make money—big money! All they have to do is to travel around the world with a little stick in their hands—just a little stick. Not as long as my bow. They stand then before an orchestra, a big orchestra, which plays. They stand there and they wave this stick. Tremendous applause. Big money. They go somewhere else, waving this little stick. More money, more réclame. They don't need anything else. Just the little stick!

"Now do you suppose, Fernandez, if there was no orchestra, and they just stood before the audience, waving the little stick, do you suppose they would get as much réclame? The same applause? The same pay? Ha!" He squinted, he snarled sardonically. For Sarasate the tribe of conductors were second only to the critics in their superfluity and capacity for mischief. He would have given the baton, when he played with the orchestra, to his valet, and said, as some grumbling orchestral musician will say, in effect, "You wave the stick, and we'll play."

As, indeed, a certain gentleman in a near-by symphony orchestra exploded, a few seasons ago, to a young conductor who palpably did not know his business, and was concealing that fact by hectoring the men who sat under him. The player spoke: "Please don't talk to us so much. If you do, we'll watch you and play it the way you're leading."

THERE are such conductors, but they seldom last long. The matter was admirably put to the writer one day by one of the leading figures in the field.

"Conducting," he said, "is either the easiest or the hardest task in the world."

He was speaking from his long experience, and, as any one who is at all in touch with these activities knows, he was a thousand times right. The man who gets everything that is to be gotten from a complicated orchestral score and makes

89. 90. 91 92 X

BARBIROLLI
ENESCO
TOSCANINI

OF THE PODIUM

a hundred men of greatly varying degrees of knowledge, craftsmanship, experience and good-will perform in a manner which precisely reflects his interpretive will, is doing a thing of such intellectual eminence, imagination and power as would fit him for nearly any task of leadership and accomplishment. A man like that earns more than he ever will be paid. And he is rara avis.

This is not a field for the introvert, as some aspects of music are; not a place in which a person of an ultra-sensitive and subjective nature can fly away to his instrument or his corner and forget his defeats and frustrations in private communion with his art. The conductor has to turn what he thinks and feels into something musically concrete, and he has to have an encyclopedic knowledge of music and propulsive vision and control of men to do it.

These men are human, of varying capacities and temperaments. First of all, they won't give him "everything they have," as the phrase goes, unless they want to. He can command an acceleration, an accent, a sound loud or soft that follows a specific prescription. They won't refuse that. They can't. It is what they are paid for. But what, ostensibly, they are paid for doesn't mean anything worth a 2-cent piece where life and sensibility in a performance are concerned. If such things could be so easily obtained, we should have at least as many great conductors as we have chauffeurs or mechanics—men who turn screws and attend to gadgets and deal in figures with results as ascertainable as the product of an automobile factory.

The conductor is in different case. His realm includes mental operations of infinite subtlety and precision, and the field, so determinative in performance, of the emotional and psychological. To read some of the scores which he must comprehend and absorb to the very smallest detail is a task for the most thorough musician. To hear everything that goes on in an orchestra during rehearsal and performance is a thing of which fewer conductors than you might think are capable.

THE layman sometimes asks whether a performance is different in any way from a rehearsal; whether the conductor on the platform does anything differently, or obtains effects in any way different from those of the final hours of preparation for the concert.

It can be answered, almost categorically, that a genuinely inspired performance is certain to be different, though perhaps only in emotional ways, from the last careful rehearsal. Of course, there may be a rehearsal when the men and the conductor are exceptionally in the vein; when by some happy chance they achieve the precise thing they want to do, and then miss that precious secret at the time of the public performance.

There are too many practical and psychological elements which go into a performance to permit the stating of any unbreakable rule. But the very fact of the official performance, the immense psychological influence of the presence of the audience, and the final fact that now conductor and orchestra are to take technical detail for granted and concentrate on making music, give the performance its own quality, and make it one usually more creative than the most fortunate rehearsal could be.

From these facts the old adage, that "a bad rehearsal means a good performance," very often holds true—always provided that the bad rehearsal was held by able and wholly comprehending musicians. When that takes place, when everybody's nerves are at the breaking point—the conductor feeling that he might as well leave town between trains, the men sulky with him and one another and grumbling themselves out of the hall—that very crisis may be the prelude to the great show. The baton descends and everybody, on the qui vive, suddenly realizes that it is going to go; assurance increases with every measure; the music is struck off white hot, and the audience goes wild.

BUT to the law of averages. Where does the rehearsal begin? It only begins in one place, if it is of any use at all. That is in the conductor's head.

The conductor, before he enters the rehearsal room, must have the minute detail and the ideal effect of the score within him. Thereafter neither is important. For there are various sorts of rehearsals. One is that of the conductor who stops almost at once, to correct an error, and goes on stopping, step by step, insisting on one technical clarification after another, as long as rehearsal time lasts. It is a direct and practical method. Yet there are few, if any, of the great conductors who follow it, and they would be especially shortsighted if they followed it when playing new music.

The rehearsal which produces the best results is the one which gradually builds in the minds of the players the creative conception of the composition, while incidentally correcting the vital technical defects. By the time of the last rehearsal the orchestra should be in the state where it can participate knowingly with the conductor and carry out spontaneously his interpretive commands. That is one reason why a conductor who is a poor technician and disciplinarian, even a second-class musician, may secure a better performance than the hard-working and conscientious person who plods along and does what is called "Playing the music as it is written."

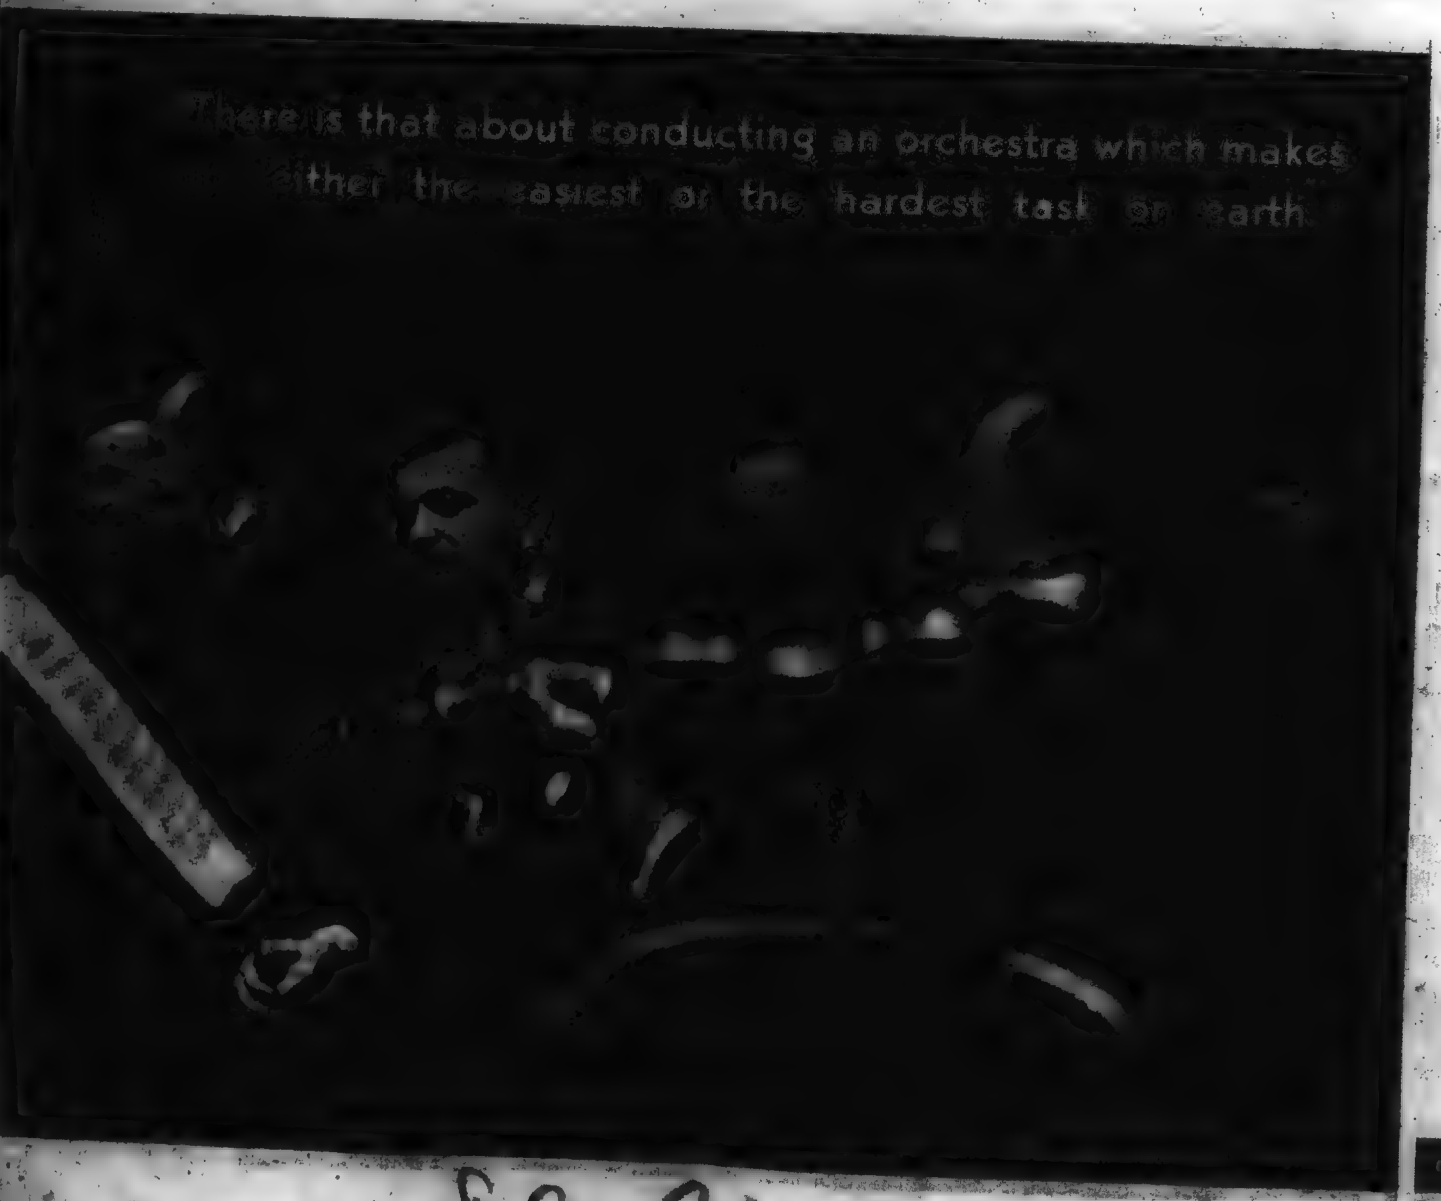
Which latter is another fallacy. Music is, of course, to be played in a manner faithful to the composer's indications in the score. But if all the conductor accomplishes is playing "what is written," he is giving us the letter of the music and letting its spirit die.

HOW does the conductor get precisely what he wants in performance? It may be surprising to state that very few conductors do. And that many of them not only fail to hear the orchestra exactly as it sounds under them—that Pandora's box of incredible tonal effects and potencies—but don't fully know how to set about getting it.

How to get it involves the clearest conception and the profoundest knowledge of the possibilities of every instrument, supreme musicianship, the ear of a wizard, and above all, imagination, intuition, and imperious, creative power. When the conductor achieves his end, the music comes from the orchestra as though, at the moment, it were being composed or, better, improvised, by some master mind, on all the instruments.

The conductor—and this is the very root of the whole matter where a great performance, as indeed any great achievement of an artist, is concerned—the conductor must have full control of himself, a heart which is a volcano, a head of ice; an overwhelming temperament and a critical faculty mercilessly on the alert. He must personally lead the charge, but never for an instant relax the direct control of every man in the battalion, in the thick of the battle.

We are speaking, in short, of a god-like person who scarcely exists, and not of the stick waver who gesticulates while the men play as well as musicians without a single cohesive objective and interpretive purpose behind (Continued on Page 27)



There is that about conducting an orchestra which makes [illegible] either the easiest or the hardest task on earth.

89.90 91 92

X

220

The New York Times Magazine, March 10, 1940.

Goro from Black Star

Final tune-up before performance—Rehearsal of string section.

PODIUM AUTOCRATS

(Continued from Page 9)

them can. Once James Huneker said something to the effect that music is the playground for great souls. It is, for the conductor who really measures to his task a transcendental sphere, one in which he can never hope fully to reach his objectives.

THE invisible forces that play when a creative action takes place can be illustrated in a thousand ways. Here is Toscanini, a leader supremely and imperiously the master of the scores he interprets and the men he controls. His near-sightedness is famous but the eyes that cannot clearly distinguish the features of players before him carry commands which are implicitly obeyed.

"All the time," he once said, "you must have the men under your eyes—like the lion tamer in the cage. Don't ever turn your gaze away, or you lose control of the situation."

The question of control is a basic one. It is a kind of struggle between the leader and the men, which begins and sometimes ends with the first rehearsal, to see who is master. Conductors have different methods of meeting this issue. Some badger the players, which is dangerous. Karl Muck, former conductor of the [illegible]ston Symphony, who has just died in Germany, was a great master of his art. He had a very distinguished and dominating presence on the stand, and an extremely sharp tongue. So that once one of his players when he found himself momentarily seated opposite his chief on the night train on a tour, said, "Dr. Muck, do you believe that a conductor can be so sarcastic with a player that he can unnerve and destroy him?"

Muck agreed that this was possible. "Then why, Dr. Muck," said this player, who had seen some of his colleagues in the orchestra reduced to complete abjection, "why do you do it?" Whereat Mephistopheles Muck, with a face that was a cross between that of an intellectual devil and Richard Wagner, simply threw his head back and roared. He extended no mercy, he neither gave nor expected quarter.

THERE have been conductors, they say, who ruled through love and not through fear, though it is to be apprehended, human nature being what it is, that the presence of the iron hand beneath the glove had best be sensed, even in the most cordial relations. Nikisch was a man whom the players adored, and whom they obeyed with intense enthusiasm. They always spoke of his marvelous eyes, his face during a performance, the manner in which the men sensed in advance what he wanted, the way in which he could absorb them, as it were, into his interpretive self.

"Discipline toward the mass," says John Barbirolli, conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, "must be tempered with understanding of the individual."

Asked to define the fundamental qualities of a good conductor, Mr. Barbirolli said: "It is possible for a man of mediocre musicianship to be a good conductor and vice versa. The great conductor is a combination of both. That indefinable thing which gives one man power over a group of men and denies that power to another is one of the secrets of personality."

THE ways of winning the men must be honest ones. Thus, in the course of Koussevitzky's earlier seasons with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, we were told that there was a tangible added degree of response to his baton when he invited the orchestra, privately, with no one else present, to an informal and intimate entertainment, and, as one of the three greatest virtuosos of the double bass the world has ever seen, played for them.

Few conductors could do that, but there are few of the great ones who do not know intimately the capacities and the technique of each family of instruments, and most of the conductors have been orchestral players. Muck, who was a pianist, was one of the exceptions. Toscanini, as is well known, was a 'cellist, so expert that on one occasion, for a second-class violinist who was in the orchestra, Toscanini, on his 'cello, played his solo measures for him. Stokowski, an organist at the time he became a conductor, is now a capable manipulator of many orchestral instruments.

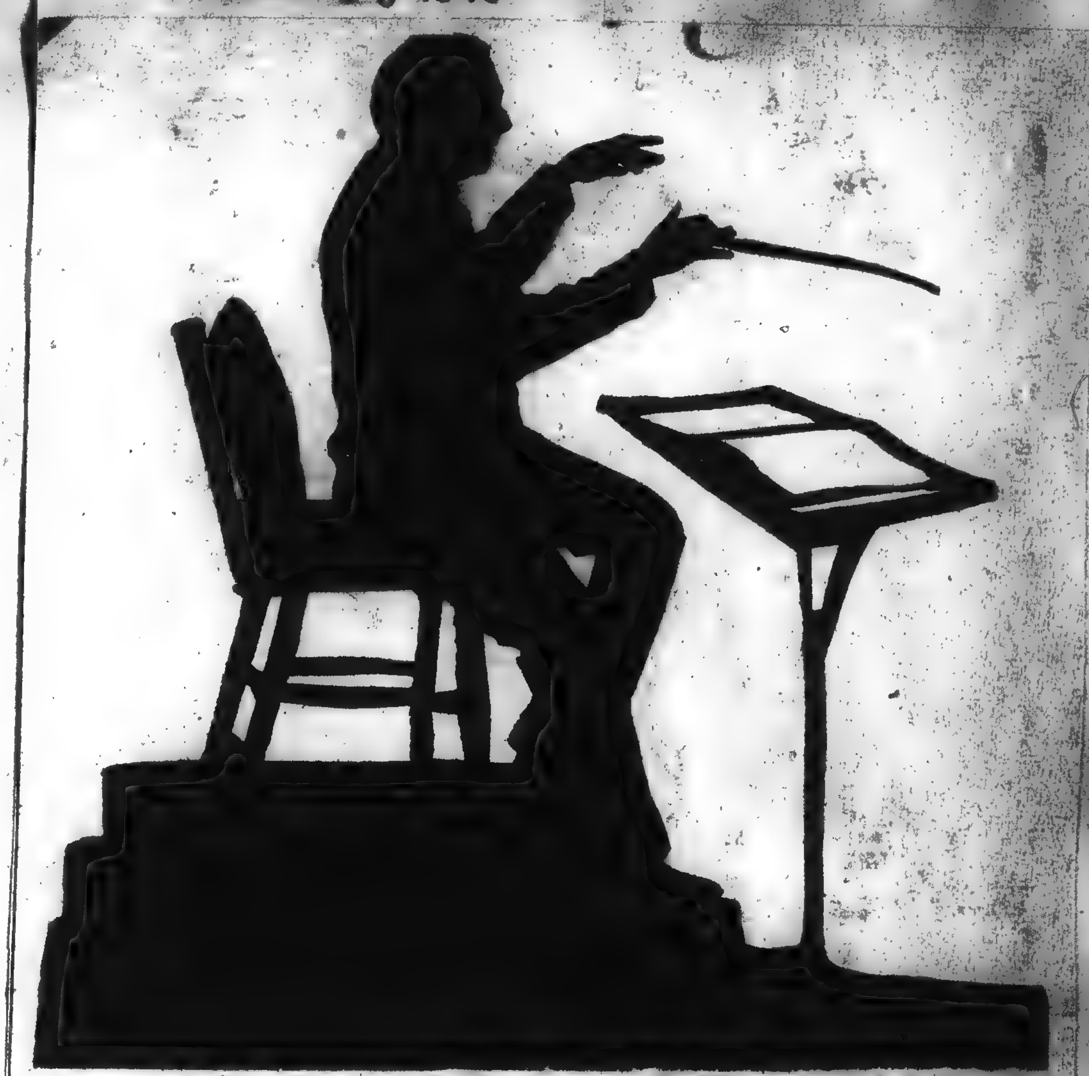
And yet, here again, the thing that counts and decides is the mental capacity of the musician. Neither Wagner nor Berlioz could play any orchestral instrument acceptably and they were two of the greatest pioneers of this modern art. For modern it is.

Remember that in the eighteenth century the conductor sat at the harpsichord directing the ensemble, or stood and waved his fiddle bow, from which the conductor's stick is descended. He was a time beater and not the dominating interpreter. Now the virtuoso conductor has shouldered aside the fiddler or prima donna whose servant he used to be. He is in command. The artist appears only with his consent and is a secondary feature of the program, into which artist and concerto must fit.

FOR the conductor's art is the art of the supreme interpreter. It is no longer the question of a linnet-voiced and linnet-headed soprano showing off her clothes, herself and her voice; or even of a pianist or fiddler of unusual accomplishments stealing the show. At the orchestral concerts a famous soloist helps the box office—at times, and in a very few instances. In general, the public realizes that the greatest soloist of all is the orchestra, in the hands of a master, and the greatest music of all may well be that of the symphonic repertory.

There he stands, the conductor, in a highly spectacular setting, monarch of what he surveys. He controls visible and invisible forces. Through the medium of a hundred other artists, and a set of instruments made of bits of wood and skin and viscera, he converses face to face with the gods, while audiences, also visible and invisible, listen in to the mighty conversation. This, indeed, is a playground for the mind, the will and the spirit.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAR 10 1940



Silhouette by the Baroness Eveline Von Maydell
Serge Koussevitzky at rehearsal

Concert By Boston Symphony To Conclude Woolsey Series

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second visit of the season to New Haven on Wednesday evening, appearing in Woolsey Hall for the seventh and concluding event of the 1939-40 Woolsey Hall Concert Series. The concert will commence at 8:30 and the usual capacity audience will be in attendance for one of the outstanding occasions on this city's musical calender.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the great Russian leader who is credited with bringing the famous orchestra to a point of perfection unsurpassed by any musical body in the world, has arranged an especially varied and interesting program for the forthcoming occasion.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra brings the current Woolsey Hall series to a brilliant climax on Wednesday evening it will mark the conclusion of one of the finest series of concerts ever presented in this city. Opening last October with Fritz Kreisler, violinist, the series continued with the first seasonal appearance of the Boston symphony in November; Helen Jepson, soprano, in December; first the Philadelphia Orchestra and then Josef Hofmann, pianist, in January; and Lawrence Tibbett, baritone, last month.

The artistic value of these recitals was reflected in the demand for tickets, for capacity audiences were the rule throughout the season. That no new attendance mark was established for the 1939-40 series was only because for the past several years the number of persons to hear these concerts were limited only by the seating capacity of the auditorium. Spacious as it is, Woolsey Hall could be half again as large before all who wish to attend the concerts could be accommodated. This is indeed a notable tribute to the cultural life of this city and its environs, and a direct explanation as to why this city enjoys the finest orchestras and concert artists each season.

Until last season the Woolsey Hall Series made its announcement for the coming season early in the fall. With the increasing demand for tickets, however, this plan was found no longer practical, and last spring the current series was announced at the last concert of the previous season. As Yale University closes for its spring recess next Wednesday word of the new season's plans will not be made public until after March 28, the reopening date.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
MAR 10 1940

Scriabin Commemoration

The Scriabin Circle, which was founded by its director, Katherine Ruth Heyman, in 1934, plans to commemorate the twenty-fifth anniversary of Alexander Scriabin's death on a national scale during the week of April 20 to 27. The Boston Symphony, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, will co-operate in this observance by performing the "Poeme de l'Extase" during the anniversary week. Miss Heyman and Jacob Weinberg will play Scriabin's only work for two pianos, a fanrasia, in a radio program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
B'Klyn. Section
MAR 10 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY INBROOKLYNFRIDAY

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to Conduct at Concert in the Academy of Music

BACH WORK TO BE HEARD

Sinfonietta to Present Work in C Major Tomorrow, First Time in Publio

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give a concert Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Jesus Maria Sanroma will be soloist for Stravinsky[illegible]apriccio for Orchestra with Piano Solo." The program will include Mozart's symphony in C major, No. 34, and Brahms's symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73.

The event is the fourth in a series of five Brooklyn concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the sponsorship of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and Brooklyn committee.

On Tuesday afternoon Jonathan Schiller, lecturer in music at the Institute, will discuss the program of the concert at the Academy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
MAR 10 1940

Envoy Will Attend Concert to Benefit French Musicians

Count de Saint-Quentin To Be Here Next Thursday for Stravinsky Program

Count René de Saint-Quentin, Ambassador of France, is among several representatives of the diplomatic corps who will come here from Washington Thursday to attend a benefit concert for French musicians in distress. Igor Stravinsky, conductor-pianist, and twenty-one musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra w[illegible]

The event, which is under the patronage of Count de Saint-Quentin, Mr. William C. Bullitt, United States Ambassador to France, and Count Charles de Ferry de Fontnouvelle, French Consul General in New York, is being arranged by a local committee headed by Mrs. Charles H. Marshall and under the general auspices of the Committee for Relief in Allied Countries, of which Mr. and Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss are treasurer and chairman, respectively.

Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, sponsor of the concerts in the Congressional Library and of the Coolidge Music Festivals at Pittsfield, Mass., and Countess van der Straten-Ponthoz, wife of the Belgian Ambassador, will attend.

After the concert Mrs. Elbridge Gerry Chadwick will give a tea at her home for Mr. Stravinsky and Mrs. Elizabeth Coolidge has planned a dinner in his honor at the Colony Club.

Those who will entertain box parties include Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss, who has reserved two boxes; Mmes. Dwight Davis, John T. Pratt, W. Murray Crane, William H. Moore, Victor Morawetz, Elbridge Gerry Chadwick, Charles E. Mitchell, Robert Bacon and Diego Suarez.

The committee of arrangements for the concert includes Mrs. C. H. Marshall, Mrs. R. W. Bliss, Mrs. Alexander McLanahan, Mrs. Averell Dougherty, Mrs. David Randall MacIver, Mr. and Mrs. E. G. Chadwick and Mr. Samuel L. M. Barlow. A junior group assisting includes Miss Cynthia Dunn, Countess Baillet-Latour, Miss Cynthia Davis, Miss Margot Finletter, Miss Rosamund Reed, Miss Antoinette Irving, Mr. Stuart Preston and Mr. Sumner W. Gerard jr.

The proceeds of the concert are to be administered by the committee for French relief, of which Mr. Winthrop Aldrich is chairman.

Ti[illegible] benefit may be obtained from the Burden-Littell Bureau, 721 Fifth Avenue, and at Town Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 10 1940

221

CULLED FROM THE MAIL POUCH

Miss Farrar Remembers Karl Muck's War Problem

Miss Farrar Recalls Dr. Muck

To the Music Editor:

MAY I thank you for the tribute paid in today's NEW YORK TIMES to Dr. Karl Muck, the noted conductor whose passing at Stuttgart was announced.

Not only did I have the inestimable privilege of singing under his baton, in the pre-war period, as a member of the Berlin Royal Opera, but I was the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on that fateful evening in Providence, when Dr. Muck was bitterly and unjustly assailed for not playing our national anthem.

As your editorial correctly reports, he knew nothing of the request.

Major Higginson, the orchestra's founder, and C. A. Ellis, its manager, assumed all responsibility for the procedure of the scheduled program.

I was warned there might be a disturbance in the auditorium, and to be prepared for resultant confusion.

Happily there was none. The concert was given to the usual expression of admiration and esteem that this superlative orchestra and its hated conductor evoked wherever they played.

The fortunes of war brought Dr. Muck—as well as other aliens—no disgrace in an internment camp.

I saw Dr. Muck several times in later years, and know he counted the years with the Boston Symphony Orchestra among the happiest and most fruitful of his career.

GERALDINE FARRAR.

Ridgefield, Conn., March 5, 1940.

Dr. Muck and the First War

To the Music Editor:

PERHAPS this time is proper for the telling of the real facts concerning Dr. Karl Muck's "refusal" to play "The Star-Spangled Banner" at the Providence concert in October, 1917. I was in charge of publicity for the orchestra at the time.

Muck's five-year contract was ending in May, 1917. Before we entered the war he so shrewdly foresaw the possibility of trouble and embarrassment that when it was announced that von Bernstorff, the German Ambassador, was leaving the United States, he asked Major Henry Lee Higginson to release him from the remaining months of his contract, so that he could return to Germany with the Ambassador. Higginson not only refused to do this but insisted that Muck sign another contract to run five years. This after many discussions Muck consented to do, but with the understanding that if conditions should become too uncomfortable he should be allowed to retire and, if possible, to return to Germany. Both Higginson and Charles A. Ellis, manager, assured him that as an artist he would be quite safe, and made light of his fears that there would be any feeling against him on the part of the public.

From personal knowledge I can testify that during the months between our entry into the war and his arrest he was most discreet, both in his actions and in his talk. He had few friends, no intimates. He was completely absorbed in his work, in the study and preparations of his scores. And after we had entered the war he withdrew more than ever into himself, becoming really supersensitive. A good and patriotic German, he had become greatly attached to this country, and altogether he was a thoroughly unhappy man.

The question of playing "The Star-Spangled Banner" was first brought up in the very early Autumn of 1917 when William H. Brennan, assistant manager then, and I suggested to Ellis that it might be wise to open each of our various series of concerts in the Fall with the national anthem. Ellis vetoed the suggestion at once. The tune was entirely unfit for performance in a serious symphony concert; and, moreover, he would not embarrass Dr. Muck by asking him to do such a thing. The question was argued among us for several weeks, but Ellis could not be moved, and, as a matter of fact, neither Brennan nor I thought it was of any very great importance.

Two days before the first concert in Providence (we had opened the Boston season without playing the tune) a paper signed by numerous persons in Providence was received by Major Higginson in which he was requested to instruct Dr. Muck to open the program with the national anthem. For some time The Providence Journal had carried numerous direct attacks on Muck, who, for some unknown reasons, seems to have incurred the bitter hostility of the then editor-in-chief. Added to this was the discovery that none of the names signed to the paper was on the list of subscribers to the Providence concerts. These two facts combined convinced Higginson and Ellis, especially the latter, that it was all a put-up job on the part of The Providence Journal to make things unpleasant for Muck and start a movement to get him out of the country. They decided that "The Star-Spangled Banner" should not be played and that they would tell Muck all about it after the concert.

Both of them went to Providence that night, Higginson most pugnacious and Ellis rather nervous. (Incidentally, he had taken measures to protect Muck in case there was any real trouble.) The tune was not played, the concert went off quietly and the orchestra returned to Boston on its special train, as was the custom. But on the way to Boston Muck was told about it. Actually he was aghast. Why had they not told him? Of course he would have played it. It was perfectly proper for him to bow to the national feeling. It did not make him less a good German by being courteous to the Americans whose guest he was. Moreover, he feared that this would lead to more trouble.

And it did. The fat was in the fire and blazing high. The Providence Journal carried scareheads the next morning about the Hun conductor, the friend and favorite of the Kaiser, insulting the American people by refusing to play their national anthem. And every paper in the country carried the story. Although it was the Spring before Washington decided that, guilty or not of espionage, Muck had become such a storm center it was best to intern him for the duration, his fate, so far as America was concerned, was settled that night in Providence because of the short-sighted stubbornness of Henry L. Higginson and Charles A. Ellis.

There was a humorous turn to the drama when the orchestra came to New York for its first concerts of the season, a few weeks later. Both Higginson and Ellis most reluctantly agreed that "The Star-Spangled Banner" should be played at all of the out-of-town concerts. Muck insisted upon it. After the first concert in New York some or most of the critics found grave fault with the arrangement of the tune as played by the orchestra. "Cheap," "tawdry," "undignified" they found it. Muck agreed, and when the orchestra returned the next month he had a new arrangement which pleased the most captious. The joke is that the version played in November was by Victor Herbert; that played in December by Anton Witek, the concert-master of the orchestra and the most pro-German of all the Germans in the orchestra.

WILLIAM E. WALTER.

New York, March 5, 1940.

THIS CLIPPING FROM OSHKOSH, WIS.
NORTHWESTERN

MAR 11 1940

The new 'cello concerto of Serge Prokofieff will be introduced to New York by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, with Greger Piatigorsky as soloist, when the orchestra makes its fourth visit of the season for two concerts in Carnegie Hall on March 14 and 16. The concerto had its first American hearing in Boston recently.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

MAR 11 1940

Boston Symphony Concert Friday; Boxholders Announced for Event

The fourth Brooklyn concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be presented in the Opera House at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting a program including the Mozart Symphony in C, No. 34, Brahms' Symphony No. 2 and the Stravinsky Capriccio for Orchestra with Piano Solo. Jesus Maria Sanroma will be the soloist.

Box holders for the concert include Mrs. Frank E. Simmons and Mrs. Maxwell Lester, who will be hostesses in Box 1. Mrs. Dean C. Osborne has reserved Box 2. Box 3 will be occupied by Mrs. Benjamin Prince. Mrs. Oliver G. Carter, president of the Brooklyn Woman's Club, will be hostess in Box 4. Members of the Adelphi Alumnae Association will occupy Box 5, and Box 7 has been taken by officers of the Fort Hamilton Army Post.

The concerts are given here under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which James G. McDonald is president; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, R. Huntington Woodman, chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee for Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts, headed by Mrs. Henry J. Davenport as executive chairman.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

MAR 11 1940

SMITH COLLEGE

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY TOMORROW

Lecture On Program This Afternoon — Louis Fischer to Speak Thursday

Northampton, March 10—An important event on the Smith college calendar for the coming week is the concert to be given Tuesday evening at 8 in John M. Greene hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussevitsky conducting. The program will be varied, comprising works of Beethoven, Hindemith, Faure and Wagner. Tickets for standing room will be available at the box office that evening. Preceding the concert, tomorrow at 5 p. m. in Sage hall 2, Arthur Locks, professor of music at Smith college, will speak on the symphony program.

Dodie Smith's "Call It a Day" will be presented by the Dramatic association Thursday, Friday and Saturday evenings at 7.30 in the Students' building. Tickets will be on sale in Seelye basement tomorrow, Tuesday and Wednesday from 9 to 1 and from 2 to 4. They may also be procured at the door.

"The Real Issues in Europe's War," will be the subject of the lecture to be given by Louis Fischer at 8 Thursday evening in Sage hall. Mr Fischer has been special European correspondent for the Nation during the past 18 years, and is an internationally-known foreign correspondent.

Next Sunday from 2 30 to 4.30 p. m. the Tyron gallery will be open to the public. The exhibition of prints from the permanent collection now on view will remain until the spring vacation, the 20th. Rev Halford E. Luccock of Yale university will be the speaker at the college vespers service that afternoon at 4.45 in John M. Greene hall. Anna Hamlin, assistant professor of music at Smith college, will present a song recital in Sage hall at 8.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

MAR 10 1940

Koussevitzky Gives Novelty By Prokofieff

Cello Concerto Will Be Introduced Thursday; Out-of-Town Concerts

In its fourth evening concert of the season at Carnegie Hall, next Thursday, the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's direction will introduce Serge Prokofieff's cello concerto with Gregor Piatigorsky as the soloist. It had its first performances outside of Russia in Boston last Friday and Saturday. The concerto, which is in three movements and is Prokofieff's only orchestral work for this instrument, was first sketched in Paris in 1934, completed four years later and first played in Moscow on Nov. 26, 1938. Mr. Piatigorsky will also be heard in Strauss's "Don Juan," with Jean Lefranc as solo violist.

Hindemith's symphony, "Mathis der Maler," will be one of the principal items in Dr. Koussevitzky's program for Saturday afternoon. Its only previous concert performances here were given by the Philharmonic-Symphony under Otto Klemperer in October, 1934. It has also been played in the NBC Symphony's radio series. Beethoven's first symphony and French music by Faure, Debussy and Ravel, already heard in the Thursday evening series, complete the list. The orchestra will play at the Brooklyn Academy of Music next Friday night.

Leopold Stokowski will conduct the Philadelphia Orchestra in its next regular pair of home concerts this Friday and Saturday, and in a children's concert for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund on Thursday afternoon, March 28. He will appear in Carnegie Hall with this organization in the ninth concert of its New York subscription series on Tuesday night, March 19.

Robert Casadesus, who is this afternoon's soloist with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, will appear with the Chicago Symphony next Thursday night and Friday afternoon in Brahms's concerto in B flat major. Lily Pons will sing with the Cleveland Orchestra in a popular [illegible]day afternoon in that city's Public Auditorium with her husband, Andre Kostelanetz, as guest conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PERTH AMBOY, N. J.
NEWS

MAR 11 1940

Hear of Courses Given at School

The eighth grades of the Grammar School met with Principal W. W. Ramsey of the high school and Edward Herbert of the guidance department to learn of the various courses and curricula offered by the school. Following this, personal conferences were held by the assembly room teachers and the pupils to guide the prospective high school entrants in their decisions.

A music appreciation lesson on "Peter and the Wolf" by Prolofieff which was played by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky was conducted by Maxwell MacMichael for the seventh and eighth grades. The music supervisors, Mrs. Murphy and Mrs. Otto, participated in the arrangements. It provided a very enlightening and delightful hour.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

MAR 13 1940

Boston Orchestra Plays at Smith

NORTHAMPTON.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, played to a capacity audience at John M. Greene Hall, Smith College last night. Students and townspeople not only occupied every seat but stood lined against the wall in the balcony and on the main floor.

The program included Beethoven's Symphony No. 1 in C major, Hindemith's Symphony, "Mathis der Maler;" Faure's "Pelleas et Melisande" suite, and Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin" and prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

MAR 13 1940

HINDEMITH AND BEETHOVEN ON LAST PROGRAM

Boston Symphony Heard in Usual Excellent Form at Smith College

By Williard M. Clark

NORTHAMPTON, March 12—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the final concert of the Smith College Concert course in John M. Greene Hall tonight before an enraptured audience.

Beethoven's First

The program opened with a straightforward reading of Beethoven's first symphony, a work which was played in Springfield a few weeks ago. Once again the familiar excellencies of the Boston players were noted, the almost mechanical perfection of the ensemble and the virtuosity of the solo instruments. Tonight the symphony fared better than it did in Springfield when there was a singular roughness in the opening movement. Tonight the work moved with customary beauty of tone and play of colors. Every detail of the composition was set forth and the andante cantabile was played with ravishing beauty of tone.

In sharp contrast was the Hindemith symphony, "Matthias the Painter." It was played hereabouts for the first time and made a profound impression upon the audience. The three movements compare to three famous paintings of the Isenheim Altar piece to be seen in the museum at Colmar, Alsace, the handiwork of Matthias Grunewald, the 16th century German painter. The identification still holds when the opera is considered. "The Angelic Concert" is the overture to the opera. Then comes "Entombment" and finally "The Temptation of Saint Anthony."

The few themes of the symphony are tonal symbols of extraordinary vitality. Old church melodies are used in the first and third movements. There was notable lyricism in this work as well as startling passages of polyphonic development. The development of the three movements is clear and the story is told with remarkable expressiveness from the happiness of the Angelic Concert, through the lyric beauty of the Entombment to the mighty exaltation of the concluding Hallelujah Hymn.

Faure Excerpts

Gabriel Faure wrote the stage music to Maeterlinck's play "Pelleas and Melisande" and Dr. Koussevitzky gave three excerpts. The Russian conductor is at his best in the interpretations of the music of the French composers and he wove a tapestry of beautiful sound, tinted with myriad colors. The first movement is the prelude to the play and it suggests a forest scene. The second movement, "Fileuse" is an entr'acte in preparation for the third act. A spinning figure in triplets suggests Melisande at her spinning wheel. The third movement, molto adagio, is associated with the tragic final scene in which Melisande dies. One seldom hears this work which is a pity for it is rich in feeling and spiritual content.

The program concluded with the Prelude to Wagner's opera "Lohengrin" and a stupendous performance of the prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

MAR 13 1940

Boston Symphony Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make a second visit of the season to New Haven, giving a concert in Woolsey Hall this evening at 8:30. Dr. Koussevitzky will devote the first part of the program to music of Beethoven and Hindemith, and the second part to music of three French composers. He will open the evening with the First Symphony of Beethoven in C Major. The second number will be the Symphony, "Mathis der Maler," which has been described as one of the most important orchestral works of recent years. The "Symphony," which consists of three excerpts from Hindemith's opera of the same name, takes its title from religious paintings of the early German composer, Matthias Grunewald: Angelic Concert, Entombment, and Temptation of Saint Anthony.

Doctor Koussevitzky will open the second part of the program with three numbers from the incidental music which Gabriel Faure wrote for Masterlinck's play "Pelleas et Melisande." They will consist of Prelude, The Spinning Wheel, and Molto adagio. Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and the Second Suite from Ravel's Ballet "Daphnis et Chloe" will conclude the program.

MAY FESTIVAL

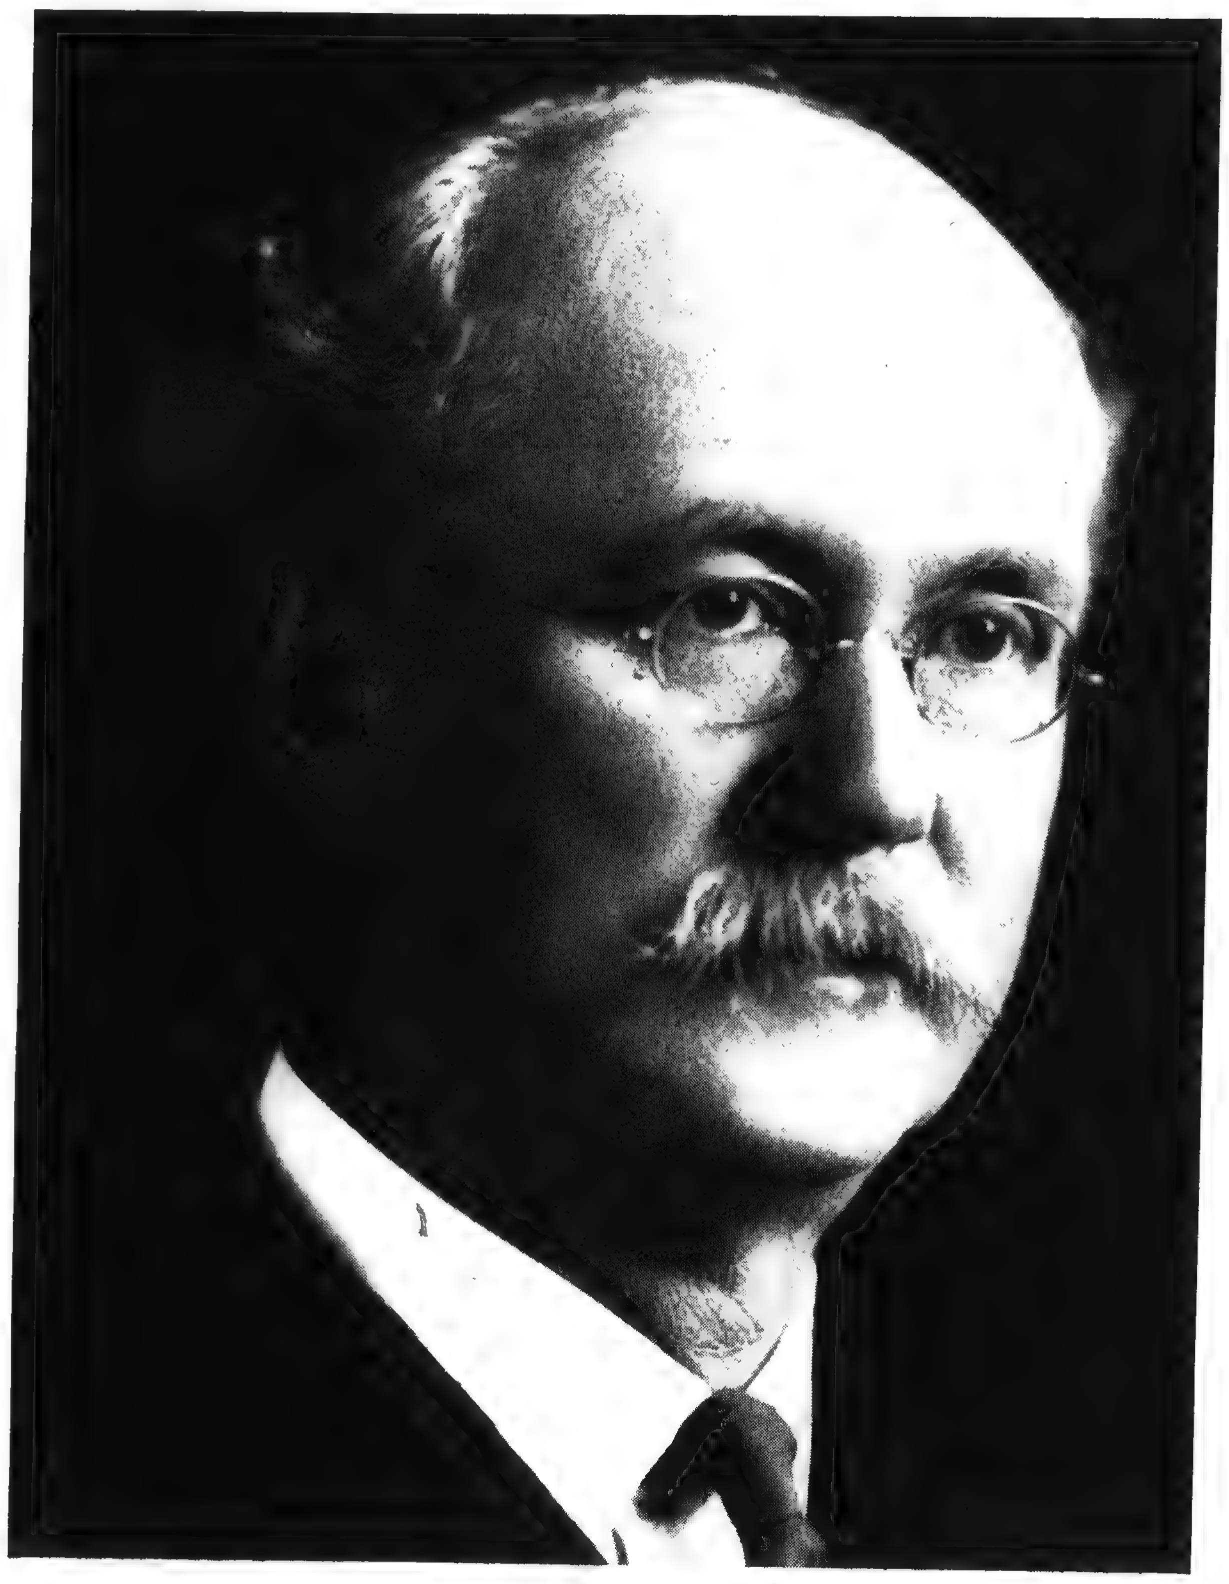
UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

MAY 8, 9, 10, 11, 1940

Brilliant
Soloists

★

Philadelphia
Orchestra



ALBERT A. STANLEY (1851–1932)

Choral
Union

★

Young People's Chorus

SIX CONCERTS - FOUR DAYS

HILL AUDITORIUM » » » ANN ARBOR

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

MAR 13 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CLOSES SMITH'S PROGRAMS

Beethoven and Hindemith Feature Final Concert — Makeup of Next Year's Series Announced

By FRANCIS REGAL

Northampton, March 12—The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, gave tonight the last concert in the Smith college series, and on March 11, 1941, it will close another excellent series, the items in which were announced tonight. The list includes the Philadelphia and Cleveland orchestras, Roland Hayes, a violin and piano recital by Adolf Busch and Rudolf Serkin, who appeared here recently, and a joint recital by Emmanuel Feuermann, cellist, and Beveridge Webster, pianist. Reservations for course tickets may be made by mail on and after October 1.

Beethoven's First Symphony

Tonight's concert gave the series a brilliant finish, and Boston's famous orchestra was at its best. Dr Koussevitzy opened the program with Beethoven's first symphony, in C major, which he gave at the orchestra's recent concert in Springfield. It was not a routine performance such as some conductors a generation ago used periodically to give in order not to neglect entirely the earliest and smallest of the immortal nine. On the contrary, it showed fresh study and a commendable effort to show how beautiful this early work is when perfectly played by a magnificent orchestra. There was no exaggeration, but none is needed to prove that this sometimes slighted first symphony is a masterpiece and the climax of the fine period which produced the string quartet of opus 18.

Remainder More Modern

The rest of the program was more modern but not excessively modern. and some listeners who had been rather dreading a Hindemith "symphony" were relieved to find that it was not an experiment in non-Euclidean musical geometry. It is not a symphony in the modern sense but a concert version of three orchestral excerpts from Hindemith's opera, "Mathis der Maler." The opera was not staged until May 28, 1938, when it was produced at Zurich, but the "symphony" extracted from the score was brought out in 1934 and was played by the Boston orchestra in the same season. It is not yet quite a well-known work, but it is attractive and much easier to grasp than Hindemith's more abstract music.

The three movements are linked by the composer with three famous paintings of the Isenheim altarpiece in the musem at Colmar, the work of the 16-century German painter, Malthias Gruenewald, who is the central figure in the opera. The movements are "Angelic Concert," "Entombment" and "Temptation of Saint Anthony." Each has interesting points, but the last is by far the most striking and rises to a highly effective climax.

Another comparatively little known work by a famous composer was the orchestral suite "Pelleas and Melisande," taken from the stage music composed for Maeterlinck's play by Gabriel Faure. This was brought out four years before Debussy's opera, which may have overshadowed it, but it is a fine work and ought to be made more widely familiar. To close the program the orchestra played superbly two Wagner numbers, the preludes to "Lohengrin" and "Die Meistersinger," in the latter of which the brass and percussion were given a free hand. It would have shocked some of Mr Koussevitzky's predecessors, but not Wagner, and the climax was thrilling.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

MAR 14 1940

Piatigorsky to Play New Work With Koussevitzky

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make their fourth visit of the season to New York this week, playing tonight and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall and tomorrow evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist, will be soloist in the first local performance of Prokofieff's concerto and will join Jean Lefranc, violinist, in the solo parts of Strauss's "Don Quixote" at the concert this evening. The program will open with Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" Overture.

Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, Dr. Koussevitzky will play Beethoven's C major Symphony, Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" Symphony, Faure's incidental music to "Pelleas et Melisande."

Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, will be soloist in Stravinsky's Capriccio at the Brooklyn concert. The program will open with Mozart's C major Symphony (K. 338) and will close with the Second Symphony of Brahms.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

MAR 13 1940

Boston Symphony's Concert Applauded by Local Audience

Koussevitzky Shows There Are Great Things in Modern Music and Unlimited Aspects in Old

The concluding contribution to the Smith college concert course of 1939-1940 was made by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra in John M. Greene hall last evening. And what a contribution it was! For an expectant audience, the leader and orchestra showed that there are great things in new music; for a devoted audience, they revealed unlimited aspects in old masterpieces.

How did this come about? There was Hindemith's symphony, "Mathis der Maler," for the expectant; Beethoven's first symphony, that preludes to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" for the devoted.

At first hearing, Hindemith's work—made up of three excerps from his opera, "Mathis der Maler"—became extraordinarily powerful, expressive pieces. Strange tonality, harmony and such matters were forgotten in the moving effect of the whole, with its grand line, its undeniable sincerity and depth of meaning. Even when it was not entirely comprehensible, when it seemed to wander, it held the listener's attention. The contrapuntal skill, the sheer progress of the melodic line alone were objects of fascinated observation.

But the emotional tension of the opening measures of the "Temptation of Saint Anthony," that section's final brass choir, the wonderful simplicity of the "Entombment" and the interplay of voices in the "Angelic Concert" were to be remembered as profoundly beautiful, stirring music.

These qualities were the more arresting and exciting, of course, through the interpretative powers of Mr. Koussevitzky and his band of musicians. The music could not have had more conviction or emotional stress. For the conductor appeared singularly in the vein: He drew sonority upon sonority from the orchestra; he was the master in maintaining each lyrical line.

If this can be said of the performance of the unfamiliar, it can be said with equal right of the familiar. Beethoven is a much calmer and smaller voice in his first symphony, yet there is unbounded wonder in his tonepoetry. It gave the orchestra full scope for some eloquent playing, as it afforded new aspects of the composer's genius and of the greatness of his interpreter.

When the program ended with Wagner, the listener was to marvel anew. Here again the playing was superlative, in its dramatic utterance, its blaze of color and penetration to the heart of the music. Need it be said that the audience was reluctant to go? There was applause and stamping of feet, and patient awaiting until Koussevitzky appeared again and again.

D. H. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

MAR 15 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orchestra Was As Good Under Monteaux As Under Muck

To the Editor of The Courant:—

Will you allow a long-time reader of The Courant to comment upon your recent editorial, "Carl Muck?"

If New York and Boston papers and our own Courant of 1915-1916 were to be consulted, I think that the following ideas would be found:

1. That the "storm of criticism" under which Carl Muck withdrew was due to his unneutral activities here, before our entrance into the World War.
2. That these activities were rewarded by the Berlin government upon his return to Germany.
3. That under Pierre Monteaux, his successor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, far from "declining in finish and style," played marvelously well to enthusiastic audiences throughout the country;
4. And that this excellence continued under Serge Koussevitzky.

Not because M. Monteaux needs defense, but in the interests of accuracy, I am wondering if these recollections of mine may be verified.

MAUDE G. MORRILL.
Hartford.

MAY FESTIVAL

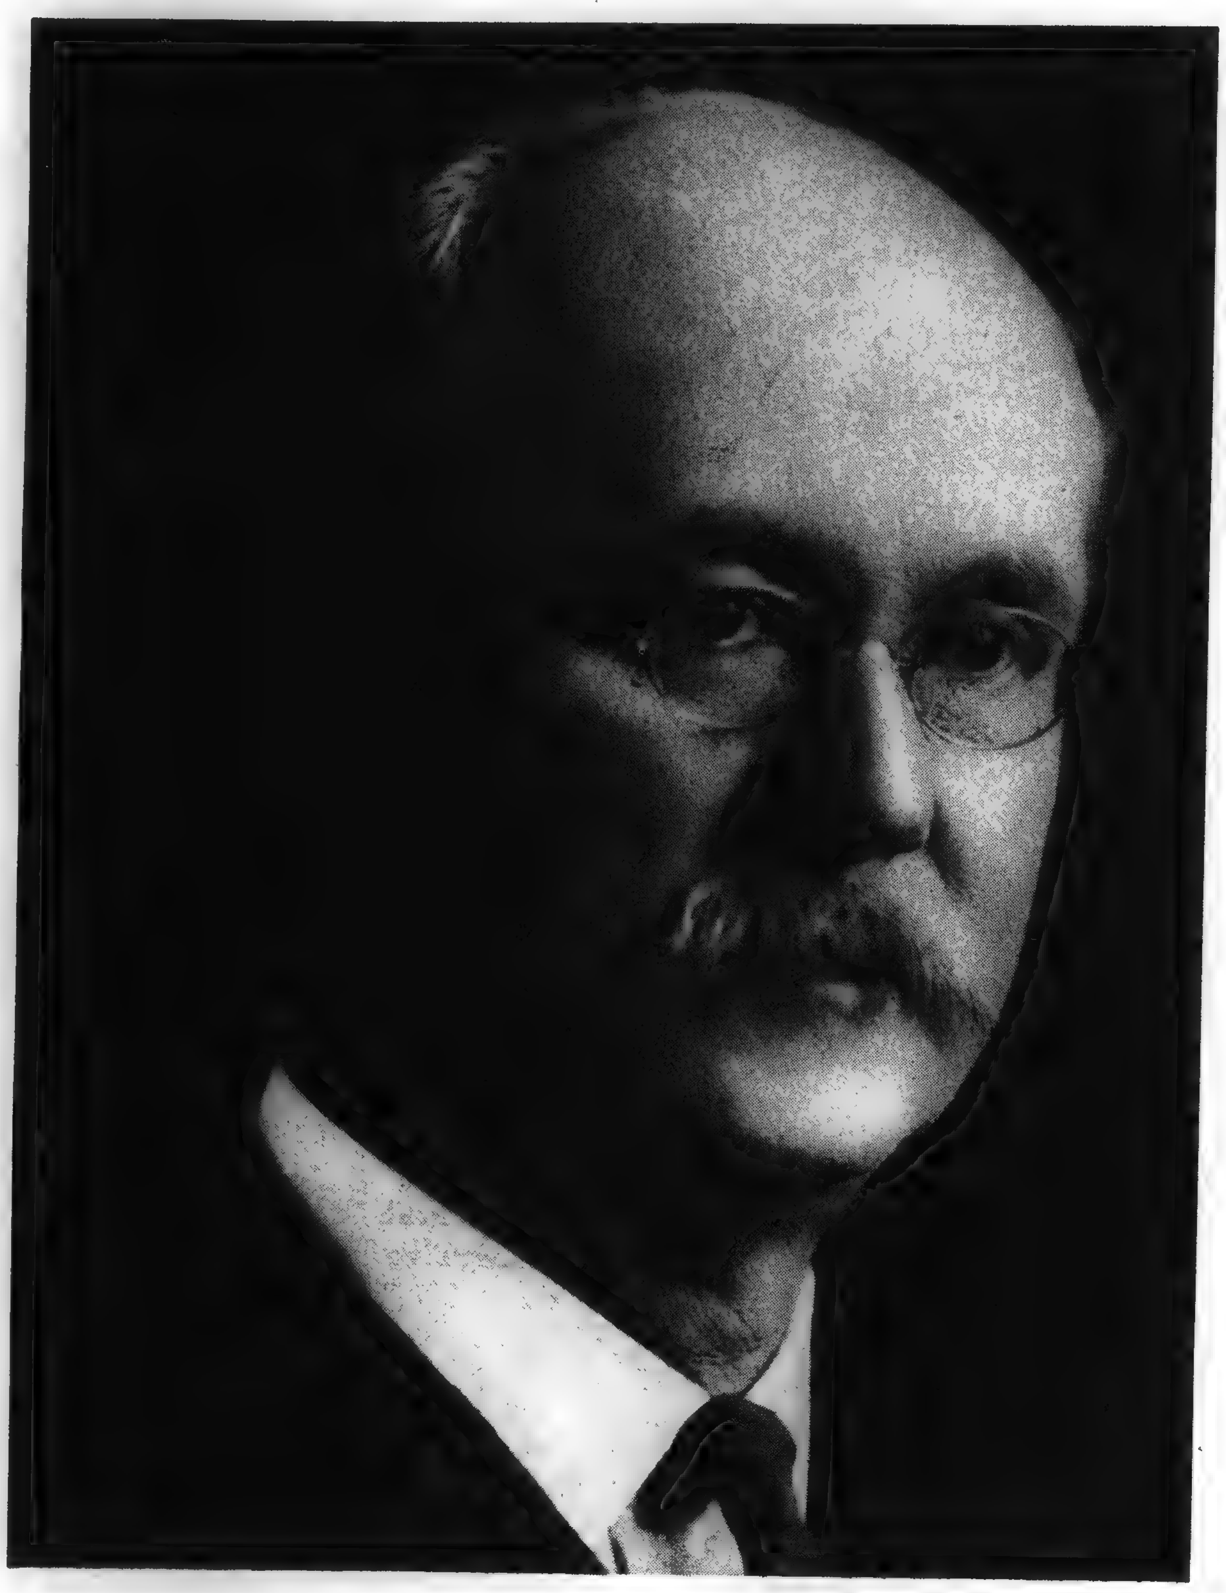
UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

MAY 8, 9, 10, 11, 1940

Brilliant Soloists

★

Philadelphia Orchestra



ALBERT A. STANLEY (1851–1932)

Choral Union

★

Young People's Chorus

SIX CONCERTS - FOUR DAYS

HILL AUDITORIUM » » » ANN ARBOR

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

MAR 13 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CLOSES SMITH'S PROGRAMS

Beethoven and Hindemith Feature Final Concert — Makeup of Next Year's Series Announced

By FRANCIS REGAL

Northampton, March 12—The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, gave tonight the last concert in the Smith college series, and on March 11, 1941, it will close another excellent series, the items in which were announced tonight. The list includes the Philadelphia and Cleveland orchestras, Roland Hayes, a violin and piano recital by Adolf Busch and Rudolf Serkin, who appeared here recently, and a joint recital by Emmanuel Feuermann, cellist, and Beveridge Webster, pianist. Reservations for course tickets may be made by mail on and after October 1.

Beethoven's First Symphony

Tonight's concert gave the series a brilliant finish, and Boston's famous orchestra was at its best. Dr Koussevitzy opened the program with Beethoven's first symphony, in C major, which he gave at the orchestra's recent concert in Springfield. It was not a routine performance such as some conductors a generation ago used periodically to give in order not to neglect entirely the earliest and smallest of the immortal nine. On the contrary, it showed fresh study, and a commendable effort to show how beautiful [illegible] is when perfectly played by a magnificent orchestra. There was no exaggeration, but none is needed to prove that this sometimes slighted first symphony is a masterpiece and the climax of the fine period which produced the string quartet of opus 18.

Remainder More Modern

The rest of the program was more modern but not excessively modern, and some listeners who had been rather dreading a Hindemith "symphony" were relieved to find that it was not an experiment in non-Euclidean musical geometry. It is not a symphony in the modern sense but a concert version of three orchestral excerpts from Hindemith's opera, "Mathis der Maler." The opera was not staged until May 28, 1938, when it was produced at Zurich, but the "symphony" extracted from the score was brought out in 1934 and was played by the Boston orchestra in the same season. It is not yet quite a well-known work, but it is attractive and much easier to grasp than Hindemith's more abstract music.

The three movements are linked by the composer with three famous paintings of the Isenheim altarpiece in the musem at Colmar, the work of the 16-century German painter, Malthias Gruenewald, who is the central figure in the opera. The movements are "Angelic Concert," "Entombment" and "Temptation of Saint Anthony." Each has interesting points, but the last is by far the most striking and rises to a highly effective climax.

Another comparatively little known work by a famous composer was the orchestral suite "Pelleas and Melisande," taken from the stage music composed for Maeterlinck's play by Gabriel Faure. This was brought out four years before Debussy's opera, which may have overshadowed it, but it is a fine work and ought to be made more widely familiar. To close the program the orchestra played superbly two Wagner numbers, the preludes to "Lohengrin" and "Die Meistersinger," in the latter of which the brass and percussion were given a free hand. It would have shocked some of Mr Koussevitzky's predecessors, but not Wagner, and the climax was thrilling.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

MAR 14 1940

Piatigorsky to Play New Work With Koussevitzky

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make their fourth visit of the season to New York this week, playing tonight and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall and tomorrow evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist, will be soloist in the first local performance of Prokofieff's concerto and will join Jean Lefranc, violinist, in the solo parts of Strauss's "Don Quixote" at the concert this evening. The program will open with Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" Overture.

Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, Dr. Koussevitzky will play Beethoven's C major Symphony, Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" Symphony, Faure's incidental music to "Pelleas et Melisande."

Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, will [illegible] in Stravinsky's Capriccio at the Brooklyn concert. The program will open with Mozart's C major Symphony (K. 338) and will close with the Second Symphony of Brahms.

NORTHA[illegible] MASS.
GAZETTE

MAR 13 1940

Boston Symphony's Concert Applauded by Local Audience

Koussevitzky Shows There Are Great Things in Modern Music and Unlimited Aspects in Old

The concluding contribution to the Smith college concert course of 1939-1940 was made by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra in John M. Greene hall last evening. And what a contribution it was! For an expectant audience, the leader and orchestra showed that there are great things in new music; for a devoted audience, they revealed unlimited aspects in old masterpieces.

How did this come about? There was Hindemith's symphony, "Mathis der Maler," for the expectant; Beethoven's first symphony, that preludes to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" for the devoted.

At first hearing, Hindemith's work—made up of three excerps from his opera, "Mathis der Maler"—became extraordinarily powerful, expressive pieces. Strange tonality, harmony and such matters were forgotten in the moving effect of the whole, with its grand line, its undeniable sincerity and depth of meaning. Even when it was not entirely comprehensible, when it seemed to wander, it held the listener's attention. The contrapuntal skill, the sheer progress of the melodic line alone were objects of fascinated observation.

But the emotional tension of the opening measures of the "Temptation of Saint Anthony," that section's final brass choir, the wonderful simplicity of the "Entombment" and the interplay of voices in the "Angelic Concert" were to be remembered as profoundly beautiful, stirring music.

These qualities were the more arresting and exciting, of course, through the interpretative powers of Mr. Koussevitzky and his band of musicians. The music could not have had more conviction or emotional stress. For the conductor appeared singularly in the vein: He drew sonority upon sonority from the orchestra; he was the master in maintaining each lyrical line.

If this can be said of the performance of the unfamiliar, it can be said with equal right of the familiar. Beethoven is a much calmer and smaller voice in his first symphony, yet there is unbounded wonder in his tone-poetry. It gave the orchestra full scope for some eloquent playing, as it afforded new aspects of the composer's genius and of the greatness of his interpreter.

When the program ended with Wagner, the listener was to marvel anew. Here again the playing was superlative, in its dramatic utterance, its blaze of color and penetration to the heart of the music. Need it be said that the audience was reluctant to go? There was applause and stamping of feet, and patient awaiting until Koussevitzky appeared again and again.

D. H. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

MAR 15 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orchestra Was As Good Under Monteaux As Under Muck

To the Editor of The Courant:—

Will you allow a long-time reader of The Courant to comment upon your recent editorial, "Carl Muck?"

If New York and Boston papers and our own Courant of 1915-1916 were to be consulted, I think that the following ideas would be found:

1. That the "storm of criticism" under which Carl Muck withdrew was due to his unneutral activities here, before our entrance into the World War.

2. That these activities were rewarded by the Berlin government upon his return to Germany.

3. That under Pierre Monteaux, his successor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, far from "declining in finish and style," played marvelously well to enthusiastic audiences throughout the country;

4. And that this excellence continued under Serge Koussevitzky.

Not because M. Mo[illegible] defense, but in the interests of accuracy, I am wondering if the recollections of [illegible] fied.

MA[illegible]

Hartford

FORTY-SEVENTH ANNUAL

MAY FESTIVAL

INTRODUCTION

EUGENE ORMANDY

THOR JOHNSON

THE First May Festival was held in 1894. It was founded by Dr. Albert A. Stanley, and his associates on the Board of Directors of the University Musical Society: G. Frank Allmendinger, James B. Angell, Henry S. Dean, Charles B. deNancrede, Paul R. DePont, Ottmar Eberbach, Francis W. Kelsey, Adelbert L. Noble, William H. Pettee, James H. Wade, and Levi D. Wines.

The First Festival consisted of but three concerts, given on a Friday evening and on a Saturday afternoon and evening. The Boston Festival Orchestra, under the leadership of Emil Mollenhauer, participated; and the Choral Union, conducted by Dr. Stanley, presented Verdi's "Requiem." The Festival was held in old University Hall. The following year a fourth concert was added, and later, a fifth concert. In 1913, the Festival was transferred to the newly constructed Hill Auditorium, and shortly thereafter a sixth concert was added; and the offerings were supplemented by a large chorus of young people.

At these Festivals, practically all of the larger choral works and operas adaptable to concert performance, as well as many of the smaller choral compositions, have been performed. In a number of cases American, or even world, premieres have taken place. For eleven years the Boston Festival Orchestra participated. Then for thirty-one years, the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Frederick Stock, made annual pilgrimages to the University. For the past five years the Philadelphia Orchestra, under the batons of Eugene Ormandy, Leopold Stokowski, Jose Iturbi, and distinguished guest conductors, have taken part. Most of the more important soloists of the period, both vocal and instrumental, have been heard either in choral works or in solo numbers.

Truly, Dr. Stanley and his associates builded better than they anticipated. The development of the Festival and its contributions to the progress of musical culture for nearly half a century is a substantial justification of the ambitions and ideals of the far-seeing music enthusiasts who established so important an enterprise at a time when widespread support was not as prevalent as it is nowadays.

"The Cream of the Crop," as a group of enthusiastic students put it, will participate in the Forty-Seventh Annual MAY FESTIVAL. LILY PONS, GIOVANNI MARTINELLI, LAWRENCE TIBBETT, NORMAN CORDON, JOSEF SZIGETI, ARTUR SCHNABEL and RICHARD HALE are all long-time favorites. Newcomers will include DOROTHY MAYNOR, ROSA TENTONI, ENID SZANTHO, ROBERT WEEDE, and EMANUEL FEUERMANN. This provides a happy balance between those who will make Festival debuts, and those who have won warm welcomes on past occasions.

The CHORAL UNION, established in 1879, and which has been heard several times each year since that time, will perform a short work entitled "THE INIMITABLE LOVERS" by CHARLES VARDELL, Jr., contemporary American composer; and SAINT-SAENS' monumental "SAMSON AND DELILAH" with a cast of all Metropolitan Opera singers, under the baton of THOR JOHNSON. JUVA HIGBEE will present the YOUNG PEOPLE'S FESTIVAL CHORUS in several songs.

The PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA, for the fifth consecutive Festival, will participate in all six concerts. EUGENE ORMANDY will conduct the major portion of the orchestral numbers; while SAUL CASTON, Associate Conductor of the Orchestra, will also take part. HARL McDONALD will officiate as Guest Conductor of one of his own compositions entitled, "SANTA FE TRAIL SYMPHONY."

The UNIVERSITY MUSICAL SOCIETY, in building the programs for the Forty-Seventh Annual May Festival, has endeavored to keep in mind the divers tastes and desires of a loyal and discriminating public, both in the selection of artists and organizations, as well as in the choice of numbers to be performed. The Society trusts that its offerings this season will meet with the same hearty approval which has greeted its programs in the past. It expresses to its patrons and to the music-loving public in general, sincere appreciation for their loyal and stimulating support over a period of many years.

The May Festival

SOLOISTS

LILY PONS Metropolitan Opera Association	Soprano
DOROTHY MAYNOR Sensational Negro Singer	Soprano
ROSA TENTONI Metropolitan Opera Association	Soprano
ENID SZANTHO Metropolitan Opera Association	Contralto
GIOVANNI MARTINELLI Metropolitan Opera Association	Tenor
LAWRENCE TIBBETT Metropolitan Opera Association	Baritone
ROBERT WEEDE Metropolitan Opera Association	Baritone
NORMAN CORDON Metropolitan Opera Association	Bass
RICHARD HALE Noted American Actor-Singer	Narrator
JOSEPH SZIGETI Hungarian Virtuoso	Violinist
EMANUEL FEUERMANN Renowned Austrian Artist	Violoncellist
ARTUR SCHNABEL Brilliant Interpreter of Beethoven	Pianist

ORGANIZATIONS

THE PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA
THE UNIVERSITY CHORAL UNION
THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S CHORUS

CHORAL WORKS

"The Inimitable Lovers"	Vardell
"Samson and Delilah"	Saint-Saens

CONDUCTORS

EUGENE ORMANDY, Orchestra Conductor
THOR JOHNSON, Choral Conductor
SAUL CASTON, Associate Conductor
HARL McDONALD, Guest Conductor
JUVA HIGBEE, Young People's Conductor

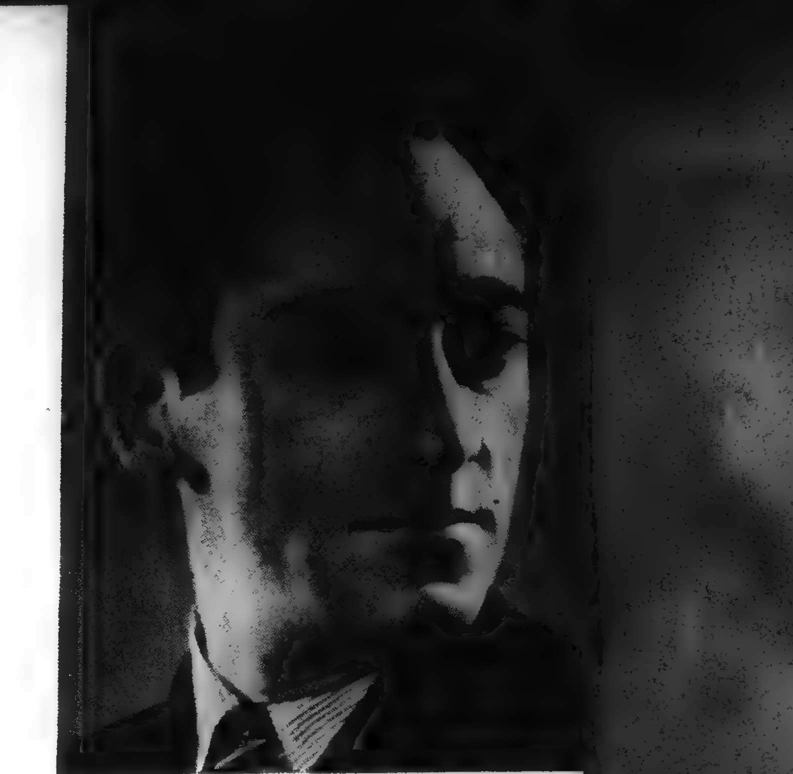
TICKET PRICES

The prices of SEASON TICKETS (six concerts) are $6.00, $7.00, and $8.00 respectively. For original purchasers who present "Festival Coupons" from season Choral Union tickets, the prices are reduced to $3.00, $4.00, and $5.00 each.

The prices for INDIVIDUAL CONCERT TICKETS will be $2.50, $2.00, $1.50, and $1.00.

ORDERS FOR TICKETS for the series or for individual concerts, with remittances to cover, will be filed and selections will be made in sequence. Tickets will be mailed out about May 1, at purchasers' risks, unless 18 cents additional for registration accompanies the order.

Please address CHARLES A. SINK, President, School of Music, Ann Arbor, Michigan.



SAUL CASTON

JUVA HIGBEE

HARL McDONALD

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

MAR 13 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CLOSES SMITH'S PROGRAMS

Beethoven and Hindemith Feature Final Concert — Makeup of Next Year's Series Announced

By FRANCIS REGAL

Northampton, March 12—The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, gave tonight the last concert in the Smith college series, and on March 11, 1941, it will close another excellent series, the items in which were announced tonight. The list includes the Philadelphia and Cleveland orchestras, Roland Hayes, a violin and piano recital by Adolf Busch and Rudolf Serkin, who appeared here recently, and a joint recital by Emmanuel Feuermann, cellist, and Beveridge Webster, pianist. Reservations for course tickets may be made by mail on and after October 1.

Beethoven's First Symphony

Tonight's concert gave the series a brilliant finish, and Boston's famous orchestra was at its best. Dr Koussevitzky opened the program with Beethoven's first symphony, in C major, which he gave at the orchestra's recent concert in Springfield. It was not a routine performance such as some conductors a generation ago used periodically to give in order not to neglect entirely the earliest and smallest of the immortal nine. On the contrary, it showed fresh study and a commendable effort to show how beautiful this early work is when perfectly played by a magnificent orchestra. There was no exaggeration, but none is needed to prove that this sometimes slighted first symphony is a masterpiece and the climax of the fine period which produced the string quartet of opus 18.

Remainder More Modern

The rest of the program was more modern but not excessively modern, and some listeners who had been rather dreading a Hindemith "symphony" were relieved to find that it was not an experiment in non-Euclidean musical geometry. It is not a symphony in the modern sense but a concert version of three orchestral excerpts from Hindemith's opera, "Mathis der Maler." The opera was not staged until May 28, 1938, when it was produced at Zurich, but the "symphony" extracted from the score was brought out in 1934 and was played by the Boston orchestra in the same season. It is not yet quite a well-known work, but it is attractive and much easier to grasp than Hindemith's more abstract music.

The three movements are linked by the composer with three famous paintings of the Isenheim altarpiece in the musem at Colmar, the work of the 16-century German painter, Mathias Gruenewald, who is the central figure in the opera. The movements are "Angelic Concert," "Entombment" and "Temptation of Saint Anthony." Each has interesting points, but the last is by far the most striking and rises to a highly effective climax.

Another comparatively little known work by a famous composer was the orchestral suite "Pelleas and Melisande," taken from the stage music composed for Maeterlinck's play by Gabriel Faure. This was brought out four years before Debussy's opera, which may have overshadowed it, but it is a fine work and ought to be made more widely familiar. To close the program the orchestra played superbly two Wagner numbers, the preludes to "Lohengrin" and "Die Meistersinger," in the latter of which the brass and percussion were given a free hand. It would have shocked some of Mr Koussevitzky's predecessors, but not Wagner, and the climax was thrilling.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

MAR 14 1940

Piatigorsky to Play New Work With Koussevitzky

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make their fourth visit of the season to New York this week, playing tonight and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall and tomorrow evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist, will be soloist in the first local performance of Prokofieff's concerto and will join Jean Lefranc, violinist, in the solo parts of Strauss's "Don Quixote" at the concert this evening. The program will open with Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" Overture.

Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, Dr. Koussevitzky will play Beethoven's C major Symphony, Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" Symphony, Faure's incidental music to "Pelleas et Melisande."

Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, will be soloist in Stravinsky's Capriccio at the Brooklyn concert. The program will open with Mozart's C major Symphony (K. 338) and will close with the Second Symphony of Brahms.

Bost
Co b

Kous
Are Mo lim

The
the Sr of 193
Kousse
Symph
Greene
what a an exp er and there a sic; fo reveale master
How
There ny, "M expecta phony,
ner's
Meister
for the
At fi work—from Maler" powerf
Strange such m the mo with its able si meaning entirely seemed tener's tal skill
the mel jects of But t
the ope
"Tempt that sec
the wor
"Entom of voice cert" we profound
music.
These arresting through ers of M band of could no tion or conducto the vein sonority was the each lyr
If this formance can be s
the fami much ca in his fi is unbou poetry. I scope fo
as it aff composer greatness
When Wagner, marvel playing dramatic color an heart of said that tant to g and stam tient awa appeared

THIS HAR
C

BO

Orchestr
Mon

To the Will yo of The your rec
If New and our were to the follo
1. Tha under w was due here, bef
World W
2. Tha warded upon his
3. Tha
his succe
Orchestr finish an well to througho
4. And tinued u
Not be defense,
curacy,
recollecti
fied.

THE FORTY-SEVENTH ANN ARBOR MAY FESTIVAL

FIRST MAY FESTIVAL CONCERT

WEDNESDAY EVENING, MAY 8, at 8:30

Soloist:
LAWRENCE TIBBETT, Baritone
THE PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA
EUGENE ORMANDY, Conductor

PROGRAM

Entr'acte Khovantchina ....Moussorgsky
"Lieutenant Kije" Suite ....Prokofieff
Incidental sclos: LAWRENCE TIBBETT
Hallucination Scene from "Boris Godounoff" ....Moussorgsky
Prince Galitzky's Aria from Act I, from "Prince Igor" ....Borodin
MR. TIBBETT
Fifth Symphony in E minor ....Tschaikovsky
(In commemoration of his 100th birthday anniversary)

SECOND MAY FESTIVAL CONCERT

THURSDAY EVENING, MAY 9, at 8:30

Soloists:
DOROTHY MAYNOR, Soprano
ROSA TENTONI, Soprano
ROBERT WEEDE, Baritone
RICHARD HALE, Narrator
THE PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA
THE UNIVERSITY CHORAL UNION
EUGENE ORMANDY and THOR JOHNSON, Conductors

PROGRAM

Music to Goethe's Tragedy, "Egmont" ...Beethoven

1. Overture
2. Recitation
3. Entr'acte II
4. Recitation
5. Song: "Die Trommel geruehret"
6. Recitation
7. Song: "Freudvoll und Leidvoll"
8. Entr'acte III
9. Recitation
10. "Clarchen's Death"
11. "Melodrama"
12. Recitation
13. "Symphony of Victory"

MISS TENTONI and MR. HALE
Cantata "The Inimitable Lovers" ....Vardell
MISS TENTONI, MR. WEEDE, and CHORAL UNION

"Leise, Leise" from "Der Freischutz" ...von Weber
"Depuis le jour" from "Louise" ....Charpentier
MISS MAYNOR
Legend: "The Homecoming of Lemminkainen" ....Sibelius

THIRD MAY FESTIVAL CONCERT

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MAY 10, at 2:30

Soloist:
ARTUR SCHNABEL, Pianist
YOUNG PEOPLE'S FESTIVAL CHORUS
THE PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA
SAUL CASTON, HARL McDONALD, and JUVA HIGBEE, Conductors

PROGRAM

Two Choral Preludes ....Bach–Ormandy
1. O Mensch, bewein' dein' Sunde gross
2. Wachet auf, ruft uns die Stimme

Group of Songs:
1. Jeanie with the Light Brown Hair .....Foster
2. Spinning Song (German) ....Aslanoff
3. Star Lullaby (Polish) ....Treharne
4. Swing Low, Sweet Chariot (Negro Spiritual)
5. En passant par la Lorraine (French) ..Tiersot
YOUNG PEOPLE'S CHORUS

Sante Fe Trail Symphony ....McDonald
CONDUCTED BY THE COMPOSER
Concerto No. 4 for Piano and Orchestra ..Beethoven
MR. SCHNABEL

FOURTH MAY FESTIVAL CONCERT

FRIDAY EVENING, MAY 10, at 8:30

Soloists:
LILY PONS, Soprano
JOSEPH SZIGETI, Violinist
THE PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA
EUGENE ORMANDY, Conductor

PROGRAM

Suite for Strings, Op. 5 ....Corelli
I. Sarabande
II. Giga
III. Badinerie
Blonda's Aria from "Die Entfuhrung aus dem Serail" ....Mozart
Aria, "Caro Nome" from "Rigoletto" ....Verdi
MISS PONS
Poeme ....Chausson
MR. SZIGETI
Ballet Music from "The Machine Man" ......Zador
"L'Amero saro costante" from "Il re Pastore" .Mozart
Obbligato by MR. SZIGETI
Bell Song from "Lakme" ....Delibes
MISS PONS
Symphony in D minor ....Franck
Lento. allegro non troppo
Allegretto
Allegro non troppo

FIFTH MAY FESTIVAL CONCERT

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, MAY 11, at 2:30

Soloists:
JOSEPH SZIGETI, Violinist
EMANUEL FEUERMANN, Violoncellist
THE PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA
EUGENE ORMANDY, Conductor

PROGRAM

Compositions by Brahms
Variations on a Theme by Haydn
Double Concerto in A minor for Violin and Violoncello and Orchestra
MR. SZIGETI and MR. FEUERMANN
INTERMISSION
Symphony No. 2 in D major

SIXTH MAY FESTIVAL CONCERT

SATURDAY EVENING, MAY 11, AT 8:30

Soloists:
ENID SZANTHO, Contralto
GIOVANNI MARTINELLI, Tenor
ROBERT WEEDE, Baritone
NORMAN CORDON, Bass
THE PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA
THE UNIVERSITY CHORAL UNION
THOR JOHNSON, Conductor

PROGRAM

Samson and Delilah ....Saint-Saens

Notices

Concerts will begin on Eastern Standard time. Evenings at 8:30 and afternoons at 2:30. Doors will be closed during numbers.

Holders of season tickets are requested to detach the proper coupon for each concert and present for admission (instead of the whole ticket).

The right is reserved to make such changes in the programs or in the personnel of participants as necessity may require. Tickets are sold at purchasers' risks, and if lost, mislaid, burned, or destroyed in any manner, the University Musical Society will not assume responsibility, nor will duplicates be issued.

Lost and found articles should be inquired for at the office of Shirley W. Smith, Vice-President and Secretary of the University, University Hall.

Those who leave the Auditorium during intermissions will be required to present "rain checks" in order to re-enter.

Traffic regulations will be enforced by the Ann Arbor Police Department and the Buildings and Grounds Department of the University.

Notices will not be announced from the stage.

Rehearsals are private.

An art exhibition will be conducted in Alumni Memorial Hall during the Festival.

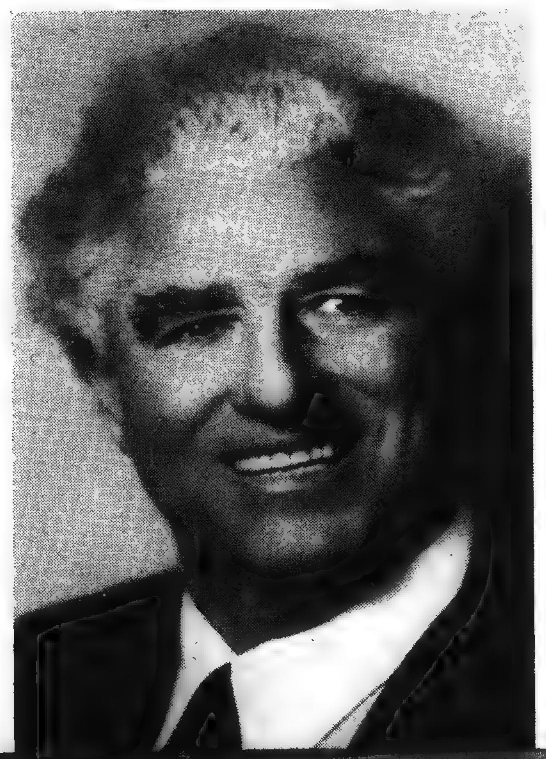
The Steinway is the official piano of the University Musical Society.

LAWRENCE TIBBETT

LILY PONS

ROBERT WEEDE

GIOVANNI MARTINELLI



DOROTHY MAYNOR

NORMAN CORDON

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

MAR 13 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CLOSES SMITH'S PROGRAMS

Beethoven and Hindemith Feature Final Concert — Makeup of Next Year's Series Announced

By FRANCIS REGAL

Northampton, March 12—The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, gave tonight the last concert in the Smith college series, and on March 11, 1941, it will close another excellent series, the items in which were announced tonight. The list includes the Philadelphia and Cleveland orchestras, Roland Hayes, a violin and piano recital by Adolf Busch and Rudolf Serkin, who appeared here recently, and a joint recital by Emmanuel Feuermann, cellist, and Beveridge Webster, pianist. Reservations for course tickets may be made by mail on and after October 1.

Beethoven's First Symphony

Tonight's concert gave the series a brilliant finish, and Boston's famous orchestra was at its best. Dr Koussevitzy opened the program with Beethoven's first symphony, in C major, which he gave at the orchestra's recent concert in Springfield. It was not a routine performance such as some conductors a generation ago used periodically to give in order not to neglect entirely the earliest and smallest of the immortal nine. On the contrary, it showed fresh study and a commendable effort to show how beautiful this early work is when perfectly played by a magnificent orchestra. There was no exaggeration, but none is needed to prove that this sometimes slighted first symphony is a masterpiece and the climax of the fine period which produced the string quartet of opus 18.

Remainder More Modern

The rest of the program was more modern but not excessively modern, and some listeners who had been rather dreading a Hindemith "symphony" were relieved to find that it was not an experiment in non-Euclidean musical geometry. It is not a symphony in the modern sense but a concert version of three orchestral excerpts from Hindemith's opera, "Mathis der Maler." The opera was not staged until May 28, 1938, when it was produced at Zurich, but the "symphony" extracted from the score was brought out in 1934 and was played by the Boston orchestra in the same season. It is not yet quite a well-known work, but it is attractive and much easier to grasp than Hindemith's more abstract music.

The three movements are linked by the composer with three famous paintings of the Isenheim altarpiece in the musem at Colmar, the work of the 16-century German painter, Malthias Gruenewald, who is the central figure in the opera. The movements are "Angelic Concert," "Entombment" and "Temptation of Saint Anthony." Each has interesting points, but the last is by far the most striking and rises to a highly effective climax.

Another comparatively little known work by a famous composer was the orchestral suite "Pelleas and Melisande," taken from the stage music composed for Maeterlinck's play by Gabriel Faure. This was brought out four years before Debussy's opera, which may have overshadowed it, but it is a fine work and ought to be made more widely familiar. To close the program the orchestra played superbly two Wagner numbers, the preludes to "Lohengrin" and "Die Meistersinger," in the latter of which the brass and percussion were given a free hand. It would have shocked some of Mr Koussevitzky's predecessors, but not Wagner, and the climax was thrilling.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

MAR 14 1940

Piatigorsky to Play New Work With Koussevitzky

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make their fourth visit of the season to New York this week, playing tonight and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall and tomorrow evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist, will be soloist in the first local performance of Prokofieff's concerto and will join Jean Lefranc, violinist, in the solo parts of Strauss's "Don Quixote" at the concert this evening. The program will open with Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" Overture.

Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, Dr. Koussevitzky will play Beethoven's C major Symphony, Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" Symphony, Faure's incidental music to "Pelleas et Melisande."

Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, will be soloist in Stravinsky's Capriccio at the Brooklyn concert. The program will open with Mozart's C major Symphony (K. 338) and will close with the Second Symphony of Brahms.

JOSEPH SZIGETI

ROSA TENTONI

EMANUEL FEUERMANN

PERSONAL SKETCHES

LILY PONS is a star of opera, concert, radio, and screen. She is as dazzling as the upward flight of her birdlike voice. Her spectacular rise to the heights of world-wide fame has been incomparable. Her Metropolitan Opera debut in 1931 was an overwhelming triumph. Thereafter, in successive seasons, she sang many famous coloratura roles which were revived for her. Her repertoire includes all of the great operas containing dazzling and scintillating roles adaptable to her beautiful voice. Everywhere she is in demand, from the Metropolitan to the Colon Opera in Buenos Aires, Covent Garden in London, Monte Carlo and Paris Operas, and the San Francisco, Los Angeles, St. Louis, and Chicago Opera Companies. So great is her public following that invariably all box office records, sometimes even those of the adored Caruso, are broken.

DOROTHY MAYNOR was chosen by the NBC on their New Year's broadcast as the most important musical find of the year. Serge Koussevitzky discovered her last summer when he heard her at the Berkshire Festival. He exclaimed, "She is one of the finest singers I have ever heard." The musical world was agog over his enthusiasm, and New York impresarios at once vied for the privilege of managing her affairs. She appeared in recital in New York and won an ovation. Since then her managers have arranged for appearances with practically all of the major American orchestras, under other distinguished musical auspices. She was born in Norfolk, Virginia, the daughter of a Methodist minister. She received her first training in the choir of her father's church. At fourteen she entered Hampton Institute and a few years later toured Europe with the Hampton Negro Chorus. After her graduation she continued her studies to become a music teacher.

ROSA TENTONI is an American girl of Italian background. She became famous overnight when, in February, 1934, Toscanini chose her to sing in Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony." That was the beginning of a rising career. Thereafter she was starred in opera in the New York Stadium summer seasons; in the Cleveland Orchestra's presentation of "Otello"; and at the Hollywood Bowl. Again Toscanini required her services, now as an experienced artist, following which the Metropolitan Opera Association engaged her for major roles, where she has become one of that institution's most important assets. Interspersed between opera engagements, she finds time for concert and oratorio work under the most discriminating musical auspices.

ENID SZANTHO is an Irish-Hungarian contralto, who possesses one of the truly great singing voices of the present day. Olin Downes, of the New York Times, said that "The unusual feature of the fine performance of 'Die Walkure' at the Metropolitan was the appearance of an excellent new Fricka—Enid Szantho. The richness and color of her voice, the capacity to project utterances with dignity and intensity betoken a valuable addition to the Metropolitan's ranks." In concert and oratorio and in other professional capacities she rises to equal heights.

GIOVANNI MARTINELLI is too well known throughout the world of music to require an introduction. For more than a quarter of a century he has occupied a forefront position at the Metropolitan Opera, portraying practically all of the great tenor roles, in most cases holding records for the number of performances. His artistic successes, with a congenial personality, have combined to make him one of America's best-loved artists. The mere mention of the name "Martinelli" is a signal for enthusiastic anticipation and the consummation of an evening's entertainment of a triumphant order. Mr. Martinelli has been heard in Ann Arbor at frequent intervals since his triumphant Metropolitan debut a quarter of a century ago.

LAWRENCE TIBBETT was twenty-five years old when he reached New York on borrowed money to study voice. Within six months he had a Metropolitan Opera contract. Soon thereafter, his magnificent rendition of the role of Ford in "Falstaff" precipitated pandemonium and landed him on the front pages of newspapers throughout the world. His successive achievements have kept him there ever since. This distinguished baritone never fails to stir his audiences to breathless attention. He is both a superb singer and a superb actor. There is hardly an interpretative style that he does not command from the ground up. He possesses the unique faculty of making classic music popular—and popular music classic! Such is Lawrence Tibbett—America's own—who has become an international idol in the world of song.

ROBERT WEEDE, of the Metropolitan Opera Association, has won his artistic spurs not only on the dramatic stage, but also in radio, concert, and oratorio. He was born in Baltimore. In 1927 he won the National Federation of Music Clubs contest. In 1929 he won the Caruso Memorial Foundation Award, which made it possible for him to spend two years in Italy. In 1933 he became a leading member of Roxy's group in Radio City. He made his Metropolitan Opera debut in 1937, where he scored an immediate success. He has triumphed in appearances with the La Scala Company of Philadelphia, the St. Louis Grand Opera Company, the Cincinnati Summer Opera Company, the Robin Hood Dell, and with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra during the Stadium Concerts series, and in other capacities.

NORMAN CORDON came from the South to join the Metropolitan Opera. His rich bass-baritone voice, a winning personality, and a brilliant record in opera, concert, and radio, assure an impressive future. He was born in Washington, North Carolina, and started his career as a choir boy. He attended a military academy and later the University of North Carolina. Here he determined to make music his career. He continued his studies in Chicago. Soon important engagements came his way, and his great artistry became recognized far and wide. In the great opera companies of America, as well as in recital and with orchestra, he has amply justified the frequent statement that America now produces artists equal in professional ability to the best of the old-world countries.

THE UNIVERSITY MUSICAL SOCIETY

Charles A. Sink, President
Alexander G. Ruthven, Vice-President
Durand W. Springer, Secretary
Oscar A. Eberbach, Treasurer
Shirley W. Smith, Assistant Sec'y-Treas.
*Earl V. Moore, Musical Director

Junius E. Beal
Roscoe O. Bonisteel
Harley A. Haynes
James Inglis
Horace G. Prettyman
E. Blythe Stason

* Absent on leave.

RICHARD HALE is widely known both as actor and singer. After a brilliant student career at Columbia University, he had his first engagement as an actor in the company of Mrs. Fiske. Two years later he made his debut as a singer with Yvette Guilbert. Since that time he has sung recitals in New York, London, and Berlin, and has been soloist with the principal orchestras of this country and abroad. He was leading man with such well-known players as Ethel Barrymore, June Walker, Edith Barrett, Sylvia Sidney, Katherine Alexander, and others.

Mr. Hale is well known among the moderns for several "first performances," notably Stravinsky's "Les Noces" under Stokowski; Malipiero's "Sette Canzoni" under Serafin; and "Peter and the Wolf" under Prokofieff, the composer, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

JOSEPH SZIGETI, the world-famous, world-praised violinist, "has everything," according to the London Times. Wherever he goes, whether on tours around the world, in Europe, South America, or in the United States, his appearances constitute triumphs. Leopold Stokowski, a dozen years ago, revealed him to the American public. Official honors bestowed upon him include the ranks of Officer of the French Legion of Honor, Commander of the Order Leopold of Belgium, Officer's Cross of the Hungarian "Ordre pour le Merite," and many others. Recently the London Times aptly summed up his glowing record of art in the words "Music in gold and silver." On his tours to America he has won great distinction both as recitalist and with orchestra. Authoritative critics generally consider him as one of the greatest violinists of the day.

EMANUEL FEUERMANN, the world-renowned violoncellist, has been pronounced by discriminating critics to be the finest violoncellist on the concert stage, and one of the greatest of all time. Mr. Feuermann, who is an Austrian, came to this country five years ago, and made his debut as guest artist with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under Bruno Walter. This appearance, with ensuing recitals, created a tremendous stir in musical circles. He has been playing since he was a boy of eleven, when he made his debut with the Vienna Symphony Orchestra under Felix Weingartner. Later he appeared with the Berlin Philharmonic, Hamburg Philharmonic, Paris Symphony, Amsterdam Concertgebouw, and the Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestras. At sixteen he was called to a professorship at the Conservatory of Music at Cologne.

ARTUR SCHNABEL ranks among the most popular of concert artists. In spite of his towering intellectual attainments, and his reputation of being a musician for musicians, he has proved to be a sensation among music lovers and the public in general. His visits to Ann Arbor have emphasized locally what is generally called "The Schnabel Vogue."

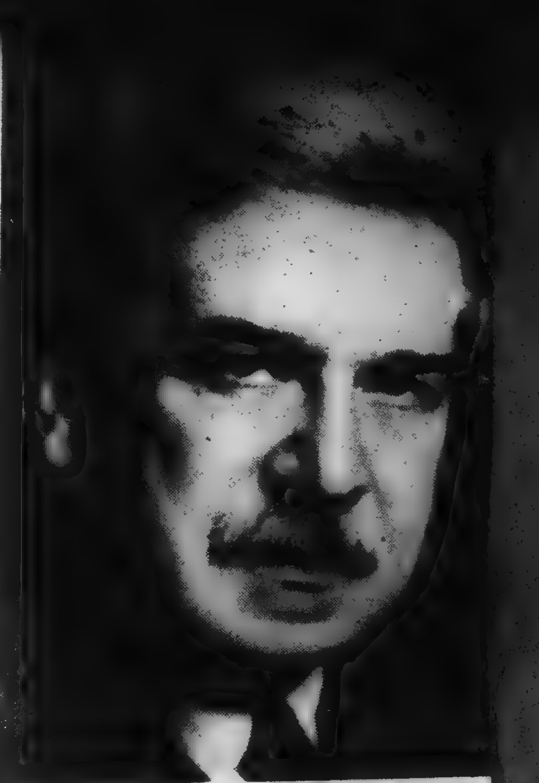
He is the idol of the younger generation of pianists, many of whom have been his pupils, and through them he has exerted a tremendous influence on contemporary concertizing. Born in Austria, Schnabel now makes his home in London. At an early age he began his studies with Leschetizky, with whom he continued for five years. He has been concertizing since he was fifteen, a period of nearly forty years. His command of Beethoven is phenomenal. He has been heard in Ann Arbor on two previous occasions in recital.

THE PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA. Words can tell part of the story, but the voice of the Philadelphia Orchestra, with its infinite variety and overwhelming power, must speak for itself before its full glory can be understood. Rachmaninoff has said: "Philadelphia has the finest orchestra I have ever heard at any time or place in my whole life."

The Philadelphia Orchestra was founded in 1900. It has developed from a modest body of players to its present eminence under four conductors. Fritz Scheel, who was its founder, led the Orchestra for its first seven years. He was succeeded by Carl Pohlig, who in turn was followed by Leopold Stokowski in 1912. Under Mr. Stokowski the organization achieved a world-wide renown unmatched in musical history. Eugene Ormandy became co-conductor in 1936, and music director in 1938.

EUGENE ORMANDY was born in Budapest in 1899. He was a child prodigy of the violin. He was accepted as a student at the Royal Academy of Music at the age of five, and became a professor at the age of seventeen. Four years later he came to the United States, where he became successively; assistant orchestra conductor at the Capitol Theater, New York; a guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra at the Stadium Concerts, and of the Philadelphia Orchestra (substituting for Arturo Toscanini); and permanent conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony. The "happy chances" which made these engagements possible were due, of course, to the fact that he knew his scores and his orchestra as few conductors did.

Thus his natural gifts, diligent study, and years of experience, have enabled him to continue the Philadelphia Orchestra's brilliant tradition. The standard repertory has



ARTUR SCHNABEL

ENID SZANTHO

RICHARD HALE

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

MAR 13 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CLOSES SMITH'S PROGRAMS

Beethoven and Hindemith Feature Final Concert — Makeup of Next Year's Series Announced

By FRANCIS REGAL

Northampton, March 12—The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, gave tonight the last concert in the Smith college series, and on March 11, 1941, it will close another excellent series, the items in which were announced tonight. The list includes the Philadelphia and Cleveland orchestras, Roland Hayes, a violin and piano recital by Adolf Busch and Rudolf Serkin, who appeared here recently, and a joint recital by Emmanuel Feuermann, cellist, and Beveridge Webster, pianist. Reservations for course tickets may be made by mail on and after October 1.

Beethoven's First Symphony

Tonight's concert gave the series a brilliant finish, and Boston's famous orchestra was at its best. Dr Koussevitzky opened the program with Beethoven's first symphony, in C major, which he gave at the orchestra's recent concert in Springfield. It was not a routine performance such as some conductors a generation ago used periodically to give in order not to neglect entirely the earliest and smallest of the immortal nine. On the contrary, it showed fresh study and a commendable effort to show how beautiful this early work is when perfectly played by a magnificent orchestra. There was no exaggeration, but none is needed to prove that this sometimes slighted first symphony is a masterpiece and the climax of the fine period which produced the string quartet of opus 18.

Remainder More Modern

The rest of the program was more modern but not excessively modern, and some listeners who had been rather dreading a Hindemith "symphony" were relieved to find that it was not an experiment in non-Euclidean musical geometry. It is not a symphony in the modern sense but a concert version of three orchestral excerpts from Hindemith's opera, "Mathis der Maler." The opera was not staged until May 28, 1938, when it was produced at Zurich, but the "symphony" extracted from the score was brought out in 1934 and was played by the Boston orchestra in the same season. It is not yet quite a well-known work, but it is attractive and much easier to grasp than Hindemith's more abstract music.

The three movements are linked by the composer with three famous paintings of the Isenheim altarpiece in the musem at Colmar, the work of the 16-century German painter, Mathias Gruenewald, who is the central figure in the opera. The movements are "Angelic Concert," "Entombment" and "Temptation of Saint Anthony." Each has interesting points, but the last is by far the most striking and rises to a highly effective climax.

Another comparatively little known work by a famous composer was the orchestral suite "Pelleas and Melisande," taken from the stage music composed for Maeterlinck's play by Gabriel Faure. This was brought out four years before Debussy's opera, which may have overshadowed it, but it is a fine work and ought to be made more widely familiar. To close the program the orchestra played superbly two Wagner numbers, the preludes to "Lohengrin" and "Die Meistersinger," in the latter of which the brass and percussion were given a free hand. It would have shocked some of Mr Koussevitzky's predecessors, but not Wagner, and the climax was thrilling.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

MAR 14 1940

Piatigorsky to Play New Work With Koussevitzky

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make their fourth visit of the season to New York this week, playing tonight and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall and tomorrow evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist, will be soloist in the first local performance of Prokofieff's concerto and will join Jean Lefranc, violinist, in the solo parts of Strauss's "Don Quixote" at the concert this evening. The program will open with Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" Overture.

Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, Dr. Koussevitzky will play Beethoven's C major Symphony, Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" Symphony, Faure's incidental music to "Pelleas et Melisande."

Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, will be soloist in Stravinsky's Capriccio at the Brooklyn concert. The program will open with Mozart's C major Symphony (K. 338) and will close with the Second Symphony of Brahms.

229

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 15 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS 'CELLO SOLOIST

Gregor Piatagorsky Appears With Orchestra in Serge Prokofieff's Concerto

'DON QUIXOTE' IS HEARD

Richard Straus's Music Is on Program Presented on the Carnegie Hall Platform

By OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, returned last night to Carnegia Hall to the manifest pleasure of an audience which packed the auditorium and rapturously applauded everything. This included Serge Prokofieff's Concerto for 'cello and orchestra, played, with Gregor Piatagorsky as soloist, for the first time in New York.

It goes without saying that this concerto is skillfully composed; that the 'cello part is admirably interwoven with the orchestral texture, and that such ideas as there are, are developed with exemplary skill. The composer sets himself some pretty problems and solves them neatly.

The concerto is in three movements and they were played without interruption. The last movement is the most varied in its effects. One finds in it a number of interesting cadenba-passages to which the soloist did consummate justice. There is in fact a little of everything.

Audience Pays Homage

There were those who applauded this performance with much persistency—homage richly deserved by the masterly exhibition of Mr. Piatagorsky. And the concerto itself? The reception of music by the listener is a highly subjective process. Great masterpieces have often been violently condemned at a first hearing. Bearing these facts firmly in mind, it is nevertheless incumbent upon this reporter to remark that he has seldom heard a piece of music which struck him as so devoid of ideas or creative compulsion in the writing, so skillful in the statement of precisely nothing. Mr. Prokofieff has written a great deal of better music.

The concert began with brilliant playing of the joyous overture to the "Marriage of Figaro." It ended, again with Mr. Piatagorsky in the foreground as solo 'cellist, in the performance of Richard Strauss's consistently astonishing "Don Quixote."

Music for Reflection

This music is subject for endless pleasure and reflection. It is perhaps the answer to the question of how far program music can go. Would the uninitiated understand each page without Strauss's avowed program? In substance, this is a most moving, piteous, ironical commentary upon the illusions and the disasters of the idealist in a world of stupid and deadly realities. The final pages are among the tenderest and noblest music Strauss ever wrote. Whether the uninformed listener would know that this was an attack on a windmill, or that the overturning of a boat in a river, and the other an argument between knight and squire, is a different question.

This we know: that in sum Strauss has written wonderful music, and that, in attempting a tonal canvas so filled with significant detail he has probably extended the actual articulateness of music where definite ideas are concerned to the farthest possible point of expression.

The score is very elaborate, yet constructed with exceptional finesse. The performance emphasized this latter element. It was of beautiful tone quality, astonishing in its clearness and very refined.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
MAR 15 1940

STRAVINSKY GIVES 'DUMBARTON OAKS'

Assisted by Adele Marcus and Boston Players.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

Though he was assisted by a pianist and twenty-one members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Igor Stravinsky was the apostle of economy of means at his concert yesterday afternoon in Town Hall, given "for the benefit of French Musicians in Distress." It was to be noted paradoxically that if few concerts not of a symphonic order enlist so many performers, few concertos of the scope of the two on this program are to be heard performed by ensembles stripped similarly to the bone.

One of the concertos, that which Stravinsky composed in 1938 and named "Dumbarton Oaks," was new to Manhattan, though it had been played in Washington, Paris and, as recently as March 6, in Boston. It is for fifteen instruments: flute, clarinet, bassoon, two horns, three violins, three violas, two 'cellos, two double basses. But it is not in the old concerto grosso form, with alternations of soli and tutti. Instead, as one of its special characteristics, there is a unifying sort of ostinato that runs almost throughout the concerto. In the third and final movement, marked con moto, winds and strings have a virtuoso dialogue of harmonic interest. But this is an exceedingly spare Stravinsky, in ideas as well as means. Something more than the musical apparatus has been reduced to the bare necessities of motion and form.

The other concerto, that for two pianos without orchestra, composed in 1935, had been played here before. Yesterday's pianists were the composer and Adele Marcus. Theirs was a spirited and altogether competent performance of a work often percussive, even xylophonic, in effect. The variations again emerged as the most persuasive part of the score. The Boston concertmaster, Richard Burgin, did yeoman service in "Histoire du Soldat." Given as a sequence of nine instrumental numbers, without the narrator and stage trappings, the work yielded almost the effect of a violin concerto at times. Six other players—double bass, clarinet, bassoon, trumpet, trombone, percussion—were again adequate for Stravinsky's purposes. Here is a work that has been produced in full-sized opera houses—this reviewer recalls Klemperer's conducting of it at the Kroll in Berlin—and it has an orchestra of seven.

That is one less than was required for the one piece of avowed chamber music on yesterday's program, the Octet for wind instruments, which dates back to 1922. This work is perhaps a praxis more than it is a musical composition, in that there are virtually no emotional connotations in its building of linear counterpoint and its exploitation of timbres. It was exceedingly well achieved, with the flutist, G. Laurent, contributing some exceptional playing in the opening sinfonia. Mr. Stravinsky was a skillful conductor of his own works. The applause was particularly hearty after "Dumbarton Oaks."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 16 1940

DINNERS BEFORE CONCERT

Hosts and Guests Hear Boston Symphony at Brooklyn Academy

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Ser[illegible]vitzky conducting, presented the fourth concert of the current season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music last night.

Before the concert Mrs. Maxwell Lester entertained at dinner Dr. and Mrs. Frank E. Simmons, Mr. and Mrs. James G. McDonald, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Hammitt and Jacob Klinck. The party later attended the concert as guests of Mrs. Simmons and Mrs. Lester.

The Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association box was occupied by Dr. and Mrs. William Slater, Mr. and Mrs. William Arnold, Miss Emma Jessie Ogg and Mr. and Mrs. Seymour Beardsley. The Brooklyn Woman's Club was represented in Box 4 by Mrs. Oliver G. Carter, Mrs. Jason Davis, Mrs. Edwin Patterson, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Wilson Briggs Zimmer, Mrs. Frederic W. Burbank, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives and Mrs. Theodore F. Vosseler. Brooklyn Girl Scouts were in Box 9 and high school students in Box 12.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 15 1940

STRAVINSKY HEARD IN A DOUBLE ROLE

The Russian Composer Plays and Directs Orchestra in His Own Works at Relief Concert

'DUMBARTON OAKS' GIVEN

Novelty Is Featured—Adele Marcus, 20 Members of the Boston Symphony Assist.

Igor Stravinsky, the eminent Russian composer, appeared as conductor and pianist in a concert devoted to his works, given yesterday afternoon at Town Hall, under the auspices of the Committee for Relief in Allied Countries, for the benefit of French musicians in distress because of the war. Adele Marcus, piano, and twenty musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were the assisting participants in a program which featured the "Dumbarton Oaks" concerto in E flat, that had its initial New York hearing on this occasion.

The four works performed were not presented in chronological order, but the earliest of them was the suite from the play "Histoire du Soldat" of 1917, for violin, double bass, clarinet, bassoon, trumpet, trombone and percussion. Next in date of composition came the octet for wind instruments of 1922, the remainder of the list being devoted to the two-piano concerto of 1935 and the "Dumbarton Oaks" novelty, written in 1938.

As it happened, the last-named opus was paired with the octet at the concert, these being followed in turn by the two-piano concerto and the "Histoire du Soldat" suite. The facts are worth mentioning because, whether accidentally or not, the series of offerings proved to be arranged exactly according to their musical value, the program closing with the most estimable contribution, the "Histoire du Soldat" suite.

Work Arouses Curiosity

Since all of the compositions scheduled were familiar here except the "Dumbarton Oaks," that work especially aroused curiosity. It was dedicated to Robert Woods Bliss and Mrs. Bliss of Washington, D. C., on the occasion of their thirtieth wedding anniversary, and named after their estate in that city, where it was first performed May 8, 1938, under Nadia Boulanger. Since then it has been conducted by its composer in Paris, London and Boston.

The "Dumbarton Oaks" concerto is scored for flute, clarinet, bassoon, two horns, two 'cellos, three violins and three violas. Played immediately after the octet for wind instruments, it proved to have a strong affinity to that creation, composed sixteen years earlier. Neo-classic, like the octet, it resembled that work in the banality of its thematic material and the artificiality and dryness of the development of the subject matter. As in the octet and practically all of Mr. Stravinsky's output since "Mavra," human feeling was banned and the insistence placed on the mere patterning and rhythmic qualities of the music as such.

In the first and last of the three movements, captioned "tempo giusto" and "con moto," respectively, the rhythmic element was particularly stressed, but the almost savage emphasis placed on it got nowhere because of the emptiness of the derivative basic ideas employed. The most intriguing parts of the work were the episode in the dance-like second movement (allegretto), in which the flute wove an elaborate contrapuntal embroidery about the main theme, and the concluding measures of the first and second movements, where almost as if by chance, the composer slowed down the music and gave it the human characteristic of introspection.

Audience Enthusiastic

It was not until the much more rewarding concerto for two pianos was reached that something of the composer's real genius became obvious. Mr. Stravinsky and Miss Marcus gave a searching and technically proficient reading of its tricky measures. But the climax of interest came with the playing of the "Histoire du Soldat" suite, which, if inferior when compared to Stravinsky's great works of his twenties, was easily the crowning achievement among the examples proffered, though all of them were magisterially scored for the instruments under consideration. Mr. Stravinsky conducted with a knowing hand, and all the performances were admirable in clarity and precision. An audience of good size was unboundedly enthusiastic.

N. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
MAR 16 1940

Mrs. Maxwell Lester Is Hostess Before Concert

Before the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert last night at the institute at the Academy of Music in Brooklyn, Mrs. Maxwell Lester entertained at dinner for Dr. and Mrs. Frank E. Simmons, Mr. and Mrs. James G. McDonald, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Hammitt and Jacob Klincke, the party attending the concert later as guests of Mrs. Simmons and Mrs. Lester, co-hostesses in Box 1.

The Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association box was occupied by Dr. and Mrs. William Slater, Mr. and Mrs. William Arnold, Miss Emma Jessie Ogg and Mr. and Mrs. Seymour Beardsley.

Mrs. Benjamin Prince was hostess in Box 3 to Mr. and Mrs. James C. McMullin, Mr. and Mrs. Karp Mikhalenkoff, Mr. and Mrs. Eric Hall Haight and Walter Golde. Box 2 was occupied by the guests of Mrs. Deane C. Osborne.

In the Army box were Mrs. Eley P. Denson, Mrs. Thomas Crystal, Miss Isabel Crystal, John Crystal, Mrs. Bert M. Lennon, Mrs. John N. Hopkins, Mrs. Chester A. Carlsten and Mrs. Walter A. Huntsberry.

Under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences the Brooklyn committee for Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society these concerts are now in their fifty-fourth season in Brooklyn.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL-AMERICAN
MAR 15 1940

Prokofieff's E Minor Concerto Played by Boston Symphony

By GRENA BENNETT.

The Boston Symphony brought a novelty to New York for its concert in Carnegie Hall last evening. On a day when Russian music and musicians were much in evidence, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the visiting band, gave the first local performance of Prokofieff's E minor Concerto with the celebrated 'cellist Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist. The composer had outlined an interesting share of the work for the assisting artist and Mr. Piatigorsky's performance was a fusion of plangent tone and glittering technique. The concerto is fashioned and harmonized on exotic patterns, the note sequences far removed from the expected; the fabric heterogeneous and ornamented with occasional small medallions of beautiful melody—a curious and unusual admixture of the modernistic with daring harmonies incorporated into the orchestral part. The work is difficult and its interpretation was a masterly endeavor by all concerned.

• • •

Igor Stravinsky appeared in the triple capacity of composer, conductor and pianist at Town Hall yesterday afternoon in a benefit concert for "French Musicians in Distress." In the presentation of a program of his own works he was assisted by Adele Marcus, pianist, and an ens[illegible] 21 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The event had been eagerly anticipated and a large and fashionable audience was present.

An octet for wind instruments was the first number played. The composer, so it seemed to this writer, remembered much that he had invented for the music of "Petrushka," with occasional new designs in inharmonic combinations and an adroitly devised fugue at its close. A second or perhaps third performance would give the auditor a clearer view of its architecture and message.

The Dumbarton Oaks Concerto was introduced as a medium for disclosing the splendid equipment of fifteen Boston musicians and the lucid conducting of the composer.

The concerto for two pianos, which came next, was shared by Miss Marcus and Mr. Stravinsky. Both are to be complimented for their strength of muscle and endurance. This was the impression of a work that was "all sound and fury signifying"—the power and resiliency of the pianists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
MAR 15 1940

PIATIGORSKY GIVES PROKOFIEFF SCORE

Boston Symphony Heard in Carnegie.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

It is seldom indeed that a soloist has as long a tour of duty as marked the appearance of Gregor Piatigorsky with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night. Save for the three and a fraction minutes that were required for Serge Koussevitzky to whip through Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" overture, Mr. Piatigorsky was audible and visible for all of the concert's length. Since he is not only a greatly talented 'cellist but also one of our better-looking musicians, Mr. Piatigorsky's presence was grateful in both ways.

Despite this, one was inclined to think wistfully about speeding the welcome guest during the first portion of the program, in which he was concerned with a new concerto for cello (in E minor) by Prokofieff. Considering the pleasure with which 'cellists would receive any worthwhile addition to their meager literature, it is not surprising that Prokofieff worked intermittently on this work from 1934 to 1938. What was surprising is its lack of salience, the absence either of the gritty, hard-bitten firmness of the first violin concerto, the challenging ingenuity of the third piano concerto, or even the pseudo-eloquence of the G minor violin concerto. There is always a reluctance to condemn a new work by a composer of demonstrated ability, but it would be a strange revelation indeed if a future performance proved the work either more substantial or persuasive than it sounded last night.

Strauss's 'Don Quixote.'

That Mr. Piatigorsky was in top form (save for an odd disposition to play out of tune every so often) was indicated not only by the facility with which he outlined Prokofieff's exhausting patterns, but even more by his playing of the solo 'cello part in Strauss's "Don Quixote." This is a work that might be called the 'cello player's "Hamlet," for it poses an almost equivalent range of expression, with a comparable latitude of interpretative liberty. From the first brash and foolish defiance of the windmills to the last tender, pitying gesture, Mr. Piatigorsky gave himself over wholly to the unpredictableness of the creature's nature. There have been performances of richer tonal variety and more mature eloquence, but this one had a full measure of those qualities together with a skill in small details that totaled to a masterpiece of tonal draughtsmanship. Technically it was of the first order.

It was, of course, the subtlety and richness of Mr. Koussevitzky's feeling for the orchestral score that permitted the soloist's creation to stand forth as it did. If the brasses brayed with a little too precise intonation for healthy sheep, they were inimitably mellow in the great climax of the third variation and brilliantly humorous in the tenth. Throughout the work there was a virtuosity of thought and action that persuaded one, at least for the time, that Strauss wrote no music of such quality before or since. Conductor, orchestra and soloists (which includes the admirable Jean Lefranc, violist, and Richard Burgin, violinist) were applauded at length.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 15 1940

—MUSIC OF THE DAY—

Koussevitzky Brings New Prokofieff Score

Piatigorsky Heard in First New York Performance of 'Cello Concerto

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Still another work of Prokofieff was given its first New York performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky in Carnegie Hall last night. This was his Concerto for violoncello in E Minor, Opus 58, completed in 1938. Gregor Piatigorsky was the soloist of the evening, heard in the Prokofieff and Strauss' "Don Quixote." In spite of wind, rain and one of the worst traffic snarls, the hall was crowded.

There will be some who will hail the new concerto as a clever technical feat. That it is. How musical the effort has been is another matter. After a first hearing, it becomes all the more urgent that we accustom ourselves to the new melodic intervals that are more and more creeping into contemporary music. This concerto has melody, but some would call it unmelodic melody, a contradiction in terms which somewhat characterizes the work as a whole. It has rhythmic interest so instrumented that the music is undoubtedly of the machine age. It has its moments, too, but last night they sounded more prosaic than poetic, more accidental than designed.

The work is in three movements: an Andante, an Allegro, and a Theme and Variations. The most felicitous section of the Andante comes in the closing measures where the 'cello assumes more of its natural quality as a singing instrument. The second theme of the Allegro has melodic appeal. After that comes a development section dominated by scraping rhythms. It is here that the 20th century locomotive style asserts itself. One is reminded of a trip on a streamliner—preferably with a steam locomotive—for the machine-like rhythm tunes in with wheels on steel roadbeds and the rest of railroad atmosphere. Here is music for the movies to use for background. The third movement has its monotony as well as a good cadenza for the 'cello, all neatly contrived.

Mr. Piatigorsky played the concerto in his brilliant and virtuoso style. The orchestra did as much. There was considerable applause, but more than likely it was for the soloist and the orchestra.

Strauss sounded "classic" after Prokofieff. The "Don Quixote" Variations grow increasingly interesting with a succession of superior performances. That of last night was stunning, especially final sections of the old knight's return to sanity and his death. But there is no space to discourse on the fascination of this score: its mastery of the medium was made apparent through much excellent playing.

The concert began with Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" in a spirited performance which sounded almost too incisively accented.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
MAR 15 1940

MUSIC

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, fourth evening concert of the season at Carnegie Hall yesterday, with Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist, as soloist in the following program:

Mozart....Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro."
Prokofieff....Cello Concerto in E minor, Op. 58. (First time in New York.)
Richard Strauss—Don Quixote, Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character, Op. 35.
Solo cello, Mr. Piatigorsky; solo viola, Jean Lefranc.

New Music From Russia

Had Serge Prokofieff been able to make his projected trip to America this winter he would have had three opportunities to bow in company with another eminent Serge of Russian origin during the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts in Carnegie Hall. One would have been in January, when Dr. Koussevitzky presented his familiar Classical Symphony; the second in February, when his second violin concerto had its local premiere in its original form, and the third last night, when his new cello concerto was heard by its first New York audience.

According to a Russian critic, Konstantin Kuznetzov, quoted in the program notes, Mr. Prokofieff began work on the concerto in 1934, but did not complete his first draft, using not more than half of the original material for the final version written in 1938. It was first played in Moscow in November of that year, and introduced to the United States by yesterday's interpreters in the Bostonians' home concerts of last Friday and Saturday.

* * *

The work consists of three movements, without formal intervening pauses. The first two reverse the usual order of tempi; an andante, in which the solo cello indulges in an almost continuous lyric meditation, preceding an allegro in sonata form. In the finale, Dr. Koussevitzky omitted a variation and an interlude, bringing the length of the performance to twenty-eight minutes.

Much of the music is in the unabashedly melodic vein which characterizes the second violin concerto. It also possesses much of the reflective and poetic seriousness which is to be found in the slightly earlier work. There is a greater element of contrast and, in the two latter movements, hints can be found of other qualities which have been associated with Mr. Prokofieff's music. Whimsicality marks a few measures here and there; the composer occasionally provides a delicately pungent blend of sonorities.

Although this is the composer's first contribution in this field, the new concerto gives an impression of familiarity with the technical and interpretative resources of the cello. The writing for the solo instrument favors its plangent higher tones rather than its deep-voiced lower register, but often has the length and flow of phrase and line in which the cello is most in its element. Opportunities for technical display are not lacking in the swift-paced second movement and in the grave, dignified cadenza, although the orchestra has a role of co-ordinate importance with the soloist.

* * *

While often imaginative and absorbing, the concerto is handicapped by a certain complexity of structure and deviousness of progress. Most of the themes have a melodic appeal, but, apart from one tune of a straightforward, frankly Russian character, lack saliency of outline. The scoring as a whole and the combination and contrast of the solo with the ensemble is wrought with uncommon skill, but sometimes suggests an excessive devotion to ingenuity and over-elaborated subtlety. It seemed that the composer had much to say, but could have said it more strongly in more direct and simple accents.

Gregor Piatigorsky

Solo 'cellist in last night's Boston Symphony Concert

Except for a few slight lapses in accuracy of intonation, Mr. Piatigorsky's playing deserved the highest praise for its wide-ranging color, clarity and ingratiating texture of tone, as well as for its technical mastery and realization of the expressive possibilities of the music. Similar qualities marked the work of the orchestra, which has been justly lauded too often to need further extensive encomiums.

Little can be said here about "Don Quixote," but each rehearing suggests that this work, among Strauss's longer tone poems, has the greatest share of the qualities which make for purpose, in its skill of characterization, its warmth and insight and essential humanity. Its expressive resources were well revealed in the notable interpretation of Mr. Piatigorsky, and, for the most part, in the excellent orchestral performance, despite an occasional inclination toward relatively deliberate tempi. The capacity audience bestwode enthusiastic applause upon all the participants.

* * *

Coincidence of intermissions prevented the reviewer from noting more than the presence of a large audience at last night's concert in the Carnegie Chamber Music Hall. Felix Robert Mendelssohn conducted the Mendelssohn String Orchestra in music by Mozart, Bach, Ernest Lubin, whose Suite in Olden Style was played for the first time, and Jensen. Milton Berman, violinist, and Hansy Book, soprano, who sang works of Schubert, Strauss and Rossini, were the soloists.

Own Works Led And Performed By Stravinsky

Composer and Musicians of Boston Orchestra in Concert at Town Hall

By Jerome D. Bohm

A program of compositions by Igor Stravinsky was given in Town Hall yesterday afternoon with the composer appearing in his dual capacity of conductor and pianist, with the assistance of Adele Marcus, pianist, and twenty-one members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program included the first local performance of the "Dumbarton Oaks" Concerto in E flat, penned in 1937-'38, which takes its name from the estate of Robert Woods Bliss, in Washington. The work was set forth for the first time anywhere at Dumbarton Oaks under the direction of Lily Boulanger on May 8, 1938.

This concerto, which is conceived for fifteen instruments, is the Russian composer's latest product and is a rather disheartening creation to have formed in the same mind that created "Petrouchka," "Oedipus Rex" and "Sacre du Printemps." It is, like the Octet for Wind Instruments, which preceded it on the program, in his neo-classic manner and is ideationally barren and totally unrewarding. Even such expert playing as that accorded it by the superb musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra could not make it palatable. Nor does the Octet improve on further acquaintance.

The second half of the afternoon brought more engaging facets of Mr. Stravinsky's art—the Two-Piano Concerto, which had been tellingly unfolded here earlier in the season by Celius Dougherty and Vincenz Ruzicka, and the incidental music to "Histoire du Soldat," which dates from a more fruitful period of Mr. Stravinsky's career. The concert, under the auspices of the Committee for Relief in Allied Countries, was well attended and cordially received.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

MAR 15 1940

Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall

By PITTS SANBORN.

It seems unlikely that a New York audience will be treated to many repetitions of the concerto for 'cello and orchestra in E minor by Serge Prokofieff, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, introduced to New York at Carnegie Hall last evening. This though a more persuasive performance than the work was accorded by Gregor Piatigorsky and the superb band surely couldn't be imagined.

The obstacle lies in the concerto itself, begun by the Russian composer in 1934 and completed in 1938. It is by no means one of his stimulating works. Still, it possesses the merit of brevity, long drawn out though the finale may appear to be.

Three continuous movements constitute the concerto—an Andante assai, lyric in character, which is little more than an introduction to the ensuing Allegro giusto, in sonata form. That leads into the concluding Allegro, a theme and variations that would provide ample excuse for William IV's historic observation about variations.

That the concerto has mood is plain enough, mood of a rather dreary and dejected sort, and the harmonic treatment, only sparingly "modernistic," and the instrumental procedure are not without points of interest, but the thematic invention is weak, and the rest of the story is not important enough to dissemble that essential lack. After the performance the soloist was recalled a number of times.

Besides the novelty, the program offered Mozart's Marriage of Figaro overture as salutatory, and the Don Quixote of Richard Strauss, as valedictory. The overture had plenty of spirit, but the dynamic contrasts were extreme, owing in part to the employment of the full body of strings. Don Quixote is one Strauss piece that we don't hear often enough. The solo 'cello was played by Mr. Piatigorsky, the solo viola by Jean Lefranc.

Town Hall Concert.

Of the many purposes served by the concert given in the Town Hall yesterday afternoon two were outstanding. The first had to do with the benefit nature of the event—it was in aid of French musicians in distress, the second with the fact that Igor Stravinsky's Dumbarton Oaks Concerto had its local premiere.

Mr. Stravinsky was everywhere at once. He conducted a group of musicians from the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three of his own works, including the Dumbarton Oaks piece, named after the Robert Woods Bliss estate in Washington, D. C., and together with Adele Marcus offered his Concerto for Two Pianos Soli.

The novelty, one hazards a guess, belongs in the category of Stravinsky compositions that have fallen fictim to "neo-classical economy." It is polyphonic, what chords there are arising out of the flow of the lines. It is dissonant, and why wouldn't it be with the aforesaid lines running helter-skelter, unmindful of tonal clashes? It is intellectual—not too much so—because it is steeped in experimentation. And it is often dull and uncommunicative.

The number is written for flute, clarinet, bassoon, two horns, three violins, three violas, two 'cellos and two basses. Of course, it had an accurate performance—or so it seemed. Evidently Mr. Stravinsky got all the effects he wanted from the musicians, for his face was wreathed in smiles at its conclusion. R. O. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

MAR 15 1940

ALL-STRAVINSKY CONCERT IS GIVEN AT TOWN HALL

By Samuel Chotzinoff

An all-Stravinsky concert was given at Town Hall yesterday afternoon under the auspices of the Committee for Relief in Allied Countries. From the crowded appearance of the hall it was obvious that relief in Allied Countries was a considerable gainer by the effort. It is presumed that not alone Mr. Stravinsky's music, but the presence as well of the composer as conductor and pianist attracted the capacity audience.

Words and Music

Assisted by Miss Adele Marcus and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Stravinsky presented his "Octet for Wind Instruments," the "Dumbarton Oaks Concerto in E Flat," the Concerto for two pianos and the music from the play "Histoire du Soldat."

The "Dumbarton Oaks" was a first New York performance. The title, you will be surprised to learn, holds no esoteric implication. "Dumbarton Oaks" is merely the estate of Mr. R. W. Bliss in Washington, and it was there that the concerto was first performed in the Spring of 1938. Scored for flute, clarinet, bassoon, 2 horns, 3 violins, 3 violas, 2 cellos and 2 double basses, the chamber composition is in three movements, played, if I remember, without pause.

Poses Knotty Problem

But how to describe the "Dumbarton Oaks" as music? Shall the critic resort to the historical method, the psychological or the psycho-analytical? One hardly knows. A first hearing of a modern work by a modern master poses a knotty problem. Suppose the composition seems a wearisome affair unrelieved by a spark of inspiration. Shall the critic say so and risk the possibility that future generations will cherish it as a classic, as we now cherish Beethoven's Fifth Symphony? I can almost see before me a page out of some reference book of 1990. "Dumbarton Oaks Concerto," it will say, "now a staple of the concert hall was, believe it or not, dismissed after its first performance in the following words by the smug and ignorant reviewer of a New York daily: 'Mr. Stravinsky's concerto harps eternally on a driving and repetitive rhythm.

It says nothing that the composer had not said before, and what it says is not of the slightest importance. Sometimes it goes back to Bach. But it doesn't go far enough back. It does not astonish with its acrid harmonies, because acrid harmonies are old hat now. It is just a succession of notes and note patterns which have no apparent relation to the human heart and imagination. It is only another opus in the series fabricated by the composer since he exhausted his talent and began, like George Sand's little pet, to chase his tail.'"

But of course the future reference book will contain no such quotation since I am no Hanlsick (who was foolish enough to misunderstand the significance of Wagner.) I do, therefore, stoutly maintain that "Dumbarton Oaks" is a great work which brings its composer yet another step forward in his search for absolute objectivity and pure form, and that the new piece profoundly affected yesterday's audience. The other great works on the program made, I may add, a like impression. Fervent applause greeted the cessation of each composition, the efforts of the members of the Boston Symphony, and Miss Adele Marcus, who co-operated cleverly with Mr. Stravinsky in the Concerto for two pianos.

Piatigorsky Is Soloist With Boston Symphony

The Russian cellist, Gregor Piatigorsky, was soloist with Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night, giving the first local performance of one of his compatriot's works, the E minor Concerto, Opus 58, of Prokofieff. In addition to this, he was soloist with Jean Lefranc, violinist, in Strauss's "Don Quixote." Dr. Koussevitzky opened the program with the overture to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro."

In the new concerto, Mr. Prokofieff puts his more serious foot forward and restrains his customary wit and high spirits until the final movement, which is in the form of a theme and variations; and the preliminary andante and succeeding allegro are rather archaic in character, and not a little suggestive of Milhaud.

Mr. Piatigorsky's playing of the concerto breathed Russian sentiment and was extravagantly vital, as it always is; but he carried on a somewhat oriental flirtation with the true pitch which seemed at variance with the essential severe character of the work.

The cellist's virtuosity, however, was given greater scope in the "Don Quixote," shining resplendently throughout a transcendental performance.

O'G.

Transcript March 16 '40

Union Pressure?

An Unpleasant Rumor Concerning the Symphony and the Musicians' Union

By EDWARD DOWNES

There was considerable excitement in New York and Boston this week over rumor that for the nth time the Musicians' Union was moving against the Boston Symphony Orchestra—the only non-union major symphony orchestra in America. This time the union was said to have notified the Victor Recording Company that, on the expiration of its present contract with the Boston Symphony, they must use union musicians, or no union members would ever make Victor recordings.

There was consternation in New York and Boston, both among friends of the union and of the Boston Symphony. For should such a demand have been made, it would be tantamount to notifying the Victor Company that the Boston Symphony must either unionize or stop making records. And this in turn would amount, practically speaking, to a flat demand that the Victor Company stop recording the Boston Symphony.

A Question of Income

The income of the Boston Symphony from records is put at around $25,000 or one quarter of its total deficit. To deprive the orchestra of this source of income would mean a serious additional burden to the gallant work of the Friends of the Boston Symphony who strive each year to meet the Symphony's deficit. It would be a destructive act.

Some years ago the Boston Symphony stopped broadcasting over the radio. Well-informed sources linked the name of the Musicians' Union with the action. It cost the Boston Symphony $25,000 of annual income.

Now the Musicians' Union has never made any secret of the fact that it would like the Boston Symphony to be "organized." And the Boston Symphony, while it has been extremely reticent on the subject, has given the distinct impression that it was doing very well, thank you, on a non-union basis. Since the Boston Symphony is regarded by many musicians as the finest orchestra in the world, unionizing it would hardly seem to serve an artistic purpose.

It is questionable too whether the financial position of Boston Symphony musicians would be improved by unionization, for they receive the highest average annual salary of any orchestra in the country, which probably means in the world. This is not due to their high weekly wage, but to the length of their season, which an efficient management has been at great pains to extend. To quote Margaret Grant and Herman Hettinger in their new book, "America's Symphony Orchestras and How They Are Supported":

"The superb 'merchandising' of the regular symphony season, the ten weeks of "Pop" concerts, the Esplanade and the Berkshire series over a period of time have enabled this organization (the Boston Symphony) to pay the highest average annual wage with a relatively low weekly average for a long season, to produce its concerts at a lower average cost per concert, and to earn a higher proportion of its budget than any other major orchestra. But it should be noted that this accomplishment has been largely facilitated by the absence in Boston of the inflexibility imposed by the usual union agreement."

The absence of such inflexibility also enables the Boston Symphony to make records at about half the expense involved for a union orchestra. This fact together with the desirability of the Boston Symphony product resulted last year in our Symphony's making 96 records while another top ranking eastern orchestra made only 16.

A usually reliable source of information tells us that it was the union contractor for that orchestra who, wishing to prevent a non-union competitor from doing so much of the profitable record business took up the matter with the Musicians Union.

Pressure on Whom?

What the response of the union may have been it is hard to say. Leonard Lyons stated categorically last week in the New York Post that the union already had notified the Victor Co. that only union musicians could be used after the expiration of the present contract with the Boston Symphony. Mr. Lyons is unable to reveal the source of his information, but assures us it is unimpeachable. Our own sources tell us that pressure has been brought to bear. The Victor Company when asked, did not deny they had received such a warning. Nor has the union, as far as we know, issued any denial.

It would be regrettable if any such demand had been formulated upon the Victor Company. Friends of unionism in general and of the Musicians Union in particular will hope that it has not. Clearly, more constructive ways of increasing the union's prestige could be found than making life more difficult for one of the most distinguished artistic institutions of the country and by forcing on it an arrangement that is to the advantage neither of the orchestra nor of the players themselves.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

MAR 16 1940

Boston Symphony Concert Heard By Large Audience; Dinner Is Given by Mrs. Lester

The season's fourth borough concert in a series of five by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music before a capacity audience.

Many attended the concert with guests. Mrs. Maxwell Lester gave a dinner and later entertained her guests in Box 1 at the Academy, where Mrs. Frank E. Simmons was co-hostess. In the party were the Rev. Dr. Frank E. Simmons, Mr. and Mrs. James G. McDonald, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Hammitt and Jacob Klincke.

The Adelphi Academy Association Box was occupied by Mr. and Mrs. William Slater, Mr. and Mrs. William Arnold, Miss Emma Jessie Ogg and Mr. and Mrs. Seymour Beardsley.

Mrs. Benjamin Prince was hostess in Box 3. With her were Mr. and Mrs. James C. McMullin, Mr. and Mrs. Karp Mikhalenkoff, Mr. and Mrs. Eric Hall Haight and Walter Golde. Box 2 was occupied by the guests of Mrs. C. Osborne.

In the Army box were Mrs. Eley P. Denson, Mrs. Thomas Crystal, Miss Isabel Crystal, John Crystal, Mrs. Bert M. Lennon, Mrs. John N. Hopkins, Mrs. Chester A. Carlster and Mrs. Walter A. Huntsberry.

The Brooklyn Woman's Club was represented in Box No. 4 by Mrs. Oliver G. Carter, Mrs. Jason Davis, Mrs. Edwin Patterson, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Wilson Briggs Zimmer, Mrs. Frederic W. Burbank, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives and Mrs. Theodore F. Vosseler.

The Council for the Brooklyn Girl Scouts took Box No. 9 for musically gifted Girl Scouts, while in Box No. 12 were leaders and members of high school student orchestras in Brooklyn and Queens.

A review of the concert, conducted by Dr. Serge Kousevitzky, will be found in another section of this edition of "The Brooklyn Citizen." The appearances of the orchestra here are sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, James G. McDonald, president; the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, H. Huntington Woodman, chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee, Mrs. Henry J. Daveport, executive chairman.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

Transcript March 16

Already the third week's series of concerts to be given at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, has met with a remarkable response, according to a report today from the trustees. The season has been extended this year from two to three weeks. That the Festival's concerts at Tanglewood (between Lenox and Stockbridge) will have an unusual appeal not only because of the programs, but because of world conditions, is indicated by early applications for subscriptions. Advance reservations for all nine concerts show that the Festival Shed has been sold out at this date to a third of its capacity.

Recently the Festival mailed announcements concerning the third week of concerts to all its members. Already more than half have responded and a third of them have indicated their desire to avail themselves of the membership privilege for the third week.

Program Details

During the opening week of the Festival the programs will include works by Beethoven, Schumann, Sibelius, Schubert, Brahms, Prokofieff, Ravel, Stravinsky and Roy Harris.

For the second week there will be a Tchaikovsky Festival, celebrating the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth. Artur Rodzinski will conduct one of the programs. Albert Spalding will be a soloist at another.

Dorothy Maynor, talented Negro soprano, will appear with the orchestra the third week. The program will include works by Brahms, Haydn, Wagner, Hindemith and Bach's B Minor Mass, with the Festival Chorus from the Berkshire Music Center.

Interest in Music Center

Similarly the orchestra reports enthusiastic interest in its Berkshire Music Center opening at Tanglewood, July 8, and continuing through the period of the concerts, the first three weeks in August. More than 275 applications have been received to date.

The first 200 applications received for admission to the Berkshire Music Center bear witness to fine backgrounds and varied experience of the prospective students.

Among the first 200, men predominate—111 men to 89 women. About half of the applicants, 102, are under 25 years of age; 29 are between 25 and 30 years; 45 are between 35 and 40 years; 24 are over 40.

Twenty-three States are already represented among the applicants who come from the finest schools of music: 25 have been students at the New England Conservatory; 20 at Juilliard; 15 at Eastman; 12 at the Cleveland Institute of Music; 8 at the Curtis Institute; 8 at the Longy School; 6 at Oberlin; 4 at the American Conservatory of Chicago; a number at the Salzburg Mozarteum, the American Conservatory at Fontainebleau, the Royal College of Music in London, the Cincinnati Conservatory and several others. Three-fourths of the applicants are either college students or have attended college.

Half Are Professionals

About half of the applicants are already in the musical profession: teachers, directors and supervisors of music, orchestral and choral conductors, composers and arrangers, pianists, singers, organists, symphony orchestra players. The other half are music students and amateurs with an interest in music and some musical education. Some of these amateurs are members of the legal, medical and engineering, as well as other, professions, but have retained an active interest in the field of music.

Dr. Koussevitzky's class in orchestral conducting is bringing many applications from the best qualified graduates of the outstanding music schools. Only those are eligible who can meet the minimum requirements: a knowledge of the technique of composition — form, harmony, counterpoint, fugue and instrumentation; ability to transpose at sight and to play the piano and one or more orchestral instruments. It is also considered desirable for applicants to have had some experience in conducting and that they be, generally, not over 35 years of age. In addition, they must be well recommended by former teachers or directors of musical institutions in which they have studied.

Catalogs of the Berkshire Music Center will be sent upon application to Margaret Grant, secretary of the Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass.

Information about the Berkshire Symphonic Festival will be sent upon application to the office at Stockbridge or the New York office at Steinway Hall, 113 West 57th street. The Berkshire Hills Conference, Pittsfield, will be glad to answer inquiries about living accommodations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

MAR 16 1940

Music Notes

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard In Concert Here

Capacity Audience and Many Standees at Academy of Music

By PAUL J. BROWN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, played in the Brooklyn Academy of Music last night for the fourth of its five scheduled concerts of the Brooklyn season and gave an excellent, exhuberant and interesting performance. A capacity audience and many standees were, in turn, most attentive and then fervently enthusiastic over the program and the performance, although there was a mixed reaction over the second number, Stavinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist. The program opened with Mozart's Symphony in C major, No. 34, and closed with Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D major.

The mixed reaction to the Stravinsky performance seemed to be a dissatisfaction with the music, but full satisfaction with the playing of Mr. Sanroma, who, also with the Boston orchestra, played the work the first performance it was given in America. Mr. Sanroma deserved full praise for his light-fingered virtuosity, which the fantastic Stravinsky harmonics demand. On the other hand, the Capriccio is far from being great music.

The chief criticism of the concert should be of the traditional Koussevitzky flouting of tradition, in presenting the Mozart work first. Certainly the Stravinsky work seemed puny after it, but in a lesser degree so did the Brahms symphony, which, although a masterpiece, couldn't change the fact that ll that was post-Mozartian was anticlimatic.

The orchestra's playing of the Mozart symphony was superb; that of the Stravinksy Capriccio was at least equal to the music. The playing of the Brahms symphony, by far a less coherent work than the Mozart, was correspondingly less certain. But the whole evening was one of full-bodied and vibrant music, rather exhausting in a complimentary sense.

March 17

Boston Orchestra

Die großen Momente im New Yorker Muſikleben ſind ſpärlich geſät: aber als geſtern bei dem Konzert des Boſton Symphony Orcheſtra unter Serge Kouſſevitzky nach dem Spielen der „Mathis, der Maler"-Symphonie von Paul Hindemith Komponiſt und Dirigent den ſtürmiſchen Beifall eines vollen Hauſes in der Carnegie Hall entgegennehmen konnten, glaubte man Muſikgeſchichte zu erleben. Soweit man die geiſtige Arbeit eines Orcheſterleiters für den Tondichter auch phyſiſch erfühlen kann, war dies geſtern der Fall, demonſtriert an einem Werk, das für New York keineswegs neu iſt. Klemperer hat es vor Jahren ſchon mit den Philharmonikern geſpielt und im Vorjahr hat ſich Arthur Rodzinſki mit dem NBC Symphony Orcheſtra am Rundfunk für die Breitenwirkung der Symphonie bemüht.

Zeitgenöſſiſche Muſik — ſoweit überhaupt etwas dahinter ſteckt — hat das eine Kennzeichen: man muß ſie mehrere Male hören, ehe ſie ſich einem voll erſchließt. Das gilt für eins der bedeutendſten Werke des letzten Jahrzehnts, wie es die Hindemith'ſche Symphonie iſt, ganz beſonders. Die drei Sätze, inſpiriert von den Flügeln und der Predella des Iſenheimer Altars, dem größten Werk des Matthias Grünewald, den Hindemith in den Mittelpunkt der Symphonie und einer inzwiſchen fertiggeſtellten Oper geſtellt hat, ſind gläubig-ekſtatiſche Muſik im beſten Sinne. Es wäre mehr darüber zu ſagen, als hier möglich iſt, wo die interpretatoriſche Arbeit Kouſſevitzkys in erſter Linie gewürdigt werden ſoll.

Zunächſt tut Kouſſevitzky eins: er glättet manches in der Inſtrumentierung des Werks, ſo daß die lineare Struktur deutlicher hervortritt. Er läßt ſich nie von den gewaltigen Klangeffekten, der üppigen Farbengebung Hindemiths berauſchen, die für dieſe immer nur logiſche Entwicklung ſeiner Themen, nicht Selbſtzweck ſind. So erhält der erſte Satz, „Konzert der Engel" genannt, jene Ruhe und innere Verhaltenheit; der zweite, „Grablegung", jene faſt expreſſioniſtiſche Deutlichkeit des Leidens, das uns aus einer anderen Welt ergreift; der dritte, „Die Verſuchung des hl. Antonius", ſchließlich, die kühne, leidenſchaftliche, durch einen an Brucknerſche Symphonik gemahnenden hymniſchen Schluß, jene Krönung und Gefühlsverdichtung, die man faſt als einen Verſuch auslegen möchte, die Grenzen der Künſte zu verſchieben.

Einzelheiten innerhalb dieſes gewaltig konſpizierten Werkes zu erwähnen, iſt unmöglich; genug, daß man einen erneuten Beweis für die Lebenskraft der Muſik unſerer Tage bekommt, an der man manchmal zweifeln möchte.

Um Hindemiths Werk hatte Kouſſevitzky die 1. Symphonie Beethovens und in einem früheren Abendkonzert bereits geſpielte franzöſiſche Stücke — Faurés „Pelléas et Mélisande"-Suite, Debuſſys „Nachmittag eines Faun" und Ravels 2. „Daphnis und Chloe"-Suite — gruppiert: erſtere ſo vorgetragen, daß ſich die Fröhlichkeit Haydns und Strenge Beethovens zu einer Einheit band, die den ſpäteren Beethoven ahnen ließ; letztere mit dem rechten Sinn für die von ſo eigenwitziger Senſibilität durchzuckte Muſik wiedergegeben.

H. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 16 1940

—MUSIC OF THE DAY—

Boston Symphony Plays Stravinsky

Sanroma Heard in 'Capriccio' Conducted By Koussevitzky at Fourth Academy Concert

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Had it not been for the superb performance of his Capriccio for Orchestra with Piano Solo, Stravinsky would not have been the chief topic of conversation during the intermission of the Boston Symphony concert at the Academy of Music last night. But the performance was so forceful and the playing of Jesus Maria Sanroma, the soloist, so remarkable an exhibition that the audience buzzed with opinions regarding this contemporary music. The lovely Mozart Symphony in C Major, No. 34 (K 338), which opened the concert, was accepted and brushed aside in consequence. Stravinsky, however, bowed in turn to Brahms whose Second Symphony was so sympathetically interpreted that it dominated the evening.

In the decade that has passed since Stravinsky wrote his Capriccio, contemporary music has gained more than a foothold in the public imagination. There was a tendency to approach this work with more tolerant appraisal than that encountered when it was first introduced to America by Koussevitzky almost ten years ago.

With due respect to likes and dislikes, this music reflects the age in which it was written. It is a child of the 20th century. As such, it gives expression to that pulsating quality which has made rhythm the chief element in musical composition for more than a quarter century. Every listener must admit, even begrudgingly, that the rhythmic character of this music is stunning. This goes hand in hand with an intellectual and realistic approach to sound, hardly poetic, mostly prosaic.

Granted this summation, then, the music takes on new interest with repeated hearings. Young ears will respond to its rhythmic urge more readily than those conditioned by the melodically-wrought harmonies of music of an earlier date. Put it down to sheer virtuosity, but, if nothing else, the work is a brilliant technical achievement, even though it exploits the percussive aspect of the piano and calls for steel-like fingers and riveting precision from the soloist.

The Mozart Symphony was beautifully played, with a delicacy and a style indicative of this great orchestra at its best. While the horns bobbled a bit in the first movement of the Brahms, the playing was of a superior order.

* * *

'CARMEN' FOR A DAY

Gladys Swarthout essayed her first Carmen at the Metropolitan yesterday afternoon in a special performance for the benefit of the Music School of Henry Street Settlement. She swaggered through the part giving evidence of excellent coaching, both in singing and in acting, but not once during the afternoon did Carmen emerge as the famous character she is. Technically, Miss Swarthout did a great deal that was good, but there was no apparent connection between all this and the essential flesh and blood that makes Carmen one of the great operatic personalities.

It was not a particularly happy performance but it had its brighter moments; such as, Martinelli's third act finale, Licia Albanese's appealing third-act Micaela (the best impression she has made this year), Ezio Pinza's familiar Escamillo, the toreador; Thelma Votipka's Frasquita and Helen Olheim's Mercedes. Mr. Pelletier conducted an indifferent orchestral performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 17 1940

HINDEMITH WORK CONCERT FEATURE

Koussevitzky, Leading Boston Symphony, Gives Excerpts From Opera 'Mathis'

OFFERS BEETHOVEN MUSIC

Compositions of Faure, Ravel and Debussy Are Also on Carnegie Hall Program

By OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall one of their superlative concerts which seem to represent nearly the limit of brilliancy and eloquence which a modern conductor and a peerless orchestra can expect to attain.

The particular feature of this concert was the performance of the "symphony" which Paul Hindemith, who was present on this occasion, has taken from his opera, "Mathis der Mahler"—ultra-modern music, of a texture which would have been wholly incomprehensible to a general musical gathering twenty-five years ago, and which received on this occasion the exceptionally enthusiastic applause of the audience.

In fact, few programs could have illustrated as this one did the breath-taking rapidity with which the language of music itself changes, as also the receptivity to new musical idioms of the human ear. Not only was the reception of the symphony cause for remark. There was also the fact that three works by Faure, Debussy and Ravel, which made the last half of the program, were unknown in America at the turn of the century; that two of them, Debussy's "L'Apres-midi," introduced here in 1902, and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" suite, first heard here in 1917, were subjects of hot controversy, and are now acknowledged classics, familiar and everywhere popular, of the orchestral repertory.

Beethoven Symphony Given

Nor was Beethoven's First Symphony, which opened this concert, a work easy for our forefathers to swallow. Even today, its masculinity and its new vigor, which may well have perturbed the conservatives of 1800, are apparent. Only in the finale, played with delightful virtuosity and esprit, is there little actual distinction between the manner of Beethoven and the manner of Haydn.

But Hindemith's symphony, where music novel to us is concerned, was the apex of the concert.

This symphony "Mathis the Painter," taken from the opera, whatever its dramatic derivations or purposes, is to be estimated in the concert hall on the basis of its inherent value as pure music. As music itself it must be accounted one of the most important works to have come from Hindemith's pen. There are many questions about it that may easily remain unanswered after one or after half a dozen hearings. Is, for example, the harmonic quality of this score consonant with the harmonic implications of the chorale themes which form the basis of the symphonic structure? Will these developments be seen in years to come as a genuine burgeoning of a new musical expression from the roots of the ancient melodies, or will there be a striking divergence between the inherent nature of the chorale-tunes and the nature of the music with which Hindemith has dressed them?

Will this music be seen as a strikingly individual expression of a modern direct descendant of plain chant and Protestant chorale; the fusing of these elements in a new idiom of today; and the heritage of the practices of Father Bach and the German music of centuries?

The symphony, beyond doubt or peradventure, is the writing of a master, with his own matured devices, his own style and the unmistakable expression of an exceptional creative vitality. The themes bear his stamp. Processes of development which can be sensed more quickly than they can be definitely analyzed begin to occur as soon as the orchestra commences. There is a remarkable development of form.

The word "form" can have here two meanings, the one that of structure, the other that of harmonic relationships. In this music is the presence of a "form" built upon the most substantial groundwork of tonality and the relationship of tones above a bass, and of a linear "form" in the proportions and inter-relations of the different parts of the symphonic structure.

The music is charged with feeling. It has a Gothic tension and a certain severity of manner, color, accent eminently suggestive of the medieval. It is dramatic as medieval architecture and painting were dramatic, and often wildly imaginative, behind severe surfaces. There is sequence of mood: the serenity, the joyousness and affirmation of the opening movement ("Angelic Concert"); the solemnity and the mystical devoutness of the second, designated in the score as "The Entombment," which is an intermezzo in the final scene of the opera; and then the proud symphonic arch and the intensity of drama which precedes the culminating statement of the triumphant chorale. These, we are told, are divisions of an opera. In the guise of yesterday, they are three parts of a symphonic tryptich, inspired by the altar-pieces of Grunewald at Colmar, so integrated and inter-related that one wonders whether the symphony did not come first, with an opera—and a long one, lasting four hours and a half in performance—built upon it.

Interpretation of Work

There is no doubt that the quick response of the audience was to the music as such. At the same time, it is questionable whether the music would have struck the audience so forcibly had it not been for the interpretation, which was one more instance of Koussevitzky's unparalleled intuition and understanding of modern masters. Music of this character evidently constitutes a challenge which is exciting in the highest degree to the most modern minded of living conductors. The significance of its interpretation is perhaps also the explanation of the varying character of performances of familiar music of an earlier date which Koussevitzky gives from time to time. A composition, for him, may require the intellectual element so prominent in this score of Hindemith, or the lure of the mysterious or exotic or unknown, for Koussevitzky to put forth all his astonishing powers.

The early Sibelius, the Strauss of the end of the last century? He may seek in them something which he cannot completely find. Koussevitzky is certainly, perhaps pre-eminently, a musician of his epoch, one with the rarest understanding of its innermost tendencies, and the full technical, sensuous and intellectual equipment to bring these elements to complete expression. Another question of yesterday: What opinion will we have of the "Mathis" symphony when it becomes better known and subject to the ministrations of good, bad or indifferent conductors? Mr. Hindemith must have reflected, as he bowed to an exultant audience after the performance, that he hardly hoped for another such interpretation of his score elsewhere.

For the reason that "Mathis" has carried us far, and that the interpretations heard yesterday of Fauré, Debussy and Ravel are no longer news—having been given very recently by the same conductor and orchestra—they are to be dismissed here with mention. But they constituted unforgettable experiences to those who heard again a leader and an orchestra unmatched in their exposition.

FRENCH AMBASSADOR AT CONCERT
Shown at Symphony Hall last night are, left to right, Serge Koussevitsky, Lily Pons, Governor Saltonstall and Count Rene Doynel de Saint-Quentin.

GALA CONCERT STIRRING EVENT

French Charities Aided at Symphony Hall

Post March 16

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is difficult to decide whether to review the affair which took place at Symphony Hall last evening as a musical, a social or (from the French point of view) a patriotic occasion. In point of fact, it was all three combined. Billed as a gala benefit concert—it was designed to aid the local French war charities—it enlisted the services, given gratuitously, of Dr. Koussevitzky and most of the Symphony Orchestra, of Lily Pons and of the Boston pianist, George Copeland. There was also a film which depicted the celebration in Paris on July 14th, last, in commemoration of the 150th anniversary of the fall of the Bastille. In the audience, besides Boston notables and fashionables, were the French ambassador, the French consul and the Governor of this Commonwealth. One might add that the arm of the law was represented in the corridors as it seldom is at musical events, that the hall was draped with the flags of France and the United States and that the more important guests sat in the balconies in what purported to be boxes.

Certainly it was no time for the music critic to exercise his critical functions, yet there was little of which he could not approve. The programme, needless to say, was entirely French. The orchestra played marches by Saint-Saens, Planquette and Ganne, as well as the "L'Arlesienne" Suite, No. 1, of Bizet. Accompanied by Frank La Forge, Miss Pons sang a miscellany of French songs and "Je suis Titania," from "Mignon." Mr. Copeland, long a specialist in French music, played compositions by Ravel, Debussy and Chabrier. However you looked at it, the evening was one long to be remembered.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
MAR 17 1940

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Orchestra Here

Presents Hindemith Symphony, 'Mathis der Maler,' in Carnegie Hall Concert

One is grateful to Serge Koussevitzky for permitting local lisenters to hear his interpretation with the Boston Symphony Orcnestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon of Hindemith's symphony, "Mathis der Maler." This work, one of the indubitable master creations of modern music, is drawn from the German composer's opera of the same name. The first movement, "Angelic Concert," is the overture to the stage work; the second movement, "The Entombment," provides the intermezzo to the final scene, and the final movement, "The Temptation of St. Anthony," appears as its sixth scene. All three movements have been inspired by the Isenheim Altar Piece of the sixteenth-century German painter, Matthias Grünewald.

Hindesmith's telling utilization of old church melodies, and of liturgical modes, along with his superb individual contrapuntal resoursefulness, are the material from which he has built a musical structure of moving, and, in the "Temptation of St. Anthony" movement, of overwhelming power. The ecstatic serenity of the "Angelic Concert," the elegiac tenderness of the "Entombment" give way to the seething imaginativeness and affecting nobility of the closing episode's peroration. Mr. Koussevitzky, aided by his magnificent players, gave a tonally gorgeous and compelling account of the score which is replete with original touches of instrumentation.

The program began with a tonally ingratiating but rather too objective a conception of Beethoven's First Symphony and brought, in its second half, three compositions which Mr. Koussevitzky had already set forth here last month: the suite from Faure's music to "Pelleas et Melisande," Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faune" and the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe."

J. D. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
MAR 17 1940

Karl Muck's Art

A Masterful Conductor of the Boston Symphony

To the New York Herald Tribune:

Certain critical observations in your article on the career of Dr. Karl Muck cannot be permitted to go unchallenged. It is distressing that the Herald Tribune, in its obituary notice, should belittle an artist of superlative distinction.

Those of us fortunate enough to have heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Karl Muck recall music played with such power, such freshness, such tingling and electrifying energy, such insight into the secrets of tonal design and color, that the picture of the conductor as a meticulous precisian "admirably suited to the quiet Boston culture" seems so far from the truth as to be invidious.

Muck was a precisian just as Toscanini is—in the sense that every detail must be right. He is the only conductor I ever heard of who invariably checked with his own eye the ninety-odd individual orchestral parts, to make sure they agreed in all particulars with the score and thus enable him to devote his rehearsal-time to music and not to notes. But his care of minutiae affected in no way his imaginative sense of the larger aspects of a composition.

He had, of course, his special excellences. If his interpretations of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven might on occasion have been thought unduly self-contained, that could never have been said of his Brahms, his Schumann, or his Franck. Only Nikisch and Mahler could rival him in the sheer intensity of his playing of the symphonies of Brahms, which glowed and throbbed under his baton, radiant with vitality. "Suited to the quiet Boston culture," indeed! Brahms, with Muck conducting, was so exciting that only the more decorous Bostonians could remain calm. Every one else itched to shout Bravo.

Muck divined and communicated the tenderness and buoyancy of Schumann as few can nowadays, and the serenity and exaltation of Franck. He knew and conveyed the ardors of Tchaikovsky and the splendors of the Strauss tone-poems. He was himself something of a Till Eulenspiegel, full of miching mallecho, malice and mischief—and a damnably sarcastic Prussian arrogance to boot—but his shortcomings as a man had nothing to do with his eminence as an artist. A Doctor of Philosophy, he was no academic conductor, but in simple truth a master of the art of music.

DONALD TWEEDY.
Danbury, Conn., March 15, 1940.

727

CONSIDERING TWO GREAT LEADERS

Post March 17

Dr. Koussevitzky and Dr. Muck Are Comparable

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

WHEN the present great conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra recently paid tribute to the greatest of his predecessors in a performance of the Allegretto from Beethoven's Seventh Symphony which the latter would have both approved and admired, there was reason to reflect upon the qualities of the two conductors and upon certain changes in Dr. Koussevitzky's conducting since his sensational Symphony Hall debut in October, 1924. Some of the poise and restraint of Dr. Muck have made their appearance in Dr. Koussevitzky's directing, nor can anyone say that anything truly valuable has been lost to it. Thus may we who hear him today count ourselves doubly fortunate.

Dr. Muck never heard a performance under the baton of his Russian successor. He did, however, confide to this reviewer in Munich, in the summer of 1926, that he understood Koussevitzky was a bit of a showman. Judged by his own platform in passiveness, that allegation was true in those days, though it would be far less applicable now. More secure of his place and position, Dr. Koussevitzky has today no need to heed the effect of himself or of the music upon his audience. He too can concentrate upon revealing the composer's message in the composer's own terms.

Great as Dr. Muck was in the music of certain composers, notably Beethoven and Wagner (his "Tristan" in the summer of 1926 transcended on the orchestral side anything in this writer's operatic experience), a lack of sympathy with the then modern musical trends and with much of the music from countries other than his own made his range of supreme eloquence, in his Boston days, narrower than that of Dr. Koussevitzky. He played the later Strauss, and Debussy and Tchaikovsky as one doing his duty toward the public but with an unavoidable objectivity of approach. The keynote of the man was mastery, musical and personal; mastery of himself, of his task and of the orchestra before him. Only through such absolute command and control could the performance above referred to have been accomplished, as he subsequently admitted, without rehearsal. His word for it was "improvised." More than most, he exemplified the adage that a conductor should have a heart of fire and a brain of ice.

If perchance Dr. Muck had a high regard for his musical accomplishments he would never let you suspect it. Asked once why he did not compose, he replied that as a young man he had written a symphony which won a prize and he forthwith decided that if his music was as bad as that he had better not write any more. The story is told that after a notable performance of the "Eroica" in Berlin he was congratulated by no less a Beethoven authority than Artur Schnabel, who wished to know just how the miracle was wrought. "Steht alles da," said Muck. In other words, "It's all in the score."

It is a pity that more Bostonians could not have known the Muck of post-war days. In some respects they would hardly have recognized him. An experience which might have embittered him seemed only to have made him gentler and more mellow. Largely gone was the old imperiousness. No one could have described his appearance as Mephistophelian, an adjective often heard of old. And to refer once more to the "Tristan," the only post-war performance that this reviewer was permitted to hear, there was a new warmth in his conducting as well. Thus in the twilight of his life, as leader of the Hamburg Symphony, as guest conductor from Copenhagen to Madrid and in his appearances at the Bayreuth and Munich summer festivals, he evidently reached his fullest flowering as artist. Yet but for Boston his fame would have been less, and but for him the Boston Symphony Orchestra would have waited much longer to be proclaimed the finest in the world.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
MAR 18 1940

Concerts of the Week End

On Saturday afternoon the Boston Symphony gave one of its really peerless concerts, with Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra superbly in the vein alike for the music of Beethoven, Faure, Debussy, Ravel and Hindemith. The symphonic triptych which Hindemith has evolved from his opera "Mathis der Mahler" was given a superlative performance, as Mr. Hindemith seemed fully to realize when he came forth to bow. The music had not previously made so strong an impression. But there was equally fine playing in Beethoven's First Symphony, Faure's "Pelleas et Melisande" suite, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
MAR 18 1940

Boston Symphony Plays Hindemith "Symphony"

Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the concluding concert of its fourth local visit Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The feature of the program was the "symphony" from Hindemith's opera "Mathis der Mahler." The remainder of the program offered music which the orchestra had played here earlier this season, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," incidental music to "Pelleas et Melisande" by Faure, and the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe."

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
MAR 19 1940

Hannikainen To Direct

Symphony Orchestra to Play for Finnish Relief

An orchestral group, composed of 60 members of Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present a concert under the baton of the famous Finnish conductor, Tauno Hannikäinen, at 8 o'clock March 31, in Mechanics Hall, for the benefit of Finnish relief.

Arrangements for the concert were made today by members of Finnish Aid Committee. Rev. Viljo Heiman of Finnish Lutheran Church, chairman of the committee, is in charge of arrangements.

Mr. Hannikainen is conductor of the Turku, Finland, Symphony Orchestra, and directed the Boston Symphony Orchestra in two concerts of Finnish music, Feb. 2 and 3, in Boston. Proceeds of the concerts were sent to Finland.

Mr. Heiman announced the Worcester concert would feature Finnish masterpieces with special emphasis on those of Sibelius. The program will be announced shortly.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, ILL.
STATE JOURNAL
MAR 20 1940

Announce Two Amateur Musical Club Attractions

Announcement of two of the outstanding attractions of the 1940-41 program of the Amateur Musical club-Community Concerts association was made by Mrs. Stuart Brown, president, at the tea held at the executive mansion yesterday afternoon, honoring winners of the annual piano students contest.

The association will present the Minneapolis symphony orchestra with Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor, and John Carter, young tenor of radio fame. Mitropoulos will serve as guest conductor for four concerts with the New York Philharmonic orchestra next season and also the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Mrs. Brown also announced plans for the annual membership drive which will be held the week of April 1 to 6, with the Music Shop as headquarters. Mrs. Ernest T. Jackson is general chairman. The drive will formally open with a luncheon for active members April 1 at the St. Nicholas hotel.

Winners of the piano students contest presented the musical program yesterday. They included Rosalinda Celletti, Earl Dryfoose, Janice Overaker, Olga Hooker, Ennio Celletti and Helen Jane Rush, winners in the respective grades.

At the tea which followed, Mrs. Brown and Miss Elberta Smith presided at the urns. The contest committee with Mrs. J. A. Canham, chairman, acted as hostesses.

MUSIC March 22

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky honored Howard Hanson, last November, by inviting the American composer to conduct his own Third Symphony at a pair of Boston Symphony concerts. This week Mr. Koussevitzky has doubled the distinction by repeating the work himself. The program begins with the Overture to Mozart's opera, "The Marriage of Figaro," and includes the Beethoven Fourth Symphony.

The afternoon concert was set ahead to Thursday, as is customary in Holy Week. There will be no change in the date of the evening performances, which will begin Saturday at 8:15.

When one first heard Hanson's Third Symphony, during a radio broadcast, the dominant impression was of a powerful score permeated with the influences of the Finnish genius, Jean Sibelius. That impression was confirmed last November and again yesterday. So pronounced are these influences that one hastens to point out it is no matter of an isolated reminiscence or two, but frequent Sibelian devices. Not for a moment would one imply that Mr. Hanson applied these devices consciously. Yet there they are, just as in the music of many past composers may be found the effects of strong creative personalities like Beethoven, Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Richard Strauss and Debussy.

Mr. Hanson's way of using the woodwind instruments in chromatic thirds, of contrasting them with cellos and double-basses, certain combinations of harmony bespeak Sibelius. So do his employment of brass and the upper strings, his fondness for sombre effects in low tones, and the prevalence of short melodic fragments worked into the fabric of the symphony. The kettledrum figure of the third movement has a strong affinity for that in the scherzo of the Sibelius E minor Symphony.

There is, of course, another side to Mr. Hanson's work that reveals his American temperament and at the same time eludes precise description, although it is most observable in certain twists of melody. Apart from these considerations, one must acknowledge the monumental form, the mastery of counterpoint and orchestration and above all the absolute grandeur of the way the whole thing sounds.

Conductor and orchestra were not far from perfection the afternoon through. If Hanson had the benefit of virtuosity, so did Mozart and Beethoven. The "Figaro" Overture bubbled and sparkled, every detail exactly in place and not a technical flaw from the first rustle of the strings to the last, transparent chords.

Mr. Koussevitzky's treatment of the Fourth Symphony—which ought to be done a good deal oftener than it is, by the way—may be called classical purity seasoned with individuality. His proportioning of the movements, the architectural logic with which they were unfolded was classical; the minute shadings of tempo, color, volume and rhythm must be attributed to the conductor's own imagination.

Compared to such a glowing re-creation, the familiar dictum that "the music should be played as the composer wrote it" is pedantic nonsense. Of course the substance of great music lies in the notes, but all music must inevitably be colored by the minds of those who play it.—
C. W. D.

HANSON'S SYMPHONY REPEATED

Post

March 22

Koussevitzky Gives Work Benefit of Fine Conducting

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Last autumn, when discussing American music with members of the press, Dr. Koussevitzky waxed particularly enthusiastic over the new Third Symphony of Howard Hanson.

HANSON'S WORK REPEATED

Then on Nov. 3 and 4 Mr. Hanson conducted in Symphony Hall the first concert performances of the work, only to be told by the reviewers that it was largely reminiscent of the matter and manner of Jean Sibelius.

Later, Dr. Koussevitsky himself introduced the score to New York and then, as though to say, "I'll show 'em," he decided to repeat it at the concerts of yesterday afternoon and tomorrow evening.

And now for second impressions. To begin with, the performance was a more eloquent one, although Mr. Hanson is more adept and experienced at conducting than most composers, and the work better integrated. Having recovered from the first surprise of hearing so many Sibelianisms and freed from the occupation of identifying and placing them, the listener could give more heed to the music itself.

As was said before, this Third Symphony, regardless of or perhaps because of its antecedants, is a more engrossing composition, in many respects, than its predecessors, the "Nordic" and the "Romantic."

No Special Enthusiasm

Mr. Hanson is here often impressive, if in no very original way. The fact that three of the four movements are in slow tempo results in eventual monotony, and, to repeat another earlier comment, the broad theme from the second movement, which reappears at the end, is on the commonplace side, but its use here makes for a certain kind of effectiveness.

The Symphony was well received, but there was no unusual demonstration in its favor.

In one sense, if not in another, Dr. Koussevitsky gave the Symphony the advantage of a favorable setting by placing ahead of it two works of a much earlier day, Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" and Beethoven's Fourth Symphony.

Captivatingly played, Mozart's sparkling preface to an opera which, unfortunately, we are not going to hear from the Metropolitan Company in its impending visit, made one wish for more of the same sort. Dr. Koussevitsky has of late turned his back on overtures in general, yet they remain the most satisfactory introduction to the average concert and there are plenty of fine ones. Beethoven's Fourth has always been one of Dr. Koussevitzky's happier adventures with the symphonies of that composer and the performance of yesterday was no exception to this rule.

March 22 C.S.M.

Dr. Koussevitzky Conducts Work Composer Introduced

By L. A. Sloper

Howard Hanson's Third Symphony, which had its first concert performances in Symphony Hall last November under the composer's direction, was repeated yesterday afternoon under Dr. Koussevitzky's baton. It will be heard again at the second concert of the nineteenth subscription pair, Saturday evening.

The repetition was a signal honor to this American composer. Few new works are played a second time in the season of their introduction. Moreover, it is commonly believed that when Dr. Koussevitzky turns over the first performance of a composition to its author or to the assistant conductor, he himself is not enthusiastic about it. But the Hanson Third was well received last fall, and its success perhaps stirred the conductor's interest.

Its repetition so soon was undoubtedly justified. It seemed to most of us in November easily the best of Dr. Hanson's symphonic product to date. There was natural interest in seeing what it would sound like in Dr. Koussevitzky's reading; especially in view of his recent elucidation of Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler."

⁂

But strangely enough, the result in the case of the Hanson work was far less illuminating. Either the composer's reading was the better, or the work could not stand the more revealing interpretation of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—embarrassing alternatives.

In any case, the outcome was not flattering to the symphony. The Sibelius influence which everybody thought he detected last fall was less conspicuous—and this under the direction of the world's leading exponent of the music of Sibelius. On the other hand, the first two movements took on a decidedly Tchaikovskyan aspect.

Since the score is romantic and emotional to begin with, this treatment did it no service. It emphasized, for one thing, the undistinguished nature of the thematic material, and the repetitiousness of its use. The balance of choirs was not carefully maintained, and muddiness of texture resulted. The second movement, moreover, was by no means tranquillo, and it seemed to stop without having been brought to a conclusion.

The Scherzo on a second hearing remains the most interesting of the four movements. Yet even here I felt that the theme announced by the kettledrum had lost something of its effect. The last movement, with its close which the composer intended to be "in a note of exultation and rejoicing," seemed rather theatrical.

⁂

Thus the performance tended, unhappily, to bring out a commonplaceness in the score, a want of true originality, individuality, and distinction. This was no doubt quite contrary to the intention of the conductor, who would hardly have undertaken the repetition if he could have foreseen such a result.

The concert opened with a performance of the Overture to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," which was taken at so quick a tempo as to stress its dynamic more than its lyrical aspect, and to advertise the virtuosity of the orchestra at the expense of the music.

This approach carried over into the first movement of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, which has been better played by Dr. Koussevitzky. But with the glorious slow movement, Beethoven triumphed, and the Scherzo and the Finale were superbly done.

Speaking of "Tristan and Isolde," young Edwin McArthur, Mme. Flagstad's protege, who will conduct Wagner's opera here on April 1, will not, as widely reported, be the first American-born conductor ever to lead a performance by the Metropolitan Opera Company. Nahan Franko, born in New Orleans in 1861, joined the Metropolitan Opera House orchestra in 1883, becoming in turn concertmaster, ballet-conductor and in 1905, full conductor. And speaking of Mr. McArthur, his recent New York debut as conductor in an all-Wagner concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra, with Mme. Flagstad as soloist, was coolly received by the New York critics, who granted him talent but protested his lack of experience, his inability to put it over.

On Friday evening the Bowdoin College Glee Club, Frederic Tillotson, director, will appear at Jordan Hall.

THE BOSTON HERALD, FRIDAY, MARCH 22, 1940

—19th Concert of Symphony Orchestra Season

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 19th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Mozart...Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"
Beethoven...Symphony No. 4 in B flat major Op. 60
Hanson....................Symphony No. 3

The chief glory of this concert lay in the performance of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony. From the orchestra we heard solo playing of exquisite finish and a consistently lovely sonority that is a physical joy to hear, even apart from the musical ideas themselves. Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation had a luminous quality—there is no other word for it—that enhanced the total effect.

Commentators often assume that the Fourth Symphony is neglected, but only by stretching a point can this be maintained today. Less epic in spirit than the Third or Fifth, it is full of dramatic surprises which must once have appeared shocking and are now purely delightful. Preceding the symphony came a beautifully precise performance of Mozart's Overture.

Mr. Koussevitzky's faith in the Hanson Third Symphony obliges those of us who did not like it before, to justify our animosity or change our mind. (We seem to recall an unfavorable opinion in these columns!) This much may be said: That Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of the score is incomparably more effective than the composer's and that the imitation of Sibelius, which was noted as an all-pervading fault, is chiefly confined to the first and last movements. Therein it consists in the aping of typically Sibelian, stylistic tricks, such as the running passages on the strings and the use of wood-wind and brass. At points you keep expecting the march of the finale of the Second Symphony to emerge.

These concessions aside, we cannot alter our opinion of this symphony. Surely no work ever so depended on the kettle-drums. They are almost never silent, so that, when they are handed a solo part in the scherzo, it is easy to imagine the sensations of the Emperor Jones. The andante sounds well enough, but it is banal music. We cannot, consequently, be vastly impressed when Mr. Hanson doubles back and produces it triumphantly as the climax of his finale.

The concert will be repeated on Saturday night. Next week Igor Stravinsky will conduct the orchestra in his own "Apolon Musagete" and, with the assistance of soloists, a reader and the Harvard Glee Club, "Oedipus Rex."

Serge Koussevitsky, who will conduct a group of Boston Symphony players a tthe concert to be given tomorrow night at Symphony Hall for the benefit of French war charities. The other guest artists will be Lily Pons and George Copeland.

MUSIC

Benefit Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

A "gala benefit concert" was given last night in Symphony Hall to aid four French war charities. The participating musicians were Lily Pons, soprano of the Metropolitan opera company; an ensemble of the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, and George Copeland, pianist. Lily Pons, who was accompanied by Frank LaForge, sang songs by Faure, Hue, Thomas, Debussy, Ravel and others. Mr. Copeland played selections by Ravel, Debussy and Charbrier. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the orchestra in Saint-Saens' Marche Heroique, Bizet's First Arlesienne Suite, Planquette's March, Le regiment de Sambre et Meuse, and Louis Ganne's Marche Lorraine.

This was hardly a concert in the regular sense of the word, though a number of eminent musicians participated and a good deal of music—first and last—was heard. It was actually and was designed as an occasion to signify devotion to the French cause in the war and to provide a benefit for Amercian agencies engaged in pacific aid to France. The French ambassador came on for the occasion, and there was a ceremonial atmosphere not ordinarily connected with concerts in Symphony hall.

All the artists gave their services, and it may at once be said that there was no stinting of talent. Mlle. Lily Pons made a very dramatic appearance, gowned in an effective arrangement of the tricolor, and sang a varied number of songs. Enthusiastic applause greeted our foremost exponent of coloratura singing in the Metropolitan. Mr. Copeland's great talent for the interpretation of French piano music was also appreciated.

In the middle of the concert we were shown a film of the military exercises connected with the celebration of Bastille Day last summer in Paris, entitled "La revue due quatorze juillet." This proved to be a singularly impressive sequence of parade moving pictures, what the business calls in this country a "super news reel." Equally important for the success of the occasion was the admirable playing of the ensemble from the Boston Symphony and Mr. Koussevitzky's inspired direction of music that is seldom his deepest concern.

Life of Clara Schumann; Mr. Burk's Admirable Study

March 24

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS Herald

The Schumanns have long stood in need of extended biographical treatment in English, and the subject is attractive for one equipped by nature and patience to write this kind of book. Mr. Burk, the editor of the Boston Symphony program notes, has done a splendid piece of work in covering about two-thirds of this subject ("Clara Schumann, a Romantic Biography" by John N. Burk; Random House: $3), and it is now clearly up to him to complete the portrait of Robert.

The successful writer of biography has a good deal in common with the historical novelist; he must attain the same results without resorting to all the same methods or taking any of the factual liberties. If he must scrupulously stick to facts, he has one advantage over the novelist in that the materials of his characters are more or less ready to his hand. It is thus that the invented characters of historical novels are often such sticks and the minor figures, based on reality, so vivid.

Now, many biographers have adopted one technique of the novelist and have sought to give life to their narration of events by interspersing conversations or thoughts that the subject may well have had. This can be cleverly and plausibly done, particularly when the writer does not invent apart from his sources. Mr. Burk has recourse to this method infrequently and then judiciously and with evident authority. We mention the practice not only because it is common but also to show that it is possible to work, as Mr. Burk has done, almost entirely without its aid.

A CROWDED LIFE

Clara Schumann was a most interesting personality, if you except the fact that she seems to have had no sense of humor. She was the daughter and prize pupil of Friedrich Wieck, who made her into one of the greatest pianists of all time. She was also the wife of one of the greatest composers, and the story of their love was both romance and idyll. Mr. Burk is exceedingly fair to Wieck which other authors, in the extremity of their sympathy for Clara and Schumann, have not been. He certainly does not spare the repellent side of Wieck's character, but he also shows how hard it was for the father to give up his ideal child to as unlikely a prospect for worldly success as Robert Schumann. Even while scheming in every manner—some very underhand—to keep Clara and Robert apart, Wieck could admire the young man's compositions.

The romance of their love over five troublous years to a marriage that was a blissful haven of the spirit has often been told but never as completely as Mr. Burk has managed. He had, of course, that earnestly candid diary to go on as well as the letters and he has interwoven this material with straight accounts and explanations of his own in a skillful and readable manner.

Mr. Burk is at pains to make clear the utter devotion that Clara had for Robert Schumann. There have sometimes been hints that the great friendship of Brahms, who entered their life in 1853, was more than that where Clara was concerned. He was undoubtedly in love with her during the difficult years of Schumann's insanity and was also a great comfort to her. It is possible that she could not mentally have endured that period and the times of struggle after 1856 without Brahms' support. But there is also no reason whatever to doubt her entire absorption in Schumann and his affairs throughout her life.

If the years following, to her death in 1896, are slightly less interesting to read about, that is hardly to be wondered at. The tours of a successful concert pianist are much of a muchness. Our attention is held by Mr. Burk's delineation of her character, of the qualities of her pianism as opposed to the Liszt school and of the fate of her many children.

We should like to have known a little more about Wieck, aside from the fact that he repented and left Clara money in his will. What were his reactions when she conquered Leipzig again and again with her talents? We should also like to have learned about the fate of those of Schumann's children who did not die prematurely and of their descendants. And such curiosity is tribute to the vitality of Mr. Burk's talent for biography. One slip and one only shall we note, and that because of personal bias and because praise should be tempered. We must beg him to shun that abominable word "podium," which is more and more frequently and misguidedly used for conductor's stand in American writing about music. Since it does not mean what it is supposed to mean and has a pompous sound, it should be held in odium!

Nilsson

C.S.M. Igor Stravinsky March 25

To conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

---

american

New Bride Inspires Stravinsky's Music

March 25

Love, that little thing of magic, may present a new Igor Stravinsky to music lovers Friday and Saturday when the famous composer conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For, in preparation for the occasion, Stravinsky, honeymooning in Boston with his attractive bride is playing inspirationally.

Known as a moody man of melody, Stravinsky now smiles frequently, chats animatedly with friends in his honeymoon suite at Hotel Hemenway, Back Bay.

Equally ecstatic, friends say, is his bride of two weeks—the former Vera de Bosset, characteristically gay and with dark, sparkling eyes.

The Stravinskys were married at the home of friends, Dr. and Mrs. T. A. Taracouzio in Bedford.

Stravinsky and his bride were born in the same district, in St. Petersburg, now Leningrad. His family and the de Bossets were close, but he did not meet Vera until 20 years later, in Paris.

At the time, she was the wife of M. Sudeikine, noted Russian painter. When the composer met her again last year, she was free, and their friendship developed into love.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 25 1940

Stravinsky, 57, Reveals Marriage 2 Weeks Ago

Boston, March 25 (AP)—The noted Russian composer, Igor Stravinsky, 57, and Vera de Bossett Sudeinkine, a countrywoman whom he met 20 years ago, were honeymooning here today. The couple revealed yesterday that they were married in Bedford two weeks ago. Stravinsky will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra guest conductor this week.

Stravinsky to Lead "Oedipus Rex"

Igor Stravinsky will conduct his opera-oratorio, "Oedipus Rex", when the distinguished Russian composer takes the direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as guest for the concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, in Symphony Hall, March 29 and 30, and likewise for the concert in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on Thursday evening, March 28. "Oedipus Rex", a score large in concept and design, was written for orchestra with male chorus, solo voices, and a speaker.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MIRROR

MAR 25 1940

IGOR STRAVINSKY, COMPOSER, WEDS

BOSTON, March 24 (AP). — The marriage of Igor Stravinsky, 57, Russian composer, to Vera de Bosset Sudeikine, a Russian, in Bedford two weeks ago was disclosed today. Presently the couple is residing in Boston where Stravinsky this week will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

March 24.

French Charities Concert

BOSTON'S four French charities, the American Field Service, which provides and equips ambulances for service with the French army; American Friends of France, which helps rehabilitate evacuated French civilians; the American Association for Assistance to French Artists, and the Defense Contre Avions-Canteens will benefit from the proceeds of the gala benefit concert at Symphony Hall tomorrow night. The greatest personalities in the world of music are donating their services to this event. At the left, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, eminent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will lead an ensemble of French members of his orchestra, discusses program plans with Mrs. Charles Codman, chairman of the executive committee in charge of entertainment, and Mrs. F. Wadsworth Busk.

Trans Mar 30

Stravinsky Program

Revival of Neglected 'Oedipus Rex' Proves a Triumph—Composer Conducts Ballet Suite

A Stravinsky festival in miniature was yesterday's concert in Symphony Hall with Stravinsky himself conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the Harvard Glee Club, Raoul Jobin, tenor; Suzanne Sten, mezzo-soprano; Mack Harrell, baritone, and Paul Leyssac, narrator. Both of the works on yesterday's program, "Apollon Musagete" and the opera-oratorio "Oedipus Rex," are of the same period in Stravinsky's development—some 12 to 13 years ago—and both of them could be lumped together under the rough classification of neo-classicism. Beyond that, however, they have little in common.

Originally a ballet, the "Apollon Musagete" appears in the concert hall as an orchestral suite written for strings alone. It is written in Stravinsky's unemotional, decorative style, purposely lacking in color or anything else but an interesting play of formal design. "I had pictured it to myself," writes Stravinsky of the first performance, "as danced in short, white ballet skirts in a severely conventionalized theatrical background devoid of all phantastic embellishment such as would have been out of keeping with my primary conception."

Stravinsky's primary conception as well as his final score were apparently both so severely conventionalized that whatever emotions he may originally have had about the birth of Apollo, were conventionalized out of existance. Stravinsky seems here to have been interested only in the play of line. Now patterns may be a very fascinating preoccupation for Stravinsky, as they are, within limits, to other people. But patterns to the exclusion of everything else get to be a deadly bore. There were long stretches yesterday when one had the impression of listening to a rehearsal of the string section of an orchestra alone, with the brass and wind parts missing.

Inspiring Theme

Happily "Oedipus Rex" is a different matter. Its Latin text by Jean Cocteau is after Sophocles, and Stravinsky's music has caught the elemental emotional impact of the Greek drama. That sense of unavoidable doom which is one of the essentials of Greek tragedy, the feeling of impending disaster pervades the music with an almost terrifying intensity.

The work is built on a tremendous theme about which Stravinsky has allowed himself to have emotions, and the results are memorable. The opening chorus is stirring in its desperate appeal to Oedipus to save his dying city. Stravinsky's genius for strong and exciting rhythms vitalizes this first number and remains throughout the work his greatest source of strength and inspiration.

With the exception of the role of Jocasta, the most impressive music in the score is given to the chorus. Jocasta's aria on the lying oracles is so affecting partly because of its concealed agitation, as if Jocasta already sensed the catastrophe and were attempting to reassure herself against it. The chorus' ominous iterations, "Trivium, trivium" are a wonderful introduction to the dramatic duet, "Pavesco subito." A tremendous climax swells up to the final chorus, "Divum Jocastae." The last farewell, "Tibi valedico" is tragically restrained.

The Harvard Glee Club sang with dramatic power and enthusiasm. Paul Leyssac was the cultivated Speaker. Raoul Jobin as Oedipus and the Shepard disclosed a strong lyric tenor of generally bright quality. Mack Harrell employed his agreeable baritone in the three roles of Creon, Tiresias and the Messenger. The role of Jocasta is perhaps the most unvocal of three extremely difficult parts. Miss Sten mastered it.

It is twelve years now since the first and only other presentation of "Oedipus Rex" at these concerts. Twelve years is much too long to wait for the next performance.

E. D.

TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, MARCH 29, 1940

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

By Paul Crane

The dashing, witty Jesus Maria Sanroma is the Boston Symphony Orchestra's most popular figure. He is popular not only with the public but with his colleagues in the orchestra as well.

Mr. Sanroma was born on the American possession of Puerto Rico, the son of Spanish colonizers. He was sent to this country in 1917 by the Puerto Rican Government to study at the New England Conservatory of Music. He studied with the celebrated Polish concert pianist, Madame Annette Szumowska-Adamowska.

His performances with the Pops Orchestra and particularly his presentation of the works of the ultra - modern composers have made him a popular figure to Boston audiences.

On a concert tour of Europe some yars ago, Mr. Sanroma decided to experiment with the tastes of audiences and see if they really understood the works of the moderns or if they were merely being polite when they applauded.

In London he played some Schoenburg sketches, pieces which require only about four minutes to play. After finishing the piece he remained seated at the piano. The applause broke out all over the house and continued until the artist arose and acknowledged it. This convinced him that English audiences understood and appreciated this music. In France the same experiment was tried with the same success. But in Spain a woman was heard to say in a loud voice: "How horrible."

While he was finishing his studies here in Boston he was an extra percussion man with the Symphony Orchestra. The result was that even now, when the coast is clear, he will slip up to the left-hand corner of the stage and amuse himself with Mr. Sternberg's instruments.

Although most of his appearances on the concert platform are made in a very serious mood he did break down at the "Gay Nineties Night" of the Pops several years ago. Appearing on the stage dressed as a dude of the period, he sat down to the piano and without removing his white gloves gave a rendition of "Hearts and Flowers" with all the gestures and fluttering motions at his command.

JESUS MARIA SANROMA, PIANO

His gay wit is always present behind the scenes and particularly on the long trips that the orchestra takes. He has his own quiz program on these trips.

Wandering through the train he hums or whistles themes from various scores and challenges his traveling colleagues to identify the works from which they come.

His subtle persuasion with an audience was noted one night at the Pops after he had played the "Rhapsody" of Gershwin. The audience demanded an encore, and got it. Then they called him back to the stage several times for curtain calls. Despite the presence of Mr. Fiedler on the podium the applause continued unabated. On his fourth trip to the center of the stage Mr. Sanroma bowed to the audience and then very gently drew the cover over the keys of the piano. The effect was startling. The audience which had been thundering applause became absolutely quiet and the concert continued.

In spite of his readiness to joke he is intuitive about the most profound phases of artistic thought. And what is more he can play the cold, calculating music of the abstract moderns with an exciting fervor and understanding.

9

ROTOGRAVURE SECTION March 24 THE BOSTON HERALD

French Charities Concert

BOSTON'S four French charities: the American Field Service, which provides and equips ambulances for service with the French army; American Friends of France, which helps rehabilitate evacuated French civilians; the American Association for Assistance to French Artists, and the Défense Contre Avions-Canteens will benefit from the proceeds of the gala benefit concert at Symphony Hall tomorrow night. The greatest personalities in the world of music are donating their services to this event. At the left, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, eminent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will lead an ensemble of French members of his orchestra, discusses program plans with Mrs. Charles Codman, chairman of the executive committee in charge of entertainment, and Mrs. F. Wadsworth Busk.

Trans Mar 30

Stravinsky Program

Revival of Neglected 'Oedipus Rex' Proves a Triumph—Composer Conducts Ballet Suite

A Stravinsky festival in miniature was yesterday's concert in Symphony Hall with Stravinsky himself conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the Harvard Glee Club, Raoul Jobin, tenor; Suzanne Sten, mezzo-soprano; Mack Harrell, baritone, and Paul Leyssac, narrator. Both of the works on yesterday's program, "Apollon Musagete" and the opera-oratorio "Oedipus Rex," are of the same period in Stravinsky's development—some 12 to 13 years ago—and both of them could be lumped together under the rough classification of neo-classicism. Beyond that, however, they have little in common.

Originally a ballet, the "Apollon Musagete" appears in the concert hall as an orchestral suite written for strings alone. It is written in Stravinsky's unemotional, decorative style, purposely lacking in color or anything else but an interesting play of formal design. "I had pictured it to myself," writes Stravinsky of the first performance, "as danced in short, white ballet skirts in a severely conventionalized theatrical background devoid of all phantastic embellishment such as would have been out of keeping with my primary conception."

Stravinsky's primary conception as well as his final score were apparently both so severely conventionalized that whatever emotions he may originally have had about the birth of Apollo, were conventionalized out of existance. Stravinsky seems here to have been interested only in the play of line. Now patterns may be a very fascinating preoccupation for Stravinsky, as they are, within limits, to other people. But patterns to the exclusion of everything else get to be a deadly bore. There were long stretches yesterday when one had the impression of listening to a rehearsal of the string section of an orchestra alone, with the brass and wind parts missing.

Inspiring Theme

Happily "Oedipus Rex" is a different matter. Its Latin text by Jean Cocteau is after Sophocles, and Stravinsky's music has caught the elemental emotional impact of the Greek drama. That sense of unavoidable doom which is one of the essentials of Greek tragedy, the feeling of impending disaster pervades the music with an almost terrifying intensity.

The work is built on a tremendous theme about which Stravinsky has allowed himself to have emotions, and the results are memorable. The opening chorus is stirring in its desperate appeal to Oedipus to save his dying city. Stravinsky's genius for strong and exciting rhythms vitalizes this first number and remains throughout the work his greatest source of strength and inspiration.

With the exception of the role of Jocasta, the most impressive music in the score is given to the chorus. Jocasta's aria on the lying oracles is so affecting partly because of its concealed agitation, as if Jocasta already sensed the catastrophe and were attempting to reassure herself against it. The chorus' ominous iterations, "Trivium, trivium" are a wonderful introduction to the dramatic duet, "Pavesco subito." A tremendous climax swells up to the final chorus, "Divum Jocastae." The last farewell, "Tibi valedico" is tragically restrained.

The Harvard Glee Club sang with dramatic power and enthusiasm. Paul Leyssac was the cultivated Speaker. Raoul Jobin as Oedipus and the Shepard disclosed a strong lyric tenor of generally bright quality. Mack Harrell employed his agreeable baritone in the three roles of Creon, Tiresias and the Messenger. The role of Jocasta is perhaps the most unvocal of three extremely difficult parts. Miss Sten mastered it.

It is twelve years now since the first and only other presentation of "Oedipus Rex" at these concerts. Twelve years is much too long to wait for the next performance.

E. D.

TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, MARCH 29, 1940

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

By Paul Crane

JESUS MARIA SANROMA, PIANO

The dashing, witty Jesus Maria Sanroma is the Boston Symphony Orchestra's most popular figure. He is popular not only with the public but with his colleagues in the orchestra as well.

Mr. Sanroma was born on the American possession of Puerto Rico, the son of Spanish colonizers. He was sent to this country in 1917 by the Puerto Rican Government to study at the New England Conservatory of Music. He studied with the celebrated Polish concert pianist, Madame Annette Szumowska-Adamowska.

His performances with the Pops Orchestra and particularly his presentation of the works of the ultra-modern composers have made him a popular figure to Boston audiences.

On a concert tour of Europe some yars ago, Mr. Sanroma decided to experiment with the tastes of audiences and see if they really understood the works of the moderns or if they were merely being polite when they applauded.

In London he played some Schoenburg sketches, pieces which require only about four minutes to play. After finishing the piece he remained seated at the piano. The applause broke out all over the house and continued until the artist arose and acknowledged it. This convinced him that English audiences understood and appreciated this music. In France the same experiment was tried with the same success. But in Spain a woman was heard to say in a loud voice: "How horrible."

While he was finishing his studies here in Boston he was an extra percussion man with the Symphony Orchestra. The result was that even now, when the coast is clear, he will slip up to the left-hand corner of the stage and amuse himself with Mr. Sternberg's instruments.

Although most of his appearances on the concert platform are made in a very serious mood he did break down at the "Gay Nineties Night" of the Pops several years ago. Appearing on the stage dressed as a dude of the period, he sat down to the piano and without removing his white gloves gave a rendition of "Hearts and Flowers" with all the gestures and fluttering motions at his command.

His gay wit is always present behind the scenes and particularly on the long trips that the orchestra takes. He has his own quiz program on these trips.

Wandering through the train he hums or whistles themes from various scores and challenges his traveling colleagues to identify the works from which they come.

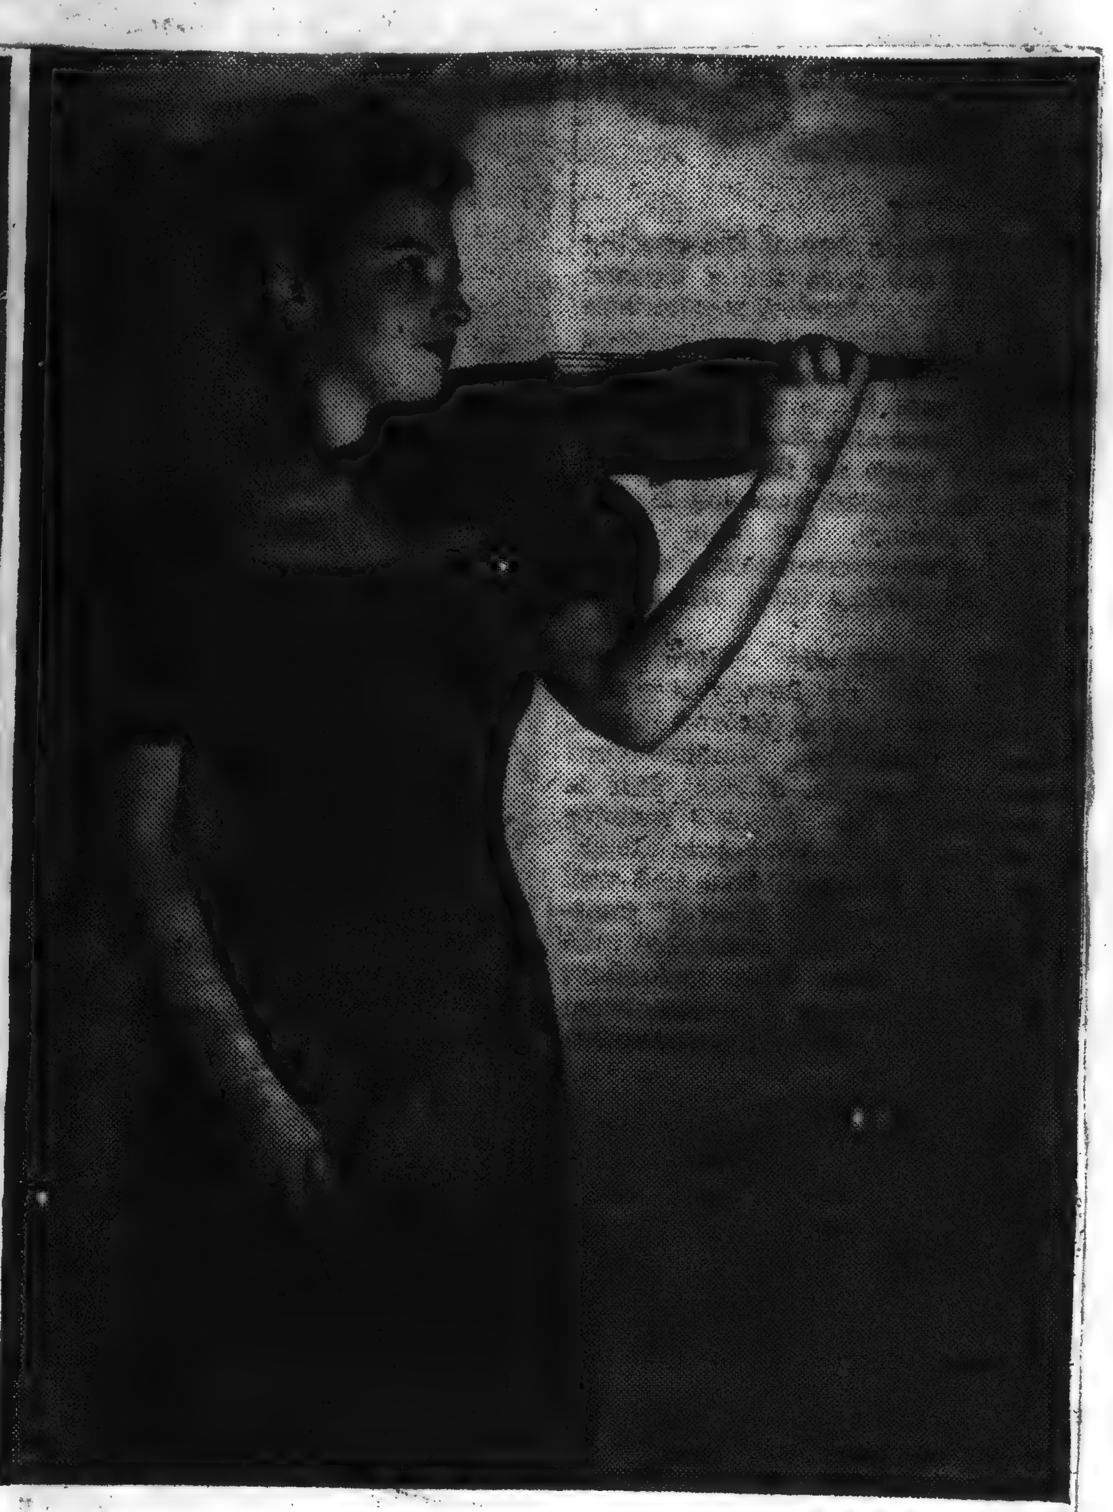
His subtle persuasion with an audience was noted one night at the Pops after he had played the "Rhapsody" of Gershwin. The audience demanded an encore, and got it. Then they called him back to the stage several times for curtain calls. Despite the presence of Mr. Fiedler on the podium the applause continued unabated. On his fourth trip to the center of the stage Mr. Sanroma bowed to the audience and then very gently drew the cover over the keys of the piano. The effect was startling. The audience which had been thundering applause became absolutely quiet and the concert continued.

In spite of his readiness to joke he is intuitive about the most profound phases of artistic thought. And what is more he can play the cold, calculating music of the abstract moderns with an exciting fervor and understanding.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 24 1940

230

A new violin concerto by Benjamin Britten (right), young English composer, will be on Philharmonic-Symphony program this week. Antonio Brosa (above) will be the soloist in the work.



Claude Harris and James Abresch

Eudice Shapiro will be one of the soloists with National Orchestral Association on Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

A VISITING COMPOSER LOOKS AT US

By BENJAMIN BRITTEN

IN April of last year, I left England on a vacation trip across the Atlantic, a vacation rather from the general European atmosphere than from overwork.

I spent two months in Canada, and since last August have been chiefly in and around New York with occasional visits to the Middle West. I have found this country enormously stimulating, and, as I have met many of the chief figures in American music today, I have had perhaps as good an opportunity as most foreigners of comparing conditions in this country with those in their own.

* * *

There has been in these columns recently a lot of correspondence about American music and the treatment of American composers. It has been the chief topic of conversation in many musical circles to which I have been introduced, and it has been the subject of many articles and essays.

Let me say straightaway that, in my opinion, the American composer has little to grumble at; compared with English composers, nothing. Whatever struggle American music may have had in the past for its fair share of public recognition, today the composer here, compared with his English brother even in normal times, has a very rosy prospect.

In the first place, as far as I can see, there does not exist in the minds of most audiences here the deadening distinction, so common in England, between "music" and "contemporary music." This in part may have been caused by the British Broadcasting Corporation's mistaken policy of giving a full-sized concert once a month by music of contemporary composers (generally of the most formidable and unattractive kind); and with this gesture, having done its duty to "contemporary music," it returns with a sigh of relief to the normal programs of "music."

* * *

This distinction has been aggravated by the modern music enthusiasts themselves, who have not always been very discriminating in their praise, and have made the same mistake of giving entire concerts of modern music. This, separating as it does the two audiences, is obviously fatal. Contemporary music should take its place in concert programs side by side with the well-tried masterpieces; it should be judged solely on its merits as music.

American audiences appear to be less prejudiced in this respect than English ones. Most of the symphonic programs include a twentieth-century work, and the halls do not seem to be any the less full. American composers should be very definitely helped by this attitude, in their efforts to be heard, and, to judge from the concert and radio columns of the Sunday papers, it is undoubtedly the case. Since the beginning of the season, modern music generally has been continually broadcast, and American music in particular has received outstanding encouragement from such festivals as the one organized by ASCAP and, more recently by WNYC, as well as the fine concerts of American music given by Dr. Koussevitzky. The programs of the Boston and New York Symphony Orchestras contain American works, as do the programs of the symphonic bodies all over the country.

In England, too, there is no such organization as the WPA, which, according to the press, has performed 7,332 American compositions by 2,258 native or resident composers! I wish that the American musician could see the programs of the BBC Symphony, the London Philharmonic Orchestra and the London Symphony Orchestras. He would not think himself so hardly used.

* * *

Generally speaking, unless one has become a national institution (a process which requires many white hairs and forty years of being snubbed and rejected), one is limited for performance of new works to the London branch of the I. S. C. M., with its few concerts a year and exclusively highbrow audience; to occasional semi-amateur performances organized by well-meaning but often inefficient enthusiasts, or to very infrequent and strangely timed radio performances, few of which reach the general concertgoing public.

Here the composer has a chance of obtaining commissions from radio and phonograph companies. In England these are even rarer than chromatic timps. Here there are private fellowships; I know of nothing of the kind in England. In America perhaps the printing of modern music has lagged behind performances, and in this respect the publishers seem scarcely to have realized that a printed work stands a much better chance of establishing itself in the regular repertory than a sometimes illegible score, and parts that may not have been too well copied and have been thumbed and blue-penciled from Boston to Los Angeles. Phonograph companies on this side have been much more enterprising, and many works by the not so old have been "disked" and many are to come. On the other side of the Atlantic, the great publishing houses automatically issue a few contemporary scores each year, but to be recorded is for most composers a rare privilege.

All this is not to say that the struggle of the young and unknown composer is not often heartbreakingly difficult here as everywhere. But I am sure that his opportunities are greater in this country than in any other country in the world.

* * *

To the outsider, however, the struggle which American music has had for recognition, and which has resulted in the present comparatively happy situation, has left behind it at least one potential source of danger. This is the very real danger of excessive nationalism.

In the first place, in their efforts to do justice to the American cause, conductors and performers may not always exercise an objective criticism in their choice of works to offer the public. They may be prejudiced by the fact that these works are written by Americans. No one would deny that this country has been magnificently hospitable to European composers and artists. But what always has mattered and always will matter is that the works in question should be good. No accident of nationality has ever excused a composer for writing bad music.

In the second place, the composer must be alive to the danger of consciously trying to create what he imagines to be a national style. I realize that many young American composers wish to produce something different from the rather tame imitations of the European masters, from Grieg to Hindemith, that have been turned out in this country for some time. But I am sure that a complete rejection of the great European tradition is equally fatal, for, after all, that tradition is nothing but centuries of experience of what people like to hear and what players like to play.

* * *

In England the position has been very similar. At the turn of the century, young English composers were sick to death of the preponderating German influence which had been stifling English music for 150 years. There were two reactions to this: one on the part of practicing musicians like Elgar and Frank Bridge, who realised the value of the classical tradition yet whose utterances were characteristically English; the other, and temporarily more influential, r[illegible]tion was that of the folksong group. This group adopted English folksong as the chief influence in their work, and disregarded most of the lessons Europe had to give. It held up the progress of music for twenty-five years, but it has now entirely subsided, since audiences found it monotonous melodically and harmonically, and clumsy in form and orchestration. It was founded on a style which was too personal to its instigator and in its imitators forced and unnatural.

* * *

Let American composers take warning from this. There is no more malignant disease than nationalism. Why not make the best of both worlds? With lessons learned from Europe, let an American style develop naturally and without forcing, which it surely will do, if the composer takes no notice of what is going on around him and writes the best music he can for every occasion that offers itself. Besides having the largest concert organizations in the world and the obvious advantages of Hollywood, this country has an educational system unparalleled in size and scope, and the demand for good, simple music in this direction is enormous. There are school operas to be written, pieces for the numberless school children learning to play instruments, and, above all, there are the military bands which are such a feature of this country and have been so neglected by the serious composers.

March 27

The Woman Who Had Everything

John N. Burk, annotator of the Boston Symphony programs, has written "Clara Schumann: A Romantic Biography." Gerald W. Johnson, reviewer, describes it as the story of a woman who had everything—intelligence, musical genius, good looks, fame, love, friendship, success, children, health and length of days. She also had disaster, pain, terror, loss, fatigue and sorrow. She was great as a musician; greater as a woman. His review will appear in the BOOKS section of

Next Sunday's New York Herald Tribune

231

Society Crowds Symphony

Glob DR. AND MRS. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY Ma 29

FOR FRANCE—At the Symphony Hall concert of French music for the benefit of war relief organizations last night. Left to right: Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Lily Pons and Count Rene Doynel de Saint-Quentin, French ambassador.

Herald

, MARCH 30, 1940 —New England News—

Stravinsky Conducts 'Oedipus Rex'

C.S.M.

By L. A. Sloper

For the second time this season, Igor Stravinsky is conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week in a program of his own compositions. Last December it was the "Jeu de Cartes," the Capriccio, the "Pétrouchka" Suite, and the "Symphonie de Psaumes." Yesterday afternoon it was the "Apollon Musagète" ballet music and the "Oedipus Rex." In other words, last December we had one example of the early Stravinsky, whom we al ladmire. Yesterday we had only the neo-classicist.

Neither of the works submitted yesterday was new to Boston, but the "Oedipus Rex" had been performed here only once before, 12 years ago, under Dr. Koussevitzky; and it is generally rated one of the composer's more important compositions. It was interesting therefore to hear it again, and under the composer's direction.

The presentation did not materially modify the impression made on the first hearing. There are passages which have a certain power, there are others which are banal and reminiscent. Where the "opera-oratorio" should achieve its climax, in the final chorus, the orchestral accompaniment defeats any impressiveness of effect by its frivolous nature.

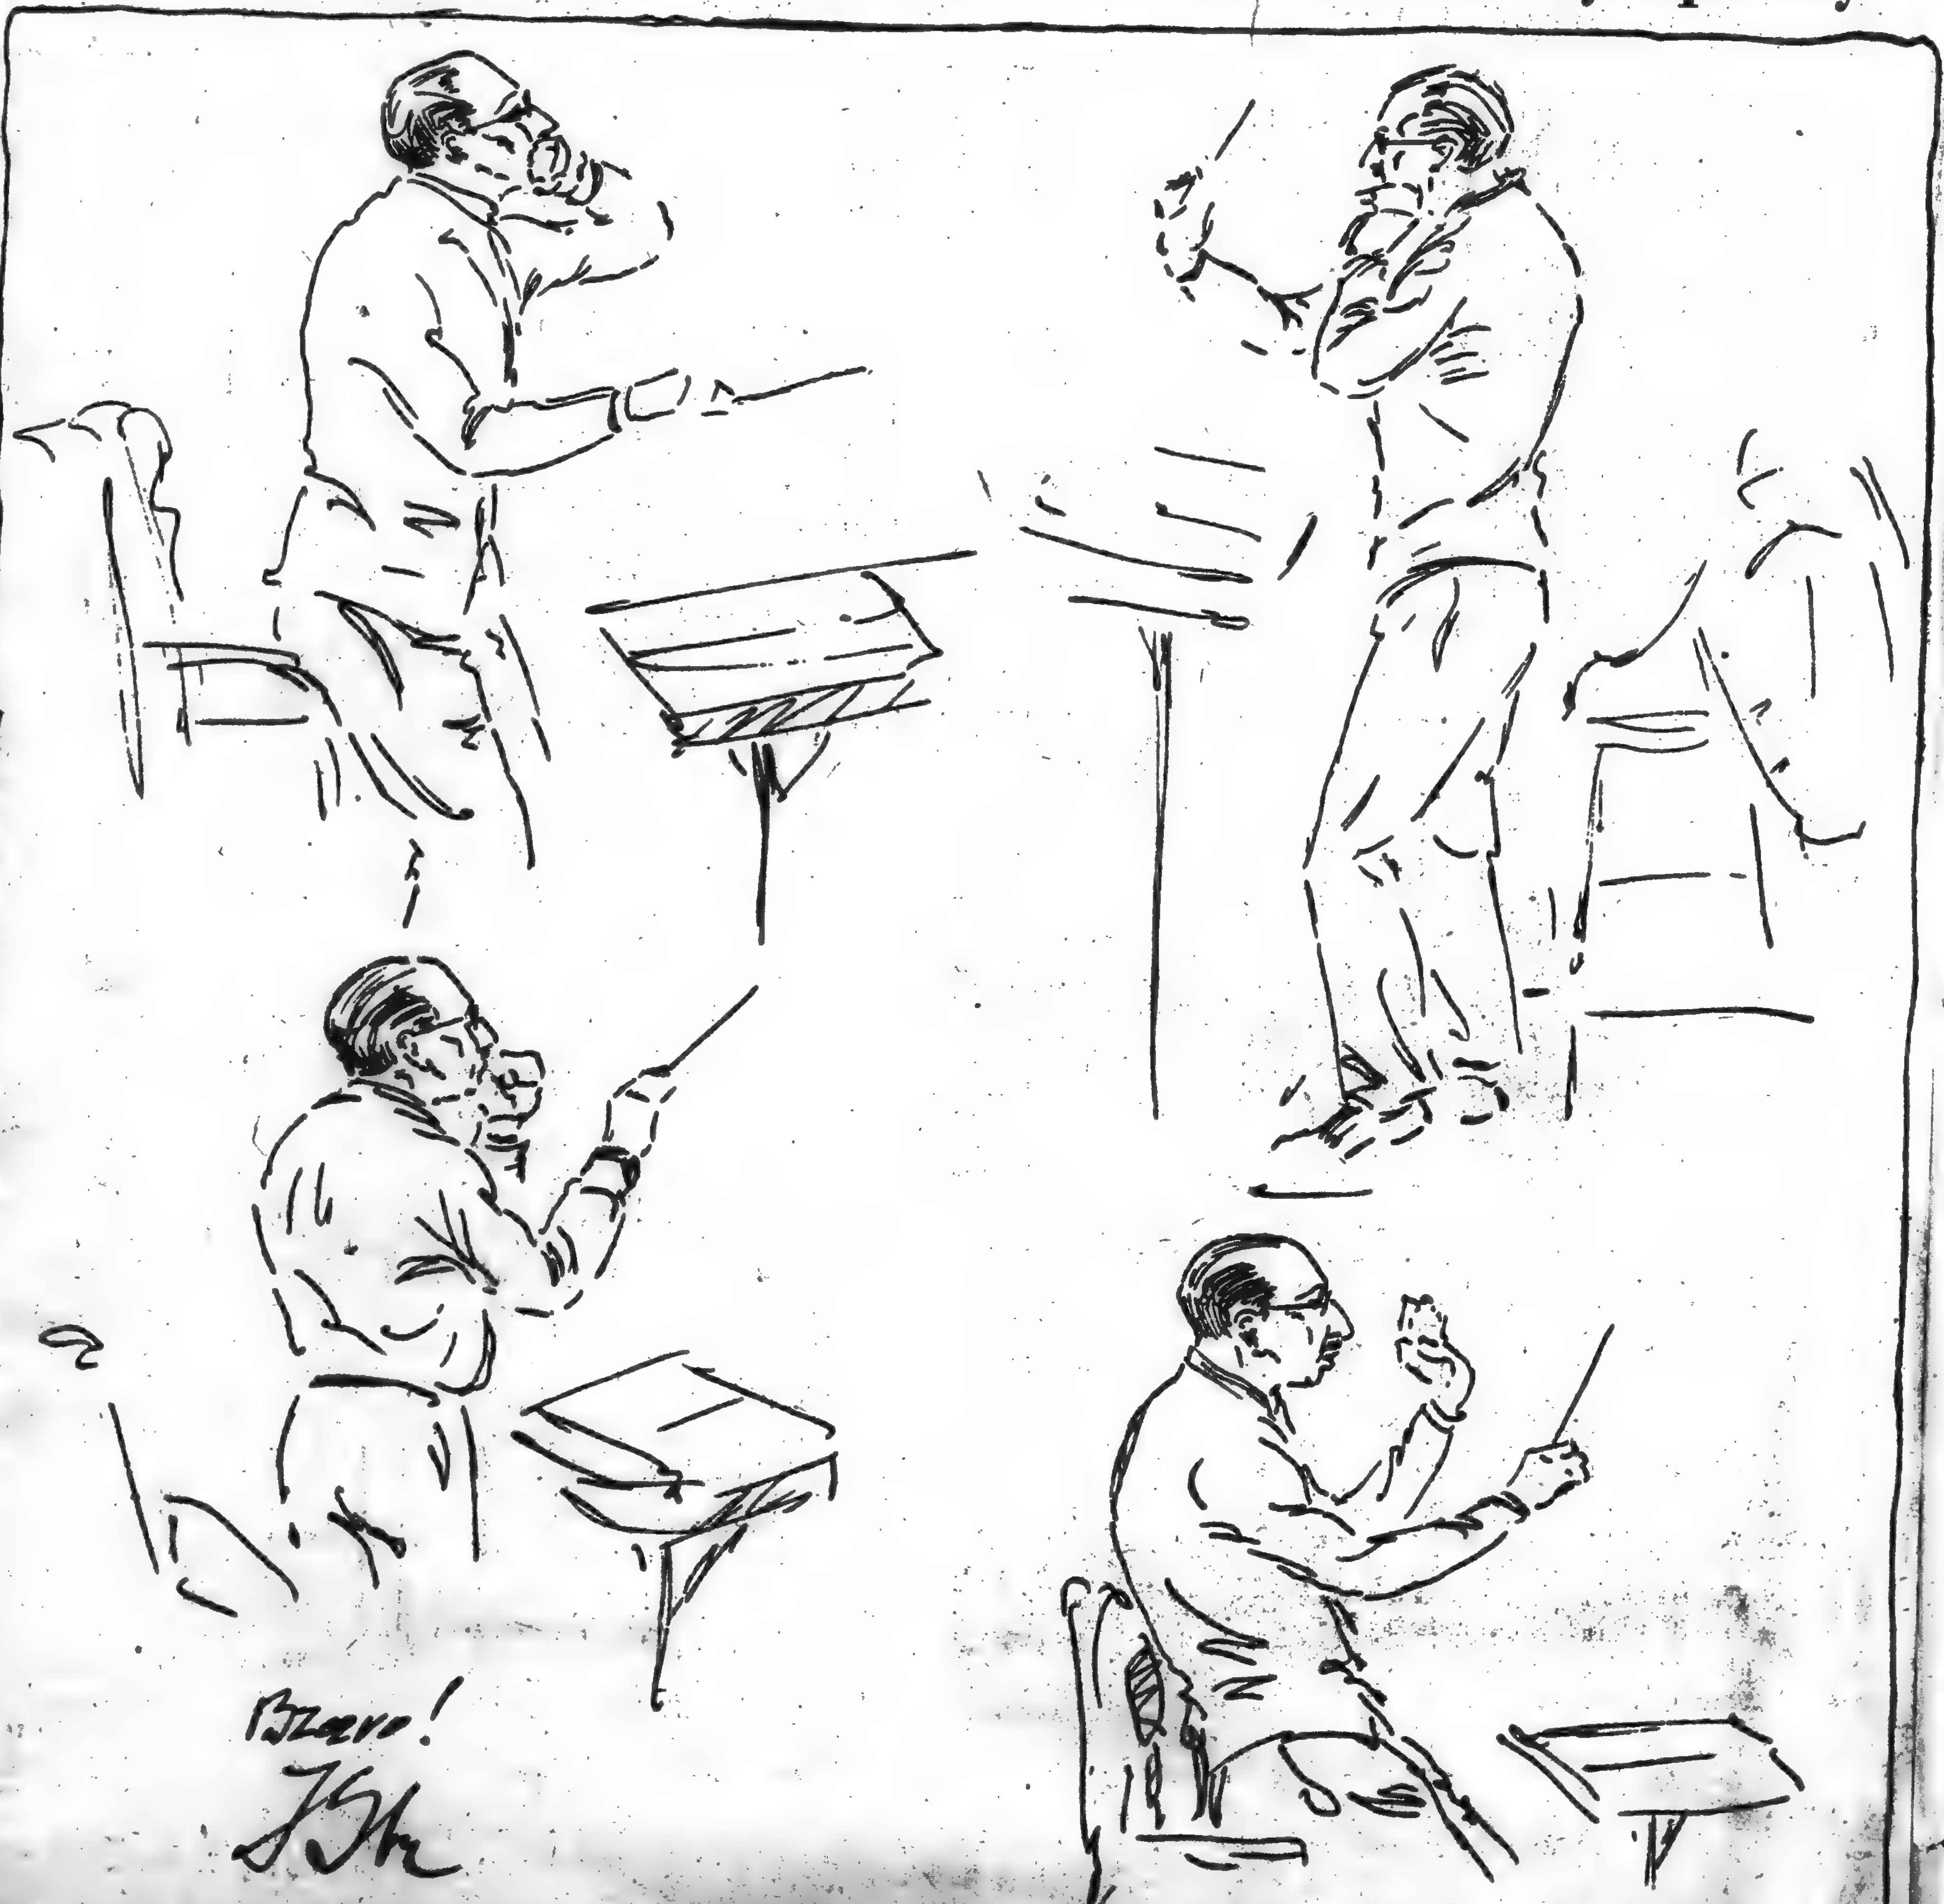
But these things are details. What matters is the fundamental spirit of the music, Ond this still appears to be that of self-conscious formalism, arid and bloodless. Greater familiarity with the idiom merely makes the lack of inspiration more apparent.

Mr. Stravinsky obtained a good performance from the small body of instrumentalists, from the chorus of the Harvard Glee Club, and for the most part from the soloists and the speaker, Paul Leyssac. Raoul Jobin, the tenor, and Mack Harrell, the baritone, distinguished themselves by their vocalism and by their interpretive ability, though some of the music lay too low for Mr. Harrell's voice. Suzanne Sten, mezzo-soprona, was unable to meet the demands of Jocasta's aria. All the soloists suffered from Mr. Stravinsky's failure to keep down the orchestral tone sufficiently to enable them to be heard clearly.

"Apollon Musagète" is a milder and even drier experiment in the neo-classic style. But it is still true that the music is easier to listen to than the ballet is to watch.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY, MARCH 28, 1940 C

Igor the Great in Rehearsal with the Boston Symphony



Igor Stravinsky prepares one of his major scores, "Oedipus Rex" for a performance tonight in which the Harvard Glee Club will play a generous role. Stravinsky liked these sketches of Martha Burnham's so much that he signed them himself.

THE BOSTON HERALD, TUESDAY, MARCH 26, 1940

ny Hall for Concert to Benefit French Groups

Lily Pons, George Copeland, Symphony Ensemble Appear

Count de Saint-Quentin, French Ambassador In Washington, Among Distinguished Guests

By ALISON ARNOLD

One of the most important events of the season, socially, musically and charitably speaking, took place last evening in Symphony Hall. Boston society turned out enmasse for this joint concert given by Lily Pons, George Copeland and Serge Koussevitzky and an ensemble from the Boston Symphony orchestra for the benefit of the American Field Service, the American Friends of France, the American Association for Assistance to French Artists and the Defense Contre Avions Canteens. French flags were hung about the hall and on the stage, where American flags and four huge bouquets of red and white gladioli and blue hyacinths carried out the red, white and blue color scheme still further.

When Lily Pons appeared, a gasp of admiration came from the vast throng that filled Symphony Hall to its very rafters, as the diminutive coloratura soprano looked utterly enchanting in an off-the-shoulder, hoop-skirted frock of white taffeta, its panniers of royal blue edged with ball fringe. With this quaint frock she wore a tiny blue hat trimmed with white flowers and carried an old-fashioned bouquet of crimson carnations. Long white gloves completed her costume, and diamond bracelets glittered on her slender wrists. She sang two groups of French songs and the applause was so insistent that she was obliged to sing two encores, the last one, "The Beautiful Blue Danube," accompanied by the members of the Symphony orchestra conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky.

Mr. Copeland played selections from Ravel, Debussy and Chabrier and received a large share of the tumultuous ovation. The orchestra's offerings included Saint Saens' "Marche Heroique," Bizet's "L'Arlesienne Suite," and two other stirring marches. A short motion picture entitled, "La Revue du Quatorze Juillet," added still further to the patriotic spirit of the evening, and spontaneous bursts of applause rang out.

Among the distinguished guests present at this outstanding affair were His Excellency Count Rene Doynel de Saint-Quentin, French ambassador in Washington, Monsieur Francois Briere, French consul in Boston, and Madame Briere, and Governor Leverett Saltonstall and Mrs. Saltonstall. Mrs. Charles R. Codman, chairman of the committee in charge of the entertainment, was seeing that all went well, and topped her sea green gown with its billowy tulle skirt with a silver fox jacket. Mrs. F. Wadsworth Busk, an energetic committee member, wore an attractive printed frock.

Seated beside the French guests of honor was Mrs. Robert Lovett, chairman with Mrs. Homer Gage of he Massachusetts branch of the American Friends of France, Inc. Nearby sat Mr. and Mrs. Allan Forbes, Mrs. Forbes very smart in lack with which she wore lustrous earls. Also present were their aughter, Miss Phyllis Forbes, and heir niece, Miss Esmee de Menocal. n black with which she wore a pearl hoker and a black and gold brocade wrap was Mrs. I Tucker Burr.

A diamond sunburst brooch and diamond earrings were the sparkling jewels worn by Countess Eleanor Palffy with her gown of putty beige crepe. With her was her daughter, Mrs. Nelson Aldrich, wrapped in a stunning white tweed coat brightened with gold trimming and a crimson-lined hood. Mrs. A. Barr Comstock, whose black gown was trimmed with gleaming gold sequins, arrived with her daughter, Miss Dorothy Comstock, and Mrs. Wilbur Higgins.

Because of the continued bitterly cold weather, Bostonians are taking no chances in putting their furs in storage, and there were many gorgeous furs in evidence last evening. With her black gown Mrs. Robert Treat Paine wore a snowy ermine jacket, and Mrs. Oliver Wolcott covered her black frock and jacket of gold sequins with a chinchilla cape. Wrapped in mink coats were Mrs. Roger Wolcott, who attended with Mr. Wolcott, Mrs. Sydney Harwood, who was accompanied by her debutante granddaughter, Miss Anne Rogers, Mrs. Fuller Halsey and Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, who had a stunning orchid corsage pinned to her mink coat. Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky wore a sable wrap with her black gown, and Mrs. Charles Edward Bacon's wrap was fashioned of squirrel.

Strolling about the foyer together during the intermission were Mrs. Roger Warner and Mrs. Morton Prince, neighbors on Chestnut street. Mrs. Moses Williams, Jr., wore slim black trimmed with gold, and Mrs. Charles F. Toppan who was escorted by Mr. Toppan, chose yacinth blue organza. Sitting together were Miss Hope Halsey and her cousins, Miss Lydia and Miss Mary Fuller, and with Mrs. John T. Bottomley were her two daughters, Miss Ellen and Miss May.

Miss Polly Long, in a printed frock, was escorted by her fiance, Mr. Irving Chase, and another engaged couple present was Miss Patricia Blake and Mr. James J. Storrow. Mrs. Ralph Bradley's black gown was sprinkled with tiny gold, red and green paillettes, and Mrs. Robert Knowles wore brown chiffon and lace. With her black gown and gold wrap Mrs. Evans Dick wore a gold link necklace and Mrs. B. Davis Crowninshield's frock combined two shades of gray and was sashed with coral.

A group of deutantes in red and white candy-stripped smocks sold programs in the lobby before the concert. In the outer lobby were Miss Betsy Bradley, Miss Dorothy Ganett and Miss Elizabeth Jenney, and just inside the door was Miss Jean Saltonstall. Still others were Miss Lee Thacher, Miss Louise Sargent and Miss Nancy Putnam Smith, and heading the group was Miss Lucy Cochrane, in a picturesque peasant costume with an enormous black hat atop her long blonde bob.

To add to the general "get-together" atmoshpere of the evening, a buffet supper was served in the foyer following the concert. In the throng we glimpsed Mr. and Mrs. Guy Warren Walker, Mrs. F. Gordon Patterson and her father, Mr. Harry V. Long, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Campbell, Mrs. Neal Rantoul and her son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike, Jr., Miss Christina Lowell, Mrs. Horatio Lamb and her daughter, Miss Aimee Lamb, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Keller, Miss Amelia Peabody, Miss Jane Pickman, Mr. and Mrs. F. Delano Putnam, Mrs. Horace H. Soule, Mrs. Arthur Grannis, Miss Olivia Ames, Mr. and Mrs. J. Bradford Millet, Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Hovey, rs Edgar Pierce and Miss Helen King.

Still others were Mrs. Ernest B. Dane, Jr., Mrs. Reginald Foster, Jr., Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird, Jr., and her daughter, Miss Diana Bird, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Atherton, Mr. and Mrs. Eben Draper, Mrs. William Dana Orcutt and her son, Mr. Philip Dana Orcutt, Mrs. Igor Stravinsky, Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin Goodale, Mrs. Harold Peabody and her daughter, Miss Gertrude Peabody, Miss Geraldine Field, Mrs. C. Christian Born, Mrs. Henry K. White, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Carl Dreyfus, Mrs. Horace Binney, Mr. and Mrs. Harold Baptiste, Miss Katherine Lane, Miss Alice Stackpole, Miss Elizabeth C. Leland, Miss Margaret Fitzhugh Browne, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Holmes and Mr. John Gardner Greene.

SHE WON HEARTS OF ALL

NOTABLES AT BENEFIT CONCERT
Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, Lily Pons and Count Rene Doynel de St. Quentin, French Ambassador.

Lily Pons Cheered by Brilliant Crowd at French Benefit

Only the opening of the opera could equal the brilliant gathering at Symphony Hall last night. Boston's elite was there en masse to hear the gala benefit concert by Lily Pons, George Copeland, Serge Koussevitzky and an ensemble from the Boston Symphony Orchestra for four organizations for French war relief.

The hall was practically a sellout and more than $7000 was netted. And for enthusiasm, eagerness and appreciation the audience was one of the keenest Boston has ever assembled.

Lily Pons, the gorgeous coloratura diva, sang from her soul. In beautiful voice, in stunning costume, she appeared again and again to acknowledge the cheers and thunderous applause. For her final encore, with Koussevitzky conducting almost 70 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, she gave a breathtaking rendition of "The Blue Danube." That, and the orchestra's playing of the "Marseillaise," with orchestra and audience standing, was the pinnacle of one of the most successful concerts Boston has ever had.

Flags Decorate Interior

The hall was decorated with French and American flags. On the stage were large bouquets of red and white gladioli and blue hydrangeas. And Lily Pons' costume also carried out the French and American colors.

She wore a gown specially designed for the occasion. It was a white taffeta hoop skirt dress, with a French blue scarf draped over the bodice and looped on the skirt. On her head she wore a little white cockade hat topped with the same color blue flowers, and she carried an old-fashioned nosegay of bright red carnations. The audience gasped at her appearance, and never left off gasping until she had made her final bow. Her glorious voice, her gracious manner, her cute little way of tripping off the stage held the people spellbound.

Before the concert and during the intermission, debutante ushers in candy-striped red and white smocks with deep blue sashes and pockets distributed programs. And after it was all over more than 300 persons gathered in the foyer for a buffet supper to meet the French Ambassador to the United States, Count Rene Doynel de Saint-Quentin, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, Lily Pons, pianist George Copeland and the members of the orchestra.

The French Ambassador viewed the program which also included a stirring film of the French celebrations on last July 14, their national holiday, from the box in which also sat the French Consul at Boston, M. Francois Briere and Mme. Briere, Mr. and Mrs. Charles R. Codman—Mrs. Codman was chairman of the executive committee in charge of the program—Mme. Koussevitzky, Mrs. Robert W. Lovett, Mr. and Mrs. Alan Forbes, Mrs. Edward Burlingame Hill and Msgr. Stephen El-Douaihy.

Gov. Saltonstall Present

Directly opposite was Gov. Saltonstall's box, in which appeared the Gov. and Mrs. Saltonstall, Maj. David Weden, the Governor's aide, S. H. Fessenden Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Laurence Hemenway, Mrs. Henry B. Cabot Jr., Miss Olivia Ames, Miss Caroline L. Busk and Mrs. F. Wadsworth Busk.

Police Commissioner Joseph P. Timilty and many others also attended the affair which benefitted the American Field Service, American Friends of France, Inc., American Association for Assistance to French Artists, Inc., and the Defense Contre Avions Canteens.

Ten special policemen under the supervision of Sergt. John J. Crossen were present to guard the celebrities. Two policemen were stationed at the door of Miss Pons' dressing room and the others were at every strategic point in the hall.

Everyone was entranced with the diminutive Lily Pons—even Gov. Saltonstall's chauffeur was wide-eyed. During the concert he reported to Maj. Weden.

"You wanted to know where I am?" he asked. "Well, I'm back stage looking at Lily Pons and she sure is swell!"

Mentions Allies' Pledges

During the intermission Count de Saint-Quentin said that he believed England and France would fulfill their pledges to an "allied nation" if it were attacked.

The French Ambassador to the United States declined to elaborate on the identity of either the "allied nation" or the possible aggressor as he clarified published reports of an interview given today.

Asked concerning the Allied policy with reference to Finland he said the Allies had waited for Finland to appeal for help, but that she did not do so.

Asked to compare the present French Government and its predecessor the Count said only that both were composed essentially of the same men who would pursue a resolutely national policy in conformity with the wishes of the people.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TELEGRAPH

MAR 27 1940

Orchestra Offers Services En Masse

BOSTON, March 26.—Though it was advertised that only a small group of Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians would appear with Lily Pons in a benefit concert for four French war societies tonight, the entire 110-man orchestra answered the curtain—plus an extra man. He was pop concert Conductor Arthur Fiedler, former orchestra member, who said he "sneaked in to do my bit on the viola."

DEDHAM, MASS
TRANSCRIPT
3/15/40

Four French War Oeuvres Concert

Mrs. Edward Cunningham, Mrs. Powell M. Cabot, Mr. ad Mrs. Alexander G. Grant and Mr. Charles Wiggins II are among those who are assisting in arranging the concert at Symphony Hall, March 25, for the benefit of the four French War Oeuvres. Mme. Lily Pons of the Metropolitan Opera, George Copeland pianist, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and many French sympathizers in the Boston Symphony Orchestra are contributing their services to help alleviate the sufferings of thousands of European citizens. The four French War Oeuvres to benefit from this concert are The American Field Service, The American Friends of France, The American Association for Assistance to French Artists and The Defense Contre Avions-Canteens.

BLANK PAGE

Shipman's Scrap Book
FOR DUPLICATE ORDER NUMBER
911
ASA L S SONS
Ward's
STATIONERS
57-61 FRANKLIN ST.
BOSTON

END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE REWIND